Mr. Ryan: I was asking the Prime Minister whether it was a condition for the removal of the 10 per cent surcharge that the United States—

Some hon. Members: Ha, ha.

Mr. Ryan: Does the United States want us to allow our dollar to go over par or up to $1.05? Let me put it this way, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might speak to the Prime Minister after the question period.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, let me put it clearly. As a condition for the removal of the 10 per cent surcharge, is the U.S. insisting that Canada not prevent the dollar from floating over par and to a high of $1.05 in relation to the U.S. dollar?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, no conditions have been put to the Canadian government as a reason for removing the 10 per cent surcharge, and particularly that one. I do not think the U.S. government suspects us of preventing our dollar from moving up, so I think this is a double reason for not making that a precondition.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member had what I thought was a supplementary question. But if not, perhaps he may be allowed a short supplementary question because we are running short of time. We have only five minutes left before the end of the question period.

POLICY OF GOVERNMENT REGARDING LEVEL OF DOLLAR

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): In light of the increasing concern, particularly among our exporters, that the dollar will be allowed to further appreciate, can the Prime Minister assure the House that it is the policy of the government to keep our dollar below par and that this will remain the policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, it is a floating dollar and, as I have told the House, we have not interfered in the market forces in any forceful way. I do not know of any condition of that kind having been put to us. So far as the policy of the Canadian government is concerned, it is merely that we stay with the floating rate for a little while longer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON SHARING REVENUES WITH NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether it is still the position of the government of Canada that it would keep half the royalties from offshore oil and be prepared to divide the other half among the provinces, provided the provinces can agree among themselves on a formula? Is this still the position that the government of Canada is taking in its negotiations with the province of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Prime Minister might prefer to answer this question himself as I have not been involved in the detailed negotiations. I know that an attempt has been made to find the right distribution of advantages, but the Prime Minister might want to say more if he cares to.

An hon. Member: Daddy will answer it himself.

Mr. Hees: Go ahead, wind up and go.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: He is pretty delicate; you have to treat him carefully.

Mr. Stanfield: It may not be as serious for the government to joke about this as it is to joke about unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: I accept the statement of the minister that he is not fully informed, but this is a very serious question. I ask the minister whether he will inform himself and tell the House at a very early stage what the policy of the government is with respect to offshore mineral rights.

Mr. Pepin: I resent this, Mr. Speaker; I am fully informed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: What I know is that an offer was made to the government of Nova Scotia back in 1968. That offer has been discussed on a number of occasions since then, and I was passing the buck to the Prime Minister because I wanted to know whether he cared to reveal at this moment what formulas have been debated. But the general philosophy is very simple. We are trying to distribute advantages in the best possible way between the federal government and the rest of Canada, including the province of Nova Scotia. In the meantime, permits are administered by the federal government, so there is no vacuum of power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Is it too much to ask the Prime Minister or the acting minister what is the position of the government of Canada on a matter of such basic importance to Nova Scotia and to all the provinces of this country?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—DATE OF LAST COMMUNICATION WITH NOVA SCOTIA REGARDING POLICY OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Would the Prime Minister indicate to the House, and to the people who are very concerned about this, exactly when was the last time there was any communication between this government and the government of Nova Scotia on this vital question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There was communication between the premier of Nova Scotia and myself, and indeed the premiers of other Maritime provinces, when I was in that part of the country at the end of July and in early August. Since then I know that there have been meetings between the departments and perhaps even between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the premiers. As a matter of fact, I remember that certainly there have been exchanges of views between our minister and the premiers of some of the provinces some three weeks or so ago.

[Later:]

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—FEDERAL POSITION RESPECTING SABLE ISLAND

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): A further supplementary and the final one for today, Mr. Speaker, and it concerns jurisdiction over the territory that is Sable Island. I wonder if the Prime Minister can indicate if this question has been raised specifically by the government: Is Sable Island part of the territory of Nova Scotia or is that, as a proposition, being considered by this government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question of Sable Island, Mr. Speaker, was one which would have been settled in a proposition we made to the province at the end of 1968. The question was again discussed when I met Premier Reagan just about two months ago. As the House knows, the matter has not yet been settled to the satisfaction of the province of Nova Scotia.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—POSITION OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT REGARDING CLAIMS OF FRANCE TO CONTINENTAL SHELF

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Have negotiations taken place with the government of France with respect to whatever claims the government of France may have to the continental shelf lying off the French islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, and what the position of the government of Canada is with respect to this matter in view of the fact drilling operations are now taking place there?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will have to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to report on this aspect of the question. I know he answered a similar question not so long ago by saying that the matter has not been settled but that negotiations were proceeding.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: The question period has just about expired. I thought perhaps the Chair might allow the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East who raised this matter originally to ask a supplementary question, and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands had a supplementary question on a prior question. I apologize to him for having cut him off but, as I said, we have just about reached the end of the question period.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES SURCHARGE—INQUIRY AS TO PRECONDITIONS FOR REMOVAL—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY UNITED STATES OFFICIAL CONCERNING AUTO PACT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Spadina. The Prime Minister stated that the government has no knowledge of what preconditions the United States government is laying down for the removal of the 10 per cent import surcharge. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he or any of his ministers have made any inquiries throughout all the meetings they have had at the ministerial and official level as to what those preconditions are, and particularly if they have made any inquiries as to whether Mr. John Petty, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, was speaking for the United States government when he said that the removal of the transitional safeguards in the autopact was certainly one of the preconditions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what various ministers and I have said previously. The United States has never said to us, "If you do such and so, we will remove the surcharge", therefore there is no precondition that has been put to us as a reason for them lifting the surcharge as it applies to Canada. I do not think that what Assistant Secretary Petty said is a statement of policy; it is not even presented as a condition and certainly I do not read it as a statement that if we do this with the autopact there will be no more surcharge applied to Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I brought to the attention of hon. members that we reached the end of the question period a moment ago. I realize how important these matters are, but they might be pursued tomorrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKERS GALLERY OF DELEGATION OF BRITISH PARLIAMENTARIANS

Mr. Speaker: Before we call orders of the day, perhaps hon. members would like me to bring to their attention the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a very distinguished delegation of British parliamentarians, under the leadership of Lord Diamond, who are in Ottawa under the auspices of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and as guests of the Canadian House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS TO WESTERN CANADA PRODUCERS IN YEARS WHEN RECEIPTS BELOW FIVE-YEAR AVERAGE

The House resumed, from Monday, October 4, consideration of Bill C-244, respecting the stabilization of prairie grain sale proceeds and to repeal or amend certain related statutes, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture and motions Nos. 1 and 2 of Mr. Gleave (page 7252).

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, just before ten o'clock last evening, I was explaining to the House, at some length, the reason for our opposition to this bill as it now stands. This is related largely to the fact that it is based upon considerations of gross farm income rather than net farm income. Over a period of years that fact would mean that the bill would have the effect of accelerating the process of forcing the small farmer off the land, thereby altering the whole cultural pattern of western Canada and its whole way of life. I was suggesting that the social consequences of such legislation had not been taken into account by the government. They should be and that is why we are fighting so hard to have this change made.

This morning when reading a speech made by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in Assiniboia, I came across some reference to the fact that the New Democratic Party was working hand in glove with the Liberal party in efforts to force the small farmer off the land and to force land consolidation.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Rowland: That statement is patent nonsense and demonstrably so. Who caved in under pressure, the New Democratic Party or the Tories? Who caved in when it became difficult to fight this bill any longer? Yesterday the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) was moved to say that the government was using "impudent, fraudulent and intimidating actions to try to force this bill down the throats of Canadian farmers," and then the Tories withdrew from the debate. Who is hand in glove on that basis? Only four members of the Conservative party stood and supported the New Democratic Party in their efforts to have this bill changed, namely, the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg), the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) and the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher). Now, who is hand in glove?

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Rowland: There are probably two or three others who would have liked to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I think that on reflection the hon. member will realize he has misconceived the purpose of the vote yesterday. It was not a vote to change the bill, but it was a vote to delay the proceedings. It was in relation to that that we cast our vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The point raised by the hon. member for Peace River is hardly a point of order. At this time the Chair might take the opportunity of asking the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) to relate his remarks so far as possible to the amendment under discussion. The Chair does not see any way of relating the last remark of the hon. member to the amendment we are studying at this time.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to reply briefly to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Peace River and then continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Chair hesitates to allow the hon. member to give any kind of reply to the point of order that was ruled out by the Chair and would hope that the hon. member would return to a discussion of the subject that is before the House at this time.

Mr. Rowland: I shall do so, Mr. Speaker. The point of this debate is to have this bill changed so that it will be based upon consideration of net income rather than gross income. That is why the agriculture ministers of the three prairie provinces came to Ottawa; that is what they asked the government to do and that is why they negotiated a cooling-off period in order to permit the federal government to consider that recommendation. It was because the federal government abrogated that agreement unilaterally that we moved adjournment of the debate yesterday. We thought it was a betrayal of confidence, a betrayal of confidence that would never have taken place had those provinces been other than Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. It certainly would not have happened had it been Ontario and Quebec that were concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rowland: I said yesterday that we are getting fed up with that kind of treatment and we will not stand for it any longer. This bill is where we draw the line. We want it changed and we hope the minister will see fit to make the changes that are necessary.

[Mr. Rowland.]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, although the subject of this bill is not part of my departmental responsibility, as a western Canadian—

Mr. Paproski: This is going to be good.

Mr. Richardson: —I feel compelled to enter this discussion. I feel compelled to do so because of the importance of this bill to western Canada, to western agriculture, and in fact to the whole country.

Mr. Paproski: We know Jimmy is going to tell the truth.

Mr. Richardson: In considering the amendment to the motion moved by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) in which he proposed to alter the motion moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), I have heard a few debating points. I have read in Hansard some technicalities and I have seen certain signs of indifference, Mr. Speaker. I want to say now, as I rise in my place, that there is a time to play politics, and there is a time to—

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Obey the law.

Mr. Richardson: —get on with the urgent business of this nation. This, of all times, is not the time to play politics with the livelihood of western Canadian farmers.

Mr. Horner: The government is playing politics with them. It has played politics for ten months with $60 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the hon. member for Calgary North rising on a point of order?

Mr. Woolliams: No, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would permit a question.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I have just begun. I will answer all questions in due course or, if I do not, I will accept them later. I will not accept questions at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members know they may not ask questions of the minister unless he gives them permission. Apparently the minister has not given such permission.

Mr. Richardson: The central issue to be decided—

Mr. Woolliams: Is whether the government will obey the law.

Mr. Richardson: —is not the payment of $100 million and is not just the stabilization plan, important though these are. The important issue is this: who understands, who really understands, the great contribution made by the men who work the top soil of the great plains?

Mr. Skoberg: Who wrote that for the minister?

Mr. Richardson: In the points I want to raise, I want to demonstrate that it is the architects of the stabilization bill who really understand.

Mr. Horner: Now, I have heard everything.

Mr. Richardson: It is they who are prepared now to do something constructive and specific for the western farmer.

An hon. Member: That's a lot of bull.

Mr. Richardson: Two weeks ago, because of the importance of this legislation in so far as the western farmer is concerned, I moved a motion to extend the hours of debate. More than ten hon. members stood in their places and refused that request.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is a bad bill and the minister knows it.

Mr. Richardson: Even worse than that, on the previous day members of the NDP moved a motion to adjourn the House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What's shocking about that?

Mr. Richardson: They moved the adjournment of the House, as we were about to debate this legislation which is of such vital importance to western Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What was so wrong with what they did?

Mr. Richardson: As a western Canadian, I am dismayed and disappointed—

An hon. Member: We all are.

An hon. Member: Listen and learn.

Mr. Richardson: —to see other western Canadians standing in their places and deliberately delaying legislation that is vital to western Canada.

Mr. Horner: The minister has no right to say that.

Mr. Richardson: The record of the opposition on this bill will live for years.

Mr. Dinsdale: It sure will.

Mr. Richardson: I can remember the day when a prairie farmer thought that one of his best friends was a member of the Conservative party.

Mr. Dinsdale: He still does, Jim.

Mr. Richardson: As a result of what we have seen recently, I suggest that that day has gone forever.

Mr. Horner: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the minister has reflected on the attitude of the members of the Conservative party. His assertion is not correct and the record will bear me out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: Shortly after the House was reconvened on September 7, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) asked that this legislation be brought forward. The spokesman on behalf of the government said that it would be brought forward in due course. Exactly nine days after that request, the legislation was brought forward for debate in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What about the adjournment motions?

Mr. Horner: You can move adjournment motions at any time you like.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair asks hon. members to refrain from outbursts as much as possible. The Chair feels that the point raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot is not a point of privilege and hardly a point of order. Actually, he sought the floor for the purpose of clarifying a point. That has been done. The Chair will now recognize the minister who has the floor at this time.

Mr. Richardson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. the record will clearly speak for itself, and it will speak for several years to come. I urge the House to move forward to a decision on the amendment to the motion, and also to a decision on the motion, so that we can bring the stabilization bill to a vote.

Mr. Alexander: What part did the minister play in breaking the law?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He writes the cheques.

Mr. Dinsdale: He has not written any cheques lately.

Mr. Richardson: I urge this for a number of compelling reasons. Let me put these reasons in their simplest terms. Above all, let us get the facts straight in this debate. First, let us look at a few dollar facts. In western Canada, as my hon. friends all know, the crop year is a year which runs from August 1 to July 31 of the following year.

Mr. Horner: I am amazed that the minister knows that.

Mr. Richardson: We are not talking about the calendar year and we are not talking about the fiscal year.

Mr. Horner: Talk about the calendar year.

Mr. Richardson: Let us look at three crop years and make comparisons as between the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and the provisions of the stabilization bill. Listen to this. The over-all fact is that western farmers would receive in the order of $67 million more if the stabilization bill were passed than they would receive if the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act were to remain in force.

Mr. Paproski: How would they receive it?

Mr. Richardson: The hon. member knows how they would receive it: directly, in payments.

Mr. Paproski: But tell us how?

Mr. Korchinski: I think the Prime Minister mentioned $58 million. Who is right?

Mr. Horner: Where did the minister get the $67 million figure?

Mr. Richardson: Instead of receiving their money through the Wheat Board, as was done under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, the farmers in this case would receive cheques directly. There is no more direct way of sending money.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Richardson: So, I was citing the facts.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Richardson: I am about to answer some questions right now, then I will receive others. In the crop year 1970-71, the Wheat Board would have been paid, under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, $62,100,000. Transitional payments to be made directly to some 180,000 farmers under the stabilization bill would amount for the same period, as you know, to $100 million. In the second crop year, 1971-72, the year in which we are now, payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act would amount to approximately $31 million.

Mr. Woolliams: That comes to about $100 million. I wish the minister would explain that.

Mr. Richardson: Wait; we are taking this crop year by crop year.

Mr. Woolliams: Do it altogether.

Mr. Richardson: I am doing it this way in order that we may get the picture straight.

An hon. Member: There speaks the wheat germ kid.

Mr. Richardson: Although the crop year is just over two months old, this figure can readily be calculated because it is based on the amount of wheat in storage on August 1. Under the proposals of this stabilization bill, it is estimated that the federal government's contribution, based upon 4 per cent of 90 per cent of total receipts, would be at least $35 million and could be higher.

An hon. Member: The farmers will not see it that way.

Mr. Richardson: In the next crop year, in the crop year after this one, it is estimated that temporary wheat reserves payments to the Wheat Board would be below $20 million.

An hon. Member: Whose crystal ball is the minister using?

Mr. Richardson: These are Wheat Board figures. Federal government payments under this stabilization bill proposal—

An hon. Member: This is the first time I have heard the minister defending the Wheat Board.

Mr. Richardson: —would continue at $35 million or more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Richardson: This means, Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Richardson.]

Mr. Horner: The minister is not worried about the poor.

Mr. Richardson: This means, and we are getting the facts here,—

Mr. Paproski: The minister is filibustering.

Mr. Richardson: —that under the stabilization bill there would be federal government payments of more than $170 million—

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Gleave: I wonder if the minister would permit a question, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members may only ask questions if they have the minister's permission. He has the floor. Is the minister willing to permit the hon. member to ask a question?

Mr. Richardson: I have made it clear that what I am saying here is designed to answer questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Everybody pay attention.

Mr. Richardson: Then, we will get down to facts.

Mr. Gleave: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to point out that some of the facts the minister has presented to this House are not correct. They are just not correct.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member knows, of course, that he is just making an argument. He should state his point of order when he seeks the floor for this purpose. The Chair hopes that hon. members on both sides will try to at least help the Chair hear what the minister is saying. I am sure this will be to the benefit of everyone.

Mr. Richardson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was just at the point of saying that with this figure for the three crop years, which I have broken down and used to make a comparison between the stabilization bill and the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act—there will be federal government payments of more than $170 million—

Mr. Korchinski: What about the losses?

Mr. Richardson: —just a moment—in three years, compared to $113 million under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. As I have said, this means there would be $67 million more put into the western economy and into the hands of the western farmers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister at least do his subtracting correctly. It is only $57 million, even on the minister's own figures.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is wrong, anyway.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): $113 million from—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Hon. members know—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Horner: Count the parliamentary secretaries again. Have them do your adding for you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Hon. members know they cannot intervene in a debate without first seeking the permission of the Chair. It is very difficult for the Chair to follow the debate, hear the different points that are raised between members and try to apply the rules all at the same time. While hon. members are making noise or attempting to intervene, they are preventing other members from hearing what the minister is saying. The Chair asks for the co-operation of hon. members.

Mr. Woolliams: What's $10 million?

Mr. Richardson: The figures I have given are correct. There will be a federal government payment of more than $170 million in the three year period compared with $113 million under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is correct is pointing out that the difference between those two figures is clearly $57 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Korchinski: You have to reduce that amount by the 2 per cent—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Richardson: Now that the figures have been put on the record, I would like to move to the second reason for moving urgently with this legislation.

Mr. Horner: What about PFAA?

Mr. Richardson: The value of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act to western farmers is declining each year. The figures dropped from $62 million to $31 million, and then to below $20 million.

Mr. Horner: That is wrong.

Mr. Richardson: As far as the western farmer is concerned, the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is a slowly sinking ship.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is being lowered by the government.

Mr. Richardson: We do not mind if the members of the opposition want to stay on board that ship. What we object to is the fact that they want to bring the western Canadian farmer on board with them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Crowfoot is seeking the floor.

Mr. Horner: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister has projected some figures. He has gone into a lengthy description of the crop year. We know what he means by the crop year. I want to ask him the source of those figures, which he said are accurate. He said the payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act would be down from $60 million to $30 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Horner: If he thinks those figures are right—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Crowfoot may have a point for debate, but it is hardly a point of order.

Mr. Horner: If he wants us to believe those figures, he has to give us the source.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: It is the same point of order as that raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). If a member of this House quotes from a document, any member is entitled to know the source of that document. In fact, he is entitled to have that document tabled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members will have to pardon the Chair. I have just assumed the Chair, and at this point I am not sure of the source of the figures. I would like the minister to continue for the time being.

Mr. Richardson: I will continue, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Horner: You cannot substantiate them.

Mr. Richardson: I can substantiate them.

Mr. Horner: Put the source on the record. You cannot do it.

Mr. Richardson: They were supplied by the office of my colleague, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board.

Mr. Horner: Let him put the record straight then.

Mr. Peters: They are phony like the Prime Minister and his figures, really phony.

Mr. Richardson: The observation of the hon. member is correct. These figures have also been made public by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Horner: He did not identify his source over television, and you cannot produce your source now. They are both false.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: They are false.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Supply and Services has the floor. We should try to hear him, and then other members may contribute to the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Give us the source.

Mr. Richardson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will move on. During the debate both within the House and in the country, there has been some evidence of concern that the stabilization bill does not include all of the measures and policies which western farm organizations would like to see. I assure the farming community that I am awake and that other members of the government are well aware of the policies which farm organizations would like to see adopted. I refer to such important matters as a two price system for wheat, the consideration of a floor price for grains, as well as further consideration of some government payment for storage of grain. Just because these important matters are not included in the stabilization bill does not mean they cannot be brought forward for consideration.

Mr. Horner: They were not in the Prime Minister's speech in Winnipeg on June 2, 1968, either.

Mr. Richardson: There have been indications from some farm organizations that lead me to believe they feel the stabilization bill in some way closes the door on these important matters. I wish to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the case. I give this assurance, with the concurrence of course of my colleagues, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board.

The stabilization bill was never intended to be an all inclusive grains policy. It should be viewed as part of a continuing grains policy. It should be seen for what it is, a big step forward in grains policy and clear evidence that the government is now ready to substantially improve the position of western farmers and to recognize the great contribution they make to this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The government is trying to get rid of half of them.

Mr. Richardson: The stabilization bill is also clear evidence of the leadership and untiring effort over many months that my colleague, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, has given to his native province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Paproski: He shaved off his moustache and went west.

Mr. Richardson: He has made a contribution not only to Saskatchewan, but all of western Canada, by establishing a forward looking and constructive grains policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: He is now devoting all his time to immigration.

Mr. Richardson: Although I have worked in the business community, I know the farmland and I know the farming community's contribution to the prosperity and success of the business community. The issue before us, therefore, is very much larger than the wellbeing of western agriculture.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Western agriculture is a springboard for the whole of the economy, and the injection of $100 million that would be made within days of the passage of the stabilization bill would not only improve the prosperity of the west, but would be felt beneficially from coast to coast. What I am emphasizing, Mr. Speaker, is that the government's concern for the western Canadian farmer is not based solely on what we can do for farmers as individuals. We understand that a prosperous farming community helps to create a prosperous industrial community. Western farmers by their labour bring into Canada new money from around the world, and it should not be forgotten that they sell their products in the world at competitive prices, at world prices, but that when western farmers buy manufactured goods, mainly from Ontario and Quebec, they do not always pay world prices.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Will the minister table the name of the author of that speech?

Mr. Richardson: The author of this speech is standing before you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Richardson: I am glad you find it so good.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Give him more time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will ask whether there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Richardson: Thank you; I appreciate the opportunity to continue these remarks.

Mr. Woolliams: There were a few interruptions.

Mr. Richardson: The point I wanted to get across was this—I know it is already understood, but I think it should be underlined—that many of our manufactured goods sell behind a tariff wall for prices which are above world prices.

An hon. Member: Are you talking about the $80 million?

Mr. Richardson: I am coming to that in a minute. Put in its simplest terms, western farmers sell in a free market and buy in a protected market. I point to these facts to emphasize the extent to which the western farmer deserves, and is entitled to, the payment from the national treasury which is proposed in this stabilization bill.

Mr. McCutcheon: You are making history.

Mr. Richardson: Making history or not, I should like to put on record my personal conviction as to the importance of farming to the whole economy. I do not think it was ever better expressed than it was years ago by William Jennings Bryan when he said: "Destroy your cities and leave our farms, and your cities will spring up again as if by magic; but destroy our farms and grass will grow in the streets of every city in the land."

Mr. Dinsdale: Spoken like a true Conservative.

Mr. Richardson: That is why it is important to dispose of the amendments and pass the stabilization bill.

Mr. Korchinski: Richardson for Prime Minister.

Mr. Richardson: Let someone put that on the Hansard record. I realize I am imposing on the time of hon. members. I just want to add that if democracy, of which we are all proud, means anything, it means that the voices of the people are heard and that the voices of all the people help to determine what legislation will be passed into law in this place. At this point, in what we hope are the closing days of this debate, when we are trying to make a simple choice between passing the stabilization bill and continuing with the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, I say to all the farmers of western Canada: let us hear from you; let your representatives on both sides of this House hear your decision before we make our decision.

Mr. Horner: Isn't it a little late?

Mr. Richardson: This is what we want to find out. Let us hear whether you want the stabilization bill to be passed or whether you want to stay with the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. That is the most important single issue. We want to see democracy at work. We want to hear your judgment on this matter.

One last point, if I may. Again, as a western Canadian, I cannot help but reflect upon the fact that since the House reconvened on September 7 the government has put forward two important pieces of legislation, bills it wanted to see passed.

Mr. Paproski: Name them.

Mr. Richardson: One is the stabilization bill, which we are debating, to provide $100 million to western Canada. The other is the employment support bill which came along much later and which provides $80 million in grants to industry.

Mr. Horner: Did you take that $80 million from industry in the first instance?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I gather hon. members would like to hear the minister continue his remarks and they have given their consent to his doing so. But since I have pointed out to other speakers the necessity of being relevant to the amendment and to the motion before the House, I want to be on record as saying that the hon. minister would appear to be wandering considerably beyond the scope of the matter which is before us.

Mr. Richardson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not know how I could possibly be more relevant than to mention the reasons for moving to a quick decision on the amendment which is before us.

Mr. Peters: The amendment is on page five.

Mr. Richardson: I simply wanted to draw a comparison between the $80 million provided in the employment support bill and the $100 million in the stabilization measure. It is estimated that only 3 per cent of the industries likely to benefit under the employment support act are in the prairie provinces. By far the larger number are in Ontario and Quebec. Both bills are government bills. The government is trying to be fair to all parts of the country. I think westerners will have to consider and observe the manner in which Conservatives and members of the New Democratic Party alike have reacted to each of these bills. I would think the leader of the Progressive Conservative party and the leader of the NDP would each wish to reflect upon the speed with which their supporters helped to get the employment support bill passed and compare that performance with the delaying tactics which are evident in passing to legislation which would benefit the west.

I wish to conclude by asserting that the government is concerned equally about all parts of Canada, and I urge hon. members to move forward to bring the amendments to a vote. We are speaking here of vital matters.

Mr. Horner: Pay the money.

Mr. Richardson: We are talking about long-term stabilization of income on the Prairies. But of equal importance we are talking about short-term prosperity, real prosperity in the west between now and Christmas. Our concern primarily is to recognize the great contribution made to Canada by the men who work the topsoil of the great plains.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Another speech like this and that topsoil will blow away.

Mr. Richardson: I say to the members of this House that in my opinion the prairie topsoil is one of the sacred possessions of this nation. It and the men who work on that soil are not suitable subjects to be made the pawns in a political game. It is for these compelling reasons that I urge the House to reach a decision on the amendment to the motion, to reach a decision on the amendment, to reach a decision—

Mr. MacInnis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is seeking the floor on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: My point of order is this. If the minister has such feelings for the western farmer, can he not express them without reading them from a prepared text, which is against the rules of this House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is entitled to raise the point of order. However, I do not think it is unique for an hon. member to refer closely to notes in making a speech. In my experience here, I have observed that this quite often happens. The Minister of Supply and Services.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is seeking the floor on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: It is the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your ruling, but is the Chair trying to imply that the minister has not been reading his speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair did not imply anything of that sort. The Minister of Supply and Services.

An hon. Member: That's the only time you speak, to raise a point of order.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member for his intervention. If I had been able to read my speech in this House, I would have been able to complete it much more quickly. I think if hon. members compare Hansard with what I have written down they will find a great deal of difference between the two.

Mr. MacInnis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. An hon. member interjected while remaining seated and imputed motives. He said the only time I speak in the House is when I raise a point of order.

An hon. Member: Give us a statement of fact.

Mr. MacInnis: If I were to refer the House to a statement of fact, I would refer hon. members to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said when this minister was elected. He said—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Supply and Services.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed participating—

Mr. MacInnis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I will continue to raise points of order as long as members opposite are allowed to make interjections, while remaining seated, and impute motives. I will continue to raise a point of order in connection with reading speeches in this House, and to refer to the Prime Minister's remarks about this minister. He said, "So you have elected James Richardson; you could have done better"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his point of order. The Minister of Supply and Services.

Mr. Richardson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was saying that I have enjoyed participating in this debate, and I want to end by urging the House to reach a decision on the amendment to the motion, to reach a decision on the amendment, to reach a decision on the motion and in the name of the western farmer to reach a decision on the stabilization bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, before Your Honour took the Chair the minister did say that he would answer questions. I was wondering whether Your Honour would be gracious enough to give the minister extra time so I can put a question to the minister, with his consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The situation is that hon. members extended the time of the minister, and if the minister will accept the question the hon. member for Calgary North may ask it.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my question is a very simple one. I am wondering on which side of the fence the minister is. The Prime Minister has admitted that for about the last 14 months the government has been breaking the law as a result of its failure to pay the farmers under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. The Minister of Justice has been quoted all across Canada in newspapers as saying that the law has not been broken. What position does the minister take in this regard?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the facts as far as I am concerned are that no member of this government has ever suggested that we did not have an obligation to make payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

Mr. Woolliams: Why did you not make them, then?

Mr. Richardson: Because we brought forward a bill for consideration which repeals that act, a bill that is a great improvement on that act. In my opinion, this government has acted in a responsible manner. We have been responsible to the House on this issue in the same way as we are responsible to the House on everything else. We are not repealing the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act; we are asking the House and Parliament to do that.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had not planned to intervene this afternoon, but following some of the things the minister said I feel compelled to say a few words. I should like to start just where the minister finished. He seemed to recognize at last that it was this House and Parliament that change the laws, not the government. Yet ever since August 1, 1970 the government has been defying the laws of this land. It has refused to comply with the laws of this land, taking the position that just because it has decided to change the law it can ignore the law that exists. The minister can talk all he likes about this government behaving responsibly; to my knowledge no government has behaved so irresponsibly as this one.

An hon. Member: Don't read your speech now.

Mr. Stanfield: No, I will try not to do that. My difficulty is I cannot read my own writing.

The bill before the House has at least two different aspects. One relates to what is called an interim payment of $100 million and clearly has nothing at all to do with the longer range stabilization plan. If the government had been prepared to separate this payment from the stabilization plan, I would have expected the House very quickly to approve of this $100 million payment, though it is by no means clear that this is much better, if at all better, than what is already required to be paid under existing laws. Clearly the government has refused to separate the $100 million adjustment payment from the other payments because it knows perfectly well that it is unable to sell the stabilization plan, not only to the members of the House but to the farmers of western Canada. Blackmail may be a strong word, but certainly the adjustment payment is there. The government refuses to separate these two in the hope this will constitute enough sugar to persuade the farmers of western Canada to somehow or other swallow the pill which so far they have found difficulty in swallowing.

One might say also that the comparative figures used by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and by the minister this afternoon—I do not want to be unparliamentary—are not honest. The minister is comparing his $100 million plus the payments which someone or another next to him, using some basis of calculation—

Mr. Lang: I knew you didn't understand it.

An hon. Member: Don't be arrogant.

Mr. Peters: He is at least being honest.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: They were your figures; no wonder we don't understand them.

Mr. Stanfield: The figure was $100 million plus what somebody has calculated will be payable under stabilization contributions to be made by the Canadian government. This minister, like the Prime Minister, has compared this with the payment the government is required to make under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, very blithely ignoring, as I understand the situation to be, that if the stabilization bill is accepted not only does the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act go out the window, but also the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the legislation relating to pool losses. Yet this minister from western Canada stands in the House, and this is one of the reasons I felt compelled to take part in the debate this afternoon, purporting to serve the interests of farmers in western Canada, but does not have the frankness to make a fair comparison. He tries to put before this House, like the Prime Minister tried to put before the people of Canada, a very misleading comparison and an extensively misleading situation. They are, therefore, suspect right from the start.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The government compares the $100 million with the money owing by this government to the Wheat Board under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, but those payments have nothing to do with the stabilization plan. All this aspect of the government's operations, which the minister just described as honest, can in fact be summed up by the simple use of the word "blackmail".

As far as the stabilization plan is concerned, it is unsatisfactory and unacceptable to all of us in its present form for the number of reasons given here and elsewhere, yet the government has refused to amend it. It has not only refused to be responsive to suggestions from the floor of this House, it has refused to be in any way responsive to the requests made by the provincial Ministers of Agriculture. The government has not only been arrogant in respect of its breach of the law and dishonest in respect of figures it has put out, it has been bullheaded in refusing to take any advice from anybody, including those provincial ministers of agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I am opposed to governments breaking the law persistently; I am opposed to this government trying to bull through this House a stabilization bill which is not satisfactory to the farmers and is not gaining support from the farmers. I am opposed to the government trying to slip this past the farmers with the use of some sort of sugar coating.

An hon. Member: It has been before the House for six months. It must be a six months' slip.

Mr. Stanfield: I am opposed to the bill, and I have not been persuaded by the minister this afternoon to be otherwise. I think the government is simply trying to be too smart; first of all in breaking the law and, secondly, in the technique it has used in an attempt to get this bill accepted. I cannot accept the bill in its present form. I cannot approve of the stubborn refusal of the government to accept any amendment to make it satisfactory. The government deserves opposition to this bill. That is exactly what it is getting from the opposition, which is serving the interests of the farmers in western Canada far more than that minister, whose fundamental sincerity I believe, who put this bill before the House this afternoon in a very misleading way.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is one thing for which we owe a debt of gratitude to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson). His intervention this afternoon has brought the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) back into the fight. I was beginning to worry about the reports of what the Leader of the Opposition said out west, that he was going to let this bill slip through, but obviously he now takes a different view.

I rise to support the amendment of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), which was moved to the motion presented by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), and I shall state in a moment or two my reasons for supporting that position. Before I do so, I think I am entitled to deal with the figures the Minister of Supply and Services has placed before us this afternoon. They are substantially the figures the Prime Minister, with a blackboard and pointer, placed before the people of Canada the other night on national television.

I assert that the country is being deceived by these figures. I ask the House, and particularly my fellow city members in this chamber, who are more numerous than farmers, to pay attention to this and look closely at the two sets of figures. The Prime Minister, and now the Minister of Supply and Services, asks us to look at a period of three crop years from August 1, 1970, to July 31, 1973. One of those crop years has gone, we are in the second one, and we are asked to take into account the next one as well.

They tell us that if Bill C-244 does not pass, all the farmers will get will be the money paid out under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, and that for the three years this will be $113 million. There is a certain amount of guesswork with regard to what happens during those three years, but I do not quarrel with that general calculation of $113 million for those three crop years.

Then, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Supply and Services tell us that under Bill C-244 there would be an immediate $100 million transitional payment by the government, as the minister said, within a few days, and that there would be $35 million in this present crop year and another $35 million in the next crop year, or a total of $170 million. The Prime Minister and the minister have asked us and the public to believe that this is the whole and true picture; than on the one hand the farmers get $113 million and on the other they get $170 million. Actually, I do not quarrel, as my colleagues would, with the estimate of $35 million in each of the next two crop years. I am not going to set my estimates against those of the government. Those figures could be less; they could be $30 million or $28 million. But even if one accepts those figures, and this is what I want the House to look at, under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act the entire $113 million would be paid by the government, and the minister is the boss of the man who signs the cheques. I thought he was going to tell us this afternoon that he had ordered the cheque to be written to the Canadian Wheat Board. In any event, the entire $113 million would be paid to the Wheat Board and would go to the farmers of western Canada.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lang: Not necessarily.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, because whether the minister—

Mr. Lang: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a minute. Let me finish my analysis of this. That money, that $113 million, gets through to the farmers. But in the case of $170 million, the $100 million goes directly to the farmers. Yes; they have already had their letters and they know how much they would get depending upon the acreage on their permit books and so on. But the other $70 million does not go to the farmers. It goes to the stabilization fund. I am talking about these three years because they are the years the government talked about. In that same period, the farmers will contribute to that same fund $35 million, or $17½ million a year.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If I am given an extension, then I will accept all the questions the minister wants to put to me. In that same period, the farmers will have put $35 million into the fund. So, this arithmetic is not complicated. If you look at the current cash position of the farmers for this three-year period, this is the situation. Under the present law they would be better off by $113 million, but under Bill C-244 they would get only $65 million because they would get $100 million now out of the transitional payment fund but they would have to pay back $35 million into the stabilization fund. I suggest that the government should have the honesty—

Mr. Lang: I would be glad to straighten you out.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —to tell the farmers of western Canada, the people of Canada and this House that that is the real picture. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) at one point this afternoon said that this money would go directly to the farmers. He was talking about Bill C-244. I tried to ask him a question to straighten him out but I did not have an opportunity to do so. I ask the government to be straightforward and let the farmers, the country and this House know that that is the picture, and if this bill does not pass, in terms of current cash in their pockets position, the farmers will be better off than they would be if Bill C-244 passes so far as this three-year period is concerned. I may say at the same time that calculations under the PFAA would have to be taken into consideration. I do not think the effect would be extensive but the position of the farmers would be even worse under Bill C-244 than under the present situation.

I recognize quite readily that if Bill C-244 passes, in addition to the fact that the farmers would have $65 million in their pockets in this three-year period as opposed to $113 million under the present law, there would be in the stabilization fund a total of $105 million which would be made up of the $70 million put in it in the two years by the government and the $35 million put in by the farmers. The government may say that is an asset the farmers will have. I have had so many letters over the years from retired public service employees and retired CNR employees and others wondering why they could not get the benefit of the millions of dollars in funds that I do not want the farmers put in the position where they can be told they are well off because there is this huge amount of money in the stabilization fund most of which they may never see.

A few days ago when I was thinking about entering this debate it was not my thought to zero in on this three-year period. I have done so because of what the government has done and what the Prime Minister did the other night in the dishonest and distorted picture he gave when he talked about this $113 million. I think the figure was $112 point something million, but the minister says $113 million and that is about the same. The Prime Minister said, leave the legislation as it is; let the opposition deny us the right to pass this bill and that is all the farmers get, $113 million, in these three years, but pass the bill a generous Liberal government has brought in and they will have $170 million. This is not true. They will have a net of $65 million under Bill C-244 as opposed to $113 million under the present law.

That leads us to the question of the stabilization fund, the $105 million that would be there at the end of two years if the government's calculations are correct. This goes to the whole question of the rationale of this bill and our reason for trying to improve it. That is what the amendments before us now are all about—the motion of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) and the amendment of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). The whole purpose of these amendments is to try to improve the formula in this bill which provides for the farmers to get payments from the fund.

It is no improvement in the farmer's position and no fun just to put money into a fund all their lives. There is a possibility that is what could happen because this fund works on what is called a moving five-year average and farmers will get payments out of it in any bad year only if the gross income in that year is less than the average of the last five years.

An hon. Member: Ninety per cent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should get the 90 per cent figure in there. I thank my friend for that correction. May I point out that it would be possible for conditions in agriculture to decline year after year, and under this government they probably will—

Mr. Lang: This is a record year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —but because it is a moving average any year, no matter how bad it might be it might not be below the average of the immediately preceding five years.

This is not a stabilization program. At best it is an income insurance program for a year of disaster, a year of catastrophe. I submit it is not properly drawn. It is not even a good insurance scheme. I think the more the farmers come to understand it the more they feel it should not be pushed down their throats. That is why we are opposing it in the course of this debate as we are. Last June there was some opposition to it. My friend sitting behind me and I were accused of blocking it. We accept the accusation and the disastrous political result because we like the kind of disaster which took place in Saskatchewan on June 23. Why did the farmers of Saskatchewan vote against the Liberals? For quite a few reasons, but one is that they do not like the so-called stabilization plan. The effect of this stabilization plan, if it does anything, is to stabilize poverty. You know, Mr. Speaker, this government is awfully good at this job of redistributing poverty. You would stop me if I got too far into the matter of old age pensions but I will not go so far that you will have to stop me.

What happened the last time the government amended the old age security act? It redistributed the poverty of the old people. It took some away from some old people to give a little more to other old people. The government is good at redistributing poverty. The government tells us that this legislation will make things better. The Minister of Supply and Services said that this is an improvement and that is why we in western Canada should support it. We were told about the new unemployment insurance act, that it was a tremendous improvement. Not a day passes that I do not receive letters from people saying that they are worse off under it than they were before. Some people are better off, but some people are worse off. We were told the same thing about the veterans legislation. How many members receive letters, particularly from those on the war veterans allowance, who state that their position has been made most difficult because of the way that act operates. So, we do not accept the assertion of the Minister of Supply and Services or of the government that this legislation is an improvement over the old one and therefore we are not being filibusterers, obstructionists, undemocratic and irresponsible because we oppose this legislation. We are not just playing around with it and making amendments for the fun of it. We say it is a bad bill. We say that it is against the interests of the farmers of western Canada and that it should not be supported by this House.

You might say, Mr. Speaker, when are you going to talk about the amendment? Let me talk about it enough to be in order, but to this point I have been dealing with the remarks made by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson).

The point of the motion and amendment is to try to improve the bill a little so that there will be some chance of the farmers getting some money out of this fund into which they will have to pay money if this bill passes. But the way the bill now reads, the farmers can get income out of the fund only if the total gross income with respect to the six grains that are dealt with in this bill is below the average of the immediately preceding five years. We contend that that figure of gross income is a misleading one, particularly because of the rising costs of production that can take place and there is no chance of farmers gaining from this unless the income in a bad year is at least the net income.

That was the purpose of the motion moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave). Under this motion, when the net income, rather than the gross income, falls below the average of the preceding five years, payments would come into effect. The purpose of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) is to be somewhat more precise and to set the first crop year in this cycle as the base period and to take into account the increased cost of production between that base year and subsequent years. We think that that would make at least a slight improvement, that there would be some chance of there being years in which farmers would get benefits out of the fund.

That is why we think the House should support the amendment and then support the motion as amended by the words in the amendment of the hon. member for Skeena. But I have no hesitation in saying that even if that takes place, the bill is still not a stabilization plan; it is not what the ministers over there talk about, namely, something that will even out the bumps and the hollows. It is at best a plan to provide income insurance for years that are particularly bad, particularly catastrophic. We may go 10 or 20 years without having that kind of year, particularly because of this so-called moving average. I say, therefore, that even if this bill were amended it would not be the kind of bill that would meet the situation. One of the difficulties is that if you get this kind of bill on the statute books, as with so many other things, it will be years before it can be changed. I say to the Minister of Supply and Services, my neighbour from Winnipeg, that I think we would be rendering a disservice to the farmers of western Canada if we allowed this bill to pass. That is why we are still standing here doing our best to persuade the government to withdraw it.

I continue to protest against the failure of the government to carry out the law as it now obtains in the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which requires these payments to be made. The government is now 15 months in default, and the law is there just as much for the government as it is for anyone else, and it has not been kept.

I also object very strongly to the fact that this debate is taking place during the early days of this week after the clear understanding that was arrived at between the minister and the prairie ministers of agriculture last Friday that there would be a moratorium, a cooling off period, during which the government would look at the proposals made to it by those ministers. You cannot call it consideration just to have slept on it over the weekend from Friday to Monday.

I have no hesitation in saying that I have been speaking to at least one of the western ministers of agriculture and he was horrified to learn yesterday that this bill was under debate. He asked me: "Stanley, what happened?" I tried to explain, but he certainly had the clear understanding that the bill would not be proceeded with until the minister in charge of the Wheat Board had reported back to the western ministers of agriculture. As of this morning, that has not taken place. I am told that the minister's assistant has communicated with at least one minister to inform him that the debate was on again, but there has been no answer to the proposals that were made to this government by the prairie ministers when they were here last Thursday. There is a great deal of talk by this government about participatory democracy. One way of course is to involve the other levels of government, to involve the provinces. I submit that to let those ministers come down here and have those discussions on Friday, to come to whatever understanding they may have come to, then to throw it out the window and say "it is all off; we are going to put this bill through" is certainly not carrying out participatory democracy.

People are becoming somewhat discouraged about what is going on. I hear people who are on the other side of the fence say on the radio that they are disturbed because the debate is going on and there is obstructionism by the opposition. They ask us why we do not let the government get its way. The other side of the picture is that the government has a responsibility to the people of this country, the responsibility to keep its word. I submit that that is not being done by holding this debate this week, and I submit that the government is not measuring up to its responsibility to maintain the law by its failure to pay the amounts specified under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I see that Your Honour is on the edge of the chair, so I will sit down. I want to emphasize again how thoroughly dishonest the government is in trying to tell the farmers and the people of Canada that it is a choice between $170 million and $113 million when, so far as these three years are concerned, it is a choice between $113 under the old law and $65 million under Bill C-244.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the minister rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The minister would need the unanimous consent of the House because the hon. member's time has expired. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lang: I should like to ask the hon. member what is really a three part question. Is he aware of the fact that with regard to the amounts of money involved, the figures which the Minister of Supply and Services was using were the amounts which it would cost the treasury in that period of time, and that so far as the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act money is concerned, it is inaccurate to say that the amount being paid for the next year or the following year would necessarily go to the farmer, because any deficit in the pool could wipe out any payment to the farmer. Second, is the hon. member aware of the fact that while the government commitment to the fund under Bill C-244 is only probably in the order of $35 million under the 4 per cent formula for the next couple of years, the amount of payments to the farmer could in fact be very significant and could amount to $100 million, $200 million or $300 million, as it would have done two and three years ago.

Third, is he aware of the fact—

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether that is a question. It seems to me that the minister is making a speech rather than putting a question. Perhaps he might allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to reply to the first two questions, and we will then ascertain whether the minister still has the consent of the House to resume his questioning.

Mr. Peters: We should adjourn the debate so that the minister can find out what the bill is all about. He is totally confused.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I say in reply to the minister that I am aware of these imponderables, of figures that can change. It is interesting that the minister and his colleague and the Prime Minister want to use firm figures that are fairly high when they talk about what would be paid under Bill C-244, but then they downgrade the figures when they talk about what would be available under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

Mr. Lang: These are the facts.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister has not persuaded me that he gives the country the facts.

Mr. Lang: I have not persuaded you, but I am giving the facts.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister wants to make the point that although the government says that under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act there would be another payment of $51 million between the end of the last crop year through the next two, maybe it might be less. Yes, it might be less, but so might the amount of money under Bill C-244 in each of the next two years be a lot less than the $35 million which the minister indicated. In fact, if you want to cut both figures down we are about even Stephen.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Lang: The $38.6 million is certain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The $38.6 million on top of $62.1 million—all right.

An hon. Member: It could go to a deficit.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will take the minister's figures, $62.1 million.

Mr. Lang: That is treasury costs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will take $62.1 million plus $38.1 million—

Mr. Lang: You are still not getting it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Plus $38.1 million—or rather $38.6 million—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether we might have some sort of order.

An hon. Member: We are doing fine.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was granted unanimous consent for an extension of time to answer a question. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has been waiting for some time to make his speech. Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) might attempt to reply to the question as quickly as possible so that the Chair may recognize the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was trying to deal with the figures that the minister now puts out which are a correction of the Prime Minister's figures. The Prime Minister compared $113 million with $170 million. The present minister wants to talk of the amount that is there, namely, $62.1 million for the last crop year and $38.6 million—

Mr. Lang: No, no—$38.6 million only if you are talking about payments to the farmer.

Mr. Horner: You are wrong.

Mr. Burton: For 1969-70.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think the minister should be given time to study his own legislation. Even on his terms, there is more money that would go into the pockets of the farmers under the present situation than under the new legislation. When you consider that the only guarantee—the only guarantee—to the farmers under the new legislation is the $100 million—oh yes, there is another guarantee. There is the guarantee that they will have to pay money back into that fund during the next few years.

Mr. Dinsdale: About 2 per cent of earnings.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Far from the comparison being what I made it out to be, $65 million under the new legislation versus $113 million under the old, it might even be worse. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the dishonesty the government has been using, the deception it has been handing out to the people, is just being compounded by what the minister is saying now. When the minister wanted to point out that it could be more than $35 million, he still used the phrase "payments to farmers". These payments are not going to farmers, they are going to a stabilization fund. As far as the farmers are concerned, it could be the same as money in some of the pension funds around the country that never gets to the people who deserve it.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is time the picture was put clearly. One of the reasons I got into the debate is that as a non-farmer I have to study some of this legislation with special care, and the more I do the more I realize we are being submitted to a case of blackmail. We are being asked to buy a piece of legislation because there is $100 million in it which has conditions which are utterly intolerable for the farmers of western Canada.

I submit to the minister that he will find out by the Liberal vote in Assiniboia on November 8 what the farmers out west think. With the prairie agriculture ministers and the prairie farm organizations becoming agitated about this, I think the most honest and most responsible thing for the government to do is to withdraw this bill from debate, to take it back and study it again and have consultation with those who really know what it is all about.

Mr. Lang: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The minister is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the obvious difficulty that the hon. member is having with the figures, I should very much like the consent of the House to have a few moments to explain them to him. I know he has been studying this matter but he has not got the figures straight.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister also explain the figures to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion is now being made by the minister that he should speak a second time with the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it understood that this applies only to the minister and not to other hon. members who may want to reply to him? Of course, hon. members will appreciate that if the minister is allowed to make a second speech it is being done by unanimous consent. Any member who wishes the same privilege will also have to seek the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: And no time limit.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is not being entirely fair to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Lang: I shall deal only with the specific item of the figures. I appreciate the indulgence of the House in allowing me to rise to do so.

The payments which were referred to by both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Supply and Services were the payments which the treasury would make under either the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act or Bill C-244 specifically. In the case of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, the payments are known for one year to be $62.1 million, are estimated with a fair degree of accuracy at this stage for the next year at $30.8 million and are estimated rather more speculatively for the third year at $20 million for a total of $112.9 million. Under Bill C-244, the Stabilization Act, transitional payments are $100 million known exactly for the first year, $35 million estimated as the 4 per cent levy for the current crop year and $35 million estimated rather more speculatively for the following year, making a total of $170 million. Let me turn to the other side of the picture.

Mr. Peters: To whom are you paying those sums? You are paying them to two different organizations. They are not the same figures.

Mr. Lang: If I may repeat what I said at the beginning, those are specifically the amounts which the treasury would pay. I am not saying at that point to whom, but those are the amounts the treasury would pay. Now, let me turn to the "to whom".

An hon. Member: Did you check with Big Daddy?

Mr. Lang: If we have the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act route followed, without therefore passing Bill C-244, of the $62.1 million which would be paid we know that $38.6 million would reach the farmers because that is in connection with a crop year for which the transactions are concluded. Had that amount been paid it would ordinarily have been paid on June 17 as we made quite clear at all times. The $38.6 million would therefore have reached the farmers. The balance would apply to future operations of the wheat pool as would the $30.8 million and the $20 million estimated for the subsequent years. These would apply to future wheat pools. The point I made to the hon. member who just spoke was that should any of these pools turn out to be in a deficit position, not one penny of it flows through to the farmer. So, there is no certainty possible at this time whether those amounts of money will get to the farmer. All that would happen would be the payment by the treasury would, to that extent, reduce the treasury obligation on another account. It would not get to the farmer if the pools were in a deficit position, as it was a year ago when the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act Payments did not get through to the farmers.

Mr. Horner: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Lang: Certainly.

Mr. Horner: Would that same point not hold true if there were a deficit? That, too, would come out of the fund that you spoke about which would be built up by contributions of the federal government of $35 million in each of the two years under the grain stabilization fund. That deficit would come out of the fund?

Mr. Lang: It would, but would not interfere with the amount of payments made to the farmers.

Mr. Horner: If there is a deficit in the barley pool would that not come out of the treasury fund?

Mr. Lang: It will, through the stabilization fund in any case.

Mr. Horner: No, it won't.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that they are compounding the difficulties. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had the floor; the minister asked a question; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre replied; the minister got the floor by unanimous consent to explain the answer he had given to a question and now he is being questioned by the hon. member for Crowfoot. This is just about the most disorganized debate I have ever seen.

Mr. Horner: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Horner: I should like to apologize to Your Honour and to the House for interrupting the minister, but he was granted the privilege of speaking on a second occasion to clarify figures. I was only trying to assist him in clarifying the figures.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the sentiment and purpose of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and will welcome further opportunities for his clarification. I have dealt with the fact that under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act the only amount we are sure would go to the farmers is $38.6 million. Under the stabilization transitional payment, we know that $100 million, would go to the farmer. For future years, the issue is speculative with regard to both cases. Temporary wheat reserves payments would not go to farmers if there were a deficit. We would expect some money to go through, but we do not know how much. On the stabilization bill side, the amount that would go to the farmer depends upon the total sales situation for the year. If we are comparing payments which may go to farmers, we have to be honest enough to recognize that that contingency is a very large one. Although the treasury will make a specific payment of $35 million in certains years, the contingent liability under Bill C-244 is unlimited. As I say, under the bill it is unlimited. There may not be a precedent for this on our statute books. The payment to the farmer will be whatever is required in any of those years to bring his gross receipts for the year in question up to the average of the previous five years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But the government does not pay.

Mr. Lang: Although I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the record level of exports achieved under this government this year is likely to continue and that we will set new records, history teaches that we will not enjoy a smooth line of rising exports, so as we move ahead there will be a series of drops from the high levels. In those years the amounts which will be paid to farmers is not limited and will be set by the formula. If the stabilization plan had been in effect between 1945 and 1971, the fund would have paid to the farmer $3.96 for every dollar that the farmer put into the fund. Such payments simply must not be ignored when we calculate the benefit that would accrue to the farmer from such plans. I urge the venerable hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) not to use the word "dishonest" while ignoring the fact that payments like these may be made to the farmer.

The figures used by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) were exactly accurate with regard to payments out from the treasury. If the hon. member was talking about those figures, then those figures are accurate. If he is talking about receipts by farmers, he must compare similar and not different things. He must recognize that, as far as the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is concerned, we are sure only that farmers would be getting $38.6 million whereas, under Bill C-244, $100 million would be paid out to farmers. History teaches that there will be significant benefits to the farmer under the stabilization plan.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to ask a question of the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Burton: Since the minister claimed that only $38.6 million, I believe that was the figure, could be said to be directly payable to the farmers, as of now, would he explain why the Prime Minister said in his broadcast on Sunday night that, "In the last crop year under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act we would be in process of paying to western farmers $62 million." Those are the words he used.

Mr. Lang: I think it is obvious that in another context one could refer to payments to the Wheat Board or payments to the stabilization fund as being payments to western farmers or to farmers' institutions on their behalf.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that not dishonest?

Mr. Lang: If that misled the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre at all, it misled him in a way that was favourable to his argument that more was being paid under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I am surprised that the hon. member suggests that the Prime Minister was dishonest if he suggested the figure was $62 million when the real figure ought to have been $38.6 million.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Finally, Mr. Speaker, we realize that Bill C-244 is confusing. Various interpretations have been brought forward in the House and if hon. members are unable to understand the exact meaning of Bill C-244, just imagine the position of Prairie grain producers. When we go over there we see how these farmers fail to understand the legislation supposedly brought forward in their behalf.

This afternoon we heard two ministers, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and members of the NDP. Each one has his own interpretation of Bill C-244. In the meantime, western farmers are calling for more attention and asking Parliament to take swift action, because they need their money.

Since the end of last week, I have been receiving letters from Saskatchewan. One of them says:

[English]

Mr. Member of Parliament:

The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act assists only those who produce wheat and large farmers.

The Grain Stabilization Plan helps all farmers and small farmers.

Stop playing politics and allow the Stabilization Plan to go to a vote.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Those people do not say: Adopt this bill immediately. Not at all! They ask that the question be put to a vote. At the present time, in this very place, within the federal Parliament, western farmers are used for political purposes; their problems are turned into political issues.

A short while ago, my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke about the by-election to be held in Assiniboia in one month or so, when the electors will show their dissatisfaction. Other governments have held power before the one now dealing with the problems of the Canadian farmers. Did they solve those problems? We are still facing the same ones after 10, 15 and 20 years.

For three days we have witnessed an inconceivable waste of time in this House: three adjournment motions were moved and we lost an hour and a half voting on them. And what did that solve? Nothing!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Because it does not come from the province of Quebec.

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member for Edmonton West says the reason is that it does not come from the province of Quebec. I am from the province of Quebec, and I have never behaved so stupidly as Progressive Conservative members from Alberta. Anyway, we did not introduce adjournment motions for the sole purpose of delaying the work of the House, and the hon. member knows that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Talk about abortion and the Criminal Code amendment.

Mr. Caouette: We opposed it because the bill was unacceptable.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Bill C-244 is not any more acceptable.

Mr. Caouette: That is not sure and this is so true that the hon. member for Edmonton West avoids talking about Bill C-244 when he is in his riding, just as he is afraid to talk about it in the House.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is a real farce.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that when I say that they want to play politics with farmers, I am right. Members of all political parties are presently touring the West to tell farmers in Saskatchewan: Protest against Bill C-244, at the expense of certain people, or, help us pass it. What I am condemning this government for is its failure to apply the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act—a law already in force—and its failure to pay immediately to western farmers the amount of $100 million which had been promised to them, and which is not only due under the law, but also as a matter of justice.

Mr. Speaker, western farmers are writing us that they are confused. No wonder, because here, in this very House, we are all confused concerning this bill.

I heard the minister say a while ago: "It will be paid to the farmers!" Maybe yes, maybe not. We are convinced that the $100 million now due to the western farmers should be paid, irrespective of the passage of Bill C-244. If we have to continue to spend weeks or months on Bill C-244, let us do so but not at the expense of a group or in the spirit described by the hon. member for Edmonton West a while ago, to wit that it has nothing to do with the East. When did the hon. member see the East rise in anger against the West about assistance granted to western farmers?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Such is your attitude!

Mr. Caouette: It is not my attitude, but that of the hon. member for Edmonton West who raised the question. We have never raised it in the House. We are demanding the introduction of a comprehensive farming policy in Canada equally favourable to eastern and western farmers. That's what we want! I think everyone is aware of our position on this subject. Unfortunately, for years, considerable time has been spent in stirring up the West against the East and vice versa by saying: If things are going wrong out West, it is because Ottawa is giving too much money to the East; and if they are going badly in the East, it is because Ottawa is giving too much to the West. People and regions are being raised against each other by the introduction of bills like this one, Bill C-244, or by taking incoherent positions like the ones we see here in this House.

Mr. Speaker, what do we mean by a global policy? The farmers from the west, no more than those from the east, would come begging to the federal government if they were sure they could sell their products. Had western farmers been sure they could sell their wheat at a profit, Bill C-244 would not be before the House. The same goes for eastern farmers, whether it be in the dairy industry or general agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, that is what is lacking—certainty. Were a bill to be introduced to guarantee markets for the whole Canadian agricultural industry, were the government to take the required steps to store that production, the problem would be solved.

Two years ago, we had a surfeit of wheat. Next year, there may be a shortage, not because of a crop failure, but because, at one point, we found an export market for it. The situation is the same in all fields of production in Canada. And I hold the government responsible for that state of affairs. I maintain that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has not been a good salesman, that he did not find the necessary markets where our surpluses in Canada could be exported.

Instead of travelling to Australia, New Zealand or other countries of the world, he should be investigating export possibilities for our products. And we, members of Parliament pass a law to guarantee western and eastern farmers alike the sale of their entire production. This would be a permanent solution to the problem which is raised every year by the opposition, the government or the various farmer associations across Canada.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-244 has given rise to controversy, as every body has noticed, especially among farmers. I receive letters from socialist areas of Saskatchewan, from southern Alberta, asking that the bill not be passed. People from Medicine Hat for example urge that the government not be allowed to change its present policy, namely the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. Farmers are utterly confused. Why? Because some believe that the government is interfering in the management of their business or seeking to take hold of their properties or to deprive them of their freedom, while others think that the government wants to assist them.

Here in this House we have just been listening to 45 minutes of idle discussions. Hon. members have talked about $38 million, $30 million, $20 million, $113 million, $170 million. Proposals range from paying farmers to filling the deficit of the wheat pool or making payments to another organization. We no longer know where we are heading.

Mr. Speaker, there is something which I believe would be wise to do. That would be to stop using farmers as political feelers, particularly in western Canada. This theme has been exceedingly exploited for years. I see the minister nodding in the affirmative, but a former liberal leader, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, also used farmers for political ends. I saw progressive conservatives like John Bracken of Manitoba using also the western farmers for their political maneuvers. Besides, they have succeeded in raising the west against the east in Canada and vice versa while everywhere in the country farmers are faced with the same problem. In fact, all the classes of our society are fighting these same difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, let us stop playing politics with that. For a month now farmers have been saying: Take a decision; come to any kind of agreement. The government persists in refusing to avail itself of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and says: All that is included in Bill C-244; it allows the $100 million grant. Some people want to dissect this bill—to take the $100 million out in order to give them to the farmers and leave consideration of the problems for later.

The government stubbornly refuses to change its stand while, farmers are kept waiting and have to borrow money from finance companies and pay extravagant interest rates. One can imagine their dissatisfaction, not only with the government but also with this House, which just gets lost in useless debate.

Mr. Speaker, time has come for us to make a decision. If some oppose the bill, let them vote against it. If some are in favour of the bill, let them vote accordingly. But let us come to a vote on this bill. I am aware that the government can make use of Standing Orders 75A, 75B and 75C and demand that a vote be taken, but time has come for us to do so anyway. In any event, a vote will eventually be called on this bill—and we will realize, as usual, that the government has a majority. Thus we will not be accused of having harmed the farmers of western Canada or of eastern Canada. It seems to me it is time we assume our responsibilities and take the vote. Let those who are against the bill vote that way and let those who are in favour prove it. We will see the result and I hope it will be in the best interests of western farmers and especially of the wheat producers of western Canada.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I would like to say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that I view Bill C-244 as a typical example of a government not really knowing what western Canada wants or needs, so doing the next best thing, in their view, and placing before the farmers of western Canada a bill loaded with what I believe to be the true Liberal philosophy of supply management and government control. If one views Bill C-244, along with Bill C-176 which we were lately discussing, it makes a person stop and ask himself just how far is a government willing to go before it openly advocates complete government control of our industry.

In the past few weeks, as a practical farmer and as a member for a rural constituency, I have had many conversations with farmers and it is quite apparent that many farmers are very sceptical of the grain stabilization bill. This has come about for a number of reasons, one of them being that when their farm organization representatives came to Ottawa to appear before the committee, very few of recommendations made by the farm organizations were adopted or, for that matter, very seriously thought about by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Some of the recommendations to which I refer were:

1. A reduction in farmers' contributions to the plan and a more rightful, responsive position taken by the government;

2. The transitional payment to be paid out immediately and then the legislation discussed for its long term effects;

3. That the federal government share the costs of carrying the necessary reserve stocks of grain by paying carrying charges annually on approximately 400 million bushels of all grain;

4. An inflation factor to be built into the legislation; and

5. Losses in the grain pool accounts not to be paid out of the stabilization fund.

One has to look very carefully and be somewhat sceptical of just where the government is going and what it is trying to do as far as western agriculture is concerned. It has been said many times by both opposition parties as well as by witnesses present at the committee proceedings that if the bill were not improved the initial impact of the legislation would likely, for a period of time, result in the reduction of the level of income available to the producer because of the reduction of the levy and the termination of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. Moreover, the protection afforded the level of farm income will be altogether inadequate over a given period of time.

Regardless of what may be said, Mr. Speaker, I believe that Bill C-244 is a vehicle designed to enable the federal government to bring to a conclusion the number of federal policies which relate to the expenditure of public funds for the support of agriculture and, I might add, without compensating the prairie farmers on a comparable basis. As an example of this, I would draw attention to the government ending its commitment to guarantee initial prices for wheat, oats and barley under Clause 15. In 1968-69, this guarantee for wheat resulted in payment by the government of approximately $17 million to the Canadian Wheat Board. Operating losses under the grain stabilization bill would not be charged against the fund to which the farmer is contributing a share of the money which is to constitute the fund. I would also refer to the ending of government support of storage payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act for wheat in commercial storage, 178 million bushels under the terms of clause 33.

It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that payment by the government for the carrying of a reasonable inventory of grains to meet world trade requirements is still a valid philosophy of agricultural policy, although this could be done other than through the existing Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. This Act has, since its inception 15 years ago, paid out an annual average of $40 million. The total burden of commercial storage will now fall upon the grain producers. Reference has also been made to the repealing of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act under which the federal payments have averaged $6 million annually since 1939. Discontinuance of the policy requiring millers to purchase wheat entering the domestic market for human consumption at a basic rate of $1.95½ will result in an annual loss of some $12 million to $15 million dollars to wheat producers at present price levels without a compensating payment or reduction in prices.

The commitment of the government to the program under Bill C-244 will, I believe, be roughly $40 million. The proposals in Bill C-244 essentially aim at stabilizing the income from grains relative to current conditions. As any farmer from western Canada will tell you, stabilizing incomes relevant to current conditions is just not good enough. Conditions in a good many areas of western Canada are very serious indeed. Farmers have gone through a winter where there was a terrific cash shortage; they have gone through the spring in which there was a cash shortage and now they face the prospect of no additional government help, simply because the government will not pay them the money that is rightly owing to them under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

The provisions of this bill for stability relative to this situation are unattractive. Were we heading into a period of deflation we could, of course, view the proposals in a different light. We are, however, inclined to the view that inflation will continue more or less along the pattern of recent times. Should this turn out to be the case, then the stabilization plan, as proposed by the government, seems entrely inadequate. Farmers are in the poorest segment of the Canadian economy, with the exception of old age pensioners and others on limited and fixed incomes, to absorb the current effects of inflation. A farmer's essential expenses, such as taxes and cost of living, are related to the domestic economy. On the other hand, export sales are locked into a situation which involves virtually no bargaining, in a market which is further depressed by competition, in many cases from government-subsidized stocks. In addition, farmers have absolutely no influence over trade arrangements and credit programs which may be unfavourable to them. In these circumstances, the effects of inflation are such that the income accruing to producers of grain for export faces continued erosion. Should the inflation rate be as low as even 4 per cent per year, it is not difficult to calculate the disastrous position in which grains producers will find themselves five or six years from now. And I contend the bill before us will do absolutely nothing against the inflation of which I have been speaking.

I have heard the minister say that if any constructive criticism were voiced in this debate he would be willing to listen. However, after seeing what happened during the weekend I find some difficulty in believing this statement. I suppose constructive criticism has a different meaning for different people, but I should like to add two or three points which in my view would make the legislation more palatable.

First of all, I think there must be more direct producer representation on the grain stabilization board itself. These producers must have some real influence at the decision making level. Second, I believe there must be some means, as I have said before, whereby we can build into the plan a cost of living or inflation index. I do not believe that this is an unreasonable request to make. Third, I think the money that is rightly owing under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act must be paid out to the farmers and the act updated. I believe these demands are not unreasonable. If these points are not given any consideration in any form whatsoever then of necessity I feel I must vote against the legislation when the vote is finally called.

In closing, I should like to add that in dealing with a total policy package with respect to income protection for the western grain growers we must contemplate an adequate two-price system for their products. This was again mentioned this afternoon. It is just not right that Canada should be virtually the only wheat producing nation that accepts world price levels as an adequate guide to prices that should fairly be paid in the marketplace by domestic consumers. A look at the statistics indicates the shocking fact that since World War II there has been essentially no increase in grain prices, which means no increase in the amount farmers receive for flour and cereal products sold to the consumers of this country. I believe this situation must be corrected by substantially increasing the price received by the farmers for grain used for domestic human consumption. The impact of this increase on the consumer would be very small, since the great bulk of the cost of cereal products purchased by the consumers consists of transportation, processing and distribution charges.

We are debating this piece of legislation today because it leaves a great deal to be desired so far as a grain stabilization policy for western Canada is concerned. In addition, the government has ignored the pleas of groups that represent farmers. We must draw on someone for expert advice and these groups made an attempt this spring to present their case in Ottawa. But the fact is that the government has ignored their pleas, just as it has ignored the recommendations of the agricultural committee of the House of Commons, and this indicates that the government is bent upon putting through this legislation whether or not it be beneficial to the farming community. The government does not want to hear the other side of the argument.

Once again may I say I will not be able to vote for the legislation in its present form because I sincerely believe it will not produce a proper grain stabilization policy for western farmers.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in the debate on this amendment, I want to make it very clear at the beginning that if there is any question in the minds of hon. members that we are not going to try to hold up the bill, then I suggest that that is exactly our intention at the present time. There is no question at all that somewhere along the line the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and the real issue in the debate on the stabilization plan have got lost. There is no question whatever that the government is now trying to blackmail the western producers into thinking that they have two choices, either to accept the payment under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act or to accept the mythical $100 million that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) held out on his telecast the other night.

The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is not the real issue here; the real issue is whether the stabilization plan itself is going to be of benefit to the western producers. I am sure the minister in charge of the Wheat Board is convinced that the plan now before the House is not really in the best interests of agricultural producers.

As we witness the changing moods in this House of Commons, it is not difficult to realize that proposals are being made for certain reasons that are not compatible with the basic philosophy of the plan. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) talked this afternoon about the big bonanza that would result from the payment of $100 million. Not too long ago, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool published a bulletin which indicated that the average payment would be about $560 on the maximum quota of 640 acres. I suggest that this payment is a carrot being held out by the minister in order to get the bill through this House, a bad bill to say the least. The minister is wrong if he thinks he can get the bill through the House in its present form, no matter what kind of blackmail is used.

We have all heard the saying, which is probably quite true, that the politics of corruption is the misuse of our fellow man. I can think of no greater misuse of our fellow man than what happened in Ottawa over the weekend when the three prairie ministers of agriculture met with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to discuss the very issue we are debating here at the present time, namely the net incomes of agricultural producers. The whole basis of the amendment before the House is net income; in other words, the exact amount the agricultural producers will receive.

Instead of the minister being forthright and telling the agriculture ministers of the three prairie provinces that he really was not concerned about the incomes of prairie producers, he told the press something else. While I was in Moose Jaw the Moose Jaw Times-Herald carried the headline "Government to delay debate on bill", and the first paragraph of the article was as follows:

> The federal government has agreed not to proceed with its prairie grain stabilization bill for at least another week to allow provincial governments, farmers and others to consider its implications "and its relationship to over-all income of grain producers."

To my knowledge, the three prairie Ministers of Agriculture came to Ottawa in order to discuss the very issues we are debating today, and which we will be debating in this House for many more days. Even though the minister in charge of the Wheat Board may have wanted to delay the bill for a week to try to bargain on some of the provisions in the bill, he was probably not allowed that delay by the Prime Minister and the cabinet generally. It seems strange indeed that when the western provinces would like to have some dialogue with a government that is responsible for the agricultural economy they should be betrayed. They have been double-crossed, and they learned about this double-cross only when they returned home.

I have referred to the saying that the politics of corruption is the misuse of our fellow man, and this government stands condemned on every count of misusing the agricultural producers of this country. When I was in Moose Jaw over the weekend, I talked to several farmers about this bill and asked them what they would do if they were members of the House. There was no question in their minds that they did not want this stabilization plan in its present form.

We have all heard much debate in this House during the last few weeks about the government breaking the law, and this will be decided by a court. The real issue is that the government is responsible for the plan it would like to bring in, and members of the opposition are responsible for seeing that the plan suits the best interests of the agricultural economy. Every member of the opposition, as well as the independent members in the House, should decide whether or not this stabilization plan deals with the net income of farmers today. It is in this regard our amendment was proposed. It clarifies the bill in that it designates a time period and spells out in clear terms exactly what the legislation is intended to do.

Not long ago I asked the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) the following question dealing with this subject:

> Can the minister say if, under the proposal for a prairie grain stabilization plan, any final report has been prepared on the consolidation of small farm units into units of more efficient size? If so, can the minister say whether this report will be made available to the House?

The minister said in answer:

> Mr. Speaker, the paragraph in the statement to which the hon. member refers had reference to some plans being developed by my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture. Further details about these plans were subsequently issued by the minister, and I know that a full copy was distributed to all hon. members of the House.

I suggest that the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board misled the House when he said these plans were distributed to all members. In an attempt to find out whether I had misplaced my copy I found that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) had in fact distributed copies in certain communities in order that people there could consider the proposals, but the plan was not widely distributed. This further compounds the situation, because the statement that all members received a copy is not true.

The same thing applies to the suggestion that the minister was prepared to meet the ministers of agriculture and delay, possibly for one week, the discussion of this bill. We find that is untrue. This is the situation in which we find ourselves, yet we hear the suggestion that we are using the farmers as pawns in this game. People dedicated to the principle of equality for all in this country, particularly those in the agricultural sector, realize that the bill before us does not meet the necessary criteria. I sincerely hope that no member of the House will take for granted that it does. The issue hinges on the net income feature and the amendment before us is directed toward that point.

When I asked about plans to adjust farm units to a more efficient size there was no answer. Just as in this case, the farmers know nothing about the plan where it refers to adjustment of farm units. How can we in this House make an intelligent decision as to whether the stabilization plan is in the best interests of our nation when we are not told specifically what the government has in mind? Municipalities and small agricultural communities must depend on net income and the return to agricultural producers. They must also become familiar with the precise intent of this bill before any sensible decision can be made. It seems strange that the government has refused to supply these details.

We in this party realize that there must be collective bargaining and we firmly believe that in the interests of the agricultural sector of our economy there must be a cooling-off period in that collective bargaining. Our newspapers referred to this during the weekend, but we now find there is to be no cooling-off period. The minister is adamant, as is the Prime Minister, that anything he thinks is good for the farm should be accepted by everyone. When we consider the situation we realize that what he thinks is good for the farm is not good in any way, shape or form.

Questions were asked earlier today about an advertisement which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post. It also appeared in the most recent edition of the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. It related to net income, and I am wondering whether the farmer is being charged for this type of propaganda which appears in the newspapers. In the August edition of Saturday Night magazine I find an advertisement under the heading, "Prairie farmers gear production to world demand". It states that it was issued under the authority of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture, and reads in part:

> The government of Canada is helping this development with its new prairie grain policy—providing "package" programs for all grains, encouraging increased pasture, setting up a new quota system, providing a stabilization program to offset poor years and making sure the farmer gets advance information on world grain conditions at planting time.

I wonder whether the cost of this propaganda is being deducted from the receipts of western farmers. Who is behind this kind of propaganda, and is the cost being deducted from farmers' incomes? The cost of this type of advertisement must be tremendous, because we all know that the cost of a full-page, coloured ad in a newspaper is high. We do not know that there is any justification for this kind of thing, but we know that one of these advertisements was authorized by the Keep the Stabilization Plan Committee. This reminds me of the KOD plan of a few years ago in Saskatchewan. It was the Keep Our Doctors plan. Perhaps the same people are involved in this propaganda. If this type of propaganda is to continue, then the people should be given a clear explanation of the stabilization plan. The name is peculiar in itself because there is no stabilization plan as yet. These advertisements refer to the plan as though it were already in effect and they are now worried about losing it.

Perhaps the minister would like to accept responsibility for that particular advertisement. Perhaps he would inform the House how much money has been spent in the last year on propaganda of this type, trying to persuade farmers to accept something that is not in their best interest.

Mr. Horner: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Skoberg: I would be only too pleased to do so.

Mr. Mahoney: Now we have Alphonse and Gaston.

Mr. Horner: The advertisement the hon. member refers to was authorized by the Keep the Stabilization Plan Committee. Is the hon. member not aware that a gentleman by the name of McPherson is paying for this advertisement in the hope that he will be appointed to the Senate?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Skoberg: I thank the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) for that clarification. I was not aware of that, but it does not strike me as being strange if it is the case. There may well be a vacancy in the other place to which some people aspire.

Mr. Horner: There are 18 vacancies.

Mr. Skoberg: Someone from the other place was involved in the recent Alberta election, but the party to which he is affiliated did not gain the seat in question.

If we are really concerned about what is happening in respect of net income we should suggest ways of improving this bill. If the minister is really concerned about the net income of farmers he should take into consideration the proposals of the prairie ministers of agriculture. If he is interested he should at least listen to the proposals they make. I am sure a few months' delay at this time of year would not do much damage. I am equally sure that the propaganda being distributed to western producers is intended for only one purpose.

Any time we are accused of trying to confuse the agricultural producers for our own purposes, I should like to assure the government that this is far from the truth. We have witnessed the propaganda in respect of some letters which, if not from the minister's constituency are at least from Saskatoon. It is quite true, as my colleague the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) reminds me, that hardly ever are they signed, and if they are signed it is difficult to read them. If one is able to decipher the signatures you find that some of the people are storekeepers, doctors, and so on. I suppose this is the area in which the minister travels.

If we are trying to be sincere about net income, why do we not get to the real crunch of the question and divide the bill and discuss it. The minister has not yet come up with a good reason for not dividing the bill in such a way that the western producers and agricultural ministers could consider it in depth, and then let the minister and his department consider and accept some of the proposals made. Surely he does not think he is the end-all in respect of knowledge concerning the agricultural community.

Mr. Baldwin: That is what he does think.

Mr. Skoberg: That is quite true. People who have no real knowledge or practical experience in the field in which they are dealing are those who are trying to bring about direction in this country. Instead of having practical people bringing about this type of educational process, we have ministers who have no practical knowledge.

If we consider the problems facing this House, then look at this amendment and the question of the net income of farmers, it is interesting to note the situation. We have a minister responsible for the Wheat Board and for immigration and manpower who is also the minister who has suggested the Local Opportunities program, as they call the new program for this winter, which they are afraid to start too early because the snow might not fly for another two weeks or so. This minister is responsible for all these areas. How could he possibly be thoroughly familiar and conversant with the area affecting the income of the agricultural producer?

It would seem to me that if the Prime Minister wanted to perform a real service to this country he would divide the portfolio of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt. He ought to look into the situation and place somebody else in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. This stabilization plan, involving the net income of the farmer, is a full-time, on-the-ground process. How can any minister be conversant with the problems of each and every department he has been given an interest in and supervision of?

It would seem to me that the agricultural producer in this country has been shortchanged by the Liberal government and the Prime Minister when a minister is not put completely in charge of the agricultural economy. We have a minister of agriculture from the west and a minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, also from the west. I think each looks to the other and wonders what jurisdiction each has. In the end, damn little is done for the agricultural economy. We hear much about the number of people who are urging that we adopt the stabilization plan in order to get this so-called $100 million. However, we should consider the people who are still opposed to it. An advertisement in a Regina paper tried to associate the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool with it, and yesterday the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool made very clear that they are not associated with the advertisement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough

(Mr. Macquarrie)—United Nations—Canadian action to achieve representation for Mainland China and Taiwan; the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz)—Income Tax—Effect of amendments on credit unions; the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise)—Consumer Affairs—alleged pressure by banks to accept credit cards.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS TO WESTERN CANADA PRODUCERS IN YEARS WHEN RECEIPTS BELOW FIVE-YEAR AVERAGE

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-244, respecting the stabilization of prairie grain sale proceeds and to repeal or amend certain related statutes, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and motions Nos. 1 and 2 of Mr. Gleave (page 7252).

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member can ask a question only with the unanimous consent of the House, because the time of the hon. member who had the floor has expired. Does the hon. member wish the Chair to ask if there is unanimous consent of the House?

Mr. Skoberg: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House agree that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) may ask a question of the hon. member who had the floor?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: If the hon. member would study the advertisement he would notice that it suggests that in the year 1973 the payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act will be down to approximately $13 million, which would mean less than 250 million bushels of wheat in storage. Has the hon. member any figures which would relate this situation to the storage position of the past ten years and the past 20 years, in order to give any validity to the $13 million figure that is used in the advertisement?

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I think we still have the problem in the House of getting only part of the question because of the type of sound system we have. Would the hon. member repeat his question?

Mr. Horner: I would be glad to. In the advertisement that the hon. member referred to in his speech there is the suggestion that next year—the suggestion is in black print—the payment will be less under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and that by 1973 it will be down to approximately $13 million. If the storage is calculated at one and three quarters cents per bushel per month, this figures out to less than 250 million bushels in commercial storage. Could the hon. member give the House some idea as to how this compares with the average over the past ten years and the ten years before that?

Mr. Skoberg: I will be glad to do so. The information I have is that the ten-year average from 1950 to 1959 was 460,017 million bushels, and the ten-year average from 1960 to 1969 was 557,291 million bushels. Of course, this brings out the point that we are trying to do better under the concessional sales and the minister always says how much better things are now. I give him credit for extending this type of sale and getting back to long-term concessional sales. But at one time someone in his department terminated concessional sales to the extent that other countries picked up the exports this country used to make, and only lately have we been able to get back into them.

Under the plan before us, any long-term concessional sales will be charged against the pool. If there is a difference in the interest rate on overseas sales and the cost of money to the pool in Canada, the minister is well aware—he is shaking his head—that in this case the pool pays the extra money.

In the United States, when grain is produced it becomes the property of the country and the producer receives credit for his grain. In Canada, this government refuses to accept the fact that grain is a national asset. If they would accept that fact, then possibly we could do more business so that the economy of the agricultural producer would be improved.

We realize that the Minister of Supply and Services referred to double-talk and suggested that we are playing politics. He asked who really understood the situation. Not too long ago the minister in charge of the Wheat Board made it very clear that he thought there should be more consultation with the people affected. When he was asked what he would do, he suggested without hesitation that there should be more consultation with the producer so that he would have more knowledge of what is going on. Yet when the ministers of agriculture from Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan came to Ottawa last Friday to do what the minister suggested, he turned them down flat. It was unfortunate that they went back to their respective provinces, reported that everything looked rosy and then found out on Monday that things were not so rosy.

With reference to the double-talk and double-cross which we have experienced, let me point out that the minister himself asked the minister of agriculture from Saskatchewan whether he would try to do something to delay the court proceedings there. It makes one wonder why he would do that to people in whom he places his trust. It makes one wonder whether the Prime Minister is looking at November 29 for a federal election, because this would get him over the hump. It makes one wonder whether the real reason they could not delay debate on this legislation for a cooling-off period of one week was because on November 29 there might be a federal election. Time will tell. I am not sure that even the great white father, the right hon. Prime Minister, would tell his colleague the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether this will be the case. If we are going to be serious about this situation, it is the responsibility of this minister and of the government to do something about it.

Another point came up this afternoon when the Minister of Supply and Services spoke about the $80 million in association with the employment support bill that was passed by the House. That was a clear indication that the NDP tried to include agriculture and fisheries under the $80 million, but we were voted down. Then the Minister of Supply and Services stood up today and spoke about the assistance that agriculture is receiving under the employment support bill. It seemed strange that if he was so knowledgeable at that time he did not vote in favour of our amendment to include agriculture and fisheries under that bill.

I am sure other hon. members would like to say a word or two on the amendments before us. We must get back to the basic problem. If we allow corruption to take place in the handling of agricultural problems, then of course the government will stand condemned because they have deliberately tried to use every avenue for double-crossing the western agricultural producer.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I rise to take part in the debate, not to ask a question, Mr. Speaker. The amendment before the House, contrary to what some hon. members such as the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) may think, is crucial: it goes right to the core of the bill.

Mr. Faulkner: If that is the case, put it to a vote.

Mr. Peters: A vote does not prove anything except that you have more members than we have. Let us have a vote in the country. Take it to the people. The Prime Minister lies to the country. Why does he not take it to the country?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair would appreciate it if the hon. member who has the floor could be allowed to at least commence his speech before other conversations take place.

Mr. Nystrom: The subamendment was moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). It amended the amendment moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave). As I said before, it goes to the very core of the issue that we are discussing today and have discussed for the past few days in the House. The amendment and the subamendment deal essentially with a new formula which would make the stabilization plan one that could be accepted by western farmers and western farm organizations.

It seems to me very strange that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) will not listen to some of the suggestions that come from this side of the House. We do not pretend to be experts, to know it all, to have all the answers to the farm problems. We are not like the minister in that respect. But one thing we do know is that farm organizations and farmers themselves are not very happy with the bill that is before us. For that reason we are doing all we can to change the bill and to make it more acceptable to the farmers.

I suggest to the minister that we will continue as long as we can and as emphatically as we can to convince him that he should change the bill which he presented to the House. This past summer when I was out in my constituency I had the opportunity to speak with literally hundreds of farmers. One of their main concerns was with the stabilization bill, the way it was drafted and the formula that would be applied to them if it passed the House.

These farmers are not letting us pull the wool over their eyes. They know what is happening. They knew what was happening in the provincial election when they studied the stabilization bill. The results of that election are indicative of what they thought of some of the proposals in the stabilization bill. It is very significant, as I and many of my colleagues have said, that all the major farm organizations are unanimous in their opposition to the bill before us, organizations such as the wheat pools of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, the Federation of Agriculture, the Farmers Union and the United Grain Growers. All the main organizations and farm spokesmen are unanimous in saying that this bill is not good enough and that it must be changed if it is to help meaningfully farmers in the western provinces.

We have the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta which differ in their ideology and in their interpretation of the policies that should be presented to their people. But despite that they are unanimous in their conclusion that this bill will not help the farmers. The ministers of these provinces came to Ottawa last Friday to meet with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. They presented to him in a very sincere and serious way some alternatives which he should consider for changing the regulations and some of the main features of this bill. It is our understanding that as a result of that meeting the minister agreed to consider most seriously some of these recommendations which would change the bill and take into account costs of production, net income, and other matters.

Then suddenly we find that although a moratorium of one week was promised we are discussing Bill C-244 once again. Did the minister double-cross the ministers of agriculture of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta; and, if so, why did he do this? Perhaps we are too harsh with the minister. We are calling him all sorts of names. I think the minister sincerely wanted to consider some of these changes, but he went to the Prime Minister's office and was told, "No, thou shalt not do this, Otto", and Otto had to come back here and reintroduce the bill yesterday afternoon. I think that is the story. The minister probably tried. Perhaps the minister says different things in cabinet meetings than he does in the House, but the Prime Minister runs this country with an iron fist, in a unilateral and autocratic way.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The minister is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, since these things are said in the House in my presence, I think I should rise on a question of privilege to say that the hon. member is speaking complete and utter nonsense.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege that has been raised—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Peters: On the question of privilege that has been raised, Mr. Speaker, I would like your ruling on whether the intervention of the minister in any way, shape or form constituted a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is very easy for the Chair to decide this question. The point raised by the minister is mainly an argument and a question of debate and has nothing to do with the principle of a question of privilege as established by the rules of this House. At the same time, the Chair feels that the use of such language is not customary in this House and would hope that hon. members would not lower the level of debate and not destroy the established rules.

Mr. Nystrom: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am very glad that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board said what he did. It seems to me that he is telling the truth but he insinuates that the provincial ministers of agriculture might not have told the truth when they said they had an agreement with him that he would go back and consider the proposal to have a moratorium of one week. Were the three ministers of agriculture not telling the truth? I hope the minister in charge of the Wheat Board will at least have enough common courtesy to trust the ministers of agriculture of the three prairie provinces.

I am amazed that the minister would not listen to the ministers of agriculture of the prairie provinces, that he would show such lack of sensitivity toward the western farmers whom he is supposed to represent. I was sure he would at least consider their recommendations and would not double-cross them by bringing this bill back suddenly as he has done. Perhaps the decision was not taken in the Prime Minister's office. If it was not, I am very surprised that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board would take the responsibility on his own shoulders. I am sure farmers in my constituency and all across the Prairies will be very interested to know that the minister himself unilaterally made this decision and not the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I have said all along that the farm organizations do not want this bill. We should listen to them and do some of the things they suggest. Do we not do this because we are afraid of the farmers, afraid of their ideas and of letting them participate? All we are asking on this side of the House is that we have a stabilization bill which is acceptable to the farmers of this country.

Earlier today the minister said that perhaps the figures used by the Prime Minister in his telecast on Sunday night were not correct. I think all of us listened to the Prime Minister. I have before me the transcript of what he said. He was talking about the $112 million that will be given to the farmers under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act if it remains in effect. To set the record straight, I should like to quote a short excerpt from his remark as follows:

> Let's first compare them in terms of money. For the last crop year, under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, we would be in process of paying the western farmer $62 million, for the crop year which we are now in, we would probably have to pay him some time next year something like $30 million, and for the crop year after that $20 million, for a total of $112 million.

These are the figures used by the Prime Minister, the figures which the minister in charge of the Wheat Board tried to change today. I think the minister should consult more closely with the Prime Minister's office, because the Prime Minister will probably want to change some of the things the minister has been saying to us.

The amendments before us are crucial to this bill. The government should listen and accept them. If they would accept these amendments and bring the costs of production and the net income of farmers into consideration, then I am sure that members of the opposition would be more favourably impressed by the bill and would consider giving it speedy passage. If the minister is at all sincere, then we can send the $100 million out to the farmers immediately, as was suggested today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). We could then study the stabilization bill more closely, listen to the farm organizations and perhaps iron out some of the things that they do not like.

Some members who have participated in this debate are familiar with an advertisement which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post protesting against some opposition members speaking against the stabilization bill. The advertisement states that the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has now joined the government in approving this bill. But I think he would like us to make it clear that this is not the case, that it is misleading advertising and that he is not in favour of the bill. The wheat pool speaks for tens of thousands of farmers in Saskatchewan and Alberta. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool radio report of September 29 began as follows:

> With all the opposition to the proposed grain receipts and income stabilization plan, it's time government took a fresh look at its proposals.
> Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and other farm organizations have suggested a number of changes to the plan because it does little to improve the individual farmer's net income. They have pointed out that income would be stabilized at too low a level.

That can hardly be interpreted as support for the stabilization bill, and it is a very good indication of where the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool stands. I could go on and on reading press statements of the Alberta Wheat Pool, the Manitoba Wheat Pool and other farm organizations, all of them saying that the bill before us is not good enough and asking that changes be introduced immediately.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board, and the Prime Minister, have said that we have a choice between A and B—the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and the stabilization bill. I am sure that anyone who thinks at all knows that this is not the case. It is not so clear. First of all, we cannot just consider the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. The PFAA, for example, will disappear if we pass the bill before us.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, a good argument could be made to show that the farmers will not receive $170 million, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested, but only $65 million over the next two years. That is the picture if one considers only the short-term aspects of the bill.

Another matter concerning many of my constituents and people throughout our farming community is the long-term ramifications of Bill C-244. The figure of $35 million was used by the Prime Minister on Sunday evening in this telecast. This figure, which is supposed to be paid out of the federal treasury each year, was based on total receipts of $900 million in the grains industry. Four per cent of that figure is $35 million. Let me remind hon. members that in many years less than $900 million worth of grain will be sold. In some years we may sell only $700 million or $800 million worth which means that only $28 million or $32 million per year will be contributed from the federal treasury to farmers over the long term. That is to say, over the long term the farmer who gets this money will be no better off. He might only get about $28 million, $32 million or $35 million from the federal treasury every year.Those amounts will apply only to farmers who will be getting benefits from the stabilization fund.

Many of my colleagues and some farm organizations have pointed out that not all farmers will necessarily benefit from the fund as it is presently constituted. Many parts of the plan and some of the regulations to be brought in may prevent a farmer receiving benefits from the fund unless the bill is amended. Therefore, in the long term the fund will not help the farmer and it will not stabilize farm income. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, at best the plan will be but an insurance policy. If there happens to be a disastrous year, it will insure a certain proportion of income received by the grain farmer.

Many other things have been said about the fund. Arguments have been put forward as to why we should very seriously consider the amendments which are before the House. Hon. members have pointed out that the bill does not take into account the real costs of production. Why should the farmer have to bear the brunt of increased production costs? Why should farmers have to subsidize food stores or the consumer part of our economy? Why should not a farmer at least be paid an increasing amount, so that he can keep up with increases in production costs?

The minister said yesterday that you could not include in a stabilization bill a clause to take into consideration costs of production. I submit that you could easily do that. It has been done in other government plans. I am sure that an economist could easily work out such a provision which could be incorporated in the bill we are discussing. Why do we not listen to farmers and farm organizations and introduce into this bill or a bill like it a two-price system for grain? That would help, in a genuine and immediate way, the farmers of western Canada, particularly those in the middle and lower income brackets.

There is another long-term consideration we ought to take into account when debating this bill. If the bill passes it will stabilize farm incomes at a very low level. According to people who know more about this subject than most members of the House, this bill will be the first step toward implementing the recommendations of the task force on agriculture. Those task force recommendations seek to expedite the exodus of people from rural Canada to urban centres. Really we are talking about a whole life style which is being threatened by the provisions of the bill. We are talking about the culture of our rural society. Why do we continue pushing people from the small centres and farms into the large, unplanned cities? These are matters we ought to consider and deal with in a bill of this sort. It is only natural that we should consider these issues. They should be top priorities, and not the priorities the minister seems to have given them.

I say as sincerely as I can that the minister ought to consider accepting some of the recommendations of the three prairie ministers of agriculture. The minister should again look at the briefs of the wheat pools of the provinces, at the briefs presented by the Farmers Union and the Federation of Agriculture and adopt some of the amendments they suggest. That would not cost very much and would be fair to the farmer. That is all I am asking. Let us bring in a bill that the farmer wants and from which he will benefit.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, the government has done badly by me, for the simple reason that I was of the opinion that this matter would not be discussed today. I spoke to three cabinet ministers from the Prairies who but recently came to Ottawa, who informed me that they had a proposition which was fairly complicated. Actually, their proposal was so complicated that I would have needed some time to understand what was being proposed with regard to Bill C-244. In any event, I was informed by the three prairie ministers that this matter would be stood over for a week. It was therefore with much surprise that I watched television on Sunday night and saw that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who knows less about wheat than I do—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: —was involved in this matter. I was surprised to find that he had not been briefed adequately and that he did not put forward an honest proposition to the Canadian people. That shocked me. Obviously, he was saying to the opposition, "Put up or shut up." We will not give the minister the credit for negotiating directly with the parties, because Parliament will make the ultimate decision.

Certain alleged facts have been discussed this afternoon. I am sure that most hon. members would agree that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) did not tell the entire story in respect of the figures he used. The farmers of western Canada are not the least bit confused by the situation. They are living from day to day. They know how much income they enjoy and where that income comes from.

As has been made clear, the subamendment before the House seeks to apply the stabilization bill to a grain farmer's net income rather than to his gross income. The farmers of western Canada know what goes into gross income. They know that this year they grew a bumper crop of between 1.25 billion and 1.5 billion bushels of wheat. The western farmer also knows that under normal conditions a crop this size means that he will get considerably more money than he would in years of lesser production. Two or three years ago the farmer was talking about $2 per bushel of wheat; he was anticipating that No. 1 Northern would fetch $2 per bushel. The Liberal party promised a two-price system as well as $2 plus per bushel. The farmer found that prices were around $1.76 a bushel. Now, Mr. Speaker, with a bumper crop the farmer is getting $1.42.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is shocking.

Mr. Peters: It is sad that farmers' costs did not go down at all. It costs just as much to fertilize an acre of wheat land in western Canada—

Mr. Dinsdale: It costs more under Liberal inflation.

Mr. Peters: Yes. As the hon. member points out, under inflation everything costs more. Every year the increase is 4, 5 or 6 per cent. At any rate, the farmer puts on the same amount of fertilizer, at a higher cost. He drives a tractor which uses as much gasoline or kerosene as before, but gasoline and kerosene cost more. The farmer uses the same number of hired men, at higher wages. He must borrow more money now to operate his farm and pay considerably more interest on it than before.

All the factors that go into production costs have increased. At the same time, the farmer is getting less for his produce than before. The more he produces, the less he gets. I think it is a fact that the farmers break-even point is considerably higher than even the gross income that he is receiving. Hence, the farmer is in a deficit position now. The higher prices go, the worse his position will become. This bill does not take that factor into consideration at all.

Some time ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) set up a task force on agriculture. There have been two major agricultural meetings in Canada. Several major recommendations were made to the government. One was that the government stabilize the income of western farmers. This, of course, is where the government got the crackpot notion that eventually evolved into this ludicrous bill. It is supposed to give the farmer something but it will take away more than it gives. There are other factors.

The minister spoke about the right of the government to refuse to make payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. We were told in committee that the costs of storing over 180 million bushels of grain in a crop year were to be paid to the farmer at the rate of seven, eight or nine cents a bushel. Unless the system of storage in elevators, the method of handling grain in the terminals and the transit and loading systems are changed, you are not likely to get away from the fact there has to be in storage the production of one or two crop years. That production can be stored in a number of places.

A few minutes ago my colleague very eloquently pointed out that it is time the government made up its mind about what it intends to do with regard to storage. Other countries have done this. The government will have to develop a grain supply bank in Canada to meet our commitments. This must be for an extended period of time, at least three years. The government, the country and the economy are interrelated in the production of western grains. If we do not keep a large enough supply on hand to meet our commitments in case there is a disaster in an area of grain production, we will not keep up with what is a normal pattern in other countries.

Governments of other countries are responsible for the sale and storage of food. This relieves the farmer of storage costs. To say that the Wheat Board is responsible for the costs, and the final payment to the farmer is the selling price less the costs, obviously puts all the costs back on the farmer. I suggest that this will have to be taken care of by the farmer. I refer specifically to the costs of the farmer. If the costs are not in the elevator system or under the control of the Wheat Board, obviously they are on the farm. We are told it will cost the farmer more than eight or nine cents a bushel to store grain on the farm. If the farmer has to build elevators or storage bins to keep his grain in a fit condition to be put on the market at the maximum price, it will require a large cash outlay on his part. This cost will come out of the farmer's net income, not gross.

When talking about the discontinuance of storage costs the government did not mention another additional cost that the farmer will have. If we wipe out the six, eight, ten or fifteen million dollars under PFAA, the farmer will have to carry additional insurance to cover disasters. We are wiping out this $6 million or $8 million. These payments did not go into a fund; they went into the farmer's pocket in areas where it was necessary.

Everyone knows the Prime Minister is pretty slick when it comes to handling figures. However, we thought he would have protected himself as the minister did today. The minister protected himself in six directions; he used six different sets of figures. I quote from a transcript of the Prime Minister's remarks:

> —we would be paying for three years $170 million to the western farmer instead of $112 million, which he would be now getting under the grains stabilization program (sic—should read Temporary Wheat Reserves Act).

I do not know what "sic" means. I suppose that is the little boys in the backroom. I think the Prime Minister should have read it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is only one of the mistakes he made that night.

Mr. Peters: The minister indicated that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act payment would amount to only $38 million. That is not what the Prime Minister said in his statement. Where did he get the figures? Was he given the figures, or did he get them from the bright boys he has around him? If he did, I apologize because he was obviously misinformed. If he got them from the minister, he was not misinformed; he was informed exactly the way the minister wanted him to be informed. If that is so, he cannot have it another way today. On the other hand, the $35 million the minister talked about today is an estimate. It could be more and it could be less. Unless there is a serious deterioration in the gross sales of wheat, the farmer will not get $35 million. As my hon. friend pointed out, a fund will get the $35 million.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was pointing out that the statements which were made this afternoon by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board were greatly at variance with those made by the Prime Minister in the course of his television broadcast. In that broadcast the Prime Minister said that over the next three years we would be paying out $170 million to western farmers instead of $112 million.

It was contended this afternoon that the figures were not necessarily of that order. The minister put forward several other propositions. As I was reading the text of the broadcast it occurred to me that I had expected the Prime Minister to couch it in more legalistic terms. I am surprised to find he did not. When he mentioned $35 million for the present year and a probable $35 million in the coming year, he must have known that payments will not be made to the farmer unless gross receipts fall below 90 per cent of those for the qualifying period. The Prime Minister must have known this. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) knew it and I am sure the minister responsible for the Wheat Board knew it.

The Prime Minister made another statement which in my opinion is not true. He said the farmer would only be paying in $1 for every $3 he would be taking out. This is in relation to the $35 million. Mr. Speaker, this is not in the bill. The bill says the farmer will have to pay 2 per cent of his gross sales and that the government will match this with 4 per cent of the same gross sales. This is a ratio of 1 to 2, or 2 to 4; it is not 1 to 3. This is totally dishonest.

Mr. Mahoney: Indeed it is. You are the one who is being dishonest.

Mr. Peters: No, Mr. Speaker. The parliamentary secretary should read the bill. This is an amendment to an amendment to the bill. The bill says the farmer shall pay 2 per cent of his gross earnings and that the government will pay 4 per cent.

Mr. Mahoney: That is three out to one in for the farmer.

Mr. Peters: How is it possible to reconcile this with the statement by the Prime Minister that the farmer would only be paying in $1 for every $3 he would be taking out. Indeed, the farmer would not necessarily be taking out anything, because we do not expect the situation to worsen by 10 per cent. In any case, he would not be putting in money at a ratio of 1 to 3; he would be putting it in at the ratio of 2 to 4.

I consider there are many major loopholes in the explanation which was given. The explanation of the Prime Minister was made, I presume, because of the opposition he is encountering from those who are interested in the legal problem rather than in the mechanics of the bill before us. A question has been raised as to whether the farmers of western Canada have been consulted. They have been consulted. They were consulted during the election campaign in Saskatchewan. This was a major issue during that campaign. The minister responsible for the Wheat Board made it an election issue. The former leader of the government in that province also made it an election issue. Therefore, a decision has been made in that province.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: I will at the end of my speech; I have only a few minutes left. Concern has also recently been expressed by the farmers, and they made a decision on the matter. We have also had considerable reaction from the newly elected government of Alberta and the recently elected government in the province of Manitoba.

On many occasions the federal government has told us that provincial representations must be considered. The three agriculture ministers asked for a meeting with the minister, came to Ottawa and reached an agreement that there would be a moratorium on discussion of this legislation until they were able to put forward a proposition. That proposition, in the main, is that contained in both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment that are now before the House, and basically it is that we move from a gross sales income base to a net sales income base.

Although the government might have considered this proposal, in view of the legal problems that have arisen from the inability or unwillingness of the government to meet their commitments under another act the Prime Minister decided that we should continue the debate, that now was the time to discuss this issue and that there would be no opportunity for a consideration of the proposal put before Parliament, through the minister, by the Ministers of Agriculture of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, might I put my question now?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time having expired, a question can be asked now only by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the question cannot be put.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) which proposes a base period for calculating costs of production. The minister and some of his colleagues have contended that the costs of production feature is unworkable. I am prepared to assume that the minister is correct, provided he brings in some other feature in substitution for the subamendment. If the minister would agree to have the bill sent back to the agricultural committee for one day, to which I am sure my colleagues on my right would agree, he could then put forward an amendment to incorporate some sort of escalation feature in this bill of a sort that the farm organizations and grain growers of the three prairie provinces could accept.

The minister refuses to do this, insisting that this feature is unworkable. I do not think it is. If our suggestion is unworkable, then a base year 1970-71 for calculating costs of production must be workable in one way or another. If the minister were to draw on his research staff and on all the brains among the backbenchers in the rump, I am sure he could bring in some changes to the bill. I have seen some pretty bad looking rumps in my day, Mr. Speaker, but this is ridiculous. If hon. members opposite were to incorporate some kind of escalation feature into the bill to take account of the rising costs of production facing our grain growers, then they would find a great deal less difficulty getting this kind of legislation through the House.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) and every member of the House from Thunder Bay to Rocky Mountain has tried very hard this spring, summer and fall to keep in touch with the grain growers and farm organizations.

Mr. Skoberg: There are not too many Liberals among them.

Mr. Benjamin: They all have stubble behind their ears, anyway, and would not know a bushel of grain from a bucket of bolts. I find it passing strange that the House is short of prairie Liberal members tonight, though we are short of them anyway, thank goodness.

Mr. Gibson: We will win the seats there next time. If you keep talking they will soon see the light.

Mr. Gleave: Not by the candle you are carrying.

Mr. Benjamin: Opposition to this bill does not come solely from people like the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) or myself. Opposition to it continues from the Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba wheat pools, let me remind hon. members opposite. Opposition continues from the National Farmers Union, from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, from the Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba federations of agriculture and from the United Grain Growers grain handling company.

All of these organizations, or most of them, are called a bunch of raving, wild-eyed radicals by members on the opposite side of the House because they have continued to oppose the bill since lodging their original objections last May and June. Unless some kind of cost of production escalation feature is built into the bill, this legislation, as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has said, is unacceptable.

Last night I was in a place called Nokomis, Saskatchewan, and met grain growers from Drake, Lockwood, Govan and other sundry communities around Nokomis who asked me two questions. The first was: When are we getting the money that is owing to us? The second was: When is the government going to give the grain growers of the prairie provinces the same kind of treatment given people in Ontario and the province of Quebec? I get this kind of static from NDP'ers, Conservatives and Liberals. I am wondering if I said something wrong, because one Liberal—and that is better than usual—said I was doing a good job down here.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Benjamin: This has me wondering what I have done wrong.

An hon. Member: Tell us more about yourself.

Mr. Benjamin: Let me repeat that the opposition to this legislation does not come from Conservative and NDP members alone. Some Conservatives are nervous about it but, like a bunch of willy-nillies, they would be. The opposition does not come from a few of us on this side alone; it also comes from organizations which represent the grain growers in the three prairie provinces. These are the kind of people who helped elect myself, the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang).

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt, who is supposed to be in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, made three safaris into the Prairies this past summer in an effort to gain some or any kind of support for this bill. He has tried to gain any or some kind of opposition to amendments moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) and the hon. member for Skeena. I am afraid his efforts were to no avail. Some fellows try hard but they are born losers.

An hon. Member: And they never know they are.

Mr. Benjamin: This full-page, colour advertisement which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post looks more expensive than my suit. It looks even better than my pyjamas.

An hon. Member: It cost more, too.

Mr. Benjamin: This full-page, colour ad which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post on Friday and Saturday night is entitled, "Your choice, the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act or the grain stabilization bill".

An hon. Member: Blackmail.

Mr. Benjamin: Let me inform the House who the sponsors of this publication were. We have not been able to find out who put up the $5,000 or $6,000 for these coloured ads, but we do know that the minister made a recent frantic effort to get support for this legislation from some or any place in the three prairie provinces. We know that he went to inordinate lengths in the past week in respect of building in the costs of production. But the fact is that the grain growers I talked to in Nokomis, under natural gas light, said the problem is that whether it is the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act or the grain stabilization bill, they still lose. They said that if we could get something better for them we should keep trying if it takes until New Year. I pass on that little message to gentlemen opposite. Let me repeat in one sentence what has been said ad nauseam in this House. These grain growers and Members of Parliament from the west will not be bribed or blackmailed.

An hon. Member: Where are the western members?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the minister made his safaris to the prairie provinces to get support for this legislation and opposition to the kind of changes asked for by members of the grain organizations. They have put forward a number of suggestions which have been repeated in this House by members of the opposition. All the minister succeeded in getting was this full-page, colour ad. It states in part that it is authorized by the Keep the Stabilization Plan Committee. That is a very important and high-sounding title. It reminds me of the Keep our Doctors Committee which was in existence when the Liberal dinosaurs were in Saskatchewan fighting medicare. This is the same breed of cat.

An hon. Member: There was a lot of dough behind that.

Mr. Benjamin: The ad suggests that the stabilization plan was endorsed in principle by the Palliser Wheat Growers Association. I am still wondering about those fellows because methinks they protest too much on account of certain people in the Winnipeg grain exchange. The advertisement suggests that the plan is supported by the Rape Growers Association. There may be something in favour of growing rape, but these growers seem to suggest they are subject to it. The ad also suggests that the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool endorses the stabilization plan. Let me read what the President of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool is reported as having said in respect of building into this legislation costs of production. Perhaps I should first of all say that last night and this morning the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool was reported to have said, and I refer to the Regina Leader-Post under the heading, "Wheat pool president denies Bill 244 endorsed":

Monday, E. K. Turner, president of the pool, issued a news release denying that he or his organization supported Bill C-244, the proposed plan.

"Our position was misrepresented in both cases"—

The words "both cases" means the outfit that put this ad in the paper, and the editorial writers of the Regina Leader-Post. The article continues:

"We have not endorsed and will not endorse the proposed income stabilization plan because in our view it is inadequate," said Mr. Turner.

He said the wheat pool would support a stabilization plan—

He laid down three conditions under which it would support the government's bill, and if the government wants me to shut up it will adopt these three suggestions. The first is that an amendment should be made so that annual increases in production costs could be taken into account when calculating the grains income shortfall. That is the kind of provision that we propose in the amendment we are debating.

The second suggestion is that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, to be eliminated under this bill, should be replaced with a storage plan to cover a normal reserve stock of grain. The government heard about that little point some time ago. The third suggestion is that the price of wheat consumed in Canada—that is, human consumption—should be increased by $1 per bushel. The President of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool reiterated what he said to the agricultural committee last spring, and disavowed this piece of garbage.

Let me tell you who put this piece of garbage in the newspaper. One of them happens to be—this will shake you because they are supposed to be grain growers—Donald K. McPherson, Liberal MLA for Regina Southwest. That riding is in my riding. I am sad to state that we do not grow a damn bushel of wheat in that riding—but that is the kind of support the minister in charge of the Wheat Board received. The other sponsor of this ad happens to be the son of a Liberal candidate who was defeated last June. He is a practising lawyer in Regina. He is a very nice fellow and I go goose hunting with him once in a while.

An hon. Member: Who gets the goose?

Mr. Benjamin: This ad invites grain farmers to submit a coupon. We have been through this procedure before. The Tories did it in respect of a tax bill and the Liberals are now doing it in respect of the grain stabilization bill. Both these parties have the imagination of a doorknob. I am sure all hon. members are receiving letters about this measure. I received one from 416 Preston Avenue, Saskatoon. I am sure they grow lots of wheat there! I received one from Riel Crescent in Saskatoon, and they do not grow any wheat there. I received another from Preston Avenue, and they do not grow even a bushel of gophers there. I got another letter from 652 East Place, Saskatoon, and they do not grow any wheat there. This is the kind of support Mr. Lang is getting in respect of his position on this bill. I have received 34 communications to date, of which two were from grain farmers. The rest are from the Liberal heelers who belong in that party and who betray Canada and the grain growers in the three prairie provinces.

Unless the minister is prepared to build into this bill some provision, not necessarily our amendment or subamendment, which takes into account the increasing costs of production, then I am sorry—we hate to do this to you, Mr. Speaker—but we will be here for quite a while. This is what it is all about. For the first time in many years, through all the multitudinous times this subject has been raised in the House in the question period, during the "late shows" and various debates, this is the first piece of major, long-term legislation that for the next ten years will set the law for the grain industry in the three prairie provinces.

As a consequence, hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly the government House leader (Mr. MacEachen), will realize that this is the last opportunity we will have for a long time to get the kind of changes and additions to the grains legislation we have been pleading for in western Canada for a number of years. We have no choice; we must make our fight now.

If hon. gentlemen opposite think we are just playing around or kidding, as sincerely as I can I would assure them that is not the name of the game. I want them to know that my colleagues—and I am certain some of the gentlemen to my right and possibly some in the Liberal ranks—are prepared to place our political lives on the line on this issue. We have fought for many years to get this kind of legislation. We have asked and pleaded for it for at least 15 years.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board now proposes long-term legislation which perverts the word "stabilization". I plead with hon. gentlemen opposite to use whatever influence they might have with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, with the cabinet and with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). Of course, there is not enough money in it and until enough money is put into it in a meaningful and significant way, this legislation so far as I am concerned will not pass. That is what we are up to. I put it plainly and simply in those terms. The grain growers in the three prairie provinces have been asking for legislation which would give them the same kind of treatment that is given to the gold mines, the textile industry and the uranium industry. That is all they are asking. They are not asking for anything they have neither earned nor deserved.

The western grain growers are asking for recognition of their efficiency, their production and their contribution to this nation. The result of this legislation would be that between now and 1980 no payments will have been made out of the stabilization fund, and in the meantime 12,000 to 20,000 more grain producers will have disappeared and will have contributed to the fund, not having received anything back. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) claims that the government is putting more money into the grain growing industry under this bill than under the previous legislation, I submit he is incorrect, to be polite. The government will pay out $100 million. It will save in the previous crop year $62 million.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much that I must interrupt the hon. member, but his time appears to have expired.

Mr. Skoberg: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When debates of this nature are being carried on, is it required that at least one minister responsible for the bill be in the House to hear the observations that are made?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie).

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this amendment partly because I wish to comment on the figures given by the minister as to the amount of money that would be owing under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act versus Bill C-244. The minister stated that there is $62.1 million owing already, with $30.8 million likely, and an estimated $20 million for the present crop year. But the minister stated that only $38.6 million will reach the farmers out of the $62.1 million. He implied that the balance, $23.5 million, would not reach the farmers and would not be used.

I should like to point out that this money goes to the Wheat Board to be used in its operations in taking care of pools which have been in deficit, and under the new act, when a pool is in trouble it will be paid a sum out of the stabilization fund to help them with carrying charges, and so on, related to grain in storage. Almost certainly, if this bill should pass in its present form there will have to be an increase in the handling charges of grain, so the farmers will have to make further payments out of the proceeds from their grain in order to make up what was the government's obligation under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

Although the farmers may not necessarily receive the exact amount of their payments into the pools under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, still it goes to their benefit because it is used to help carry the Wheat Board so that it can provide the service of marketing the grain. The minister stated that with the $100 million that would be paid under Bill C-244, the farmer would be a lot better off. This is not necessarily so, because he included an estimated $17.5 million for the next two years that would be paid out of the farmers' pockets, to be matched by $35 million each year from the government. This, however, will go into the stabilization fund and there will not be any immediate benefit to the farmer unless there should be a disastrous crop failure.

The effect of this legislation, really, is that the government will not be paying out any substantial amount of money in the next five years. Unless there should be a tremendous disaster, it will not have to pay out any money. So at a time when things are extremely bad the government is able to wash itself of the farm industry for the next five years. What about the prospects for this year, which the minister attempted to say are extremely good? In the Richardson grain letter of September 30 we find these comments:

> Reports from around the world paint a rather gloomy picture for the Canadian producer. According to the Canadian commercial officer in New Delhi, India is becoming self-sufficient in wheat. They have already acquired the 5 million tons buffer stock of imported wheat, and the Food Corporation's target of buying four million tons from local farmers has already been exceeded by one million tons. Supplies are still flowing in steadily, leading to what is being currently referred to as "the problem of plenty". India may not require imports and could well be seeking export markets next year. Some are even so optimistic as to maintain that India's wheat revolution has come to stay to an extent that future poor monsoons will not have any significant effect on production and supplies.

> The United Kingdom harvest is expected to be at an all-time high; the EEC countries harvested record crops and the U.S. feed grains production, which includes corn, oats, barley and sorghum, is expected to total 198 million tons, 24 per cent more than last year, and all-wheat production at 1,625 million bushels is a record high. The deficiency countries are mainly in North Africa and the Middle East where we were expected to sell a lot of barley, for one thing, but the Commodity Credit Corporation—an arm of the U.S. department of agriculture—has started to sell barley—

—at a very low price. Referring to oilseeds, the worldwide burdensome supplies of flax are well known and this holds out very little promise for any advance in price. In rapeseed, European supplies are estimated to be 120,000 metric tons more than last year, and with the increase in our own crop of around 30 million bushels we have substantial rapeseed on hand. So hon. members can see that this bill comes at a crucial time for western agriculture.

What are the main problems connected with this bill? I would like to enumerate them as I see them. The fact is that it comes at a time when there have been four years of poor income and only one good year. This gives a very low average on which to base the formula for crop payments. Five years ago it amounted to approximately $1,400 million, but in the last four years it has been between $800 million to $900 million to $1 billion. So in view of the crop expectations, the government will not have to pay out much money from the fund in the next five years, and almost certainly nothing in the next two years. Nevertheless, farmers will be paying 2 per cent of their gross income at a time when they can ill afford it.

What can be done? I suggest that the minister should reduce the farmers' contributions in the next two years to nothing, or at the most to 1 per cent for at least the next five years. After the plan has been in force for five years the amount could be increased to 2 per cent if conditions warrant it. However, at this time to impose a 2 per cent levy is not in the interest of the farmers. Furthermore, for the next two years there should be some base, regardless of what the average is, below which farm income should not be allowed to fall. What this base should be I do not know, but I think it should be in the neighbourhood of $1 billion. Even that would not make a large payment which the government would be obligated to make.

What about payments under the bill? Little thought was given to the type of payment that would have to be made. Agriculture is not a monolithic industry. It is not made up of two, three, four or even ten large companies. It is made up of 200,000 grain producers who live in a large area 400 miles wide by 1,000 or more miles long, people who experience different conditions and whose districts are entirely different.

The fact that payments will not be made for the whole of the designated area below the previous five years' average means that great hardship will result. Of these 200,000 farmers, at any one time and in any one year—even in the best years—10,000 to 20,000 will be in difficulties. They may easily find themselves in serious trouble through no fault of their own, while their neighbours might be enjoying the best financial years of their lives. What will happen if these 10,000 to 20,000 farmers who are in trouble each year have a 2 per cent levy imposed on them in that particular year? What can be done to make this bill more workable?

The least we could do is to make payments to crop districts. At least this would narrow down and help to smooth out some of the injustices. It would prevent discrimination which would take place with this type of pay-out that the government proposes under the bill. Unless something like this is done, the movement of farmers off the land will accelerate and farmers who are in difficulty will be pushed over the edge because they will receive no payment but will in fact have to pay 2 per cent of their meagre gross income in that year. These are some of the comments that I wanted to make on the bill. It is incomprehensible to me that a 2 per cent levy should be applied immediately. It should be reduced to 1 per cent or even to nothing for the first couple of years.

The other point I want to make is that when the program is begun, a different base than the previous five years' average should be established. Finally, the method of payment leaves much to be desired. It is not a good method and I think it could be improved so that a workable solution is found to some of the farm problems.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member seeking the floor?

Mr. Skoberg: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member is prepared to answer it.

Mr. Skoberg: I should like to ask whether, in view of the fact that the three prairie Ministers of Agriculture came to Ottawa last Friday, the hon. member thinks that some progress may be made in this debate which we are pursuing, so far as the stabilization plan is concerned?

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Mr. Ritchie: I would hope that the three prairie ministers advanced reasonable solutions. I do not know what they were, but I would be interested to hear them.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, as an indication of how strongly the NDP feels about the legislation before us and how useless it is, they have reached into the wilds of southern Ontario for the wheat expert from Waterloo.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: One of the best things that ever happened to the prairie farmers, in my view, was when they elected six members of the NDP in Saskatchewan. This has had two important influences. It is important to know that this debate has been largely conducted by the members from Saskatchewan, assisted by colleagues within their party who have been persuaded about the justice of the cause of the western farmer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: I am not saying that these are exclusively the only ones; there is the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). But let me point out that the people—

Mr. Horner: What about the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta)?

Mr. Saltsman: Fight with the government, will you? What is obvious is that western constituencies which have placed their faith in the Liberal member whom they elected to Parliament on the assumption that, being a member of the government, he would speak for the farmers must feel a tremendous sense of betrayal as they follow the progress of this debate. Where are the Liberals who always say, "What is the point of electing an opposition member?" What about those who have said, "Elect us so that we can go inside the confines of the government where we will have access to the ear of the Prime Minister and the cabinet and can explain your position"? Instead of bringing the arguments on behalf of the prairie farmer to their colleagues, they have been persuaded that he is not important and they keep quiet. They do not even have enough dignity or integrity to resign. The hopes of the people who sent them here are betrayed.

When the member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) felt that the policies he was advocating in respect of housing were not acceptable to the government, he felt honour-bound to leave the government. When the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) tried to get the government to understand what was happening to employment in Canada and in the selling of our resources, and could not persuade his colleagues of the merits of his case, he resigned. But there has not been a single resignation of a Liberal member from the west. Instead of resigning on principle to highlight the problems of the prairie farmer and the indignities showered upon him, they are so insensitive to his needs that they defend every criminal act perpetrated on the farmer and attempt to rationalize rather than criticize.

An hon. Member: They are not even here.

Mr. Saltsman: There has not been a word of criticism from a Liberal on this bill. Is this bill so obviously meritorious that not one Liberal will stand up and say that there are things in it which are wrong and should be changed? The ministers concerned are not even here to listen to the speeches; they do not even want to hear what is said. Is there one Liberal who will stand up and say, "Enough things have been brought to our attention that the bill should be withdrawn for examination, so let's hold it to take another look". It is obvious from everything that has been said that grain growers in the west do not like this bill.

An hon. Member: Right!

Mr. Saltsman: Where are their representatives on the government side to speak for them? They are not even in the House tonight. It is left to the city boys to join western representatives in the opposition parties to speak on behalf of the farmers. It is true that I do not know a great deal about growing wheat. There are no wheat fields in the streets of Galt or Waterloo—but there are some things that apply to wheat as they do to any other element in this country.

Mr. Benjamin: Costs of production.

Mr. Saltsman: Right, costs of production. There is no reason why farmers cannot be considered in the same light and come to Parliament to ask that their future be looked upon favourably, in the same way that we look upon the future of industrial workers or any other group that comes to Parliament and says, "We are entitled to some sense of security and some sense of support from the other people in our society".

One thing is certain, Mr. Speaker, that inflation is a fact of life and we will have to live with it. I do not think there is any economist or any person who is analysing the situation in Canada, the United States or any part of the world who will say that there will not be inflation in future. We hope that it will not be a galloping kind of inflation, but we know we will not be able to hold it down to less than 3 per cent.

This means that every single component the farmer uses to produce wheat will rise in price—his truck, his tools, the petrol, the combine, and so on; even the things he needs in order to exist, that he cannot grow himself and requires for sustenance. The very bread that he grows the wheat for will rise in price because of increasing labour costs and the general increase in the cost of living.

This bill says that the farmer will be compensated only if his gross income drops below a certain level. Every year that goes by, his costs of production will increase at a very substantial rate. Even if his income remains steady and the price of wheat remains what it is today, or even if it increases slightly he will lose out on the deal and be caught in the same squeeze that he has been in since the end of the war. The price increases and his gross income do not equate. It is incredible that a bill which claims to seek to stabilize farm income, to give a measure of justice to the farmer and to protect him against the vicissitudes of market hazards, ignores this elementary possibility.

The amendment before us is important because it seeks to guarantee the farmer's income by taking costs of production into account. Unless those costs are considered there can be no justice for the farmer on the basis of simply saying, "We will try to maintain your gross income on an average of the last five years". Another bill that was recently before the House also deals with the problem of security. This House passed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which included additional benefits to workers who become unemployed or who cannot work because of ill health. The percentage of the pay which they can draw has been increased. Pregnancy benefits have been allowed under that bill. In fact, what we have done is recognize society's obligations to those who find themselves in difficulty because of technological change or changing market conditions.

Surely the farmer is entitled to the same protection, but this bill does not offer it to him. I think the bill could be drafted to cover it. Acceptance of the subamendment would go a long way toward improving the situation for the farmer. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, there are times in this House when one of my colleagues will ask a question about wheat or boxcars. When that happens, all we city fellows turn off right away because we know the question period has gone, that this subject is going to dominate. Sometimes we get a little peeved at the energy and enthusiasm with which they put forward their case. But as we follow this bill we can see why they feel as they do; we can sense the real grievance that exists in the prairie provinces about the insensitivity of this government.

Just the other day one of my colleagues blamed Ontario and Quebec. But it is not Ontario and Quebec—certainly not all of Ontario and Quebec. However, there has been a tendency for the Liberal party to think in those terms, and the farmer feels this. Sometimes you get the impression—

Mr. Skoberg: The minister has arrived.

Mr. Saltsman: I am delighted to greet the minister.

An hon. Member: It is nine o'clock.

Mr. Saltsman: With any luck we may continue this discussion so that we have the vote tomorrow rather than tonight, in which case the minister may feel it was worth his trouble to hear us—

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, could I ask a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) seeks the floor to ask a question.

Mr. Saltsman: Certainly.

Mr. Horner: In view of the fact that the member began his remarks with a reference to prairie members, I fail to see why he is taking such an interest as a member from central Canada. How does this bill affect central Canada? Not that I think he is colloquial in his thinking—

An hon. Member: "Parochial."

Mr. Horner: —but could he give the House some reason for these remarks?

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Saltsman: I am glad the hon. member asked me that question. It demonstrates better than anything else the difference between a democratic socialist and a conservative. As democratic socialists, we are concerned about all people and not just about those immediately surrounding us. It may be that the hon. member for Crowfoot is accustomed to thinking only about those in his neighbourhood.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are not parochial. The hon. member said "colloquial".

Mr. Saltsman: I am sure the hon. member is our friend. At least, that is about as close as a conservative can get in his attempts to think like a democratic socialist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: If my hon. friend from Crowfoot hoped, by asking that question, to make me lose my place in my notes, he has succeeded admirably. He asked why I am speaking. I do not pretend, as I said in my opening remarks, to be an authority on wheat. I am speaking because this party's six magnificent representatives from Saskatchewan have been twisting my arm and the arms of others in my party to speak. They said that farmers are part of this country, suggested they should not be the only ones to speak on behalf of farmers and that each member of our party should recognize the interdependence of the farmer and the urban dweller. I recognize that. Their advocacy has worked wonders and that is why I am tonight making a speech on farming.

There is something else that all of us from the city know. Canadian prosperity is based on agriculture. We sometimes forget that our country's prosperity rests on our farmers' ability to provide food efficiently. Before there is any industrial development there must be surpluses of food. We must have a rich and varied agricultural sector. Our farmers have achieved that. Not more than 6 or 7 per cent of our population consists of farmers, which is perhaps why the Liberals who look at these percentages say, "Farmers are not terribly important. They will not matter very much in the next election. After all, we do not hold many seats in the west. Even if we lose Otto Lang, he always has his university to go back to, and Mr. Richardson will not be selling pencils on the street of Winnipeg, so perhaps they are all expendable."

An hon. Member: What about Pat Mahoney?

Mr. Saltsman: Pat Mahoney also has a little fund set up for himself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. When the hon. member is reviewing the future of his colleagues he should refer to them by riding.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That demonstrates the sort of difficulties that can occur when a non-farmer becomes involved in a debate on farming.

An hon. Member: Talk about the costs of production.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I appear to be having more difficulty with my colleagues, who are making remarks and offering reminders, than with the official opposition and members on the government benches.

[Mr. Horner.]

I wish to make another important point. Wheat is Canada's most important export. In recent years there has been a tendency to forget how important wheat is to Canada's future. There have been oil discoveries; we are exporting gas and a great deal of iron ore. We have forgotten that wheat is a renewable resource. We must remember that.

An hon. Member: Otto, are you listening?

Mr. Saltsman: Every year we harvest and sell our wheat, and the next year, if the farmers have done their job in planting it, it grows again. It is renewable, which is not true of oil, gas or minerals. Those resources do not replace themselves. Once they are taken out of the ground, they are lost forever. If we are to pursue an objective in this country, that objective ought to be the export of renewable resources such as wheat and forest products. These are vital commodities and we ought to concentrate on their production.

At present we are undergoing an upheaval. I think we need to develop new trade policies. Our great friends to the south, upon whom the Liberal party from time to time relied when it wanted to get out of trouble, are no longer interested in helping Canadians overcome difficulties caused by our government. The Liberal party which forms the government of the day will have to redirect much of our trade. They will have to cut down the export of non-renewable raw materials. There has been much criticism about the way we export raw materials from this country. The oil and gas will not last forever and will not always be able to meet the insatiable appetite of our neighbour to the south. We will have to rely increasingly in future on our renewable resources to provide the exports of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: The attempts to phase-out the farmer constitute a most foolish policy. He is being punished because there is a glut in a number of products.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: If we phase farmers out of production, this country may well regret such a decision. It seems to be government policy to get rid of the farmer. His own productivity has destroyed him. The government wants farming to be undertaken by corporate bodies. It is not hard to see that corporate farming methods will increase efficiency, and we can tell what will happen to our corporate farms. Not much of our industry belongs to us any more. We do not own many of our resources. Farming is one of the few fields we still control. Are we willing to see our farms bought out by the United States in the same way as that country is buying out our forests? Some day a tractor may start somewhere 100 miles below the border, cut a huge swath through Canada and go back with the money and the produce to the United States.

An hon. Member: Without even stopping for the Customs.

Mr. Saltsman: That is right, perhaps without even stopping for the tax collector. Those corporations will need big machinery. They will not buy it in Canada. They will not buy their merchandise in the little country stores. They will not support any of the towns which are needed if there is to be any kind of society or civilization on the Prairies. Running a combine for 100 miles through the country is certainly no way to develop a country. It may be efficient, but it is not the way this country was built up in the first place.

Mr. Skoberg: Right on.

Mr. Saltsman: Most of us in Canada enjoy some kind of subsidy. I am sensitive about that. Speaking as one who lives in a city in southern Ontario and whose preoccupation is with the manufacturing industry of Canada, I am not averse to seeing the farmer get a fair deal through substantial subsidies if necessary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher).

Mr. Skoberg: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the minister was granted two extensions. I wonder if the House would not agree to extending the time of the hon. member who has just spoken.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take too much time of the House this evening discussing the amendment to the amendment which is before us. I think we should recall exactly what this subamendment purports to do for the grain economy of western Canada. In my opinion it seeks to deal with a deduction from the gross grain deliveries of farmers in western Canada. This goes to the root of the problem we are facing today and that is why there is in western Canada such fierce opposition to this legislation.

The government seems to be puzzled about why there should be this opposition. In some respects it questions the validity of that opposition. It appears to me, on the basis of mail that crosses my desk, that there is no support for the bill. I have received a significant number of communications—not to be compared with the number I received about Bill C-176—from constituents who definitely oppose this bill. On the other hand, I have received but one letter from a constituent urging passage of the bill. That constituent is a barley grower. He said he did not benefit in any way, shape or form from the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. He thought this was a good opportunity to get some money out of the federal government which, although it was a one-shot deal, was at least something rather than nothing.

I felt it necessary to remind my constituent that he might be paying a rather high price for this one-shot payment, in view of the fact that this legislation proposes what is in my view a new tax on the western grain economy. That is, in this 2 per cent deduction of gross grain deliveries in the foreseeable future there is no real anticipation of ever receiving anything back.

It is useless for the minister to keep reminding us that if this legislation had been in effect since World War II the farmers would have received almost four times the amount of their deductions. We are in a different factual situation. The minister should know that ever since Canada more or less left the International Wheat Agreement by default we have been consistently faced with smaller grain sales abroad. This has been reflected in the radical decline in prairie farm income in the past five years.

Mr. Gibson: Oh, come on!

Mr. Schumacher: The government may have increase shipments but, I ask the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson), at what price? If it has been at a decent price, why have the returns to the farmers been falling so greatly? The net disposable income fell from $1,100 million to something over $500 million in those five years. If something happened to the economy of the area which the hon. member has the privilege of representing, he would be making more noise than is presently being made by the responsible members on this side of the House who represent the area of the country that is suffering most because of the actions of this government.

Mr. Gibson: You are holding up the legislation, not us.

Mr. Paproski: Have you been listening to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)?

Mr. Schumacher: We are not holding up any legislation. As I pointed out to the constituent who wrote to me about this matter, this is a one-shot deal which will prove to be a rather expensive payment for him in the future. While he may receive something in the order of $500 or less, considering the size of the farms in the area in which the gentleman lives, he will be faced with a deduction from all his barley payments in the future, with no hope of recovery.

These farmers realized that in the early days of the PFAA there was not much hope for adequate payment under the program because the block was too large. When the former Conservative administration took office it reduced the size of the block to make payments more available to farmers who suffered a crop failure.

What is proposed in this bill? We have a block consisting of the entire prairie area plus the Peace River area. It would take a complete and utter climatic disaster, or a continuation of the poor marketing policies of this government, to ever facilitate a future payment. In view of the ever increasing inflation we are faced with, even a decrease in real terms might not be reflected in monetary terms. This five-year average would result in no payment being made to the farmers who had contributed to the program. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say that we are not being presented with a viable program for western Canada. I support the amendment to the amendment because it has the objective of reducing the tax that is being imposed on western farmers by the government through this legislation. At this stage we do not need the imposition of another tax.

The government has been paying directly into the western grain economy sums of money in the order of $40 million to $50 million a year. The government proposes to stop paying those sums to introduce a plan which will take money out of the western grain economy and not put anything back into it. I do not care what the minister says about contributing 4 per cent to some fund—this is a general revenue fund. It is like the CNR pension fund; it is non-existent. It is a future commitment that the government might meet at some time. It would be different if we were going to establish a particular pattern of earned interest for the benefit of the western grain economy, but this is not even proposed. It is easy for the minister to talk about a 4 per cent commitment, but when it is just a paper entry it is not meaningful to the western grain economy. For this reason I urge the House to give serious consideration to the amendment. I know it does not solve the problem of the program of the government, but it has an ameliorating effect and should be supported by all members of this House.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the sub-amendment, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and honoured to follow the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: The member for Palliser is a very congenial young gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: His riding takes its name from a celebrated British army engineer and explorer, Captain Palliser. The whole region of the Prairies was explored under his orders. After visiting the region for some months, it was described as a semi-arid region which would never be productive and there was no need for any population to settle there. It appears that the original viewpoint of Captain Palliser is being echoed in the kind of policies being put forward by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: After listening to my colleagues from prairie Canada it is apparent that there is substantial opposition to the bill now before us. I am putting it by way of an understatement. The government benches appear to view that kind of opposition as some kind of inflexibility or a move on the part of various parties or the members who represent prairie Canada to create some kind of blockade against very generous, much needed and crucial legislation. This is not my reading of it. It seems to me that if we can assume that a member from a particular region of Canada is not putting forward the views of his constituents, we would say it about every region.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Benjamin: Right on.

Mr. Rose: The question which occurs to me is this: When member after member representing one of the five great regions of this country rises to oppose this bill, if they are not speaking for those they represent, who are they speaking for? Are they speaking for the grain industry? Are they speaking for the government? It is obvious they do not speak for the government, because they are sitting on this side of the House. It is well known that I do not represent a constituency in prairie Canada. This is one speech that I hoped I would never be called upon to make. I think there are a number of members who probably shared this aspiration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: This is the highest legislative body in the land, if you leave out the Prime Minister's office which is not a legislative body but an oligarchy.

Mr. Speaker, I am having a very difficult time with certain hecklers around here. This is the body, it seems to me, which should deal with national problems. I do not think there are many members in any party who are so introverted, so ingrown, so parochial that they can consider only issues associated with their particular regions while ignoring others. This is precisely why I, as a member from British Columbia, am now involved in this debate in support of the position taken by my hon. friends in this party and by my good friends in the official opposition. I do so because it has not sunk through very well, in spite of some debate—not substantial debate but some debate—that by and large this bill goes against the grain.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Rose: There has been a suggestion from the government benches that the opposition is indulging in some kind of filibuster. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Lessard) nodding his head. I welcome him to the House. It is a long time since I have seen him. He is really not interested in the grain business. He is interested in the broiler business. This debate has not been unduly prolonged. I think I can say this with reasonable safety. I have in my hand a piece of paper which was published by the research bureau of the national Liberal caucus.

Mr. Horner: How did you get hold of that?

Mr. Rose: It may have been a cabinet leak; I really do not know. But it has come into my possession, and like all good journalists I protect my sources. I assure Your Honour there has been no burglary or anything like that. Maybe someone from prairie Canada, maybe someone from Quebec, secretly opposes this legislation and has placed this information in the hands of the opposition. The charge has been that the opposition is filibustering this bill and that if we would only sit down and be quiet the government would go on to do great things for Canadians. This may be so, but it would be for the first time since I came here three years ago.

The grain stabilization bill received first reading on April 29, 1971. That is not very long ago. At that time there was a miniscule four days of debate. This is an important and controversial piece of legislation, as I think all hon. members will agree, and four days does not seem unduly long for the careful consideration of legislation so vital to the future of western Canada. After that, the bill went to committee. Approximately nine days were spent on that stage. The committee gave the bill a clause by clause study. My hon. friend from Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) suggests I should have said "claw by claw" instead of "clause by clause". It took nine days. I think the general public would be pleased to know that Parliament took a searching look at a piece of legislation which came before it. I see the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) nodding his head; he agrees with me.

After the summer had ended, the bill was brought back to the House for discussion at the report stage on which we are presently engaged. The bill has been back with us four days. I do not think this is spending too much time on a measure which according to the government is worth something like $100 million to the prairie farmers.

While we are considering the subamendment I think it would be worth while to examine the source of this bill. I think it can safely be said that the bill was really born in Winnipeg on June 2, 1968, when a gentleman very important to this country visited that city.

Mr. Skoberg: Who?

Mr. Rose: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of our country. Among other things he is reported to have said that day was the following:

> One of the most pressing long-range problems for western farmers is the need for an adequate yearly income to get away from the boom and bust cycle which has become part of prairie farm life. To this end, the Liberals are proposing a plan which in effect, sounds like the equivalent of unemployment insurance for farmers. In good years they would pay into a fund; in bad years they would draw money from the fund, thereby, to a degree, stabilizing their income.

I think most of us would support that concept. So much for the gleam in the eye, so to speak. But when the bill was born it turned out to have some serious abnormalities. One of the most important is that the bill, as contrasted with unemployment insurance, does not apply to individuals. If an individual through no fault of his own becomes unemployed, he needs unemployment assistance. If he has the correct number of stamps on his card and has worked the required number of days, he is eligible for assistance and receives it without equivocation.

The situation is different under this legislation which does not apply to individuals at all but to the average of a group. The hon. member for Palliser ably pointed out that as a result of drought, hail, a grasshopper invasion, even an attack by the Bertha army worms or some other blight peculiar to agriculture on the Prairies, an individual farmer in desperate need of assistance could conceivably be ineligible for assistance under this measure owing to the simple fact that the national average in terms of sales was not sufficiently low to enable him to qualify. Thus, an individual in desperate need of assistance would not get a dime under this measure.

This is a major flaw in the legislation, as pointed out by a number of people. This party and the official opposition feel that the legislation should be based on net rather than gross income. Let me tell the House why I feel this way. I think we are all aware that there are very few sectors of the economy that are stable. For the last 20 years we have experienced a wave of inflation. Stabilizing the income of farmers sounds fine, but that is only half the problem; you must also stabilize their costs.

Let me give hon. members a revealing example of what has happened to farmers' costs since 1949. These costs have been affected by taxes and interest rates. Using the base 1939 equals 100, by 1949 taxes and interest rates had risen to an index of 149.4. By 1970 that figure had more than doubled, to 323.4. We all know that the farmers need capital. Farms are now large operations; the little half-sections are no longer efficient units and have disappeared. If taxes and interest rates, as one of the indices, have more than doubled during that period, then it appears to me that the income of the farmers would have to match that increase.

The same increase can be shown in the cost of farm machinery. In 1949 the price index had risen to 158.4, and by 1970 had gone up to 339.6. Increases like this are the reason that the members of this party as well as the members of the Conservative party oppose the bill. I submit the cost base of production should be the year 1970. The minister is no longer in the chamber; indeed he is seldom here during the debate. When he is here he rarely listens. He usually just sits in his seat, writes in his notebook and occasionally looks up to give one a baleful stare like a recently hibernated iguana. We are rarely able to reach him.

One needs only to drive across the Prairies to see what is happening to western Canada. It is being depopulated. Small farms are being abandoned in favour of larger units. Opportunities for the people, especially the young, are disappearing. High schools, post offices and drug stores are closing down and whole communities are dispersing. People are migrating to the cities. The same thing is happening in Newfoundland under the present government. The once independent, self-reliant, if not wealthy, people under the new enclosure movement are being chased off the land for economic reasons. Where you once had the land owner you now have millions of Canadians living as cliff-dwelling tenants in cities across Canada, thus creating all kinds of urban problems. It seems to me that if we had done a little more research on rural problems we would have far less need than we have at the moment for a Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Congestion in cities has created many problems for Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There does not appear to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Skoberg: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am given to understand that when an hon. member details figures that can be substantiated by a chart, the document should be tabled. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) referred to the government's legislative progress chart and to the number of hours spent in this House. Could the hon. member table that chart?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): As I understand the rule, this request can be made of a minister. If an hon. member wishes to refer to a document in front of him and adopts it or interprets it as part of his speech, it is very difficult to ask him to table the document unless he reads exactly from the document itself. Therefore, the Chair cannot accept the hon. member's suggestion.

This might be a good opportunity to inform the members of the House that for a good part of the day the Chair has been attempting to try to relate many of the remarks made by hon. members to the debate on the amendment. The Chair has made an almost gymnastic effort to relate a large portion of the remarks of hon. members to the amendment. I know we have only a few minutes left and I do not want to impose any restraints upon the hon. member who will have the floor, but this is a matter hon. members might think about overnight in an effort to orientate their remarks in a suitable way tomorrow.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I intend to be brief, Mr. Speaker. I did not plan to speak tonight, but I noticed that the minister was in the House and I wanted to say a few words in an effort to help my colleagues bring him to his senses. I am sorry to note that he has left because the remaining members on the government side look as though they might be difficult to bring to their senses.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Yewchuk: Another thing that motivates me to say a few words is the fact that this government has been taking part in criminal activities for some months with gay abandon and complete disregard for the law of the land.

Mr. Alexander: That's right.

Mr. Yewchuk: They have done this by their failure to pay money to the farmers under existing legislation. In view of the fact there is no recourse to farmers to claim this money, there is no other way of describing it than saying it is equivalent to armed robbery. These people have no recourse and no one to turn to in their effort to obtain the money due them.

Another motivating factor leading me to make a few remarks is that the speeches I have heard from the government side today have been filled with deception and have smacked very heavily of blackmail. The blackmail consists of the government's suggestion to the farmers that they must support the stabilization plan or they will not receive the money the government owes them. That is the decision the farmer has to make.

Some hon. Members: shame.

Mr. Yewchuk: Farmers generally have been objecting to this legislation but now they are starting to say they do not give a damn what the legislation is, they want their money. They are not objecting to it any longer in order that they may be paid. That is an extremely sorry state of affairs facing our farmers. The government has deceived the farmers by suggesting that under this legislation they will get more money than they would under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. This is a gross misrepresentation of the facts.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

An hon. Member: It is extortion.

Mr. Peters: It is fraudulent extortion.

Mr. Yewchuk: The government says there will be more money coming to the farmers, but the money now owing is almost equivalent to the $100 million the government wants to pay out, at least theoretically.

Mr. Woolliams: That is $92 million.

Mr. Yewchuk: In addition, we will have a discontinuance of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and will lose the advantage of having the government pay the deficits incurred by grain pools. The worst part of this whole situation, as mentioned by the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), is that the farmers will have to pay an additional tax. When we consider the net income picture which farmers have faced for the past several years, we realize that the last thing they need is another tax on their income. A 2 per cent tax on gross income could amount to 10 per cent of the net income. Let us say a farmer sells produce for $10,000; he would have to pay an additional tax of $200 per year. This is outrageous, but it is something the farmers are not being told. It is being hidden. They should know about it.

This kind of stabilization bill is a poor excuse for the agricultural plan about which the government has been bragging for the past three years. The government suggests it is bringing in long-term policies to solve agricultural problems. This is a very poor excuse for a policy to sell agricultural products. It is a very poor excuse when we realize that half the wheat surplus of the world exists in this country and that we produce only 5 per cent of the world's wheat production. This is a very poor excuse for an explanation as to why our wheat market has dropped from 35 per cent to 17 per cent.

The situation is not helped very much by the fact that we in Canada today spend $25 per capita for the importation of agricultural products, or by the fact that in 1969, the year of the last report, Canada for the first time in its history was a net importer of agricultural products. Can one conceivably imagine that in this country which is suited to agricultural production we do not produce enough to feed our own people? We were net importers of meat, poultry products and many other things Canada is well able to produce. This is a very shameful indictment of this government and the minister who is responsible for the Wheat Board.

The minister is not making any real or sincere effort to do anything on a long-term basis for this industry which is rapidly vanishing from our Prairies. We have heard many discussions and representations, some from agricultural groups, to the effect that we must do something to improve the declining net income of the farmer. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) appointed the Barber commission to study the ever increasing price of farm machinery. That commission reported and made several good recommendations but the government has done absolutely nothing to implement them. It has done absolutely nothing to bring down the price of farm machinery.

I should like the minister to explain why there is not legislation before the House to do something about this situation and the suggestions in the report. The only thing we have had from the government is this grain stabilization bill. The only thing this government has done is attempt to bribe the farmer with his own money. It has attempted to deceive the farmer by saying this is new money to be injected into the agricultural industry.

This stabilization bill might theoretically sound all right to someone who does not understand agriculture. The government suggests it is going to stabilize the income of the agricultural industry.

An hon. Member: That sounds like a law professor.

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, it sounds like what the dean of law would suggest as a good solution to the problem. Let us consider the average net income of a farmer in western Canada in the past two years. It has been around $1,000, perhaps $1,100. Mr. Speaker, would you like to have your income stabilized at $1,100 per year? That is what this government is attempting to do to the western farmer.

An hon. Member: They are stabilizing poverty.

Mr. Yewchuk: Having observed the actions of this government over the past three years I have come to the conclusion there is only one solution to the agricultural problem in the west, and that is to throw out this do-nothing government.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question. Would the hon. member allow me to pose a question at this time?

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes.

Mr. Skoberg: In view of the cooling-off period suggested following the meeting of the minister with the three prairie agricultural ministers on Friday, was it his expectation that this bill would be brought back before the House this week?

Mr. Yewchuk: I regret that it is very difficult to expect anything at all from this government. I was surprised, or shocked would be a better word, that the minister made a commitment to the three agricultural ministers from the prairie provinces that the debate would be cooled off for a week.

Mr. Peters: If he does not live up to the law, how do you expect him to live up to an agreement?

Mr. Yewchuk: I am surprised that no opportunity was provided for consultation with ministers of the prairie provinces to see whether the bill could be made more acceptable. Instead, the minister brought the bill back before the House at the first opportunity. That means one of two things. It means either that the minister deliberately deceived the three agricultural ministers from the Prairies or that he does not have sufficient authority with his cabinet colleagues to persuade them to agree with his decisions.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Alexander: You cannot trust Grits.

Mr. Yewchuk: The third possibility, as my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) says, is that you cannot trust Grits. To sum up, I believe that to save the agricultural industry—I am saying this not only to members of the House but to the people of Canada—we must to re-elect a Conservative government which has some understanding of agriculture, which has a feeling for the people, which is concerned about the individual and about individual industry which is being destroyed. We must have that kind of government returned to power in this country.

As I said before, this bill basically is a piece of blackmail. Farmers here and there are saying they need the money and that therefore we should get this legislation through the House. I think this is outrageous. I believe that this, added to the policy of the government which is designed to remove two-thirds of the farm population from the farms, is too much to swallow at one time. Farmers do not want to be removed from their industry, especially when there is nothing to replace that type of employment. It might be all right if we told them we would retrain them for a certain job and then offered them that job, but under this administration we do not have jobs for those who are already involved in factory work, industry, and soon.

We have a shortage of housing in cities for people who are already there, and at the same time have set our sights on removing two-thirds of the farmers from the farms and placing them in the cities. Where are they to live? The only alternative offered is the Liberal alternative: Get off the farm and go on welfare.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member, before he took the floor heard the remarks of the Chair concerning the rule of relevancy. The Chair agreed that some leniency had been given to hon. members during the day, but I believe hon. members should at least make an effort once in a while to refer to the amendment before the House.

It is very difficult for the Chair, even when it wishes to be lenient, to permit hon. members to open the whole subject of agriculture or even the whole subject matter of the bill before us. The occupants of the chair during the day have tried on different occasions to obtain the co-operation of hon. members concerning the application of the rule of relevancy. The Chair cannot do more than remind hon. members a few times of this rule, which is a basic rule of debate.

Without the co-operation of hon. members, the Chair feels we may be, not destroying but minimizing the parliamentary system. I am not speaking at this moment only to the hon. member who has the floor; I am inviting other hon. members in their participation in the debate to try to adhere closely to the rules of debate. In respect of an amendment to a bill, the rules should be observed much more strictly than they have been.

Mr. Yewchuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I realize you have been extremely lenient with me as well as with previous speakers. I believe most of my remarks,, with imagination, could be linked to a consideration of the cost of production and net income about which I have been speaking. I am sure you will be pleased, Mr. Speaker, to hear that I have almost completed my remarks.

I indicated that the cost of production has become so high that many farmers are leaving the farm. I described the terrible social dislocation which has occurred as a result of that. In general, I am critical of this legislation because it would in no way solve this problem. Therefore we must look a little more closely at the kind of things which must be done in an effort to stabilize farm income at a reasonable level.

It is a sad commentary when we look around the world and see so many people hungry and starving, and then look at our own country and see that we who are so well equipped to produce food for the world are not doing so and are being asked to cut back. This government obviously does not have the kind of imagination that is necessary to reconcile these two factors. That is the simple point I want to make.

Mr. Skoberg: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes.

Mr. Skoberg: It may seem strange to some people that a medical doctor is so concerned about this bill. Would the hon. member indicate his real concern and the type of constituency he represents in which the concern is so evident?

Mr. Yewchuk: That is a very complex and intriguing question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that it is ten o'clock, perhaps I could answer it at a later time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on the usual question, I wonder whether I could ask a responsible person on the government side, if there is one, what is to be the business for tomorrow, Thursday and Friday. Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition desires to expedite the business of this House and it is essential to know what is to be done in the next few days.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, we intend to proceed tomorrow with the consideration of today's business, namely, Bill C-244. I expect we will make considerable progress with this matter on Wednesday and then deal with the tax reform measure on Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Baldwin: Do I understand that on Thursday and Friday we will definitely be on Bill C-259?

Mr. Basford: Assuming, of course, that we complete Bill C-244 tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

UNITED NATIONS—CANADIAN ACTION TO ACHIEVE REPRESENTATION FOR MAINLAND CHINA AND TAIWAN

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on September 22 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) if the Canadian delegation at the United Nations General Assembly would be making efforts there to bring about a situation whereby the people in Mainland China and Taiwan would be represented in that body by delegates of their de facto governments.

I must say, Sir, that the minister's reply was a good deal more smug than informative. He indicated that there was only one question immediately before the United Nations, and that is who speaks for China, who occupies the China seat; and with a casualness that was somewhat unbecoming he suggested that the question of the future of Taiwan is something for the future to decide.

It sounds so easy and so clever to suggest that there is nothing involved but who occupies the China seat. In fact, Sir, there is a good deal more involved. Involved is the whole concept of universality of membership in the United Nations, a concept in which I believe and in which I thought the present government believed. The support of the Albanian resolution at the General Assembly will mean clearly and definitely the expulsion of the government now in control of affairs in Taiwan. It will mean that over 14 million people will lose representation in what we like to think is a universal body, the United Nations.

I cannot believe that a move which will result in the expulsion of the representative of Taiwan is one which should be entered on so casually and easily by the government of our country. I have long believed that this country should recognize the de facto situation and extend diplomatic recognition to the People's Republic of China, and I am pleased that this has come about although I do not share the view of those who believe that a new era has been entered into by the mere fact of recognition. I am hopeful, however, that it will have a good and helpful effect.

I was especially delighted that the leader of my party made such a valuable and useful visit to Mainland China and made such a good impression there. Indeed, I am not reluctant to say that we should long ago have recognized the de facto situation and extended diplomatic recognition to the government of Peking. But the same pragmatic acceptance of a de facto situation in Mainland China should not be abandoned when we look at Taiwan. The government of Chiang Kai-shek—regardless of what we think of it, and this is not at issue here—undoubtedly is in control and is governing Taiwan just as the government of Mao Tse-tung is governing in Mainland China.

It is easy to use the numbers game and say that the great majority of Chinese citizens are under Mao and that there are only 14 million across the straits. But surely we are not in the game of counting heads, and I think that kind of attitude is unbecoming to a charter member of the United Nations. But if we do count heads, it can be pointed out that there are more people in Taiwan than in two-thirds of the member states of the United Nations today. In other words, Taiwan is not an inconsiderable part of the world community.

Last fall, when the minister announced recognition of Peking by this country, an announcement which was greeted warmly in nearly all quarters of the House, he declared:

> Our position . . . is that the Canadian government does not consider it appropriate to endorse or to challenge the Chinese government's position on the status of Taiwan.

In other words, the Canadian government took note of Peking's contention in this regard but did not endorse it. It seems to me that in supporting the Albanian resolution at the United Nations the government of Canada would in fact be endorsing the contention of Peking that it, and it alone, speaks for all of China including Taiwan, despite the fact that that island is clearly and obviously administered by a government not subject to Peking. At the very time that the admission of China to the U.N. is being developed, the support of the Albanian resolution would be yielding to the maximum demands of the People's Republic of China in regard to its claims to Taiwan.

Having read the minister's speech, I do not know whether or not Canada will be supporting the Albanian resolution. I do note that at the General Assembly the minister indicated that Canada endorsed the principle of universality and even looked forward to the time when the divided states could be represented at the United Nations. We all say amen to that. But if we move in the direction of admitting the divided states, it would seem inconsistent for us at the same time to adopt a policy which would prevent Taiwan from being represented in the world body.

One cannot but wonder what happened to the eloquently expressed views of the minister's predecessor, the Hon. Paul Martin, who used to win applause from government benches when he said that our policy is not one China or two Chinas but one-China and one-Taiwan. He said in 1967:

> We believe Formosa should continue to be a member of that organization and for that reason we will abstain on a resolution which seeks both to seat mainland China and to expel Formosa.

I have noted the present government's casual attitude toward the laws of the land and I am sure they would not at all be inhibited by their own promises; but our recollection is that in the campaign of 1968 it was the Martin one Taiwan, one China policy which was being put forward to the Canadian people as the government's point of view.

I hope, therefore, that it will not be Canada's role to assist in the expulsion of a member from the United Nations, that we will not deny the principle of universality to which we have long given allegiance and that we will not turn our back upon a reasonable, rational settlement of this long troublesome problem of representation in the U.N. for the people of Taiwan and for the people of China.

Mr. Hogarth: On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member knows that by practice it has been established that unless a member has a very very strong point of order, points of order are not recognized during the adjournment debate.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, I think that on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: There is no such thing as a point of order at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair cannot prevent a member from rising on a point of order if that point of order is valid, but I would ask the hon. member not to ask to be recognized at this time unless he has a point of order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Pierre).

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in response to the question from the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) who sits on the same side of the House as I do, I think it best to reiterate what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) told the House on September 22. This was also in reply to a question by the hon. member for Hillsborough. It is simply that Canada has a one China policy. We consider that the only issue immediately before the United Nations is one of representation, that is, what government should represent the approximately 800 million people living in China.

As hon. members know, although the regime in Taiwan has continued to occupy the Chinese seat in the General Assembly and on the Security Council, a growing number of countries, including Canada, have come to believe that a realistic appreciation of the situation requires that the People's Republic of China be recognized as the government of China and that its representatives should take their place in the Chinese seat at the United Nations.

The issue, therefore, is not one of membership but of who shall represent a country which is already a member, and Canadian policy in the United Nations is consistent with our recognition of the People's Republic of China as the sole legal government of China.

INCOME TAX—EFFECT OF AMENDMENTS ON CREDIT UNIONS

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, on September 9, 1971, I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in the House of Commons, whether he could allay the fears of Canadian credit unions who consider the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act as a threat to their existence. Unfortunately, the Minister of Finance did not have the opportunity to give me a definite reply. That is why I am raising the question this evening.

As an active member of the largest parish credit union in Ontario, the St. Stanislaus Parish Credit Union Limited, with a branch at St. Casimir's parish in the constituency of Parkdale, and as a former member of the board of directors in that credit union 25 years ago, I am familiar with the representations that have been made to the Minister of Finance by Canadian credit unions expressing their fear of the proposals in clauses 135, 136 and 137 of Bill C-259, an act to amend the Income Tax Act. The whole question of tax reform has been debated by the Canadian public since the publication of the white paper in 1969, and that is very good.

The result, Bill C-259, is now being studied by various people with deep knowledge of the taxation system and its implication for the whole of Canadian life, and they are offering detailed and responsible criticism. I am aware that urgent submissions have been made to the Minister of Finance by representatives of the credit unions from Ontario and other provinces, including the caisses populaires in the province of Quebec.

Throughout the history of Canadian tax legislation, credit unions have been treated differently, for tax purposes, from ordinary corporations because they are different in their structure and operation. Credit unions have played a great role in assisting people in lower and middle-income brackets, especially new Canadians in need of loans, to establish themselves in this country, because lending institutions of all descriptions were demanding high securities, high interest rates and other conditions and most of those conditions were, I think, burdensome for most of those people. Consequently, credit unions sprang up and flourished among these groups of people. Credit unions have assisted their members not only with low-cost loans but also with low life insurance premiums and other programs of mutual assistance.

The present income tax amendments affecting credit unions are, to say the least, ambiguous and need clarification. The principle of proper understanding of credit unions and fairness is necessary in devising tax laws with respect to credit unions. A close analysis of the proposed legislation in Bill C-259 reveals that the new taxation will be harmful to the legal characteristics of credit unions and caisses populaires and that these characteristics will place them at a disadvantage with other corporations.

Both the Porter Royal Commission on Banking and the Carter Royal Commission on Taxation recognize the essential "savings nature" of share deposits by a credit union member. Similar recognition should be given in clause 137 of the bill. But the area which causes credit union members the greatest concern is that relating to dividends to members on their share accounts. We have always looked upon these dividends as being an interest payment similar to that paid by chartered banks on their savings accounts. The major difference has been that banks set their rates in advance, whereas credit unions determine their rates on the basis of the profit for the year.

Chartered banks are able to deduct the interest paid on savings accounts from their income to determine their taxable income. The tax reform bill does not appear to provide for the deduction of the dividends paid by credit unions to members on their share accounts. Moreover, there is no provision in the tax reform bill concerning existing allowances for doubtful accounts or the so-called guaranteed fund. The other area which causes a problem concerns the starting point for depreciation of fixed assets.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Minister of Finance to take into consideration the brief presented to him by the National Association of Credit Unions on September 22, 1971, outlining their major objections as well as their proposals regarding income tax amendments so that taxation of credit unions will be fair and equitable. Only then will the government provide credit unions the opportunity to continue their worthwhile role of great service to people who have joined them in order to help themselves, and of providing a much needed service to their fellow Canadians which is not offered by other financial institutions.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize, also, that credit unions are a unique agency form of collective enterprise. They have an unusual personal, owner-customer relationship with their members, with any surplus earnings, apart from necessary provincial statutory reserves, being allocated to the members. This feature is certainly distinguishable from the operations of the banking system.

In conclusion, all of us in the House of Commons should take very seriously the representations which have been made to us and to the government by credit unions with respect to the effect of the proposed amendments in the income tax bill. I think it is imperative that the Minister of Finance announce without delay amendments favourable to credit unions. I am hopeful that our appeals to the minister will achieve a result which will enable credit unions to continue their great service to the people of Canada and to the economy of our country.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The matter raised by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) has been canvassed extensively by members who have to date taken part in the second reading debate on Bill C-259. From this side of the House, the hon. members for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair), Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), Gloucester (Mr. Breau) and Okanagan-Boundary (Mr. Howard), among others, all made a point of bringing the views of the credit union and caisses populaires movements to the government's attention in an effective way. I have the impression that it was referred to by some of the 36 opposition members who have so far taken part in the debate. Most of those who dealt with credit unions and caisses populaires also dealt with the related, although not identical, views of the co-operative movement.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and I met here on August 11 with a large delegation from the Co-operative Union of Canada and Le Conseil Canadien de la Co-operation, as well as several of their constituent organizations. On September 20, the Minister of Finance met representatives of Les Federations Des Caisses Populaires and the National Association of Canadian Credit Unions upon his return from the Group of Ten meeting in London. These associations have discussed their views at length with officials of the finance department.

I would like to reward the Canadian Press writer who has stayed here so long waiting for a big news story. However, I can only say at this time that they have done a very effective job of bringing their views to the government's attention and that these views are being seriously considered. What, if any, changes the government deems appropriate will be indicated when the pertinent clauses of Bill C-259 are reached by the committee of the whole.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—ALLEGED PRESSURE BY BANKS TO ACCEPT CREDIT CARDS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the sitting I asked a question to the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and I drew his attention on the fact that some finance companies and banks are exerting pressure on people to have them accept Chargex credit cards. Even if these people do not ask for these cards, they receive one or are urged by mail to accept one. And even if these financial institutions receive no answer, they send these cards to people thus inviting them to spend without measure. They enclose pamphlets detailing all possibilities for people to travel and for the housewife to buy all kinds of things; however they do not talk about the reimbursement of the money thus advanced. There is hardly a mention about an interest of 18 per cent that will be charged to the client's account.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is a rather high handed way of forcing people to accept such credit cards, inviting them to spend more, when we know to which extend such advertisings can be harassing to consumers. Through all kinds of ways, people are sometimes urged to spend much more than they can afford. The advertising is skillfully designed to create the illusion that all kinds of goods can be brought with no obligation to pay and in due course the bills are sent and you have to pay up.

Mr. Speaker, I object to such procedures and I call upon the hon. minister to enact a departmental order or bring forward legislation making it illegal for such companies, whether Simpsons-Sears, Eaton's or others, to force those credit cards on people.

[English]

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can offer complete assurance that no one can be forced to accept a credit card issued by a bank or any other institution. Anyone who is sent a credit card and did not ask for or does not want it is under no obligation to accept or use the card. His best course of action is to destroy any credit cards he does not want.

A number of provinces have specific legislation which relieves consumers of any liability arising from unsolicited credit cards unless they accept their terms and conditions. The government hopes that such legislation will be adopted by all the provinces. If there is any evidence whatsoever that individuals are being pressured to accept credit cards, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) would very much like to have that evidence.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 6, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely, of Philip Gerald Givens, Esquire, member for the electoral district of York West, by resignation.

Accordingly I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issuance of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. This matter concerns the administrative responsibility of the government to the Indians of northern Alberta. The Indian students have been withheld from school and parents have protested the school facilities provided for their children and have requested the minister responsible to meet with them to discuss improvement of the school facilities as well as living conditions.

Yesterday 200 Indians demonstrated outside the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Resources office at St. Paul. A further meeting has been called for Sunday. Government officials and the minister have been asked to attend. These grievances cannot be permitted to escalate. Therefore I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk):

That this House instruct the minister to meet with the Indians of northern Alberta and the bands affected immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL (WEST INDIES) STEAMSHIPS LTD.

Question No. 999—Mr. Fortin:

1. Did the United States order a suspension of payments on the balance due to the Canadian National West Indies Steamships Limited and, if so, is this order being maintained?

2. What is the position of the Canadian government concerning this matter?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Payment of the balance due to Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Ltd. cannot be made unless a licence is obtained under the Cuban Assets Control Regulations of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States has not authorized the issuance of such a licence.

2. The Canadian Government continues to attempt to collect the balance owing.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY STANDARDS

Question No. 1,624—Mr. Mather:

1. Is consideration being given to a federally sponsored program for calibrating equipment for the measurement of skid characteristics of highway pavement?

2. Is consideration being given to improving safety requirements for motor-vehicle carrier fuel systems?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No. A technical committee of the Roads and Transportation Association of Canada, which includes technical experts from each of the federal and provincial government departments having skid resistance measurement equipment, has made arrangements for cooperative tests in order to calibrate such devices so as to produce consistent and uniform measurement results.

2. Consideration is being given to extending the scope of the current Canadian Motor Vehicle Safety Standard 301 relating to fuel systems for passenger cars so as to include all trucks and buses as well as additional performance requirements.

HIGHWAY SAFETY—SEAT BELTS

Question No. 1,629—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to encouraging, by education or legislation, the wearing of seat belts by drivers or relief drivers of interprovincially operated commercial vehicles?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Motor Vehicle Safety Regulations mandating the installation of seat belts in all trucks and buses in 1972 will be proposed in the Canada Gazette, Part I, very soon. The Department of Transport is also conducting studies of seat belt usage in Canada in an effort to identify techniques, which might be employed to encourage all drivers to wear them. A Committee of Federal and Provincial Transport Department officials is now studying the need for national operating safety regulations for interprovincial commercial motor vehicle carriers.

HIGHWAY SAFETY—REAR VISION DEVICES

Is consideration being given to acquiring, installing and testing of periscopes on government owned vehicles to enable indirect visibility for motor vehicles and permit drivers to monitor the motoring environment to the rear of the vehicle?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The entire rear vision standard for motor vehicles is presently under review. Consideration is being given to requirements which could necessitate the use of devices similar to periscopes. For this reason, various proposed systems are being studied. Vehicles for experimental purposes are now being acquired by the Department of Transport and within the next few months various rear vision aids will be installed for evaluation.

AMHERST, N.S.—ENGINEERING SERVICES OFFICES

Question No. 1,638—Mr. Coates:

1. Has a final decision been reached by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion regarding the engineering services offices in Amherst, Nova Scotia and, if so, what was the decision?

2. Have any complaints been received by the Department with regard to any closure or reduction of services of this office and, if so, from whom were they received and in what form were the complaints submitted?

3. What was the total staff, permanent and temporary, of this office during the last fiscal year, and what was the total payroll for the fiscal year 1970-71?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. A decision has been taken that the engineering services office at Amherst, N.S., should be phased out as a purely federal operation as of March 31, 1972. However, discussions are continuing with the governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island regarding a possible role for the office after that date.

2. Yes; letters have been received from Robert C. Coates, M.P., D. A. Casey, R. S. Bacon, M.L.A. and Kenneth J. Streatch.

3. Strength, including continuing employees, casuals and others, was 66 at the beginning of the 1970-71 fiscal year and 59 at the close of the year, with a utilization of 70 man-years for the period. Total payroll for 1970-71 was $553,820 for all employees.

GEORGETOWN, P.E.I.—EXPANSION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND INDUSTRIAL CORPORATION PLANT

Question No. 1,690—Mr. McQuaid:

What are the details of the proposed expansion of the Prince Edward Island Industrial Corporation plant at Georgetown, Prince Edward Island, and how many new jobs will this create?

[Mr. Duquet.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As listed on page 25 of the Report on the Operation of the Regional Development Incentives Act for the period August 1 to August 31, 1971, which was tabled in the House of Commons on September 10, 1971: Location of Plant: Georgetown, P.E.I. Type of Industry: Ships and vessels. Type of project: Expansion. Expected Eligible Cost: $75,000. Expected Additional Employment: Nil. Rate of Offer: 15 per cent of the approved capital costs. Estimated Amount of Offer: $11,250.

NUMBER OF UNEMPLOYED REGISTERED AT CANADA MANPOWER CENTRES

Question No. 1,716—Mr. Badanai:

How many unemployed registered at Manpower Centres in the following categories (a) age fourteen to eighteen (b) age eighteen to twenty-one (c) married women whose husbands are employed (d) married women over sixty years of age?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): (a) and (b) The ages of registered clients without employment at Canada Manpower Centres are reported quarterly, by selected age groups. For the whole of Canada, the total number of registered clients at Canada Manpower Centres, who were without employment and were under 20 years of age, at the end of June 1971, was 249,758. Data are not available separately for the age groups 14 to 18 and 18 to 21. It should be noted that the data on registered clients without employment represent a count of the live files which is taken on the last working day of each month. The figures are very different in concept from the official unemployment estimates which are produced by Statistics Canada. (c) Not available. (d) Not available.

MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION—OPERATIONAL DATA ON JOB ORDERS

Question No. 1,718—Mr. Blackburn:

Has the Department of Manpower and Immigration been collecting operational data on job orders and, if so (a) since what date (b) how often have these data been collected (c) what were the amounts of job orders in Canada and in the five regions for each of the available periods to date, in terms of totals and broad occupational classifications?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): (a) Data on Employers' Orders have been collected by the Department of Manpower and Immigration since its inception. (b) The statistics are reported monthly. (c) Employers' Orders (including orders for casual workers) for the periods April to July 1970 and April to July 1971, and the fiscal years 1966-67 to 1970-71 are as follows:

REGISTRATIONS AT CANADA MANPOWER CENTRES

Question No. 1,721—Mr. Marshall:

How many clients were registered at the following Manpower centres at the end of August 1971, male and female (a) Corner Brook, Newfoundland (b) St. John's, Newfoundland (c) Halifax, Nova Scotia (d) Moncton, New Brunswick?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The number of clients registered at the Corner Brook, Nfld., St. John's Nfld., Halifax, N.S., and Moncton, N.B., Canada Manpower Centres at the end of August 1971 are shown in the following table:

DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION—RETIREMENT AGE OF PRESIDENT

Question No. 1,765—Mr. Orlikow:

Has the Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission passed the normal age of retirement in the government service and (a) if so (i) when was he given an extension (ii) for what reasons (iii) for what term (b) if not (i) when is he due to retire (ii) has a decision been made as to his replacement?

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): There is no such position as Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission. The President of the Canadian Transport Commission was appointed under sections 6 and 7 of the National Transportation Act which states, inter alia, that a Commissioner's term of appointment shall not exceed a period of ten years and he may continue to hold office upon attaining the age of 65 years but he ceases to hold office upon reaching the age of 70 years. The incumbent president was appointed effective September 19, 1967. His term will end on June 23, 1975, when he reaches age 70.

[Later:]

Mr. McCleave: I wish to raise a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I should have raised it immediately after the parliamentary secretary sat down, but I thought my hon. friend from Athabasca might have had a similar intention in mind.

My question of privilege arises out of starred question 1793 which I placed on the order paper on September 29. It is an honest probe for information, asking what public acts of Canada are not included in the revised statutes of this country. The Minister of Justice referred previously to about 150 acts. The purpose of my question was to ascertain whether there were in fact 150 public acts or whether acts such as the Canadian Pacific Railway Act and similar measures were being smuggled into his figure. In the past the starred question has been a method by which Members of Parliament could achieve within a reasonably short period of time answers to inquiries on matters of burning public moment. I suggest that my question falls exactly into that category and I think it is an act of incomparable rudeness that I am not answered today.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ADEQUATE FACILITIES FOR SCHOOL CHILDREN IN NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 26 to ask leave to propose a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the necessity to meet an emergency in relation to the non-attendance at school of a large number of Indian children, and the necessity for the government to take immediate action to provide adequate facilities to meet the requirements of Indian children in northern Alberta.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca has given the Chair due notice of his intention to request leave to move the adjournment of the House to debate the matter just stated by him.

All members will agree, I am sure, that the matter raised by the hon. member is of great importance and one of widespread concern, but I wonder whether it meets the requirements of the rule which provides for immediate debate by the House. I suggest to him that there are other means by which he might, in a preliminary way, raise this problem. It may be that the matter may develop to the point where the business of the House must be set aside in order to deal with the question he has posed, but it seems to the Chair that it would be premature to put the motion to the House at this time.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I ask that all notices of motions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NEW BUDGET AND TAX REDUCTIONS TO STIMULATE EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the daily reports of lay-offs in our industries, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the measures he proposes to take with regard to stimulating employment, and which he indicated yesterday would be taken as soon as possible, will be in the form of a new budget?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the Prime Minister's answer rule out any prospect of the economy being stimulated by some reduction in taxation other than the removal of the 3 per cent surtax in the June budget and the shifting of tax burdens contemplated by the tax reform bill before the House?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think it is possible for me to say, without making an announcement, what I am eliminating and what the government will retain among the various suggestions made by members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Stanfield: It is encouraging that possibly the Prime Minister is considering some such reduction. I should like to ask him whether, when this new package or program is presented to the House, it will be accompanied by a statement with regard to trends in the economy, projected rates of growth and projected rates of unemployment, because clearly those which were contained in the budget speech forecasts of the Minister of Finance last June are no longer applicable.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not agree with the premises of the question. As to the form of the statement, the Leader of the Opposition will have to be patient and see how it is made.

Mr. Stanfield: Not for too long, I hope.

REQUEST FOR FUNDING OF EMPLOYMENT-CREATING MUNICIPAL PROGRAMS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister giving consideration to the request of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities that the federal government announce its intention very soon to contribute to the funding of employment-creating programs advanced by the municipalities through grants and loans to those municipalities that are prepared to accelerate any plans they have in this regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have considered a great number of useful suggestions, as I have just told the Leader of the Opposition. As to which of them have been retained, I am afraid the hon. member will have to wait until we make the announcement.

UNITED STATES PRECONDITIONS FOR REMOVAL OF IMPORT SURTAX

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in view of the tremendous effect that the United States 10 per cent surtax has on all facets of the Canadian economy, would the Prime Minister advise the House when the government intends to find out from the United States government what conditions must prevail before that government would be willing to remove the 10 per cent surtax on imports from Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we can only find out when the United States itself decides that there is going to be a series of conditions put to us to do certain things. I have assured the House that there has been no such statement of position by the United States. As far as Canada is concerned, the House will appreciate that we have been approaching this problem as much as possible on a multilateral basis because we feel that trading patterns throughout the whole world are important to Canada.

Mr. Hees: Since Secretary of the Treasury Connally has clearly indicated that certain conditions must be met, when does the Prime Minister intend to get up sufficient courage to go to the United States—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: —and ask the specific question as to what we must do in order that the surcharge may be removed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

GRAIN

STABILIZATION BILL—REQUEST BY SASKATCHEWAN WHEAT POOL AND NATIONAL FARMERS UNION FOR EARLY MEETING

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, might I ask a question of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. In view of the communication from the president of the National Farmers Union to the minister urging either the minister or the Prime Minister to meet members of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the National Farmers Union at an early date, would the minister tell the House what the nature of his reply was?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the president of the National Farmers Union did talk to me yesterday about a meeting on Thursday or Friday but I have rather significant commitments on both those days. I did offer Sunday and Monday to him but he said that that was the weekend and not very convenient for them.

Mr. Gleave: In view of the request that has been made for the minister to meet a large number of grain growers in the west under the invitation of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and the National Farmers Union, is the minister preparing to arrange some such meeting with the farm organizations to discuss Bill C-244?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the leaders of other farm organizations about an early meeting to deal with a number of questions not necessarily related to Bill C-244. I stand ready and willing to meet farmers and farm organizations at any time.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Given the importance of this question at the present time, and in view of the very strong position taken by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and National Farmers Union in statements made by them on September 30 and October 4, would the Prime Minister himself be prepared to meet with these organizations in order to bring about some satisfactory conclusion to this very important question?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I might be prepared to consider that suggestion, but am I to understand that the New Democratic Party is prepared to have us hold up the payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act a little while longer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that to the extent we are able we should not inject into the question period the debate which has been raising in the House for some days and will continue later today. Perhaps we might reserve a half hour of the time of the House for matters other than that particular bill. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina East for one supplementary and then recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

STABILIZATION BILL—DELAY OF CONSIDERATION FOR FURTHER DISCUSSIONS WITH PRAIRIE FARM ORGANIZATIONS AND GOVERNMENTS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the expressions of dissatisfaction with Bill C-244 by various farm organizations and the prairie governments, and in view of the very specific alternatives for a better sort of plan put forward by those organizations and governments, is the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board now willing to delay further consideration of Bill C-244 until additional discussions can be held with these prairie farm organizations and governments?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will continue to urge the House to come to a vote on Bill C-244 and pass it. I should like the hon. member to know that my mail from farmers is running about five to one in favour of passing Bill C-244.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: I didn't know he had five friends.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member for Regina East is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister should know that the only correspondence I have which is running five to one in favour of the plan is from his constituency executive.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

IMPENDING ABOLITION OF UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, if that wheat can be sold, the problem will be solved.

I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Just a few days ago, the Minister of Public Works stated that he was sure that the U.S. 10 per cent surtax would be removed long before the Christmas season. Is the Prime Minister aware of the indications on which the minister based that statement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the only indication I could mention would be the minister's natural optimism. I do not know of any others.

POSSIBLE EFFECT OF PROPOSED UNITED STATES JOB DEVELOPMENT TAX CREDIT—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Will he inform the House whether, during multilateral or direct talks with the United States involving the DISC program and the surcharge, any attempt is being made to persuade the United States not to enact the job development tax credit—JDTC—which is to be retroactive to August 18 and represents a hidden surcharge that might be more disastrous in the way of unemployment than even the surcharge itself?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the Prime Minister indicated his government is now relying principally on multilateral efforts in connection with the United States 10 per cent surtax on imports. Does this mean the Prime Minister has pretty well abandoned any expectation of an exemption for Canada from this surtax by the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, that has not been our approach, nor is it at this time. The approach was that Canada was not asking for any special favours. Canada's position is that the United States approach to the multilateral situation had to be applied in the case of particular countries to decide whether the approach was valid. We said that in the case of Canada we had already met in advance those conditions the United States was trying to extract from the rest of the world for the eventual lifting of the surtax.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that was serious.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—PUBLICATION OF REPORT TO CABINET—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON BROAD ECONOMIC GOALS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question—I think it is but we will see—for the Prime Minister. The government has not said whether the Gray report will be released in a watered down form, presumably so as not to discourage foreign investment. Will the right hon. gentleman tell us whether that study, which I understand took some 20 months, will be published in an unedited form, or can we expect it to be published in the form in which it was presented to the cabinet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member should refer to something he says I said which is contrary to what I have always said, namely, that the report would not be published in one form or another. This is a report to cabinet and it is in the form of a cabinet document now. There is no intention on the part of the government to publish it at any time.

Mr. Fairweather: Now that we have cleared that up, since the Gray Report has in effect been scuttled and having in mind also the damage of the surcharge and the fears about the DISC program alluded to a minute ago, as a minimum response will the government make a statement on broad economic goals for the country and, if so, can we expect a public statement soon?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the member has got all the premises of his question wrong. He has not cleared up anything, in the sense that there was never any statement by anybody on this side that we would publish the so-called Gray Report. Therefore the government's position on that matter has not been changed. In so far as action is concerned we have always said we would make a policy statement on the basis of the studies made by the minister. This is still our intention. As to the timing, I told the House a few days ago it would be as soon as possible.

CAPITAL SPENDING BY U.S. SUBSIDIARIES ON MANUFACTURING AND EXTRACTION INDUSTRIES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary of the Prime Minister arising out of the semi-annual report of the United States Department of Commerce which indicates that United States subsidiaries in Canada are planning to increase their capital spending in this country in 1971 and 1972 by some 13 per cent and 11 per cent respectively but that this capital spending is to be less in the manufacturing field—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would suggest to the hon. member that he should try to ask the question as briefly as possible. The question period is only 40 minutes and many members are seeking to ask questions. Questions should be asked briefly and at the same time answers should also be as brief as possible.

Mr. Douglas: I point out that the estimate is that their capital spending for manufacturing in Canada will be substantially reduced and capital spending for extraction industries will be increased correspondingly. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether this is consistent with the Canadian government's policy having in mind the Prime Minister's reference to the fact that he does not want Canada to become merely a supplier of raw materials?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I would have to study the statistics put forward by the hon. member to see what implications to draw from them.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Perth.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Perth might allow the hon. member a supplementary, which I hope will be brief.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask if the group that was assembled by the Minister of National Revenue to prepare the report on foreign ownership which has now been submitted to cabinet is still in existence and, if so, what role it is now fulfilling?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the so-called group was essentially composed of people on the minister's staff and I believe some outside people. I see the minister is indicating that the group is still in existence.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CLOSING OF WERLICH INDUSTRIES PLANT, STRATFORD—ASSISTANCE TO THOSE LAID OFF

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the minister in charge of manpower. I refer to the recent closing of the Werlich Industries Limited plant at Stratford causing the lay-off of some 150 employees. Has the minister looked into this matter and, can he say what might be done for these people who have been laid off?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the name of the company.

An hon. Member: They make toboggans.

Mr. Monteith: It is Werlich Industries Limited.

Mr. Lang: I am not sure I have a report at hand in respect of that particular company. I shall be glad to check and report to the hon. member.

DOMTAR STRIKE—ADEQUATE REMUNERATION OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Labour.

Since approximately 200 workers in the manufacturing of insulating board in Donnacona are presently on strike to claim equal working conditions and wages with their colleagues of the same community who are working in the newsprint area, and that the chairman of Domtar, Mr. T. M. Beaupré, has recommended salary increases for many categories of Canadians working for the federal government, can the hon. minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should make his question as short as possible. I do not think that it is in order to have a question preceded by a series of preambles. The hon. member should put his question as quickly as possible.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Godin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister say whether he intends to suggest to Mr. Beaupré to apply his own recommendations to his employees now on strike?

SHIPPING

VANCOUVER HARBOUR—ACTION TO EXPEDITE MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN CARGOES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Two weeks ago I asked the minister a question concerning the congested traffic situation in the Vancouver harbour and the difficulties being faced by Canadian importers. He gave me privately an interim report. I am wondering now whether he is in a position to give us a more factual estimate of what is happening in light of the continuing complaints, particularly as to the involved management and the difficulties for Canadians in getting their goods?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I will answer as briefly as possible, Mr. Speaker. Last Friday I met with representatives of the Canadian Importers Association. There were people from Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto in the group of about ten. We went over various alternatives. I told them I knew of no way under the law, or indeed any other way, by which a full embargo on the port of Vancouver would be possible. I do not believe that can be done. I did, however, undertake to make a public appeal which I then did to the wharf operators and others in Vancouver to give preference to Canadian cargoes. I followed this up by asking the acting chairman of the National Harbours Board to go to Vancouver where he is today convening a face to face meeting between the wharf operators and the importers.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Has the minister taken into account the pressing demand for increased facilities in the harbour and the criticisms and difficulties with regard to the port management structure which has been put on a new basis much against the wish of the people concerned?

Mr. Jamieson: I do not believe that that is a related question. However, we have taken into account all of the matters to which the hon. member has referred and I think he will discover that the majority of those in the port of Vancouver agreed with the actions that have been taken in this particular case.

HEALTH

CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION REQUEST FOR EXPANSION OF FACILITIES TO TRAIN DOCTORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In view of the Canadian Medical Association's urgent request for expanded medical training in Canada to combat the shortage of doctors and in view of CMA's call for fewer foreign and more Canadian doctors, is the minister prepared to act on this recommendation and hold meetings with the medical profession and the provinces with a view to providing more funds for medical schools for Canadian students?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have already had several meetings with the principal organization, the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges. I was with them the last two days. I have also discussed this situation with representatives of the CMA. It is not entirely clear that the solution the hon. member is suggesting is the right one.

Mr. Rynard: Can the minister then state to the House whether he believes that there is a shortage of medical doctors in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Rynard: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

USE OF GOVERNMENT SURPLUS IN FIRST FIVE MONTHS OF FISCAL YEAR TO STIMULATE ECONOMY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that a few days ago the minister revealed that the government is in a surplus position with respect to the first five months of the current fiscal year, can the minister say when the government intends to use that surplus to stimulate the economy as he and other ministers have promised the government would do?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Monthly figures which are published on a cash basis are very misleading because expenditures which are committed early in the year pile up toward the end of the year, and I can well foresee that the deficit I forecast will be there.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thank the minister for his honesty about his misleading figures.

POST OFFICE

ROLE OF INCREASED RATES AND ALLEGED REDUCTION IN SERVICE IN CONTRIBUTING TO ECONOMIC SLOWDOWN

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Postmaster General. In view of the protest by the Letter Carriers Union of Canada that the reduction in postal service along with the increased rates in recent years is contributing to the current drastic slowdown in the Canadian economy, will the minister review and reverse the policy, as he did with the closure of rural post offices?

[Mr. Rynard.]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): I do not agree with the premise of the question because there was no reduction in the services.

Mr. Dinsdale: Inasmuch as the postal service is vital to the Canadian business economy and also because of the decline in postal business as represented by figures from the minister's own department, will he not take emergency action to reverse this trend?

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE AUTHORIZATION OF CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES TO EXTEND TRANS-CANADA FLIGHTS TO HALIFAX

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of recent news reports that a formal application has been made by CP Air either to the minister or his department for authority to continue trans-Canada flights to Halifax, can the minister tell us whether there is any possibility of CP Air being given authority to serve this area in the near future?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. Such an answer would have to come from the Canadian Transport Commission.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REPRESENTATION FOR MUNICIPALITIES AT FORTHCOMING MEETING

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

As the delegates to the convention of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities showed a marked interest in additional credits being earmarked for municipal projects, would he tell us whether he is willing to allow the matter to be discussed at the coming federal-provincial conference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am convinced the hon. member knows what the difficulties are. We, of the federal government, are always willing to discuss these things with the municipalities, but the provincial governments, and in particular that of Quebec, are often opposed to it. I must add that last year, in Winnipeg, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs did get the representatives of the provincial governments, including that of the Quebec minister of municipal affairs, to agree to tripartite conferences which we hope will lead to happy results.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED PARTIALITY ON NEWS BROADCASTS AND PUBLIC AFFAIRS PROGRAMS CONCERNING ONTARIO ELECTION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Will the minister get in touch with the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and insist that strict impartiality be exercised in the news broadcasts and public affairs programs concerning coverage of the current Ontario provincial election? I refer specifically to news broadcasts in the last several days in which an obvious attempt was being made to promote favourably the leader of the Ontario Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He needs help.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INTRODUCTION OF NEW LEGISLATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. In light of recent statements by the Minister of Justice of Quebec and yesterday by the Minister of National Defence to the effect that the War Measures Act was too blunt an instrument and too dangerous a tool to put in the hands of police officers, is the government considering now bringing in a new law or new measures with reference to the security problem?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): There is an order before the House that has not been fully debated. There have been two days of debate on a resolution to put this matter before a committee of the House of Commons, and that still stands.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister now consider, in light of the facts now coming from the Minister of Justice of Quebec and the Minister of National Defence, approving an amendment to that motion whereby a full investigation of the facts could be placed before Parliament and the people of Canada so that we can be apprised of what kind of law should be implemented when it is implemented?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I already answered that argument in the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: I can understand the Minister of Justice answering in that way. He is the lawbreaker of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

COMMUNICATIONS

APPLICATION BY BELL CANADA FOR RATE INCREASE—SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT ACTION TO NULLIFY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Transport who has not yet broken the law. I should like to know whether the minister is aware of an application or a notice of application by Bell Canada for a substantial increase in rates by that very wealthy company and whether the minister is giving the matter any consideration?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I believe this question might more properly be directed to my colleague, the Minister of Communications because, although the Canadian Transport Commission deals with such applications, where they relate to communications they also relate to that particular department.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Communications take the ball that the Minister of Transport has just thrown to him?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to throw the ball to the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission which has jurisdiction in this field. The minister does not have that jurisdiction, but I will be glad to make inquiries of the chairman of the commission.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short supplementary question. I would like to ask the Minister of Communications whether he is aware of this application, or of the intention to apply, and whether he will recommend to cabinet that this time the government should enter the picture to see to it that additional increases in rates for Bell Canada, which seem to me to be unconscionable, will not be allowed by the commission?

Mr. Stanbury: The law provides that the jurisdiction in this respect rests with the Canadian Transport Commission, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH

PROGRESS IN INCLUDING DENTAL CARE IN MEDICAL INSURANCE PLANS

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the widespread concern throughout the country that dental care should be more equally available to all Canadians, could the minister report on what progress is being made to include dental care in medical insurance schemes?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there have been considerable discussions with the provinces, at the official level, and to a degree also at the ministerial level, on new cost-sharing arrangements under both medicare and the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. During those discussions the question of increased coverage for services other than those now covered has come up and the provinces are considering it. I expect that the provinces will make further representations concerning this matter over the course of the next few months.

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, could the minister indicate by what date he anticipates that some provinces might be willing to enter into such a scheme?

Mr. Munro: I cannot clearly indicate that, Mr. Speaker. I do not think there are many provinces which have yet decided that this is their next priority area. Some feel drugs are more important, and so on.

HARBOURS

DESIGNATION OF OFFSHORE OIL RIGS AS CANADIAN PORTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the Canada Shipping Act requires that only Canadian ships be used between Canadian ports, is the minister contemplating the designation of offshore oil rigs as Canadian ports, as I believe was recommended in chapter 15 of the Darling report?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting proposition but, as the hon. member knows, the whole of the report is now being examined and I would not want at this time to indicate what our intentions are with respect to one specific part of it except to say that we hope to make our intentions known in the near future.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the Minister of Fisheries in charge of the environment. Can the minister indicate whether the government has a contingency anti-pollution plan for the offshore oil effort at the present moment and whether he would be prepared to table such plan in the House of Commons?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): The answer is yes in both cases, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LIVING CONDITIONS ON RESERVES IN NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It arises out of the statement made by his special assistant, Mr. Moses, to the effect that Ottawa has been fed inaccurate information by Indian Affairs departmental officials with respect to living conditions on the reserves in northeastern Alberta. Is there any corrective action being taken in order that the minister may be adequately and accurately informed of the conditions as they are on the reserves, particularly since he refuses to visit them?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have undertaken forthwith to correct certain problems which called for an urgent solution. I must say that the prevailing situation there is somewhat difficult. It must be pointed out to the House that between 1968 and 1970 we have more than doubled the budget in that respect, and we intend to devote ourselves particularly to improve that situation.

The hon. member would be well advised to urge parents not to use Indian children for blackmailing purposes.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This seems to me to be debate.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister saying that he was unaware of the conditions in northeastern Alberta, particularly the living conditions, until his special assistant had visited the area and reported to him?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: No, Mr. Speaker. I knew that conditions were difficult and that is why, in the last two years the government has more than doubled the funds available to this area. It is obvious that more money would be needed, but we cannot achieve everything in one year and we hope to improve the situation in the next few years. The people of this area can be assured of my co-operation.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow one supplementary on this subject, but if hon. members look around the House they will see there are still quite a few members seeking the opportunity to ask questions, and of course many of them will not have that opportunity this afternoon.

WITHDRAWAL OF CHILDREN FROM SCHOOL AS PROTEST AGAINST LIVING CONDITIONS—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH UNION OF ONTARIO INDIANS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the statement by Fred Plain, president of the Union of Ontario Indians, that a campaign is under way to keep Indian children out of school as a protest against living conditions and in the hope that this will force the government to take cognizance of them and take some corrective action, has the minister any plans to meet with the Union of Ontario Indians, or the chiefs, to work out a plan to assist in the areas involved?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will be delighted to meet with them if they want to come and meet with me here. I met the president of the National Indian Brotherhood on this problem a week ago. We are doing our best to ameliorate the conditions, but to use the kids as blackmail I think is absolutely unacceptable.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena on a point of order.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The point of order is a simple one, Mr. Speaker. I hope the minister was not indicating that I was using children as blackmail in this effort—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have indicated to hon. members that I hope we may be able to move along. We have had a number of supplementaries on this subject.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): —but if blackmail is what is needed, then they better use it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Brant.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): What I would like to ask the minister—

Mr. Blackburn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Brant. Unless the hon. member for Skeena is rising on a point of order or question of privilege, I have to give the floor to the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Yes. The point of order is that the minister said he would be glad to meet with them at any time; yet I understand he has declined to attend a meeting with them in Cornwall on October 9 and 10, without any valid reason.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The minister rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Chrétien: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have accepted an invitation to be in Manitoba tomorrow to meet with the Indians of Manitoba and on the weekend, which is supposed to be free, I will visit ten different communities in the Northwest Territories because I want to be aware of the problems, but I cannot be everywhere all the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STUDY OF HILL REPORT ON FUTURE OF MOHAWK INSTITUTE—POLICY STATEMENT

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Could the minister inform the House if his department has studied the Hill report on the future of the Mohawk Institute in Brantford, Ontario, and, if so, when can we expect a policy statement on the future of that institution?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I take the question as notice and I shall be glad to give the answer to the hon. member soon.

COST OF CONFERENCES OF OFFICIALS HELD IN LAURENTIANS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Communications. In view of the controversy over the high cost of the last conference held in the Laurentians by officials of Information Canada, why did the minister authorize another such conference and what was the cost of this meeting to the Canadian taxpayers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that question should be placed on the order paper or raised at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know why this conference was not held in Ottawa in order to save this cost to the taxpayers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there is urgency about the question it can be raised at the time of adjournment.

TAXATION

POSSIBLE TAXATION OF CAPITAL GAINS TAX BY QUEBEC—DISCUSSION TO AVOID DOUBLE TAXATION

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance regarding a statement made on television last night by the finance minister of the Quebec Liberal government that his government was planning to tax capital gains. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he intends to talk to his Quebec counterpart in order to avoid double taxation in that field?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have had several discussions over the past several years about the tax measures which are presently before the House. I presume that what the Minister of Finance of Quebec was indicating was that they would enact a provincial law similar to the federal law to make sure that the two coincide, as they now do.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

If the provincial government intends to levy this type of tax, I wish the minister would tell us in the House that the federal government will not impose a double taxation.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member's question is hypothetical.

POLLUTION

MEETING OF TARGET DATES FOR RESTRICTION AND ELIMINATION OF PHOSPHATES IN DETERGENTS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Because of the confusion being caused in Canada by the publication of United States conclusions that anti-phosphate laws and policies concerning detergents should be reconsidered, can the minister say whether Canadian target dates for the restriction and elimination of phosphates in detergents will be met?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is no confusion here. Our dates still hold. Those targets will be met.

Mrs. MacInnis: Can the minister say whether research will be stepped up to determine the value or harm of phosphate substitutes now being used in detergents?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, a research program along those lines has been going on for some months and will be continued, especially in respect of NTA as a substitute for phosphates.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POLYMER—ACTION TO PREVENT EMPLOYEE LAY-OFFS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister concerning lay-offs which now seem to be affecting Crown corporations. Is the government going to take any action to avert a further lay-off of some 250 employees of the government's own Crown corporation, Polymer Limited?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter was brought to my attention by the hon. member for Sarnia. I told him I would look into it and discuss with the Minister of Supply and Services what might be done.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services and the Minister of Finance are becoming extremely concerned about the possible effects of the DISC program, is the Prime Minister to make a statement about the effects of this program and what action the government intends to take in order to relieve the situation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the DISC program not having passed through Congress yet, the question becomes hypothetical. I can merely say that the government is looking at it and watching its progress with great interest.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that recommendation has not been made to me at this point.

STORAGE OF INFORMATION ON CANADIAN RESOURCES, INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE IN UNITED STATES DATA BANKS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. In view of the concern expressed in the telecommunications report and the Science Council report that vital information on Canadian resources, industry and commerce is being stored nearly exclusively in data banks in the United States, can the minister say whether the government is planning any steps to transfer the storage of this information to Canada?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that there is a task force on computer communications now at work. I am looking forward to getting recommendations from the task force within the next few months.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister be consulting with Mr. Robert Nixon on possible dates for federal-provincial conferences to be held after October 21—

STATISTICS CANADA

REPORTED UNREST AMONG EMPLOYEES RESPECTING PHOTOGRAPHING AND FINGERPRINTING

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and his parliamentary secretary, may I ask the Prime Minister if he will ask the minister to investigate a statement that there is discontent and unrest among the 4,000 employees of Statistics Canada because they have been asked to be photographed and fingerprinted for security purposes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will refer the question to the minister.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the policy of the government to see that people employed in the Public Service, Crown corporations, or wherever else they may be employed are fingerprinted and photographed for security reasons?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any general policy along those lines but it is entirely conceivable that in certain departments and under certain circumstances that policy is being tried. I will inquire.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Government House
Ottawa

October 6, 1971

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 6th day of October, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau
Brigadier General

Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 5, consideration of Bill C-244, respecting the stabilization of prairie grain sale proceeds and to repeal or amend certain related statutes, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture and motions Nos. 1 and 2 of Mr. Gleave (page 7252).

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few comments to add to the remarks which I began last night. The debate on this bill ended last night with a question by a colleague to my left. In order that the House may understand the relevance of my remarks, I should like to read the question the hon. member asked. The question was by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) and is reported at page 8470:

> It may seem strange to some people that a medical doctor is so concerned about this bill. Would the hon. member indicate his real concern and the type of constituency he represents in which the concern is so evident?

I am glad the hon. member indicated that the concern of our constituents is so evident. I simply say that it does not matter to a constituent what profession the man who represents him pursues. In my case, I represent mainly farmers. It does not take a member of my profession long to realize that the agricultural industry is in an extremely difficult position. My concern in this case is the same as it would be if I were looking after a patient, except in this case the patient is the agricultural industry itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: In addition, I am concerned about my constituents, mostly farmers, who are being forced off the land through the policies of an insensitive government. It has been devising policies which have meant an ever decreasing net income for farmers. The result has been that, in the area in which I live, during the past five or six years half the farmers have abandoned their land, have moved and are still continuing to move to the towns.

Actually, about 10 per cent per year leave, so that in ten years nobody may be left on the land. What will happen to the communities and towns which depend on farmers for their survival? As things now are, you can drive anywhere through the Prairies and you will find every 15 or 20 miles towns which at one time were fairly prosperous but which are now ghost towns. I do not want to see the rest of the communities in my constituency turn into ghost towns. I do not want to see what was once a prosperous farming constituency turn into an area of barren land.

In order to cut the cost of production and help resolve the ever increasing problem of reducing farm income, we must have legislation which is more substantial than this grain stabilization bill. We need legislation which will have the effect of lowering the cost of producing and decreasing the cost of farm machinery and other machinery that is used. At the same time, we must have legislation which guarantees some stability to the price paid to farmers and guarantees a reasonable return to the farmer for his efforts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate because of what I consider to be the impression created by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, who is piloting this bill through the House. The minister has tried to create the impression that at the meeting last Friday with the prairie ministers of agriculture he agreed he was willing to reconsider the basic principles of this legislation, but he wanted a week to think about it; that he would recommend that the House not be asked to proceed with discussion of the bill during this week and in return the three prairie ministers of agriculture would discuss with Members of Parliament, members of the opposition in particular, the proposal that they not ask questions or make statements which would exacerbate the heated debate now taking place.

The ministers of agriculture of the three prairie provinces assumed they had an agreement with the minister because the minister had agreed, not that he would recommend changes in the bill, but would give consideration to changes. The three prairie ministers of agriculture asked their Members of Parliament, particularly those from western Canada who are in the opposition, not to cool the debate, but to cool the heat for the next week or so. Lo and behold, the minister found it necessary or expedient to break that agreement. He appeared in a television interview over the weekend. On Sunday evening the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appeared on television on the program "The Nation's Business". He again defended this bill and attacked the opposition.

On Monday and Tuesday of this week, members of the opposition asked the minister for an explanation as to why he went back on his agreement. We were told in a round about way that there was no agreement. I have known and worked closely with the Manitoba minister of agriculture for 10 years. If there is one quality he has, it is honesty. I do not believe—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will not mind if I bring to his attention, as I have tried on other occasions since the debate on this amendment began, that the remarks of members should refer to some extent at least to the amendment. Hon. members will appreciate if we have general speeches, general contributions which do not relate to the motion, let alone the amendment, but relating generally to the bill before the House, it will be difficult to have any logical and Parliamentary debate in this institution. If there is a vote on the amendment, I can foresee another long series of speeches which will, in essence, be the same speeches we are now hearing because members will not be called upon to relate their speeches to what is before the House.

I think hon. members, who have the right to speak as often as they wish in reference to a specific question, should try to relate their contributions to what is before the House. When this amendment is disposed of, we will go back to the motion and eventually to other motions. Hon. members should show good will by keeping this debate within the rules of the House. It is really the only way we can operate. I do not see how we can function properly if no effort is made by hon. members to confine their speeches to matters before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: I have listened to Your Honour's suggestions carefully. The bulk of my remarks today will consist of putting on the record the proposals which the government of Manitoba and the minister of agriculture of Manitoba made in reference to this whole question. I suggest that the amendment which we are now discussing clearly spells out the kind of thinking which the government of Manitoba and the minister of that province proposed in their statements with regard to this bill.

Before going into the details, I want to record my disappointment, and that is putting it mildly, with the minister in charge of this legislation. In my opinion, he has broken an agreement which he made only a few days ago with the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba and the other prairie Ministers of Agriculture. We cannot have a logical discussion on this other amendment or on the whole question if we are not going to have some honesty.

Ever since this debate began, we have been told that the opposition to proposals in the bill is purely political and partisan. We have been told that the farmers want, need and will benefit by this legislation. I have never seen a proposal on any subject and by any government which has met with such unanimous opposition from the organizations representing the people who will be affected by the bill. The three prairie provinces, the wheat pools of the three prairie provinces, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the National Farmers Union oppose this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. I have to interrupt him. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Gibson: With the greatest of respect, Mr. Speaker, following on Your Honour's ruling, the hon. member who has the floor has simply continued with a long and rather dull prolix, irrelevant debate. I submit he is out of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Orlikow: When it comes to dull remarks, there is nobody who has a better and more consistent record than the hon. member who just interrupted with a point which is not in order or anything else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: The farm organizations which I have listed oppose this bill because one of the basic principles of it is that in calculating the payments which will be made to farmers, the amounts paid will be based on calculations related to the gross income of farmers. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) is not listening. If he were listening, he could not understand anyway. I will therefore ignore him. I challenge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to name a single legitimate farm organization which supports this measure, not the kind of Liberal party subsidized, fake organization which put those full-page advertisements in the western papers.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Barrett: We have heard all that before 20 times.

Mr. Orlikow: I invite the yappers on the back benches over there to get up when I have finished and make a speech. They are good at interrupting me. I do not mind. I am quite willing that they should interrupt. But I would be happy to see them get up and make a speech. In all the years I have been here I do not recall that the hon. member has ever made a speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps we might now return to consideration of the amendment.

An hon. Member: It would be for the first time.

Mr. Orlikow: If we could put an end to the kind of interventions we have been getting that might be possible. What did the government of Manitoba say with reference to this bill? What proposals did they have to make? I am not talking about blind opposition to the bill; I am talking about proposals for improving the bill so that it would meet the needs of prairie farmers. I have here a report of the submission made by the minister of agriculture of the government of Manitoba to the parliamentary committee which dealt with this question. He summarizes his idea of what a real income stabilization plan for prairie grain producers should be. The report reads:

1. The plan should provide for a net income guarantee to grain producers on a basic quantity of production or on a basic acreage.

I want members opposite to listen. He is talking about a net income guarantee, not a gross income guarantee. Farmers are not responsible if the cost of gasoline goes up, for example. They are not responsible if the cost of farm implements goes up. The government is responsible. After all, a few years ago the government appointed a royal commission headed by Professor Barber of the University of Manitoba to look into the high cost of farm implements. It was a very expensive royal commission. It reported more than a year ago but none of its recommendations have been carried out. They have been completely ignored. I wonder whether government inaction in connection with this report has anything to do with the size of the contributions the implement-making companies make to the Liberal party at election time.

The minister of agriculture of Manitoba further said:

2. The plan should not be detrimental to efficient practices or destructive of initiative.

3. The plan must be conducive to sound land use practices by providing for crop flexibility.

4. The plan must be such that it is in the direct financial interest of the Government of Canada to take effective measures to reduce the cost of inputs to prairie farmers.

The question is: does the legislation before us in any way meet the criteria set out by the Manitoba minister of agriculture? The minister says the basis upon which prairie grain receipts will be stabilized in the first five years of the plan will be about 65 per cent of the average of the late 'sixties; about 70 per cent of 90 per cent of total receipts in that period. I come from an industrial riding. I know what Liberal members who represent urban constituencies would say if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) brought in an amendment to the Labour Code increasing the minimum wage for all workers under federal jurisdiction, and if he were to announce that the minimum wage would be at the rate of 90 per cent of the wage of the last five years. He would be laughed out of office. Nevertheless, the minister has enough gall to make that kind of proposal for farmers. I say the farmers of Canada are entitled to the same consideration as are urban workers. Second, the agriculture minister of Manitoba points out that the net cost to the federal treasury in the first five years of the plan proposed by the federal government will be less than $30 million. He further contends that the stabilization account could show a surplus of at least $100 million and, possibly, $225 million by 1976. That money would be in the fund, not in the pockets of the farmers as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) so dishonestly suggested the other night on television.

Mr. Gibson: Nonsense.

Mr. Orlikow: The stupid member for Hamilton-Wentworth interjects "Nonsense". I wish he would get up and explain why the statement I have just made is incorrect.

Mr. Mahoney: Because you made it.

Mr. Orlikow: It is way beyond the understanding of that hon. member. The Manitoba minister stated, further, that between now and 1976 the stabilization account could be operated as proposed in Bill C-244 on the strength of the 4 per cent contribution by the federal government alone in the absence of any contributions from farmers. Last, the minister pointed out that except for a possible payment of $100 million at the end of the 1971-72 crop year, there is virtual certainty that no more payments will be called for during the remainder of the 'seventies.

Just one last reference to the submission made by the minister of agriculture in the province of Manitoba. Last Friday, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) promised that this submission would be considered carefully. But it has been ignored. It would be interesting to know whether the minister really did intend to give further consideration to the bill in the light of these representations or whether he received a directive from the Prime Minister on the lines: this is our legislation and it has to go ahead on Monday. Or, perhaps, the instruction came from somebody in the Prime Minister's office who has the power to make decisions and who told the minister he must ignore the promise he had made and continue with the bill as it stood. The Manitoba minister said that because the proposed stabilization plan would operate on the basis of a five-year moving average, which is presently low and still declining, and which by its very nature will move upward slowly only after a period of recovery, it can be safely predicted that the plan will be of no direct benefit to the prairie farmer during the 'seventies.

Certain hon. members may not realize that the last five years have been some of the worst years farmers have experienced during the last 25 years. The minister of agriculture for Manitoba did not agree with the concept of the stabilization plan because, he said, it was based on gross receipts. In the face of ever-rising costs, even the best guarantee of stabilizing gross receipts becomes less meaningful with the passage of time. The guarantee proposed in Bill C-244 will cover only one half of the actual costs presently incurred in the producing of grain.

The minister and the government may say that after all, the minister of agriculture in the Province of Manitoba is an NDPer and he is putting forward these views for purely partisan reasons. For the information of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, who temporarily occupies an Alberta seat until the next election, I will read a short extract from the views of the Alberta Wheat Pool, which is not an organization noted for being particularly radical.

Mr. Mahoney: It has already been put on the record twice.

Mr. Orlikow: In a statement sent to all Members of Parliament on September 23, the Alberta Wheat Pool, speaking about this bill, said, among other things:

> Attractive as a principle stability may be, the first concern shown by our members at the current time is that of income itself. They have expressed coolness bordering on disinterest in any plan of stability which does not have as its first objective, stability at a remunerative level. Within this context—

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Calgary South on a point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: Is the hon. member aware that this very document has already been read into the record twice by his colleagues in this debate to date?

Mr. Orlikow: I know it has, but obviously the disinterest of the hon. member from Calgary, as well as the minister, indicates that it needs to be repeated not three times but perhaps 30 times, and then perhaps it will sink in.

Mr. Paproski: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I apologize to the hon. member, whose time is nearly up, but the hon. member for Edmonton Centre rises on a point of order. I think the hon. member should be given an opportunity of finishing his speech, but at the same time the hon. member for Edmonton Centre is entitled to be recognized if he seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Paproski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have been sitting here diligently listening to the filibuster that is going on between the Liberal party and the New Democratic Party. We would appreciate it if they would get along with the motion so that we can get along with the bill.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired but I think in fairness he might be allowed a minute's additional time in view of the points of order we have had.

Mr. Orlikow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To continue:

> Within this context, our association has some serious reservations about the proposals of Bill C-244.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, again not a very partisan organization—if anything, I would say it has been very careful not to offend governments, and the Liberal government has not been exempt from that fairly reasonable treatment—said in a statement issued on May 7, to quote one paragraph:

> It would be highly improper for us to temper our criticism of the long term grains policy in this bill—and we do have criticisms and very serious ones—out of a feeling of fear and urgency respecting a possible delay of these essential "transitional" payments.

So, hon. members can see that the wheat pools, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the National Farmers Union are opposing this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. member since his time expired a few minutes ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can carry on with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I hear some faint cries of "no" which indicate that the hon. member does not have the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal with two aspects of the amendments now before the House. Before Your Honour gives me the instruction that my remarks are not relevant, I should say that I think the last few moments will prove that they are. I have been prompted to make these points by questions that were asked outside this House, particularly by backbenchers from parts of the nation other than the Prairies. Members of the press gallery have also asked similar questions and members of this House have received numerous letters from people across Canada, though particularly from the Prairies, to the effect that they find this bill very confusing. Most people do not understand it. Neither do they understand the amendments now before the House at the present time. I shall have more to say about those later, but at this point may I say there is no doubt that the bill is confusing.

I am sure all members of the House, as well as everyone on the Prairies, agree that there is need for a stabilization of the economy on the Prairies and would welcome a bill with reasonable provisions that made this possible. I say that because various members of the House have put on the record DBS figures indicating that five years ago the average income of the farmer on the western prairies was in the neighbourhood of $5,000, whereas last year it had dropped to about $1,000, quite a drastic drop in the income of farmers in that region, as hon. members have pointed out.

Many words have been uttered in this House on the unemployment situation in eastern Canada, particularly in industrial areas. I think part of the reason for this vast unemployment presently in the land is the lack of purchasing power on the part of the farmers, and this lack is felt all across Canada.

The second question that was asked by the group to which I referred related to the accusations of filibuster and obstruction which are hurled across the floor of the House from one party to another. This they do not understand and are beginning to wonder who is responsible for this obstruction and filibustering.

Mr. Hogarth: You admit it is there, then.

Mr. McIntosh: I hope I shall be able to reveal to the House just who is responsible for the filibustering, but to do so one must understand this question and see it in its right light. The reason so much interest is stirred in this House when farming or agricultural legislation is presented to us is that we from the western prairies have to live with a one industry economy, namely agriculture. Of necessity, every member of the House from the Prairies, regardless of party, is very interested in any topic that relates to this industry upon which we in western Canada depend so much.

In my own area the industry is broken down into two parts. While 50 per cent of the farmers' income comes from wheat sales, in the main, the other 50 per cent comes from livestock sales. If I were permitted to do so, I should like to say something about the government's intervention in this particular field, but I do not think this would come within the scope of the amendments. I therefore notice your glance, Mr. Speaker, and heed your warning. So the reason every member of the House from the Prairies makes the subject of agriculture his prime concern is that, as I said before, we have a one industry economy on the Prairies.

Another question that is asked is: Who actually is blocking this legislation, rather than, who appears to be blocking it? I think this point was made by my colleague from across the way. Why the necessity for a long debate on each agricultural issue to come before the House? I wish to prove that it is not the members of the opposition but the Liberal government that is responsible for the obstruction and the filibustering that appears to be taking place.

To prove my point I should like to refer to a Canadian Press release which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on October 5. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle), who is one of the Liberal backbenchers who spoke on this amendment said, as reported in that newspaper, that the bill had flaws in it. I think other members than that hon. member have made the same statement. I think the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, if he has not made that statement, has implied there are flaws in the bill. This is one of the causes of the filibustering.

Members in this House, and certainly the people of this country, wonder why the government does not bring in amendments to correct these admitted flaws in the bill. Common sense dictates that if such action were taken much of the debate in this House of Commons would be eliminated, because we would not have to point out time and time again that these flaws are there and should be changed before the bill becomes an act. The minister, as almost everyone in this House knows, is so adamant and arrogant in his position that he will not acknowledge the weak points outlined by members even of his own party. I see the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) in the House. He spoke on this bill yesterday and I should like to make a few references to what he said. He said that the bill lacked many necessary and beneficial features desired by farmers. After saying that, he shrugged it off by saying the government would look after these omissions at a later date.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In fairness I feel I should correct that impression of what I said yesterday. I think Hansard will show that I did not suggest the stabilization bill lacked other policies. I said that the farm interests and groups had expressed a desire to have other policies and just because they were not contained in the stabilization bill was no reason for preventing it from moving forward. These policies can be obtained in other ways. The stabilization bill will not cut off these desirable policies. That is the clarification I wanted to make.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, if I had the wrong impression of what the minister said I apologize. I sat here and listened to what he said, and I was under the impression he admitted there was something lacking in the stabilization bill. In addition, he was asking the opposition to bear with the government and it would bring in these other policies later on. During previous Parliaments, the opposition has accepted similar statements made by ministers of the cabinet, but attached little significance to commitments made by backbenchers. Prior to this government taking office such a statement by a minister was accepted as government policy. That is not the case at the present time. The just society boys destroyed that king of co-operation by bringing in what is now called the "supergroup". The cabinet ministers appear to us on this side of the House to be only figureheads who take their instructions from that supergroup in the Prime Minister's office. The word of a cabinet minister is not held in such high regard today as it was in the days of previous governments.

The western members and the farmers they represent no longer trust this government, and certainly have no faith in the promises it makes. This distrust is founded on past experience of broken promises by members of this cabinet. I could list many of them. Just a few minutes ago reference was made to a broken agreement between the three prairie agriculture ministers and the federal government. There has been some explanation by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to the effect that he did not make any agreement with the three prairie ministers, but there was an apparent misunderstanding on the part of all who took part in those discussions. We heard a moment ago from a representative of the NDP from Manitoba that his interpretation of the agreement was there would be a cease-fire for a week. Certainly, that has not been the case. I do not think any explanation by the government could convince the farmers that an agreement was not broken. This is something that has happened on past occasions, but not nearly as often. It is quite common for this government not to keep promises.

Not very long ago the minister who represents the livestock sector of the agricultural economy of western Canada broke a promise to the producers. It is for this reason I suggest the ministers of this cabinet have no power whatsoever. All the power is focused in the Prime Minister's office with that supergroup. The ministers take their instructions from that group which is telling them how to run the country. That supergroup is not even an elective group.

Mr. Paproski: It is shameful the way they forget about western Canada.

Mr. McIntosh: I doubt if they could get elected. Perhaps a worse feature than this broken promise is the breaking of the law in respect of payments owing to grain producers under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I will not say more about that, but let me point out that in recent weeks I have stated on three different occasions that this government, as a result of a decision by the supergroup, cabinet ministers or the government as a whole, has broken faith with the country. No wonder there are accusations of filibustering and obstruction.

Many uninformed members of this House and members of the Press Gallery do not understand what we are talking about because this bill is very confusing to many, including myself. We do not know its implications, but we are afraid of certain of its features. The farmers I represent had an annual income of about $5,000 some five years ago. That annual income has now dropped to about $1,000. This government wishes to stabilize this income at $1,000 a year. That is how I read this bill. There is little need to point out that this type of action on the part of the government invites obstruction. We all know such action delays the passage of any legislation, beneficial or otherwise.

Before this government came into power, governments of the day, regardless of which party was involved, would accept suggestions by opposition members and others which would improve legislation. Other governments accepted amendments to improve bills. That type of co-operation eliminated much of the type of debate that has taken place in this House during the last three years.

This dictatorial administration demands that we pass legislation as it is presented by the government or it will withdraw the legislation. This government is not going to threaten most members on this side, regardless of party affiliation. It is no wonder people in Canada are asking what is happening to the Parliament of Canada. Even we who sit here are wondering what is happening.

In yesterday's Ottawa Journal the minister in charge of the Wheat Board is reported as having said that he would withdraw the bill. The report reads:

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. Lang said last week he would withdraw the bill if the opposition continued a series of procedural attacks stalling its passage.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have news for the minister. He had better withdraw the bill forthwith and scrap it at least until such time as he comes to his senses, gets down from his high and mighty pedestal, listens to reason and accepts some of the suggestions of the farmers. I suggest to the Prime Minister that there should be a change in the cabinet, particularly in respect of the portfolio relating to the Wheat Board, because if the minister's attitude does not change and if his rigid and inflexible position continues, I believe that he must acknowledge what everyone else in this country knows, namely, that he is not capable of piloting this bill through the House of Commons. If there is no flexibility in the minister's present position, I forewarn that there are some members in this House who are determined to stall the bill in its present form.

If the minister has decided that the bill is to remain as presented, then any debate from now on is useless in the face of that adamant stand. He would perhaps be doing the Parliament of Canada a service by immediately taking the action he has threatened to implement as reported in the newspaper article because we have now reached a deadlock. Members on this side are determined to stall this legislation until the minister accepts some amendments. By his actions and by his words, he indicates that he does not intend to accept any amendments. The members to whom I referred a moment ago intend to use, regardless of what the minister says, every legal means available to them, be it procedural or otherwise to prevent the income of their constituents being stabilized, as I said before, at a poverty level. In this same press release in the Ottawa Journal, the minister is also reported as saying that the amendment is unworkable and so on. I recall a former minister of a Liberal government making a similar statement in respect of cash advances for farm stored grain. He said it was unworkable and could not be made to work. The people of Canada thought otherwise. They changed the government and proved it could be done.

Cash advances on farm stored grain became a very important piece of legislation. So, do not let the minister try to fool us that this is not workable. We would be quite satisfied if the income level were up where it should be. Stabilization should not be at a poverty level. Perhaps there are some people on the back benches and in the press gallery who believe the government has all the answers, and that nobody should listen to the opposition members. I know there are some who believe this. Those of us who do not agree with such a conclusion have a suggestion to make. Let the government listen to the Canadian citizens who will be directly affected by these amendments, as well as by the bill itself. Let us imagine for a moment a situation which, if it took place, would result in the elimination of all opposition members in this House. Who would or should the government consult? As I have said before, they should consult those people who would be affected by the legislation.

I have in my hand a telegram from the delegates of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, District Four which is in my area. I should like to put this on the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. Unless there is unanimous consent he will not be able to pursue his remarks. Does the House wish to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIntosh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and members of the House. I shall try to be very brief. I wish to put the telegram on the record because, as I have mentioned, these are the people to whom members of the government should listen if they do not wish to listen to members of the opposition. I think the people of Canada would like to know what the farmers of western Canada want. The telegram reads as follows:

The delegates of district four Saskatchewan Pool met in Swift Current on September 29 and 30, and are gravely concerned about the pressure being put forth in the House of Commons to have Bill C-244 passed. The following resolution was passed unanimously. The delegates endorse the principal of a stabilization program, . . .

I interject here to say I believe everybody in the House endorses this principle.

. . . but will continue to oppose Bill C-244 until it contains the following amendments: 1. An inflationary factor to take account of the rising production costs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. McIntosh: This is quite reasonable. We can accept this.

2. An adequate two price system for wheat.

This has been talked about time and time again. The people of western Canada for years and years have believed there is a double standard in Canada. There was a bill which passed through this House very quickly during this session of Parliament. I refer to the bill granting $80 million to industries in the event that some employees of certain industries were laid off. The farmers have no objection to this type of action. They say, however, that no jobs have been lost yet and the government has voted $80 million to help people who may be laid off. In God's name why can they not give us the money that is owing to us?

I could go on and mention the price of bread and so on. We have heard time and time again that an increase of 60 cents in the price of wheat would represent an increase of only one cent on a loaf of bread. We have heard some opinions expressed that labour people would not stand for this. I am not sure what the price of bread is today. It has increased by one cent, by one cent and by one cent. We have heard no complaints about this except from individual housewives. We have heard no organized complaint about this. It has been said that perhaps labour is entitled to this amount of money because of inflation and so on. Why cannot similar consideration be given to the people who produce the wheat? We have no hesitation in adopting item No. 2.

The next proposal reads as follows:

3. Recognition of a storage policy for each kind of grain paid for jointly by government and producers.

It I had more time I should like to inform the House about the storage policy in the United States. The farmers there have no difficulty disposing of their grain whenever they want to do so. The government stores it. The system works wonderfully. I have records to show that the United States has sold proportionately almost twice as much grain as we have in the past 20 years. Australia has beaten our efforts. Why? Because our system must be antiquated and should be altered. Why should we not follow the system adopted by one of these successful countries. I have no hesitation in accepting the third proposal.

Then, we have their next proposal, which reads:

4. An annual separate pool for each kind of grain guaranteed.

We can accept all these recommendations. This is why I say I have no hesitation in adopting the resolution passed by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, District Four. Much has been said about who in the Prairies supports the government view. I think the same newspaper was referred to time and time again. It lists three organizations dealing with grains that do support the minister's story, and the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool is one of the three but there are doubts about the first one. However, this advertisement is erroneous because the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix dated October 4 contains an article in which the president of this organization refutes the contention of the one Liberal in the city of Regina who says that the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool endorses the stabilization bill C-244 which the minister has presented to the House. In the president's own press release he says:

We have not endorsed, and will not endorse the proposed income stabilization plan because in our view it is inadequate. We think the stabilization of income from grains is a good idea. However, endorsation of the principle of the stabilizing of income does not mean support of the existing plan.

• (3:50 p.m.)

He also said:

. . . there is no justification for holding up money promised to farmers.

In addition, he said:

We do not support the stabilization plan as it is, nor do we want to retain the TWRA as it is.

He said nothing more than the members of the opposition have said. We want a stabilization plan. Possibly we will vote for the minister's plan if, as I said before, he will come to his senses, listen to reason, and accept some of the amendments, not amendments that we want but those that farmers themselves want. Is that asking too much?

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I will not delay the House more than five or six minutes, unless I am requested to do so, of course. I will wait for that request to be manifested in an obvious way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I have a few comments to make and also a suggestion. First, I want to say that I support the motion as clarified and improved by the amendment. However, we cannot look at the amendment without putting it in context with the general situation because this amendment, like some of the others, goes to the heart of the issue. I, like other hon. members, have been west. I have looked upon the face of western agriculture in the last few months and I have found it a sad and disheartening experience in view of what used to be the situation. There is no doubt that the people who have brought this about are the people who sit opposite, and they are unfit to govern this country because of what has happened. There will be another time and another opportunity to enlarge on that aspect.

It has been suggested by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and by others that there are stalling tactics, there is delay and there is fillibustering. These dainty dilettantes in democracy do not understand the purpose of the democratic structure in this House. It is based upon the adversary system. When an issue is thrown on the floor of the House to be contested—it is an issue in this case moved by the government— the only way in which it can be examined effectively and dealt with is through the adversary system. Therefore, we on this side of the House, and hopefully some day members on the other side when they find the intestinal fortitude to stand up for the things they believe in, will contest the validity of the proposals brought forward by the government, just as hon. members to my left are doing with this amendment and just as we are doing with many other useful—I could almost say more useful—amendments that we are offering. It is in that sense that this debate has been conducted.

I am shocked and amazed to hear it suggested that the form which this debate has taken constitutes a delay of the proceedings in this House. My hon. friends opposite are guilty of deception I think when they say "let the bill come to a vote". Unless there has been some change, we know what that means, that the obedient group on the other side will vote as they are told. I think we should bear in mind that they do not represent the majority of the voters in the 1968 election, and I think that is something which should be considered.

However, be that as it may, in pursuit of our democratic duty we have, through the means of this amendment which has been supported by members in our party, indicated the grievous faults in the case made by the government. It would be one thing if it was the government against the opposition on the basis of the adversary system of which I speak. But on the scales of truth and justice upon which we and the people of this country must balance which side is the right side there has been placed against the government the statements and the evidence of impartial and objective people who are not involved in the day to day arguments in the House of Commons.

My good friend, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) gave witness to that a short time ago when he read the resolution which had come to him from his province. But over and above that, what do we find? I discount the statement of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. I also received letters from Saskatchewan, mainly from Saskatoon, which promoted the rapid passage of this bill. Upon examining the envelope in which these letters came I find they are mainly from the city of Saskatoon, from urban farmers in that city who have been cultivating the 40 feet in their back lane.

Mr. Lang: You should see my letters; they are from rural areas.

Mr. Baldwin: I do not know about the minister's staff, but I certainly know that I examined those that came to me. There were so few that I had a chance to examine them carefully and in detail. Anybody who is motivated by correspondence of this kind does not deserve to sit in the House of Commons. In addition to the farmers, there are the farm organizations. All the responsible and major farm organizations have said that they support, amongst others, an amendment of this kind; that they are not in favour of the bill in its present form and that there should be major changes before the stabilization program is made effective. These are farm organizations and the pools. In addition to that, there are the provincial ministers of agriculture, two of them comparatively new in their jobs; men who have just been through the rigours of a campaign. I was involved on the fringes of the campaign in Alberta, and let us not suggest that to some extent federal issues were extraneous to those campaigns. I do not know about Saskatchewan, but certainly in Alberta some of the federal legislation was very germane to some of the campaign fights in rural constituencies. I heard mentioned on many occasions Bill C-176 and Bill C-244, and the sad and pitiful showing of the Liberal party at that time. The success of our party indicates beyond any doubt that the farm organizations, the farmers, the prairie premiers and the prairie ministers of agriculture are opposed to this bill in its present form.

Under those conditions, it would be manifestly absurd for the government to suggest that we should not make it quite plain that we propose to support the amendment put forward for the purpose of improving the legislation. The facts are simple, Mr. Speaker. The bill is not adequate and must be changed. But the government, like most governments, is unwilling to make changes because the changes are proposed from this side of the House. Probably the minister would like a long delay with the opportunity to propose changes himself. But we cannot trust the government. We cannot trust these ministers. We have seen what happened with respect to a simple understanding that consideration of the bill would be postponed under certain conditions. Those conditions were not met.

Be that as it may, and in the belief that what the government is seeking is a face-saving device, I wish to make a suggestion before the vote is called. I make it on my own behalf. I am not authorized to make it on behalf of my party, but I think it has merit. If the government is really interested in providing a stabilization measure which will be effective and useful to the people of western Canada, then in the first instance I suggest it should immediately pay the money it owes under Chapter 2 of the 1956 statutes, the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, and the Canadian Wheat Board should then pay to the farmers the amount which it owes them, on the normal basis. There can be no alternative to this. The government has been in default. It has broken the law. This situation has gone on for 14 or 15 months. There is no other way in which the government can purge its contempt and make itself respectable again.

My second suggestion is made on the assumption that the bill will pass. The government has the troops, the bodies—I was almost going to say the willing, dumb bodies, but I will just say the willing bodies—to compel passage of the bill. I imagine that having secured consent from his colleagues the minister intends to persist with the bill until it is passed. I also assume that the government is going to reject all of the useful and valid amendments that have been proposed. This being the case, I suggest that the minister make use of the amendment which he has placed on the order paper. I suggest that when the bill does pass clause 32 should be immediately proclaimed. This is the clause which provides for the payment of $100 million. I suggest that then the balance of the clauses of the bill should not be implemented.

I suggest that the implementation of the balance of the clauses should be delayed for some considerable time. In fact, I assume that the minister has no intention of operating the new provisions at least until the new crop year arrives. I suggest that the order in council containing the proclamation bringing the rest of the clauses of the bill into effect should be delayed until there has been an honest, valid and meaningful attempt by the government to secure, in co-operation with the farm organizations, farmers, provincial governments and the opposition parties, a form of stabilization bill that will work, that is acceptable, and does not contain the repugnant provisions of the present bill.

How in the name of heaven can the government be satisfied that this bill will meet the real requirements of the farm population of western Canada? In the light of what has been said by the farm organizations, by members of the New Democratic Party, by members of this party, and by the prairie ministers of agriculture, which I assume the minister must have taken to heart, how can the government be honestly and truthfully satisfied that this bill meets the needs of the prairie farmers? If the government genuinely desires such a result, and I have not completely ruled out that possibility at this stage, then what I suggest could very easily be brought about as the means to secure it. But because I do not trust the government any more, I would insist that any order in council implementing the remaining provisions of the bill should not come into effect until an affirmative resolution was introduced in this House, and debated without time limitation.

These proposals are simple. As I say, I make them on my own behalf, as some indication of what might be worked out if there is any real, honest, genuine intent on the part of the government to try to do something for the people of western Canada. We all know that the cash position of a great many farmers in western Canada is desperate. Yet despite that, the people in many parts of the west will not buy this bill in its present form. It is to their eternal credit that they feel that way. The government would be failing in its duty and conscience if it failed to take that into account, and if it failed to work out a means by which this money could be paid. The government should seek to meet that obligation, and with respect to the rest of the bill it should work out terms which are acceptable to all of the farm organizations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Before putting the question, I think the Chair should inform hon. members that although Standing Order 75(11) provides for the deferring of the recording of the yeas and nays at report stage on different motions, the Chair has decided to call in the members in this instance because otherwise we would be merely postponing study of the first two motions until the end of our study of the other motions, when we would re-open the debate on motions Nos. 1 and 2. The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

• (4:10 p.m.)

And the Clerk-Assistant being about to call the names:

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North knows that members should not come into the Chamber or leave the chamber or move from seat to seat while the motion is being put. I do not want to be difficult about this but I believe I must bring this rule to the attention of hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Speaker.]

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is called on the main motion now before the House, namely the one in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), I should like to make another plea to the government. The farm organizations of western Canada which speak for the farmers have made a strong appeal to the government that Bill C-244 be amended along the lines recommended in this motion. The recommendation, which is the primary recommendation in just about all of the submissions that are being sent to the government, is that consideration be given to the net position of the farm economy of western Canada rather than the gross position with respect to the application of stabilization payments.

May I take a moment to explain the reason, as I see it, for the motion moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. The general scheme of Bill C-244 is that money is put into a stabilization fund partly in the form of payments made by farmers and partly in the form of payments made by the government. Payments are made out of that fund to the farmers only under very stringent conditions. The principal condition is that a crop year would have to be so bad that the total gross income—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but I have been given information to the effect that the hon. member has already spoken on the main motion.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: I thought at first when the hon. member rose that he had not spoken before, and if I am wrong the hon. member will tell me so. However, my understanding is that he did speak previously, as reported at page 8441 of Hansard for Tuesday, October 5. If I am correct the hon. member could still pursue his remarks with the consent of the House, but the information I have from the table is that the hon. member's speech is recorded from pages 8441 to 8447 of Hansard for October 5 last.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House would greatly enjoy catching me out of order, and if I am I shall bow to the Chair. But when I spoke yesterday, October 5, I was speaking to the amendment, not to the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that when the hon. member seconded the amendment he was speaking to both questions, but I appreciate that the matter is perhaps difficult to interpret from a procedural standpoint. I am sure the hon. member would agree that, procedurally speaking, his seconding the amendment would put him on record as having spoken both to the motion and to the amendment. However, perhaps this is being technical; I do not want to do anything to prevent the hon. member from expressing his views at this time. If there is agreement—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I may, of course, be wrong in my interpretation, which is simply a preliminary one. If the hon. member feels that I have incorrectly understood the situation I would be pleased to hear from him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when you suggested I had spoken, and when Your Honour referred to a speech I made yesterday, as recorded at certain pages in Hansard, I of course objected because that was a speech I made on the amendment. I am quite aware of a citation that used to be in the books governing members who seconded motions, but I think Your Honour would have to go back many years to find when this rule was applied.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would be inclined to agree with the hon. member that if the only record that we have of his having spoken on the main motion is that he seconded the amendment, it would be interpreting the rules rather strictly if I were not to allow him to speak to the main motion. Certainly, that is my view.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe I was pointing out that the main principle of this bill is the provision of stabilization payments to farmers under certain conditions, conditions that we regard as too severe. In order for farmers who are growing any of the six grains covered by this bill to receive payments, a year must be so bad that the total income in the area covered by the bill is less than 90 per cent of the average total income of the preceding five years.

When one realizes that, among other factors, there is the fact that the cost of production has gone up, it can readily be seen that, if in any such difficult year the farmers do not get paid unless their gross income falls below the five year, this will have the effect of precluding the making of payments under the stabilization fund for many years. Gross income could be a very large figure whereas the actual net income of the farmer, because of increased costs of production, could be below the average income of the previous five years, and yet no payments would be made to the farmers. That is why we feel very strongly about this bill and that is why these amendments are still before the House. We feel the bill should be amended to right this provision, namely that stabilization payments out of the fund to the farmers will come into effect in any year when the net income of the farmer falls below the average of the preceding five years.

We would also like to change the 90 per cent figure and other things, but we do feel that this principle of distinguishing between the gross income and the net income is one that is extremely important to the successful operation of this bill. Again, I remind the minister that the organizations representing the farmers of western Canada are putting this point as number one in the pleas they are now making to the government. I suggest it is just possible that the farm organizations might understand the situation and might know what is best for the farmer, and I think the minister ought to pay attention to their pleas.

I know, this House being constituted as it is, and in view of the vote we have just had, that if this amendment comes to a vote and the government says it has to be turned down it will be turned down. If we simply go on and put the bill on the statute books, the effect will be to provide a bill that will not do what its sponsors say it is supposed to do. It will not be a piece of legislation that will stabilize farm income in western Canada. It will not be a bill to even out the humps and hollows, it will be merely a bill which will result in the farmers putting millions of dollars into a fund for one purpose, namely that in a catastrophic year payments will come out of the fund for the farmer. That will not be satisfactory, and I urge that consideration be given to this amendment.

Like the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who spoke a while ago when we were on the previous amendment, I should like to make some suggestions to the minister and to the government. As I have already said, if this comes to a vote and the government says it must be turned down that will be the end of the amendment. As the minister knows, representations are still being made to him and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for further consultation about this bill. The minister and the Prime Minister have been invited to go out west to meet officers of the National Farmers Union and the wheat pools and, despite some difficulty there was today as to whether Thanksgiving weekend is the time to do this, I hope these meetings will be held.

If the meetings are going to be held, surely the thing to do now is to desist from further debate on this bill in the House of Commons. We are not asking the government to withdraw the bill in the sense that it be removed from the order paper, but we are asking the government to let the bill stand. The government has other things it wants to proceed with, including the tax bill and a few other items, and this is the purpose of our continuing the debate at this time, to plead with the government to let this bill stand in order that consideration can be given to ways in which the bill can be improved.

Although there have been difficulties in the past day or two, so far as the Chair is concerned, about hon. members staying in order when speaking on the amendment, I submit there should be no difficulty about staying in order on the part of those who speak in respect of this amendment because it touches the very heart of this bill; is it to be confined by this reference to gross income so its benefits will never flow to the farmer, or is it to be a measure based on net income that will help get the benefits to the farmer in a way that will even out the humps and hollows?

It has been said in the course of this debate that the principle of stabilization legislation is good. We confirm that, for we believe there should be legislation to stabilize farm income in western Canada. We think it should be on a rational basis which holds out the prospect of raising the level of living in western Canada, not just stabilizing it at the poverty level, or perhaps a level that is declining. We think a rational stabilization plan should be worked out. We do not think this bill does that. It is tied to this $100 million carrot, as it were, and it is mixed up with this whole question of whether the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act money should be paid out.

We suggest that the whole thing has got into a mess which should not be continued any longer. Let me say that we agree with the contention from the other side, indeed from both sides of the House, that there should be stabilization legislation, but despite its title we think this legislation is not that kind of legislation. We also agree with the other side that the whole question of how we provide for storage of surplus grain in western Canada, not just wheat but all six of the major grains, is one that is not adequately covered by the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. We do not think that is a piece of perfect legislation which must stay for all time. We think there must be a new policy in regard to the way in which we provide for the cost of storing surplus grain.

By the way, that is another of the main points of the representations farm organizations are making to the government at this time. They not only want net income as the base rather than gross income, a two-price system and a few other things, they want the whole policy regarding storage costs to be put on a rational basis. To narrow all this to two things, what is before us in this bill is a proposal for stabilization, which is not satisfactory and will not work, and a proposal in respect of storage which simply repeals the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act without putting anything in its place.

What the farmers of western Canada, through their farm organizations, have said they want is for the government to sit down with them and work out a rational solution to these two problems. I will go as far as giving the minister credit for being aware of the fact that these two problems exist. It is clear, I admit, that purpose of this bill is to cope with those two problems. He is attempting to get something better than the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and something in the way of stabilization, but with great respect I say he has not solved either of these problems.

In the meantime we have become lost in the battle over the payments which have not been made under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act for 15 months. We have become lost in respect of figures and the arguments about which piece of legislation would be best and which would pay the farmers the most in the next three years. We have heard arguments about $170 million as compared to $113 million, and we have heard different figures from both sides. I think that all this proves this bill is not a satisfactory solution to these two main problems; the problem of providing for stabilization on a rational basis and the problem of providing a rational program for the payment of the cost of storing surplus grain in western Canada.

In light of all that I believe the farm organizations are being reasonable, logical and responsible in asking the government to give this matter further consideration. A Liberal member, whom I need not name, asked me earlier today if I realized that by our continuing to debate this bill we were challenging or tempting the government to withdraw it or cease to proceed with it so that it would not pass and did I not feel badly about that and realize the disastrous consequences that would flow from that. I said to him, "Do you think we are fooling around; that is precisely what we want". We want the government not to proceed with Bill C-244 in its present form, to let it lie on the order paper and to meet with the farmers of western Canada to discuss a rational and sensible solution to these problems, with a view to obtaining an adequate stabilization program that would even out the bumps and hollows and not just take care of a serious hollow which occurs once in every 20 years. It should be evened out to provide a decent level of income for the farmers of Western Canada.

The other problem is to do something better than the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act does in respect of the problem of grain stored in western Canada. As I say, this is a place where we can debate and have votes. I know as well as I am standing here today that if there is a vote on the amendment of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar it will be defeated, and we will go on to debate the other 14 amendments on the order paper at the report stage. I know those amendments will be defeated and that the bill will go through in its present form. We also know around here that when legislation gets on the statute books it takes a long time to get it changed. The whole idea of improving the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is a good one. The whole idea of a plan to stabilize farm income in western Canada is good, but if we are to cope with these two problems let us do so sensibly.

Mr. Woolliams: And honestly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friend from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) says "and honestly". I join with him, but I was trying to avoid that kind of assessment at the moment. We believe that many things are going on which we do not like, but at the moment I am trying to make the plea which has come to us from the farm organizations out west and which we know is coming to the minister because of the message received in the last day or so from the head of the National Farmers Union. I am trying to plead with the government to give this whole matter the further time it deserves and not to just say there are two choices, live forever with the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act with its declining value or accept the stabilization plan in Bill C-244. Those are not the only choices. It is true that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act may decline in value and that it does not cover other grains and so on, but it is equally true that Bill C-244 will take more money out of the farmer's pockets than it will put into them. This problem will not be solved by saying, as the Prime Minister did on television on Sunday, that under Bill C-244 $170 million will be given to the farmers in these three crop years. That does not happen to be true. All they would get would be $100 million, and in the two crop years referred to they would pay back $35 million into the fund. Therefore, their net benefit would be only $65 million.

Mr. Lang: Unless there is a failure.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, unless there is a failure. I did not know my hon. friends opposite were contemplating such a bad year while they were in power. In a sense, I am getting a little away from what I had intended to say. I like to get into an attack on the deception, the dishonesty, the misleading figures, the blackmail and all the rest of it, but I believe the point has been reached when this issue has become deadly serious. As I say, when a certain Liberal member spoke to me earlier today and asked if we knew what we were doing and finally said that he thought we were fooling, I told him that we were not fooling but that we think this is an important matter and that the issue should be grappled with in a sensible way. We go along with the Prime Minister in the context of participatory democracy. We believe the people who are affected should be heard, and in this case that means the farmers.

I have some doubt about the extent to which the farmers of western Canada were heard last Friday in view of the fact that the ministers went home not understanding what had been agreed to. I would plead that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, the Prime Minister and the members of the government meet with the heads of the National Farmers Union and the heads of the wheat pools to discuss with them their proposals. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) a while ago placed on Hansard the four points contained in a telegram he received from the local wheat pool in his area, and my colleagues have placed on the record those same points from other organizations. They are there; they are very clear. There are about four main points involved. The minister must not tell us these are things which are outside the scope of the bill because when one talks about a better way to cope with the question of storage under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and when one talks about an adequate stabilization plan one is talking about things that are in this bill. If we do not deal properly with them now and this bill is pushed through and put on the statute books in its present form, we will be fastening upon the backs of the farmers in western Canada something that will cost them far more than they will get.

I said the other day that it is like some of the other legislation which has been put through this House which was supposed to be an improvement. I referred to the new unemployment insurance scheme, the new veterans legislation and the new old age security legislation. Today we have to cope with people who find that under these improved pieces of legislation their position is worse than it was before. I submit that will happen in respect of this legislation.

I wish to end on a pleading note. I say to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and his friend and mine, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson), who are having a little tête-à-tête right now, that I recognize—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I finish my sentence?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I recognize the sincerity of the government in saying that the two problems of storage and stabilization have to be met and that that was the reason for bringing in this bill. I ask them, however, to realize that the farm organizations of western Canada do not believe this bill properly solves either of these problems. I ask them to meet with those organizations and let us all come up with a better bill.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who spoke before me, I consider the bill before us to be confusing. Primarily I want to strongly support the amendment presented by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) to the effect that some amendments are required in order to increase the value of the bill.

In support of what I have just said, one needs only refer to the explanation given yesterday, October 5, 1917 by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as to whether the hon. minister knew exactly what the farmers would get under the new prairie grain stabilisation legislation, recorded on page 8446 of Hansard, from which I quote:

> If we have the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act route followed, without therefore passing Bill C-244, of the $62.1 million which would be paid we know that $38.6 million would reach the farmers because that is in connection with a crop year for which the transactions are concluded. Had that amount been paid it would ordinarily have been paid on June 17 as we made quite clear at all times.

I have received perhaps 600 or 700 letters from western producers first telling me to ask the government to make the payments according to the former legislation, and afterwards, they agreed with the new legislation. Yesterday, the hon. minister said, and I quote:

> The $38.6 million would therefore have reached the farmers. The balance would apply to future operations of the wheat pool as would the $30.8 million and the $20 million estimated for the subsequent years. These would apply to future wheat pools. The point I made to the hon. member who just spoke was that should any of these pools turn out to be in a deficit position, not one penny of it flows through to the farmer. So, there is no certainty possible at this time whether those amounts of money will get to the farmer. All that would happen would be that the payment by the treasury would, to that extent, reduce the treasury obligation on another account. It would not get to the farmer if the pools were in a deficit position, as it was a year ago when the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act payments did not get through to the farmers.

Mr. Speaker, such statements by the minister explain very well why western farmers are so worried about Bill C-244. In fact, they know very well that, if the June 1971 payments had been made, the situation would have been less confusing. Farmers think that this legislation is to put an end to the $38.6 million owed to them by the government under the former act.

I received today from Bonnyville, Alberta, the following letter:

[English]

> As a half section of land farmer, I ask you to vote for the Prairie Grains Stabilization Act. The transitional payment I would receive would amount to $511.85. I would get much less under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.
> Yours truly,
> Denis A. Rondeau
> Bonnyville, Alberta.

[Translation]

Farmers, especially the smaller ones, do not hesitate to say that this law is required to provide them with an improved income. However, they are concerned as to the amounts that they will receive. We, in this House, do not even know just what is in store for farmers.

Yesterday, the minister referred to approximate amounts, but nobody really knows what they are. This is why I definitely agree with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar to amend this legislation.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion no. 1 of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on motion No. 1 (Mr. Gleave) which was negatived on the following division:

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is with regard to a press release apparently issued under the name of the minister allegedly responsible for the Wheat Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: The parts that are particularly obnoxious, repugnant and incorrect are the following:

—throughout the weekend indicated time and again that the Leader of the Opposition refused to agree to the moratorium.

The following then appears in quotation marks:

"We didn't know for certain until Monday morning when I consulted with the Conservative House Leader that they had no intention of assisting farmers, agreeing to the moratorium" Mr. Lang said. "I was very surprised and angry when after they had sabotaged the moratorium, they then announced an intention to cooperate and bring C-244 to a vote. That apparent about-face was soon identified as being for the public only, as they have continued to talk and waste time at every opportunity."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: That is as far from the truth as it is possible to get. I reject it entirely. I repeat what I said on Monday morning when this question first came up and I raised the question of privilege. At that time I said, because the government had indicated through its spokesman that a moratorium was contingent upon there being some consideration of amendments and changes to Bill C-244, this would be satisfactory. When I was told categorically that prospects for any changes were very, very remote, I made it quite plain that as far as this party was concerned, there was no objection to there being any moratorium.

Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker. I can only say that those whom the gods would destroy they first make mad.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: It's a lie.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. As was indicated when discussing this matter earlier, particularly at the time the leader of the New Democratic Party was speaking, if there had persisted to the beginning of the House sittings on Monday an agreement simply to have a moratorium on the debate and any discussion of legalities without any preconditions about what was involved or what would be assumed as a result of that moratorium, we would likely have had one.

The House leader for the official opposition has today confirmed what I suggested at that time, that the failure to obtain a moratorium was due to their insistence that their agreement depended upon our committing ourselves in advance of any discussions or conversation about the likelihood of changes being made in the bill at this time. We had to make very clear to them that it was not a likelihood at this stage. We made that clear to them. At that point they refused the moratorium on that understanding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see that some hon. members want to rise on this point. There cannot be a debate at this time on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). He has raised the matter. As is the practice of this House, the member who is directly concerned has been given an opportunity to reply to the point. There is no motion before the House and, therefore, no matter to discuss.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) are apparently anxious to make a contribution to the debate. I suggest there can be no debate on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peace River, unless they have a point of order or a different approach. My ruling is the matter as raised by the hon. member for Peace River cannot be pursued. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Peters: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It concerns the same press release, the section that refers to the New Democratic Party. I quote:

"On the other hand the NDP have renounced their hypocrisy and have now clearly stated that they are totally against the Bill under any circumstances. —"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: It's a lie.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, the minister has charged hypocrisy on the part of the New Democratic Party in connection with the position it has taken. I consider the minister to be dishonest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: He is stupid.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Peters: He is well aware—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I suggest to all hon. members that the House is really not doing itself any good by these charges and countercharges which are being levelled. The hon. member for Timiskaming suggests that statements were made. which are not in accordance with the facts. I wonder whether that will lead us anywhere. We have had this debate today. It will continue for a while yet, and I really do not think we ought to pursue the matter by way of points of order or that any conceivable purpose could be served by pursuing discussion on the plane which has now been reached.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Don't get political.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: I do not intend to try to outshout anybody. If hon. members want to shout I can stand here until they are finished. If the minister had made the statement in the House, it would have been a different thing, but the minister knows and every member of this House knows, that members of the New Democratic Party have opposed Bill C-244 as a bad bill and as being a disservice to the farmers of Canada from the very first day. The minister knows this, and his statement in his press release—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The statement by the hon. member for York South confirms what I said a few moments ago. Every member here—and there are some 200-odd members here, more or less—could get up and accuse the other side of making false statements or of having made statements which were not in accordance with the facts. We could go on for a long time on that basis. Again, I suggest to the hon. member that we are seeking to continue a debate which, in any case, will continue for some time yet. I do not think we shall achieve anything which is of use to the House or to anyone or anything, by pursuing the matter further.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Témiscamingue rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Caouette: I rise on a question of order, Mr. Speaker.

If the name of our party was not mentioned in the release just referred to, it is because we want Bill C-244 to be voted upon, and we want to see an end to the politicking that is now going on.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following bill with amendments: Bill C-262, An Act to support employment in Canada by mitigating the disruptive effect on Canadian industry of the imposition of foreign import surtaxes or other actions of a like effect, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

• (6:00 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

An Act to amend the Judges Act and the Financial Administration Act.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HEALTH

SHORTAGE OF DOCTORS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to present a motion to the House concerning the scarcity of doctors. I rise pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose this motion in connection with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Canada has reached a crisis which, unless federal and provincial governments act more quickly than they have, will escalate to tragic proportions on a national scale. This crisis has been caused by Canada's failure to train enough doctors to meet the increasing surgical and medical needs of Canadians. Last year Canada trained 1,152 doctors to our high Canadian standards, but had to import 1,113, many of them not trained to our standards.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare told the House yesterday it is not clear that the provision of additional funds for medical schools for Canadian students is the right solution. Perhaps not, but in the name of those countless Canadians who, now and in the future, will suffer from this indecision, let us make an end to it.

I therefore propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Monteith):

That the matter of the increasing shortage of doctors who are trained to Canadian standards be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs with an instruction to inquire into the matter as quickly as is consistent with a thorough study and, from time to time, report back short-term and long-term solutions.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe North. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity; the motion cannot be put.

PENITENTIARIES

STATEMENT BY SOLICITOR GENERAL ON PENAL REFORMS

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House of Commons on the present situation of the federal penitentiary system, which pertains to persons convicted of sentences of two years or more, give an outline of our policy and explain the reforms that were undertaken a few months ago by the Penitentiary Service, and other reforms that are planned for the future.

I will start with some figures on the present situation.

First of all, as far as expenses are concerned, the government must spend about $10,400 a year to keep an inmate in an institution while it costs only $415 to the government if an inmate is on parole.

During the last month of June, 5,257 offenders were on parole across Canada. A study carried out by the National Parole Board of 2,663 inmates on parole showed that 2,078 or 78 per cent had a job. They earned, for that month only, nearly $857,000. On the basis of such results and of money earned by the same persons for a whole year, this adds up to more than 10 million dollars and their income tax, both federal and provincial, has been estimated at nearly 1.3 million dollars.

Let us take a look now at the social angle. In Canada, close to one million persons have a criminal record. Each year, on average, 3,750 persons are admitted in our 36 federal institutions. At the present time, there are 7,270 inmates in our institutions, whose average age is 35 years and 80 per cent of them are recidivists.

These few figures point to the obvious conclusion that rehabilitation of offenders remains one of the major problems of our times. The present situation results from the fact that protection of society has received more emphasis than the rehabilitation of inmates.

For too long a time now, our punishment oriented society has cultivated the state of mind that demands that offenders, whatever their age and whatever the offense, be placed behind bars. Even nowadays, too many Canadians object to looking at offenders as members of our society and seem to disregard the fact that the correctional process aims at making the offender a useful and law abiding citizen, and not any more an individual alienated from society and in conflict with it.

Consequently, we have decided from now on to stress the rehabilitation of individuals rather than protection of society.

Minister's Statement on Penitentiaries

Criminologists, psychologists, psychiatrists and senior officers with a long experience of the correctional field are agreed on the fact that at least 80 per cent of our inmates can be rehabilitated.

Therefore, a policy must be established concerning those 80 per cent, that is, the larger part of our inmates, rather than a punitive policy intended to meet the needs of a minority. We will undoubtedly have to keep on protecting society against dangerous criminals, but we will also take into consideration the fact that most inmates do not belong to such a category.

Reforms are undertaken on the basis of two essential principles. Firstly, an inmate is always a citizen who, sooner or later, will return to a normal life in our society and, as such, is basically entitled to have his human dignity, of course, but also his rights as a citizen respected by us to the largest possible extent. Secondly, in order for the rehabilitation to be as successful as possible, we must take advantage of participation from the community, both inside and outside our institutions, so as to have within our institutions a way of life that is as similar as possible to the normal life of citizens.

With such principles, we hope to change in our institutions the climate of tension that results from useless coercion, obsolete policies, and to create in the old-style institutions a more relaxed atmosphere more conducive to the rehabilitation of individual inmates.

We have therefore endeavoured to liberalize the system. On the one hand, we have closed the maximum security section in St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary and we have transferred most of the inmates of the old Kingston Penitentiary to Millhaven.

We have suspended all work for the construction of the new Mission Correctional Centre in British Columbia and appointed a task force whose terms of reference are specifically to assess the entire problem of maximum security institutions and to report to me at the end of October.

At the present time, we anticipate the creation of a greater number of pre-release centres. We also are working towards providing for visits by the inmate's family under conditions which are to comply more fully with the requirements for privacy, especially in the case of maximum security institutions.

In other institutions, we are considering the possibility of allowing the inmates to go out, following the adoption of a leave system which will be along lines similar to the "military leave of absence" system; such leave is to be periodical and regular and provided on the basis of merit. Already, in Warkworth institution, some inmates hold a regular job in a local industry; they therefore leave the institution daily.

On the other hand, we have already instituted a Permanent Advisory Committee of eight psychiatrists to help us improve mental health conditions for the inmates who are ill and to study shortcomings in the present system. We expect a first report from this group some time during the month of November 1971.

I would also like to announce the forthcoming arrival within our medical services of a permanent advisor on nursing. Moreover, a meeting is to be held in October, grouping all the medical doctors who are working in penitentiaries at the present time, in order to determine the inmates' medical requirements and to review the services provided for them so as to operate on a rational basis.

We have promoted the creation of inmate committees within the institutions. Elections have taken place within all 36 institutions and each one of the committees has held at least one meeting. The idea of inmate committees was enthusiastically received by the inmates. These committees will make it possible to establish more satisfactory co-operation between the inmates and correctional staff in order to gain better knowledge of the inmates' problems.

In another field, we have relaxed the regulations governing communications of inmates with Members of Parliament and the Commissioner of Penitentiaries. For a few months now, letters addressed to Members of Parliament or the Commissioner are not being opened or censored by the institutional authorities.

Quite recently, we brought the inmates' haircuts more up to date and provided the inmates with clothing which is similar to that worn in the outside community, especially clothing worn for leisure. We have also abolished the humiliating custom of identification numbers on clothing.

Within the same perspective, we intend to give increasing application to the "living unit concept" which we have been testing successfully within some of our institutions. This is a matter of reorganizing a normal community on a small scale: a limited number of inmates are grouped within the same wing and they share the same premises with the Correctional Officers who are in charge of the group. We are, in fact, carrying on a kind of group therapy. The result will be that the inmate will no longer be depersonalized, a frequent occurrence under the old system.

We are also proposing to establish the cafeteria system within our institutions to replace the system of meals eaten within the cells, a practice which added to the dehumanizing character of prison life.

And among the most significant of proposed reforms, I would like to point out the new concept of work and industry within the penitentiaries. It is a well-known fact already that the organization of industries within our institutions at the present time tends to promote unsound production habits. The efficiency rate for our inmates is assessed roughly at one third that of a normal worker. In order to cope with this problem, we have put into practice two projects on an experimental basis.

At the William Head minimum security institution on Vancouver Island, a regular wage will be paid for the construction of a building required by the institution. The inmates will be required to comply with the same requirements as those in force in private industry with regard to working hours and productive capacity. Instead of the present daily allowance which varies from .55 cents to .85 cents, the inmates will receive the federal minimum wage, which will make it possible for them to pay for their room and board in the institution, to pay for their clothing, to help support their family, to save money for their eventual release from prison, to pay their taxes and to be eligible for payments under unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation acts. Once released, an inmate may be less inclined to rob a bank: on the contrary, he will already have a bank account. He may even, as in the case of other workers, receive unemployment insurance payments during the period required for finding some employment.

In Drumheller, Alberta, we have already gone one step further: the inmates are fully responsible for the construction, the organization and the operation of a golf practice range. And the money derived from the income of this business is entirely invested into a trust fund for inmates. This pilot project, in which we have a good deal of hope, will show that it is possible to allow the inmates themselves to assume responsibilities and thus to act as they would within a normal community.

Another important project in the field of correctional education is presently being implemented. Last September, the St. Lawrence Community College of Kingston extended its campus in order to include the Collins Bay Penitentiary. The institution will therefore be integrated into the campus and the inmates will be able to follow the same programs, have the same teachers and receive the same degrees as the college's fulltime students. This will improve the structure of educational programs as well as the turnover of teachers. The inmate will thus have contacts with a larger number of persons from the outside and this will facilitate his eventual re-integration into society.

The Canadian Penitentiary Service is involved in yet another research project in co-operation with the Donner Foundation of Toronto and the University of Victoria. In a year's time, we want to have determined the effects of correctional education in order to assess inmates' activities following their release.

However, it will be impossible to achieve these reforms if we do not have a highly qualified staff at our disposal. We want to expand our vocational staff—criminologists, sociologists, psychologists, correctional technicians, etc.—in order to increase the ratio between professionals and inmates. We have vast reserves at our disposal, since already the junior colleges, the colleges and the universities offer technical and vocational courses in the correctional field.

We also want to provide our employees with every opportunity of retraining themselves.

Mr. Hees: For heaven's sake, he has two more pages!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is there no limit on the length of time the minister can take? I think he is trying to talk himself out.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that under the standing orders no time limit is imposed in respect of a statement made on motions by a minister. The limitation of time applies only to the replies made by spokesmen on behalf of the opposition parties. There may be some unfairness to this. I have in the past expressed the view and made the suggestion to ministers that perhaps some thought should be given to making statements on motions shorter rather than longer, and I would hope ministers would take this into consideration. If a minister makes a statement which takes 20 or 25 minutes I believe in such a case the House and the Chair must be prepared to hear longer comments by spokesmen on behalf of the opposition parties. It may be that when we are considering a matter as important as that now being dealt with by the minister we would want to devote more time to the subject. I do think, however, that there should be an effort made by ministers making statements on motions to present them within reasonable time limits.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the hon. minister.

[English]

Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, considering the fact that the minister obviously has three or four more pages to read, what about the rule that forbids the reading of speeches in the House?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows, of course, that that rule does not apply to statements on motions.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: We have great confidence in our personnel and we will give them both the educational and the monetary facilities to enable them to undertake retraining.

So that all may have a better understanding of the new policies, the heads and officials of our institutions will also be given the opportunity of improving their training. The administrative and organizational structures will be updated and we will emphasize further regionalization.

All the reforms pertaining to our correctional officials and personnel are conceived in a spirit of consultation which we intend to further develop. To that effect we will increase the meetings so as to ensure continuous communications.

A third major element in the implementation of these reforms is the citizens' involvement. The program which the members of our society have to set up in order to foster the ex-offender's rehabilitation is an important one. We have undertaken long-term studies on community relations to improve the planning of the programs in which citizens, employers, voluntary agencies and professionals are involved with us; and we have also encouraged Canadian employers, as well as our own departments, to employ parolees and ex-offenders.

As our society becomes better acquainted with the problems of crime and rehabilitation of offenders and as citizens realize both the economic and social advantages of a rehabilitation program, a major part of the challenge that faces us will have been met.

Our reforms will perhaps be criticized for being too liberal or for omitting to protect society against dangerous criminals.

Indeed, this new rehabilitation policy will probably demand much striving and involve some risks, but we cannot maintain a system which in itself can cause even more obvious dangers.

We are conscious of the fact that some of our inmates are dangerous and we do intend to protect society against them.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members that these are objectives towards which we strive and we realize that it will take time before the fundamental changes are implemented.

Bearing this in mind we intend to develop a mechanism for consultation with the provinces in order to improve greatly the Canadian penitentiary system.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is an important subject because we are dealing with a class of people in Canada, if they might be categorized in that way, who do not have the right to exercise their franchise. They are the only class of Canadians, apart from the judiciary who are independent of our democratic institutions, who have all the qualifications but who, because they happen to run afoul of the law, are incarcerated and cannot really speak in this place or in a community through the ballot box.

The minister presented a lengthy statement. He has taken almost thirty minutes. I will try to keep my speech short but there are some things that I think should be answered. I repeat that if any subject is important in this House this one is, and we discuss many subjects at length. The fact is that there are approximately 7,000 or 8,000 people right now in the penitentiaries of Canada, some of whom are young men and women who do not have the right to express themselves through the ballot box.

I have read carefully during the lunch hour the nine page statement of the Solicitor General with reference to penal reform and corrections. Many of the items contained in the report have been recommended by this party. I hope this statement involves not a question of propaganda, not a question of words but is rather an indication of some action to relieve the situation.

The minister says that reforms are undertaken on the basis of two essential principles. One, he says, is that the inmate is always a citizen who sooner or later will return to a normal life in our society and is basically entitled to retain his human dignity and have his rights as a citizen respected by us to the largest extent. First of all, I want to congratulate the minister for realizing at last that crime is not just a sordid happening but rather a result of human behaviour brought about by our economic and social conditions which we have failed to change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Woolliams: For years we have pushed for and supported a system of penal reform. We have pushed and fought for a more modern idea of institutions. We have fought against the unnecessary use of maximum security institutions where the lock, the key and isolation were the letter of rehabilitation and retribution was the reason for punishment.

During my 27 years of experience at the bar and in my time as a member of the House of Commons I have visited most of the penal institutions in the country. If institutions are to be used at all, Mr. Speaker, and I have questioned that throughout my career, I point out that we in this party have fought for the use of more medium and minimum security institutions which would better serve the average incarcerated person who has been convicted of a crime for which the code by law requires the imposition of a lengthy prison sentence.

We have fought for an extension of the concept of parole under which persons could be granted wider and more humane privileges, that would permit persons in penitentiaries to attend outside educational institutions instead of remaining confined in prisons where loneliness and crime prevail, remaining in institutions which are merely crime factories manufacturing more criminals rather than dealing with persons who could and can be rehabilitated. We have fought for a wider system of parole under which a person could either remain in custody overnight and by day attend the ordinary schools in the community or be given freedom to remain out on parole during the period when he is acquiring training and education to prepare him to return to society.

We have asked for more psychologists and psychiatrists. There are not enough psychologists and psychiatrists serving penal institutions. There should be greater availability for persons convicted to obtain this kind of technical psychological psychiatry, to make certain they receive the emotional and mental treatment necessary for their rehabilitation.

I hope the minister realizes that crime is not only the fault of the prisoner but the fault of society as well. Everyone is born as clean as a white piece of paper. It is society that creates the environment which leads to crime. I respect the minister's enlightened views in this field, but in light of the discovery yesterday that employees of Statistics Canada are to be fingerprinted and photographed for security reasons I wonder whether his views will be translated into action.

This is a complex problem. On the one hand we find that the minister is imposing restrictions on Canadians, and on the other hand that he is stressing the rehabilitation of the individual rather than the protection of society. It is not clear to me which priority is uppermost in the minister's mind. It is also not clear to me why there should even be a conflict between the two.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) has pointed out that at least 80 per cent of the inmates of penal institutions can be rehabilitated. But the important statistic is that which shows that 80 per cent of those people who have been incarcerated in prisons are returned to those same institutions for committing other crimes.

I put this on the highest level, Mr. Speaker, because we are dealing with a matter which is above politics. We need reforms. All of this appears to be contained in the minister's statement. But is it a matter of words or a matter of action? Can the 7,000 or 8,000 prisoners in Canada turn over tonight in their little cots in the loneliness of their cells and say: Something is going to be done for us; things will be better for us in the future. We must be prepared to spend money on reform. It is all right to talk, but we must be prepared to spend money if we are actually to get reform.

Prisons create for the individual an atmosphere of fear, of violence, in which the problems created by lack of education, lack of help for physical and mental illness, and the prevalence of drugs, homosexuality and so on, combine to unsettle the most stable individual. Prisons create the starkest possible segregation from the community. Months or years are spent in a prison environment, followed by sudden release and full personal responsibility. We could not devise a more traumatic social experience.

For those who make up our crime problem, penitence has little meaning. By and large their lives are so empty, they are so full of frustration and despair, they are so sick in mind and body, and their entire life experience, providing them grist for thought, is so totally lacking in charity that contemplation is more likely to cause anger at society's sins rather than remorse for what they themselves have done.

At the beginning of these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I said that I had visited many penitentiaries, both as a Member of Parliament and as a counsel. I have seen the terror, the emotion on the faces of young people incarcerated as late as 1968 after having been sentenced to five years for trafficking in, being in possession of or using non-medical drugs such as marijuana.

We can only rehabilitate the convicted if the law is reformed to bring it in line with the 1971 concept of what is expected in a highly complex, technological age. Political and economic reforms must come now. Above all, those who have been given the privilege to govern must respect and obey the law themselves. The flouting of the law by the government will do more to encourage crime in society than any other factor.

I would like to read a newspaper clipping I received this morning which was sent to me by somebody in my home town. I do not know who sent it to me, but it reads:

> The University of Calgary called yesterday for 400 volunteers to take part in its research project on the non-medical use of marijuana. The two-year project, financed by a $100,000 grant from the federal government, will be an attempt to determine the physical and mental effects of marijuana smoking under controlled test conditions.

The point I am making here is that young men attending our universities and colleges are charged under the Narcotics Act for doing the very thing that the government will now be paying other young people to do. There cannot be one law for one section of the population and another law for another section. That is what I mean by flouting the law. You must have respect for law and order if you are going to try to prevent crime.

The social and economic changes about which I am talking include the development of a creative society in which all young persons will have an opportunity to succeed. Last year thousands of young people in universities were turned down and failed simply because of a matter of a decimal point in their marks. Thousands were denied the right to study medicine; thousands were denied the right to study accounting; thousands were denied the right to study law, pharmacy or other professions, and thousands of others were denied the right to be trained in some skill simply because we do not have enough institutions for all our young people. These young people are being denied by a system of human computerization. Somebody makes a differentiation of .06 in their academic marks and that is sufficient to set them apart from somebody else. The time to start reforming our institutions is now in order to give all our young people a chance and remove their frustrations.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I wish to read one short excerpt from a book which I think everybody should read, "Crime in America", written by Ramsey Clark, the former Attorney General of the United States. In it he writes:

> If rehabilitation is the goal, only the indeterminate sentence will be used.

In other words, what he is saying is that under a modern, streamlined criminal code a judge could make more use of indeterminate sentences, because what judge knows how a man or woman will react six months, one year, or five years after their appearance in court? Indeterminate sentences would be one way by which young people would have a chance to become rehabilitated and attend educational institutions. That would be a starting point in reform.

I have been speaking for just ten minutes, Mr. Speaker, while the minister spoke for 30 minutes. I want to repeat that this is the most important matter raised this session in reference to human dignity and the quality of life of the individual. The minister is a young man and I congratulate him on many of the views he holds. I hope he will translate his words into action in order to relieve the terrible frustrations of the convicted and to change our prisons from factories of crime to factories of rehabilitation and prevention of crime.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would like to preface my remarks by thanking the minister for sending us a copy of his statement in sufficient time so that we could make an adequate reply.

The minister has brought to his new portfolio a great deal of vigour and concern with regard to the problems of the penitentiaries. But, Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to congratulate him because his government is the one responsible for not implementing reforms many years ago in order to develop an adequate penology system. When one looks at our prisons today I think we are fortunate that we have only experienced the incidents at Kingston and Dorchester within recent times.

Another reason why I hesitate to congratulate the minister is that for most of his reforms no definite period of time for implementation is given. For example, in his statement the minister said, "We anticipate the creation of a greater number of release centres", "we are considering the adoption of a leave system", "we intend to give increasing application to the living unit concept", "we are proposing a cafeteria system". Such words as "anticipate", "considering", "intend to give increasing application" and "proposing" are not sufficient. When the reforms are definitely implemented we in the New Democratic Party will be the first to commend the minister. At this time, however, we are not prepared to congratulate him on a mere statement on motions in the House which only sets forth indefinite future actions.

I had the privilege of travelling with the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs when it crossed the country visiting different institutions such as St. Vincent de Paul, Prince Albert, New Westminster, Archambault, the new Millhaven and others. Whether the institutions are new or old certain things are common to all. First, there is too much stone and steel in the construction, giving one a feeling of separation and rejection. Many of the institutions are too large, indicating a depersonalization of the inmates. Many of them are located too far from major cities, thereby denying inmates proper treatment facilities and personnel and making their reorientation within the community very difficult upon release. We found that there is an excessive use of prisons in Canada. It is only now that the minister has said that the parole system is of great value. May I suggest to the Solicitor General that we should start at the probation service stage. If this were improved within the court system, perhaps the large populations at present in the prisons would not be necessary.

Another thing we found was a too heavy concentration on maximum security prisons across the country. I am delighted that the minister told us that he has halted construction of the Mission Correction Centre. In Canada maximum security prisons are populated to the extent of 35 per cent whereas in Great Britain the figure is 15 per cent. Something must, therefore, be basically wrong with regard to classifying the inmates in institutions.

We also found that the classification centres are not adequate to diagnose the problems of inmates and set forth a proper treatment and evaluation program. The industrial training courses are also inadequate and do not equip inmates to accept their responsibilities within the community upon release. Finally, we were struck by the absence of a team approach by the staff and the inmates of the institutions.

The Ouimet report set forth two principles with regard to prisoners. The first requirement was custody of the inmate for the period of his sentence subject to remission and/or parole. The second requirement was to prepare the individual for permanent return to the community so he could live as a law-abiding and contributing citizen. Our prisons in the past have not achieved these goals nor are they doing so at present. This is one of the reasons for the high rate of recidivism. In the past, control was through containment rather than through involvement. If these reforms are fully implemented we may find a change in the emphasis with regard to prisoners.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that some changes are still necessary. For example, the design, size and function of prisons must be blended toward preparing individuals for their return to society as law-abiding citizens. Prison programs and services must also provide adequate training and treatment both within and without the institutions. The best example of this need is the absence of treatment for many of the drug addicts within society today. Matsqui is the only centre where treatment is available. I am sure the Solicitor General looks forward to the day when treatment centres for addicts will be closely attached to the prisons.

I thought the minister showed a particular interest in inmate committees. I am sure one of the reasons for so much trouble in prisons in the past was the absence of any participation by inmates with regard to conditions of discipline and treatment. If the minister is really serious about inmate committees I would recommend to him that some of those inmate committees appear before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs when the estimates come before it in order to set forth their ideas on what a prison should contain with regard to design, size and programs regarding their treatment.

In fairness, Mr. Speaker, I think the reforms are a step in the right direction and we shall await their implementation and evaluation. Finally, I suggest to the minister that, if he does not want to see prisons in the future populated with young people, he withdraw the Young Offenders Act and replace it with modern penology concepts. This would be the greatest contribution the minister could make to this Parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, more than ever we can truthfully say that we live in a mad world and are governed by the most outstanding of the mad.

Seeking to correct the effects of causes one is unwilling to change is, in my opinion, just standing still, which is absolutely no way to solve a problem which does call for a solution, but an intelligent one.

Rehabilitation of offenders, according to the Solicitor General's statement, has become more important than the protection of society. The Solicitor General does not, for instance, mention that there are causes for our having offenders and criminals, stemming from within society itself. Therefore, so long as we tolerate those causes, poverty in the midst of affluence, and insecurity, we evidently will have criminals to cope with. To try to rehabiliate them in hostile society is the solution the Solicitor General has to offer. Indeed, according to his statements, unemployed and welfare recipients would be better protected in jail than if they were free.

Please note that I am for the rehabilitation of prisoners, but in a society that will allow it, which is impossible in the present system. We want them to be rehabilitated. We now promise them university degrees or CEGEP diplomas. Therefore, our young people of 18, 19 or 20 years of age, who are honest and anxious to complete their studies and graduate will have no other choice but to commit an offence, be sentenced to prison where they will be sure to get a university degree or CEGEP diploma.

Mr. Speaker, we agree on emphasizing rehabilitation but, as I say, as long as we tolerate insecurity among prisoners—and the government very well knows it—they will be incited to return to prison and that, on several occasions.

Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me a step in the right direction. That might please the prisoner, but once he is released, if he is rehabilitated he will be returned to society where he has no place. What purpose will be served by prison or penitentiary reforms? Let us begin by reforming what must be reformed in Canada: the economic system, which allows the eventual prisoners to remain in society and take part in its activities. But no, the government prefers to come to grips with problems caused by the present situation, and not with the causes themselves.

Mr. Speaker, the minister told us that it costs $10,400 yearly to keep an individual behind bars. In my opinion it would cost less to provide for his needs or give him a job when he is free and before he commits a crime. Furthermore this would encourage young people to abstain from committing criminal acts which send them behind bars.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to us that the psychiatrists, the psychologists and the sociologists mentioned by the minister should be used not only to study the behaviour of prisoners but also the behaviour of the government.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DEVELOPMENT BY GOVERNMENT OF OVER-ALL INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY—CO-ORDINATION WITHIN GOVERNMENT SERVICES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It relates to the serious decline in the development of our manufacturing industry, particularly in the technological areas, which the Science Council says dates from mid-1968 and which just happens to be the time my right hon. friend assumed control of the affairs of this country. Does the Prime Minister now intend to have the government prepare and develop an over-all industrial strategy as recommended by the Science Council?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might reply to the Leader of the Opposition and observe that the Science Council is an entirely independent organization, independent in the sense that it is a Crown corporation. It decides what studies it will undertake and what studies it will publish. As the minister responsible for the Science Council, I shall be most interested in examining the proposals set forth in the report alluded to by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer goes directly to the main consideration to which the Science Council called attention. In light of the minister's answer I would again like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the urgency of the situation which prompted the Science Council to develop and prepare an interim report and in view of the emphasis placed by the Science Council upon the lack of co-ordination within government services, will the Prime Minister undertake to follow through on one of the major recommendations in this interim report of the Science Council and name without delay a central point in government that will have a mandate to effect such co-ordination?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has been following a concerted industrial development policy to strengthen our secondary and processing industries. A good deal of attention has been directed to the high technology sectors. Continuing attention is given within the department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other relevant departments to the development of programs and policies to strengthen Canadian industry and to achieve more effective co-operation between industry and government. The interim report of the council constitutes a most useful input into this continuing process.

Mr. Stanfield: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, we are all interested to know how amused the Prime Minister is by the sad state of industry in Canada. I have one final supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Just be patient. In view of the council's observation that the relationship between industry and government is by no means good enough and that this goes to the very root of the problem, I ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to do something to improve this situation rather than simply deliver lectures about the contributions of the Phoenicians?

FISCAL POLICY TO STIMULATE MANUFACTURING RATHER THAN EXTRACTING SECTOR—NEW POLICY FOR REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE GRANTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the Science Council points out that the growth of manufacturing has been marking time since 1968 and there are 120,000 fewer jobs than expected, is the minister planning to announce any fiscal policy that will help stimulate the manufacturing sector rather than the extraction sector of the economy which has been paying out only a small percentage of its profits in taxes?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Without accepting the premise of the question or the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I simply say that our present fiscal policies, including those which are presently before the House, if we ever get them passed, will be of great benefit to the manufacturing industry in Canada and, indeed, include tax decreases for the general corporations which pay corporate income tax. I hope we can get on with them very quickly.

Mr. Douglas: May I direct a further supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the council found that the work of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was lacking in co-ordination and that many of its grants to foreign companies were squeezing out Canadian enterprises, I ask the Prime Minister if the government intends to evaluate this finding of the Science Council and to announce any new policy under which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will operate?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the report which I understand was only made public yesterday. I am afraid I cannot comment on the report itself. If the hon. member is reflecting its considered judgment on that department, I would say that it sounds a bit wild to me, but I will certainly consider what they have to say and see if there is perhaps not a context which makes it a little less brutal than the member has put it in his question.

TAX INCENTIVE PLAN TO ENCOURAGE GREATER PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Prince-Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. As the new chairman of the Economic Council of Canada stated recently that "Canadian productivity must be improved if Canadian products are to remain competitive", does the government intend to introduce a tax incentive plan in the near future to encourage greater productivity in Canadian industry, or does it have some other plan in mind for bringing about this very necessary and desirable objective?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the Canadian environment generally encourages productivity in Canadian industry. One of the problems we have presently is that the gross national product is growing very rapidly but productivity is also growing, so not as much employment is being created as would normally occur through this size increase in the gross national product.

Mr. Hees: Does the minister intend to make a speech in the very near future to Canadian industry telling Canadian industry that it never had it so good and that the government intends to do absolutely nothing to improve productivity in this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: You keep making the same speech each day.

Mr. Hees: I want an answer to a very important question.

CHANGES IN REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE POLICIES TO ACHIEVE GREATER PLANNING AND CO-ORDINATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the Science Council of Canada's recent call for a new industrial strategy for Canada to promote the growth of manufacturing, and a series of resolutions passed by the Chamber of Commerce at its meeting in Quebec two weeks ago also calling for a new industrial strategy, can the minister tell the House whether his department will now change its incentive policies in such a way as to make possible a greater degree of planning and co-ordination?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I started reading the report. It is highly interesting; some of the views expressed there certainly deserve very close consideration. However, there are also some extremely serious omissions in this report, and once I have had time to study it in depth, I may be able to discuss it.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the minister whether, in light of the specific remarks directed at his department in the report, and in light of the statements made by other groups in the country, an examination is now taking place of the whole concept of regional industrial incentives under the minister's jurisdiction with a view to greater planning and co-ordination being exercised?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, it is not as a result of mere criticism that we hear or read somewhere that we must change our policy. It must be determined whether criticism is warranted; we consider it very seriously. That program did not come about out of thin air, but it has been brought forward by Parliament. It may have some deficiencies; we are prepared to correct them, but not merely on account of pressures or press statements.

[English]

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF INCENTIVE GRANTS TO FOREIGN-OWNED COMPANIES

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the findings of the Science Council of Canada and similar criticisms which have been made concerning grants to foreign-owned companies, is the government now reconsidering its policy with respect to making regional industrial incentive grants to such companies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have said several times in the House that the mandate of the department was to fight against regional disparity and not to define the policy of the Canadian government about foreign investments. I look after investment in underdeveloped areas and the other problem will undoubtedly be dealt with in a different manner in the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Centre for a last supplementary on this subject and then go to the next subject.

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY—AVOIDANCE OF USE AS ECONOMIC REGULATOR

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister or to the new Minister of State for Science and Technology or to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Does the government intend to use a little imagination when studying the call by the Science Council of Canada that the government cease using the construction industry as an economic regulator and begin helping to revitalize the construction sector?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I think the support given to the residential construction industry over the last two or three years is an indication that we are taking that kind of suggestion very seriously. I think that particular comment was a bit passé.

Mr. Paproski: Is the government preparing a new construction policy which will separate the housing sector from the government's economic stabilization strategy and, if so, when will a statement be made?

Mr. Andras: The indication this year is that we can expect in excess of 220,000 housing starts.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

STABILIZATION BILL—FURTHER CONSULTATIONS WITH FARM ORGANIZATIONS ON INCLUSION OF COST OF PRODUCTION FORMULA

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board this question. In view of the statement by the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool on October 4 that the pool will accept the stabilization plan if an adequate inflation formula is built in right now, does the minister intend to hold further consultations with the prairie farm organizations to see whether some mutually acceptable formula can be worked out?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In all the discussions with the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and a number of other farm organizations it was impossible to see any suggestions they were making which were merely for improvements in the plan itself, as distinct from the legislation, without the addition of large amounts of money. In other words, even their suggestion with regard to an inflation factor was not designed to improve the plan within a given financial range but was designed to increase that range. I am having further discussions with the organizations to find out whether they have any further technical suggestions or improvements to the plan to put forward, but I have no reason to believe this will be the case.

Mr. Gleave: Have any studies been made by the minister or by the department in an effort to ascertain what would be the cost of including a cost of production formula in the plan or arrangements for taking inflation into account?

Mr. Lang: A whole range of matters which were suggested at different times in the course of discussions concerning the plan were examined, as I have indicated to the House many times. Most of the cost of production formulas were either unworkable or difficult to justify in principle, in the sense that they would give a guaranteed annual income to one group in the country without such protection being available to others. An examination was made in some detail into a variety of these measures.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Would the minister be prepared to accept any plan which would allow for treasury payments at least equivalent to those made under the program which is to be dropped?

Mr. Lang: The whole package of proposals with which we came forward in October, and in respect of which certain implementation has taken place, enlarges the commitment of the treasury to the farmers in the grain area.

SPLITTING OF STABILIZATION BILL TO PERMIT ACREAGE PAYMENTS PENDING FURTHER CONSULTATIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Is the government now considering splitting Bill C-244 in order that the $100 million acreage payment can go out to farmers and further consultations can then take place concerning the stabilization bill itself?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): There was at no time any suggestion about splitting the bill. It was at all times presented as a substitution of one set of measures for another with the indicated financial exigencies that this would involve. The recommendation makes clear exactly the extent to which the government's contribution to the grain farming area would be increased by the present measure.

BASIS OF REVIEW OF ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH UNITED STATES—NEW INFORMATION CONCERNING UNITED STATES IMPORT SURCHARGE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. For two weeks the Prime Minister has stated that the government does not yet have any reason to believe that the United States has decided to alter fundamentally its economic relationship with Canada. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs said the government was now undertaking a fundamental review of Canada's economic relations with the United States. Is this review under way because the government now believes the United States position has been fundamentally altered and, if so, has the government received any new information on the basis of which it has reached a conclusion concerning United States intentions with regard to the 10 per cent surcharge?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Since the question relates to a statement I made, perhaps I might be allowed to reply. I made it clear in the statement I made on television that we are undertaking a fundamental reassessment of our economic relations with the United States because it appears to us that the United States may be in the process of changing its fundamental policies. One of the difficulties is, of course, to know for certain at the present time whether this change has in fact taken place. We hope it has not, but I think the hon. member will agree we should be prepared.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I rephrase my question to the Prime Minister a little differently? Is this decision to undertake this fundamental review based on any new information received since the Prime Minister stated more than a week ago on "Encounter" that any review would have to follow clarification of United States intentions?

Mr. Sharp: I think it is clear from the answer I gave that the government is undertaking this fundamental review in anticipation of a possible change in United States policy. We are not yet certain what that policy will be. Perhaps the hon. member knows and will help us.

Mr. Lundrigan: I have one final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government is really reviewing our economic relations with the United States at the moment or whether, in light of recent travels to Washington, it is making a fundamental review of our diplomatic practices and approaches in relation to the United States and other countries?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I think our diplomatic approaches are proceeding normally. However, I am sure the hon. member would agree that any government in charge of affairs in Canada today would be thinking about the possible changes that might occur in the policies of the United States which would affect us, and I believe we should be preparing for that contingency.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether relations between Ottawa and Washington have deteriorated to the point that it is now no longer possible for this government to find out what the economic plans of the United States administration are in relation to Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the present policies of the United States toward the rest of the world, including Canada, are only too plain. What we do not know is how temporary they are. Perhaps my learned friend would like to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—SUGGESTION THAT PRIME MINISTER WRITE OR TELEPHONE PRESIDENT NIXON

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that is supplementary to a previous question and which I will address to the Prime Minister. Is it not obvious now from the answers given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to a previous question that either a telephone call or a letter from the Prime Minister to President Nixon, asking what the plans of the United States are regarding the surtax and what Canada must do if the surtax is to be relaxed, is long overdue and that such a call or letter should be undertaken now?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—PURPOSE OF POSSIBLE WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—UNEMPLOYMENT PROJECTIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question related to the questions posed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the effect of United States economic policies on our employment situation this winter. While the government seems prepared to introduce a winter works program, can the Prime Minister inform the House whether such direct job programs will be part of a new package of economic policies to achieve full employment, or will it simply be intended to keep unemployment stable between 6 and 7 per cent for the next eight to 12 months?

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any package that we might want to announce would be intended to achieve the best possible performance from the economy.

Mr. Alexander: Is the Prime Minister going to spell out the level of unemployment with which the provinces will have to deal this winter, and which will not be reduced by further government employment programs, whether financed by the federal government alone or in conjunction with the provincial governments, and, if so, when?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have always said that we would let the House know as soon as we are prepared to make a statement on this subject.

Mr. Alexander: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would suggest to hon. members that if we are going to have three or four supplementaries on every subject we will be running short of time and be unable to cover many topics. I will allow a final supplementary to the hon. member for Hamilton West and then I will recognize the hon. member for Frazer Valley West.

Mr. Alexander: You are extremely charitable this afternoon, Sir. I have one final supplementary question. I know that the government is involved with plans dealing with the unemployment situation this winter and that the government must have some projection of the rate of unemployment with which we will be faced and the targets the government is trying to reach in order to alleviate that rate. Is the Prime Minister in a position to advise the House what these projections and targets are at this date?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, stated in general terms, I said it was the best performance possible of the economy, but I do not see any possibility of giving specific statistics with any sort of certainty and precision.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON POSSIBLE POSTPONEMENT

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the minister met with his United States counterpart, Secretary Rogers, in New York last week, and since their discussions undoubtedly included the forthcoming nuclear test on Amchitka and Canada's opposition to it, has the minister anything to report directly to the House on this very important subject?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when I met Secretary Rogers I did, as the hon. member has said, raise this question and express the very serious concern not only of the Canadian government but of the Canadian Parliament and people, particularly on the west coast. He replied that the President was very well aware of these views, that indeed he had recently been to Alaska where he had encountered the views of those in Alaska who were opposed to the test. So I can assure the House that Canada's views and the views of this House are very well known to the United States administration.

Mr. Rose: Since thousands of students in Vancouver peacefully demonstrated yesterday against the horror of nuclear warfare, does the government now plan to take any further initiatives in opposition to such tests in the Aleutians or anywhere else in the world where they occur?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think it would have been helpful if we could have had the unanimous views of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: However, I regret that an attempt was made to introduce some extraneous matters and our effort failed.

OIL

PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—FURTHER REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs somewhat related to the one asked by my colleague from Fraser Valley West. Having in mind the statement made by the United States Secretary of the Interior which would indicate the almost certainty of Alaskan oil being shipped via the north Pacific and along the British Columbia coast, with all the ecological perils that that entails, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs aware of this developing situation and is he considering any further and stronger steps in opposition to it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Like the hon. member I have been following these developments. I am not quite certain it would be useful to follow up the representations that we have made, but I can assure the hon. member that the matter is under consideration.

PROPOSED TAKE-OVER OF SUPERTEST BY BRITISH PETROLEUM—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Roberts (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister tell the House whether the government is considering any intervention to ensure that Supertest is not taken over by British Petroleum?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we were made aware of these negotiations from an early date and are reviewing the matter, but we have nothing more to say on the question at this time.

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT OF LE DAIN COMMISSION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that one year and four months have gone by since the Le Dain commission's interim report was published, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare at that time pledged that Canada would not sign the new United Nations convention on psychotropic substances until a debate had been held on the Le Dain report, would the minister inform the House when the final report of the Le Dain commission will be published?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the latest word I had was that the Chairman of the commission has indicated that we might expect the final report some time in December.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MORATORIUM ON INCARCERATION OF PERSONS CONVICTED OF POSSESSION OF MARIJUANA IN VIEW OF GOVERNMENT EXPERIMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Perhaps I should direct it to the Attorney General of Canada since it is in his field. Is the minister anticipating placing a moratorium on the incarceration of people convicted of possession of marijuana or use of marijuana, particularly when the government is putting up $100,000 to be spent by a university in conducting experiments to find out the effects of the drug on human beings?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think that answer would more appropriately come from the Minister of Justice, but I would point out to the hon. member, as he is probably aware, that the number of incarcerations resulting from charges brought against persons for possession of marijuana is very small indeed.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said the number of incarcerations is small. Let me put this to him. Has he taken into consideration the fact that by this experimentation he is really soliciting Canadians to break the law as it now stands?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member's question is in the form of an argument.

DRUGS

HEROIN—PROGRAMS TO DEAL WITH ADDICTS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware of the fact that between 20,000 and 30,000 Canadians are now using heroin and that many experts feel that Canada is on the verge of a real crisis? Is the government now going to take any new initiatives in co-operation with the provinces to deal with this most dangerous practice even before the Le Dain report on the non-medical use of drugs is presented?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are in touch with the provinces on an ongoing basis. We are advising them of the cost-sharing arrangements under the medicare and hospitalization plans and have indicated that many addicts qualify under the Canada Assistance Plan. To the degree that the provinces wish to take advantage of these cost-sharing arrangements, more adequate facilities can be provided not only to assist heroin addicts but in the form of preventative programs to more adequately take care of the problem. We also expect to have this matter on the agenda of the next health ministers conference.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES TO NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND YUKON—RETENTION OF RIGHTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the large number of employees in the Department of Public Works who are being transferred to the territorial governments or municipalities in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, the responsibility for which rests upon this government, I should like to ask the minister whether discussions are being held with those agencies and with the employees concerned to assure that their rights in connection with pensions and working conditions will be protected when the transfer is made?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the information I have is that the employees themselves were consulted from the beginning, and I would be surprised if the situation was otherwise. I will make inquiries to see if that is the case.

FISHERIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN JURISDICTION OVER CONTINENTAL SHELF TO PRESERVE RESOURCES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the government of Iceland has announced it will issue new regulations before September 1, 1972, giving Iceland exclusive fisheries jurisdiction over its continental shelf, which is approximately 50 to 70 miles from its coast, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate whether it is the government's intention to introduce similar legislation claiming fisheries jurisdiction over the Canadian continental shelf in order to establish proper conservation and utilization methods for the preservation of our fisheries resources?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I doubt that we will introduce such legislation but we will certainly be pursuing a proposal to a similar effect at the projected law of the sea conference. I think it would be desirable to get international agreement.

LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE AGENDA—MANAGEMENT OF FISHING RESOURCES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate whether an agenda has been agreed to for the law of the sea conference which is to take place in 1973, and what priority Canada has given to the management of fisheries resources on that agenda?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, discussions have been going on at the preparatory commission, but we have not yet obtained full agreement. As to the second part of the question, I will have to take it as notice because there are many important matters we will be pressing at the law of the sea conference.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

USE OF INFORMERS—REPUDIATION OF STATEMENTS BY ROBERT EADIE AND FATHER

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Solicitor General who was last week going to look at the script of the CBC "Midweek" program dealing with a former young informer named Eadie. Does he intend to repudiate certain statements made by the father and son, and if not before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will he do so at ten o'clock as my guest?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his invitation, but I read the script of September 30. I think that it adds nothing new to the allegations made on September 8, which I specifically refuted before the House on September 17.

Mr. McCleave: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

STATISTICS CANADA

PURPOSE OF FINGERPRINTING AND PHOTOGRAPHING EMPLOYEES

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In his absence I will direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. Today the Globe and Mail indicates that employees of Statistics Canada are to be fingerprinted by the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Robinson: Will the parliamentary secretary advise whether that is correct and, if so, what is the purpose for which these fingerprints are being taken?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member knows, he cannot ask a minister or a parliamentary secretary to deny or confirm a press report, but perhaps we might assume that the question was asked directly.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada has a very serious responsibility in respect to confidentiality of information in its care and in line with a review of security provisions it is going to issue new identity cards to its employees. The new cards will include the name and a picture of the employee but will not include the fingerprints of the employee. The RCMP is not involved in any way.

CORN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POLICY RESPECTING PRICE AND STORAGE

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to the continuing deterioration of commercial corn prices in Canada. Is it the minister's intention to make an early statement on motions about government policy in this respect, and will he include in this statement an indication of whether the government has made an assessment of the total production of corn in eastern Canada and the availability of storage, or will our harvest operation find our eastern elevators filled with western barley and United States corn?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have answered similar questions earlier to the effect that I have had a number of conversations with representatives of the corn industry, both here in Ottawa and in the corn growing areas. We are looking at this matter on an urgent basis and as soon as there is an announcement to be made I will make it.

PACKAGING AND LABELLING BILL—REASON FOR DELAY IN PROCLAMATION

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, in view of the far-reaching effect the packaging and labelling bill will have on business and industry generally, will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs advise the House why this bill has not been proclaimed?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it has not been proclaimed because we are drafting the regulations. In the process of doing that we are consulting with industries to avoid any undue disruption of practices. We also want the regulations to be of maximum assistance to the consumer because the packaging and labelling legislation represents a major advance for consumers in regard to packaging and labelling in Canada.

TRANSFER OF LANCASTER HOSPITAL TO PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES—PROTECTION OF EMPLOYEES' CONDITIONS OF SERVICE

Mr. Thomas M. As far as the minister is responsible, will he give a personal guarantee that the jobs of federal employees will be protected in respect of wages, salaries and other conditions?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to assure the hon. member that as far as I am concerned we will make every effort to protect all our employees and make sure they work under the same conditions in the future as they have in the past.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs whether the employees concerned are being consulted in respect of these matters?

Mr. Dubé: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Officials of my department have been in consultation with officials of the unions of these employees. At the present time we are discussing the matter with officials of the province of New Brunswick, but before anything is finalized all parties concerned will have been duly consulted.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSITION OF AGREEMENT WITH NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Following his recent visit to St. Romuald, has the minister received at least some token of gratitude from the Golden Eagle Company, because the government granted a $5,000,000 subsidy to that company as well as a tax exemption of the same order? Has the minister had any news from that firm since the day he was refused the right to speak?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have read in the newspapers that the vice-president of the company apologized for the incident in St. Romuald. Again I want to repeat, Mr. Speaker, that it is not because I did not speak, but because the Canadian government's contribution was not recognized.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPULSION OF CANADIAN STUDENTS FROM TAIWAN—POSSIBLE RETALIATORY ACTION

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in view of changes that have recently taken place in our relations with Taiwan and in light of the expulsion of a number of Canadian students from that country, is the Canadian government taking any retaliatory action against students in this country from Taiwan or Taipei?

• (3:30 p.m.)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Peters: In view of this being a political retaliation rather than the result of anything the students may have done, is it not in the interest of the Canadian government to retaliate?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

UNITED NATIONS

SEATING OF CHINA—CANADIAN VOTE ON ALBANIAN RESOLUTION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if it has yet been decided how the Canadian delegation will vote on the Albanian resolution in respect of the seating of China in the United Nations General Assembly? If so, what is the determination in respect of the vote?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian government will vote in favour of the Albanian resolution and will vote against all procedural motions which would prevent the United Nations taking a clear decision on the matter.

URBAN AFFAIRS

MONTREAL REHABILITATION PROJECT—LACK OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT APPROVAL

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State responsible for Urban Affairs. Has the minister given his approval to the rehabilitation project announced in the Montreal Gazette this morning for the city of Montreal?

[Mr. Marchand (Minister of Regional Econo).]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised and disappointed to see this news. I was surprised since I have not had an opportunity to examine the proposal, let alone approve it, and I was disappointed because this type of premature release makes it difficult to continue negotiations in good faith.

[Later:]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the report that the city of Montreal is getting multi-million dollar assistance from Ottawa for urban renewal, can the minister say whether the government plans to extend this program to other cities in Canada?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I just denied the fact that such authority has been granted the city of Montreal.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSITION OF AGREEMENT WITH NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Would the minister indicate whether or not the formality of the signing of the DREE agreement between the federal authority and the province of Nova Scotia has as yet taken place? If it has, would the minister be in a position to indicate at what stage some of the supplementary requests in respect of that agreement are?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Is it possible, Mr. Speaker, to know to what agreement the hon. gentleman is referring?

Mr. McCleave: Have you that many with Nova Scotia?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We have an agreement in respect of highways; we have an agreement in respect of the ARDA program; we have many agreements with the government.

Mr. Forrestall: About two weeks ago the Premier of Nova Scotia indicated, according to a headline in a daily newspaper, that agreement had been reached with the federal authority under the DREE program. This is a basic agreement covering many areas, particularly those areas in the designated metropolitan growth centres.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I suggest that the hon. member re-read the article and tell me exactly what program he is referring to.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Forrestall: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. On three separate occasions not only I but all Nova Scotians have learned of basic agreements between this authority and the provincial authorities before they have been announced in the House. Either somebody is very badly confused or somebody is lying. I do not accuse the minister of that, but I have very serious doubts about the veracity of the Premier of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Speaker: That is, of course, hardly a question of privilege, I suggest to the hon. member. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway after the hon. member for Athabasca.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA—STATEMENT BY MINISTER ALLEGING BLACKMAIL BY INDIANS TO ACHIEVE AIMS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Prime Minister, but since he works only part time and has left the House I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development stating a new government policy of confrontation rather than consultation when he said on television last night that the Indian people in northeastern Alberta are trying to blackmail the government in order to achieve their social aims?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is absent from the House for the purpose of attending a meeting with the Prime Minister of Malaysia. At the moment, I will only say I will bring this question to the attention of the Prime Minister, but I doubt very much whether what the hon. gentleman has said reflects the views of the minister.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has not been able to settle the problem in northeastern Alberta in a satisfactory manner, does the Prime Minister himself contemplate any assistance in this area?

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader about the business for today, tomorrow and next week so far as it can be foreseen?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the business for today will be a return to the tax bill—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —to be continued tomorrow. Perhaps I should say a word in respect of Bill C-244. I will be continuing discussions with the opposition parties in connection with Bill C-244. In this connection I should like to advise the House that unless satisfactory arrangements with the opposition parties can be concluded by Tuesday next which would bring about an end next week to the debate on Bill C-244, the government will not proceed further with this bill at this session and will make payment on Tuesday to the Canadian Wheat Board under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I hope to be meeting with my opposite numbers later in the day and probably we can discuss the matter further.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I might ask the minister whether he does not think it would help the situation if he would muzzle some of his colleagues, both of high as well as low degree but rather than do that I will ask him instead if he will consult with his colleague, the minister answering for the Wheat Board, concerning the extent to which the government is prepared to consider the very reasonable proposition I put forward yesterday afternoon in debate which now appears to have some support from this side of the House as well as from the prairie provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that that question is hardly in order at this time. The question period has expired. I believe the question asked by the hon. member had reference to the order of business of the House and I think we should not pursue the question period at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since this is the one point in the week when there is an announcement about coming House business and in view of the fact that the minister has said he will be meeting those of us who are his opposite numbers with regard to Bill C-244, may I express the hope that when he meets with us he will come with a statement of the changes the government might be prepared to make.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Friday, October 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West)(p. 7763).

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to be able to participate in this debate, particularly to deal with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I should like to begin by dealing with the wording of the amendment and making some comments on it. The amendment expresses deep concern and cites three particular problems: unacceptable levels of inflation, persisting unemployment, and a stagnant industry. All of us are concerned about the problem of unemployment, and I plan later in my remarks to deal specifically with that problem. But the motion deals with what it describes as unacceptable levels of inflation.

It is interesting to take a look at the record with respect to inflation. If we look at last year and at the performance this year up to April 1971, and compare our position with that of other developed countries, some revealing statistics become available. What was the inflation rate of the United States in 1970? It was 5.9 per cent. What was it up to April 1971? It was 4.6 per cent. What was the inflation rate in Japan in 1970? It was 7.7 per cent. What was it up to April 1971? It was 5.6 per cent. Germany in 1970 had an inflation rate of 3.8 per cent and up to April 1971 it had an inflation rate of 4.6 per cent. In France, the inflation rate in 1970 was 5.3 per cent, and up to April 1971 it was 5 per cent. In the United Kingdom, the inflation rate was 6.4 per cent in 1970, and under the Conservative government up to April 1971 they had the impressive inflation rate of 8.8 per cent. What was the Canadian inflation rate about which the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is complaining during this period? In 1970 our inflation rate was 2.4 per cent, considerably lower than that of any industrialized country, and in 1971 we had the more impressive record, considerably lower than that of any other industrialized country. Yet, the hon. member for Edmonton West moved a motion to deny second reading, alleging unacceptable levels of inflation without ever mentioning the statistical evidence.

He then goes on to speak about a stagnant economy. This is a political charge which is unsupported in his argument and unsupported by facts. What are the facts? First, the Canadian economy has been expanding at accelerating rates since the first quarter of 1970. Second, during the first half of 1971 the real increase in the nation's output of goods and services was 6.2 per cent at an annual rate. This is almost double the growth rate for 1970 as a whole. Third, the increase in the gross national product in the second quarter of the year at an annual rate of 8.9 per cent was the largest quarterly increase in two years. Fourth, demand for goods and services by business people in Canada is now advancing, with consumers taking the lead. The increase in consumer expenditure during the second quarter of this year was 4.3 per cent, the largest quarterly rise in many years. Even so, inventories are low, and this is a good omen for the expansion of output, particularly in Canadian manufacturing. Fifth, housing starts in the second quarter of the year amounted to 225,000 at an annual rate, and in August the rate was up to 243,000, indicating a record number of starts for 1971 as a whole. Sixth, total capital investment rose by 5.7 per cent in the second quarter, and business capital expenditures by 6 per cent. The mid-year survey of investment was recently revised upward by 2 per cent to 11 per cent. Seventh, increases in productivity have been high, but in spite of that the economy has produced 245,000 jobs in the past 12 months. These facts make a mockery of that part of the motion which alleges economic stagnation and, I suggest, seriously calls into question the credibility of the hon. member for Edmonton West.

But the motion goes further. The Conservatives declined to give second reading because proposals in Bill C-259 fail to provide sufficient stimulus. The motion indicates the need for, first, appropriate tax cuts, second, incentives, and third, exemptions. Everyone who has read Bill C-259 knows that it contains proposals for all three. One would reasonably expect, if the opposition intend to stop progress on Bill C-259 as they are doing by moving the reasoned amendment before us which, as everyone knows, would effectively kill the bill if carried, that they would have some solid reasons for doing so and, more important, equally solid proposals to put forward as alternatives.

I urge you reluctantly, Mr. Speaker, and other members of the House to scour the turgid prose of the hon. member for Edmonton West for any single substantial proposal that would even begin to accomplish what the motion seeks to commend. None can be found and, what is worse, an examination of the remarks of the leader of that party a day later on September 14 in the House of Commons reveals they are equally barren of substantive proposals. One can only conclude, being as generous as possible, that the opposition is not credible and is less than candid with the Canadian people. If they have serious reasons for moving the reasoned amendment, then we should know them.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Faulkner: The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) is rarely present in the House and he is trying to make up for lost time with interjections which I hope will be recorded because they are all we ever hear from him.

We should know what proposals opposition members intend to make in fairly precise terms dealing with tax cuts, incentives and exemptions. The speeches that have been made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the financial spokesman for that party, the hon. member for Edmonton West, have been barren of such precision. Instead, we have been flogged with attacks of all kinds to fudge the clear absence of plans or serious thought on the part of the opposition.

My position is that this Parliament should address itself seriously to the present proposals for tax reform before it. The protracted period of public discussion which preceded this bill has inevitably contributed to a sense of uncertainty among Canadians and Canadian business people. This Parliament has a responsibility to end this uncertainty and to establish tax guidelines for citizens and business alike and to do so quickly. To delay a decision unnecessarily would be to undermine the momentum which the economy has been gathering since early this year.

The motion speaks about unemployment. I want to say a few words about this as it relates to tax reform. But before I do so, let me make some general observations about the situation which we face. On August 15 the president of the United States announced a program designed primarily to remedy that country's deteriorating balance of payments position. Accepting the premise that something had to be done about the hemorrhaging that was taking place in that country, what is being sought by the U.S. administration is an adjustment or a set of adjustments with all countries sharing some of the load. Personally, I am not satisfied that the approach which the American administration is proposing is either equitable or appropriate. A working party of GATT officials referring to the surcharge alone described it as illegal and inappropriate and urged its removal within a short time. What is disturbing is that some—and I stress the word "some"—of these arbitrary measures proposed by the president witness the most prosperous and powerful economy of the world seeking to use its economic strength to force the cost of adjustment onto less powerful and often less affluent trading partners. Operating from strength may impress some, but in my view it does nothing to build confidence and stability into the precarious structures governing international trade and transactions developed since Bretton Woods, 1945.

The temptation is to retaliate, and many have urged this course. It is to the credit of those involved, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), and Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), and many others from other countries that so far they have resisted that course. They have recognized, and I suggest rightly, that such an approach could only compound the present problems, precipitate further protectionist actions, produce further retaliation in turn, compartmentalize trade, and generally contribute to the scuttling of the considerable efforts since 1945 to build order and confidence into international trading. Our task now must be to protect what progress we have made since 1945 and to try to use the present impasse to make further steps to improve upon the present order. In fairness, I think it must be recognized that the United States in presenting its proposals has legitimate grievances and does face serious problems.

Having said that, we as Canadians must approach the discussion of adjustments with certain things clearly understood. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it is the U.S.A. which seeks the adjustments. The Americans, and we all admit to this readily, are both our friends and allies, but they are also tough and single-minded people. Let me remind the House of what General MacNaughton said some years ago about Americans, people he regarded as friends. There is nothing in what I am about to quote which is unfriendly. It is simply an analysis. He said:

> There is nothing in our experience to date which indicates any change in the vigor with which our American friends pursue objectives which they deem in their national interest, however much this may hurt a neighbour who has unwittingly made a careless bargain in other circumstances.

This I would add, in my judgment, is equally true of other countries that will be involved in the negotiations surrounding the process of adjustment. Secondly, the United States has complained about severe and enduring trade barriers. We also have an interest in the adjustment of trade barriers. For six years I have condemned the fact that whereas Canada has been open hunting for offshore suppliers of heavy electrical generating and power transforming equipment, our people have systematically and blatantly been excluded from foreign markets, not including the United States, because of foreign trade barriers.

At another level, dealing with tariff adjustments and specifically related to Canada-U.S. arrangements, I have also condemned the fact that whereas we let U.S.-made bulk milk coolers into this country duty free, the United States has consistently refused to provide us with equal treatment. These may seem to be somewhat narrowly drawn examples but, Mr. Speaker, I represent people whose livelihood is threatened by these inequities. The point I wish to make is that as we enter into international discussions on adjustments that have to be made, we should be clear in our own minds what we want, clear about our strategy in pursuit of our long-term national interest, and determined not to make all the concessions.

Our record in respect both to our exchange rate, particularly vis-à-vis the U.S.A., and the absence of trade barriers vis-à-vis imports from other countries, has been excellent. We should therefore bargain firmly and from strength. Without wishing to be sanctimonious, I can say that our record within this area has been superb, and we can legitimately expect some concessions from other countries, including the U.S.A.

Let me look at one U.S. proposal with which I believe they should not proceed. Probably the most ominous and threatening of the proposals of the American administration is the proposal to allow U.S. companies to establish international domestic sales corporations to encourage American manufacturing firms to export from the United States. Secretary of the Treasury, John Connally, on September 8, in a statement before the House Ways and Means Committee argued for the DISC proposal in the following terms:

> In general it is designed to provide the same type of U.S. tax treatment for U.S. companies engaged in exporting as is presently available if they manufacture abroad through foreign subsidiaries. The DISC proposal is designed to create and preserve more jobs in the United States by causing a healthy expansion in U.S. exports, and by making it as attractive from a tax standpoint for U.S. companies to produce goods in the United States for export to world markets as it is for them to build their factories in foreign countries and produce abroad.

The purpose is clear. The intention is commendable, but in my view the instrument is totally unacceptable. In my view the DISC proposal goes beyond the proposals other countries have developed to support their export drives. If it is passed by Congress it will provide American manufacturers involved in the export market with tax advantages not available to any of their trading partners, and will seriously aggravate trade relations between the U.S. and other countries.

The Washington Journal of September 30 had an interesting comment to make in this regard:

> U.S. authorities who try to justify such activities (i.e. DISC) insist that other nations give incentives to exporters. They do. But such things are partly a matter of degree and few nations have gone as far as the original DISC proposal would have gone towards an outright exemption from income taxes. The U.S. already is inviting retaliation from its trading partners for its 10 per cent surcharge on imports and it is not likely that tense trade relations can withstand much further aggravation.

My comment is Amen.

From a Canadian point of view the potential impact of DISC will be extremely serious. For areas of the country like the one I represent, dominated by secondary manufacturing industries—mostly U.S. subsidiaries—the impact could lead to a sizeable number of orders being transferred to U.S. plants so as to take advantage of DISC tax provisions. This would lead to serious lay-offs in Peterborough, and in other parts of Canada.

The government of Canada has stated firmly and repeatedly its opposition to this proposal. It goes beyond what we believe to be a reasonable solution to very real American problems, and violates the spirit and the letter of GATT. Canada's position should not be to try to develop, through amendments to our present tax law, our own DISC, as some have been suggesting. The answer to DISC is not more DISCs developed in a spirit of retaliation. For a variety of reasons, most of which are obvious, these would be impractical.

It is important that we persist with our present strategy which is to seek changes in existing trade barriers around the world, changes in artificial exchange rates, and further strengthening of those institutions whose role it is to support international trade. The best long-term answer to America's present difficulties does not lie in instruments like DISC but in a more rational, open, and fair trading order. This will be to Canada's long-term advantage as well.

I want to turn away now from the question of what our response should be to threats to employment from outside the country to an examination of some of the moves we might make internally to ensure high levels of employment, adequate growth, industrial competitiveness, and a tolerable level of inflation. Back in February of this year I warned the House that the challenge to the Canadian economy was a global one. At the time I felt, and feel even more strongly today, that there is a need for consultation among leaders of the trade union movement, business and government, to formulate the broad lines of a national strategy.

In the past we have all gone more or less our separate ways, loosely harnessed by laws developed in parliament, with consultation taking place either in the heated atmosphere of the bargaining table or rather sporadically and inconclusively at ad hoc meetings.

I do not want to exaggerate the importance of a national strategy, or pretend that differences that exist between government priorities, business priorities and labour priorities can be simply and easily reconciled by some form of national body. In this business it is always a matter of degree, and to that extent I feel a more systematic and continuing format for national consultation among the three elements I have mentioned could provide a degree of improvement.

Today the Science Council has made a report available which argues strongly in favour of an industrial strategy. I have not read it, but I have seen the news report of it. In part let me say that I agree with the need for an industrial strategy, and agree strongly. If, however, the news report is correct I am somewhat disappointed that the council was unable to come up with any specific policy suggestions. I also feel that it is somewhat simplistic to argue that the state of attitude between government and business is a serious deterrent to the evolution of such a strategy.

On both sides there are very realistic and hard-headed people who are prepared to work together even where the climate is frigid. Leaving that aside, I still think it is important to look at some of the positive suggestions made in the report, and to ask ourselves how we can realize some of these important recommendations. One of the most important factual observations made by the council is that the manufacturing sector of our economy is not growing rapidly enough. It is not growing rapidly enough to meet our national needs and it certainly is not growing rapidly enough to absorb the skilled engineers, scientists, technologists which are emerging from our schools, colleges, and universities. As I pointed out to the House a few days ago, we have the fastest growing labour force in the industrial world. It is imperative, therefore, that serious and urgent consideration be given to the depressing fact that our manufacturing sector is not moving fast enough.

The Council also recommends that priority be given to industries with a high degree of technology—industries with a capacity to innovate, to compete, and to survive in an increasingly competitive commercial world. I share this view. I think it is important to recognize that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has in fact developed a variety of programs to support this sector of our economy. If these have inadequacies, I would have thought the council should have explored them in some detail.

The broad point though is that this country risks, in the short term, yielding to the temptation of living off its resources. Many of us have been concerned about this and have argued against it. The hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) has made a most eloquent plea for a neutral tax system which would stop discriminating against the manufacturing sector in deference to the resource based industries. In reference to changes in the tax law, I believe these views must be given new and urgent consideration. I frankly believe there is a consensus across this country that any industrial strategy should give the highest priority to processing more of our raw materials in this country. This not only provides greater employment possibilities but creates the openings which are necessary to absorb the people we are training in our manpower centres, schools and colleges. It is clearly also the long-term direction for an economy such as ours. Another feature of our national strategy must be a statement by the government on the matter of foreign ownership of our resources and industries. I see this as an integral part of our strategy and one which is acquiring increasing importance.

So, Mr. Speaker, I see the ingredients of a national strategy involving several parts. One is the establishment of a systematic and continuing framework for consultation between representatives of business, labour, and management on national economic goals. Amongst those goals which I detect are supported by a general consensus across the country are continuing adjustments in our tax law and government programs encouraging the secondary manufacturing sector of the Canadian economy in undertaking more processing of our raw materials here in Canada. Another is supporting and improving efforts to strengthen the pool of management skills available to this country, both on the business side and on the labour side. We need a policy on foreign ownership which will clearly dismiss from the minds of those critics of this priority, the silly notion that we are talking about excluding foreign capital from Canada in an absolute way. We should have a policy which will, amongst other things, simply regulate the form in which foreign capital comes in, where it locates and the purposes it serves. There is a depressing degree of nonsense being said on both sides of this question. Probably I might be accused of contributing to it, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, it is unintentional.

Finally, I believe we must continue the important and successful efforts at trade diversification which this government has undertaken in the past. If some hon. members want to dismiss the trips made by ministers as junkets, they are free to do so but I believe the trip by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the Soviet Union and the trip by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) to the People's Republic of China to be positive and constructive and in the national interest. Indeed, in light of some of our present difficulties I would say that developments and contacts in both the U.S.S.R. and China hold out important possibilities for this country. These seem to me to be the sort of considerations and directions which may in the long term contribute to solving the economic problem of unemployment.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say, as I said in the beginning, the amendment before us is nothing more than a superficial political manoeuvre. The bill attempts to delay and stop Bill C-259 which offers substantial benefits to Canada and Canadians. We are not promising Utopia, or the millennium; we are not saying that with Bill C-259 tax changes in Canada have come to an end. Not at all, we say this is a major reform, a major improvement and should be passed without any unnecessary delay.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): With respect to the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) for second reading of Bill C-259, Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). In view of the gloomy outlook for the Canadian economy, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the question period two weeks ago to consider changing the government's legislative priorities by bringing in tax cuts, the family income security plan and the Canada Assistance Plan reforms now instead of possibly six months from now. He replied politely enough, "Not at this time", but gave the impression that there was no urgency about the gravity of the economic picture in Canada but only urgency for this bill. Where is the government's sense of timing? And why is it that to obtain some minor overdue benefits for the people this government always insists upon imposing major burdens in the same package, burdens that are questionable and must be questioned? Being the authors of the economic misfortunes of this country and their own misfortunes, one would think that the Prime Minister and his supergroup would seize the opportunity to redeem themselves, even at this late date, by giving priority to these imperative and humane measures over Bill C-259.

Bill C-259 is palliative to some and punitive to others, but will do nothing to pull this country out of the economic swamp into which this government has steered it, both domestically and internationally. The ill-conceived and immature initiatives that have emanated from the government since the Liberal party became the "Mad Monk" party have poisoned our economic relations with the U.S. and have poisoned and threatened our collective security arrangements with the western alliance. Today we had an announcement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that we were going to shamefully follow the lead of Albania by supporting the resolution which will pitch Taiwan out of the United Nations and set a horrible precedent for the future. It will spell the breakup of the United Nations for sure. Shame on the minister and shame on the country. The minister was not always in favour of that.

Mr. Sharp: Always.

Mr. Ryan: I do not know what has converted him to such a position now.

Mr. Sharp: There is no question of chucking anybody out and you know that.

Mr. Ryan: Let me quote from an article in the Valley Messenger of Alhambra, California of August 5 last at page A, headed "Trudeau's Independent Line Costing Canada". It reads:

> In 1968, Trudeau inherited an economy from Lester Pearson that had some important things going for it. One of these was that Ottawa had influence in Washington and at European Common Market headquarters in Brussels as a result of Canada's team play in the western alliance, particularly in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the North American Air Defence Command and the United Nations.

And further, from the same article:

> Tragically for the unemployed, Canada is no longer represented by a government that can negotiate advantageously with this country's largest export market. The breakdown in rapport comes while the United States is going through an extremely protectionist phase which can, under the circumstances, only be detrimental to the Canadian economy.

Either supergroup, or the Prime Minister have consistently ignored warnings from Washington that the United States would react if Canada kept on provoking her. Now that reaction has come in the form of the American refusal to exempt Canada, her best customer, from the 10 per cent surcharge. Furthermore, it is unlikely that this present government will be able to obtain any relief from their DISC and investment tax credit proposals when they become law.

The only sane way out of our economic dilemma is for this country to replace the present anti-American government with a pro-Canadian government led by the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who is the only leader of any political grouping in this House who would be able to obtain the exemptions and considerations we need to protect our vast market with the United States.

This bill will give long overdue exemptions to some by shifting the tax burden to the middle income brackets. It will not help the economy now when the need is so great, nor over the bleak winter we face. It will, however, cause a great deal of consternation and confusion for many moons to come. Tax experts across the country have studied this bill all summer and have concluded that much of its content is murky. It is doubtful that the men in the finance department, who wrote the sections that form the whole, understand the monster to which they have given birth. Many interested organizations across the country have asked for more time to digest this monumental bill. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce in its submission on tax reform dated September, 1971, puts it this way:

> Turning to Bill C-259 itself, the Executive Council regrets, despite its concern about removing the uncertainty as quickly as possible, that more time has not been provided for study of the tax reform bill by taxpayers and their advisers.

Why is the government not giving the Canadian people this time by dividing the bill so that its exemptions and benefits may help individual Canadians in the lower brackets now, and so that its confused aspects may be digested and straightened out before they become law and not afterwards? Consider for a moment the small business incentive that the government has included in the bill. While the legislation provides a low rate of corporate tax for small businesses it has replaced the former rule, which was relatively simple and easy to comprehend, with new criteria which only high-priced legal and accounting advisers will be able to understand. The same situation applies to a majority of the provisions of Bill C-259. The government, with this bill and its verbose authors, seems to be determined to create an impression of efficiency. Rather, it will create litigation and a high demand situation for expensive tax advisers. I seriously question that these results should be the major by-products of a so-called Canadian tax reform bill.

At a time when jobs in Canadian industry are threatened not only by this government, but by the likely withdrawal of American markets and investments, the government is giving priority to passing this tax bill which does not provide sufficient incentives for the Canadian economy to expand on its own initiative. Moreover, the government is compounding the American actions, which this government did much to invite, by introducing in this tax bill measures designed to discourage Canadians from investing in their own economy. It is obvious that much Canadian money now abroad will not be repatriated. Rather it will be re-invested in jurisdictions where there is no capital gains tax, or a more favourable one. Much domestic money will seek to follow. The prospect of the withdrawal of both American and Canadian investments in this country and resulting unemployment should cause this government to pause for reflection before proceeding with certain aspects of this bill.

Many Canadians actually welcomed the idea of the introduction of a capital gains tax in Canada, not those who invested in stocks but those who invested in other areas, such as land and mortgages. They took it for granted that the rate would be no higher than the American rate of 25 per cent, if as high as that, and that any investment capital gain made outside of one's principal business would henceforth be taxed at the capital gain rate and all investors would therefore know where they stood in advance of accepting the risk. The investor's principal business at the time of investment alone would attract tax at the personal rate. This is the way it should be, but apparently it is not the way it is to be. This government wants to take all the joy out of life for Canadians with ambition.

Astonishingly enough, but perhaps not unexpectedly, the fact is that the government has failed to explain to the Canadian people exactly what a capital gain is. What definition there is consists of definition by exception, and that makes for an even greater ball of wax than before the proposed change. The present unjust common law precedents are often arbitrarily, unsatisfactorily and unevenly applied. They have been the cause of continuous and bitter litigation and are not specifically removed or displaced by this bill. There has been no attempt to change this unfair situation by presenting to this House an adequate definition.

Let me quote from A Review of Canadian Tax Reform by Riddell, Stead & Co., Chartered Accountants:

> The Bill does not introduce a capital gains tax as such but is so structured as to include in income "taxable capital gains" (one-half of most capital gains) and to permit the deduction of "allowable capital losses" (subject to specific limitations, one-half of certain capital losses). The expression "capital gains" is defined only by exception—they are gains on dispositions of property other than those that would otherwise be included in computing income, and other than those from the disposition of goodwill or nothings, mining or oil properties and rights, and life insurance policies. "Capital losses" are similarly defined but the exclusions are extended to losses on depreciable property which are dealt with under the capital cost allowance rules. Because income is not specifically defined either, the differences of opinion between taxpayer and tax collector as to the nature of the gain will continue, diminished in intensity only by the fact that what is at stake has been reduced from the difference between full tax rates and zero to the difference between full and half tax rates.

And what about the longtime Canadian taxpayer who in his declining years wants to settle in a more southerly clime? He is not going to be too happy about the provisions of clause 48 of this bill. I do not want to get into the provisions of this clause at the moment, but certainly it should be either reformed or tossed out before the bill is studied in the committee of the whole.

I would like to say a few words about the parsimonious tax reform the government has provided in the bill in relation to child-care expenses. I could not agree more with the member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) when he said that the exemptions are not large enough.

To begin with, the government has restricted the deduction for child-care expenses to $500 per child, and a maximum of $2,000 per family, or two-thirds of family income, whichever is the lesser. To me, it is incomprehensible to find a maximum set in this respect. This is surely one area in which payments are made solely for the purpose of earning income. Surely, the group which most needs encouragement and help is the group which includes working mothers, particularly those who are obliged to go out to work to help maintain large families. Furthermore, $500 will not provide day care for a child for a year in any urban or suburban area in this country. The minimum rate in Ottawa is $20 for a five-day week and it is likely higher in the larger cities. But, say it is $20. The deduction should be doubled. I say that the proposed deduction is unrealistic, parsimonious and inadequate. Since babysitters will be required to give receipts and become liable to pay income tax in the future, it is likely they will increase their charges by way of compensation or, as an alternative, withdraw their services.

Furthermore, the people who provide most child care services are either relatives or neighbours. The government has decided that the proposed deduction shall not be available in cases where services are provided by dependants of the taxpayer or relatives under 21. Mr. Speaker, as long as the payment is actually made and the services are actually performed, why should a person under 21, who is a relative, be discriminated against? I trust this unfair situation will be remedied at a later stage.

Another provision of this bill which reminds me of the days of the six-buck boys is that section which deals with the employment expense deduction. It is a miserable provision and is openly discriminatory. It provides that an employee shall be allowed to deduct either 3 per cent of his income or $150, whichever is higher, in order to cover the cost of clothing or special tools required for his work. What happens to the garage mechanic, or carpenter, Mr. Speaker, who likes to own his own tools and, in many cases, is required to own his tools to obtain employment? The sum of $150 is clearly inadequate in this day and age when a motor mechanic pays $4,000 for a set of good tools.

A doctor writes off the entire cost of his tools and equipment. A lawyer writes off the entire cost of his library. Why then does the government not intend to allow employees the same right? Does the government not trust employees to produce an honest accounting of employment expenses? The government has claimed that the employment expense deduction will redress the position of wage-earners with respect to employment expenses vis-à-vis taxpayers in business or in the professions. But it will not meet the need. Take the case of the motor mechanic. I am advised that even an apprentice looking for his first job must have $500 worth of tools and that a full-fledged mechanic is expected to bring to his job about $4,000 worth of tools. The wear and tear on this equipment is great and with new technology new tools are constantly required. Furthermore, losses due to theft, mysterious disappearance and borrowings are high.

I am advised by my insurance agent that a mechanic seeking to insure $4,000 worth of tools must pay an annual premium of $120, with a deductible of $25 with respect to theft, vandalism and malicious damage. So it is clear that in this case, and there are many similar cases, the proposed exemption barely covers the cost of an employee's insurance premium on tools. If the government wishes to remove this inequity from the tax system, why does it not place the employee on the same footing with the doctor or lawyer? Why does it not allow employees the same privilege—the privilege of deducting unlimited expenses provided receipts are produced? This is what must be done in all conscience, Mr. Speaker, if the government wishes sincerely to put even one equitable plank in the platform of its just society.

Mr. Speaker, I could go much further in my remarks concerning various other features and in my general observations about the bill before us, but I think I have already demonstrated my lack of enthusiasm for much of its content and its timing. Certainly, there is no real tax reform in Bill C-259. It will not resolve our current and future problems of inflation, unemployment and idle factories. It continues the over-taxation of the people of this country and gives no incentive to honest effort. Its tax exemptions are overdue and miserly ones. The amendment is correct when it states that the bill is not calculated to materially improve business and labour conditions in Canada, now or in the foreseeable future.

Have we not watched and waited long enough for the better things to come, only to find that the "better things" seem always to appear in the form of increased inflation, staggering unemployment and the burden of taxation which is causing even many of those who have jobs to go under, a scandalous situation for a country with the resource wealth of Canada. Your Honour may share my view that we are being led down the garden path in international affairs and down the drain at home.

In conclusion may I say that the very medieval size of the printed bill as tabled makes one mindful of the Domesday Book. Certainly, it is too long, and those who deal with it will suffer from indigestion. In the meantime, the tax jungle of the federal government is more impenetrable than ever, with the reactive legislation of the provinces still to follow.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, debate has been interrupted on several occasions since the House resumed sitting on September 7 and began its consideration of the measure before us, Bill C-259, which constitutes the Liberal government's response to the demand for tax reform in Canada.

I have listened with great interest to speeches made not only today but on earlier occasions when various members of all parties represented in this House took part in the debate. It seems to me the type of basic tax reform which was recommended in the Carter report five or six years ago finds no expression in the bill before us and that no attempt has been made to set up a tax framework which most Canadians hoped would bring justice, equity and economic growth. The government appears completely dominated by big business interests. If these proposals pass without major amendment, it is obvious that the present tax system with its many anomalies and injustices will remain basically unchanged. This was not the desire of the Carter Commission or of most of the economists who had hoped the bill before us would contain major improvements.

The Carter royal commission on taxation was set up by the Conservative government to look into the tax framework of Canada and to report on the distribution of the burdens among taxpayers resulting from existing rates, exemptions, relief and allowances provided by the personal and corporation income tax laws. It was also to look into the effects of the tax system on employment, living standards, savings and investments, industrial productivity, economic stability and growth.

The Carter royal commission started out its investigation feeling that Canada's tax system was a good one, and reasonably just. Several years later, after an exhaustive study which cost $3.5 million, the commission found that Canada had an unfair tax system. It found that billions of dollars of income were escaping tax altogether or enjoying tax privileges which lightened the tax burden. It made a large number of recommendations which would have brought about a far more equitable system of taxation in our country. Unfortunately, in the tax bill before us most of these recommendations have been ignored by the present Liberal government.

In the last election the slogan of this government was "the just society". To date we are farther from that goal than when this government was elected in June, 1968. Many of the major economic problems facing Canadians have been compounded by the foolish and weak economic policies of this government. One of the prime examples is that of the terrible unemployment situation which faces the nation today. Unemployment was deliberately encouraged by this government last year in an effort to fight inflation and it has taken its toll of Canadian society in the misery and hopelessness which it has created among Canadians, both young and old.

Just as the government failed to deal adequately with unemployment, we find in the tax measures before us another example of its failure to meet the challenge of setting up a just and equitable tax structure in Canada. If we are ever to reach the goal of the just society, it must certainly be based on a system of taxation which is just and equitable. The legislation before us proposes some needed changes, but cannot possibly be classed as a tax reform measure. It can never be the foundation upon which a just society can be based.

The Carter report dealt in detail with the privileged resource industries, and showed how they were avoiding paying their just share of the tax load in Canada. The report called for a redistribution of the tax burden so that wealthy individuals and corporations would pay their fair share. The result would have been that in 1966, $523 million more in corporation taxes would have been paid to the federal government, and $271 million of this would have come from foreign investors.

It was not only Carter who drew to the attention of the government the inequities in our Canadian tax system. This was also done in an excellent speech by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) to the Canadian Economics Association last June. He was a Liberal cabinet minister in this administration until he resigned his portfolio just over four months ago, apparently because the government had no intention of changing either its economic policies or its taxation policies as announced in the recent budget last June. An examination of some of the tables which the hon. member for Duvernay used in his speech will give a very clear indication of the unjust system of taxation which currently exists in Canada. This should be a clear warning to Canadians that present government policies have been designed to benefit big business and that measures must be adopted to rectify this situation. We do not find these changes in the legislation currently before us.

The following figures come from a comparison of "book profits" before taxes and taxable income, and the hon. member for Duvernay indicates that it is aggregated for the 1965 to 1968 period. We find that over this period those industries in the mineral-fuels business showed book profits of $795 million. But of this total amount only $45 million was classed as taxable income. This means that taxes were levied on only 5.7 per cent of the total book profits of those companies engaged in the mineral-fuels industry, which includes, of course, our gas and oil resources.

In the metal mining industry we find that the book profits amounted to $1,707 million. Of this amount only $222 million was classed as taxable income. Again this shows that only 13 per cent of the total book profit were taxable, and in this particular case $1,485 million of book profits were tax free. I must point out in passing that over two-thirds of the metal mining industry and the mineral-fuels industry, is foreign-owned and controlled.

[Mr. Harding.]

In other types of mining the table shows there were book profits of $374 million. Of this amount some $120 million was classed as taxable income, amounting to 32 per cent of the total book profits shown.

In the manufacturing industry there was some $12,745 million in book profits. Of this amount some $8,052 million was classed as taxable income. Here we find 63 per cent of the total book profits being taxed by the government.

In the construction industry there was some $993 million of book profits, and of this total some $643 million was classed as taxable income. This works out to 65 per cent of the total book profits shown by the construction industry.

In the wholesale trade there was some $2,066 million of book profits. Here we find that the taxable income amounted to $1,082 million. This means that 87 per cent of the book profits listed in the wholesale trade industry was taxable.

In the retail trade there was $1,620 million of book profits. Here the taxable income amounted to $1,445 million, which was 90 per cent of the total. It is interesting to note that in the retail trade most of the business belongs to Canadians.

We have every right to question this government's taxation policies when the major inequities which I have just outlined exist in our tax structure. It is ridiculous for the retail trade to be paying on 90 per cent of their book profits when the mineral-fuels industry, which is dominated almost completely by foreign interests, pays on only 5.7 per cent of its book profits. I should like to quote a paragraph of the speech by the hon. member for Duvernay which sums up the situation very concisely:

> If foreign ownership dominates the mining and petroleum industries, our tax system has clearly invited this concentration. We have not only extended a warm invitation to foreign capital—but we have told it where to go. If you invest in the service industries, we say, you will have to pay taxes on 87 per cent or 90 per cent of your profits. On the other hand, in metal mining you will only have to pay on 13 per cent and in petroleum on 5.7 per cent of your profits. The invitation says in effect—"Come and gut us".

There was another interesting section of the speech by the hon. member for Duvernay last June which I intend to read. It deals with investment incentives. Again, I intend to quote from the speech so there will be no misunderstanding. The part I wish to quote will be found at page 11:

> Investment incentives (depreciation, depletion, 3 year exempt mining income) apply precisely in those industries where foreign ownership is most concentrated, i.e. mining, petroleum and manufacturing. The sources of funds for American subsidiaries in Canada in 1968 amounted to $2,611 million (U.S. Survey of Current Business). Funds from the United States amounted to $127 million or less than 5 per cent. Within Canada was provided $1,027 million in net income, $864 million in depreciation and $539 million from Canadian financial institutions. Legislation to inhibit further inflows would be useless. Our tax laws are such that increasing ownership, takeovers and control of Canadian firms can be entirely financed from within our own economy.

There was another interesting table used by the hon. member for Duvernay last June which I feel bears repetition. In this particular table he was dealing with book profits and taxable income by the size of the corporation. It is for the year 1968 and gives the total in millions of dollars for all industries in certain classes. In those industries where the book profit is less than one million dollars per year, we find that taxes were levied on 76 per cent of the total book profit. In those industries where the book profits ranged from one million dollars to $5 million per year, taxes were levied on 70 per cent of their book profits. In the class where book profits ranged from $5 million to $25 million per year, we find taxes were levied on 64 per cent of their total book profits. When we get into the class over $25 million of book profits per year, we find that taxes were levied on only 47 per cent of the total book profits. It is quite obvious that our tax legislation is heavily weighted in favour of the larger corporation. The larger the corporation, the more exemption it gets and the less tax it pays.

I am quite certain that the majority of Canadians object to this discriminatory type of taxation which exists, and this is the reason Carter called for major tax reform. This is the reason the NDP is calling for major tax reform. We are not getting it in the bill which is currently before us, and it is time that Canadians insisted that major changes be made. I am convinced, however, that as long as the present administration is in power there is little hope for any adjustment being made.

A number of members have spoken about foreign ownership and the need for the processing of more of our own resources within Canadian borders, but precious little has been done about it by this administration. There is really no incentive in the tax measure currently before the House to bring this about. What has been the result? A short time ago the United States government put a 10 per cent surcharge on manufactured goods which come from our nation. It is very anxious to get the raw material which Canada can supply the basic industries established in that country. There is no doubt about it, the drive is to make Canada a supplier of raw materials for all time and at the same time have Canada as a huge market for manufactured goods to be produced south of the border. I as a Canadian protest very strongly this type of economic policy.

The reason we are in this bind today is the result of economic policies of not only this but past governments, governments of the same make and structure, which for years and years have not come out with policies which stress more fabricating of our raw materials within the confines of our borders. This would give jobs to Canadian young people. This is one of the reasons that over a period of years we have had increasing unemployment. I suggest it is high time we as a nation, and particularly the government, sat down and took into consideration the problems facing our economy, due particularly to this aspect. We should certainly be doing something about it.

Mr. Faulkner: That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Harding: That is not exactly what you are doing.

Mr. Faulkner: That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Harding: I could quote many instances of raw materials leaving this country in ever-increasing quantities, and no appreciable steps have been taken by this government to change that situation. I do not think they will ever take any steps to remedy the situation.

Mr. Faulkner: Which ones should we not be exporting?

Mr. Harding: I can mention one of our raw materials which should be manufactured in Canada, since my friend asks me. I come from the province of British Columbia where we produce hundreds of thousands of pounds of copper concentrates, and every pound is being shipped out of the province to Japan and the United States. We could have thousands of additional jobs if the provincial and federal governments had enough gumption to insist that a lot of these products be at least partially manufactured in the country of origin. That is one example, and I could name plenty more. I think this is a field to which the federal government should give encouragement in respect of manufacturing within the confines of a province and within the borders of Canada.

If I may I should now like to deal briefly with some other provisions in the tax bill. As I mentioned earlier, there are to be some increased exemptions for individuals. These certainly are welcome, but it seems to me that those in the lower income groups, including old age pensioners, veterans and so on, will not benefit too much from this legislation. There is no doubt there will be some tax relief, but every year that goes by—and this year is no different from other years—we see a 5 per cent increase in inflation which further erodes the purchasing power of the dollar and harms immensely those individuals on fixed incomes. It would seem that governments in this day and age should logically set standards of income which would reflect the minimum requirements of our citizens. These minimum requirements should be tax exempt.

If an individual requires $2,000 or $2,500 in order to get along in a year—and this is the minimum requirement set by those who understand the needs of these people and who have studied the situation—then it is idiocy to have income tax charged on any amount below that level. We suggest, for example, that the exemptions in this bill, welcome as they are, do not go nearly far enough. Single people should be exempt in the sum of at least $2,500 and married people should be exempt in an amount double that, or $5,000. It is bad enough to have inflation erode the spending power of these people on fixed incomes without asking them to pay taxes on income which they desperately need in order to sustain life or to at least have a little comfort in their old age.

In the bill before us, we also run into a number of other problems. I shall not deal with these at length this afternoon because I am sure that when this bill is discussed in the committee some major amendments will be moved in respect of one or two points which I shall mention now. These deal with the co-operatives and credit unions. We have received numerous briefs and letters from co-operative movements all across this nation, and from credit union organizations, because they would be adversely affected by this legislation. There is no doubt that in some instances credit unions and co-operatives will be affected so adversely that they will probably have to go out of business. If there has ever been a movement in Canada which has been good for the little people—the little farmer, the little individual and the humble wage earner—it has been the credit union and co-operative movement. Does the government now intend to get out the knife?

The government has already given concessions to big business. The Liberal party is a big business party; it always has been and always will be. Now, I wonder whether the government has the knife out in an attempt to eliminate these co-operative organizations and credit union organizations which have done so much to build up many of our towns, our businesses and our individuals in centres from one end of the country to the other. I suggest that this aspect of the bill be examined very closely by members in all parties, and that major amendments be offered in this regard. We cannot allow the credit union movement or co-operative movement to go down the drain because some individuals on the cabinet benches are blind to the needs of the co-operatives and credit unions in Canada.

Mr. Prud'homme: We agree with you.

Mr. Harding: Good; I am very pleased to hear it. The time is very close to five o'clock and I shall again be speaking on several aspects of the bill when it comes back to the House, so I shall not go into further detail at this time. However, I trust that in this debate other aspects of the legislation will be discussed thoroughly by members of this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, since it is now 4:58 p.m., I wonder if I could call it five o'clock considering we should now proceed to private members' business as listed in the order paper, and continue my comments at eight o'clock. In fact, if I speak now, I will use the two last minutes, because I intend to talk about the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Joliette. Is it the pleasure of the House to call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Agreed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill S-2, to incorporate United Bank of Canada, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR COPY OF REPORT RECOMMENDING 52-WEEK LIMIT ON RETRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the report by the task force in the Department of Manpower and Immigration which recommended a 52-week limit for all federal government manpower retraining programs.

He said: I do not suppose that in the history of the Canadian government there has been a department established which has grown in scope as quickly as the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The number of people working for the department and the amount of money spent have shown a spectacular increase in every year since the department has been established. In answer to a question put on the order paper some time ago—an answer which was tabled about a week ago—we were told that the number of people who are finding jobs as a result of being referred to the jobs by the department has been dropping each year since the department has been established. We were also told that the number of people who found jobs last year as a result of being referred to the employer by the Department of Manpower and Immigration was substantially smaller than the number of people who were able to find jobs in the last year in which the old national employment service was acting as a job placement agency.

At the same time, the number of people who are working for the department has increased in almost geometric progression. The figures given in answer to my question, which of course I do not have with me today, indicate that the cost of placing a person in a job under the old national employment service came to about $26 per person. The cost last year for the Department of Manpower and Immigration, if one only uses the number of people who are employed by the department in the placement field and the salary which they receive, has increased more than tenfold. It cost in the neighbourhood of $26 per job placement under the national employment service and now it costs something in the neighbourhood of $270 to $280.

I will not discuss today whether the department is doing a better job than did the national employment service or whether they are doing a good job, although I would say to members of the government and to whoever is replying for the minister that it is a disturbing thing to me to see the proliferation of private employment agencies, each one of which, quite legitimately in our free enterprise system, receives a pretty substantial fee either from the employer who is looking for an employee or from the employee who gets the job for fitting the person looking for a job to the job vacancy. It seems to me that there is something wrong, that the Department of Manpower and Immigration which has been charged by the government with finding jobs or helping people who are out of work to find jobs, is not doing the job which it should do. If it did, these private employment agencies would not be proliferating in every city in Canada.

However, the subject of my motion today is not the employment side of the Department of Manpower and Immigration but rather the training side. We embarked, as of 1966, on a very elaborate and very expensive program of manpower training. We were certainly advised to do so by labour, by industry and by the Economic Council of Canada. Hon. members will remember that the first two or three reports of the Economic Council came down very heavily on the side of a comprehensive manpower training policy to upgrade the skills and the education of the Canadian workforce. Hon. members will note that in many parts of Canada, particularly in rural areas, in the 1940's and 1950's a large number of people left school at grades five, six or seven, and it is very difficult for people with that kind of education to get jobs because most jobs which are available increasingly require the kind of skills which these people do not possess.

However, the last report of the Economic Council, which came out just a couple of weeks ago, made a very interesting point, namely, that in no country in the world is as much job training done in special institutions as it is in Canada as compared to training on the job, as it is in Sweden and many other countries. So, we have embarked on a very comprehensive program of job training but one which is also very expensive. It is not my intention today to discuss the details of whether or not our job training program is a success. That I think we can do best when the estimates of the department are before the appropriate parliamentary committee. But there are some very interesting questions which need to be asked.

If the government has decided, and Members of Parliament from all parties have agreed, that a substantial part of job training and skill upgrading shall be done under government auspices and in training institutions financed if not actually operated by the Department of Manpower and Immigration, then we have a right to study whether it is being done in the best way possible. We have a right to study whether the courses which are given are designed to fit the needs of the 1970's or 1980's or whether in fact, as so many people have complained, they have been designed to fit the needs of the 1950's and 1960's which no longer exist. As a result, many people take a manpower training course, complete it, cannot get a job, go back and take another training course. The department should look into the question of whether there is in fact a substantial number of people who have not had just one training course but three or four opportunities for job training. Some of the courses offered by the department in some of the institutions in Canada take longer than a year.

I remember one of my constituents speaking to me at considerable length and in great detail. He was a man with a number of years of experience in a business in which he has been fairly successful, but the nature of our economy and the fact that we are permitting a large importation of clothing from such places as Taiwan, Hong Kong, Japan and Mainland China have had a drastic effect on the clothing industry. This constituent of mine decided, therefore, to enter another field of endeavour. He chose a hotel management course in the community college at Winnipeg. The course offered by that institution is a two-year course, and yet under either the act or the regulations there is a limit on the time for which the department will pay retraining allowances to people taking courses under the manpower retraining program. That limit is 52 weeks. This problem was raised when the act was originally being discussed in the House. It was also raised in committee. There have been a number of changes in that ministry since then, but I believe it was the present President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), when he was in charge of that department, who told me that the government was studying the question of whether the 52 week limit should be continued. It has also been brought to our attention that the department assigned a task force to study the question.

If the government has information which can help Members of Parliament, representatives of the press, radio and T.V. media, as well as the general public to understand the reasons the government has adopted a policy, the government should do everything possible to make that information available. I happen to think that it is a mistake to limit these allowances to a 52-week period. I am the first to admit that I am not an expert in this field but I believe it would be much more sensible if the government had a flexible policy. If a course lasts six weeks a person should get the allowance for six weeks; if it lasts six months he should get the allowance for six months; if it lasts one year he should get the allowance for a year, and if it last 18 months he should get the allowance for 18 months.

The whole point of manpower retraining is that a person should get the training required to do a job. If a person wants to take a course which lasts two years, what sense is there in permitting him to start it if, at the end of the first year, the government says it will not continue his training allowances? In all probability he will have to stop taking the course, and he will not be qualified to hold a job in that field. The department has a responsibility in this connection because before a person starts a course it must determine if there is a reasonable chance that he will get a job when he completes the course. There are very few people taking manpower training programs who do not need the allowances.

Let me assure whoever replies on behalf of the government that if the report of the task force were made available to me and my colleagues, and we found it to be well researched and the argument for limiting allowances to 52 weeks to be substantiated, then we would no longer raise this question. I find it incomprehensible that the government should refuse to make this document public. I know it will be said that it is an interdepartmental document. But, Mr. Speaker, this is a government which has often talked about participatory democracy. It should live up to that slogan.

We have established Information Canada, which is spending I do not know how many millions of dollars to tell the people of Canada the things that they want to know. I urge the government to adopt a policy under which virtually every government document and study, except those dealing with personnel matters and security, is made available, not just to Members of Parliament but also to the media representatives and to the ordinary citizens.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should first deal with the request of the honorable member for the production of a report. The department informs me that there is not a precise and definite document on the subject in which the hon. member is interested. It has a series of memoranda and notes that were prepared by individuals in the department who were brought together to study a number of aspects related to the adult education and occupational training program, including the question of the 52-weeks limitation. Therefore, if a document is not produced it is because the departmental officials are not able to find a definite document, the document to which the hon. member refers.

We are grateful to the hon. member for raising this subject. We know that his interest in and knowledge of it extends over some years. When discussing the departmental estimates in April, 1970, the hon. member raised this question and drew attention to the weaknesses that he saw in this type of limitation. The hon. member is quite right in saying that the 52-weeks limitation is spelled out in the act. This is an act which was passed in 1967. I have not been able to find in the records of the votes taken on second or third reading of that bill, any vote recorded in opposition to it. At that time the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) was a member of this House of Commons. Probably this clause escaped his attention but that does not mean he should not now question the validity of it, having experienced a number of incidents several times at each level.

The requirements of this provision ought to be put on record again, as this might help to clarify the restrictions that are presently imposed. First, it has to be said that no course may exceed 52 weeks in duration; that is fact. Second, it has to be remembered that successive periods of basic training for skill development courses may not exceed 52 weeks in total. Third, successive skill courses may not exceed 52 weeks in total. Finally, basic training for skill development and subsequent skill training may not exceed 104 weeks in total. This means that a potential trainee could enter training for a maximum of 52 weeks and, having completed this training, he could enter the skill training for another maximum of 52 weeks for a total of 104 weeks.

Certainly a year ago these limitations might have caused some hardship to potential trainees. Even within the 52-week period, the person with limited education might not find it possible to develop his educational level from say Grade I to Grade VIII or whatever is required for the subsequent training. At the same time, a limitation of this kind has advantages because it puts pressure on the federal government to have a close look at the existing methodology of training adults. In other words, it promotes the incentive to find methods for achieving greater results within the 52-week limitation. Over the years, as the hon. member is aware, the department has taken several steps.

First of all, it has endeavoured to improve methods of training adults. Here we are dealing with mature people unaccustomed to the school environment, and there is a need to develop a new methodology to permit upgrading in a shorter time. The department also provided the incentive for experimentation with new methods. In this respect, the work of some of the New Start agencies has been extremely helpful as they have pioneered in the area of adult training with techniques and methods hitherto unknown which have permitted those interested in manpower training to evaluate the results of the experiments and make the new techniques available.

Having improved the methodology and experimented with new techniques and their application, one can perhaps still criticize the department. This, of course, would be fair except for the fact that there is a limitation on how the department may spend its allocation of funds for training. Ninety per cent of what was allocated in previous years to provincial institutions for the training of adults has to be made available in the subsequent year. This leaves a very limited amount available for experimentation, but nevertheless it is being done. A few weeks ago the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) attended the inauguration of a teacher training course in Prince Albert made possible as a result of New Start endeavours, and which will introduce new techniques for the teaching of adults. This is a classic example of a visible effort on the part of the department within the restrictions imposed by the government and approved by this Parliament to achieve greater results in a shorter time.

Surely, anyone in this chamber tonight knows, Mr. Speaker, that while the educational system for youngsters is structured according to certain traditional lines, it is quite a different thing when it comes to the training of adults. Surely, there is no human element which should hamper the acceleration of training techniques and methods which would raise people with limited education to higher levels in a short time. We must keep in mind of course that there are economic considerations. If no restrictions are imposed, it could mean that at the end of any fiscal year fewer people would be trained for the same amount of money. Some people could be left out because some others were receiving training for three or four years as the hon. member is suggesting should be done.

This does not mean there is no merit in his submission. He referred to a hotel management course in Winnipeg which required two years to complete in which potential trainees could not enroll because of this limitation. I suggest that this is the exception rather than the rule, Mr.

Speaker. Since its inception the main effort of the Department of Manpower and Immigration has been directed toward the upgrading of large numbers of individuals with a low level of education who needed a fast educational push in order to qualify for skill training which would place them in the various openings in various regions.

It is not out of the question that in years to come, having completed this phase of general upgrading and movement of some segment of the labour force from the non-skilled or semi-skilled into the skilled, that we would see the desirability of adopting some of the hon. member's suggestions such as providing for longer term training. It must be kept in mind of course that there has to be an occupational tie-in. The program was meant for the purpose of training people so that they could find employment and not just for the purpose of providing a general education.

At has already been stated before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, the average type of skilled development training is far shorter than 52 weeks. Once the training is completed, the trainee is permitted to move on, if approved by the counsellor, to the type of skilled training that will bring him closer to the kind of employment or occupation for which he is looking.

The hon. member made a number of other remarks that deserve attention. He quite rightly criticized the proliferation of private employment agencies, a criticism that is not shared by everyone. There has been a proliferation in this area over the years. I remind the hon. member that the matter of private employment agencies is under the jurisdiction of provincial governments. It is for the provincial governments to regulate their operations and even their existence.

Mr. Orlikow: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caccia: I will be completing my remarks very shortly. The existence of private agencies tends to indicate that there is in the department a basic general role to be performed in the training and placement of a large majority of Canadians. The private agencies are skimming off the top people with the type of education which means they can be easily placed in another job. Within a short period the agency earns its commission as these people move rapidly from one sector of the work force to another.

All that one can do at this point is bring to the attention of employers who are paying the agency fee that basically they are being taxed twice. They are being taxed once when they provide the funds which permit the opening and retention of 390 Canada Manpower centres across the nation and, second, when they turn to a private agency for a specific placement. Of course, in the kind of free enterprise society in which we live the employer is free to make his choice. This is probably one of the reasons for the proliferation of private employment agencies. It seems to indicate there are certain sectors where the private agency is quicker in its provision of services.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) wishes to ask a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I thought I made it clear that I was not suggesting any prohibition of private employment agencies. Could the hon. member, who I presume has spoken on behalf of the minister, tell the House whether the department has made any inquiries or conducted any investigation to find out whether the rapid expansion of private employment agencies indicates that the 390 Manpower centres are not doing the job as well as they might. The employers and employees of Canada would like to feel that the department, which uses a great deal of the taxpayers' money, is doing the job which is necessary.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, one could reply by saying that the 390 Manpower offices are active in placing the vast majority of Canadians who need their services, people who are unskilled, semi-skilled and skilled. The private agencies reflect only a modest percentage of service to the total labour force.

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has been making a great many requests for the production of papers, but in his request for a copy of the report of the so-called task force of 1968 under the Department of Manpower and Immigration he is in error when he states that it recommended a 52-week limit for all federal government manpower training programs. I am sure he realizes that the 52-week limit was established by section 2(d) of the Adult Occupational Training Act which provides as follows:

> Occupational training course means a course of occupational training which provides not more than 52 weeks of full-time instruction or 1,820 hours of part-time instruction.

When the proposed legislation was being debated on March 3, 1967, Hon. Jean Marchand, then Minister of Manpower and Immigration, said:

> We want to provide a second chance to people who need it most. These are the men and women who missed the chance to acquire a skill during their youth or whose skill has been made obsolete by technological change. They are the people whose whole lives can be changed, dramatically in many cases, by giving them the occupational training they need.
> Occupational training will be provided in course of 12 months or less. The experience of the last six years has shown what can be accomplished in this way. But it has also shown that many mature adults lack the basic arithmetic, scientific and linguistic facility they need to learn a new occupation. The provinces have developed accelerated courses to provide adults with this background material, and the program will pay for any such basic training that is needed for an occupational skill. To put it another way, our concern is with skills, but when people must have basic background to learn the skills, the program will meet both necessary parts of the total cost.
> The provinces have built up extensive systems for providing the type of training adults need. We wish to make use of these facilities and we will pay the provinces for training the adults we refer to their courses.

I think, Mr. Speaker, from what I have just read that it is quite evident that the members of the House were kept fully informed of the plans of this government with regard to the occupational training for adults program. During the same debate the hon. member for Winnipeg North said:

> I am sure the broad general principles enunciated by the minister will be welcomed by every member of the House and by every person who has looked at the problem in respect of full employment and manpower training and retraining in our complex society. Having said that we greet the general principles warmly, I must say that if one compares what the minister said today with the results of past programs he will realize the tremendous distance we must cover in the next year or two to implement the things about which the minister spoke.

We welcome the announcement of the minister that training allowances will be paid by the government to people taking training and that this will in no way jeopardize unemployment insurance benefit. We also welcome the announcement that one hundred per cent of bills for retraining of students will be paid by the government. This is precisely what I suggested during an earlier debate in relation to tax arrangements, namely that the federal government should accept its responsibilities to help those people who come from or live in "have not" provinces.

I am sure it is evident that we have come a long way since 1967 and that the training program is doing a good job for persons who need occupational training. The so-called task force of October, 1968, was really a meeting of representatives from the field offices with headquarters staff of the programs branch, manpower division, to review their experience with the operation of the Canada Manpower training program and recommend improvements in procedures and regulations. I am sure members realize that it is good business practice to obtain the views of those responsible for delivering services to the public in all parts of the country.

Regional representatives attending the 1968 meeting in Ottawa came from Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. From this gathering of experienced men we were able to gain much and to improve the program in many ways. The representatives at these meetings were certainly aware of the 52-week limit on training but did not recommend an extension; then simply recognized that the courses were limited to 52 weeks by the legislation. During the fiscal year 1969-70, 300,332 Canadians benefited from the various training courses offered by the program. This would seem to indicate that the 52-week limit does not seriously affect individuals wishing to acquire new skills.

Under the Adult Occupational Training Act the department purchases training services, primarily from provincial schools but also from private training institutions and from industry. It works closely with provincial authorities and educators in developing and putting into effect training courses suited to the needs of the labour market. During 1969-70 the department purchased more than 15 million training days at a cost of $115 million. The total expenditures for training during 1969-70 were nearly $250 million, compared to $190 million during 1968-69 and $105 million during 1967-68.

The types of training offered by the Canada Manpower training program include upgrading courses, the acquisition of new skills, language training for immigrants, apprenticeship and training in industry. To qualify for training, workers must be one year older than the school-leaving age in their province of residence and must not have attended school on a regular basis during the previous 12 months. Full-time trainees who have been members of the labour force for a three-year period, or those who have one or more dependants as described in the adult occupational training regulations, qualify for training allowances.

[Mr. Turner (London East).]

Manpower training is an increasingly important and effective tool of national economic policy. It improves the efficiency of the labour market by providing suitable people to fill vacancies promptly. It provides industry with needed skilled workers and it enables Canadians to adjust to economic change and take advantage of emerging employment opportunities throughout Canada. It spurs economic growth and productivity. In times of heavy unemployment such as we have been experiencing, the program is particularly effective since by training idle workers production is not lost and the training allowances usually replace other forms of transfer payments; workers trained in such slack periods form a pool of skilled workers who serve as an essential base and springboard for the next wave of economic expansion. Because many adults lack the basic preparation for entry to skilled training it is necessary to provide upgrading in key academic subjects such as mathematics, science, reading and communicative skills. However, formal, full academic courses are not purchased under the program.

Some of those who feel the 52-week limit should be increased are of the opinion that the federal government should take over the provincial responsibility for education and provide workers with regular secondary school education. They forget that the Canada Manpower training program is an economic measure designed to meet the needs of the labour market. It was never intended that the program would take over education and provide regular school courses.

Apprentice training is an important part of the training program, providing support for the classroom portion of apprentice training programs operated by the provinces. Language training is provided for immigrants who cannot find employment or make reasonable use of their skills because they cannot communicate in English or French.

As an incentive to industry to establish training programs for their workers, to provide broader, more transferable training and encourage industry to hire unemployed workers, the Canada Manpower training program provides support to training-in-industry programs. All the types of occupational training I have mentioned are limited to a duration of 52 weeks. It is only in the area of basic training for skill development that there seems to be a demand for training of longer duration. This is because people generally want the program to provide regular academic subjects for which, of course, the program is not designed.

It has been the experience in some provinces that by using modern methods of training, a great number of grade levels in mathematics, science and communication skills can be covered in a 52-week period. The majority of skill courses require a grade ten level education for admission and it seems that the vast majority of those who are referred to basic training for skill development are able to reach the required level within the 52-week limit. They then proceed to skill courses where they may receive a further 52 weeks of training.

The time limit on training was, of course, covered in the discussions as were all other aspects of the program. However, the purpose of the meetings was not to make decisions but to make recommendations for the consideration of management. As a result of the meetings a number of suggestions were made and put into effect.

Others required amendments to the regulations, and I am told that the recent amendment to allow a man to claim his common-law wife as a dependant for allowance purposes if the relationship has existed for one year is a direct result of the meeting. I also understand that other recommended changes will be made when the Adult Occupational Training Act is amended.

The papers prepared on the Canada Manpower training program during the meetings of October, 1968, were developed for the internal use of the department in improving the operation of the program. They are considered to be internal working documents and it is for this reason the motion is opposed. It is, as I mentioned earlier, good business practice to make use of the knowledge and experience of staff members. This is particularly true of an extensive program such as the Canada Manpower training program which brings an essential service to the various regions of the country with their differing conditions and needs.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, Canada is often regarded as a country of manifold opportunities, and in fact this impression proves to be right. There is no need to recall all the elements which gave us this reputation; nevertheless, it is in order to remember some developments.

Mr. Speaker, Canada has a labour force showing the largest increase in size, quality, strength, and I was going to say with much more education and training. All these are essential if our country is to maintain this reputation and go on progressing.

Canadian youth has understood this need; young people today are pursuing their studies beyond the college level.

For instance, in 1965 50 per cent of the workers 45 years of age or over had not finished primary school. On the other hand, 80 per cent of students between 20 and 24 years had completed their education beyond primary school.

[English]

It is accepted, then, that the younger age group possess, on the average, higher educational qualifications than, let us say, their parents. While this is all well and good and a tremendous asset to Canada, we must remember that the increase in educational standards may leave the older worker behind.

A second factor in the economic sector which affects the Canadian worker is the rapid level of change and technological improvement occurring in industry. In order to keep abreast of rapid industrial change and the demand for skilled young people, the Canadian worker finds that he must be relatively skilled. Now, if one is a young person without adult family responsibilities, it is a relatively simple task to adequately prepare himself or herself to enter the labour market.

But let us consider the very real dilemma facing the older worker who comes up against this problem. Think for a moment of this situation. An individual has been working for about ten years at a relatively unskilled job and he finds his skills are redundant. Technological advance demands that he must improve his present skills in order to continue in his job. If he is supporting a family, then his position is particularly difficult; he cannot satisfactorily attend a full-time educational course and provide for his dependents as well. The alternatives facing this worker are few. He may attempt to find other employment, perhaps at a much lower salary, or he may apply for training under the auspices of the Canada Manpower training program.

There is where the individual approaches the Canada Manpower centre for assistance and advice. He may, along with more than 1,100,000 others who have benefited from this program, spend up to 52 or 104 weeks—depending on his needs—in vocational studies. If he lacks basic educational skills he may take an upgrading course for a maximum of 52 weeks before proceeding on to a program of occupational training, again for a maximum of 52 weeks. If he supports dependants or has been a member of the labour force for at least three years, the trainee is eligible for a living allowance during the period he attends courses.

A follow-up survey of graduates in the training program by the Department of Manpower and Immigration has shown that individuals who have studied under the Canada Manpower training program are indeed improving their prospects of employment. Trainees completing a full-time training course are surveyed as to the success of their studies in real terms. Preliminary results show that the average trainee earns 15 per cent higher wages within three months of completing the course. This is understating the gain to trainees because many of them were limited in employment prospects before training, and also it does not reflect the full earning potential of the new occupation.

The improvement in employment prospects may be even more significant than the wage increases. Well over half the trainees in the follow-up survey were unemployed when they applied for training. Seventy per cent of these were fully employed three months after completing the training course. Over 90 per cent of those with jobs before taking the training course were back at work within the survey period. According to the follow-up survey, roughly 80 per cent of graduates from skilled and educational upgrading courses found employment after training, while only 40 per cent had jobs previously.

For the benefit of hon. members who are unfamiliar with all aspects of the Canada Manpower training program I will briefly summarize its working structure and major objectives. The Canada Manpower training program was introduced in 1967 to attempt to meet the training needs of adults in the labour force. The program offers upgrading vocational training and retraining courses, it provides for the acquisition of new skills, specialized training and, in the case of upgrading, the basic knowledge necessary to begin occupational training. The program also covers language training for immigrants, apprenticeship and training-in-industry.

In order to qualify for training, applicants must be one year older than the school leaving age in their province of residence and not have attended school for the preceding 12 months. Training allowances for those who attend full-time courses are available if they have been members of the labour force for a three-year period or have one or more dependants.

According to a departmental survey, the program is reaching established members of the labour force who have been working for ten or more years. The average trainee is 27 and is usually married with dependants. A substantial portion of the program continues to serve younger people whose formal training has been insufficient to make them competitive in the labour market.

The aims and objectives of the Canada Manpower training program may be categorized as both long- and short-term. In the area of short-term objectives we can include making the individual more employable through the acquisition of new skills, accelerating growth in traditionally slow growth areas and facilitating manpower mobility. Long-term objectives include ensuring an adequate supply of productive manpower to meet the requirements of the economy and narrow the gap between its potential and actual performance, and maintaining and improving the competitive position of Canada in relation to other countries.

The success of the program may be gauged in financial terms. Preliminary estimates of a cost-benefit study of the over-all effectiveness of the program confirm a ratio of benefits to costs of approximately $2 to $3 for every $1 of real investment in the program. I think it may be stated that from modest beginnings four years ago when it was introduced to meet a developing need in the economy, the Canada Manpower training program has become a major instrument in adapting to new technology, overcoming regional disparity and providing new income for the disadvantaged.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The time allotted to private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) (p. 7763).

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I think I am just on time, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to discuss Bill C-259 and the amendment dealing with unemployment, inflation and industrial development. This bill is nevertheless of prime importance in Canadian life.

The white paper which was tabled a year ago, discussed and attacked by some people is nevertheless valuable. Tabling such a white paper was a good idea indeed. This allowed groups and associations to discuss it and submit the necessary amendments.

Later on, many representations were made, and the government studied the required changes in depth. Those were also interpreted variously by the members. Some briefs accused the government of having backtracked, but the white paper allowed organizations to make representations. This procedure should be followed again in the future: it gives the opportunity of suggesting ideas as well as improvements.

Bill C-259 differs widely from the white paper. This proves that the government tried to offer the public a policy to be discussed. The changes in Bill C-259 prove that the government was willing to take into consideration quite a number of the representations made, which is all to its credit. We have before us an amendment dealing with the problems of inflation and unemployment. It definitely has some merit. It cannot be said that all policies introduced by the government over the past three years have had the results anticipated. Nevertheless, it is inaccurate to blame it all on the government. In all honesty, I repeat that because of the difficult economic situation the government failed to achieve the desired results.

Must I repeat here that if the Canadian government bears sole responsibility for our economic problems heads of state throughout the world have not fared better with administration, since the economic difficulties are world wide.

We have every reason in the world to make, in this House, as many constructive suggestions as possible, not in order to embarrass the government, as some take pleasure in doing, but to help it. Such is the role of every member in this House. If we performed the task assigned to us by our constituents, we would achieve much more concrete and beneficial results for society.

Bill C-259 contains good solutions. For instance, the personal exemption which has been increased from $1,000 to $1,500 for single taxpayers, and from $2,000 to $2,850 for married people. Need I point out to the ministers that, with the high cost of living, I would have wished, of course, like many others, that these exemptions be increased at least to $5,000 in the case of married people. We all recognize, Mr. Speaker, that a salary of $100 a week is not unduly high nowadays, considering the cost of living.

I must also give recognition to the government's efforts. Judging by the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) a few months ago, this bill is supposed to be of great value. I feel that the good will shown by the government is significant. Of course, we must continue to ask for more and to do better. I do not want to limit myself to criticism nor to discuss every clause of this bill. It has not lacked publicity and most hon. members are well aware of its effects.

Some amendments are very beneficial to Canadians, considering that some 800,000 of them will not have to pay any taxes and that close to 3 million taxpayers as well as industrialists will be granted great benefits.

This amendment does not give much consideration to the concrete results that will follow from the standpoint of unemployment and inflation. I would like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to remind the government that there are, nevertheless, excellent suggestions which may be made by hon. members and which take into account the interests and needs of each riding.

I had the privilege and, I might say, the good idea of organizing an information meeting in my riding not too long ago. That has enabled me to get better acquainted with the interests and needs of my constituents who in turn had the responsibility, in the various workshops, of making suggestions that I was to submit to the government.

These resolutions take into account the needs of all Canadians, and I would like to tell the House about them.

The government should pay particular attention to these resolutions which, I think, could eliminate unemployment to which the amendment refers. I think I remain within the purport of the amendment in making these comments for the government's particular consideration.

I will take agriculture as an example. Several persons of influence in my riding have asked me to make representations to the government urging them to establish a social climate which would improve the position of Canadians.

Farmers did not hesitate in asking me—and this is very sensible—to demand of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) a policy which could be established jointly with the provinces and which would guarantee free assistance to schools and hostels.

If the government is responsible for the health of Canadians, I am convinced that such a step would be of benefit to child health as well as to dairy producers who, last year, met with great difficulties.

I know that the Minister of Agriculture has often agreed to the demands of the milk producers, and I know also that the experiment launched three years ago in the United States to provide free milk in schools and hostels has been a great success. They have doubled the budget for that measure. Indeed thus we protect the health of the children and encourage consumption, which is really important for milk producers.

We know very well that because of the reduction of quotas quite a number of milk producers had to leave their farms. The government ought to take measures in order to ensure the survival of family farms. This is a way to make sure that milk producers get a higher income and at the same time to grant essential guarantees for the health of children.

As for the housing field, a resolution has been unanimously endorsed and I know that the removal of the 11 per cent tax on building materials has been widely discussed.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, my constituents are not indifferent to the results of that policy. Bill C-259 includes some important amendments which have been suggested, but it is also important to consider the possibility of removing the 11 per cent tax. If we sincerely wish to give a new impetus to construction, it is quite advisable to consider the removal of the tax. Several members have already raised the matter. I had the opportunity of discussing it and asking the government to grant special consideration to that policy. We have reached the point where we must seriously consider the removal of that tax, according to various unions and organizations of employers. It would be a way to spur the economy by enabling future owners to take advantage of reduced prices.

I repeat my request and ask the government to give special consideration to that policy.

It seems that the government is seeking various solutions, but it seems to me very simple and much more beneficial to take certain steps about housing. That would be a ready means to get people to become homeowners, and the repeal of the 11 per cent sales tax would also increase sales of building materials.

It is important for the government to convene as soon as possible all unions and builders in order to initiate a program to bring about an agreement with unions, employers, building materials dealers, and builders as well. In my opinion, if Parliament were to convene such a meeting which would go by the name of "New start in housing", it would allow the government to set up criteria and I think that it would be useful if they invited all parties concerned in housing to draw a comprehensive program for the next two or three years.

The government could on the one hand offer almost unlimited credit opportunities and would be entitled on the other hand to request particularly from labour unions some undertakings of their own such as a salary freeze.

Discontinuance of the right to strike could also be discussed together with a price freeze on building materials in order that future owners could really benefit from the removal of this 11 per cent tax.

I am sure that should the government hold such a meeting and offer unlimited credit opportunities, it would be very difficult for unions as well as for building contractors to oppose such a measure once a new start in housing is being considered.

I believe that this meeting should take place as soon as possible and I am convinced that it would enable many citizens to buy their own house at reduced interest rates. These unlimited credit opportunities would furthermore entitle us to demand from unions and building contractors that they make certain concessions to reciprocate the government's good faith.

I would like to take this opportunity to draw the government's attention on public projects in which municipalities are interested. We know quite well that the winter works program was dropped a little over a year ago. It no doubt gave way to abuse. However, we clearly recognize that the municipalities are facing financial problems. The government would be taking proper action in setting up at the earliest possible moment a policy to make a better selection of utility projects as far as the municipalities are concerned.

As to pollution, Mr. Speaker, the government should without hesitation set up a policy that would allow any municipality that wanted to equip itself with a water treatment plant to do so. When talking of pollution, one has to start at the beginning. If a municipality wants to equip itself with a water treatment plant the government should not, in view of the fact that the problem of pollution is after all a national one, hesitate to vote supplies allowing that municipality to acquire such a plant. This could be done through grants, and I do not think there is any other way of going about it.

I think the government should seriously consider granting supplies at reasonable interest rates not only for public utilities but also to municipalities.

In some cases, municipalities probably face financial difficulties. We know that only the payment of interest represents for certain municipalities more than 30 per cent of their budget. It is therefore easy to show the need for such legislation and I believe the government should consider more and more the advisability of certain recreational facilities for instance. Governments have undoubtedly tried to help municipalities in recreational matters. I wonder whether a really practical solution was found. I think a basis must be established at this time when recreation is becoming increasingly important and working hours are reduced. We must seriously consider the possibility of providing more recreational facilities to our citizens and I wonder whether the government should not consider establishing at the earliest possible date a policy of grants for some recreational facilities.

If we consider subsidizing the purchase of equipment, the building of arenas, the development of baseball parks or any other project, each municipality will be able to organize itself in a better way in so far as it is able to purchase equipment. The federal government should soon discuss with the provinces the granting of moneys for these projects.

This has not always been government policy but since people require more and more recreational facilities it is urgent to work out a policy enabling the large municipalities to provide for recreational centres and to organize recreational facilities which are as essential to grown-ups as they are to younger people.

I would like to urge the government very strongly to continue the Opportunities for Youth program. Resort as it might to measures consistent with bill C-259, for lower taxation or other benefits, though I am surely in favour of this bill, since it shows the government's willingness to do more and better, I feel that the government nonetheless is experiencing some difficulties while looking for simple solutions. Considering the tremendous insight I gained in my constituency last summer, I feel I am entitled to request from the government the resumption of opportunities for Youth program as soon as possible.

This is part of a resolution which was prepared at the local meeting in my constituency to which I referred a moment ago. The young participants at that meeting were very happy with its results and asked me to apply pressure on the government to have it announce as soon as possible the resumption of the program tough it should take care to make a better choice of projects, and to allow the necessary time to prepare them.

I hope that the minister will before long make such an announcement, so that more young people might participate in the projects next year, since the Opportunities for Youth program allowed several municipalities to increase the number of their instructors according to their needs.

[Mr. Salle.]

Also, I wish to say a few words in favour of the co-operatives and the caisses populaires. We know very well that Bill C-259 seems to enormously inconvenience the caisses populaires and the co-operatives.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I will refrain from tabling or mentioning all the recommendations I have received from the co-operatives and the caisses populaires. I know that others before me have dealt with the matter. I also know that the government has received many recommendations asking the Minister of Finance to give special consideration to the situation of these co-operatives and caisses populaires.

I hope the government will pay special attention to the situation of co-operatives. I cannot help but mention the importance taken, especially in the province of Quebec, by the Caisses populaires Desjardins, and I venture to think that Quebec members will not hesitate to give them their support. I am pleased to say in this House that the Caisses populaires Desjardins movement in the province of Quebec is important. I will give other members the opportunity to defend the caisses populaires or the credit unions. Quebecers can be proud of owning a movement crowned with success in the field of economy.

I trust that hon. members from Quebec, regardless of their political affiliations, will make it a point to ask the Minister of Finance to study carefully the representations of the Caisses Populaires Desjardins, which were successful in our province and should continue to enjoy advantages enabling them to continue to grow. In short, the movement is at the service of a community in need of it in the present economic context.

I especially appeal to all hon. members from Quebec, who are better acquainted with the Caisses populaires Desjardins, in order that the Minister of Finance will acknowledge in all fairness the importance of such a movement for the French-speaking people in the province of Quebec. This will certainly not prevent our backing similar pleas from other hon. members in favour of comparable movements outside Quebec and which are essentially making similar representations.

I do hope that all these representations and all these requests will sufficiently stir the minister and make him understand that co-operative movements, particularly the Caisses populaires Desjardins, really need the privileges they were enjoying before the introduction of Bill C-259 in order to answer the needs of their members who, finally, pursue an objective and an ideal worthy of encouragement.

I would not like to hold the House too long, so I shall not add to the comments I made because I am very interested both in the bill and in the representations from some associations.

Personally, I think the amendment deserved special attention, because of its importance, to remedy unemployment and inflation. But I also think that as it is the bill contains enough good provisions to deserve support. As an independent member, I shall be glad and honored to support the bill. However, I should point out that I did not miss the opportunity to require of the government that it pay special attention to various suggestions coming not only from me, but also from resolutions passed at a meeting that represented the opinion of thousands of Canadians.

I venture to believe that the government will give consideration to the suggestions I have tried to bring forward in the House. I support this fiscal reform which, viewed as inadequate by some hon. members, is still a step toward a society with a little more justice. Who could refuse support to legislation aiming for a more just society some of it involving an improvement within the present economic context?

[English]

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, Canada has had a brief romance with the concept of a neutral income tax system. This proposal was the recommendation of the Carter commission, a system in which a buck would be a buck to the tax gatherer and special treatment and special incentives would be removed. Such a system assumes that the best allocater of resources is the free market and that any cushioning of its effects by the tax system wrongly distorts economic decision-making. Carter acknowledged a place for subsidies and stimulative grants but he felt the tax system should not be used for that purpose.

That neutral concept of taxation has been abandoned in the bill before us. It has been abandoned in favour of a non-neutral system, a system which will stimulate growth, stimulate savings and capital formation, stimulate construction and plant expansion, stimulate regional development and stimulate Canadian ownership of our economy.

But, Mr. Speaker, this bill was conceived and designed on certain assumptions about the Canadian economy. I suggest that one of the most fundamental was our economic relationship with the United States, a relationship on which a substantial capital flow and an even more important commodity exchange is based. If this fundamental relationship of Canada and the United States were changed and we had a neutral tax system, that would be one thing and we could perhaps ignore the Canada-U.S. relationship. But with a non-neutral system, with biases reinforcing certain of our traditional relationships with the United States, we would have to reassess the whole tax system to see how these built-in biases are affected by the changes in the fundamental assumptions. These are the problems I would like to discuss tonight.

Canada-U.S. relationships fit into a pattern—a big, powerful country coexisting with a small one. History is full of cases of great powers coexisting with small neighbours, and there are other such cases in the world today. I think what is unique about Canada's relationship with the United States in this type of context has been the historic, fundamental decency of American policy toward us, which has meant for Canada absolute, if sometimes grudging, autonomy. Our independent view of international affairs is shown as we trade with Cuba, exchange ambassadors with China, condemn atomic testing and the war in Viet Nam and harbour American deserters and draft-dodgers. Contrast this kind of relationship with how China would react if its military deserters were welcomed in Afghanistan, or with how the Soviet Union would regard an application by Sweden to enter NATO.

In the economic sphere as well, our independence is visible. The American policy has not impeded Canadians in their aspirations to develop a high standard of living and an urban life style. The American investment in Canada by manufacturing companies and access to the American market for Canadian manufactures, have brought us real economic benefits. This attitude of partnership of a great power to its small neighbour has also benefited the United States. It has been proved that there is more to gain for its own people from the prosperity of its neighbours than from the bleeding process of empires past. In our secure and comfortable relationship, Canada has abandoned its traditional policy of fostering local industries behind tariff protection and has challenged Canadians to meet world competition in our own domestic markets. In this pursuit we have become America's best customer by far.

But the surcharge of August 15 and the prospect of far ranging U.S. tax subsidies to manufactured exports force Canadians to reconsider our relations with the United States. For this purpose it is immaterial whether the unilateral American act implies a new era, so far as the Americans are concerned, in their relations with Canada as such, or whether the Americans merely regard Canada's industrial prosperity as a pawn in their negotiations with third countries. In either case, our economic future is in peril.

I believe that the United States seems to have taken a narrow view of world trade. It seems to be labouring under an extremely static concept. For example, Secretary Connally has called for a shift of certain volumes of trade, measured in billions of dollars, from each of the countries with whom the United States does business, back to American production. This demonstrates a belief, I submit, that world trade is something like the children's game of trading marbles. Each child brings so many marbles to the table, and after the game some have more and some have less. The total number, however, does not change.

Mr. Speaker, world trade is not like a game of marbles; it is a dynamic, not a static thing. Total volumes are not fixed or predetermined. At the end of a successful round of world trade there is more in the aggregate than there was at the beginning. The process is creative; it generates expansion and wealth and can increase every player's prosperity. Everyone can win in trade. That does not happen in a game of marbles.

This is the dynamic approach the world had going for it in the Kennedy round. The United States should surely see, if it is seeking to use its economic power to take some or all of our marbles away, that it faces the risk, if Canada submits to such a policy, that the Canadian player who has contributed so much to the total process will be weakened or driven out of the game. Who would gain in such a process? Our first mission, therefore, is to clarify the United States concept of world trade and Canada's first place in it. What is the American concept? At the moment I believe their view of world trade is uncrystallized. I do not think there is a clear American consensus of what it means and where it will be. As a country which is vitally interested in this concept, I submit that Canada and Canadians should seek to play a part in the American policy formative process.

We all know that representations have been made by our government to that of the United States. But there are other initiatives which should be followed. Two weeks ago, for example, some distinguished American Congressmen, members of the Mills committee on ways and means, visited Canada with the NATO delegation. They expressed interest in exchanging views on these issues with our House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. This American initiative should be welcomed and followed up by our committee as rapidly as possible.

I submit there is a special role for United States subsidiaries which carry on business in Canada. To develop this point I should like to say a word about the implications of American ownership of so much of our economy. Many Canadians see our present problems and the American influence over us as deriving from American ownership. I have given considerable thought to the issue of economic sovereignty, as have all hon. members. I agree it is an issue which deserves high priority. However, I see it mainly as a political issue, one of identity or of psychology but not economic.

The fact of foreign ownership as such plays no part in our economic problems, in our problems of unemployment, economic growth, inflation, regional disparity, poverty, monetary stability or any other of our economic problems. Such corporations are generally just as good and valuable citizens as are Canadian firms. I have yet to hear an argument which says that foreign ownership harms our economy, putting aside the non-economic aspect, which of course could be the subject of another speech.

The great American influence over us, I submit, is not in their ownership of our resources and factories but in the fact that they are our biggest customer and, like any customer, they always have the right to shop elsewhere or manufacture at home the goods we export. In this respect Canada's position is like that of Japan and West Germany vis-à-vis the United States. Japan and West Germany are two great economies. No one could claim that they are in any sense owned by the United States; nevertheless, they have been dramatically affected by President Nixon's unilateral initiative.

In Japan for example, the value of stocks trading on the Japanese stock market has declined 20 per cent since August 15. During the same period in Canada the stock market has been virtually unaffected. The Japanese have also been forced to revalue the yen, moving it upward by 6 per cent. Japanese businessmen, like those in Canada, must be going to the government saying, "We want our currency devalued vis-à-vis the United States". But the Japanese government is in no better position to respond positively than is our own. And ownership has nothing to do with it. However great and independent these world traders are, the fact remains that the United States is their best customer too, because the United States is everybody's best customer due to its huge consumption. None the less, as a country with the greatest trade contact with the United States there is no doubt that Canada has been the most affected.

[Mr. Kaplan.]

Yet, although the American ownership of our economy is more a political than an economic concern, it has an economic dimension. That economic dimension has only become apparent, at any rate to me, since August 15. That is this: most of the American firms operating here also operate in the United States, often integrated on a continental basis. On the other hand, most Canadian firms do not operate in the United States and have no plant or equipment there. This is simply because the United States has a more mature economy.

The implication of this difference is that when incentives appear in the United States, like the DISC program, the Buy American program and the surcharge—which are all incentives to transfer manufacturing operations to the United States—United States subsidiaries in Canada are in a much more flexible position to take advantage of them. They are free to go where they will make the most money. Of course, Canadian firms are free to move to the United States and seek the benefit of these incentives. However, with Canadian firms there is the inertia factor deriving from the fact that moving to the United States requires a new kind of internal policy.

Let me, therefore, toss the question in the air: What are the Americans and other foreign firms in Canada doing to preserve their Canadian manufacturing operations? We all know one thing they are doing—they are coming to Ottawa for grants under the employment support bill designed to maintain employment against measures like the surcharge. They should be entitled to these grants on the same basis as other businesses. But what are these firms doing and saying in Washington? They are, after all, in a unique position to advocate free trade there. These huge international U.S. firms are the inventors of the concept that international movement of trade is a dynamic force increasing world prosperity.

Are these firms speaking for free trade in Washington as other good Canadian corporate citizens would if they had the chance? Are they pressing their case, or are they moving back home? Are they converting or preparing to convert their Canadian factories to distribution centres and warehouses for American-made goods? I do not know the answer, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to know it.

If we learn that the United States does intend a new economic relationship with Canada, with protectionist tax subsidies both for domestic production like the measure passed in the House of Representatives this afternoon, and for exports like the DISC program which passed the House of Representatives last Tuesday, if their plans are to return industry to the United States and gear our economy by market pressures, to the extent that we permit, into a conduit of raw material to United States population centres, it is very clear to me that the tax bill before us will need revision. We will need measures modelled on the American method.

Canada has its own industrial prosperity to protect. If the Americans want to reduce world trade to a game of marbles, in so far as possible Canada must adjust. Our tax act will have to be used to stimulate manufacturing, employment and exports in a way which has never before been necessary or, for that matter, which has never before been desirable. We will need a Buy Canada policy both at government level and in the private sector. These are the challenges we will have to face if our investigation proves that American intentions are what they appear to be.

Another proposal which has been made in this House is that we retaliate against the American measures by imposing an export tax on all of the resources which are exported to the United States. This measure is proposed on a false premise. I refer to the remark which the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) made a few days ago. He said we should have an export tax; we should go to Washington, not on our knees, and say to the Americans that they desperately need our oil, natural gas and other resources of which they are short. It is true that the United States has a considerable reliance on Canadian resources, but I submit there is no such dependence. There is a big difference between dependence and reliance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: I wish to refer to some of these resources. Pulp and paper are referred to as commodities which the United States desperately need from us. The fact is that American pulp and paper are substantially cheaper than the Canadian product. I suppose the reason for this is our climate. The fact remains that Americans are into Canadian pulp and paper, probably because of union problems.

Second, people say that Americans desperately need our oil. How true is that? The fact is that oil from the Middle East comes to the United States at times at $1.50 a barrel less than Canadian oil exported to that country.

Why do the Americans buy our oil at $1.50 a barrel more than they pay for oil from the Middle East? They buy it because it is important for them to maintain what they call an uninterruptable supply. If by our policies we indicate that our export of oil depends on their good behaviour, on our terms, I do not think we will have that protected market for very long. I do not think we will have that subsidy for very long. In any event, production of oil in the United States itself is only a matter of cost. At $3 or $3.10 a barrel they could be converting shale and tar sands to oil. They have no enormous dependence on Canadian oil: they have a reliance but not a dependence. What about natural gas? There is one thing you cannot get from the Middle East.

An hon. Member: Get it from the NDP.

Mr. Kaplan: In my house I use natural gas for heating. I am delighted to do that. However, if I could save a cent per unit I would transfer to oil. There is no major business in the country that is not equipped to use either oil or natural gas as fuel. They make their decision entirely on the basis of cost. Of course, if we were to cut off the United States supply of natural gas on Christmas eve or something like that, we might really be able to get them—but to argue that natural gas is a resource which is absolutely required and comes only from Canada is ridiculous.

The last resource I will itemize is nickel. I think I have covered all the main categories. It has been suggested that we could cut off the whole supply of nickel to the United States. That used to be true, but a lot of nickel is now being produced in other parts of the world. Another thing the advocates of an export tax do not realize is that our nickel production depends on the volume we sell. If we do not have big customers abroad for Canadian nickel, we cannot be in the nickel business. To withhold our nickel would contribute to cutting our economic throat.

I sincerely hope the government will not be sucked in by arguments, however politically attractive they might be, that we should retaliate with an export tax. We have to assess what the Americans intend to do with regard to us and our power of coping with the situation. We should direct ourselves accordingly.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) opened his speech by referring to a romance that our country has apparently had with other countries of the world, particularly our friendly neighbour to the south. After listening to many of the debates concerning Bill C-259 and the amendment before us, I am reminded that the Canadian people have had a rather short-lived romance with the Liberal party. We have spent some years listening to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promising us that the just society was just around the corner. We have spent some years listening to the Prime Minister, the leader of the Liberal party, telling us that the just society is here.

Mr. Faulkner: He never said that.

Mr. Gundlock: I will say something about that later. The debates that I have heard in this House have not suggested in any way, shape or form that the just society has arrived. As a matter of fact, it is probably the other way around: it is going around the corner at a very rapid pace in a way that is discouraging to the economy of this country and to the people of Canada. The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) said earlier in this debate that opposition members never have anything important to suggest.

Mr. Faulkner: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gundlock: I am glad to hear the member saying "Hear, hear". I point out to this House and the Canadian people that the strong suggestions and feelings that have been voiced here, particularly since last September, have not come from members of the opposition alone. In fact, some of the strongest pleas have come from the government benches.

Mr. Mahoney: That is true; most of the strong voices come from here.

Mr. Gundlock: This is in spite of the fact that certain members, including the Prime Minister, think opposition members do not suggest very much. They say our suggestions are not worth much. I remind this House and the Canadian people that when we reach such unanimity these suggestions must be listened to.

I see no better measure to try to improve the economic affairs of the country, particularly since the action of the United States, than a tax bill, especially one which is supposed to be so far reaching. I fail to see any change in this measure at a time in Canadian history when changes are so badly needed. One would expect some visible effort on the part of the government to improve the economy. Time and time again hon. members have drawn attention to the kind of provisions which are needed, but so far I find no indication that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is even listening.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is reported in today's Ottawa Journal as having something in mind to improve the employment situation. I point out that it has been suggested in this House over and over again, not only by members of the opposition but by members of all parties, that this type of action is badly needed. It is comforting to learn that after all these years of great suffering by millions of people, the Prime Minister at last has something up his sleeve which might create jobs. I was glad to note this, with its indication that after years of listening to talk about an improved society and the just society, the government is at last beginning to think about it.

As a member of the opposition, I suppose if I were very selfish I would say I am glad I have had a small share in bringing this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister and that he in turn has thought sufficient of it to bring it to the attention of the press. So we have some hope, at least, of a new society—one, perhaps, where people can work and save and enjoy a decent standard of living.

The amendment should be supported. My purpose in rising is to do just that and, as I said earlier, to call the attention of the Canadian people to the fact that there have been strong pleas—again, I emphasize, from all sides of the House—that the Minister of Finance reconsider certain provisions in the bill before us if not the bill in its entirety.

It should be borne in mind that our relationship with the United States has changed since this bill first saw the light of day. In this new situation I believe the minister should revise his thinking or at least withdraw the bill for a time so he may take a second look at it. This would also enable him to pay more attention to what has been said in this House on the subject.

Many hon. members have called for the establishment of certain priorities. In light of the changed conditions which are now apparent, priorities should be fixed which would offer a solid economic course for this country to take. Most business people, most of us here in the Commons as representatives of the people, and nearly all our leading economists have advised the government and the people in general that our economic course is simply one of opportunism, of drifting aimlessly about. It must come to a halt. This type of drifting is getting the country into a terrible situation.

Here we are, a beautiful country—as someone said the other day—and certainly a rich one, abundant in both natural and human resources. There is no country in the world which is any richer, and certainly we possess the knowledge required to govern us on an even, economic course. Yet what has happened to us? The government says, and quite rightly so, that it has a mandate from the people. However, I am not sure that Canadians would be proud of those who have their mandate if they had heard some of the debate on this tax bill.

One of my purposes in speaking tonight is to call attention to what others in the House have been saying. The intentions of members taking part in these discussions have been good. My hon. friend from Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) spoke on this subject the other day. He drew attention to what President Nixon had to say. There is no question that President Nixon is a world leader and is a popular leader of perhaps the richest country in the world. As reported at page 8355 of Hansard, the President of the United States, whose words were quoted by the hon. member for Malpeque, in his address to the U.S. Congress said:

> I ordered a $4.7 billion cut in federal spending, to allow for tax cuts to create new jobs.

That is a forthright statement to the country, and judging from what has happened since then I presume his country accepted it. That statement was made on September 9. We often hear it said that our economy is so closely tied to that of the United States that we cannot control our economy. I do not agree with that premise in any way, shape or form. In the first place, I do not think we need to be tied so closely to the United States economy, particularly in view of the richness and vastness of Canada and its resources. This is why to my mind the amendment moved by my colleague from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) to Bill C-259 should receive the support of all of us.

> I ask the Congress to consider as its first priority, before all other business, the enactment of three tax proposals that are essential to the new prosperity. These three measures will create 500,000 new jobs in the coming year.
> First, I urge the Congress to remove the 7 per cent excise tax on automobiles, so that the more than eight million people in this country who will buy new American-built cars in the next year will save an average of $200 each. This is a sales tax, paid by the consumer. Its removal will stimulate sales, and every 100,000 additional automobiles sold will mean 25,000 additional jobs for America's workers.

The President speaks very plainly. The tax bill that we are discussing is, for all practical purposes, several years old. Since last August we are in a completely new economic ball game, yet we are being asked to consider legislation that is behind the times. The Minister of Finance is doing nothing to meet the new situation. I am aware of no change in or amendment to the bill, and no suggestion has been made by the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister that the bill will be changed in any way, shape or form. Quite frankly, I think we are in danger of getting ourselves into a worse position, though it is bad enough now.

The Prime Minister has said in this House on many occasions that Members of Parliament are not worth a hill of beans. Each member of this House represents anywhere from 25,000 to 125,000 people, and when he rises to his feet and almost begs and pleads with the government to do something to alleviate the economic situation, you cannot tell me that MPs do not amount to anything. Some of the members of this House are the hardest working bunch of people I have ever met.

I have made reference to some remarks of the hon. member for Malpeque. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) also had something to say about the economic situation in Canada. She outlined who were the people who will be affected by this measure and she made a good, honest speech on behalf of the people she represented. She said, as reported at page 8356 of Hansard:

The result is that this tax bill continues to widen the gap between the "haves" and "have nots" in this country. It increases the comfortable insulation of the top 20 per cent of our population who enjoy 40 per cent of the good things of this world, and of Canada in particular, and makes more acute the humiliating poverty of the lowest 20 per cent who try hard to cling to their portion of only 7 per cent of the national income. Their position has not changed very much or, if at all, only for the worse.

I heartily concur with that.

Somewhere in between are the middle 60 per cent who are trying to climb the slippery slope to security while those at the bottom of the slope are sliding to the ragged edge of poverty.

That is part of what the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway had to say, and I agree with her. She then went on to explain how the elderly people would be affected by the provisions of this bill and asked what would be done for them. I wish the Minister of Finance were in his seat so he could answer that question.

What is being done under this tax bill to help the unemployed? What is being done to help those on fixed incomes? What is happening to those who have been on fixed incomes for the past five or six years? Last February a situation was brought to my attention. It involved a lady 82 years of age. She is a widow of a former captain in the Ottawa fire department. He retired after 42 years' service and went on pension. When he died, this elderly lady was left with only $133.61 per month because his pension lapsed. Her rent was $117.50 per month. This left her with $16.11 per month for food and clothing. What will this tax bill do for people like her? I was glad to learn recently that as a result of efforts of the Ontario finance corporation she is now living in a new apartment and paying rent of only $37.70 per month.

I cannot see anything in this tax bill that will offer any relief to people of this kind. We must have tax incentives. Members on all sides of the House have advocated the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. This may be a small item but it would relieve situations such as the one to which I have referred. Even members of the Prime Minister's party have supported this suggestion. But this will not be done through Bill C-259. That is why I support our amendment.

This tax reform measure first came to our attention in the form of a government white paper. I suggest it was not worth the paper it was printed on. That is the situation with which we are now faced. Many things have happened since the introduction of that white paper. We have higher unemployment, higher prices, lower seasonally adjusted manufacturing shipments, lower seasonally adjusted new orders, additional seasonally adjusted unfilled orders and higher seasonally adjusted inventories. That is what has happened in our industries—and it is not the result of the recently imposed surtax on U.S. imports. As a result of that surtax I am sure we can expect more readjustments. Canadian people, such as members of this House, are aware that the government has sent a number of people to Washington to negotiate in respect of this surcharge. I do not suppose they have accomplished anything. They might just as well have stayed at home.

Mr. Alexander: They should have picked up the telephone.

Mr. Gundlock: They should have picked up the telephone, for all the good they did. The lack of action by the government is very discouraging. We had to wait for the hon. member for Edmonton West to bring forth an amendment to this bill in order to do something constructive.

The support the Minister of Finance thinks he has for this bill is not really support: his supporters are simply saying that there should be reform which will be of benefit to the people of this country, without suggesting any specific reforms.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) to the main motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Lambert, Edmonton West) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Is the House ready for the question on the main motion?

Mr. McQuaid: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

[Mr. Speaker.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION REQUEST FOR EXPANSION OF FACILITIES TO TRAIN DOCTORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday during the question period I raised the question of medical manpower—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has difficulty hearing the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard). Would hon. members please keep their conversations quiet or conduct them behind the curtains in order that we may proceed with the "late show."

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I raised the question of medical manpower there was not sufficient time to deal with it adequately. First there is the shortage of established doctors, second the complete inadequacy of new doctors and, third, the moral issue.

Medicare was set up by a Liberal government and became the law of the land. It then became the responsibility of Parliament to see that the necessary doctors were provided. To put it mildly, there has been no real attempt to carry out these provisions. The profession is today unable to cope with the increasing medical demand of not only an increasing population but of an aging population, necessitating more chronic care. People are paying for medicare and feel they have a right to medical attention. This has put a very severe strain on the medical profession.

There should have been an increase, as recommended in the Hall commission report, instead of four years later graduating, in 1969, just over 1,000 doctors, importing just over 1,000 from foreign countries and refusing to provide the facilities required to train the necessary doctors needed to keep pace with our growing population and demand. In 1961 there was in Canada one doctor for every 50 persons. That ratio has dropped and we now rank twentieth in the world in doctor-population ratio.

In both rural and urban centres there is an increased shortage of doctors and lack of hospital space. As a joint program with national medicare, money was to be set aside, called the health resources fund. A fund of $500 million dollars was to provide the facilities, build the schools for training doctors and paramedical personnel. About the first thing this government did was to cut the health resources grant. This was patently dishonest and unfair to the Canadian people, cutting the services that they are now getting, and it was unfair to the doctors who are expected to pick up the overtaxed load of patient service. The emergency departments of hospitals are being overtaxed.

Because of the scarcity of doctors and their overload of patients, the sick find difficulty in securing appointments. Many people are forced to go to emergency departments of hospitals that were never meant to treat anything but emergencies. A large proportion of these cases are routine cases that ordinarily could be seen in the doctor's office if there were sufficient medical manpower. Instead of their serving the purposes they were designed for—to treat real emergencies, accidents and those acutely ill—they are being used to treat routine cases, often at the expense of those who are more seriously injured or sick.

This is a deteriorating situation across Canada today. To blame the doctor or the public for this situation is grossly unfair. People today move freely from place to place; they find themselves in a new city, needing a doctor. But most doctors are taking no further patients. Their only recourse is the emergency department of a hospital. I do not want to indicate that there is no blame attached to the medical profession or the general public, but the crux of the problem rests squarely on the shoulders of the government. There will be complete deterioration in medicare if a solution to the problem is not discovered.

The basic problem is one of the production of doctors. To say they are in short supply is an understatement. I do not believe that the government understands the situation, in view of statements made by responsible ministers such as, "The so-called doctor shortage is a myth". To say that the creation of an effective assistant and the production of allied health workers will solve the problem is not a statement of fact. We need about 2,000 physicians per year to maintain our current level of physicians to population. This would just cover doctors who retire, die or emigrate: we do nothing about those who go into administration, research or education.

Canadians are today losing their lives because of the shortage of medical manpower. They are unable to receive the necessary service in the required time. This brings me to the moral issue of the importation of foreign doctors. In 1967 we guaduated 923 and we imported 1,212. In 1968 we graduated 1,016 and we imported 1,277. In 1969 we graduated 1,017 and we imported 1,347. Last year we graduated 1,152 and we imported 1,113. Many of those imported come from foreign countries whose poverty is extreme, who have a doctor-population ratio of one to 5,000 or more and who badly need trained personnel in their own country. Furthermore, the majority of them do not have the high standards of education that we have in Canada.

Over 600 Canadian students last year had the basic qualifications to get into medical school and were rejected because there was no place for them. At the same time there were students accepted for medical school in other parts of the world, many of whom were not as well qualified as the 600 we rejected, and in a few years they will be emigrating to Canada to fill physicians' shoes which should have been filled by Canadian men and women whom were unable to train. Many other students wanted to enter medical school, but were rejected because they were not grade A or grade B students.

I think surveys that have been made in Canada and the United States show that grades obtained in high school have little relevance to the doctor who is turned out some years later. Indeed, many of those with lower grades have shown that they are better clinical men when they get out in practice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him is up.

[English]

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I do not think my time elapsed. I was held up at the start.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hon. member is quite right. If the House agrees, we should give him a minute or so more. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rynard: Dr. J. F. McCreary, Dean of Medicine at the University of British Columbia, deplored the waste of time and energy employed in selecting 60 students from 540 applicants and asks the very pertinent question: Is the ability to pass an examination any measure whatsoever whether or not a student will become a good physician? In fact, it has little or no bearing.

Therefore, I again come back to the moral issue: Is it right to take doctors from other countries? They are accusing us of doing it—see the article in the Ottawa Citizen of Tuesday, September 14, 1971, entitled, "Canada is stealing too many doctors". Dr. Matthew A. C. Beaubrun, of Jamaica, put the finger on Canada as the No 1 cause of their area's medical shortcomings.

We are in a crisis. The federal government is entirely responsible for the production of doctors. We brought in national medicare to enlarge the funds and put the facilities in gear for faster training, with more medical schools and enrolment of enough Canadian boys and girls to meet our medical requirements in the future. This must be done. I suggest to this government that they are derelict in their duty in this regard and that this matter should be referred at once to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Services.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out in the first place your recent promotion to the chair and to congratulate you for that honour which reflects on you and your constituents. I wish you a long term of office and the best luck for the years to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: In reply to the hon. member, I wish to say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has already stated that in Canada the ratio of physicians to the number of inhabitants is one of the highest in the world. This ratio is even higher than that in developed countries such as Sweden, France, New Zealand, Great Britain and Japan.

[English]

Mr. Rynard: That is incorrect.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member has been allowed even more than his allotted time, and I hope he will leave me at least the few minutes at my disposal to answer him.

The Royal Commission on Health Services has recommanded a ratio of one doctor for about 650 people. In 1968, there was one doctor for 740 people, and now there is one for 683. I hope that the hon. member will note the continuing improvement in that field. The increasing number of graduates in medicine together with the immigrant doctors will surely contribute to improve the situation, and the ratio recommended by the Commission will soon be reached.

In conclusion I would like to say that the efforts of the government are designed not only to alleviate the alleged lack of doctors, but also to improve medical services so that all Canadians receive good care. Indeed, since 1966, the government has already spent $216,000,000 to meet all those needs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary, but his time has ended.

FRUIT—REQUEST BY BRITISH COLUMBIA GROWERS FOR EXPORT ASSISTANCE—LEGISLATION TO PROTECT AGAINST DUMPING OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in contrast to the serious national problem posed by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) concerning the shortage of doctors in Canada and the effect of this shortage on the nation's health, my intervention tonight, dealing with the problems of the Okanagan apple industry and the strawberry industry in the Fraser Valley, may seem minuscule. However, I put forward my representations to the government on the basis of the old adage that an apple a day keeps the doctor away.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rose: My intervention tonight comes hard on the heels of the rejection by this House of an amendment put forward by my party designed to include Canadian agricultural exports within the scope of Bill C-262. I know that members of the Official Opposition who are constantly concerned about the problems of Canadian agriculture, and who provide a great deal of flak in connection with this matter, voted against this amendment to include agriculture within the scope of the bill. This is known as a parenthetical aside. Other speakers have spoken on the pre-eminence of agriculture in the total area of Canadian exports. Indeed, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) pointed out that United States imports from Canada amounted to 15 per cent of the total not covered by the particular bill we were discussing, which was concerned with aid to industrial production in Canada because of the United States surcharge. That measure was Bill C-262.

It can be pointed out that processed agricultural products could be assisted by Bill C-262. It seems to me we need to assist certain raw products such as wheat and rye as much as certain processed products such as Wheaties and rye whisky.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

My remarks tonight stem specifically from a question I put to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) on September 17. As reported in Hansard at page 7948, I asked the minister the following question:

In view of the difficulties faced by the Canadian apple industry as a result of the U.S. surcharge and also a poor apple crop this year, has the government yet made a decision on the request by the British Columbia Tree Fruit Growers for $64,000 in export assistance similar to that contemplated for industries in Bill C-262?

I received a reply from the minister which is known as a "nuthin'" answer—spelled "in'", not "ing"—to the effect that he would look into it. This was a month ago and I have not heard the result of his looking into it. I asked, further, whether, since Canadian agricultural products—not only apples and strawberries but vegetables as well—were constantly being threatened by dumped imports or foreign offers at distress prices, the government was preparing legislation that could be applied instantly to protect Canadian producers of agricultural products. The minister replied, rather self-righteously—as I think he had to—that when this was done by other countries it was difficult for Canadians to do the same thing because we have, of course, opted for fewer trade barriers as a method of increasing general trade in the world.

I have no quarrel with that, but I would point out that my party also favours a general lowering of artificial trade barriers erected between countries. Competition is fine, provided the competitors are evenly matched. I think we would all agree that when Montreal plays Toronto, the fight is even. But when the fight is between the Chicago Black Hawks of the NHL, with all their resources and capital, and the Kelowna Packers, in the Allan Cup it is obvious the strength is not evenly matched. This uneven competition exists in the agricultural field today, not only seasonally but in terms of production.

May I take a moment or two to give some of the background to the question I have raised. In the Okanagan we have experienced two years of low returns. The apple crops are poor this year. Banks are tightening credit. Fresh apples exported to the United States have been affected by the surcharge to the tune of an extra $66,000. We probably exchange about a million boxes each a year. There has been a large crop of pears in California, and as a result of this large crop, distress offers have lowered prices of these products. The price in the Okanagan is about $1.50 a box.

United States prunes are offered at 2 cents a pound, which does not even cover the picking cost. When we come to apple pies—and what can be more American, or shall I say North American, than apple pie—most of the apples in the pies in British Columbia come from China and Japan. Even our own public institutions, such as Woodlands School for the Retarded, import United States apples constantly, though the Premier himself comes from the centre of the apple growing area, Kelowna.

The United States has always maintained, despite the GATT agreement, the two cents surcharge or tariff against Canadian apples, while we have ceased to do the same. I think we need instant machinery to deal with threats like this to our agricultural stability. We have been talking for the past month, about certain measures to protect wheat and various grains, but I know of no similar measures to protect potatoes.

I see Your Honour is anxiously looking at me, but I would invite you to take a rest since I did not commence so soon as the previous speaker. However, I promise I will end my remarks almost immediately. I therefore ask the government to consider measures to remedy the instability of Canadian agricultural markets. Apple concentrates are being imported from Europe. The Department of Agriculture is making a study of the situation, but this has not been completed. Let us give an optimistic report to those engaged in the agricultural industry of British Columbia.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I see that my hon. colleague for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) would have liked to reply to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), because I think that, coming from that part of the country, he might have been in a position to specify certain points. But since the hon. member has said at the beginning of his remarks that if every Canadian—and I think he was right—ate one apple a day, the services of those among our good colleagues who are doctors would perhaps not be required. On this, I perfectly agree with the hon. member, because this would mean an average annual consumption of 8 billion apples.

• (10:20 p.m.)

[English]

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) has raised the question of assistance to agricultural producer groups and others on unprocessed agricultural products, similar to the assistance provided under the employment support bill. Members will appreciate that handlers of processed agricultural products, like others, have available to them the provisions of the employment support bill.

As the minister announced in this House last week, similar assistance will be available in respect of unprocessed agricultural products under the provisions of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. The Agricultural Stabilization Board has been authorized to develop programs on a commodity-by-commodity basis and the minister has solicited applications from producer and agricultural products distributor groups for assistance under the program.

The hon. member has raised the question of the apple industry. Departmental officials have met with officers of the Horticultural Council and plans are under way for a wider meeting with apple industry representatives to consider possible programs that will mitigate the effect of the surtax. I should also add that apples represent one of the items in respect of which the United States has announced that the tariff would be reduced to zero on January 1, 1972. If the planned Kennedy round reduction proceeds, the surtax should also be removed at that time since, the surtax is not designed to apply to items for which there is no tariff.

NATURAL RESOURCES—OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—FEDERAL POSITION RESPECTING SABLE ISLAND

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to disappoint the parliamentary secretary by saying I hope he does not talk about apples, because I shall be talking about oil, a commodity a little closer to his soul. I am talking about the essential rights of Nova Scotians. I am very much aware that the question of jurisdiction over Sable Island and its offshore mineral rights are inseparable. I do not seek to debate the whole situation but only the first aspect of the question dealing with the jurisdiction of Sable Island.

The Prime Minister's decision not to discuss the rights of the province of Nova Scotia to the territory of Sable Island, I suggest to the parliamentary secretary and to the House, is obviously a political one, made in a political context as the result of a recent Supreme Court decision. But I feel strongly that the people of Nova Scotia have a right to be heard in this House and by the government on the question of jurisdiction. On that basis alone a political decision has been taken by this government.

The Supreme Court decision of 1967, based on an historical analysis of offshore rights, which ruled that British Columbia should have control only of the lands with which it entered confederation, makes a good case for the federal government concerning mineral rights off the shores of Nova Scotia. That is not disputed in any arguments we are raising. Indeed, one knows very well that if the controversy again comes before the Supreme Court, that court must be guided by the precedent which has been established.

However, it is a rather narrow attitude to apply this legal precedent directly without listening to the special case of Sable Island and the people of Nova Scotia. It is true that the BNA Act lists Sable Island as property of the federal government in connection with lighthouses, piers and beacons—but only in that connection. Could the BNA Act provision be construed in the sense that the federal government owns only Sable Island's lighthouses, piers, and so on, and not the land itself? On the other hand, if it is the case that all of Sable Island is under federal authority, why did this authority not form a council to administer the island, as is the case in the Northwest Territories, rather than leave it to work things out for itself? I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that he not take that suggestion too lightly, although I do not expect him to deal with it tonight.

Furthermore, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick entered confederation under the terms that they would each maintain their boundary limits. I think this is clear. I believe that jurisdictionally it takes precedence over the other subsection, and this is a point of argument which will be raised. So far as Nova Scotia is concerned, this includes Sable Island. Indeed, by the Treaty of Utrecht of 1713, Sable Island was ceded to Acadia, a territory which includes present-day Nova Scotia.

Prior to confederation there was no doubt that the province of Nova Scotia owned Sable Island, and there should be no doubt today—at least, no political doubt. The province has recognized the rights of the inhabitants of Sable Island by allowing them to vote, for example in the provincial election of just about a year ago, as constituents of a county of the province in which I happen to live. Although I am not absolutely certain, I believe there was an opportunity for the people working on the island to vote by way of proxy as long ago as five years.

The Boundaries Extention Act of 1912 also supports the case of ownership, by the province of Nova Scotia, of Sable Island. Indeed, by this act vast northern areas, as hon. members know, which were well established federal domain since 1869, were turned over to the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba without compensation to the people of Canada. The same procedure was applied a few years later in respect of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and more recently Newfoundland. I simply ask the parliamentary secretary, why should Nova Scotia be turned down? As Mr. E. D. Haliburton of that province points out in an article in the Mail Star:

> The right of the three provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba to this northern territory is clearly analogous to the claims of the Atlantic provinces for offshore mineral rights. Our claim comes late because until recently such offshore mineral rights were not known to have value.

In the same vein, Professor Chester Martin maintains that in all former British possessions, Crown property was really the property of the community. In Canada, not only did the British colonial authorities recognize the right of local or colonial responsible governments to exercise full administrative control of these Crown lands and of the public domain, but the BNA Act, section 109, also stipulates that the beneficial control—this is important—of the public domain is vested in the several provinces. In light of such arguments and in view of the aspirations of the people of Nova Scotia, I cannot but reiterate the position taken by the leader of my party last evening in Montreal, when he said:

> The royalties on offshore oil should go to the contiguous provinces. This question should not be settled on a strict point of law. The tradition of equity in this country should govern, and the equitable solution is to make the royalties available to the contiguous province.

There are several questions which remain on this issue, and they will be raised until the problem is resolved.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the benefits to the Atlantic provinces of the offshore search for oil. That search will be stimulated and those benefits made more certain by the recent discovery on Sable Island. By the end of this year the petroleum industry will have spent about $130 million in the oil hunt off Canada's east coast. To date, 24 wells have been drilled. Assuming that all the work required to maintain presently outstanding permits is in fact done, the industry will, over a period of years, spend about one and three quarter billion dollars, half of which will be injected directly into the economies of the Atlantic provinces. During the current year, about $60 million will be spent on petroleum exploration off the east coast. Announced and tentative programs indicate at least double that activity next year. The Sable Island discovery may well accelerate these programs.

• (10:30 p.m.)

In this vast context, the question of whether or not Sable Island is part of Nova Scotia which is amenable to decision by the courts really begs the main issue. In late 1968 the federal government made an offer to the provinces which would have settled the division of revenues from offshore mineral rights, including those derived from Sable Island. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) again discussed this offer with the Premier of Nova Scotia a couple of months ago. It is well known that the question is not yet resolved. We hope that the Sable Island discovery will impart a sense of urgency heretofore absent in so far as some of the provincial governments are concerned.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.33 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 8, 1971

The House met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PRIME MINISTER OF MALAYSIA

Mr. Speaker: May I bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a very distinguished guest of Canada, the Honourable Tun Abdul Razak, Prime Minister of Malaysia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Even during his relatively brief tenure of office, the Prime Minister has achieved an enviable reputation as the enlightened leader of a progressive country and of a leading nation in the Commonwealth.

Just a few weeks ago, Mr. Prime Minister, your government and your Parliament hosted the annual meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I am pleased to have this occasion to thank you, your fellow parliamentarians and your government for the generous hospitality which on that occasion you extended to the Canadian members and Senators who represented the Canadian Parliament.

[Translation]

On behalf of all my colleagues, I bid you the most cordial welcome.

[English]

On behalf of my colleagues in the House of Commons I extend to you, Mr. Prime Minister, the warmest of welcomes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADIAN CULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF IMPLEMENTATION OF POLICY OF MULTICULTURALISM WITHIN BILINGUAL FRAMEWORK

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy this morning to be able to reveal to the House that the government has accepted all those recommendations of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism which are contained in Volume IV of its reports directed to federal departments and agencies. Hon. members will recall that the subject of this volume is "the contribution by other ethnic groups to the cultural enrichment of Canada and the measures that should be taken to safeguard that contribution".

Volume IV examined the whole question of cultural and ethnic pluralism in this country and the status of our various cultures and languages, an area of study given all too little attention in the past by scholars.

It was the view of the royal commission, shared by the government and, I am sure, by all Canadians, that there cannot be one cultural policy for Canadians of British and French origin, another for the original peoples and yet a third for all others. For although there are two official languages, there is no official culture, nor does any ethnic group take precedence over any other. No citizen or group of citizens is other than Canadian, and all should be treated fairly.

The royal commission was guided by the belief that adherence to one's ethnic group is influenced not so much by one's origin or mother tongue as by one's sense of belonging to the group, and by what the commission calls the group's "collective will to exist". The government shares this belief.

The individual's freedom would be hampered if he were locked for life within a particular cultural compartment by the accident of birth or language. It is vital, therefore, that every Canadian, whatever his ethnic origin, be given a chance to learn at least one of the two languages in which his country conducts its official business and its politics.

A policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework commends itself to the government as the most suitable means of assuring the cultural freedom of Canadians. Such a policy should help to break down discriminatory attitudes and cultural jealousies. National unity if it is to mean anything in the deeply personal sense, must be founded on confidence in one's own individual identity; out of this can grow respect for that of others and a willingness to share ideas, attitudes and assumptions. A vigorous policy of multiculturalism will help create this initial confidence. It can form the base of a society which is based on fair play for all.

The government will support and encourage the various cultures and ethnic groups that give structure and vitality to our society. They will be encouraged to share their cultural expression and values with other Canadians and so contribute to a richer life for us all.

In the past, substantial public support has been given largely to the arts and cultural institutions of English-speaking Canada. More recently and largely with the help of the royal commission's earlier recommendations in Volumes I to III, there has been a conscious effort on the government's part to correct any bias against the French language and culture. In the last few months the government has taken steps to provide funds to support cultural educational centres for native people. The policy I am announcing today accepts the contention of the other cultural communities that they, too, are essential elements in Canada and deserve government assistance in order to contribute to regional and national life in ways that derive from their heritage yet are distinctively Canadian.

In implementing a policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework, the government will provide support in four ways.

First, resources permitting, the government will seek to assist all Canadian cultural groups that have demonstrated a desire and effort to continue to develop a capacity to grow and contribute to Canada, and a clear need for assistance, the small and weak groups no less than the strong and highly organized.

Second, the government will assist members of all cultural groups to overcome cultural barriers to full participation in Canadian society.

Third, the government will promote creative encounters and interchange among all Canadian cultural groups in the interest of national unity.

Fourth, the government will continue to assist immigrants to acquire at least one of Canada's official languages in order to become full participants in Canadian society.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I stated at the outset that the government has accepted in principle all recommendations addressed to federal departments and agencies. We are also ready and willing to work co-operatively with the provincial governments towards implementing those recommendations that concern matters under provincial or shared responsibility.

Some of the programmes endorsed or recommended by the Commission have been administered for some time by various federal agencies. I might mention the Citizenship Branch, the CRTC and its predecessor the BBG, the National Film Board and the National Museum of Man. These programmes will be revised, broadened and reactivated and they will receive the additional funds that may be required.

Some of the recommendations that concern matters under provincial jurisdiction call for coordinated federal and provincial action. As a first step, I have written to the First Ministers of the provinces informing them of the response of the federal government and seeking their co-operation. Officials will be asked to carry this consultation further.

I wish to table details of the government's response to each of the several recommendations.

It should be noted that some of the programmes require pilot projects or further short-term research before more extensive action can be taken. As soon as these preliminary studies are available, further programmes will be announced and initiated. Additional financial and personnel resources will be provided.

Responsibility for implementing these recommendations has been assigned to the Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State, the agency now responsible for matters affecting the social integration of immigrants and the cultural activities of all ethnic groups. An Inter-Agency Committee of all those agencies involved will be established to co-ordinate the federal effort.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

[English]

In conclusion, I wish to emphasize the view of the government that a policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework is basically the conscious support of individual freedom of choice. We are free to be ourselves. But this cannot be left to chance. It must be fostered and pursued actively. If freedom of choice is in danger for some ethnic groups, it is in danger for all. It is the policy of this government to eliminate any such danger and to "safeguard" this feeedom.

I am tabling this document, Mr. Speaker, but it might be the desire of the House to have it appended to Hansard in view of its importance and long-lasting effect.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For document referred to above, see appendix.]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, these are excellent words in the Prime Minister's statement. I am sure this declaration by the government of the principle of preserving and enhancing the many cultural traditions which exist within our country will be most welcome. I think it is about time this government finally admitted that the cultural identity of Canada is a pretty complex thing.

[Translation]

I wish to state immediately, Mr. Speaker, that the emphasis we have given to multiculturalism in no way constitutes an attack on the basic duality of our country. What we want is justice for all Canadians, and recognition of the cultural diversity of this country.

[English]

It is about time the government finally recognized the validity of what we were trying to say in June of 1969 at the time of the debate on the official languages bill in the amendment we put forward then proposing recognition of the right to speak other languages and the importance of assisting in the development and preservation of these other cultures. The amendment said that we can accept the official duality of the country without denying the rights of other cultural groups. Our amendment was put forward for that purpose. It is pleasing to note that the government this morning is recognizing the importance of the rights of other cultural groups, although at that time our amendment was rejected out of hand. I am pleased the government has seen the light. But I must also say that, although this is all to the good, I regret that this statement was not made much more promptly.

Apart from what members of our party, among others, have been saying, it is a fact that the fourth volume of the B and B report has been available since early 1970, and I say in all sincerity that the failure of the government to endorse these principles earlier has created some suspicion, some doubts, in the minds of the members of these other cultural groups about the importance the government of Canada has attached to them. I must say that if the effectiveness of the government's action in encouraging the cultural self-fulfilment of the native peoples of Canada can be taken as any kind of an indication of what the practice will be in this broader field, apart from the statement of principles, then there is not a great deal of hope for the various non-French and non-British ethnic groups within Canada. With regard to the native peoples, there have been many statements about high principles but very little in the way of results and there is some doubt, to mention one example, concerning whether the government is doing enough in northeastern Alberta to help the native peoples study their own language.

It is fine to announce a principle, but perhaps the most important thing is what the government is going to do to implement this principle. When the Prime Minister uses a phrase such as "within available funds" we must keep in mind the importance of a balance here. There is no indication whatsoever in the Prime Minister's statement this morning that there will be any substantial implementation. I fully agree that a good deal of money must be expended for the encouragement of the development of bilingualism in this country, but I do not think that members of the other cultural groups with other cultural traditions are at all happy with the relatively pitiful amounts that have been allocated to this other aspect of the diversity about which the Prime Minister spoke this morning, multiculturalism.

The Prime Minister has announced the principles. We expect the Prime Minister and his colleagues to give those principles life and meaning, and we will look forward most anxiously to the implementation of these principles.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I must say, Mr. Speaker, that it is a pleasure to be able to comment on an important aspect of Canadian life that does not have to do with the economy or with unemployment, and it is equally a pleasure to be able to agree with the statement that the Prime Minister made this morning.

As members of this House know, I have not hesitated to criticize government policy, and no doubt a great deal can be said about tardiness and other aspects of the problem which the Prime Minister has put before us. But I propose this morning merely to express our support and our hopes in order to indicate to the people of Canada that this Parliament is united in its belated determination to recognize the value of the many cultures in our country.

Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep appreciation of both aspects of our Canadian cultural life, official bilingualism and multiculturalism, that my party warmly supports the principles set forth this morning by the Prime Minister.

I have often said that one of the most striking wealth of our country is the fact that it has been founded by two distinctive groups having two distinctive languages well known throughout the world. However, another wealth is also important, since we find in Canada some representatives of almost all the cultures in the world. To all Canadians, whatever their ethnic origin, I say that they must be proud of those two enriching aspects of our country.

[English]

Every society has its own cultural treasures which it cherishes with pride. It is a fact of man's history that his preoccupations have been too frequently centred on material development and that his spirit has too often been embittered by conflict and by prejudice. The result has been throughout the world—and this is true of Canadians as well—a failure to appreciate the values of diversity, a tendency to resent rather than to welcome enriching differences. For Canada this attitude is particularly destructive. The diversity of cultures across the land is a source of our greatness as a people.

To cite a recent example, when I arrived a couple of months ago in that small but great town of New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, I was greeted in literally ten languages, four or five of which I was able to follow without translation. If Hansard permitted, Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to express my pleasure at the Prime Minister's statement of principles in at least two or three other languages in which I could do so without breaking my teeth and in one or two others in which I could do so with some difficulty.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Go ahead.

Mr. Lewis: I say that to emphasize the importance of appreciating the cultural diversity of our land as one of the greatnesses of our people.

As a representative from Toronto I could perhaps say that even a serious subject permits of a little lightness. There was a time not so very long ago when there were jokes made all across Canada about spending a month in Toronto last weekend, and other remarks of that sort. But it is a fact that the influx of people of Italian origin, of Greek origin, of West Indian origin, of origins from many other parts of the world, has made Torontonians proud of their city in a way in which they were not before, and makes some of them even suggest that it is now a viable rival to the city of Montreal.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is a fact of society that every minority has a problem of survival. It has a problem of assimilation. It has a problem of keeping alive.

An hon. Member: The NDP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or the Liberal party in British Columbia.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I must admit that at first I was annoyed by that vapid and rather stupid remark from the other side of the House by the hon. member for New Westminster, but I decided that perhaps the hon. member was trying to be funny and, if he did not succeed, that may not be his fault.

Mr. Hees: He did pretty well.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if I may become serious again, I suggest that the important point that faces us is that in every society a minority has a problem, the problem of survival, the problem of keeping alive its history, its language, its traditions, its songs, its legends, its identity. When the majority in a society is as cruel as majorities have often been, not only are minorities crushed but the spirit of that society, the soul of that society, is destroyed. It is in that spirit, therefore, that on behalf of my party I welcome the Prime Minister's statement without any reservations.

• (11:30 a.m.)

I make only these two short comments in conclusion. I suggest that our failure in this area in the past was not the fault of any one government or any one level of government in Canada. It has been a failure of all our people across this country, a failure of Canadians to appreciate the importance of these things, a failure of Canadians in their neglect of the native peoples of this country. I am not saying this to needle the Prime Minister or the government but I say, because I believe it to be true. The statement of principles will be a mockery and a betrayal of high ideals and objectives unless collectively we provide the funds to make the principles meaningful in the lives of the minorities in Canada, and unless we develop programs in consultation with the minorities, giving them every opportunity to participate in the development of programs rather than imposing such programs on them. Democracy requires this kind of consideration, and with all my heart I hope that the statement of principles will be followed with action which will make us all proud of our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, even if I do not always agree with the Prime Minister on various points, I fully agree with the statement he made this morning. Indeed, I have been repeating for 30 years, to those who will hear me, and those who won't, that we have one Canadian nation and not two, three or ten, that we have two official languages, English and French, and that we have a multiplicity of cultures which are the wealth of our country.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and myself are happy the Prime Minister made that statement. However, I find this statement somewhat confusing. The Prime Minister has stated and I quote:

> For although there are two official languages, there is no official culture, nor does any ethnic group take precedence over any other. No citizen or group of citizens is other than Canadian . . .

Mr. Speaker, if there is no official culture in Canada, I do not see how we could succeed in really becoming a nation while we would be endowed with only a few cultures unable to get on among themselves or at war with one another. I am positive that we have in Canada a culture peculiar to us. We French Canadians have one that is not at all that of France, just as English-speaking Canadians have a culture which is different from that of Englishmen from England. We have our own Canadian culture. We have our history. Our traditions and customs may differ from one area or ethnic group to another. However, if we cannot change an Englishman into a Frenchman, or vice versa, we can nonetheless make good Canadians out of members of all ethnic groups in Canada.

Ukrainians, Italians and Germans must be able to attain self-fulfilment in Canada.

I am absolutely convinced that Canadians in general share the views expressed this morning by the Prime Minister. So there is no reason to worry. There is trouble in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada. Some say that if things are going wrong, it is the fault of French Canadians or English Canadians, or because we welcome too many immigrants, and so on.

[Mr. Lewis.]

[English]

What I said in French was that we do not want to have in Canada a little France, a little England, a little Italy or a little Russia. We want in Canada a great country for all the people of Canada, for all the ethnic groups in our country. Through that channel we will achieve unity and we will reinforce our position in the whole world.

UNITED NATIONS

ALBANIAN RESOLUTION TO EXPEL TAIWAN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion dealing with an important aspect of the conduct of this country's foreign policy, namely, the announced intention of the Canadian United Nations delegation to vote for the Albanian resolution calling for the expulsion of a member of the United Nations.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave):

> That, before Canada's vote is cast on this very serious, important and portentous resolution that the question be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence for full discussion and consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Hillsborough. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INCREASE IN MURDERS IN MONTREAL AND PROVINCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 regarding an extremely important matter and I would ask for unanimous consent to put the said motion. As of this date 40 violent murders have taken place in Montreal during 1971, which constitutes an all-time record for that city. At the same time, 78 murders have taken place in western Quebec and the province as a whole is also moving toward a record in this regard. A good many of these murders appear to have been carried out by organized criminal groups. I might point out that the same thing is taking place in other provinces but I do not have the statistics. I would therefore move:

> That the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs be instructed to conduct an inquiry into the causes and nature of violent crime in Canada, and that recommendations be formulated for the amendment of the appropriate criminal law statutes.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce under Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: Who said no?

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, so there will be no misunderstanding on this matter and in view of the difficulties we had last time, let it be recorded that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was the one who said no.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is completely false. I did not make any comment. The member is—

An hon. Member: Will you support it?

Mr. Bell: What other flunkey did it for you?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT WILLINGNESS TO RESUME DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON AUTO PACT BUT NOT ON ENERGY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Minister of National Revenue is reported to have said yesterday that the Canadian government is ready to resume discussions with the United States at any time on the auto pact agreement and that the United States authorities have been so informed. Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether this is a statement of government policy and whether in fact such a message has been communicated to the United States authorities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a statement of government policy. In his speech the minister indicated that the discussions had been going on when President Nixon's statement was made in the middle of August and that we have always taken the position that we are prepared to keep on with the discussions. What we have said is that discussions on the auto pact were not linked in our minds to the question of the surcharge. They had begun before and we have felt they can continue at any time.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the Prime Minister's answer I wonder whether he could clarify to the House how he reconciles our willingness to continue discussions with the United States on this matter with the message that the government sent to the United States that it was unprepared at this time to resume talks with that government on energy policies because our ministers and officials were too busy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some reservations about the form of the question and the way in which it was asked by the Leader of the Opposition. I really do not think it is in order for a member to ask the government how one statement is reconciled with another. That is obviously debate. Perhaps the question might be asked in another form.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in the light of the apparent conflict, perhaps the Prime Minister would indicate briefly what the position of the government is.

Mr. Trudeau: The position of the government is that we cannot do all things at all times. In this case the discussion of the auto pact had begun, it was in train, and we have the officials and the policy which permit us to continue discussions. In the case of energy discussions, we are not at this time prepared to continue them because we do not have the wherewithal, the personnel and the time to arrive at a decision. We want further discussions on that.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the Prime Minister insisting, as the Minister of National Revenue has insisted, that the discussions relating to the auto pact are not connected in any way with the surtax? Does this not mean, logically, that the government's refusal to proceed with the discussion of energy matters is related to the surtax?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON SAFEGUARDS AND CANADIAN VALUE ADDED CONTENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. Given the persistent and ambivalent confusion of the government's position on the automotive pact, would the minister consider making a statement early next week on the government's policy respecting the automotive industry at this time and, in particular, dealing with two points? First, would he indicate the government's intention with regard to the safeguards which already exist within the automotive agreement? Second, would he indicate to the House whether or not the government intends to make clear to the Americans that we will not be content with automotive production in this country until the terms of the automotive agreement provide for a minimum 100 per cent level of Canadian value added content for North American automobiles sold in this country?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think the position of the government on the automotive agreement is very clear. We have said that we would enter into discussions with the United States on this pact at any time. As a matter of fact, the pact itself says that either party must, so there is nothing ominous in the position we take. With respect to the safeguards, the Prime Minister and I and others have repeated that these are debatable subjects, that the important thing is to make sure that there is continued benefit under this agreement for both Canada and the United States. With respect to the objective of 100 per cent Canadian value added, this is not in the pact itself. This is an extrapolation that my hon. friend makes from the pact, which seems to him to be a reasonable objective, but others could have different views and even think that this is not sufficient. These are all debatable points and we are willing to talk them over with other people.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby for one further supplementary and then recognize the hon. member.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that the objective of 100 per cent CVA is not in the pact. Is the government of Canada, in terms of its negotiating position on this issue, insisting or requesting that this be added to the pact?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the problem with targets is that they are either too high or too low. If you set a target that is too high and you fail to reach it, you are in trouble. If you set it too low and you overpass the target, you are also in trouble.

MEASURES TO LIMIT INFLATION AND KEEP CANADIAN PRODUCTS COMPETITIVE IN UNITED STATES MARKET

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. As it is obvious that Canadian products must remain competitive if they are to continue to compete successfully in the United States market, is it the intention of the government in the near future to introduce measures designed to keep inflation in Canada from increasing at a rate greater than between 2 per cent and 3 per cent per year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have the situation under review.

Mr. Hees: I think we need more than a review to deal with this matter. Is it the view of the government that Canadian products can continue to compete successfully in the United States market inasmuch as it was announced last night that inflation in that country will be strictly controlled within certain tight limits while inflation in Canada is increasing at a rate which during the last two months reached an annual rate of 9 per cent per year?

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Trudeau: Nonsense, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What the hell are you going to do about it? Is the government going to continue to do nothing?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: The worst inflation is among parliamentary secretaries.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Hees: What a Prime Minister and what a government! My lord! No wonder we are in such a mess.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for York South.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROGRAM TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT THIS WINTER—SUBMISSION OF DETAILS TO PROVINCES FOR CONSIDERATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I know it has been asked several times recently. May I ask precisely when the House may expect an announcement of the government's program to deal with unemployment this winter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Oh, is that not sweet?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, since the federal government's policy program is likely to need the involvement of other levels of government, may I ask the Prime Minister why the government is delaying so long that it becomes increasingly more difficult every day for such a program to be of value?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative. I suggest to the hon. member that in those terms it is not in order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase it. I hope the Prime Minister will not deal with the unemployment problem in the flippant way he usually does.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: He does that because he does not care.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The second supplementary is not an improvement on the first. I suggest to the hon. member that he should ask the question directly.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, since other levels of government will no doubt have to participate in implementing any program that the government may announce, are the outlines of the program now being considered by the government before any of the provincial governments for their discussion and understanding in preparation for their part and the part of municipalities in the program?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, some ideas have been put forth by some provincial governments as to ways in which the government and the country should be dealing with unemployment. We ourselves are considering others. The federal government is not standing in the way of any actions by provincial governments if they want to proceed on their own. I am merely saying that when we have a package to put to the provinces we will put it to them and announce it to the House at the same time.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I assume, and if I am wrong in my assumption the Prime Minister will correct me, that any program the government may announce will involve participation by other levels of government. In view of that, are any discussions taking place between the federal and provincial governments with respect to the content of that program?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will correct the assumption of the hon. member. It is wrong. There are many things the federal government can do on its own without provincial participation.

Mr. Hees: Then why do you not do them?

UNEMPLOYMENT—SUGGESTED WINTER HOUSE BUILDING INCENTIVE PROGRAM

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. To create jobs, will the government revive the winter house building incentive program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The programs we will announce will be made known and the hon. member can then judge whether, in his view, they are a resuscitation of previous programs or whether there is something new.

Mr. Stanfield: We cannot wait.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of National Revenue.

In view of the Solicitor General's statement yesterday that the rehabilitation of 2,000 former inmates who have secured a job could yield $1,300,000 in federal and provincial income taxes, could the Minister of National Revenue tell us how much income tax he is losing due to the 700,000 jobless in Canada?

PAYMENTS UNDER PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT TO FARMERS IN HAILED-OUT AREAS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Since many areas have been hailed out and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has not been phased out, will there be any inspections this year? Is the minister planning any inspection in order to help those areas?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There is no change in the inspections and in the payment levels for this year even though we are not collecting the levy, and there will not be any change, for the next crop year, in those areas where crop insurance is unavailable. But of course the same rules as have applied in the past will apply to the basis upon which inspection is made this year.

UNITED STATES WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—POSSIBLE PARALLEL CANADIAN ACTION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance. Does the government intend to make a statement early next week on its assessment of the measures announced last night by President Nixon and whether consideration should be given to implementing in this country a system of wage and price controls parallel to that in the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take this matter up with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask the Prime Minister whether, in the light of the consideration which may have to be given to parallel action respecting wage and price controls, the scope of the forthcoming conference with the provinces will be enlarged to include this question inasmuch as the co-operation of the provinces is necessarily required?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, within the limits open to one in trying to answer a hypothetical question, I think that were the "if" to be substantiated the conclusion would probably follow.

INFLATION—CONTINUATION OF PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION BEYOND DECEMBER 31—PUBLICATION OF WAGE AND PRICE CONTROL GUIDELINES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): My question is directed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Has the government decided to continue the role of the Prices and Incomes Commission beyond December 31 of this year and has a set of guidelines been established in connection with price and wage controls? Further, would the right hon. gentleman undertake to make any such guidelines known to the House of Commons and the public generally?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If guidelines were to be established they would be made public in the House of Commons.

Mr. Lundrigan: Would the Prime Minister answer the first part of my question? Has the government made a conscious decision to continue the role of the Prices and Incomes Commission after December 31 of this year?

Mr. Trudeau: It is my recollection that the commission has been continued until the month of June next year. I will verify whether that is the case. I believe it is.

Is the hon. gentleman prepared to establish specific criteria as a basis for hiring these people, and is he prepared to assess specific financial penalties against companies that do not comply?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr.Speaker, it is not our intention to apply quotas or penalties at the present time. PORTS POLICY—RESOLVING OF PROBLEMS—RESPONSIBILITIES AND MAKE-UP OF PORT AUTHORITIES

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On May 12 in the course of his statement on ports policy the minister indicated that further details would be announced after consultation with local interests. In view of disturbing reports that there is dissatisfaction in at least two of the larger ports, can the minister tell us whether these problems have been resolved, and can he now announce the responsibilities and the make-up of the nine port authorities?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot do the latter, that is, announce the make-up of the nine port authorities. I can say, however, that most of the problems have been resolved. I can assure the hon. member that if there are a few Solomons around he might give me their names because it has been very difficult to make some of these necessary decisions. I anticipate that within a few days I shall be able to announce the names of two additions to the National Harbours Board as well as the make-up of the port authorities for Vancouver and Montreal.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): I am happy to hear that the minister will be announcing the names of two new appointees. I am wondering whether one of them will be stationed in the Atlantic area as I requested on May 12.

Mr. Jamieson: Neither of the two gentlemen concerned, but the reference I made to Solomon a few moments ago was in precisely that context. It is the intention of the government to locate one member of the National Harbours Board in the Atlantic provinces, but where he will go is the key question, as the hon. member well knows.

STABILIZATION BILL—INVITATION TO MINISTER TO MEET WITH WESTERN FARM ORGANIZATIONS TO DISCUSS AMENDMENTS

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister. Is it the intention of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to accept the invitation extended to him by several farm organizations in western Canada to meet with them to discuss amendments to the prairie grain stabilization bill?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I will take the question as notice and advise the minister responsible for the Wheat Board.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Having regard to the telegrams and correspondence now arriving in our offices, and no doubt in his office, running about ten to one against the stabilization plan in its present form—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a speech. If he has a question he should ask it directly. I again invite hon. members to refrain from reviving during the question period a debate we have been pursuing for some weeks.

Mr. Skoberg: I was following along the lines of what the minister did the other day. In view of the invitation extended to the Prime Minister as well from the Wheat Pools and the National Farmers Union to meet with them to discuss certain amendments, would the right hon. gentleman not agree to withdraw this bill until this meeting has taken place?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The policy of the government has been quite clear. I cannot understand how an opposition member would want us to withdraw the bill. He would then say we were continuing our so-called illegality.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Moose Jaw rising on a point of order?

Mr. Skoberg: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it should be clear that I did not request the withdrawal of the bill. I suggested that the bill should not be proceeded with until the meeting had taken place.

If so, what is such action?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I understand that at the moment at least the proposed strike has had no effect on the operations of the air line. Is it the intention to use existing facilities for this school or are new facilities to be constructed? I have in mind the facilities at the Canadian Forces Base at Clinton.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the representations the hon. member has made on innumerable occasions in this regard I have had the most exhaustive study made of the Clinton base along with the Minister of National Defence to ascertain whether it would be feasible for us to use a portion of it as an air traffic control school or some related activity. I regret to advise the hon. member and the House that we have concluded it is not a suitable site and we shall be looking elsewhere.

Mr. McKinley: May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he intends to convene a meeting among other levels of government as requested by Huron County to discuss the future of this facility?

FIRST EVIDENCE OF NEWCASTLE DISEASE IN POULTRY

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Dr. Hawkins of the Health of Animals Branch has been reported in the press as stating that Newcastle disease in poultry was first diagnosed by that department in Lambton County in June, 1971. However, a written answer to Question No. 1700, tabled in the House recently, reported that the first instance of this disease was diagnosed in Kent County a month later in July. In view of the conflicting statements and the seriousness of the disease, will the minister undertake an investigation to provide the correct answer and advise the House which one to believe?

• (12 noon)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I certainly acknowledge the seriousness of this matter. I should like to advise the hon. member that I will have a more detailed reply, but I would also like to advise him that there is a difference between recognition of symptoms and actually isolating the live virus. I think that is where the difference lies here.

Mr. McCutcheon: In view of the rapid spread of this airborne virus, if the minister finds out that Dr. Hawkins' statement is the correct one will he cause a further investigation to be made to ascertain the reason for the supression or delay of the report?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that the question is either hypothetical or a recommendation to the minister.

INCREASE IN MURDERS—SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO CAUSES

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Justice, I should like to put this question to the Solicitor General. In light of the alarmingly high rate of murders this year, is the government considering any special program to deal with this serious problem?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we are continually and relentlessly fighting organized crime in Canada. There are two points I would like to make. First, the provinces have a part to play in this field, and we work in close co-operation with them. Second, this is a police officer's task, and we believe that operations in this connection should be led by experts, and that, while some of these may be successful at times, others fail, because fighting organized crime is no easy matter.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Would the minister or the government consider establishing a task force, a royal commission or an inquiry by Parliament to look into the causes and nature of violent crime in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, in the light of my earlier reply, I am afraid that the hon. member's proposal would be a delusion, and that the work of such a committee would only reveal what several people already suspect.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBLE ON THE JOB TRAINING PROGRAM FOR YOUTH—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister who is in the House but not in his seat; hence he will be unable to reply to my question until he resumes his seat. Is the government now giving consideration to introducing a special on the job training program aimed at getting at least 25,000 young people off the unemployment rolls this winter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know from reading the press, the government appears to be considering a great number of things, including this. These stories are not always accurate and it would be inadvisable for the press to hold its breath until we make announcements on these specific matters.

Mr. Hees: You are not doing anything, so the press does not hold its breath and wait for you to do something.

Mr. Trudeau: I am not criticizing these stories in any way; I am telling the House that questions based on these reports do not necessarily elicit a positive answer from the government.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I hope will receive an answer from the government. Is the government giving priority to a special program of job training for our young people to get them back to work this winter and, if so, will this matter be discussed with the appropriate provincial authorities?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in cases where any programs that we may want to follow come partly within provincial jurisdiction I can assure the House that we will discuss them with the proper provincial authorities.

[Mr. Goyer.]

TAXATION

SUCCESSION DUTIES AND GIFT TAXES—PROPOSED FEDERAL ABANDONMENT—REPLY TO PROVINCIAL REQUESTS FOR DELAY

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I understand the Prime Minister has now sent a reply to the Premier's letter of August 6 requesting a one-year delay in the implementation of the proposals regarding changes in succession duties and gift taxes. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is now in a position to inform the House of the nature of his reply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I answered this question in the House. I indicated that my reply was to the effect that we were not going to delay the implementation of the government's decision, subject to our getting the legislation through the House, of course. I added that federal officials and ministers would be prepared to discuss with provinces that desire to have discussion on ways in which we might assist them in preparing to raise their own taxes if they wanted to step in where the federal government had stepped out. As the House knows, the announcement was to the effect that we would not continue collecting these taxes but that if the provinces wanted to start collecting them we would try to assist them to do so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS BY PRIME MINISTER TO PREMIER KOSYGIN ON BEHALF OF MINORITY GROUPS IN U.S.S.R.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Before the Prime Minister tells the convention of the Ukrainian-Canadian Congress, would he tell the House what views he will express to Commissar Kosygin on behalf of minority groups in the U.S.S.R.?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would rather follow a different sequence and listen to what the Ukrainians have to say and get their reactions before deciding what to tell Premier Kosygin.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which is a very simple one. Is or is not the Prime Minister prepared to take a stand for freedom?

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POLYMER—ACTION TO PREVENT EMPLOYEE LAY-OFFS

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. Has the minister met with officials of the Polymer Corporation and, if so, will he agree to meet further with them in an attempt to find ways of reducing or stopping altogether the lay-off of 250 men?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have been in close contact with officials of Polymer about the reduction in the work force. The company has set up an employment centre to work with other agencies and be of assistance in helping those men who have been laid off to find other work. I might also say that the officials have advised me that the action of the government in bringing in the Employment Support Act will be helpful to Polymer in its employment difficulties.

Mr. Cullen: In the ordinary course of events, corporations in difficulty do not declare dividends and in fact often operate at a loss for a short time. Is the government prepared to allow this option to Polymer if it means saving jobs?

Mr. Richardson: Well, Mr. Speaker, that question is hypothetical.

INDUSTRY

CLOSING OF RESEARCH FACILITIES AT CELANESE, SHAWINIGAN, DOW AND POLYMER—SUGGESTED TRANSFER TO GOVERNMENT SERVICE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the partial and in some cases complete disbanding of research departments recently at Celanese, Shawinigan, Dow and now Polymer, which will be difficult to reassemble once shut down, would the government take some initiative to keep such research departments active in Canada and switch them from Industry to government service?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, this does not come within my direct area of responsibility but inasmuch as it concerns Polymer I will certainly take note of it.

IMPERIAL OIL—PROPOSAL TO MOVE OPERATIONS FROM MANITOBA

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the Minister of Supply and Services also take into consideration the proposal put forward by Imperial Oil to move its entire Manitoba operation to Edmonton?

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SUFFIELD MILITARY BASE—REPORT OF WILDLIFE SERVICE SUGGESTING USE AS GRASSLAND PARK—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the environment. Has the minister seen the report of the Canadian Wildlife Service recommending that because of its ecological uniqueness the Suffield military base be used as a grasslands park, and is the minister supporting this recommendation in the current debate on the matter?

• (12:10 p.m.)

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wildlife Service has been working very closely with the Department of National Defence regarding the ecological aspects of the Suffield area. I have seen the reports. The proposal is that areas with unique characteristics will be preserved and not damaged in any way by activity there.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the area is the home of several threatened species—

Mr. Jamieson: Tories.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dinsdale: Conservatives—in Alberta? I suggest that comment displays the ignorance of the hon. member on many matters. In view of the fact that the area is the home of several threatened species of wildlife, and keeping in mind the fact there are other military areas such as Shilo available for training, will the minister table the report of the wildlife branch so other members and the people of Canada can be enlightened on this matter?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we will be prepared to table any information received as a result of the surveys by the Canadian Wildlife Service. Perhaps the Minister of National Defence would like to say a word on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we are running short of time and I notice a number of members who have been trying to ask questions for a few days. I think they should be given an opportunity to do so, particularly the hon. member for St. John's West.

[Later]

Mr. Dinsdale: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did not want to encroach upon the time of other hon. members seeking to ask questions during the question period, but I noticed that the Minister of National Defence was anxious to make a statement on the matter I raised earlier. I should not like him to be frustrated over the weekend because he did not have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister can make that statement now with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to point out to the hon. member that the facilities at Shilo are not equivalent in size to the facilities at Suffield and therefore it is not an alternative.

URBAN AFFAIRS

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD—INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGATIONS CONCERNING BLACKHEAD ROAD URBAN RENEWAL SCHEME

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs concerning an urban renewal scheme in St. John's West referred to as the Blackhead Road urban renewal scheme. Will he inform the House whether it is his intention to appoint a commission to inquire into charges of mismanagement, and other problems which have come to light, as requested by the householders union of the Blackhead Road urban renewal scheme?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to assess the allegations, but I know there has been a recent meeting between representatives of that association and officials of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I will be glad to expedite the results of that report and see just where the matter stands.

WATER RESOURCES

APPLICATION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT TO CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent statement by the Minister of the Environment that Ottawa should have insisted on using the Navigable Waters Protection Act so that the unfavourable downstream effects of the Bennett Dam in Wood Buffalo Park could have been kept to a minimum, I should like to ask how this act can be used against Crown corporations since they are not subject to its provisions?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously the hon. member is asking for a legal interpretation and his question in those terms is not in order.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PENSIONS—POSSIBILITY OF ANNUAL INCREASES RELATED TO COST OF LIVING

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that increases in pensions of retired public servants take place on an annual basis, and thus far the increases provided by Canadian National Railways have been on a one-shot basis, I should like to ask the minister whether he is still having discussions with officials of the CNR concerning the possibility of having these pensions escalated every year in relation to the increase in the cost of living?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that, but so far I have not discussed that specific matter with them.

INDUSTRY

PULP AND PAPER—RELATIVE POSITION IN RELATION TO COMPETITORS AS A RESULT OF PROPOSED TAX CHANGES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in view of the difficulties faced by the pulp and paper industries I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether the government is considering the brief presented to it earlier this year by that industry, and is it confident that the proposed changes in the tax bill will meet the industry's assertion that the present tax structure places it at a serious disadvantage compared with its main competitors?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the second part of the hon. member's question is obviously part of the debate that we may be having later today.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED CONFERENCE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF GOVERNMENT, LABOUR AND BUSINESS TO ESTABLISH POLICIES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is going to involve the private sector in the development of new economic policies and, if so, is a conference among representatives of the government, labour and business now under consideration?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would think that the government will, indeed, want to involve the private sector and various groups in the economy in respect of any economic policy we might follow. At this time there is no, shall we say, nationwide conference slated, but there have been meetings between the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and groups of people in the industrial and financial communities. There have also been some meetings between the Minister of Labour and labour leaders with this object in mind.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, in view of the economic situation in our country will the Prime Minister give urgent priority to this matter?

UNITED NATIONS

SEATING OF CHINA—REQUEST THAT COPY OF ALBANIAN RESOLUTION BE TABLED

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the Albanian resolution regarding China's membership in the United Nations. In light of the minister's statement yesterday that there is no question of chucking any member out, will the Acting Minister table in the House the text of the Albanian resolution which does, in fact, call for the immediate expulsion of the Taiwan government from the UN?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot subscribe to the facts as stated by the hon. member. I am sure it would be easy to get a copy of the Albanian resolution and table it in the House, if the House so desired. I will convey the request to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

AGRICULTURE

ASSISTANCE TO POTATO GROWERS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the meetings which took place between himself and representatives of the potato growing provinces and because of the increasing concern of the potato farmers, I would like to ask him whether he could make a statement about the meetings he had with those representatives or whether he could at least assure the House that he will make a statement next week in order to remedy the difficulties of that group of farmers?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have held a number of meetings and a committee has been established, made up of officials of both provincial and federal Departments of Agriculture, to find ways and means by which we can take early action to strengthen the market for potatoes. We have not reached an agreement as to the best means of achieving this objective.

GRASSHOPPERS—CONTINGENCY PLAN TO AVERT PLAGUE NEXT SUMMER

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In light of what appears to be growing concern that there may be a grasshopper plaque in western Canada next summer—

An hon. Member: Is that what you call yourselves?

Mr. Murta: —is the government going to organize a contingency plan to avert such a plague and, if so, is it going to conduct discussions with the provincial governments this fall?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know there is some concern in certain areas about the higher grasshopper egg count. Of course, the primary responsibility lies with the provinces but any assistance we can give will be forthcoming.

BERTHA ARMY WORM INFESTATION—ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, let me say to the Minister of Transport that a plague will occur in Assiniboia during the election, and there is no doubt about that. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the government has yet agreed to assist the provinces in aiding farmers hurt by the Bertha army worm infestation this summer?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, no statement of that nature has been made.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

STUDY OF HILL REPORT ON FUTURE OF MOHAWK INSTITUTE—POLICY STATEMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to the hon. member for Brant who put a question to me, on Wednesday, regarding the Hill report on the Six Nations reservation, in Brantford.

I must say that this report has been ordered by the Indian Council, and is presently considered by them. This is not a departmental report. We are aware of it, but the Council of the bands has not so far seen fit to discuss it with officials from my department. When they do, I shall be pleased to report to the hon. member.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259 to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this debate because I feel the proposed legislation, Bill C-259, is probably one of the most important pieces of legislation that has come before this House for some considerable time. It is important first of all because it affects so many people. It affects them in a vital way inasmuch as it has an effect on the contribution they would make by way of taxation to the treasury of the country. It is important also because I believe it is the most comprehensive revision of the Income Tax law we have had since 1917, almost 54 years ago.

I can only express regret that legislation as important as this is expressed in such involved, complicated and technical language that it is practically impossible, not only for the ordinary taxpayer who is to be affected by it but also the professional men such as chartered accountants and members of the legal profession, to understand it.

Both the Canadian association of Chartered Accountants and the Canadian Bar Association have expressed themselves as finding it very difficult to understand the full meaning of the amendments which are proposed to the income tax law. In this connection, I wish to place on the record a quotation from the remarks of Mr. R. W. Bonner, vice-chairman of MacMillan and Bloedel Ltd. of Vancouver. He made these remarks while addressing a meeting of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in Quebec City a short time ago. At that time he said:

It is an avoidable pity that the small Canadian businessman must, in addition to everything else, now learn how to do business within the terms of an all but incomprehensible Income Tax Act.

Mr. Bonner has suggested that this legislation is almost incomprehensible. I believe his view is shared certainly by the majority of the people of Canada. It is without question an extremely intricate and complicated piece of legislation. There are over 600 pages in the proposed revision. Many of the sections are phrased in language which makes them very difficult to understand. The unfortunate part of the whole situation is that if the ordinary taxpayer cannot understand the income tax legislation he must obtain, at some considerable expense to himself, professional help in preparing his income tax return. I say this places a very heavy burden on the ordinary taxpayer because he cannot afford that type of assistance. Surely, the experienced draftsmen the government has within its employ could have drafted something simpler and more easily understood. Another unfortunate circumstance so far as the complicated language of the bill is concerned is the fact that if a taxpayer does not comply with the law he is subject to very heavy penalties.

My one suggestion would be that almost immediately the Department of National Revenue, or whatever department of government is concerned, should put out an explanatory booklet written in terms which the ordinary person can understand. If a booklet which would explain the revisions to the ordinary taxpayer were available, then when the time came to prepare his income tax return under the new act it would not be necessary for him to secure professional advice. I would also suggest that if in the early stages errors are made in completing the tax returns, penalties for honest miscalculation should not be imposed. I do not think it is unfair to ask this. I realize that tax law cannot be simple. As I said before, however, I cannot make myself believe that the expert draftsmen the government has within its employ could not have drafted something less complicated than this bill.

The minister and the government are to be congratulated for taking into account the many representations which have been made by Canadian taxpayers and by members of the opposition during the extended debate in the House on the original white paper, as well as many of the representations made by members of the opposition before the committee which studied the bill. I believe the government should be commended for this.

The government would have us believe the bill represents tax reform. If one examines the bill carefully, I believe it would be difficult to reach any conclusion other than that there are very few reforms in it. In my opinion, the bill does not represent tax reform. It represents reform in some respects inasmuch as it adds to what one must report from now on in respect of one's income. For example, unemployment insurance benefits would be taxable. Benefits paid to people taking upgrading courses and courses in trades would be taxable. One half of capital gains would be taxable. So, there is very little in the way of major tax reform within this bill. Again I wish to quote from the comments of Mr. Bonner when he addressed the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in Quebec City:

The new tax act will certainly restrict business initiative at a most inopportune time.

That, of course, should not be. Rather than restrict business initiative, the government should be trying to devise ways and means to encourage it.

I know everybody in this House, as well as everybody throughout the country, welcomes the relief, which is being extended to those in the low income tax brackets. That is a reform which should have been made many years ago. No change has been made in personal income tax exemption since 1949, a period of 22 years. We know how the value of the Canadian dollar in the hands of purchasers has deteriorated during that time. So, it is unfortunate that the government did not see fit to increase these personal exemptions a long time ago, so that they would have been concurrent with the increase in the cost of living and thus have avoided placing such a burden on Canadian taxpayers.

An hon. Member: You could have done it when you were in office.

Mr. McQuaid: The deductions for single people have been increased to $1,500. I would point out that, not so long ago the Economic Council of Canada said that the exemption for single persons should be $1,900. It is too bad that the government did not see fit, when making the changes, to increase exemptions for single people to $1,900 or even to $2,000. Exemptions for married people, it is true, have been increased to $2,850, but again the Economic Council of Canada said that the very minimum on which a married person can get along today is $3,000. So, I say that it is unfortunate that the observations of the Economic Council of Canada could not have been complied with and these allowances increased accordingly.

• (12:30 p.m.)

The present allowances for dependent children are certainly out of line with the actual cost of feeding, clothing and educating a child. These exemptions could have been increased. I challenge anybody to try to feed, clothe and educate a child today on the allowed exemption of $300 a year. Bursaries in excess of $500 are being taxed. This is most unfair. These bursaries should not be subject to tax because we know the tremendous expense involved in sending a boy or a girl to university today, and they have to be sent to university to enable them to compete in our business world today. I think it is most unfair that bursaries in excess of $500 should be taxable. It is also unfair that a student who obtains paid employment during the summer months should have to pay income tax on the amount he earns because he is merely trying to assist his parents in educating him. Every encouragement should be given him because, if he goes to college and graduates, he comes out a better man and has a better opportunity of contributing to the welfare of this country.

It is unfortunate that no change was made to the sales tax imposed on building materials. That sales tax constitutes a heavy burden for a man with a small income who is trying to provide a house for himself and his family. Every encouragement should be given to that person to build a house of his own, but the government has taken the opposite view and has refused to remove the sales tax on building materials.

I am quite confident that three sections in the proposed bill will cause the government a great deal of difficulty, namely, sections 135, 136 and 137 which, if you examine them carefully, practically ring the death knell for co-operatives and credit unions in Canada today. The provision in the bill for taxation on employed capital will severely interfere with the freedom and the ability of co-operatives to distribute their earnings as patronage refunds. A co-operative is a business owned by its members, and in most co-operatives the members receive a share of the savings which have accumulated over the years. That is a very worth-while project. The proposed bill—and this is the unfortunate part of it—requires the co-operatives to pay tax on an amount equal to 5 per cent of the members' capital employed, and the co-operatives will therefore have to limit the return of savings to members in order to avoid reducing their taxable income below this amount. I understand that in Canada today there are approximately 3,000 co-operatives with a membership close to two million. This proposed change will have a very serious effect on businesses and on the two million Canadians who belong to co-operatives.

These co-operatives are user-owned. For example, agricultural co-operatives are owned by the farmers, fishermen's co-operatives are owned by the fishermen and housing co-operatives are owned by those people who build their own houses. The same applies to credit unions. Co-operatives and credit unions have actually encouraged thousands of people in the ways of thrift and saving. They are operated for service in most cases and not for profit, and nothing must be done by this or any other government to kill or even cripple that very worth-while movement.

The same thing applies to credit unions. Credit unions have been content over the years to remain small, community type organizations. They make virtually non-profit loans to their members. Under the present law their assets are taxed only when they are distributed among the members, but under the new proposal in the bill before us this tax exemption status will be taken away and members of the credit unions will be pushed into establishing a full-fledged banking operation. I say that that is most unfortunate because these businesses are not now operated for profit but for the benefit of their members.

I realize that a government must have money to run the affairs of the country, but I suggest very seriously that if this government practised a little economy in certain aspects of its operations it could very well carry on without any increased taxation proposed in the present bill. I was amazed to learn, from information put out not so long ago by the Department of Supply and Services, of examples of what appears to me to be a tremendous waste of taxpayers' money. I want to put just a few of those on the record. A contract was granted not so long ago to the Mallory Battery Company Limited in the amount of $39,025 for batteries for hearing aids. I suggest that $39,000 buys a great number of hearing aid batteries, and I hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the members of his government will tune up their own hearing aids so that they will be able to hear the cries of the 500,000 people who are unemployed today and so that they will hear the cries of the potato producers of this country who are faced with a disastrous year by reason of the imposition of the recent U.S. surtax. I hope they will hear the cries of the Atlantic provinces where the per capita income of our people is far below the national average.

Again, a contract in the amount of $61,813 was granted to the Dominion Magnesium Company for tent poles.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The amendment by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was disposed of yesterday, and we are now on the motion for second reading and reference of the tax bill to committee of the whole. Under the circumstances, I wonder if it would not be in order to direct remarks to the tax bill rather than to the general state of the economy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The point raised by the hon. parliamentary secretary is well taken, although the Chair is not in a position to judge the last part of the speech made by the hon. member who had the floor because the Chair did not hear it. But I may take this opportunity to invite hon. members to follow the rule of relevancy as much as possible. When Mr. Speaker accepted the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) it was understood then that it would enlarge the scope of the debate at that time. I would, therefore, invite hon. members to limit their remarks to the bill, and not deal with the whole problem of the economy of the country.

Mr. McQuaid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that my remarks are relevant because we are dealing with government tax proposals, and I am suggesting how money can be saved. I contend that our scope now, since the amendment has been disposed of, is much wider than when we were discussing the amendment. I know these figures are not too appetizing to the government, but I think they should be placed on the record.

There is a reference here to an amount of $61,813 to Dominion Magnesium for tent poles. I suppose the government expects to be driven into the woods by the next election and wants to have its tents put up now, but it seems to me that this is a lot of money for tent poles.

Then, there is a contract in the amount of $21,151 to the Dixon Pencil Company for correcting fluid. That is enough correcting fluid to fill the swimming pool at the YMCA. And there is another amount of $12,000 for rubber erasers. I know it will take a lot of correcting fluid and rubber erasers to wipe out all the mistakes that the government has made.

Then, there is a contract to Safety Distributor Products in the amount of $52,970 for sun glasses. I suggest that members of the government had better take off their dark glasses so they can see the problems and the plight of the Canadian taxpayers.

Then there is an amount of $18,637 to Major Sales Distributors for flashlights and $48,154 for gasoline lanterns. I suppose these are needed to lead the government out of the darkness.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the hon. member's speech, and I find it very difficult to relate it to the tax bill before the House. It seems to me that we should follow the rule of relevancy, which is such a well-known and established rule of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I am sure the hon. member heard the remarks made by the Chair a few moments ago, again inviting hon. members who want to participate in this debate to observe the rule of relevancy. But at the same time, I should point out that a practice is followed that when legislation relating to supply and finances is introduced, this opens the door to a much wider range of discussion than would the introduction of an ordinary piece of legislation. Anyway, I hope that the parliamentary secretary will not insist that participants in the debate start to speak directly to definite clauses of the bill without dealing with other indirect questions that are related to them. It would be very difficult for the Chair to impose that restriction.

Mr. McQuaid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. These are the very reasons the government has found it advisable not to introduce real tax reform. It cannot introduce real tax reform when there is waste and extravagance such as I am citing here. However, I will not embarrass members of the government too much longer. There are just one or two other items that I want to bring to the attention of the Canadian people.

I cite a contract to Biltmore Hats Limited in the amount of $40,775 for felt hats, and a later contract in the amount of $18,430 for felt hats. I suggest that all this is evidence of gross extravagance, and there are thousands of other indications of the same thing. If the government would try to practice a little economy it could very well introduce real tax reform through this bill, something that would give real relief to the people of Canada. This would be welcomed by both sides of this House, and by all Canadian citizens.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. McQuaid) on many of his remarks opposing some aspects of this proposed tax reform. I had not intended to step into the debate at this time, mainly because I am neither a lawyer nor a tax expert. But having listened to other hon. members, having talked to lawyers, and having watched tax experts on television decry the fact that this massive document is mainly confusing verbiage, I decided that I was just as qualified as several other hon. members to speak on it. As the hon. member for Cardigan has pointed out, and as many tax experts across Canada have pointed out, this bill really should be rewritten. It should be put into language that most of us can understand. The taxpayers themselves should be able to understand it.

The other reason that I decided to enter the debate at this time was that I could not allow the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to try to sell this bill as tax reform. There are some aspects of the bill that are welcomed by me and other opposition members, but in the main it is merely a patch job on a series of patch jobs that were undertaken over the years, principally by Liberal tax authorities and ministers of finance.

I wish to mention some of the aspects of the bill which I find repugnant. Very few people who have taken part in the debate so far have mentioned the effect that the bill will have on rural Canada, particularly on dairy farmers and beef farmers. The changes proposed in the bill will phase out what is commonly referred to as the basic herd. Farmers have come to look upon basic herds as capital assets, and upon their disposal they should be looked upon as capital gains as of 1972. But according to this bill the basic herd is to be phased out, so when the herd is sold the revenue will be taxed as income, which means it will be taxed 100 per cent and not 50 per cent under the proposed capital gains tax. Perhaps for the older farmer who can establish a fairly high but fair market price as of December 31, 1971, this will not rest too hard upon him. However, for the young farmer starting out it will be pretty much of an intolerable burden to be taxed on the total amount.

There are other aspects of the bill that I find extremely debatable, and the first of these is the much touted improvements in the basic personal income tax exemptions. This is the area the government thinks it can exploit to get votes, when it gets the courage to face the people after a couple of years of economic bungling, and wandering in the economic wilderness while tens of thousands of people have been forced through unemployment on to the welfare rolls, for which the working people in low income brackets can no longer afford to pay.

Just how significant are these so-called reforms in terms of dollars? I congratulate the government on eliminating nearly one million people from the tax rolls. This move is long overdue. Just how much better off will the average factory, office or construction worker be?

Let us look at the figures. To begin with, Mr. Speaker, there will be higher exemptions for low and middle income earners. On the surface this appears to be great reform. But, echoing the words of the hon. member who spoke prior to me, why has it taken the government 22 years to update the personal income tax exemption? The last changes occurred in 1949. The value of the Canadian dollar has been greatly inflated since that time. So, really what the government is doing is simply bringing tax exemptions into line with what they should have been a few years ago.

Let us look at the figures. A married man with two children earning $4,000 a year, and tragic it is that many men are still in this wage category, paid $210 in income tax under the old system. In 1972 he will pay about $73. This amounts to a gain of about $2.60 a week. What a fantastic gift from such a benevolent government! Let us look at the $8,000 a year wage or salary earner, with a wife and two children. Under the old system of taxation he would pay about $1,215 in personal income taxes. Under the new bill he will pay $1,089, a saving of $2.42 a week. Another "big deal". The wage or salary earner making $12,000 a year will gain an extra $1 a week.

But let us not forget that the wage or salary earner will be paying income tax on his unemployment insurance benefits in 1972. His medicare premiums are adversely affected as well. Any money contributed to a public medicare plan on an employee's behalf will become taxable income. This means that if an employer contributes sixty-six and two-thirds of the OHSIP premium, this amount will be taxable income for the worker. In addition to this, scholarships or bursaries over $500 that a son or daughter might receive will be taxable. And finally, a worker's union dues are included in his "huge" $150 work costs exemption.

This brings me to another important point, the double standard being perpetrated by this so-called tax reform bill. The ordinary factory or construction worker who is lucky enough to have 12 months work, has many expenses that certainly cost more than $150. For example, I was talking to a bricklayer in my riding who travels an average of ten miles to and from work each day. Gasoline and depreciation on his automobile alone amount to approximately $500 a year, yet he is only allowed the $150 basic exemption for legitimate work expenses. But the professional who is allowed, I believe, two conventions a year can write off hundreds of dollars for each. Again, I emphasize the double standard.

In the few minutes remaining before we recess for lunch I should like to mention the section dealing with credit unions and I should like to look at it from a personal point of view as well as the point of view of the people in my riding. To begin with, credit unions are a people's movement. Most of them were born during the depression and have survived because of the free time and work donated in many cases, particularly in the small credit unions, by those dedicated to their purpose. The purpose of the credit union movement of course is manyfold. You can borrow or you can save, but certainly one reason people are proud of their credit unions is that they are able to escape the loan sharks and the finance companies.

In my riding there are 38 credit unions with approximately 13,000 members. If these credit unions are taxed, Mr. Speaker, probably only two or three will survive because only three have assets of over $500,000. In 1970, the total assets of all credit unions in the Brantford area amounted to $7.7 million. This is another example of double taxation. Members already pay taxes on their dividends and on any earnings that may accrue to them from the credit union, so I implore the Minister of Finance to reconsider clause 137 of the bill and to exclude from taxation at least the smaller credit unions, those with assets of less than half a million dollars. If these small credit unions are taxed they will not be able to pay dividends of 4 per cent or 5 per cent but will be reduced to paying perhaps 2 per cent on dividends.

When discussing credit unions we should also recall that members receive a 10 per cent rebate on borrowings, something which one does not get from the bank or fiance companies. In short, Mr. Speaker, credit unions are not in business to make a profit; they are in business to serve the interests of their membership. I am quite sure that no person, at least in the province of Ontario, has ever lost a cent as a result of the failure of a credit union. There have been no Atlantic Acceptance fiascos in the credit union movement.

Another important aspect of this movement, Mr. Speaker, is that during lay-offs, illness, plant shutdowns—even during strikes—often the interest on borrowings is lifted. Until the member is back to work interest is not reapplied to the loan. Where else can one get this treatment? At finance companies and banks? I do not think so. Seventy percent of the interest earned goes to shareholders of credit unions. Credit unions also provide ancillary services which are very important such as family economic counselling, which is free of charge. The basic interest here, of course, is to attempt to put people back on the road to financial security, and I think this is a very important aspect of the movement as a whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I regret to interrupt the hon. member. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair to resume the same at 2 o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, before the luncheon adjournment, I was referring to what I considered to be the unjust proposed tax that would affect the credit union movement in Canada. I was saying that the credit union movement is a people's movement, a movement in many respects born of and nurtured by ordinary, individual Canadians for a common cause and a common purpose. I should now like to continue with my remarks relating to this aspect and to one or two other aspects.

The provinces demand that credit unions have guarantee funds which are reserves for doubtful accounts. The present basis for providing for the guarantee fund is to transfer a fixed percentage of yearly earnings. Generally, provision is made to reduce or eliminate the transfer required when the fund reaches a certain percentage of the total amount of members' shares and deposits. To my knowledge and information, there is no evidence that these reserves are excessive.

The most that the government of Canada can expect to realize in this area would result from a tax on whatever amount of reserves are considered to be excessive. As these reserves are created by provincial legislation and not by management decision, it seems reasonable to assume that the tax revenue would be gained at a future time when the reserve is reduced and the funds distributed to members by way of dividend. In effect, then, the government would simply have received an interest free loan of an insignificant amount from the credit union movement. When one considers that the proposed tax change will inconvenience credit unions and in fact lead to exorbitant tax burdens on the small credit unions, one wonders why the government is so bent on crippling this very essential and socially acceptable movement. Could it be that the powerful chartered bank lobby is a little upset by the fact that the credit unions of this country are now in No. 2 position in the small loans field.

Another criticism I have, Mr. Speaker, of Bill C-259 relates to the elimination of the federal estate tax. Here, again, I want to impress on hon. members opposite that this reveals the double standard approach to taxation. Obviously, only the wealthy, and particularly the very wealthy, are concerned about estate taxes, for the poor and lower middle income groups have little to leave except memories. I am not opposed to individual enterprise and I am not opposed to rugged individualism. As a classroom history teacher I have always had the greatest respect for the pioneers who came to this country and developed a way of life that is most commendable. Yet we often confuse the rugged individualism of that era with the protected individualism of today, and here we find a double standard. It is estimated that 80 per cent of those in this nation who are very wealthy have inherited their wealth. In other words, this inheritance in many instances is a passport to the easy life. Of course, we cannot blame them for this. They have inherited their wealth because our laws permit that. We cannot call such people economic parasites, because what they inherit they usually invest, and they live off their investments. Yet I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that they do absolutely nothing in many cases to earn any of their inheritance and that they contribute virtually nothing to the development of this country. While they masquerade as rugged individualists trying to protect the extremeties of the free enterprise system, they are simply living the good life off somebody else's hard work. I suggest that the elimination of the federal estate tax is simply contributing to this kind of non-effort on the part of some very wealthy people in this country. In other words, Bill C-259 is simply protecting these people and protracting their lives, which I would call somewhat useless.

What about imposing a 100 per cent estate tax, so that we can all start out on a truly equal level. Then, we should find who really are the rugged individualists of this country. Then we should find which of us really has the gumption to do something with his life and to create better living standards for his family. An estate tax like that would mean that the kids in St. James town, Toronto, would enjoy the same advantages, economically speaking, as the kids in Forest Hill. Of course, in the present circumstances that would be unthinkable. However, I am not seriously considering a 100 per cent estate tax. I realize that in many instances, in fact, in most instances, a dying man or woman has a spiritual need to pass on his or her material possessions to someone else.

There is one final point I wish to make. It has to do with parents of children who are physically disabled. There are thousands of children in this country who are born with physical deformities. A large percentage of them live in small communities or in rural areas where medical facilities are not sufficient to cope with their physical needs. It is often necessary for the parents of these children to travel long distances to metropolitan areas, Vancouver, Winnipeg and so on, or even, sometimes, to cities in the United States, in order to find specialist medical treatment. In the course of these journeys they incur very high costs in travelling expenses, overnight accommodation, dining in restaurants, and so on. Sometimes they are away for as long as a week. I am wondering whether some tax concession cannot be made to these parents who must face special financial problems of the kind I have mentioned, in addition to the normal heavy burden of taxation.

I have drawn attention to some of the aspects of this bill to which I am opposed. I have talked about the credit unions. I have talked about the people who have been granted the vast sum of a $150 tax write-off to cover legitimate costs incurred in their work. And I have drawn attention to one or two other points which I feel are pertinent to the average Canadian, particularly to those who will save $2.50 a week as a result of the new basic tax exemptions. When we come to committee of the whole, and discuss the bill clause by clause, I shall have more to say about these matters.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-259, entitled an act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequent upon the amendments to that Act.

The Income Tax reform bill is a document containing 707 pages, a weighty, complex tome which will directly affect the daily lives of every man, woman and child in Canada. It affects them indirectly, too, in that it reaches into the factories, stores, banks and corporate headquarters to stimulate or hinder progress. In so far as it stimulates corporate and individual enterprise, it may be considered helpful. In so far as it cramps, paralyzes or hampers initiative, it is a foolish measure.

In my opinion, taxes are to serve the people, to enable them to get along with as small a government apparatus as they need. Neither government nor taxes are ends in themselves. They are a means to an end, namely, the proper development of the national life. Whenever they become an unreasonable burden on families or individuals they restrict economic freedom, curtail democracy and generate apathy and laziness. The Income Tax reform bill is, therefore, a vital bill. Yet, allowing five minutes for the reading of each page, a person would need some 58 hours to pass through this maze. At most, a busy Member of Parliament might be able to spare five hours daily for such a task, almost 12 days. But 12 days would not be enough, since even tax experts profess to be confused and uncertain about the complexities of the measure.

The income tax reform bill is the product of almost nine years of commission hearings, public discussion, protest and, finally, distillation by scores of legal and fiscal experts who decide how much of his income the man in the street is to be allowed to keep. It has been calculated that Canadians work well into May each calendar year merely to gain enough to pay the manifold taxes levied on them by all levels of government. In a sense, therefore, they work five months of every year in order to pay the tax collector.

As I said a few moments ago, this is a very complex measure. This viewpoint has been endorsed by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which used the following words in a brief to the government early in September:

> We regret that it has been found necessary to express the new law in language so involved that it will be difficult for many taxpayers to understand their own tax position and to be able to complete and file their own returns without professional assistance.

I emphasize the last few words, Mr. Speaker, "without professional assistance". Some may doubt whether even professional help will solve the problem.

The Financial Times reports that the common complaint from the private sector, so far, has been that the bill is badly worded and too unwieldy for even taxation experts to understand quickly. One of the nation's foremost tax experts, Lancelot J. Smith, President of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, described the bill in these words:

> The most complex and formidable piece of tax legislation ever put before parliament.

In spite of a lifetime as a tax practitioner, Mr. Smith told the annual meeting of the institute in Winnipeg: "The intricacies of Bill C-259 have so far eluded my grasp." "If this is so with my background", he added, "God help the general practitioner." Mr. Smith was chairman of the Ontario Tax Reform Commission.

Another financial expert, Vincent Egan, Financial Editor of the Toronto Telegram, wrote in that newspaper on September 10:

> The new tax reforms will result in a more complicated, patched up system than ever before. If it's a joke, it's not funny! If it is not, then Mr. Benson, and his draftsmen, must be prepared, even at this late date, to simplify it wherever possible.

The Canadian Bar Association finds Bill C-259 as puzzling as do the accountants. The Globe and Mail of September 3, reports:

> Finance Minister Edgar Benson's tax reform legislation is complex, difficult, confusing and a let-down.
> Delegates heard 17 papers containing more than 120,000 words on various aspects of the legislation and the Association's special committee on the tax reform bill intends to make representations to Mr. Benson.

Ronald D. Bell of Calgary said if the new bill's concepts are difficult of comprehension, they seem remarkably clear compared with the language construction which purports to convey same to the Canadian public. Lawyers entering the taxation field periodically would find it absolutely impossible from reading the bill to obtain a working knowledge of the new system. The government should not have released the tax reforms until the new concepts had been put in clear language.

Another lawyer, John D. Smith of Vancouver, said the bill was immensely complicated and written in unfamiliar language and concepts. It was drafted with "so much use of definitions and cross-references that the drafter must have been raised on the game of Snakes and Ladders".

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Crouse: If the hon. member who interjects will sit and listen—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I just want to point out, in the absence of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, that the hon. member is reading his speech.

Mr. Crouse: No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not reading his speech. The hon. member is reading quotations from those who have condemned this tax reform bill which is presently before the House. If the parliamentary secretary had been listening to these condemnations he would have realized the concern of tax experts and economists across the country over the maze that has been introduced under the guise of tax reform.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundrary): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Crouse: I have the floor, Mr. Speaker. When I have finished my remarks I will answer any questions that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would like to put to me.

What are we being asked to do now? Parliament is being asked to pass this maze of tax changes quickly, so quickly that they can become law by January 1, 1972. In my opinion, haste in passing this massive change, haste in imposing fresh new tax burdens on Canadians at this time, is unseemly. I believe that in these days of heavy unemployment and the stifling of enterprise by taxation, the members of this House have a prime duty to see that these tax dollars are spent wisely. This raises the question: Why does the present government require all these additional funds? Are these funds being properly spent by the administration? Are they being properly utilized? After all, we are not fighting a war at the present time, and our population has not exceeded 22 million people. We cannot help but wonder just where all the money is going.

For the answer to these questions, we need turn only to the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1970, and in doing so we become painfully aware of the waste and extravagance of this government, whose spending spiral continues skyward like a moon rocket. It would be too painful to read the entire report, but I shall single out some items that clearly indicate why the present government stands condemned for its wasteful practices and why it must continue to dig deeper and deeper into the pockets of the average Canadian taxpayer.

For example, at page 11 of the report we read under item 18, headed: "Communications", that the listed increase in departmental expenditures, exclusive of the Post Office, was largely due to an increase of $3.2 million, or 28 per cent, in administration, operation and maintenance costs. The increase of $21 million that was authorized for the post office was due primarily to an increase of $11 million in salaries and allowances and $9 million in mail conveyance costs. Then, there is a little addendum which says that these expenditures do not include retroactive salary adjustments of $3.9 million paid during the year and charged to the reserve for salary revisions.

Then, under item 19 dealing with consumer and corporate affairs we read that the increase in expenditure included $1.2 million, or 22 per cent, spent by the corporate affairs division and $307,000, or 26 per cent, spent by combines investigation and research. Then, the report goes on to add that, in addition, the expenses of the Prices and Incomes Commission, established during the year, were $569,000. Again, there is a little addendum which states that these figures do not include retroactive salary adjustments of $1.5 million paid during the year and charged to the reserve for salary revisions.

So the expenses of the Prices and Incomes Commission amounted to $569,000. This commission ran around the country, after its appointment, like an old dog without any teeth: it could bark but it could not bite. Its recommendations had about as much backbone as a wet fishnet. The commission could get no agreement from labour and very little agreement from industry. On its own admission, it was a failure. The government has neither abolished the commission nor strengthened it. Today, it becomes just one more barnacle on our ship of state, one more barnacle holding back the progress of this nation and causing increases in income tax of the sort contained in this voluminous bill which can only add to the burden of our people. This is what we object to today. Is it, therefore, any wonder that the government must continually raise more money to pay for its wasteful and foolish extravagances?

Mr. Boulanger: Oh!

Mr. Crouse: Someone says "oh". It is obvious that Liberal members do not like to hear the truth as told by the Auditor General; they do not like to listen to the facts as they stand. There is no denying the wasteful extravagances that are listed in the report of the Auditor General.

Under item 20 on page 11 of his report, which deals with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, we read of retroactive salary adjustments amounting to $5 million which were not included in the expenditures for the year.

Under the Department of External Affairs, we note that its expenditure increased by $12 million. This does not include retroactive salary adjustments of $1.7 million paid during the year and charged to the reserve for salary revisions.

Under the Department of Finance, we read that the increase in outstanding bonds and treasury bills, as well as the higher interest rates of recent issues, largely accounted for the increase of $237 million, or 16 per cent, in public debt charges. All this in one year, Mr. Speaker! In addition, there is an item of $123 million which was recorded as a loan to the Canadian Corporation for Expo '67, which was written off as a loss under the Expo Winding-up Act.

I believe it is fair to state that, successful as Expo '67 may have been from many points of view, this debt of $123 million ended up as a direct charge on the Canadian taxpayer who had to foot the bill. Is it any wonder that we need a whole new tax structure in order to pay for the waste and extravagance of this Liberal government? In retrospect, I suppose that we should be grateful the deficit is not larger in view of the open-ended spending practices adopted by this government. There was no real planning for this exposition, only open-ended spending. When this exposition is contrasted with the one that recently terminated in Japan, where it was reported that there was a profit of some $35 million, we see the difference between planning and an uncaring and unconscionable government.

Again under the Department of Finance's expenditures as detailed in the Auditor General's report we read that the expenditure does not include retroactive salary adjustments of $907,000—almost $1 million—paid during the year and charged to the reserve for salary revisions.

What is the position as far as the Department of Labour is concerned? As a result of this government's policy of letting a little slack develop in the economy, its policy of letting unemployment rise under the excuse that this would aid the fight against inflation, we learn that Canada's contribution to the Unemployment Insurance fund last year amounted to $12 million, up 14 per cent. This $12 million came from the pockets of the taxpayers in addition to the regular unemployment insurance contributions made by Canadian workers. This government has not won its fight against unemployment or against inflation. Our economic picture today is a horrible example of what can happen to a country that is led by people devoid of any forward looking policies or programs, a country that has an arrogant, uncaring and incompetent government which, if it had any decency, would resign.

There is another little addendum under the item dealing with the Department of Manpower and Immigration which again deals with salary adjustments. These addenda are found at the end of each item. In this case, we read that almost $7 million was not included in the department's expenditures.

Let us look at the expenditures of the Department of National Defence. This was a department which was unified by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), who now heads "Action Canada", a political movement to recover the Liberal party from the Socialists who infiltrated its ranks and took it over from within. We were told unification would save the taxpayers money. According to the Auditor General, last year there was a net increase of $34 million in expenditures for defence services. There was also an increase of $12 million in the amortization of the deferred charges resulting from actuarial adjustments in the Canadian Armed Forces superannuation account. This department spent $1,790 million last year, and this figure does not include $12.1 million paid during the year and charged to the reserve for salary revisions.

What did we get for these increased expenditures? Our NATO forces have been decimated in Europe through unilateral withdrawal under the Liberal government, and generally our prestige and our defence profile is lower around the world today, yet our costs are higher. This is the thread that runs throughout every department of this government, namely higher costs for less service. In the Department of National Health and Welfare, there was an increase in expenditures of $290 million, not including expenditures by the Medical Research Council or amounts expended on scholarship and research grants.

In the Department of Public Works, general administration expenses alone increased by $3.1 million, up 15 per cent, while the increased drain on the resources of the Canadian taxpayers is only too evident, no matter how you look at these figures. I could go on and on.

Mr. Reid: You are.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, and with good reason. I could point out a number of expenses of this nature. CBC costs alone climbed last year to $170,673,547. They were up from the year before when they stood at $159 million. When I was first elected to the House of Commons in 1957, the expenditures required for the CBC amounted to $52 million. At that time the figure sounded high, in fact it represented $1 million per week. I remember at that time making a speech about this amount of $52 million because I thought it was a lot of money. If $52 million seemed to be a lot of money in 1957 you can naturally imagine what I think about the expenditure of an amount of $170 million less than 15 years later.

In the Secretary of State's department, we see an increase in the figures, the one I have just quoted, and an addendum. There was a further increase of $1.7 million or 36 per cent in expenditures of the bureau for translation. The $1.7 million was spent on the cultural development program for which there was no counterpart in 1969. Those amounts are higher in the current year.

I should like to point out the colossal waste of this government. The government paid $57,000 in the past two years to the Seigniory Club. That is the swank club which is 60 miles east of here, used for departmental meetings. This galls me tremendously.

Mr. Pepin: Does it?

Mr. Crouse: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) says: "Does it"? It should gall him, Sir. If it does not, it is time he became aware of what is happening in this government. Obviously, the minister does not care and has no intention of taking any action to change these wasteful extravagances. This is what happens—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: Could we have a little order in the chamber, Mr. Speaker? Twenty government departments and agencies have used this Canadian Pacific Hotel for such meetings. A government spokesman said that the reason government departments used the club for departmental conferences was so that officials would not be bothered by telephone calls and other interruptions to which they would be subjected if the meetings were held in Ottawa. I should like to ask any one of the cabinet ministers, what is wrong with the various committee rooms we have here on Parliament Hill? Why can they not be made available so that some of these wasteful extravagances can be avoided?

I could go on and on in the same way in respect of other departments.

An hon. Member: You probably will.

Mr. Crouse: If I did, I would be able to point out to you examples similar to the ones I have given. The figures I have quoted represent the cause behind the spiralling of taxation which climbs always upwards.

The increased drain on the resources of the Canadian taxpayer are evident when you consider the following figures which show the increase of consolidated government revenues, federal, provincial and local, between the years 1960-61 and 1970-71, as listed by the Department of Finance based on the Dominion Bureau of Statistics financial management series of publications. In 1960-61, the total paid to federal, provincial and local governments in personal income tax, corporate income tax, estates tax and succession duties, sales tax and other revenues net of transfers totalled $9,722 million. In 1970-71, this figure had increased to $28,465 million, up $18,743 million in a period of 10 years. A close examination of these figures reveals that personal income tax revenue received by all levels of government has multiplied by 4.5 times in 10 years. Corporation tax has more than doubled its take, as has estate tax and succession duties, while sales tax reaped in a harvest in the last fiscal year 3.5 times larger than that of 10 years ago.

I cannot help but wonder whether the incomes of Canadians, from which these taxes to three levels of government must be paid, have doubled or multiplied by 3.5 times in the last 10 years. The answer is no, certainly not, at least not in the Atlantic provinces and in other depressed areas of this nation.

My main criticism of Bill C-259 is its complexities and the fact that it places new and heavier burdens on Canadians generally, as well as on Canadian industry. There are other aspects of this bill which are causing concern and fear among Canadians. Our farmers and others involved in the co-operative movements contend that never in the history of this movement has there been legislation so damaging to the interests of co-operatives. Clayton Sinclair, writing in the Financial Times of September 13 said:

> The basic change for credit unions . . . will be the removal of their tax exempt status. Until now, their assets were taxed only when distributed among members. The legislation will add an initial bite at the predistribution level.

What about the effect on the provinces? The validity and success of this tax reform bill is very much comprised by the lack of comprehension and co-operation of the government toward the tax problems and functions of the provinces. The government has failed to introduce a tax reform which integrates the taxing function and resources of the three levels of government. This is a bill that has reduced rather than expanded the taxing base of the provinces. It is a bill that will put in doubt provincial revenues for the next five years. Those are the effects as I understand them.

Some of the provinces have expressed concern about the proposed elimination of federal estate and gift taxes on January 1, 1972. They have indicated that this proposal will not only create inequities between the taxation of existing wealth accumulations and future wealth accumulations but will thrust the burden of readjustment, if provincial revenue loss is to be avoided, entirely on to the provinces. All these factors require co-ordination of federal and provincial tax policies and make an assessment of the economic impact of the proposed legislation difficult. At the same time, we are concerned that the intention of the Ontario government to give tax credits for provincial sales tax and municipal taxes, and not to provide the 15 per cent additional capital cost allowance introduced by the federal government in its December 1970 budget, are indicative of a trend toward separate provincial tax administrations and policies. Such a trend is, I think, most undesirable and I urge the federal government to co-ordinate tax policy and administration with the provinces.

This bill is further evidence of the lack of government planning. Under this legislation, money is being siphoned off from the private sector without leaving the worker, the businessman or the entrepreneur enough incentive to set themselves reasonable goals so that they will derive some lasting benefits from the fruits of their toil. There must surely be a set of long-term priorities established as a basis for tax policy. Reform may be necessary, but the winds of reform must not leave the Canadian taxpayer like a shorn lamb more exposed than ever to the rigours of a climate which is becoming more inhospitable for private initiative. I believe my views on this legislation are somewhat comparable to those expressed by William A. MacDonald, who stated at the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association in September 1971:

With regret I have concluded that the new bill represents a giant step backwards in relation to the deepest political issue of our times—the continued possibility of maintaining freedom—under the law—as the unique characteristic of the western political tradition.

To the need for maintaining freedom in our country I would add that there is a basic need to maintain confidence in our country. This government cannot continue to endlessly nibble away at the operating framework of Canadian business with such things as tax reforms, the Canada Development Corporation and the proposed competition act, plus other socialistic, bureaucratic acts which hamstring and interfere with the free enterprise system. That is my feeling. Is it any wonder when you look at the new tax act, and the manner in which this government has overloaded Canadian taxpayers and Canadian industry, that Canadian business has this year been hesitant to invest in new job-creating capital ventures? Why are we not going forward? There is no shortage, as I read the Financial Post, the Financial Times and other such papers, in this country of investment capital. In fact, there is more encouragement given by financial institutions to borrow money today than ever before. Why are we not going forward; what is lacking in this country today? The answer that is coming through to everyone and which should be coming through even to those who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, and occupy the treasury benches, is that Canadians lack confidence in this government.

That is the problem. They lack confidence in a government whose failures do not provide sufficient incentive to our Canadian businessmen so that they will invest in new plants and in new equipment. This is why we keep suggesting and we keep asking for tax cuts. I believe tax cuts would stimulate both business investment and consumer demand and should, therefore, be implemented immediately. To do this, however, the government would have to cut down on its own wasteful handouts, cut down on its own extravagance. This government has demonstrated its generosity in giving handouts, both where the need is real and many times where the need is questionable. However, it has not to date demonstrated its ability to deal with such fundamental needs as creating a climate for honest work, sound business investment and stable prices. Yet these are basic values which must be encouraged if we are to get our economy rolling again and provide employment and real opportunities for our people.

What are our export people, those engaged in exporting goods in this country, saying today? As a member of the Board of Governors of Waterloo Lutheran University, I receive from time to time articles covering statements made at the various teaching seminars at that university. Mr. E. Cayley Hill, a Goderich businessman accompanied the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) on his recent mission to the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Pepin: A very fine gentleman.

Mr. Crouse: The minister interjects to say that he is a very fine gentleman. With that I concur, and I hope that the minister will listen carefully to what I am about to read concerning that very fine gentleman's views as expressed at Waterloo Lutheran University. Mr. Hill told a class of students and businessmen on Tuesday October 5 that Canada needs exports to continue the expansion of its economy. The news report I have reads:

Speaking to a session in international marketing, a seminar series at Waterloo Lutheran University arranged by Dr. Herman Overgaard, professor of international business, Mr. Hill said:

"Canada needs 2,600,000 new jobs in the 1970's making it crucial that Canada broaden its economic goals and diversify into every feasible market in the world. We cannot afford to rely on only one market—be it the U.S. or any other country. But diversification provides the necessary continuity and stability we require when any one market is disrupted".

The world-travelling Mr. Hill is vice president and general manager of the Dominion Road Machinery Company, a firm that operates from a small Ontario town but regards the entire world as its market. Mr. Hill warned his listeners that the proposed U.S. domestic international sales corporation, usually called DISC, could become law this fall and will encourage more manufacturing for world trade within the United States at the expense of Canadian firms.

He insisted—

These are the words I want to emphasize to the minister.

that in a private enterprise economic system such as exists in Canada business and not government—

Again, I emphasize that.

—should have the predominant voice. Only through better business practices, better policing of our own activities, can we bring the initiative back where it belongs.

The only way this can happen, he said, was for the individual businessman, as well as business associations, to improve their record and insist that they are in fact more competent to manage their affairs than is 'big government'. Industry must make itself heard and government should listen.

Those are his words, and I hope the government will take them to heart. This government is now well into its fourth year in office and with time running out I submit that it will soon have to move forward or the Canadian people will ask that it move out.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the other day while going through some documents of the Department of National Revenue, I noted with interest that until the end of July there had been income tax refunds to the extent of something like $704 million. These were for personal income tax overpayments, and amounted to around 10 per cent of the amount the government collects in personal income taxes. It would almost seem that there was a deliberate practice of overtaxing, but I think that a question of morality is involved when you have tax rebates of this extent. It is not always the government's fault. Certainly, the taxpayers do not always report changes in their circumstances, such as the birth of a child, which would increase their exemptions. Often charitable donations are not reported, and I am sure that a good many Canadians look on the business of overtaxing as a sort of enforced saving. However, this is a costly way to save and it is not convenient when you consider that it is the employer who is doing the bookwork for you. The scale of deductions is calculated to recover all the taxes owing in a given year, and on that basis the denial of the department that it is overtaxing is quite right, I think. However, the principle is wrong in practice when refunds to the extent of 10 per cent of the amount collected have to be made.

From the practical point of view, we know that it is far easier for the government to make a refund than it is to collect more taxes if the taxpayer has not paid enough. But then the question of whether the master exists for the benefit of the servant arises. I think that is the question here. Is there a law or practice hallowed by custom which requires the taxpayer to exist for the convenience of his servant, which is the government? I think it is important that we consider that concept. It is becoming all too evident these days that the servant is actually becoming the master of the people of Canada. This has become apparent in other fields also.

I have an article here which appeared in the Edmonton Journal in which Mr. McWilliam, president of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, is quoted. He is speaking about wheat, of course, but in the same general context of whether the master exists for the benefit of the servant. It reads:

> Farmers in Canada are totally dependent on bureaucrats, says J. E. McWilliam, president of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange.
> And if this situation is allowed to continue, the country's farmers will be "controlled out of the world's markets."

Then, he goes on to refer to the Canadian agricultural situation which, he said:

> . . . is totally immersed in the philosophy of the producer going to Ottawa for instructions.
> Government control and regulation of farm production can only serve to hold back agriculture . . .

I think the general tenor there can be related to this overpayment of taxes. Mr. McWilliam goes on to say:

> The farmer should never be put in the untenable position of having to react to the bureaucrats. It is the farmer who should decide the production.
> Instead of the production decisions going from bureaucrat to minister to farmer, it must be from farmer to minister to bureaucrat.

When one applies this to the concept of taxation under which the master exists for the convenience of the servant, one finds that the question of morality arises. In so far as our free enterprise system is concerned, I would hope we would want to see it continued in this country, although it is not evident that the government feels this way.

I think that this point has been made by the Bar Association and by many of the groups which have studied the tax bill. They feel that the language of the present tax bill is far too complicated for the layman to comprehend. Let me read what the Canadian Bar Association had to say about this. One can well imagine that if lawyers have difficulty in interpreting the act a layman does not have much chance. Ronald D. Bell of Calgary says:

> . . . if the new bill's concepts are "difficult of comprehension, they seem remarkably clear compared with the language construction which purports to convey same to the Canadian public".
> Mr. Bell said lawyers entering the taxation field periodically will find "it absolutely impossible from reading the bill to obtain a working knowledge of the new system".
> The government should not have released details of the proposed tax reforms until the new concepts had been put in clear language, he said.

Here we have a lawyer saying that lawyers who go into the tax field periodically will have a great deal of difficulty in comprehending the tax bill. I suggest that we can all foresee great problems arising from a tax bill which cannot be interpreted by citizens of average intelligence. Certainly, this business of having something that is mysterious, of language that no one can comprehend, will never work in the long run because of the misunderstandings and the animosities that will build up toward the government and the department of internal revenue. There are many organizations that have made this point. There is another article which appeared in the Financial Post in the column by William A. MacDonald, which reads:

> The bill fails to maintain an even hand between the tax administration and the taxpayer. Complexities are felt justified to protect the revenue, but are often not felt justified for fair treatment to all taxpayers.
> For example, a number of items are included in income without comparable deductions, what I call reverse revenue leakage. In a number of cases, penal amounts of tax are payable out of all proportion to any assumed offence.

He is referring to the penalty clauses here. He goes on to say:

> Finally, in a very few cases, there is still explicit or implicit retroactivity.

Then, he goes on to speak about the language that was referred to by the Bar Association:

> Finally, and by far the most important reason, the structure and language ensures that fewer and fewer Canadians will understand less and less about a law destined to have a more than ever pervasive impact on more and more Canadians.
> The result will be that where taxpayers understand the advice given them by professionals, they can be almost certain the advice is wrong. It is only if they don't understand it that there will at least be the chance that the advice may be right.
> If the medium is indeed the message, only one conclusion is possible—the new tax reform is fundamentally hostile to people. It is only friendly to the computer.

I suggest that that will be a very difficult thing to live with through the years. I refer to the draftsmanship of the bill itself. There is the ever-present possibility of many interpretations. This is a matter that needs to be changed and clarified before the bill becomes law. As Canadians, we want our laws to be such that most people can understand and comply with them without needing the constant help of professional advisers. If ordinary people need the help of professional advisers to comply with the terms of this bill, the result will be that only the more affluent will be able to take advantage of some of its beneficial provisions.

The cost of compliance will be an increased cost to the economy. It will be incorporated as another business cost, to be reflected in increased prices of goods and services. Many judgments will be subject to error and ambiguity. Much damage will be done, not only to individuals but to the attitude people generally have toward the country's final authority.

Has there been sufficient consultation with the provinces and municipalities on this tax legislation? It is all right to come out with federal tax legislation specifying the exemptions, but if there has not been sufficient consultation with the provinces and municipalities to discover what their future tax needs will be, the end result may be totally unrealistic. It has been projected that costs at the municipal and provincial levels will rise at a rate many times that projected for increased taxation at the federal level. This problem is not considered at all in the legislation.

In this regard I would like to quote from the Globe and Mail of July 8 last, which reads:

> One item among finance minister Edgar Benson's tax reform proposals has been largely overlooked. Since it will dip into the pockets of Ontario people for more than $58 million of federal tax money annually (and into the pockets of British Columbia and Alberta people for lesser amounts), the oversight has been rather monumental.
> The proposal is that which will require employees to add to their taxable income any part of their medicare premiums whichis paid by their employers. In most cases—and that is a lot of cases in Ontario—the employer pays 50 per cent of the premium.
> The proposal is about as brazenly discriminatory as could be imagined. It will discriminate in the favour of people who live in provinces that pay medical insurance costs out of general revenue instead of extracting them by way of premiums, and against people who live in provinces that levy premiums. It will discriminate in favour of people who live in provinces that are not highly unionized, and against people who live in provinces that are highly unionized.
> The net result—as anybody who understands Ottawa's prejudices will instantly recognize—will be to discriminate against the people of Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia—what Ottawa considers the have-provinces. The measure, however, will not hit Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, it will hit their people, in a heavy and unequal fashion in which it will not hit the people elsewhere in Canada.
> As between taxpayer and taxpayer it is inequitable—and, it must be feared, designed to be inequitable—and that cannot be defended. It is also an invasion of provincial rights. Ottawa invaded the provincial jurisdiction in the first place when it used its taxing powers to force universal medicare on the provinces—health care being constitutionally a provincial jurisdiction. The new measure will further compel provinces to adopt a certain kind of medicare—the kind that is paid for out of general revenue. This will infuriate provinces that have instituted premiums for the philosophically defensible reason that they believe it is healthier for citizens to recognize, by paying premiums, that medical services do not come free but represent a heavy cost paid by the taxpayer.

I think it is important for us to realize that many of these services just do not fall out of heaven; they all must be paid for by someone, somewhere. This legislation has far reaching implications for the agricultural industry. We have the matter of recapture depreciation being brought into income. In other words, where farmers used to calculate their capital cost allowances on the straight line method, this will be done away with on inception of the new act. In many instances, when farmers or ranchers take good care of costly agricultural machinery and that machinery has been fully depreciated, it still has a great deal of value. I think it is only a matter of seven years until a tractor is fully depreciated. A new tractor may cost up to $20,000, so a farmer with a well-cared for, older tractor may get a trade-in allowance of $6,000 or $7,000. Under this legislation the money he receives as trade-in will be brought into his income for tax purposes.

This is particularly unfortunate at a time when farmers are in a continuous cost-price squeeze. In many cases they receive no more for their products than they did 20 years ago. In order to keep pace they have to expand their operations and keep in touch with technological advances. As a result, they are in a very unfortunate position when faced with recapture depreciation being brought into income.

One of the other matters that I think should be reconsidered is the elimination of the basic herd. The basic herd supposedly is to be terminated by the end of this year. I feel strongly that this is an error in policy. There is real need for a system whereby the farmer can treat his investment in livestock as a capital investment. Consider for example, the problem of the farmer who wishes to take money out of capital in order to add to an existing herd. From his standpoint he has a capital asset which cannot be depreciated. The acquisition of cattle is an expense if he is on a cash basis of accounting, giving him a number of years of severe losses—which is not uncommon in the ranching areas of the foothills—which would not be corrected by the averaging system. To operate on an accrual basis with annual evaluation of the herd is totally impractical if only because the cattle market fluctuates with the availability of feed.

I suggest that we should consider a continuation of the basic herd provision in the proposed act, because farming requires more capital than ever before. Governments have been encouraging farmers to consolidate smaller units, to take advantage of technology and of every innovation. But this would put another severe strain on capital. One of the effects of the basic herd provision has been to create herds without the investment of money from outside. We need a provision that will allow livestock to be shown as a capital asset.

There is one special point which should be dealt with in respect of the valuation of the basic herd on valuation day—that of valuable breeding stock. This has become important in recent years because of the importation of many exotic breeds of cattle. Unless provision is made for deviation in respect of the valuation day concept, we shall run into difficulties. In the case of animals put into insemination centres, or imported animals requiring tests, the results of such tests alone will prove the value of the animal; therefore, there should be a provision for later determination of valuation day value on that basis.

I believe the matter of the family farm corporation needs review. In the last decade an increasing number of farmers have sought to hold their financial position and guarantee continuity as a basic family farm enterprise, and some have incorporated with this in mind. We should make certain that any provisions which are applicable to the individual farmer are also applicable to the family farm corporation. There are, of course, farming corporations to which this would not apply but there could be a provision which would tie the two together. I suggest that if 75 per cent or more of the shares in the family farm corporations were owned by members of the family, it should be treated as if it were an individual farmer. Certainly, if the major part of income were derived from the corporate farm it should be treated in the same way as an individual farmer in regard to taxation.

Problems will arise in regard to the transfer of a farm within a family, whether by sale or inheritance, particularly on the question of realization of capital gains. To the best of my knowledge there is at present no provision for farms transferred within a family, except to the spouse, whether by sale or inheritance, without immediate realization of capital gain. This would be true of the sale or transfer of the farm to a son or of inheritance by the son of the farmer.

We are told that this problem might be avoided by estate planning and if there had been incorporation of the farm. We all know that a farm is a very dangerous place to live, that there are a great number of tractor accidents and that sort of thing. Suppose the farmer and his son were farming together and an accident befell the son to whom the majority of shares had been transferred. If the son died prior to the father, it could mean that the father would have to pay capital gains tax if he were still operating the farm corporation. We know that credit is about as tight as a G-string on most farms at the present time, so there must be in this act provisions to take care of the situation I have outlined. In 95 per cent of the farming operations with which I am familiar, payment of cash would put a great strain upon them.

I would strongly urge, therefore, that transfer of a farm to a son or daughter, whether by sale, gift or inheritance or whatever the circumstances, should carry with it no realization of capital gains so long as it stays within the basic family farm unit. The federal government's decision regarding the application of estate and gift taxes in the farming area does not settle the matter so far as the provinces are concerned. Many provinces will need to increase their revenues and some may be reviewing the question of estate taxes. Merely because the federal government will have dropped estate taxes does not mean that the provinces will drop them with regard to individual enterprises.

I suggest that replacing the estate tax with a capital gains tax will, in a great majority of cases, mean additional taxes. Certainly, in the case of Alberta this will be so. Since 1964, I think, estate taxes have been returned to the individual in Alberta. Therefore, the capital gains tax will be a brand new tax affecting farm enterprises. I suggest that merely looking at the federal scene and federal funding with respect to taxation of these units is not good enough: we must make sure that there is not a double levy of tax on these farming units.

May I now talk about the $1,000 exemption provision on principal residences. Under the new bill, a farmer must be resident on the farm during each year for which he is to qualify for the $1,000 farm exemption. I can foresee problems in this area. A great many farmers in the southern part of my province, Alberta, and a great many in Saskatchewan are occupied principally in farming; that is to say, they do little else. Yet because of road conditions, weather conditions, the division of school boundaries, and so on, they are not able to stay on their farms all the time. That means that they cannot always maintain residence on the farm unit for 12 months of the year, every year.

I suggest that it should be possible for taxpayers who engage in farming to utilize the $1,000 option even though they do not reside on the farm. This would solve other difficulties. For instance, the son might use the farm as his home while both father and son worked on the farm. The $1,000 exemption should apply to the farm itself and should be connected with the residence in which the farmer lives. I think the $1,000 per annum provision should also take into account the sale of the principal residence. I say that because many farmers who retire may want to continue living in their homes on the farm. You often read of cases of a son taking over the farm and of a mother and father deciding to retire and live in the residence they occupied on the farm. I think it is important for us to reconsider this provision.

I think another concept related to farm financing should be reconsidered. It should be possible for a farmer to sell his land and reinvest the proceeds in another farm without incurring capital gains tax. Often the reorganization of a farming enterprise is vital. Farmers might review their operations and decide to consolidate—perhaps to go into a hog enterprise and undertake more building. A farmer may want to sell land and reinvest the money realized in buildings, equipment or some other type of operation. The provisions of the bill should make allowances for this.

A farmer should be able to realize his capital from his land and put it into other land, buildings or equipment without paying capital gains tax in the process. It may be useful to point out that at present extensive averaging is permitted with respect to capital gains in certain enterprises. The farmer should have the opportunity to reinvest his money in farming.

I now wish to talk about valuation day in the area of agriculture. Since the valuation is related to the nature of assets, I submit that the government should introduce a valuation year instead of a valuation day. I do not think that the grouping of assets in various categories merely for valuation day will work very well. Many factors have to be considered here, including the depreciated value and condition of assets, and so on. I think that the concept of valuation day relating to farming enterprises ought to be reviewed also.

I think that about 45 per cent of the income of Canadians goes in taxes which are paid to one of the three levels of government. It has been said—I forget by whom—that the power to tax is the power to destroy. When you see how the rate of taxation has crept up since income tax was introduced in the First World War, how the percentage of our income taken in taxes continually increases, and how governments get bigger and bigger and take more and more, you begin to realize that it is only a matter of time before the burden being imposed on the people will be too much for them to carry. Every day you see people throwing up their hands, leaving the work force and going on the welfare rolls. They are maintained through various government income distribution or redistribution schemes.

Fewer and fewer people are carrying the tax load. We must stop this trend if our system is to continue and if we are not to become mere slaves of the state. I do not think the people who are supporting the bill really want this situation for Canada. I do not think that is their concept for Canada. We must take a hard look at the matter because taxes today are taking about 45 per cent of the total income of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue if he has unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is not an easy task to discuss this voluminous and very broad bill in general terms, yet this is what is required to be done at second reading. I think, regardless of the way in which the situation is disguised, no bill to reform taxation can fool the public into believing that it would reduce their taxation in the long run.

There are several provisions in the bill which have on the surface some beneficial results for groups of people, yet when you look into them more carefully you find that they are not beneficial at all but in fact work against the people they appear to benefit. I should like to discuss three or four of these provisions in the time available to me. I think I can expose some of the tricky features which can easily deceive people. These provisions should be made very clear and understandable.

The first provision in the bill which has tended to confuse a number of people is that the government said, "We are going to abolish the estate tax." That sounded good. Many people came to me at the beginning and said, "That is good; they are going to abolish the estate tax and we do not have to go through all the shenanigans we have been going through getting lawyers to act in our interest in respect of estate tax and paying large sums of money to the government. It will be great with no estate tax."

Of course, this is not the case at all. In fact, in the Estate Tax Act at the present time provision is made for a basic exemption of $50,000 for every Canadian on which amount the estate is not required to pay tax at all. Certain people—for example, a husband with a wife and several children—are entitled to exemptions greater than that. They can claim up to $90,000 of exemptions under existing tax provisions. So for the average Canadian it is the exemption which counts in terms of the Estate Tax Act, not the tax itself. The average individual with a small estate or with an estate of reasonable size is concerned only about the exemption. When he is looking at his will, he says, "I have $60,000 or $80,000 of exemption and my widow will have to pay no succession duty at all since we have this small estate."

The situation under the new bill is that there is no estate tax but that a capital gains tax has been substituted for it. And the capital gains tax does not contain any provision for exemptions; you are taxed from the first dollar. This is why I say the provision is tricky. There is no exemption. You cannot look at your estate and say, "It is only a small one, so there will be no tax." The government will take from the first dollar you have. They call it capital gains; they do not call it estate tax.

Calculations have been made which indicate that it will cost more for the average Canadian under the proposed new system of taxation than it would have cost under the previous estate tax legislation, because now he starts out with a few thousand dollars, as most people do, and every time he makes a dollar either by income or by capital gains it is taxed. So he is taxed all the way through his lifetime. Then, if he has anything left at the time of his death he is taxed again. I see no benefit whatever for the taxpayer. The proposed capital gains tax is really a disguised estate tax and it does not benefit the average Canadian in any way.

A similar situation arises in the case of the gift tax. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) announced that the government proposed to abolish gift taxes. People said, "That is great; there will no longer be a gift tax." But the gift tax act, from my limited experience in the practice of law, was used mainly in relation to the exemptions which the law provided. Again, exemptions were allowed to the extent of $2,000. You could give to any number of relatives in a year a considerable sum of money, taking advantage of the exemptions in the gift tax provisions. And this is what people did; they used the benefit of the exemptions in order to make, for example, a substantial gift to a child. A great many people have been taking back a mortgage and writing if off each year as a means of making gifts to a child, or to several children, quite legally and properly, without paying a cent in taxation. It was the exemptions that people watched; it was the exemptions that they used.

At one time the exemption was $1,000, so they gave away $1,000. They kept within the limit of the exemption. The exemption was raised to $2,000, so they gave away $2,000. It was all perfectly legal and proper. Very seldom, in my experience, did anyone give more than the exemption covered, because once they got beyond the basic exemption they had to pay tax, and most people preferred to take their chances with estate tax after they had gone than to pay gift tax at the time of the gift.

The government says it is abolishing the gift tax. What it is really abolishing are the exemptions. So under the new proposals, if you make a gift to a child you are deemed to have realized the asset which you give. It is just the same as if you had sold it or disposed of it in any other way. You are deemed to have realized it and you are taxed on it under the capital gains tax provision. You are taxed from the first dollar. There is now no $2,000 exemption. Although this measure is supposed to be a benefit, it offers none that I can see.

We had two provisions here, both of which were used by the public for the exemptions they offered rather than for the tax they charged. These exemptions were abolished. So the good has gone with the bad, though in the two former acts there was a good deal more good than bad. These provisions were of particular benefit to those with small estates and small incomes. The exemptions were applied across the board, and to a person with a $10 million estate a $50,000 exemption meant very little when his estate tax was paid. However, to a person with a $40,000 estate the exemption meant a good deal more; in effect, he paid no estate tax. Once the value of the estate got within the $100,000 bracket, at least one half or perhaps three-quarters of the estate was exempt from tax.

The same situation prevailed in the application of the gift tax. A wealthy person who wanted to give away a lot of money to his dependants or make a bequest for the benefit of the public, never used the gift tax provisions. If he wanted to dispose of his estate he would set up a charitable trust of some sort. Trusts can be set up in many ways to avoid taxation. For example, if you set up a trust, a corporation or a charitable organization, you paid no tax. This is the way the wealthy solved their tax problems. They never used the gift tax provisions. After all, what good was a $2,000 exemption to a millionaire? None at all. The people who used those provisions were citizens of average means.

Many of these people have come to my office and told me that although they do not have very much in the way of an estate they would like to hand something down to their children. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, there are some foolish people in this world who want to pass on everything to their children and in the process stint themselves. In some cases they pass on their wealth to children who do not deserve it, who do not need it or who throw it away when they get it. However, that is beside the point.

Some people spend their lives earning money with only one thing in mind, namely, leaving something to their children. It was these people who used the gift tax exemptions and the exemptions under the Estate Tax Act. But, as I say, both these exemptions have been abolished and these people of modest means have now lost the only hiding place they had from government taxation. On the other hand, people with large estates remain untouched by this legislation.

I do not think I have overstated the position. The point is that the abolition of estate tax and gift tax has been no gift to the average Canadian. If it has helped anybody at all, it is the Canadian government. So I hope I have demolished the idea that has gained some ground, that the abolition of estate and gift taxes was a good thing. I think it was a bad thing.

I should like to deal with another problem that is bothering many people at the moment. I have had dozens of inquiries from people who are wondering how to value real estate which they may one day sell. They have perhaps 100 acres of bushland which might be developed one day, or a piece of waterfront property which, though perhaps isolated at the moment, may soon be served by a road, or perhaps a piece of vacant property that they hope to sell to a builder. These people want to know what will be the position if the government imposes a capital gains tax on real estate and their property is sold one day. The only advice I can give them is to value their property this year, and if it is sold in the future the capital gains tax will be paid on the difference. They then ask me who is going to value the property in 1971, and I tell them that no one is. They reply that somebody must be going to value it, otherwise how can a valuation be fixed?

As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, no one is going to value their property this year. I think it would be an administrative impossibility for the government to undertake such a task. They would be silly to try to value every piece of real estate in Canada and therefore the government are not going to make any valuations. The private individual has no obligation to do so, so what is the holder of a piece of real estate going to pay tax on if he subsequently sells it?

I have been advising these people to get their property valued this year, and I think this is the best advice I can give them. Having obtained a valuation from an accredited valuer and put it away in their little safety deposit boxes, if they have had a reliable valuation and they sell their property in 1975, they have a valuation that was based on current values. It would be most difficult for a real estate valuer or a departmental valuer to look back in 1975 and to say, "Well, you bought your property in 1965, you are selling it in 1975, so what was it worth in 1971? It would be very difficult to make any valuation four years removed from that date, and if a valuation were made of a large piece of real estate this could mean a swing either way of $4,000, $5,000 or even $10,000. So as far as this capital gains tax is concerned, valuation represents a real problem.

Another matter that should be taken into account is that real estate rises and falls in value in accordance with many other factors. There is no way of fixing once and for all the value of a piece of real estate because its value can change if a new development commences nearby. In such an event it could suddenly be worth four or five times its previous value. Changes in the stock market can also influence its value. If the stocks and bonds market becomes bad, investors tend to turn to real estate, and vice versa. Its value also depends on the need for housing in the community or on the development of the community. There are so many different factors that can influence the value of a piece of real estate. Therefore it will be very difficult to value property. As I say, the only protection for a member of the public is to have his property valued by a real estate valuer.

I think the amusing part of this situation is that some of my clients have already had their real estate valued by real estate valuers who are accustomed to valuating for succession duty purposes. Their valuations are low because this has been the way they have done it for years, and there is always a haggle between a private valuation and a valuation by the government tax department. Valuations are not exactly accurate because people in different areas place different values on real estate.

This is a real catch in the legislation and I have no idea how the government intends to deal with it. I suspect that in every case there will be a fight between the Department of National Revenue and the individual. This will mean that individuals will have their real estate valued at their own expense and that government officials will, at public expense, do the valuations. This will put a lot of small property holders, average citizens, to great expense. They will have to pit their abilities against the ability of the government. This may not sound too bad, but it is difficult to go into a small community and get a lawyer, a real estate valuer and a tax adviser in order to contest the findings of well trained people in government circles. In the long run, government assessments are accepted. In this situation the public will be reamed once again.

An hon. Member: Is that a parliamentary word?

Mr. Aiken: I will accept a question, if it is one. If it is not, I will continue my comments.

An hon. Member: It is one of the Prime Minister's favourite words.

Mr. Baldwin: It has been accepted since 1968, because that is what has been happening to the public.

Mr. Aiken: There is one thing I cannot understand and, perhaps because I am stupid, I have been trying to figure it out for 15 years. I have in mind the method of calculating tax for a professional person. I have been practising law and have always followed what is generally called the cash receipts basis. I do some work for an individual and he pays me. Perhaps I charge him $50 and I have paid out $15, so his bill is $65. I pay tax on the $50, which is what I received. At the end of the year I add up the dollars I have received as fees and that total is what I use as the basis for tax. That is my profit. I think that is a reasonable arrangement for all taxpayers because it is what they receive. I think it is reasonable for the tax collector, because he collects taxes on what has been received.

I have never been able to understand the accountant's dream, which is what I call the system the government is trying to put into effect under this bill. Under this system individuals can swindle the government every time. As soon as you send out a bill you charge for that amount because that is the money you are supposed to receive. You may never receive it, or you may receive only half, but you do not know that when you send out the bill. You may charge someone you will never see again, or someone from whom you will never collect. In any event, you send out the bill and pay tax on it.

At the end of the year you are allowed to write off what you expect you will never receive. What you have is a double negative. You bill for what you might receive and then you write off what you think you might not receive. You pay taxes on what you have left. Perhaps this is very simple—but it does not matter how much you write off or how much you actually lose, you go according to the book. You are allowed to write off perhaps three times as much as you are going to lose or that you think you might lose.

An hon. Member: You better get better accounting advice.

Mr. Aiken: My hon. friend knows as well as I that I am telling the truth. The government is substituting a system which is vulnerable to abuse at both ends. In any event, this is what I call an accountant's dream, because anyone can swindle the government. I do not care what my hon. friend thinks about it, I know that is what would happen. This is not a valid system. It may be great for large enterprises, but for a person who does not want to spend all his life keeping books for the government, which is what my hon. friend would want us to do, it is a terrible system.

[Mr. Aiken.]

Mr. Blair: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Aiken: Certainly.

Mr. Blair: Would the hon. member explain why businessmen in this country are required to keep their books in accordance with the accrual system and why he thinks, as a professional man, that he is entitled to a special privilege?

Mr. Aiken: I did not say I was entitled to any special privilege; I suggest that because you have one stupid system is no reason for having another one.

An hon. Member: That's pretty weak, Gordon.

Mr. Aiken: No, it is not. In any event, I see it is four o'clock.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

COMPULSORY CARRYING OF IDENTIFICATION CARD

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately consider the advisability of requiring Canadian citizens and immigrants to carry an identification card.

Mr. Speaker, before dealing with this notice of motion, which I put on the Order Paper on October 27, 1970, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) on his new appointment. I am convinced it is due to his competence, his ability and his devotion to public affairs.

As I said, that notice of motion was placed on the order paper on October 27, 1970. It was called once before on September 24. On that occasion, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), who was piloting Bill C-243, an Act to amend the Judges Act and the Financial Administration Act, asked me whether I would agree to postpone debate on my notice of motion, a request I was pleased to comply with, after having obtained unanimous consent of the House. In fact, the House adopted the bill that day.

Obviously, my notice of motion, filed in October 1970 following the tragic happenings in Quebec, was perhaps at that time a reaction to current events.

Besides, at the present time, we have similar reactions in other areas. For instance, the government reacted when the 10 per cent surcharge was imposed by the President of the United States, and we reacted by introducing a bill to support employment in Canada.

Of course, I also reacted at that time, after having asked my constituents for their views. I had received their approval and almost all were unanimous in thinking that perhaps circumstances were such as to favour the revival of the debate on identity cards.

The motion itself says, and I quote:

—the government should immediately consider—

I am not requesting that we require immediately that people carry an indentification card, because I believe it is more important to consider the arguments for and against this before taking a decisive step on the matter.

I also said that we must, and I continue the quotation:

—requiring Canadian citizens and immigrants to carry an identification card.

And maybe we should add that every resident citizen in Canada should be required to carry such a card.

So I believed it was important to clarify the text because the matter has been much questioned, it has prompted a controversy among newspapermen and, obviously, it will be discussed until a more definite position is taken.

I must point out that personally, I am in favour of a compulsory identification card for all Canadian residents unless, of course, I am given evidence that I am wrong in my present approach to the problem.

I would like also to thank the Library's management who has forwarded to me a considerable amount of literature on this subject and part of my comments this afternoon are actually based on this information.

Indeed, my remarks this afternoon will not necessarily detail all the pros and cons in respect of identity cards, but I am sure that most of these arguments will prove to be well-grounded. Hon. members will thus have an opportunity of considering my comments and letting me know whether they feel that the government should give priority to this issue.

Should anyone care to know some of the historical background of this question, one must go back far enough into the history of the province of Quebec. In this respect, I have received from the Library an excerpt of pages 157 and 158 of an article entitled: "Electoral legislation in Quebec".

At first, the main argument in favour of an identity card was that it would help prevent electoral frauds. Since then things have greatly changed and today an identity card would be more related to other needs than to prevent electoral fraud.

But it is interesting to note that the Union National party had approved in 1936 a legislation to the effect that each voter should produce his identity card before entering an election office. For one reason or another, this law was repealed before the 1939 elections and voters were not required then to show their identity cards before casting their vote in the ballot box.

Under Camilien Houde an attempt was made to introduce such a card and again the only argument put forward was that an ID card could prevent election fraud.

The municipal election in 1962 carried a referendum on a mandatory I.D. card, and 75 per cent of the Montreal voters registered their approval.

Later, Mayor Jean Drapeau and Mr. Lucien Saulnier, President of the Executive Committee went before the Quebec Legislature and asked that a clause calling for a mandatory I.D. card be included in the constitution of the City of Montreal.

At the time Daniel Johnson was premier of the province of Quebec and after lengthy talks it seemed that the idea was dismissed though the population had strongly favoured it.

In that connection I would like to quote from an anonymous article published in Le Devoir of April 10, 1967 and entitled "The I.D. Card and the Fears of a Police State". It reads:

• (4:10 p.m.)

Five years ago, in a referendum before the 1962 municipal election, the Montreal population overwhelmingly endorsed the introduction of a mandatory identification card. Apparently this referendum was useless because the discussions held in Quebec City when the amendments to the charter of the City of Montreal came under study indicated that the identification card was not forthcoming.

In 1963, another minister of the province of Quebec, Mr. Lafrance, took over the idea. He launched an important campaign advocating the need for an identification card. The card would no longer be mandatory.

On December 11, 1963, Pierre O'Neill said in La Presse:

The Family and Social Welfare Department is about to launch a major campaign to have the principle of the identification card accepted by the citizens of the province of Quebec.

The card Mr. Lafrance is thinking about would not be mandatory, but it is almost certain it will be some day. Besides, the minister makes no mystery about his final objective.

We are already aware of how strong will be the opposition the minister will have to face. Large segments of our population and especially the intellectuals strongly oppose this measure.

A fierce battle may be expected.

Apparently, the battle did not last long because this proposal made by Quebec minister Lafrance came to a dead-end. But in 1967, the judges in the province of Quebec held a conference and spoke in favour of an identity card for all Canadian citizens. I would like to quote from a few articles published at the time of this conference. An unsigned article published in Le Soleil on September 20, 1967, stated partly under the headline "La carte d'identité":

Identity cards are an easy way to track down criminals. Quite astonishingly, groups which are the most vehemently opposing frauds of all kinds and which are demanding the use of drastic procedures for proving identity are against identity cards. They always put forward the fallacious argument of individuals rights whereas identity cards would apply equally to all citizens and are becoming more and more necessary to ensure the protection of both the citizens and the community.

And Roger Champoux, in an article published in La Presse on 19 September, stated partly, and I quote:

Identity cards were mentioned at the time of Mayor Camillien Houde and the system was initiated. Cards were printed, photos taken by the thousands and then, without any explanation, the whole business was dropped. From time to time, emphasis is being given to compulsory identity cards, as is happening now;

This is, of course, also true in 1972. The article continued:

... the papers indulge in a bit of classical editorial—the present case; everybody agrees that it is no more shameful to show one's identity card than one's passport at a customs office ...

Another La Presse report had this to say on the resolution of the conference of judges, and I quote:

Among the other proposals accepted by the assembly, one deals with a request which will be presented at the same time to the federal government and the provincial government in order that the identity card be made compulsory. According to the assembly, that card should be related both to the judiciary and the police.

It is alleged that many will shout police state, but such a card would be very important to some industries and businesses like banks and others.

The ultimate purpose of that step would be to enable the police to fight the underworld.

The arguments in favour of compulsory identification cards have evolved over the years, from 1936 up to that meeting of judges where they started considering the matter of compulsory identification cards not only to prevent fraudulent elections but also for other purposes, namely, judicial and police purposes.

Shortly afterwards, the Chamber of Notaries announced it was in favour of an identification card, and here it might be timely to consider the arguments used by the notaries on that occasion. They can be found in the December 9, 1967 issue of the newspaper La Presse, in an article signed by Mr. Léopold Lizotte and entitled:

Notaries request identification cards and family booklets Gathered together for their annual banquet, last night, in Château Champlain, the Montreal district notaries have asked the Minister of Justice of the province to establish in Quebec official and compulsory identification cards and family booklets in order to help the administration of justice and prevent countless frauds.

Addressing himself directly to Mr. Jean-Jacques Bertrand, the guest of honour at the meeting, the president of the Montreal District Notaries' Association, Mr. André Labonté, submitted that despite all precautions, and the legendary prudence of notaries, it was at the time impossible for notaries to absolutely ascertain the identity of the people appearing before them.

Since then, and especially in 1970-1971, several intermediary bodies, including the trucking industry council, have declared themselves in favour of such an identification card.

Evidently, the question gained momentum on the occasion of the October 1970 events, which proves what I was saying at the outset. At that time I was given generous publicity by the reporters; I received numerous letters and telegrams from people from all walks of life. Moreover, the Quebec judges conference sent me a letter dated November 2, 1970 signed by the chairman, Mr. Justice Marcel Marier of the Municipal Court of the city of Montreal, 775 Gosford Street, Montreal. Here it is:

Dear Mr. Leblanc:

We were informed that a notice of motion has been introduced in the House of Commons requiring all Canadian citizens to carry an identification card.

You will find enclosed a copy of a resolution that was unanimously approved by the Quebec judges in 1967. You may be sure of the support from all our group.

Yours truly,

And here is the resolution:

WHEREAS the lack of adequate identification means gives rise to several obstacles in social, judiciary and commercial administration and especially as regards justice;

I will spare the House the whereases because time is running out. I will quote only the resolution.

BE IT RESOLVED THAT, following a proposal from Mr. Justice Jacques Trahan of the Court of the Sessions of the Peace, seconded by Mr. Justice Henri Masson Loranger of the Court of the Sessions of the Peace, the Quebec judges conference on the occasion of their present meeting, ask the Quebec Parliament to pass a legislation obliging the citizens to carry an identification card and be it also resolved that a copy of this resolution be sent to the federal Minister of Justice.

And right after I had filed that notice of motion, the Quebec Minister of Justice, Mr. Jérôme Choquette, found it necessary to make a statement in favour of an identity card in the province. On that occasion, discussions were held on the possibility that a province was not authorized under the constitution to make the carrying of an identity card compulsory. The federal Minister of Justice has raised doubts about the competence of the provinces to do so. I hope that this will not become an issue between Quebec and Ottawa, since Quebec has stated that it was in favour of the card after my notice of motion had been filed.

Evidently, arguments can be raised for or against. I would say that the arguments in favour deal with the concept of freedom. There would then be some constraint and it would be a source of troubles for the citizen who would be called upon quite often to show his card. We would have the establishment of a police or half-police state, which might perhaps lead to a dictatorship, and open the door to abuses of power. Freedom might be suspended.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I have given the negative arguments only. I should like, however, to state arguments in favour of an identity card, if hon. members will allow me to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five minutes!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Agreed.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): I thank the hon. members, Mr. Speaker.

As for the arguments in favour, I shall attempt to state them as quickly as possible, so as not to take too much time and allow other hon. members, who wish to do so, to speak on this matter. But it must be noted that what I am asking is that the government give priority to the consideration of an identification card.

In support of this measure, one could mention the protection it would give to the honest citizen and, as a corollary, the fact that it could be a working tool for the police forces. Such a card could ensure the protection of the community in case of riots or terrorist acts. It could help to fight not only electoral fraud but many other types of fraud now occurring in Canada, such as banking fraud, social assistance fraud, fraud with regard to all sorts of subsidies, to old age pensions, and so on. It would be of benefit to those who travel, both within the country and abroad. And such a card could replace a number of others already in existence, such as the social insurance card, the health insurance card, and so on.

I would also like to point out that in Canada we have the citizenship card and that, perhaps, the minister could give it more publicity while waiting for the government to consider the advisability of requiring citizens to carry an identification card.

As for me, I have become, in my riding, a keen advocate of this citizenship card. As a matter of fact, I carry one myself and I can identify myself better under certain circumstances. It could also help to verify the age of our young people for instance in places where alcoholic beverages are sold and in movie-houses. Today, some films are restricted to persons 18 and over and others to those who are 14 or over. Special rates are granted on planes, trains and buses. An identification card would be very useful in this regard.

I would have many more comments to make but let me say this: if we must have identification cards in Canada, they should be issued by the federal authorities rather than by the provinces because I can hardly see hon. members from our ten provinces sitting here together and having different identification cards, while we are forming one country, this great Canada, for which a great future is foreseen.

[English]

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Yes, with the permission of the hon. member who has spoken.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Very well.

Mr. Thomson: Does the social insurance card not serve part of the objective about which the hon. member is speaking?

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): I want to thank the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) for his question.

Obviously, this would partly be an identification card. It would perhaps not show all the identifying features of an actual identity card such as the holder's name, address, age, picture and finger-prints. If a police card is wanted, it would be important to show the finger-prints but this is a merely technical point.

What would be the minimum age for carrying such a card? Should it be issued to new-born babies or to youngsters twelve-years of age or over? This is why my notice of motion—and I am very grateful to the hon. member for his question—is so important because there are technical details involved.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, no doubt hon. members will allow me to offer you my heartiest congratulations on your accession to this most responsible function, and, relying on the small experience I have of it, I know, Mr. Speaker, that it will give you great satisfaction.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words this afternoon about the motion proposed by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc), because it seems to me that at present this matter is of special interest and of particular importance for our society.

The identification card issue is one about which everybody seems to have his own opinion, which is probably quite natural if one considers how much the use of those cards affects the whole community. It is also an issue which suggests frightening visions to many people. The police state, the "Big Brother" attitude, the interference in private life and the loss of individuality are among the familiar concepts which are invoked with regard to this proposal and which are very often brought forward as a reason to reject it. Therefore, if this idea is so frightening, it is essential that we discuss it carefully before taking a decision.

When I consider this problem, I try first to answer the following questions: What is an identification card? Does that paper have a special size, colour or shape? Does it show a special type of information? Is it something which one has to carry all the time? Does it serve only one purpose? My reply to all these questions is: not necessarily. Any paper which gives an indication of my identity is, in a sense, an identification card. And we use nowadays a great many papers of this kind. On the Canadian scene, public as well as private organizations issue a whole lot of papers which an individual needs in order to confirm a given status, to record an event, to be allowed a given activity, to establish a right, or to obtain goods or services more easily. I am talking about certificates, licences, passes, and membership or credit cards. Almost all those documents carry a certain value as evidence of identity, and they are generally accepted as such. In my opinion, one can hardly doubt their basic utility for the average citizen. I also believe that they will undoubtedly become increasingly important for the individual, the government, commercial organizations and business concerns, as the mobility of the population increases. More and more complex business relations and more frequent contacts between government and citizens will initiate the need for individual records. It is not merely or even mainly a matter of administrative efficiency; the idea is not to punish, but rather to assist the individual; it is more a matter of serving people than of saving money. We therefore see that the identification card is not necessarily such an ugly document as some people think.

However, this system of personal documentation as it is known to us today was not planned in advance. It is an answer to a need and the numerous and various interested agencies are not consulted about the public or private interest it could offer.

Most documents issued are delivered to the claimant on the strength of his own statements or, in some cases where this is not satisfying, on presentation of other documents obtained beforehand. When a driver's license is to be issued, the driver's ability is the main concern; for a credit card, the solvability is checked; the diploma is a proof of qualifications. The identification of the applicant is secondary to the prime object of the request, and the value of the card, for identification purposes, is usually rather negligible. The statements of the applicant are checked only where circumstances warrant it and the identity of the individual is rarely checked. It is therefore possible to commit acts of fraud or make false statements, and numerous documents can be produced in support of a false identity. Of course, most documents issued are based on accurate information, but the fact that some documents are not hurts the reputation of the system, in that the credibility of authentic documents is sometimes questioned.

Administrative needs require of an individual that he supply descriptive information repeatedly in the preparation of those documents. The information thus collected for various purposes have some common points and most details could be used in each case. That process which is repeated at all levels of government and in various organizations and corporations periodically gives rise to vexations and disadvantages for the citizen and creates administrative problems, since it increases efforts and lost time.

As a rule at least, the creation of a single organization, evidently coming under federal jurisdiction and having the responsibility for issuing identity cards to all, could cope with those difficulties. It would thus be possible to issue to a citizen reaching a specific age or to an immigrant at the time of his admittance in the country an identity card whose validity is guaranteed. Furthermore, I think that the situation would be improved generally if, on the one hand, a government body were responsible for the issuance of identity cards to persons applying for them, and if, on the other hand, the value of information so collected were acknowledged when other documents would have to be issued.

I have good reason to believe that many people would make the point that by compelling someone to do something, one restricts his freedom; generally, such restraints, particularly when used by the government, are unwelcome in a democracy such as ours. Only a few days ago, I was talking to someone who expressed his concern on this matter; in his view, an identity card was an infringement of personal freedom. "One of these days, out of a clear sky," said he, "the police will ask us our address". Of course, the police can obtain very quickly the address of car drivers. Ontario residents are even required to give within six days their address to the authorities.

Of course, we accept this obligation as essential in the general interest and this is part of the price we pay to use highways. However, we want the least possible of such restraints. This raises the following question: Should the identification card, if it is issued by government authorities, be compulsory. Is it necessary to give each and every citizen an identification card, whether he wants it or not? Is it even desirable? Until now I have said that an identification card is useful and that, in general, people have found it valuable in their relations with others outside their immediate surroundings. It is obvious that it represents an economical way of making dealings easier—and not only business transactions—even if it is not essential. Therefore, in my opinion, the individual must decide by himself. If he wants a card, he gets one, and his relations with the outside world are facilitated to the extent he uses it. On the other hand, if he prefers discretion or individualism to convenience, or if he is reluctant to the idea for any other reason, he will not be forced to have a card. Generally, people think that a system of registration or identification is only effective if it covers every citizen of a country, but I do not agree. Certainly, the more comprehensive it is, the more extended are its benefits; but the benefits that the community and the individuals will derive from it will not in any way be diminished due to the fact that a segment of the population, whether large or small, will not accept it.

While I do not want to compel anybody to participate in such a system, I hesitate to deprive someone from the opportunity of doing so because it would be imprudent or equivalent to waiving personal freedom. Those who are overseeing to the interests of their fellow citizens are sometimes overzealous when it comes to protecting people against their own foolishness or against what they believe, in their superior wisdom, to be foolishness. I do not see anything of the kind here.

My third point, Mr. Speaker, is this: the rights and freedoms of the individuals are adequately safeguarded if participation to a national system of identification is optional. I would add for the skeptical ones, that this system is used at the present time in France, and with success.

From what I have just said, it is obvious that I should also be against the obligation for citizens to carry an identity card on their person or produce it for scrutiny by the authorities. Certainly, should someone have the misfortune to be suspected of an offence of which he is innocent, an identity card might be the means of proving his good faith. Or again, if it were a matter of establishing a right, the holder of a card could resort to it in order to have his right recognized and granted more readily by the proper agency. In fact, those are some of the important purposes the document would clearly serve. But the decision as to whether the card should be carried around in order to enjoy the above-mentioned advantages should be left to the entire discretion of the individual. A driver or a pilot has to carry a permit attesting his ability to handle the vehicle for which he is responsible, a measure essential for the protection of the public. However, I see no parallel between a citizen going about his own business and the holder of an identity card, and certainly no reason to force him to produce such card like a schoolboy answering roll-call.

Since the system of national identification cards is often associated with storage into a computer of particulars about an individual, I deem it advisable to insist upon the very obvious fact that these are two quite different matters. It seems to me that the abuses which are sometimes associated with the use of computers in this field cannot arise as far as the identification cards are concerned if we consider the kind of information that will be found on them. It is obvious that such information is not of a private nature and I cannot imagine any conceivable situation in which information about professional ability or other subjective appreciations of all sorts would appear on such a document.

Therefore I cannot foresee any problem as far as that card is concerned, even if it were related in some way to a computer for the storage of the data.

I think however that we will face some problems; indeed the usefulness and the efficiency of every national system of identification cards rests to a great extent on its security aspect and, naturally, on its acceptance by the public. I suppose that security would apply to information provided on the card and to the formalities required for obtaining it. It would be absolutely necessary first to check the applicant's identity. There should be no opportunity for serious errors in the descriptive information, and the card itself should be designed in such a way that it would be practically impossible to forge it or alter it. Therefore, the first step in this process calls for the cooperation of the people and might create major problems, because in many cases, checking the identity of the applicant will bring on him many problems. If statements under oath supporting evidence for an application, the testimony of relatives or sponsors, or other forms of confirmation are required, the public might possibly react unfavourably. The value of the system will however depend greatly on the effectiveness of the measures taken at this stage. The descriptive information required on the card is rather obvious: the name and place of birth, the sex, the height, the blood group, the colour of the eyes, physical features least likely to be changed, as well as a photograph and the signature of the holder. Were it required to list distinctive marks like scars, birthmarks, or else fingerprints, the public would no doubt be against it, for, in the first case, it would be an invasion of privacy, and in the second, it would mean an unpleasant and useless requirement. The increased security of the system brought about by those additional identification methods is not essential to its proper operation, and it seems wise to forgo the meagre benefits they provide. I also believe it is possible, with our technical means and devices, to manufacture cheaply an identification card which would be difficult to use for fraudulent purposes; if this process does not provide an absolute guarantee against duplication or alteration, it is second only to the most sophisticated and expensive forgery techniques and allows the immediate tracking of rough alterations. By the same token, if it were possible to make a color identification card to which there would be a symbolic value, it would be quickly accepted by the public.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I find certain advantages in the use of an identification card issued by a governmental agency. I do not think it should be mandatory and I would object to a measure making it mandatory for Canadian citizens to carry one or to produce it on request. I recognize that such a system raises problems and can lead to abuses, but I think problems can be solved and abuses eliminated.

[English]

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will not take long because I know other hon. members wish to speak in this debate. I should like to say a few words and give my reasons for seconding this notice of motion.

I am grateful to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) for bringing forward this matter. I noted with interest his words and those of my colleague, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Iles de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard).

I am glad to second this motion. I think it is a motion that should be brought forward, discussed, examined from every angle with very long tongs, and then dropped into a furnace and burned. One word in the motion bothers me. I do not like the word "requiring". I wish that word had not been included. One could say identification cards are very useful. Yet if you were to say to a Canadian citizen, without embellishment, "You are required to carry an identification card," I think he would say, "I'll be damned if I will."

Under normal conditions an I.D. card is not acceptable. There may be some conditions, such as in wartime, when conditions are confused or when there is an emergency, when identification cards might be useful. They were useful during the last war when we wanted to register people for selective service and take an inventory of the qualifications of people who lived in this land. However, under normal circumstances I cannot understand why the servants of a free people, the government, should ask that citizens carry identity cards.

I have a charming little poodle at home. It is the third dog I have had. The other two lived for 13 years, and this one is in its third year. She is just as intelligent as I am, and twice as attractive. The law requires a dog to wear a tag; she must wear it all the time. The only difference between us is that our ancestors climbed out of the slime, yet my ancestor in his wisdom took the road that led to my making, whereas the dog's ancestor took another road. I do not think any human being should ever allow himself to be tagged, even though society demands that dogs be tagged. Never must we allow that.

Since other members wish to speak, I merely say that this issue should be discussed. It ought to be examined in good will by people on both sides of the fence. Surely there are more acceptable ways of combating problems than the issuance of identification cards. What would give anybody the idea that such cards are good anyway? If the carrying of an I.D. card were made mandatory, I would cheerfully go to jail rather than accept such a law, because in a society which would allow this I would probably be safer, more comfortable and among more congenial people if I were in jail than in society generally.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I want to add a few words to the debate and also leave a few minutes for my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who also wishes to speak. I oppose this notice of motion as drafted for three reasons. First, I oppose it because "immigrants" is included in the wording of the motion. I think that provision is most offensive to immigrants, prospective citizens and, perhaps, to visitors coming to this country. If people are here as visitors or as landed immigrants, they have in their possession passports from their own country. They retain such passports until they become Canadian citizens, at which time they give up their foreign passports and receive Canadian citizenship cards. For that reason I do not see why immigrants should be included in the wording of the motion.

My second reason is what I would class the traditional reason. We should approach the question of identity cards with great care. The question was raised after the events of one year ago in Quebec. I believe the Minister of Justice of that province made the proposal. It was made, I think, in the heat of great stress and provocation. The idea was put forward as a measure to protect the state. According to what I have read subsequently, the idea has not been pressed further. I am under the impression that the Quebec Minister of Justice does not favour too strongly his original proposal and that he sees certain dangers which are involved.

We know that identification cards will not prevent evil people from carrying out their evil ends. Whether they have identity cards or not will make no difference to them. Such cards will do little to protect the state. In the first place, the authorities must catch the evil-doers before asking for their identity cards. This is like the old story of sprinkling salt on a bird's tail: first you must catch the bird and then sprinkle salt on its tail. Similarly, you have to catch a man before you ask for his identity card. I do not understand how identification cards, under present conditions, would be of any help. At present almost everybody has some form of identification. Banks accept almost any form of identification—a driver's licence, social security card, credit card, and so on. This proves only that you are alive, which is obvious because you are there. This is about all such identification proves. For the traditional reasons that are often advanced, I oppose the idea of giving people an identification card to be used in their daily affairs.

As I see it, any legislation making mandatory an identity card always contains a second clause that says the police are entitled to ask for your identity card whenever they feel like it. There is real danger in this practice. I have never seen any legislation of this kind which does not include some sort of licence, or right, giving the police the right to look at the identification on demand. That is true of the breath-test law and of many other laws. When you are driving a car the police are entitled to ask for your driver's licence without saying why they want it. Generally, they keep you in suspense. As I see it, the great danger in introducing an identification card system is that the police could demand to see it.

I oppose the motion because it suggests that the government ought to look into this question. I think this would be interpreted as carte blanche from this House to seriously consider it—and without intending to appear mean in any way, the last thing I would want to give this government is the right to impose further restrictions on the liberties of the Canadian people. I think the general history of the last two or three years shows the government has adopted a generally autocratic attitude toward Canadian citizens and the Canadian House of Commons. I would not want to give them one more twist of the wrist. I would oppose the motion for that reason alone.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) has already indicated, it is perhaps a good idea that this question be aired, at least during this hour. But like the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), I would not like to see the motion passed if it meant that the idea would be considered at all seriously.

[Mr. Aiken.]

During this hour I believe it has been clearly indicated that the overwhelming feeling in the House of Commons is that there should not be any legislation requiring all persons in Canada to carry identification cards. Like others who have spoken, I believe it is a good idea for individuals voluntarily to carry various proofs of identification. This is useful in case of accident, in case one is lost or in difficulty of any kind. But surely the emphasis on carrying this kind of identification should be voluntary. Likewise, I have no quarrel with the idea that in cases where the state has the authority to licence individuals to do certain things, such as drive a car, or fish, and so on, the holders of such licences should be required to carry proof that they have been so licenced.

I believe it is also proper for banking institutions and other credit institutions to issue cards to individuals verifying that they have been authorized to engage in such functions. But when it comes to an identity card which, in effect, you would be required to carry to prove your right to be here, your right to live, I suggest we are going too far.

I hope I am not being unfair to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc). I listened to what he said, and I listened carefully to the answer he gave to the question asked by my hon. friend from Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson). It seems that one of the main reasons he has in mind in proposing identification cards is to cope with criminals. One of the things he suggested about the kind of card he had in mind was that fingerprints should be on it. In effect, the motion is suggesting to every Canadian that he must carry a card to prove he is not a criminal. I believe this is completely contrary to our concept of a free society, and that it is not a good idea at all.

None of us in this House offers any criticism of the hon. member for presenting the motion so that the matter can be discussed, but I would think this airing has made it clear that most of us feel that though the carrying of voluntary identification cards is quite in order, any compulsory carrying of identity cards imposed upon all Canadians is not something which commends itself in our kind of free society.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would ask consent of the House to revert to motions.

Mr. Speaker: Is there disposition on the part of the House to allow the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) to seek leave to revert to motions.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

UNITED NATIONS

ALBANIAN RESOLUTION ON CHINA—TABLING OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN QUEBEC AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for giving me the opportunity to table two sets of documents; first, the modalities according to which the government of Quebec is admitted as a participating government to the institutions, activities and programs of the Agence de Cooperation Culturelle et Technique. This is the text of an agreement reached between the governments of Quebec and Canada.

The other is a document requested today by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) who asked to have tabled in the House a copy of the Albanian resolution on the China question now before the United Nations.

An hon. Member: Five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Do hon. members wish the Chair to call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. It being 5 o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, should that not be until two o'clock on Tuesday?

Mr. Speaker: I thought perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would like to come back on Monday at two o'clock. For the rest of us it will be Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, I shall be here on Monday.

At 5.01 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX

Federal Government's Response to Book IV of the Report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism

The purpose of this document is to present a survey of the principal policies relating to the maintenance and development of multiculturalism throughout Canada and to provide a summary of government decisions on the recommendations made in Book IV of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

The document outlines in Part A the federal government's response in general to the recommendations of Book IV of the royal commission report and gives some of the reasons for its belief in multiculturalism.

In Part B are outlined the policy objectives which will serve to guide the federal government's programs in this area.

Part C contains a general description of the programs to be undertaken by the federal government and its agencies to implement and advance the policies resulting from acceptance of the recommendations of Book IV of the royal commission's report.

A summary of the recommendations of Book IV of the royal commission's report and the government's response to them is in Part D.

PART A

Federal Response in General

Book IV of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism contains 16 recommendations (listed in Section D) of which eight are addressed specifically to the federal government or its agencies. Three deal with matters under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. One of the recommendations urges federal financial aid to linguistically handicapped children in public schools. Another is concerned with conditions for citizenship, the right to vote, and the right to stand for election to public office and thus is addressed to both the federal and the provincial governments. One appeals to agencies at all three levels of government to provide support to cultural and research organizations. The remaining recommendations are addressed to Canadian Universities.

The government accepts and endorses the recommendations and spirit of Book IV of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. It believes the time is overdue for the people of Canada to become more aware of the rich tradition of the many cultures we have in Canada. Canada's citizens come from almost every country in the world, and bring with them every major world religion and language. This cultural diversity endows all Canadians with a great variety of human experience. The government regards this as a heritage to treasure and believes that Canada would be the poorer if we adopted assimilation programs forcing our citizens to forsake and forget the cultures they have brought to us.

The federal government hopes that the provinces will also respond positively to those recommendations which the commissioners addressed to them. The Prime Minister has written to each of the provincial premiers outlining the policies and programs which the Federal Government is initiating and asking for their co-operation. Some provinces have already taken the initiative and are responding to the recommendations directed to them.

The government while responding positively to the commission's recommendations, wishes to go beyond them to the spirit of the Book IV to ensure that Canada's cultural diversity continues.

Cultural diversity throughout the world is being eroded by the impact of industrial technology, mass communications and urbanization. Many writers have discussed this as the creation of a mass society—in which mass produced culture and entertainment and large impersonal institutions threaten to denature and depersonalize man. One of man's basic needs is a sense of belonging, and a good deal of contemporary social unrest—in all age groups—exists because this need has not been met. Ethnic groups are certainly not the only way in which this need for belonging can be met, but they have been an important one in Canadian society. Ethnic pluralism can help us overcome or prevent the homogenization and depersonalization of mass society. Vibrant ethnic groups can give Canadians of the second, third, and subsequent generations a feeling that they are connected with tradition and with human experience in various parts of the world and different periods of time.

Two misconceptions often arise when cultural diversity is discussed.

(a) Cultural Identity and National Allegiance.

The sense of identity developed by each citizen as a unique individual is distinct from his national allegiance. There is no reason to suppose that a citizen who identifies himself with pride as a Chinese-Canadian, who is deeply involved in the cultural activities of the Chinese community in Canada, will be less loyal or concerned with Canadian matters than a citizen of Scottish origin who takes part in a bagpipe band or a highland dancing group. Cultural identity is not the same thing as allegiance to a country. Each of us is born into a particular family with a distinct heritage: that is, everyone—French, English, Italian and Slav included—has an "ethnic" background. The more secure we feel in one particular social context, the more we are free to explore our identity beyond it. Ethnic groups often provide people with a sense of belonging which can make them better able to cope with the rest of society than they would as isolated individuals. Ethnic loyalties need not, and usually do not, detract from wider loyalties to community and country.

Canadian identity will not be undermined by multiculturalism. Indeed, we believe that cultural pluralism is the very essence of Canadian identity. Every ethnic group has the right to preserve and develop its own culture and values within the Canadian context. To say we have two official languages is not to say we have two official cultures, and no particular culture is more "official" than another. A policy of multiculturalism must be a policy for all Canadians.

(b) Language and Culture.

The distinction between language and culture has never been clearly defined. The very name of the royal commission whose recommendations we now seek to implement tends to indicate that bilingualism and biculturalism are indivisible. But, biculturalism does not properly describe our society; multiculturalism is more accurate. The Official Languages Act designated two languages, English and French, as the official languages of Canada for the purposes of all the institutions of the Parliament and government of Canada; no reference was made to cultures, and this act does not impinge upon the role of all languages as instruments of the various Canadian cultures. Nor, on the other hand, should the recognition of the cultural value of many languages weaken the position of Canada's two official languages. Their use by all of the citizens of Canada will continue to be promoted and encouraged.

PART B

Policy Objectives in the Federal Sphere

The government is concerned with preserving human rights, developing Canadian identity, strengthening citizenship participation, reinforcing Canadian unity and encouraging cultural diversification within a bilingual framework. These objectives can best be served through a policy of multiculturalism composed of four main elements.

1. The government of Canada will support all of Canada's cultures and will seek to assist, resources permitting, the development of those cultural groups which have demonstrated a desire and effort to continue to develop, a capacity to grow and contribute to Canada, as well as a clear need for assistance.

The special role of the government will be to support and encourage those cultures and cultural groups which Canadians wish to preserve.

The stronger and more populous cultural groups generally have the resources to be self-supporting and general cultural activities tend to be supportive of them. The two largest cultures, in areas where they exist in a minority situation, are already supported under the aegis of the government's official languages programs. New programs are proposed to give support to minority cultural groups in keeping with their needs and particular situations.

However, the government cannot and should not take upon itself the responsibility for the continued viability of all ethnic groups. The objective of our policy is the cultural survival and development of ethnic groups to the degree that a given group exhibits a desire for this. Government aid to cultural groups must proceed on the basis of aid to self-effort. And in our concern for the preservation of ethnic group identity, we should not forget that individuals in a democracy may choose not to be concerned about maintaining a strong sense of their ethnic identity.

2. The Government will assist members of all cultural groups to overcome cultural barriers to full participation in Canadian society.

The law can and will protect individuals from overt discrimination but there are more subtle barriers to entry into our society. A sense of not belonging, or a feeling of inferiority, whatever its cause, cannot be legislated out of existence. Programs outlined in this document have been designed to foster confidence in one's individual cultural identity and in one's rightful place in Canadian life. Histories, films and museum exhibits showing the great contributions of Canada's various cultural groups will help achieve this objective. But, we must emphasize that every Canadian must help eliminate discrimination. Every Canadian must contribute to the sense of national acceptance and belonging.

3. The Government will promote creative encounters and interchange among all Canadian cultural groups in the interest of national unity.

As Canadians become more sensitive to their own ethnic identity and to the richness of our country, we will become more involved with one another and develop a greater acceptance of differences and a greater pride in our heritage. Cultural and intellectual creativity in almost all societies has been fostered by the interaction and creative relationship of different ethnic groups within that society. Government aid to multicultural centres, to specific projects of ethnic groups, and to displays of the performing and visual arts as well as the programs already mentioned, will promote cultural exchange. The Government has made it very clear that it does not plan on aiding individual groups to cut themselves off from the rest of society. The programs are designed to encourage cultural groups to share their heritage with all other Canadians and with other countries, and to make us all aware of our cultural diversity.

4. The Government will continue to assist immigrants to acquire at least one of Canada's official languages in order to become full participants in Canadian society.

The federal government, through the Manpower and Immigration Department and the Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State, already assists the provinces in language training for adults, but new arrivals in Canada require additional help to adjust to Canadian life, and to participate fully in the economic and social life of Canada.

PART C

PROGRAM OF IMPLEMENTATION

Six programs have been developed to implement the policy of the federal government. These programs will be carried out under the administration of the Citizenship

Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State with the exception of those proposed by the federal cultural agencies which will be administered by the agencies concerned but co-ordinated through an Inter-Agency Coordinating Committee.

Program I

Multicultural Grants

A grants program has been developed to meet specific recommendations in the commission report and the demonstrated need of cultural groups. Grants will be made to activities which meet some or all of the four parts of the policy outlined in Part B.

Activities eligible for federal assistance will include multicultural encounters; organizational meetings for new cultural groups; citizenship preparation and immigrant orientation programs; conferences; youth activities; cultural exchanges between groups as well as other projects. Grants will also be made available for multicultural centres in areas where there is a demonstrated need and desire from the community for such a facility. Existing multicultural centres, like that in Winnipeg, have proven their value in providing services to help new immigrants adjust to Canadian life, and in promoting inter-ethnic activity on a continuous basis.

Program II

Culture Development Program

A culture development program will be instituted to produce much-needed data on the precise relationship of language to cultural development. It will provide essential information on the extent and nature of the demands of individual cultural groups for language retention and cultural development. It will examine existing organizations and facilities, including educational institutions, the press, radio and television to determine the part they now play and their potential role in cultural development. The study will incorporate those recommendations directed to the Canadian Radio-Television Commission for studies of the best means by which radio and television can contribute to the maintenance of language and cultures.

The program has been designed to produce results within one year. The data will serve as an information base for some of the other programs and for future long range planning by the Citizenship Branch, the cultural agencies, and other government departments.

The government is initiating steps to help provide textbooks for non-official language teaching, since Book IV of the royal commission's report found there are almost no textbooks suitable for teaching a third language to children living in Canada. The acquisition of the ancestral language is an important part of the process of developing a cultural identity, and the federal government proposes to discuss this with the provinces to find a mutually satisfactory way to meet some of the costs of preparation and production of third language textbooks or audio-visual aids for language teaching.

Although the commission made no formal recommendation regarding the ethnic press, aside from advocating the continuation of existing government support in the form of advertising and information, the culture development program will also undertake a study of the ethnic press and other media which could be better utilized to carry essential information to those persons who use languages other than English or French. We recognize that the ethnic press plays an important part in bringing information to recent immigrants and elderly people who have difficulty reading Canada's official languages, as well as in helping to develop Canada's cultures.

Program III

Ethnic Histories

A clear need exists for the writing of objective analytical, and readable histories of the ethnic groups in Canada, and for the distribution of these works to as wide a readership as possible. The Citizenship Branch will commission 20 histories specifically directed to the background, contributions and problems of various cultural groups in Canada. The program will offer visible, effective and valuable recognition of the contribution of our diverse ethnic groups to Canada. It will promote knowledge of and respect for the cultural heritage of the groups concerned, as well as providing invaluable resource material for students, writers and government agencies.

Program IV

Canadian Ethnic Studies

The need exists, and was recognized by the commission, for systematic and continuous study of Canada's multi-ethnic society. The Department of the Secretary of State will therefore undertake a detailed investigation of the problems concerned with the development of a Canadian ethnic studies program or centre(s) and will prepare a plan of implementation.

Program V

Teaching of Official Languages

The federal government already assists the provinces in the teaching of English and French to adult immigrants, and accepts in principle recommendation four of the royal commission relating to special instruction in the appropriate official language for children who enter the public school system without a knowledge of that language.

The federal government therefore proposes to undertake discussions with the provinces to find a mutually acceptable form of federal assistance towards the teaching of official languages to children.

Program VI

Programs of the Federal Cultural Agencies

The government asked the federal cultural agencies referred to in Book IV to respond to the recommendations of the report. The programs they will be undertaking will enable all Canadians to gain an awareness of the cultural heritage of all of Canada's ethnic groups.

National Museum of Man

The commission recommended "that the museum receive additional funds to carry out its projects regarding the history, social organizations and folk arts of cultural groups other than the British and French". The government concurs with this recommendation and will fund the following projects to be undertaken by the museum;

(a) purchase of artifacts representing Canada's ethnic diversity;

(b) research on the folk arts and music of the various ethnic communities in Canada;

(c) other museum extension and educational projects designed to reach the public at large.

National Film Board

For many years, the Board has been producing versions of some of its films in languages other than English or French for use abroad in co-operation with the Department of External Affairs. The royal commission recommended that the board advertise that it has films in languages other than English and French and make these available for domestic consumption, and also expand its production of films that inform Canadians about one another, including films about the contributions and problems of all our various ethnic groups. The board has indicated that it will not only respond positively to these recommendations, but that it will also survey the cultural communities in order to determine what types of film they would like produced in their ancestral languages.

National Library

Although many public libraries in Canada do have collections of books in non-official languages, the supply is well below the demand. The Canadian Library Association has studied the problem and has recommended the creation of a multicultural language and literature centre at the National Library. The Library will embark immediately on a preliminary study leading to the creation of this centre. The centre will administer a program designed to deposit in local libraries books in languages other than English and French. The library will also acquire publications produced by and for non-English, non-French groups in Canada.

Public Archives

The Public Archives in Ottawa has relatively few holdings relating to Canada's various cultural groups or their activities. The same is true of most archives across the country. Such material should be collected, since the history of immigration and cultural groups is an integral part of the history of this country.

The Public Archives will be given funds to acquire the records and papers of all the various ethnic organizations and associations which are significant documents of Canadian history.

ADMINISTRATION

Interdepartmental Co-ordination

To enable the Citizenship Branch to fulfill its task of implementing the policy proposed in this document, arrangements will be made for co-ordinating the activities of various departments and federal cultural agencies. All the agencies responsible for the programs proposed have agreed to establish an inter-agency coordinating committee, and an interdepartmental committee will be established to undertake an ongoing review of federal government policies and programmes to ensure that they reflect the cultural groups in our society.

Consultation

The various cultural communities must have an opportunity to influence the decision-making process by a continuing consultative process. A variety of consultative procedures—public conferences, private meetings with group leaders, confidential consultation sessions with specialists, seminars, press analysis, and others—have shown themselves effective, and will be continued and intensified at the local, regional and national levels.

Federal-Provincial Considerations

The commission addresses six of its recommendations to the provinces. Three of these concern education, two deal with human rights and one calls upon the provinces to support cultural organizations. The growing provincial interest and public action in the field of multiculturalism make it imperative that the two levels of government co-operate. Patchwork programs and jurisdictional confusion will result unless an attempt is made to co-ordinate federal and provincial policies at the ministerial level and good relationships are established between the officials administering the programmes.

Once the results of the culture development research program are available it is proposed that the provinces be invited to participate in a federal-provincial meeting at the senior official level, in preparation for a possible ministerial meeting.

PART D

SUMMARY OF SPECIFIC RESPONSE

TO RECOMMENDATIONS IN BB IV

1. Recommendation 1

We recommend that any provinces that have not yet enacted fair employment practices, fair accommodation practices, or housing legislation prohibiting discrimination because of race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry, or place of origin, do so and that this legislation be made binding upon the Crown and its agencies. We further recommend that all provinces make provision for full-time administrators of their human rights legislation. (No. 152)*

---

Response

This is directed primarily to the provinces but the federal government has the whole question of human rights under consideration.

2. Recommendation 2

We recommend that the same conditions for citizenship, the right to vote, and to stand for election to public office be accorded to all immigrants, with no regard to their country of origin. (No. 233)

Response

The Canada Elections Act (proclaimed April 12, 1971) and intended amendments to the Citizenship Act now in preparation provide for the equality called for in this recommendation.

3. Recommendation 3

We recommend that the teaching of languages other than English and French, and cultural subjects related to them, be incorporated as options in the public elementary school program, where there is sufficient demand for such classes. (No. 378)

Response

Elementary school education is a provincial concern, but the government plans to undertake a major research project on the relationship of language to cultural retention and development. It also plans to discuss with the provinces and cultural groups ways of assisting in the development and duplication of new teaching aids for languages and cultures other than English and French.

4. Recommendation 4

We recommend that special instruction in the appropriate official language be provided for children who enter the public school system with an inadequate knowledge of that language; that provincial authorities specify the terms and conditions of financial assistance for such special instruction; and that the federal authorities assist the provinces in mutually acceptable ways through grants for the additional cost incurred. (No. 383)

Response

The federal government approves in principle aid towards the teaching of official languages to children of immigrants, and will be discussing it with the provinces.

5. Recommendation 5

We recommend that more advanced instruction and a wider range of options in languages other than English and French, and in cultural subjects related to them, be provided in public high schools, where there is sufficient demand for such classes. (No. 390)

Response

This is primarily a matter of provincial jurisdiction. However the development of new teaching aids (noted in the reponse to Recommendation 3) and the ethnic histories programme will be useful in the high schools. The Prime Minister's letter to each of the provincial premiers urges a positive response to all those recommendations which touch upon provincial authority.

6. Recommendation 6

We recommend that Canadian universities broaden their practices in giving standing or credits for studies in modern languages other than French and English both for admission and for degrees. (No. 443)

Response

This is primarily a matter for consideration by the academic institutions.

7. Recommendation 7

We recommend that Canadian universities expand their studies in the fields of the humanities and the social sciences relating to particular areas other than those related to the English and French languages. (No. 458)

Response

This is primarily a matter for consideration by the academic institutions.

8. Recommendation 8

We recommend that the CRTC remove restrictions on private broadcasting in languages other than English and French, except those restrictions necessary to meet the administrative and legal responsibilities of the licensees and those that also apply to English—and French-language programs. (No. 538)

Response

The CRTC has agreed to place this matter before the Commission in the very near future.

9. Recommendation 9

We recommend that the CBC recognize the place of languages other than English and French in Canadian life and that the CBC remove its proscription on the use of other languages in broadcasting. (No. 539)

Response

The CBC has not agreed to the spirit of this recommendation. The question of broadcasting in non-official languages will be considered within the major research project.

10. Recommendation 10

We recommend that the CRTC undertake studies in the field of broadcasting in other languages to determine the best means by which radio and television can contribute to the maintenance of languages and cultures and that the CBC participate in these studies. We further recommend that these studies include pilot projects on either AM or FM radio in both Montreal and Toronto. (No. 542)

Response

The CRTC has agreed to undertake these studies, and the CBC has agreed to cooperate. The studies will be carried on within the total framework of the major research project on language retention which will be directed by the Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State.

11. Recommendation 11

We recommend that research be undertaken through the CRTC concerning the nature and effects of the portrayal of other cultural groups on both publicly—and privately-owned English-and-French-language radio and television stations. (No. 546).

Response

This study will be broadened to include all the media and will be carried on within the major research project mentioned above.

12. Recommendation 12

We recommend that the National Film Board undertake to publicize the fact that it produces prints of many of its films in languages other than English and French, particularly in regions where there are concentrations of persons who speak languages other than English and French. In addition, we recommend that the voluntary associations of cultural groups stimulate interest among their groups in the use of these films. (No. 553)

Response

The multicultural programme to be undertaken by the National Film Board meets this recommendation.

13. Recommendation 13

We recommend that the National Film Board continue and develop the production of films that inform Canadians about one another, including films about the contribution and problems of both individuals and groups of ethnic origin other than British and French, and that the National Film Board receive the financial support it requires in order to produce such films. (No. 555)

Response

The multicultural program to be undertaken by the National Film Board meets this recommendation.

14. Recommendation 14

We recommend that the appropriate federal, provincial, and municipal agencies receive the financial means they require to maintain and extend their support to cultural and research organizations whose objectives are to foster the arts and letters of cultural groups other than the British and French. (No. 642)

Response

The grants program administered by the Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State will provide funds to assist such organizations.

15. Recommendation 15

We recommend that the administrative costs of the Canadian Folk Arts Council or a similar body be provided for out of public funds through the Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State. (No. 643.)

Response

The Canadian Folk Arts Council already receives an annual grant for administrative purposes from the Arts and Culture Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State. In the Citizenship Branch, requests for grants to pay for specific projects suggested by the Canadian Folk Arts Council or similar bodies will continue to receive consideration if they meet the objectives of the multicultural program.

16. Recommendation 16

We recommend that the National Museum of Man be given adequate space and facilities and provided with sufficient funds to carry out its projects regarding the history, social organizations, and folk arts of cultural groups other than the British and French. (No. 646.)

Response

The multicultural program of the National Museum of Man meets this recommendation.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Motions:

September 10, 1971—Mr. Howe: That the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented to the House Wednesday, April 7, 1971, be concurred in.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications has a motion similar to mine on the order paper I should like to ask that mine be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have leave to withdraw his motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

AGRICULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PURCHASE OF TURKEYS BY AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BOARD

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to announce that the Agricultural Products Board has been authorized to purchase turkeys for processing, with the canned meat going to the world food program. This action is the first action taken under the previously announced programs designed to offset the impact of the surtax on agricultural products entering the United States. It is estimated that the amount of turkeys purchased will compensate for the market for Canadian turkeys in the United States lost during the period August to December because of the surtax which has further distorted an unbalanced supply and demand situation.

The Agricultural Products Board will be issuing tender calls, specifications and other details shortly.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the statement just made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) I am aware that the Ontario Turkey Federation made representations to the minister and the board as early as late August or early in September. I have also made strong representations to the minister and the chairman of the Agricultural Products Board in this regard.

We all know that at this time turkey prices are the lowest they have been for 25 years. This has resulted from the fact that when chicken broilers were put on quotas in Quebec many buildings which were easily adaptable to raising turkeys were switched over and there was an increase in turkey production. We now understand that some of the provinces have got together in an endeavour to control their production to some extent to assist in achieving a better price.

The United States surcharge has created a tremendous hardship for turkey producers because the price dropped two cents per pound on its implementation. In addition, the surcharge is causing the loss of many jobs in this country. Canadian hatcheries that produced turkey poults in Canada are finding they cannot sell in the United States because of the increase from two cents to four cents in the duty on turkey poults. Production of turkey poults by Canadian firms in the United States is increasing and Canadian workers are being laid off.

I am sure we are all thankful for the little bit of assistance the minister has announced today. I realize that the producers asked that some 8 million to 10 million pounds of turkeys be purchased for the world food program. The minister has not said how much will be purchased for this purpose, but I do not think the amount will be anything like what was requested, I am sorry to say. I certainly hope that what has been decided will be helpful at the present time and that further action will be taken when necessary. We will expect the government to keep a watchful eye on the situation and take further action in this regard when necessary.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the minister assured the House a while ago that agricultural products affected by the United States surtax would be considered product by product, and I suppose this is another instalment in that procedure. Because I have spoken to producers personally I know that some producers in western Canada are in a very serious situation. The minister's announcement will certainly make them feel somewhat better since he is taking at least this much action to meet the existing situation. Some of them have discussed with me the possibility of finding other markets than the United States and the possibility of research into processing and developing special products. I suppose those who have such ideas will bring them forward to the minister, and I hope he will extend to them whatever co-operation is within his power.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, from the applause of my colleagues, one would say they are convinced I shall become Prime Minister of Canada after the next election.

United Nations

Mr. Speaker, I am extremely grateful to my colleagues for this mark of their esteem. Before commenting on the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), I should like to assure them that, as ever, in the Parliament of the Canadian nation I shall co-operate with each and everyone in order that Canada may remain Canada and that our nation may be united irrespective of a diversity which makes for its greatness.

Mr. Speaker, I am gratified by the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture. It expressed in substance what he used to say when he was a deep-dyed Créditiste. He recommends assistance to some sectors of agriculture, and if he made such statements regarding all areas of Canadian agriculture I believe our western and eastern farmers would no longer believe that government aid to the west is detrimental to the east and vice versa. I think that this policy which is one of guarantee for turkey producers, for instance, could also apply to wheat, dairy, corn and other agricultural producers.

Mr. Speaker, we welcome this statement and express the hope that the Minister of Agriculture takes the same action to assist the Third World, the underdevelopped countries, as well as this country, and above all Canadian consumers.

UNITED NATIONS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

This matter concerns the decision of the government to support the Albanian resolution at the United Nations. This resolution calls for the recognition of the People's Republic of China and at the same time for the expulsion forthwith of the representatives of Taiwan.

As the government in Taiwan is clearly in de facto control of the Island of Taiwan and adjacent islands, the question arises whether the Albanian resolution is contrary to the United Nations principle of universality of representation. The resolution also creates the precedent of expelling a member from the world body.

I therefore propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the government do forthwith provide an early opportunity before the U.N. vote on the Albanian resolution for full discussion of this important matter in this chamber.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion moved by the hon. member for Spadina. This motion can only be put with the unanimous consent of the House.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent as required under the terms of Standing Order 43?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore the motion cannot be put.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POLYMER EMPLOYEE LAY-OFFS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to place before it a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It arises out of serious lay-offs made in the last few days by the Polymer Corporation in Sarnia where 250 production and scientific employees have been laid off, some with 25 years of service. The lay-offs were announced by the president of the corporation and services were terminated without notice although employees were given the appropriate pay in lieu of notice. This has caused tremendous hardship for the families concerned and has produced a sense of insecurity not only throughout the Polymer work force but also throughout the community.

Since Polymer is a Crown corporation answerable to this Parliament through the Minister of Supply and Services and since there is great fear that further lay-offs may follow, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the lay-offs which have been imposed by Polymer Corporation and the circumstances leading thereto be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for immediate and full inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for York South. This motion requires unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore the motion cannot be put.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

USE OF WIRETAPPING IN UNION STRIKE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my motion is under Standing Order 43. Last week two metro Toronto constables were caught using wiretapping devices against members of a trade union involved in a legal strike against Redpath Refinery, a subsidiary of Dominion Sugar Company Limited. At present there is no law prohibiting wiretapping. This wiretapping practice is so abhorrent to Canadian principles of justice that it gives weight to the Minister of Justice's statement that we are living in a bugged society and fast approaching an Orwellian state. Therefore I move under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin):

That the question of the illegal use of electronic equipment and wiretapping devices against persons involved in strikes and lockouts be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs with instructions to report back to the House prior to second reading of Bill C-252.

Mr. Speaker: The motion requires unanimous consent. Is there agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POTENTIAL LOSS OF JOBS IN AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 which provides that in cases of urgent and pressing necessity a motion may be made if unanimous consent is given. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity is the potential loss of jobs to thousands of Canadians employed in the automotive industry. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), the following motion:

• (2:20 p.m.)

In order to clear up the present uncertainty concerning the future of 83,000 Canadians employed in the automotive industry, this uncertainty having arisen because of the repeated refusal of the government to assure the country that notwithstanding American pressures to the contrary, including a recent proposal for free trade in used cars, the safeguards in the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement will be maintained in principle and strengthened in detail, this House resolves that such commitments be made.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE CONSTITUENCY NAME FROM ESSEX TO ESSEX-WINDSOR

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-269, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the electoral district now known as Essex is one of the fastest growing in western Ontario. With its great diversification of people and its production, both industrial and agricultural, from the city of Windsor and the county of Essex, I feel it would be proper to change the name so that both areas would be properly recognized.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

APPARENT BREAKDOWN IN COMMUNICATION BETWEEN GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF UNITED STATES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26 I ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration.

This specific and important matter is the apparent breakdown in communication between the government and the government of the United States at a time when confusion regarding economic relations between the two countries must accelerate the rate of unemployment in Canada.

If my motion is acceptable, Mr. Speaker, I will move the adjournment of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition has filed with the Chair the due notice of his motion to request the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration under the provisions of Standing Order 26.

The question which the Chair must determine is whether or not the problem as posed by the Leader of the Opposition meets with the procedural requirements of Standing Order 26.

It is obvious to all hon. members that the general question of communications and relations between the governments of the United States and of Canada is of paramount importance. It is of national and urgent interest. It does not follow necessarily that such a vast and complex problem must be debated today, by an adjournment of our regular proceedings under the terms of Standing Order 26, rather than later this week or next week.

My understanding of Standing Order 26 is that its provisions apply when there is an emergency of a sudden nature which requires an immediate debate in the House. The standing order does not apply when we have before us a situation which is claimed to be developing or evolving over a period of time. Hon. members are well aware that this suggestion has been advanced in the House on a number of occasions in past weeks, and particularly during the lengthy debate which took place in relation to Bill C-262. That condition in itself would tend to indicate that the proposed motion does not satisfy the criteria set out in the standing order.

In view of all circumstances and after reiterating that the Speaker's ruling, in such circumstances, is essentially a procedural one, I must conclude that for today at least the motion cannot be put to the House.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—REPORTED LIST OF AMERICAN GRIEVANCES AGAINST CANADA—METHOD OF COMMUNICATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in light of the most recent press reports of a so-called shopping list of American grievances with Canada, he would tell the House if his government, as reported in the press, has in fact requested from the United States administration a specific list of complaints regarding our trade relations with the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, since I have had some discussions with the United States directly on these issues, perhaps I might be permitted to answer the question. During the discussions we have had recently with the United States they have from time to time indicated that they have certain matters they would like to negotiate with us and we have indicated, of course, that we would be happy to receive such a list. So far we have not received it.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. As a matter of government policy, is it intended to pursue a direct approach to the United States or does the Prime Minister intend to continue a course of oblique communication back and forth with the United States administration by way of speeches in Canada and the United States, leaks here and there and press releases?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as we are concerned there have been no oblique communications; they have been at the ministerial and official levels at all times. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to take press leaks as his authority, then he is using them in an oblique way, but our relations with the American authorities are very direct, I understand that this leak has been denied any authenticity by the State Department and the White House. If indeed it had been some form of an oblique representation to Canada, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was going to speak to the State Department to ask if there was anything in this so-called leak, but we now understand that the White House and the State Department have said that these leaks have no authenticity at all.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to just that leak but to various speeches made by ministers and parliamentary secretaries in Canada which seem to be leading to considerable deterioration in relations between the two countries. Since it is now eight weeks since I first urged the Prime Minister to communicate directly with President Nixon and as there has been no clarification in the meantime but apparently a deterioration in the situation, I should like to ask if the Prime Minister is now prepared to reconsider his position and initiate direct communications with President Nixon?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there have been extremely direct communications between the two governments. I have not decided that it would be necessary at this time to speak to President Nixon directly.

SUBJECTS THAT UNITED STATES WISHES TO NEGOTIATE WITH CANADA—CONSIDERATION DURING SURTAX DISCUSSIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs today, the Minister of Finance on other occasions and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on still other occasions have indicated that the American authorities had suggested there were matters which they wanted to negotiate, may I ask whether in a formal or informal way, directly or indirectly, at the ministerial or official or any other level, the government has been informed of the subjects the American administration wants to negotiate with the Canadian government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have of course been negotiating the automobile agreement so that this is not a matter that comes afresh. We have been negotiating this for months. On the list that leaked to the Chicago Tribune there are some other matters that are very familiar to us and some that I must say are new. But we also have our list.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You have a list?

An hon. Member: Did you leak it?

Mr. Sharp: I do not think that we would want to be exchanging lists at this time through the public press and I do not think the United States administration intended that either. However, we have similar problems that we would like to negotiate with the United States, such as their ban on the importation of uranium, their manufacturing clause in their Copyright Act and their restrictions on immigration into the United States. We have a long list, but I think that these are matters that ought to be negotiated between our two countries in the ordinary way and certainly should not be associated with the surcharge.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt there is a long Canadian list. One may agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that it should not be associated with the surcharge, but I should like to ask him, the Prime Minister, or any other minister who can tell us, whether it is not a fact that some of the grievances that the Americans feel they have have been brought up during the discussions with regard to the surtax, not necessarily as preconditions but as part of the discussions regarding the surtax? Is that not so?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best way of answering this question is to say what the spokesman for the American State Department said. He said: "The United States has not given Canada a specific list of conditions for the lifting of the 10 per cent surtax on Canadian imports."

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be allowed one further supplementary, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue on a supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the very precise language that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just read, namely, that they have not produced a list of conditions for the removal of the surtax, and since neither the minister nor the Prime Minister has indicated any word from the Department of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may I again ask the minister whether the government is giving consideration to informing the House and the people of Canada about the nature of the discussions that are taking place and, instead of our having to listen to the kind of thing which we have read, letting us know what in fact is taking place between the two governments?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure if I gave a complete answer it would be out of order now. I should like to say to the hon. gentleman that we have never at any time had any indication that if we complied with a particular request of the United States that they would lift the surcharge. It is true, as I said earlier, that there is a list of points that the Americans would like to negotiate with us and they would like to get their way, but we have a list of points that we would like to raise with them and on which we would hope to get our way.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—PROGRAM TO EXPAND TRADE WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

To palliate the situation caused by the levy of the 10 per cent American surcharge, the minister says that Canada also has a list of negotiable items, but has a formula not been developed which, in addition to palliating the situation, would divert our exports a little bit more towards USSR and Communist China markets?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been any government in history that has spent more time in trying to cultivate markets for Canadian goods. I am thinking of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who has gone to China as well as the Prime Minister who has gone to Russia. The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and I have been to Europe on innumerable occasions to try to enlarge the horizons of Canadian trade, and this has worked.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, could the Minister tell us if there is not already a program advocating our withdrawal from the American market in favour of that of the USSR and communist China?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I remember the rather sorry story of the efforts made by a previous Prime Minister to divert trade from the United States to Great Britain. It is not an experiment I should like to follow.

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—COMMUNICATION BY PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT NIXON—GOVERNMENT PLAN TO CREATE JOBS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister been in touch with President Nixon either by letter or by telephone to make sure that there is no doubt in the President's mind about the very serious effect his economic program will have on the economy of this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): By letter or by telephone, no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: How about by extrasensory perception?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As it therefore appears highly unlikely that the American 10 per cent surcharge will be removed until a great many months have passed, is it the intention of the government to introduce a program to create jobs, similar in nature to the kind of program which was announced by Premier Davis of Ontario over the week end—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: —and which on a national basis would create well over 100,000 jobs?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are not on the eve of an election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: For how long does the government intend to remain in its present state of petrified lethargy? Why does it not get on with the job?

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—AMERICAN GRIEVANCES AGAINST CANADA

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I wonder if he could clarify the confusion that exists between himself and his colleague. He indicated that the State Department and others had denied that there was any sort of list or anything of that kind; yet the Secretary of State for External Affairs tells us that for some time it has been known that the Americans have had a number of demands or grievances against Canada. Who is telling the truth?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that a question asked in those terms is not in order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I will rephrase the latter part of it. Would the right hon. gentleman attempt to reconcile the difference?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Even put in those terms, the hon. member must know that he is inviting the Prime Minister to reconcile one statement with another. I have suggested to hon. members in the past that this is debate.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order. After we have heard the point of order I suggest that we give other hon. members—will the hon. member kindly resume his seat—an opportunity to ask questions on another subject and return to this one eventually.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Having listened to previous questions and answers, in the same sense I used it seemed to me that the two statements I have referred to need to be reconciled, particularly since the ministers sit in adjoining seats.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that the Chair ought to take that into account.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PURPOSE OF PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—REPRESENTATIONS ON STRATEGIC GROUNDS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Defence. Will he tell the House whether the proposed test on Amchitka Island is for the purpose of testing a nuclear warhead to be used in the proposed AMB safeguard system. Also, has the minister made any representations on strategic grounds as to why there is no purpose in such tests?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for having advised me of his intention to ask the question. Regrettably, I cannot give him a full response today on this point.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a related question. Can the Minister of National Defence say whether he would be willing to appear before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence in order to discuss thoroughly the government's white paper on defence?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my purpose would be to appear before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and it would be a pleasure.

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Considering that murder shows an alarming increase in number in Canada, can the Prime Minister tell us if the government intends to introduce a bill reinstaling capital punishment for persons found guilty of capital murder?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, not immediately, but hon. members know that the present legislation calls for revision after five years. When the time comes, the government will have to consider the matter, but it does not intend to do so now.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—IMPROVEMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS WITH AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to earlier questions asked concerning the deteriorating relations between the governments of Canada and the United States. Could the Prime Minister indicate, in view of this very serious situation, what steps are being taken to correct it and whether or not some proposal is being made to the American administration with respect to better communications and a better exchange of information concerning the vital points of mutual interest to both our economies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with respect, we believe there is nothing wrong with the communications. The difficulty—

Mr. Hees: Is with the relations.

Mr. Trudeau: —is in ensuring that the communications are put to use so that we know what the Americans intend doing in their future policy. This worries not only Canada but the many nations that are affected by the 10 per cent surcharge. I think it is significant that President Nixon in his recent statement to the nation did not refer to international relations. Apparently this aspect of communications is not foremost in his mind. That is not because there are no channels open between us; it has arisen because it is not American policy now to put the proper stuff into the channels which would satisfy the Canadian people.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question. I thought the Prime Minister might asknowledge there is a special relationship that has existed between Canada and the United States. In view of the obvious frustration and perhaps lack of accurate information that must be behind the recent enunciation of grievances in the Chicago newspaper story, can the Prime Minister indicate to the House what action is being taken by our government to see that we will not continue to be placed in a very disadvantaged situation with regard to economic decisions made in the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there are frequent communications at the ministerial level between the American administration and ours. I answered the Leader of the Opposition a moment ago that, had the American administration not denied the validity of this so-called leak, the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have in fact communicated with the Secretary of State in Washington to see if there was anything behind this so-called leak.

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—SETTING OF TIME FOR NEGOTIATION OF AMERICAN AND CANADIAN GRIEVANCES

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my supplementary question either to the Prime Minister or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Canadian government or the American government made any specific proposal for a definite time and date for a meeting to negotiate the differences between the two countries as found on their respective lists of grievances against each other?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been said repeatedly in the House that on some of these matters there have been negotiations and exchanges for several months now. There is not one list with one timetable, if that is the question of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A moment ago I suggested to hon. members that we might go on to another subject. We have perhaps inadvertently returned to the original subject. I again suggest we should not have too many supplementaries on this matter. I will recognize the hon. member for Calgary Centre and then the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder if the Prime Minister can explain to us what he means by a timetable in connection with these negotiations?

Mr. Trudeau: The question from the hon. member was whether any time had been agreed to. When I said that there was no timetable agreed to nor even discussed, I was answering the hon. member's question about time.

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—SUGGESTED PERSONAL COMMUNICATION BY PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT NIXON TO OBTAIN INFORMATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the importance of this whole subject and the concern that the Prime Minister has expressed about the possible difficulties and long-term effects of the American policy, will the Prime Minister indicate why he will not personally contact the President of the United States in order to get the information that the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not seem able to get? I do not ask this in an argumentative way. Will the Prime Minister personally attempt to get from the President of the United States the information, part of which the Secretary of State for External Affairs is seeking, which is of vital importance to Canada at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that the question lacks slightly in candour. If I thought anything positive would come from following up such a suggestion, I would have followed it up long before now.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT MEETING IN ALBERTA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is with regard to the very important meeting scheduled to commence tomorrow in Alberta and involving Indian people from all across the nation. Will the minister be in attendance at that meeting to hear first-hand the decisions that are made?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, Mr. Speaker. However, I invited the chiefs of the area to come and meet me in Ottawa on Thursday and they refused. I hope that they will reconsider my invitation and that we shall be able to discuss the matter here as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I do not know whether the minister has been invited to the meeting in Alberta tomorrow. If he has been invited, does he not think it would be more worth while for him to appear on the scene and see at first hand—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

STATUS OF JEANETTE CORBIERE LAVELL—APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): In the absence of the Minister of Justice I will direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the far-reaching decision in the federal court of appeal last Friday in favour of Jeanette Corbiere Lavell, which returned her to Indian status after she had lost this status upon being married to a non-Indian, will the minister consult with his colleague, the Minister of Justice, and have this most important and momentous decision appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada so that it will be ruled upon by the highest court in our land?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet received the written decision of the Federal Court. As soon as we do, we shall study it and I shall be pleased to consult with the hon. Minister of Justice and examine the possibilities of an appeal to the Supreme Court, as the hon. member suggests.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM IN LIGHT OF MULTICULTURAL POLICY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a related question, Mr. Speaker. As the government has just accepted the important fact that this country is a multicultural society, can the minister now advise if and when he will be making a statement with regard to a dynamic approach and a dynamic program whereby Canada's first citizens, the Eskimos and Indians, will in fact play a leading role in the mainstream of Canadian life?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it could be said that there was no dynamic action in this direction. One can notice every day that for the last two or three years Indians have had a new conscience, a new pride. They are very well organized in federations financed by the federal government.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question. As a result of this approach of the government, will the minister advise if he will be making a statement in due course on any new approaches in order that there can be some credibility given to the statement of the government which was just made on Friday? Are there any new approaches?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we announced a new policy two years ago and we then asked the Indians to inform us of their reactions. Last Thursday, the Manitoba Federation of Indians submitted a very important document on this subject. It is presently under study. We have received other suggestions or documents from Indians. It was about time the Indians were given the opportunity to inform us of their views on their future.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: One last supplementary. In light of the fact that Mr. Harold Cardinal seems to be as well advised, if not more so, than the minister, will the minister convene a meeting with this young man in order that he can take his advice if for no other purpose than to say that he is sorry for the remarks he made the other day?

[Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is rising on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

I want to inform the House that I had the opportunity to meet with Mr. Cardinal in my office twice, only ten days ago, and he is welcome at any time.

[English]

SUGGESTED ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT NATIONAL INDIAN BROTHERHOOD COUNCIL MEETING

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary question. Has the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in fact received an invitation to attend the special meeting of the council of the National Indian Brotherhood of Canada? Also, in view of the fact the Indian people feel that the difficulties in Alberta are duplicated in other parts of the country, does he not consider it advisable to attend this meeting in order to discuss the matter with them in earnest?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I received that invitation on Friday, and discussed it with the president of the Indian Association of Canada. I told him that I would not be able to attend, as I was leaving the North today. We discussed the situation for several hours, and I told him that I would gladly welcome the Alberta Indian chiefs and the national association executives here, in order to hold a discussion as soon as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

BENEFITS PAYABLE TO CALAND ORE COMPANY WORKERS

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. Can the parliamentary secretary inform the House whether the numerous complaints concerning unemployment insurance benefits payable to the workers of the Caland Ore Company in Atikokan have been investigated and resolved?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for bringing the plight of these workers to the attention of the department several days ago. An investigation has been made and unemployment insurance benefits have been increased as a result of a recompilation of average unemployment insurance contributions. The company incorrectly deducted unemployment insurance contributions while the employees were in receipt of holiday pay, and as hon. members are aware this would have the effect of lowering, unfortunately, the base used in assessing their benefits. I thank the hon. member for his question.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—APPROVAL OF APPLICATION FOR EXPORT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in his capacity as Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the application now before the National Energy Board to export approximately 2.7 trillion cubic feet of natural gas from Canada to the United States been approved by the board and, if so, has it been approved to date by the cabinet?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I am not aware of these facts. I was led to understand that the parliamentary secretary might answer this question if he were here. I will take the question as notice.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether I might direct this question to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that there is an application before the National Energy Board for approval of the export of 2.7 trillion cubic feet of natural gas spread over a 15-year period, and since there is a serious shortage of energy in the United States, would this not be one respect in which the Prime Minister could personally negotiate with the President of the United States to relieve difficulties in the trading relations between our two countries at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the board would have to make its recommendations before I would be able to make such representations.

Mr. Woolliams: May I just follow that through.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. The hon. member can ask a supplementary and then we will try to go to another subject.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, to follow up the Prime Minister's reply, is he suggesting that the application has not yet been approved by the board, or is he saying that it is before the cabinet of Canada? I do not think you know, Mr. Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps my minister would know, if you asked him.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that the decision is not before the cabinet. As everyone knows, it has to come before the cabinet before it is finally approved.

BRIDGES

PROPOSED STRUCTURE TO SEA ISLAND, VANCOUVER—NATURE OF PLAN IN RELATION TO TOLLS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to direct to the Minister of Transport which is of considerable interest to many people on the lower mainland of British Columbia. Can the minister indicate whether a plan has been decided on to provide toll-free access to Vancouver International Airport and Sea Island, or toll-free access to Sea Island itself, or whether a modified toll plan has been arrived at?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious that I cannot answer this question in detail. I can say that there are a number of variations on a plan that are presently being considered and these will be submitted to the interested parties in the Vancouver area before any final decision is made. We have already had one meeting with these parties and we will have another.

AGRICULTURE

HOGS—INQUIRY AS TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENT TO PRODUCERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture who seems quite willing to give me a good answer.

The Agricultural Stabilization Board recently sent hog producers a letter recommending that they keep their sales slips probably in order to grant them a deficiency payment.

Could the minister tell the House if he expects deficiency payments to be made by the end of 1971 to hog producers in order to help them get a better income?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is a heading on these grading certificates at the top in red ink indicating that they should be retained in the event that a deficiency payment is made. I have advised the House a number of times that the mandatory level is $24.14 based on the national weighted average. If the average for 1971 is below that, there will be a payment at least up to that amount.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

In view of the fact that prices are definitely inadequate according to hog breeders, could the minister indicate to the House whether he is prepared to recommend that the price of $24 be changed in order that those breeders may have an opportunity to get an income consistent with 1971 needs?

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I could make any announcement of that kind until I know for a fact what the national weighted average is for all of 1971.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EGGS—INQUIRY AS TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENT

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell the House whether a deficiency payment for the past year will be made on eggs? I understand that the assessment period ended at the end of September.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I will look into that to see whether the price falls below the moving average and I will report to the House tomorrow.

SHEEP—PROGRAM TO SUSTAIN INDUSTRY

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture concerning the effect of the stabilization bill on support for the sheep industry. The minister has discontinued the wool subsidy. What other program has he in mind to sustain the Canadian sheep industry?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in response to that kind of question, though not precisely the same question, I have advised the House and the sheep industry on many occasions that there has been a substantial increase in the price of Canadian lambs which more than offsets removal of the deficiency payment on wool.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONFERENCE OF FRANCOPHONE COUNTRIES—APPOINTMENT OF DELEGATES, VOTING INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the conference of Francophone countries now being held in Canada. Could the minister advise by what government these delegates to the conference were appointed and from what government they receive their voting instructions?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I recall the situation, at the conference where the agence was approved the membership was determined at that time. All of the members who joined the organization at that time were invited by the secretariat to attend.

Mr. Macquarrie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are any delegates at the current conference appointed by the governments of any of the provinces of Canada and, if so, which provinces are they?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, on the Canadian delegation are representatives named by the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Ontario. The province of Quebec has the additional distinction of being a gouvernement participant.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROVISION OF NATIONAL SALARY SCALE FOR NURSES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Will guidelines be developed to put an end to the practice of regional pay disparity for first level nurses across the country, and will the government review the specific instance which next year will grant to first level nurses in the Maritimes about $6,500 while nurses in British Columbia will receive about $7,800?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I cannot reply affirmatively to that suggestion. As I indicated in the House last week, in the interests of fairness and equity the government is proceeding to establish relativity between government rates of pay and local or regional rates of pay. This policy has recently been confirmed in the case of nurses. There was a hearing on this issue before an arbitration tribunal, and as a consequence of the award the pay levels the hon. gentleman referred to were granted.

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—DISCUSSION OF REMOVAL OF TARIFFS ON NEW OR USED AUTOMOBILES PURCHASED BY INDIVIDUALS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, if I may have the minister's ear I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In the government's discussions with the United States government on the Canada-United States automotive agreement, in addition to the concessions that it seems willing to make on the question of safeguards in the pact, has the government of Canada agreed to or discussed any proposal that would remove tariffs on new or used automobiles purchased by individuals, as opposed to corporations, in one country for shipment to the other so that they would enter duty free?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this particular aspect has not been discussed in my presence but it may very well be that it was raised at the official level. However, I cannot say that it was.

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—RELATION OF CANADIAN GRIEVANCES TO FUNDAMENTAL POLICY REVIEW

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to some of the questions asked earlier of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact the hon. gentleman admitted we do have a list of some sort for use at some time and to be presented somewhere, I wonder whether this list of ours is a substitute for or supplemental to the fundamental review of policy the minister said we were having in respect of our relations with the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. gentleman that it is not our purpose to prepare such a list unless, of course, we receive such a list from the United States, which we have not received.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, without arguing with the answer or its inconclusive nature, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he would use his good offices to assure this chamber that the Minister of Finance, while he may not have formally received a list from the external affairs people of the United States, does not have in fact a working list from the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and, if he does not, will he instruct the Minister of Finance to appear on some television show with the Secretary of the Treasury so they can exchange these lists?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CORN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the MInister of Agriculture. In view of the fact some time has elapsed since representations were made to the minister regarding the corn industry and the further deterioration of the market, will he indicate whether he will be in a position in the next day or two to state the government's policy on motions?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hope that will take place very soon, but I am sure the hon. member is as aware as I am of the many implications and ramifications of the alternatives open to us and certainly we would like a consensus on what would be the most useful thing to do before reaching a decision.

TURKEYS—PRICE TO BE PAID BY AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BOARD

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the program announced earlier this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture, I should like to ask what price will be paid for these turkeys or, if a definite price has not been arrived at, will be indicate what will be the means of arriving at the purchase price?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have noted from the announcement I made that there will be a call for tenders which will include specifications for tendering. I think the details will be out later today or tomorrow.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF BANK OF CANADA INTEREST RATE

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Would he tell the House whether he foresees the possibility of reducing the interest rate of the Bank of Canada so that chartered banks may reduce their own, thus promoting the economic expansion of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this kind of decision usually comes from the Bank of Canada, which makes the announcement itself, rather than the government.

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION AND DEBATE ON GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

With reference to negotiations that will surely take place between the United States and Canada, would the Prime Minister indicate whether the government has any positive proposals to make to the United States, whether he intends to make them known to hon. members of Parliament and whether he would go as far as invite them to discuss such proposals, taking into account the interest of Canadians.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the only proposal we are making to the United States government, which we indicated to the House several weeks ago, is to remove the 10 per cent surtax. There are no other general decisions that we are trying to get from them.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said a few minutes ago, a lot of issues are discussed throughout the year with the United States, as well as with other countries by the way, and we always keep the House informed in due course.

WELFARE

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY FUNDS TO PROVINCES TO PAY INCREASED COSTS THIS WINTER

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. As a survey of Ontario welfare offices indicates another significant increase in the welfare rolls this winter caused by unemployment, and in view of the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare about unemployed employables on welfare, is the government considering providing emergency funds to the provinces to finance increased welfare costs this winter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no announcement I can make in that regard at this point. If the government had any plans of that nature it would discuss them with the provinces when we meet and make the plans known to the House at the same time.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister agreeable to having provincial welfare costs on the agenda of the forthcoming first ministers' conference?

Mr. Trudeau: If such is the desire of the provinces, Mr. Speaker, the federal government would, of course, agree to establishing an agenda which the provinces wanted.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I would if I could ask the government House leader what he intends to do today in view of the fact that on Friday last the government's legislative shopping list was a little unclear?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am still a little unclear as to the long-term prospects. It had been my intention today to move a time allocation order under Standing Order 75B in respect of the grain stablization bill. If that order were passed, as I think it might be, it would bring an end to the debate this week. However, my readiness to move that time allocation order rests on the assumption that we can get the parties to agree to postpone the court action that is to take place in Saskatchewan tomorrow. If we are assured that an adjournment of that action could take place, then I would move the time allocation order later today. Of course, if an adjournment is not possible I think the government would have no alternative later today than to make payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. However, I am still waiting for final word on the outcome of the efforts to arrange an adjournment among the parties to that court action. With that background and with the expectation that we might be able to move that time allocation order later today, I would advise my hon. friend that we will take the tax bill as the first item this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the government House leader to make one point clear. The hon. gentleman referred to an agreement among the parties. An agreement among the parties in this place usually means among the four political parties represented here. I think he should make it clear that the use of the phrase "the parties" in this case refers to the applicants at Regina and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), who is the respondent.

While I am on my feet, may I say that the minister has indicated he would be prepared to move a time allocation order under Standing Order 75B. Of course, that implies he does not have unanimous approval for such an order but only majority approval. That is quite correct. I have not agreed, for we do not feel the House should be put under the gun in respect of this matter.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I just want to assure the House that I agree with the definition of "parties" as given by learned counsel on the other side.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Friday, October 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that bill C-259 to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there are some points regarding this bill I should like to call to the attention of the House at this stage on second reading. We are discussing an immensely complicated piece of tax legislation. The bill is very complicated, very detailed and very dry. One would have to admit, consequently, that the discussion of this bill is not exactly going to grab the Canadian people.

Nevertheless, the contents of the bill are of tremendous importance to the Canadian people and indeed to the whole future of this country. The most obvious reason is the immediate and long-term effect that this legislation will have upon the pocketbooks of individual Canadians. This is important because it involves the freedom of choice of the individual, his ability to spend his money as he desires, the proportion of his earnings he will have to give to the public treasury for public purposes and the proportion he may be allowed to keep for his own priorities. We of the official opposition have been saying from the start that as a result of the rapidly increasing proportion the government intends to take even from the relatively low wage earners, as their earnings may go up because of inflation or because of an increase in their salary for other reasons, most Canadians would rather quickly find they will be paying more rather than less to the government of Canada.

The sleight of hand trick may well have an effect for a few months or even for a year or two, but the whole thrust of this tax package is to get more money from the low or relatively low income workers. That is what we have been denouncing and continue to denounce. However, beyond the impact on individuals there is another aspect of taxation which affects the whole economy, its capacity for growth, its capacity to adapt to changing conditions in the country and its capacity to adapt to changing conditions in the whole world. The question we must ask ourselves, and ask the government, is what does this proposed tax package really accomplish in terms of the health of the whole Canadian economy. What do these changes do, for example, to help us fight the battle against massive unemployment in Canada. What do they do to help us in the battle against inflation. What do they do to improve or even maintain our trading position in the world, where all the established trading patterns are under attack as they have not been for a long time. The answer must be that this present tax bill is irrelevant to the solution of these problems. That is the best answer one could give.

The most optimistic answer one could give is that this tax bill is irrelevant to the fight against inflation, the fight against unemployment and the fight to enable the Canadian economy to adjust to world trading conditions. Indeed, as I say, that is an optimistic point of view to take as I shall indicate in a few moments. Even the government does not pretend that these proposals, if they should be applied at the beginning of next year, would have any real effect on unemployment. That is, they would not in any way reduce unemployment. It is just as well the government does not claim this, because it would be laughed out of court if it were to try to do so. The government does not claim these tax proposals will help in the battle against inflation, that is clear; and once again it is just as well because they could not make any case. As for the present trading position in Canada and Canadian industry, especially with regard to the United States, the relevance of these proposals has not been laid out. It is clear to all of us who have sat in this House and who have lived in Canada for the past number of months that the country is faced with tremendous problems, problems which are immediate and problems which are right here in front of us as well as problems which we see stretching out into the future.

Let us not forget that tax policy, both long and short-term, inevitably has an enormous impact on our present and future economic performance in Canada.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Order, There should not be a caucus in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition, but I suggest to hon. members who want to have party caucuses that they should have them outside the Chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Stanfield: Maybe it is not just the country that is faced with tremendous problems, I don't know, Mr. Speaker. In any case, the country certainly is faced with tremendous problems. That is why these proposals should be relevant, and why it is so tragic they do not seem to be relevant to these urgent questions. What has in fact happened has been that the legislation has been presented to us in sort of a vacuum. It was as though the government decided it could make these decisions in some kind of air-tight compartment, regardless of changing conditions outside the compartment.

I reject that concept with all the force I can command. What we should be doing is taking steps to create a tax arrangement that will help us find our way in the world as it seems to be evolving.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: What we should be doing is finally setting our goals in terms of employment, in terms of price stability and in terms of trade expansion. On that basis, we should be working out tax policies to fit our problems to these conditions and ensure the viability of our economy. That is what this bill fails to do. And that is what this government notoriously has failed to do in its tax policy and for that matter in the other policies, if any, it has been pursuing in the field of economics. The plain fact is that we believe the tax bill is irrelevant to the many serious problems of today. That is the most charitable thing one could say about the bill. That is its basic weakness and that is why I find it almost incomprehensible that this government is insisting that it should have priority at this time. This is not merely a confusion of priorities. It is not just a simple mistake in judgment. It is in fact an admission by this government that it has nothing relevant to say or propose to the Canadian people at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is in fact an admission that this government has no policies to deal with the problems of unemployment, inflation and trade. I do not need to take the time to indict the government. The government has indicted itself. I said that at best the bill is irrelevant in respect of these problems which face us. When the bill was drafted and presented to the House the economic context in which Canada found itself appeared then to be markedly different from the context in which we find ourselves today. It is true we had very heavy unemployment, despite all the predictions of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), but at the time the bill was introduced our exports were doing quite well. It was the unsatisfactory rate of growth in the domestic sector that was generally considered to be causing the unemployment. Indeed, our exports have been expanding because of the expanding economies of our customers.

• (3:20 p.m.)

At the time when the tax bill was introduced I suppose the darkest cloud that was visible on the horizon was the much discussed entry of Great Britain into the Common Market, and the very real and very justified concern as to what this might do to some of our exports. This was the darkest cloud visible on the horizon so far as our exports were concerned. Then, as we know, in mid-August President Nixon announced his new package. We all remember the surtax that was imposed, the visit of two of our ministers to Washington, and the rumours and speculation as to matters between our two countries that the United States wished to see changed. We now know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) had requested a bill of particulars, so to speak, with regard to the removal of the surtax, but this has not been received. However, there has been a great deal of discussion in the press and elsewhere as to matters for which the U.S. may be pushing in terms of long-term and fundamental changes in the trading relations between our two countries. These suggestions have not only come in the press, indeed they came from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself as well as from the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On September 23, the Prime Minister expressed concern that while he believed the United States was > . . . legitimately just trying to correct their adverse trade balances, that they are really trying to solve their near-crisis in their balance of payments, and that they are attacking it in a very drastic way. I do not think that the U.S. is deliberately trying to beggar its neighbours and make this into a permanent policy. But if it is—and you know this is your question—if it is, we will have to have a fundamental re-assessment of our whole economy.

More recently, on Sunday last, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in a television program, gave similar information. He was asked a particular question, and he said:

> Yes, I'd like to know too, I'd like to know the answer to that.

That is, whether there is some fundamental change in our economic relationship under way. He said:

No, what you have to do is to react to particular changes and if a pattern begins to emerge then you know that there is no return to the old sort of relationship that existed before August 15 so that it's an ongoing process and this is one of the reasons why in the government we have decided to have a look at the options because we can't wait until we are finally sure what the American position is going to be. We must have done a good deal of thinking in advance so that at least we are prepared to take appropriate action.

I quote the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in order to indicate that for some reason the government of Canada has some concern that there may be under way a long-term change of some sort in the trading relations between Canada and the U.S. Both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have referred to the need for Canada to consider her alternatives. I will not take the time of the House to read the statement made by Mr. Petty, the under secretary of the Treasury or to speculate about how much truth there might be in the story in the Chicago Tribune. These have been discussed earlier today and on previous days in the question periods, but I think it is quite clear from what the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance have said that they are concerned about possible changes in the trading relationship between Canada and her biggest customer, the U.S.A.

Therefore, I suggest that it hardly makes sense to consider a tax bill now which involves a complete new package. It involves a vast change, a reform in the law, if you like, relating to the taxation of the incomes of corporations. It involves, of course, changes in personal income tax schedules and exemptions. It makes a lot of sense to consider these, and I am not suggesting that they should be dropped, but in terms of this vast new structure of taxation of companies, partnerships and business profits generally, I suggest that this whole structure may need substantial revision, even in the eyes of the sponsors of this bill, when the smoke clears and our position vis-à-vis the U.S. in terms of trading relationships becomes clearer. Even those who sponsored this bill last spring may themselves come to feel that this is not the appropriate kind of tax structure for Canada to have in the new circumstances which the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Finance have said may be evolving. They have all expressed the hope—and I hope their hope is justified—that any fears they might have would prove groundless.

However, it is hardly sensible for the House to proceed with this tax structure as if nothing at all had happened in view of the quite disquieting statements that the Prime Minister and senior members of his government have made in public. We have the U.S. surtax on many of our exports to the U.S. We have tax changes now before the U.S. congress, including the so-called DISC program. We have the statements of our own ministers that in view of all these things there may be a need for a fundamental revision of our relationship with the U.S. in terms of trade. If this is so, I could say a good deal about the kind of commentary that this deterioration makes on the kind of policy that the government has been pursuing with regard to the United States, but that is not my point today.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

I do not rise today to criticize the government in connection with the Canada-U.S. relationship, since there will be another opportunity to do that. My point is that these changes to which the Prime Minister and the ministers have referred may require a quite different approach to business taxation, especially with regard to companies, partnerships and individuals engaged in the exporting business. Premier Davis of Ontario made this point very effectively I think toward the end of last week. It might be said that whatever changes prove to be necessary in any newly evolved international context, whatever that may be, such changes can be made by special legislation in time. If the changes under way are anything as fundamental as the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have suggested, changes which would require a complete new rethinking of our whole relationship, then the changes in our tax structure to meet this situation may need to be very far reaching. Indeed it might be much more advisable for us to approach this question, and any new stance we wish to adopt by way of incentives, in terms of our general tax reform legislation rather than in terms of special taxation which might attract undue attention and, in the eyes of our competitors, look like a subsidy of some sort.

• (3:30 p.m.)

This bill is enormously complex, especially with regard to small corporations. I do not think anybody will deny for a minute that it will take quite a bit of time for a small company to get used to it. The small businessman will need quite a bit of advice for tax consultants on a continuing basis to learn how to operate satisfactorily in the new milieu that this tax bill would create. In view of its complexity, in view of the difficulties it will create, the added difficulties in the lives of business people at this time, it is not the sort of thing the House should enter upon lightly.

I suggest it does not make very much sense for us to be asked by the government to consider a bill of this complexity at this time if in fact the government is considering other options with regard to Canada's trade stance in the world. If the government feels it is compelled at this time to consider other options with regard to trading policies generally, then it is pretty likely to feel compelled to consider other options with regard to taxation policies, particularly as they effect industries and companies engaged in exports.

I must also remind the House that the Science Council has become so concerned with the plight of the technological sector of our manufacturing industry that it felt it was necessary to produce a special interim report, particularly in view of the deterioration that has taken place in the position of our technological industries within the past two or three years. The Council has emphasized the pressing need for an industrial strategy which, it says, is nonexistent at the present time.

I ask the Minister of Finance who sponsors this bill in the House, is the government of Canada going to develop an industrial strategy, as recommended by the Science Council, and will tax policy play any part in that industrial strategy? The Science Council does make a brief reference to tax policy. Indeed, it expresses the hope that things might be a bit better under the proposal related to half capital gains and allowance for half capital losses. I assume that when the Council speaks about things being better it is speaking relatively, in comparison with what conditions would have been under the white paper proposals, because the Science Council refers very emphatically to the unattractive climate for investment in manufacturing in Canada today.

When I asked the Prime Minister some questions about the Science Council recommendations, he seemed to be a little bored with the whole thing. I do not think any Canadian could read the interim report of the Science Council without sharing the great concern that is expressed quite eloquently by the Science Council. The Science Council says that an industrial strategy is needed. Is tax policy to be a factor in that, because it is certainly not taken care of in this bill? I have referred to the complexity of the bill, to the difficulties that will be added to the ordinary normal difficulties of people in business, particularly those small businessmen engaged in exporting.

In view of the complexity of the bill, in view of the call for a new industrial strategy—a strategy which the Science Council is convinced does not exist—in view of the hints, or at least the concern expressed by the Prime Minister and by senior ministers that we may need to engage in a whole review of our trading position, in the light of all these circumstances why does the government try to push this bill through in all its complexity at this time? Even assuming, as I do, that the provisions in the bill were considered appropriate in the eyes of the sponsor, I think they can hardly be considered appropriate in the eyes of its sponsor today. I suggest, indeed I request, that the Minister of Finance bring in a bill that does justice to the needs of individuals, that is, with relation to tax deductions to the ordinary taxpayer, tax deductions for senior citizens, for the blind, a bill providing for exemptions; in other words, a bill designed to meet the needs of the individual for a more just personal income tax system.

Surely, Sir, it is important that the government of Canada and the people of Canada get a clear view of our position in the economic world as it exists, and obviously none of us is very clear at the moment as to what that world is. None of us is very clear as to what kind of a world Canadians will be doing business in, and surely it makes sense not to push through a very complex bill, a complete tax reform relating to commercial activities when apparently the future is so obscure to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Finance and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Let us provide justice for individuals in terms of their personal income tax problems. Let us provide that kind of justice, but let us not change the general tax system relating to companies and partnerships until we know the context in which we are dealing and operating, until we know the industrial strategy that the government intends to bring forward. It will then be appropriate to deal with it, but not necessarily through a bill such as we have today, but a bill that we will be able to discuss in terms of the actual context within which Canadians will be operating. I suggest that it makes very little sense for the Minister of Finance to try to jam this bill through at this time when he cannot possibly know, in view of what he has said and of what the Prime Minister has said, the conditions under which Canadians will be trying to do export business.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I enter the debate at this stage with a speech, which I hope will not be very lengthy, for three reasons which will become evident as I continue.

When the government informs Parliament and the people of Canada that it is engaged in a total reappraisal of its economic relations with the United States which may, as developments occur, become necessary, I think the whole sense of the bill before us becomes rather obscure and difficult to understand. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no way in which such a reappraisal, if it is taking place in the ranks of the government and if it results in some new direction of government policy, can be achieved without affecting the tax structure of Canada.

The tax measures now in this complicated and unreadable bill—I challenge anyone to read this bill in the course of a week and understand at least half of it—really concern in part our economic relations with the United States because they still give emphasis to the resource industries; they still make important tax concessions to the large foreign controlled corporations that yank Canada's wealth out of the ground and ship it elsewhere. That, Mr. Speaker, is one of the basic facts of the present tax bill. As was said during the debate on the budget by members of my party and the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), the general thrust of the proposition of the government is to continue to tax the large corporations and the resource extractive industries lightly and to continue to tax ordinary Canadians heavily. That imbalance, that inequity in the tax system, is directly related to our economic relations with the United States. It is obvious that when one gives corporations that have their headquarters in the United States continuing tax concessions, one invites them to continue controlling our economy and indeed to increase that control.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say, since it is my wont to speak pretty frankly and strongly, that the government is not being frank with us when it says it is reappraising our economic relations with the United States and when it says that, it is just talking about something that is a theoretical, academic exercise undertaken by the mandarins and their assistants in the various departments as a matter of regular routine rather than as a matter of meaningful reappraisal of our position vis-à-vis the United States. Either that is what is happening or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was boasting about something that is not really the case, playing games with words and with the people of Canada. Either that is the case or the government must withdraw the tax bill now before us and look at it again in the light of any reappraisal that is really taking place in government ranks.

That seems perfectly logical to me, Mr. Speaker, because no reassessment of our economic relations with the United States, no program of action and policy following such a reassessment that changes the direction of Canada's economy, that I can conceive of would not involve the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and his tax measures. Any such reassessment must involve some changes in the tax structure vis-à-vis individuals, vis-à-vis corporations generally and vis-à-vis foreign owned corporations in particular. Again I emphasize, I cannot imagine it resulting in any policy which would not require a new kind of tax approach to the resource industries. We have emphasized again and again, and I merely restate it as briefly as I can without the details, that the continuation of the forgivable taxes, the deferred appreciation, the speeded up exploration costs, the speeded up depletion allowances and the deferred taxes on resource corporations in this country is an iniquitous provision both because it is inequitable in the tax structure and because it continues to sell out Canada's economy to foreign corporations, mainly American.

One cannot discuss this bill without dealing with the over-all economic situation that faces Canada. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I feel we are being a little like Alice in Wonderland discussing a huge unreadable and almost unintelligible tax bill at a moment in our economic history when we have had far too high unemployment for the month of August and a threat of massive unemployment in the autumn and winter months. I feel that the government is making this Parliament deal with a subject that is not immediate, which, as far as I am concerned, will have value mainly for the corporations some time hence, when what we ought to be dealing with is the immediate concern of unemployment in Canada and the dreadful—I repeat, Mr. Speaker,—the dreadful situation that the workers of Canada are likely to find themselves in during the next two or three months and for some months to follow. We are told all the time by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the government is in the process of working up a program to create jobs this winter and then, there is this delay. Mr. Speaker, I say to the government and the Minister of Finance who is here, that I cannot understand the reasons for that delay. I cannot see anything ahead but great trouble and hardship as a result of that delay.

In answer to a question which I put to him the other day, the Prime Minister said in effect that there are many things the federal government can do on its own on the question of employment this winter. He did not say that is what it is going to do, I appreciate that. He did not say the program it was discussing was going to be exclusively one that should be implemented by the federal government alone in every respect. However, he did say—which is sometimes his wont—what I said which did not answer the question at all. Since then, I have tried to think and understand what the federal government could do to create jobs this winter without the participation of municipal and provincial governments of Canada.

One of the things the federal government could do, Mr. Speaker, is to introduce some meaningful and sizeable tax cuts immediately, affecting the low and low middle income groups in this country. It could do that without consultation with the provinces and the municipalities. I say to the Minister of Finance that this should be done and it should be done immediately. If the government were to come forward with a program to seek tax cuts in addition to those proposed on an inequitable basis in the present tax bill, I am sure that all members of the opposition—and I can speak for members of my own party—would pass such a bill if it had the effect of cutting taxes for the low and middle income groups in Canada with the least possible debate and in a short time. The purchasing power of the people would thereby be increased immediately for the purpose of stimulating the economy in a very short time. Of course, there is always a time lag between the date tax cuts take place and when their effect is felt on the market and on the economy. We, in our party, would be willing to consider that kind of proposal with the least possible debate, unless it were as horrendous in its inequity as some other proposals which have been produced by the Minister of Finance. Obviously, he does not intend to do any more than is suggested in this tax bill. Otherwise, I cannot understand why he would not already have told us that he intends to make the necessary amendments to the necessary clause of the tax bill in order to produce those tax cuts without delay.

The other thing that I suppose the federal government could do on its own would be to spend some money on its own public works programs. It could build some more fancy, federal office buildings—at least that would produce some jobs. Yet I want to argue this afternoon that I am not interested in make-work proposals. There are necessary things that must be done for the welfare of the people of Canada, and any program of winter jobs ought to be directed towards those objectives.

Even the large amounts of money which might be spent by the Department of Public Works or some other departments of government in connection with programs that the government could undertake would obviously not create many jobs in Canada. I therefore assume, and perhaps I am naïve in making this assumption, that any programs for jobs this winter announced by the federal government would include, no matter what else it may or may not include, some money which is to be made available to the provinces or municipalities with respect to various works that the provincial and municipal levels of government may carry out this winter and start immediately. I hope that assumption is correct. If it is not, we will not get a program from the government; we will get a shadow. We will merely get useless suggestions from the federal government for work this winter because the provinces and municipalities will not be involved. I say that because the area in which the federal government, by itself, can produce jobs is so narrow that it will not even touch the issue of unemployment this fall and winter.

I must, therefore, assume, and my colleagues may disagree with me for being so generous, that the government is not unintelligent and that it is sufficiently intelligent to know that it must bring the provinces and municipalities into the picture for any valid, useful and large job creating program. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, I say to the government that its failure to call an earlier conference on the unemployment question, and I do not care whether the conference was to have been between ministers of finance, treasurers or heads of governments across Canada, was unforgivable. The government ought to have called an earlier federal-provincial conference. Its failure to call that conference last month or, indeed, within the next few weeks, for the purposes of working out collectively a program that would create a massive number of jobs this winter, constitutes a betrayal of its duty to the people of Canada in view of the present unemployment situation and the unemployment situation that is to come.

The Prime Minister has tried to blame other first ministers for the fact that an earlier conference is not being held. According to my reading of the situation, and I have seen the correspondence that has been made public, this government has never asked for and never called a conference to deal with the unemployment situation. The discussions were to be on general economic subjects. If the government intends to make a proposal, present a program or offer some finances in order to create jobs this winter which will involve implementation in part or in whole by provincial and municipal governments, then the present delay on the part of the government in announcing its program is reprehensible. I cannot see how provincial and municipal governments can make ready their plans for jobs in November, December, January and February, if they are not told how much money the government of Canada will make available for that purpose. It should make that known before the end of October, and we are now in the middle of October. The delay, in my humble view, is unforgivable. In my submission, it indicates a hesitation on the part of the government in dealing seriously with the unemployment situation that faces us now and will become more serious in the months ahead. This again indicates the government's failure to consider in human terms this problem affecting millions of Canadians, and its failure to deal sensitively with this massive unemployment situation. It has failed to display the sense of urgency and emergency which the situation requires.

There are no magic ways for dealing with the unemployment situation, Mr. Speaker. Nobody can wave a magic wand and settle these problems. As we discuss this tax bill, the changes in the tax structure which are being made and the inequities which still remain, I wish to put forward some suggestions which I believe are important. First, the government must present a program that will guarantee at least an additional one quarter of a million jobs during the four or five months of winter. Any program that provides additional work for fewer than a quarter of a million of our people will not scratch the surface, since in all likelihood our unemployment this winter will reach well over the half million mark, and perhaps come closer to the three quarters of a million mark, both because of the internal economic situation and because of the reactionary, protectionist Nixon policies of the United States. That is the first point I make, Mr. Speaker. At least a quarter of a million additional jobs must be created by any program that the government will propose.

My second point relates even more directly to the tax bill before us. If it becomes necessary in some way for the government to find the funds which will be necessary for carrying out my suggestion, the government has the responsibility of doing so. My studies and inquiries have shown me that this kind of program cannot be accomplished without a massive injection and expenditure of funds. I am talking of amounts between three quarters of a billion dollars and one billion dollars. Any program that is smaller than that will no more than scratch the surface of the unemployment situation, merely raise the expectations of people which will not be realized and again betray the desirable as well as justifiable hopes of the Canadian people. They hope that something will be done. I submit that much of this money ought to go into an increased housing program. It ought to develop, particularly, low cost housing both for renters and for those who may be able to buy a house if the down payment is reduced sufficiently, if interest rates are reduced sufficiently and if the income to which the house purchase is related is made more reasonable and practical, in the light of the present situation. I am sure everyone here will agree with me that nothing can create jobs more quickly, and even here there will be quite a time lag, than a massive housing program.

I am aware, and I want to say it before anyone else does—although perhaps nobody else will bother to say this—that housing starts this year have been running at an annual rate of around 220,000, 230,000 or 240,000 units.

Mr. Benson: I think the rate was at better than 250,000 units as of last month.

Mr. Lewis: It may even be 250,000 units. That performance is much better than the performance of recent years. I do not deny that. I suggest to the government, none the less, that it ought not to be complacent about this, because the need for housing is away beyond 250,000 new units per year. The need for housing is so great and urgent in many parts of this country that you could create jobs this winter and meet the pressing need of the Canadian people. That is what I meant when I objected to any criterion that created jobs by make-work programs, by building unnecessary buildings and by erecting buildings that are fancier than the situation requires. That is throwing money away even though it may create jobs. As far as the social good for Canadians is concerned, that does not accomplish anything. Building homes, renovating homes which are now unliveable, creating an environment for the Canadian people in which they can live in decency, providing day care centres for working mothers or fathers, providing necessary parks for the children of Canada and necessary facilities for amateur sports in this country will not only create jobs, but meet urgent social needs in this country. That is the kind of program for this winter that my party suggests the government ought to propose before long. It is too late already.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The long delay in making the payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is related to the economic situation, the tax situation and the unemployment situation. The financial bind in which the farmers have found themselves for the past couple of years has directly resulted in lay-offs at equipment manufacturing plants in Brantford, Toronto and elsewhere in this country. If the government had not broken the law as it did, without conscience, but had paid out the money under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act when it should have, many farmers in western Canada would have been able to buy equipment and parts and the workers in eastern Canada who produce the equipment and parts would not now be walking the streets in idleness. That, too, is a matter which is the responsibility of the government and greatly adds to the unemployment rolls in this country.

Fourth, with regard to the whole economic situation which faces us, any plan for jobs this winter must not merely turn over large sums of money to some agency. There ought to be careful planning. I again plead with the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister that they call without delay a meeting of whatever representatives of all the governments of Canada can get together in order to set the policies and programs governing winter employment, jobs on the scale to which I have referred. The time is long overdue to get out of the constitutional straitjacket into which the Prime Minister has put himself, that is, merely because the municipalities are constitutionally the creature of the provinces he cannot take steps to have the municipalities participate in this kind of conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: This is nonsense. Anyone who knows Canada knows that one of the areas in which it is possible to do job creating and socially useful work in winter or, in fact, at any time of the year, is the municipalities of Canada. They need a lot of help. Whether it be sewers, streets, urban transportation or the fight against pollution that requires waste treatment plants, most communities in Canada, large and small, do not have any or sufficiently modern and effective plants. The areas of municipal involvement, housing, community planning, renovation of houses all involve the large urban centres and large urban regions.

I have studied the constitution, and over the years I have studied the cases affecting the constitution. I have not seen anything in logic which prevents the federal government from inviting representatives of the federation of municipalities of this country to be present at a conference which will discuss the priorities governing the creation of jobs this winter. They should be there, and not just the provincial representatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: These are some of the things that can and ought to be done without delay.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that a general discussion of the tax bill looks almost irrelevant at this point. If the Minister of Finance wants to be relevant to the present situation in Canada, the threat to Canada's economy and Canada's employment picture from the employment policies, he ought to make immediately some decisive changes in the bill before us. He ought to propose immediately some massive changes in the tax structure as far as it affects the low and middle income groups. He should reduce the tax burden on them without delay. Indeed, this should be effective from the beginning of this year, January 1, 1971.

Then, Mr. Speaker, in order to make the tax bill have any relevance to the present economic situation in Canada, the minister must deal with those clauses in the bill that continue to give, as I have already said, the inequitable, undesirable Canada sell-out tax concessions to the major foreign-owned resource corporations in this country. That has to be adequate if there is to be any meaningful reassessment of our economic relations with the United States.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, this bill can be more relevant only if the government, either through the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance or any other minister, because as far as I am concerned they are all equally competent—it is difficult for Hansard to hear the quotation marks around the word "competent" as I enunciated it—presents a program for jobs this winter. The delay is already far too long. It is unforgivable that it has been delayed even this long. If it is delayed more than a day or two beyond today, the government will again carry the responsibility for a winter of misery, hardship, insecurity and dislocation for a large section of the Canadian people from coast to coast, particularly in the disadvantaged areas of this country such as the Atlantic provinces, parts of Quebec and other parts of Canada.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, if the government has a program for jobs this winter, I plead with them not to delay it any longer. Let us hear about it, not because we are curious to know what it is, although we have a right to that kind of curiosity, but unless it is announced immediately and gives the provinces, municipalities and private organizations, if they should be involved, the necessary time to make the plans and arrangements, the program will be less than a success, perhaps even a total failure.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the legislation now being discussed has undergone a very long period of gestation. Indeed, in the normal course of things, natural gestation lasts approximately nine months, but that of this pretty legislation, which has a rather impressive thickness, is the fruit of some ten years of labour. And I am convinced that this House does not expect—especially not this government—that it may be passed within a few hours.

I should like, during the few minutes put at my disposal, to review the aspect of this bill which concerns particularly credit unions and co-operatives. That is a most interesting field for us and one that we must consider seriously so as to analyze the legislation now being considered and, if it is passed by this House, to determine its consequences and advantages, if required, so as to make the best possible use of it.

Obviously, the movers of this very complicated legislation should give much more explanations about it so that the interested parties may know its true implications. First there is the whole population, if we think of the important changes brought to the personal income tax act. Then there are the corporations, companies, industrialists, business firms and especially co-operatives and credit unions whose taxation system is running the risk of being radically changed. It is important to look particularly into the amendments suggested for these institutions in this piece of legislation as well as into their demands regarding the system contemplated by the government.

Let us deal first with the co-operatives. We see that the government has introduced two new essential elements in the present taxation system, namely: the principle of capital employed, and new limits on the payment of dividends or refunds.

In practice, for the calculation of the taxable income, the profit, after deduction of dividends or refunds to members, shall not be below 5 per cent of capital employed (i.e. 5 per cent of assets less liabilities), this 5 per cent limit to be reduced only by the inclusion of the amount of interests paid to members. Let us point out that the 3-year exemption period allowed to new co-operatives is completely eliminated.

Under the present system, the limit is not 5 per cent, but 3 per cent, and it allows co-operatives to pay their members, as dividends, a greater part of their profits. Moreover, it is possible to deduct from the 3 per cent, in addition to the interests paid to members, all kinds of interests except those paid to banks and credit unions.

If the legislation is passed as drafted, a greater part of the profits of the co-operative itself will be taxable at the same rate that applies to ordinary corporations, that is 50 per cent, except, of course, for profits under $50,000 that are taxable at 25 per cent, as previously provided.

Therefore, for the same amount of profits reported by co-operatives throughout the country, the government will be able to get significantly higher revenues, while showing no concern about penalizing this way, first, the co-operatives as institutions by depriving them of an important part of the resources they urgently need to expand and, secondly, the hundreds of thousands of members whose individual and collective effort would have been rewarded by these new restrictions in respect of the distribution of benefits or dividends.

To get a clearer view of the probable effects of the government's proposed amendments, let us consider the example of a co-operative whose total capital is $800,000 distributed in round figures as follows: shareholders assets, $500,000; long term debts, carrying interest at 6 per cent, $300,000.

Under the present tax system, this co-operative pays income tax only on profits which, after deduction of dividends, may not be lower than 3 per cent of the total capital, the amount from which it can deduct the interest paid on its long term debt, which breaks down as follows: capital stock, $800,000; shareholders, $500,000; long term debts, $300,000.

Tax is therefore calculated as follows: 3 per cent on $800,000, $24,000; 6 per cent interest on debt of $300,000, $18,000.

After subtracting the taxable profit of $6,000 according to the present table, tax payable would be $1,500.

The situation might change considerably as a result of the propositions contained in Bill C-259. The rate is no longer 3 per cent but 5 per cent and it no longer applies to the total co-operative capital but only to the portion corresponding to the shareholders capital. On the other hand, because of the concept of utilized capital as a basis for calculation of taxable income, the co-operative can no longer deduct from that amount the amount annually allocated to service of the long term debt, and consequently the figures would be the following:

Total capital: $800,000; long-term indebtedness: $300,000, computation of tax: at 5 per cent of $500,000, $25,000; tax payable: 25 per cent of $25,000, $6,250.

The taxable amount is therefore increased by $19,000 and the tax payable increases from $1,500 to $6,500, which is over 400 per cent in the case I have just outlined. If, for purposes of normal development, a co-operative decided to provide a mid term, that is a policy for the distribution of patronage dividends, this could lead to an unfortunate situation where a variable part of the co-operative's profits would be taxable at the same time as the dividends legitimately received by its members. Obvioulsy, at the moment the possibility exists, at least in theory, of double taxation. Furthermore, a large part of the dividends are usually re-invested and thus re-integrated into the co-operative's capital and the co-operative can use those funds to buy back the shares of those members who during the year decide to withdraw.

Thus to compel co-operatives to reduce unduly the amount of such dividends could have the following direct consequence: on the one hand, some co-operatives would find it impossible to reimburse their members, and financial and administrative problems would follow, and, on the other hand, to prevent any significant development of a given co-operative which could only rely on its usual income which is absolutely necessary for normal expansion.

That example must be considered as a typical case around which can exist all kinds of intermediate conditions, according to the situation of each co-operative, its importance, its previous commitments, the size of its debt, if necessary, etc.

However, the legislators should be thoroughly convinced that the tax reform proposals of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) are liable to change greatly not only the overall condition of the Canadian co-operative movement, but that of hundreds of co-operatives which have not yet reached the development level enabling them to sustain the heavy blows striken by the new taxing system, unless some of its more controversial aspects are altered.

The authorities and representatives of the various co-operative movements throughout the country have widely taken part in discussions intended to lead to a global tax reform, the principle of which is greater tax equity, so that each category or stratum of society might contribute to the activities of the state according to its respective real possibilities. Needless to say, everyone recognizes that principle and doubtless the leaders and members of the Canadian co-operative movement share it.

Still, that principle, although fundamentally sound and reasonable, must not be laid down as some kind of absolute; it would only lead to rigid positions on the part of the government, and many frustrations for a large sector of the population.

The co-operative movement, if one is to judge by the countless protests against the provisions of clause 135 and the principle of capital employed seems to be one of the main victims of this wish for unconditional tax equality. Co-operative members singled out, in particular, the following points in the bill: the notion of capital employed threatens to reduce considerably the amount of patronage dividends to be paid the members in connection with transactions amongst themselves, and therefore threatens directly the ability for a large number of co-operatives to reimburse the social capital their members request, and indirectly their ability to expand and develop.

Any further increase in the co-operative's reserves leading to an increase in what has been called the employed capital would mean, rather oddly for that matter, that in a given fiscal year, a co-operative would find itself in the obligation of paying more in income tax although during the same year its real profits had remained static or had decreased. Now that is a wonderful system for the Canadian treasury to collect taxes even when production decreases during the year.

Instead of being forced to adopt the methods of ordinary corporations and to deduct from their taxable income the interest paid on the capital supplied by their members, the co-operatives would like to see their own operating rules respected and to be allowed to keep on distributing their annual operating surplus in the form of patronage dividends.

It must not be forgotten that co-operatives are based on principles and concepts fairly different from what is found in ordinary commercial or industrial corporations. In the first place, a co-operative is an association of men instead of being a simple converging point for capital. The factor "work" and the "collective effort" concept prevail over the notion we consider erroneous of capital for the sake of capital. Men associate to do business, to gain advantages and not first and foremost to make profits. And if the associated individual draws benefits, he must automatically and necessarily take them into account when filing his income tax return and, through the personal income tax return, the government levies the share it wishes each individual to contribute to the financing of the affairs of the state.

The co-operative system can make a large contribution to the improvement or, at least, the humanization of our present capitalist system which is so much criticized in some areas, especially by the youth which will have to accept or reject what they will have been left with by the preceding generation.

If this principle of fiscal equality, which is generally recognized and which is not endangered by any serious threat because it is accepted by everybody, is furthered too blindly and perhaps too rapidly, it would be rather surprizing to see the government commit by the same occasion serious inequities by not amending the discriminatory measures toward the co-operative movement that it is about to have passed by this House. These measures do not take into account either the characteristics or the methods particular to the co-operative associations. The new taxation pattern does not seem to correspond with their specific nature and will force them to relinquish their distinct characteristics or simply disappear as co-operative associations as such. A fiscal mechanism would be introduced in the relationship between the co-operative and its members by modifying the redistribution pattern of surpluses which is peculiar to co-operatives. Because of this mechanism, they would be forced to contravene the laws by which they are regulated.

There is here, at the very least, an obvious contradiction, all the more as the House, through the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Standing Committee had expressed the wish, when considering the white paper on tax reform, that while no tax concession should be granted to organizations such as co-operatives, in the future, their activities should not be hindered nor should they be heavily taxed.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

It is therefore a question of vested interests, and it would be prejudicial, to say the least, that in wanting to be too fair on one particular point, we were grossly unfair on other aspects of the same problem. We therefore suggest that the government, while not overlooking the basic purpose of tax reform, introduce the new taxation system of corporations gradually and selectively, unless it is willing to reconsider on the whole the first clauses of Bill C-259.

The step that the co-operatives are asked to take appears definitely too big, and many of them, not so well organized or more recent, may simply disappear, and this would kill the co-operative movement, which would not be questioned. Special consideration should be given to consumer co-operatives with rather small assets and that are non profit-making.

In addition to this progressive concept, it would also be logical to establish some selective feature, so that all co-operatives would not be on an equal footing and some effort would be made to take into account, among other things, the development level of each one, and that in this way some consideration would be given according to fair and realistic criteria, to the tendency of each to compete with corporations or ordinary commercial and industrial firms, since that is the fundamental argument brought forward by the latter.

It may be correct to state that some co-operatives, super co-ops, realize some very substantial profits on which they should be taxed accordingly, especially where they are competing with ordinary companies which do not enjoy the same tax privileges. This situation should obviously be straightened out, which is perfectly in line with the guiding principles of any tax reform which is to be equitable. But there is a risk of losing sight of this principle of equity, if the same provisions should apply fully to several hundreds of co-operatives which have not yet reached a degree of development allowing them to bear the burden of these new tax measures. In those cases we would run the risk of destroying the very spirit of the co-operative movement which it was so difficult for us to inculcate upon the people. Therefore we should not chance freezing or paralysing a basically sound and human sector of our economy by being adamant on a principle concerning tax reform.

Not only co-operatives are endangered by the measures proposed by the Minister of Finance. Caisses populaires and credit unions are running the risk of being squeezed out before long because the bill remains very uncertain about the tax system that will be applied to them. Those institutions themselves have recognized that they should, from now on, be taxed according to their profits. Anyway, they will be taxed on the same basis as corporations, which is, at a rate of 25 per cent on profits up to $50,000, and of 50 per cent on those in excess of this figure—which will be a substantial change from the non-taxation position in which they have been to this day.

However, those organizations are asking for the establishment of a basically fair taxation system—a system which would not open the way to situations of double taxation. In this connection, it is recommended that interest paid to members, as well as the amount of compulsory reserves accumulated under provincial laws, be deductible from the income of caisses populaires. By only allowing deduction of so-called normal reserves, the amount of which they would set in arbitrary fashion, the federal government might run counter to well established provincial laws which set the amount of such reserves at a higher level. In my opinion, we must avoid creating such distortions in the various measures that rule the activities of Canadians, whether it concerns co-operatives or credit unions. Reducing the amount of tax deductible reserves will unfortunately oblige those institutions to pay smaller dividends to their members. Another consequence of the proposed legislation will be to force former members of credit unions to get credit elsewhere at considerably higher rates.

On the one hand, we therefore risk further choking the small wage earner who greatly benefits from the healthy operation of the credit institution to which he belongs and, on the other hand, as is the case for co-operatives, we seem to forget the judicial nature of credit unions and caisses populaires. We would thus tend to deprive them of their co-operative status to consider them as banks or finance companies. As a matter of fact, if caisses populaires enjoyed the same privileges as chartered banks, as far as creating money is concerned, I might then think they could pay income tax as banks do, but that is not the case. A caisse populaire does not have the power to create money, therefore it cannot make any profit on the creation of credit or exploit it. It can only lend its members' money. I want to point out that the shares of the members of such institutions should not be considered as the equivalent of shares in a company since they are, in principle, redeemable any time and constitute, for all practical purposes, a saving which clause 137 of omnibus Bill C-259 does not seem to recognize.

We suggest that the government specify as quickly as possible in a clearer language the points that are still obscure in some clauses with regard to the taxation system applied to caisses populaires and credit unions in order that these institutions may know exactly what they can expect from the federal tax system, even if only to help them better plan their activities on short, middle and long terms. Among the points which require clarification there are the deduction of dividends on the authorized capital before computation of the taxable income and the status of investments made by credit unions. We will have to revise as in the case of co-operatives, the concept of used capital and to remove for credit unions the obligation of doing business in a single province, as is presently the case, since from now on they will be taxed on the same basis as any other corporation. Finally, the credit unions should be authorized to invest in municipal, school board and Crown corporation bonds.

Many credit unions, Mr. Speaker, have been established at the cost of a great many scarifices on the part of initiators, because they had to cope with many difficulties, namely poverty in the parochial environment, where promoters wanted to establish a caisse populaire to serve the local population.

I can well remember the establishment of a Caisse in a new settlement even though headquarters which were authorized to decide whether a caisse could be established in such or such a parish, had dimissed the idea on account of the poverty of the people. So the promoters organized a party to raise the funds required by headquarters, to pay the expenses of an agent and enable him to proceed to the establishment of the caisse in that parish.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a proof of the confidence bestowed upon the Caisses populaires and the proof of great dedication, showing the earnestness with which people may want a credit union in their area. The travelling expenses of a responsible person, authorized to open such a caisse, are defrayed.

And that is what actually happened. That man went to the parish and the Caisse was established. For 30 years now it has rendered innumerable services to the community there and still serves it.

That goes to show that Caisses populaires are most of the time the outcome of dedication and sacrifice. That is why I deem unfortunate that this government, who have a pressing need for money, due to the wasting in many cases of public funds, should be obliged to bring forward a tax reform under which the co-operative movement, caisses populaires and credit unions are equally taxed.

As regards most of the Caisses, managers worked voluntarily at the outset of operations. More than once, I have seen a manager working full time as a voluntary worker, for a 12, 24 or 36-month period, in order that the caisse may survive and provide the services that people were expecting.

The administrators, the counsellors, the credit officials have been working and are still working without pay. Dedication alone made a success of the Mouvement Coopératif Desjardins as well as of other co-operative movements which have benefited from many people's dedication, whether they be professionals, businessmen, workers, or farmers and all of them have given their time to run those co-operatives which have rendered many services to our citizens.

I say it is absolutely necessary to take into account the social role played by co-operatives and caisses populaires instead of considering only the material aspect of the situation and therefore considering them as corporations and applying an unconditional tax levelling which would not be necessarily beneficial to the community. These organizations where a great deal of free dedication is prevailing, are moreover a guaranty of stability against the ever-increasing control of our economy by foreign big business and this is why we should not hinder them unduly. Recently, we again witnessed the dedication and enterprise of co-operatism.

Part of the Gaspe population is facing a difficult situation. Thanks to organizations like the Catholic Farmers' Union and other co-operative organizations, they want to set up a cardboard factory at Cabano to make use of the environmental natural resources, that is the broad-leaved trees, to produce cardboard since they are assured of being able to sell that production in certain European countries. This firm is presently facing a situation so difficult that the issue was raised in an article published by the newspaper Le Soleil of Wednesday, October 6, 1971, and I quote:

Without the help of the government, the Cabano cardboard factory will be taken over by foreign interests.

Mr. Speaker, the factory has not been established yet and one can already foresee foreign interests taking over its operations and profits.

This is why, as I say, we must be careful before passing this bill so we do not nip in the bud those projects resulting from the initiative of people anxious to render great services to the province and the country. We must rather allow this project to become reality and make sure that those people get the services that they have a right to expect.

I hope, Mr. Spaker, that the minister will be prepared to give those thoughts due consideration and propose himself the necessary amendments. I also wish to point out to the government that it is not good for the Canadian economy to tax too heavily private enterprise for it will only discourage those who have initiative and talent for business. Unfortunately, we hear too often businessmen say, why strive to develop a business or an industry because the government takes away through taxation too large a share of those profits we have worked so hard for.

Recently the Canadian Chamber of Commerce held a congress during which its president stated the following:

The business heads must act more vigorously to avoid new legislation putting an end to their operations.

Never in the course of our history have the skills of Canadian businessmen enabling them to efficiently manage their enterprises, provide for expansion, make a reasonable profit and sustain competition been so severely put to test by legislation.

If the excessive burden and the interference of governments are not alleviated, our businessmen will no longer be in a position to exercise their main functions, that is to promote business and ensure economic development.

Mr. Speaker, here we have the president of a Canadian organization who, in very clear terms, sounds the alarm to warn all Canadian businessmen that the situation is dangerous and tell the government that it is taking the wrong direction and risks, through its legislation, discouraging, as I said a while ago, all those talented men of goodwill who really want to make their contribution to Canada's economic development. That is a warning, I might say, that should be heeded by the government.

The important question is the following: Then, how can the country's expenses be financed if co-operatives, caisses populaires and private enterprise are already fully taxed? The government needs money. Where will it get it? Here is a very wise solution, a solution that ought to be applied one of these days, and the sooner the better.

Here it is: a tax reform is more pressing than ever, but we should first have a monetary reform to modify the method of financing the public sector. Greater use of the Bank of Canada is imperative for the creation of new credits entailing administration charges only as interest, which would greatly lower government expenditures.

This afternoon, in answer to the question of my colleague, the member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe), who asked him whether he felt that the Bank of Canada should reduce its interest rates that chartered banks might lower theirs in order to give our economic activities a new impulse and reduce inflation, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) replied very candidly that the rates of interest are set by the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, is the Bank of Canada an institution of Parlement? Should it not submit itself to the instructions of the government? One may also ask whether it is subject to the whims of chartered banks. If that is the case, then neither the government nor the bank can decide, but rather chartered banks which have the privilege of controlling credit in the country and making the most of it to their advantage while penalizing everybody else.

It is against this state of affairs that we protest; as long as it lasts, it will be our duty to warn the government that they are not entirely in the right direction and if they are able then to take steps to reform or change the present institutions, we will be here to approve them.

I was listening in this very House, a few days ago, to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) speaking about an international monetary reform. I support him, but if we proceeded first with a domestic monetary reform, this would contribute to the solution of international problems.

Mr. Speaker, I would have much more to say. I could speak about taxes affecting individuals and families as such. I have no time to analyse today this aspect of the bill, but I shall come back to it at the report stage to lay down the rights of individuals and families and show once more that these categories of people are overburdened with taxes and cannot enjoy a secure and free normal life.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe)—Finance—Government attitude on negative tax formula; the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald)—Agriculture—Potatoes—Assurance to producers respecting seed export market; the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters)—Air Transport—Establishment of Nordair as regional carrier for northeastern Ontario and northwestern Quebec—Ontario application for regional charter.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, the debate on this tax bill is almost an anti-climax. What seemed so important this past few years, the long awaited revision of our tax structure, has been dwarfed by a single national issue, the future of Canadian-American relations. The average Canadian may not know a great deal about the complexities of international fiscal affairs, but there is no doubt that there is a feeling in the land that the Ottawa experts, politicians and mandarins alike, have critically miscalculated the United States reaction to its own problems. There has been the government's failure to solve inflation, plus the employment crisis. There has been an obvious lack of effective communication between Ottawa and Washington. This has not been helped in any way by the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) obvious hostility toward the Americans. There is substantial evidence, and it is feared by all, that we may well be led into another great depression.

The problem with this tax bill is that it is tailored to a decade that has passed. It is perhaps perverse misfortune that the tax review and tax changes have come at the beginning of the decade of the seventies. Ever since 1968 there has been slow, vague, but unmistakable evidence that equity was not the only prerequisite for tax changes. The mere scrapping of much of the white paper on taxation indicates that the government, I believe much against its will, has given some recognition to the necessity of economic growth.

What are the two most important things that have to be considered in relating the tax bill to our economic needs? The crux for Canada falls into two main problems at the internal level. The first is that Canada has the fastest growing labour force relative to population in the western world, but the cost of creating jobs for those entering the labour force is on the rise. The investment required to create a new job in conventional manufacturing is around $25,000, and in advanced, technological manufacturing around $75,000. Technological advance accelerates the investment required to create jobs with each passing day.

Much of our trouble is a consequence of a sharp rise in the birth rate a generation ago, something for which even the politicians cannot be blamed. A decade from now policies and social attitudes will need to be altered to take account of an opposite situation, a slowing of the labour force growth resulting from a steep fall in the birth rate since the early 1960's. Indeed the present taxation proposals might well be more applicable ten years from now than they are in the decade of the seventies. A perusal of birth rates indicates an increase from 1956, when there were 461,000 births, to a figure of 479,000 births in 1960, followed by a steady drop to 362,000 in 1968. So, it can be seen that there will be a large number of young people entering the labour force during the seventies, estimated by some people as between 2½ million and 3 million. Whether or not jobs will be created for them will depend on our economic system, on the stimulus that business, both private and government, can generate to create new jobs. In my opinion, the effect of this tax bill will not be nearly sufficient to have this result.

There are other interesting developments in our society that may have an influence on this group now coming into the labour market. The finding of jobs for this group will be difficult. Many may remain unemployed, or at least under-employed, for a great part of their lives. The trend towards education may turn some of these people into so-called perennial students, at least until they are in their thirties or even forties. The rise of the drug culture, and an increase in the so-called hippies or drop-outs, may be larger than usual. Indeed, it may well be that many of the people who were born in the 1950's and 1960's will never really be gainfully employed, at least in the context experience by those born prior to that time.

There is little we can do about the numbers entering the work force, unless by some control on immigration, but there is something that we could do through this bill about the second most important feature of our economy in the seventies. I refer to the enormous welfare costs that we have experienced, that we are going to experience, and that will expand even further. I think it is important to give careful thought to the proposed tax changes because it is fairly obvious that the new tax structure will have to generate the revenues to carry the welfare system. Successive federal governments have laid the foundation for and erected most of the structure of the most comprehensive and generous welfare scheme in existence. Generating the income to finance it is already straining our resources. Perhaps the awareness of this fact had something to do with the crunch issue in tax reform—economic growth versus social equity. I believe that the recognition of these two main facets of our Canadian life in the seventies has to be considered when we discuss changes in the taxation system.

The high costs of government are nowhere more apparent than in the latest official projection of Statistics Canada. This year governments collectively will claim revenues amounting to about 46 per cent of the nation's total production of goods and services, or 42 per cent if pensions and hospital premiums are excluded from the accounts. It seems that when new government departments are established, or old ones upgraded, they must produce programs costing many millions of dollars if they are to be taken seriously. Sometimes one program is put forward as a substitute for another. For example, family allowances were notably wasteful. Much of the money went to people who did not need it. Under the revision undertaken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) they will certainly be more purposeful, and this will cost the taxpayers $150 million more the first year. Again, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) has taken some of the insurance out of unemployment insurance. The creation of jobs and the control of government spending will be most important in the decade of the seventies. This tax bill does not in any way recognize the needs of the decade. Even if the bill deviates from the white paper, it would appear to be far too equity orientated and not growth orientated.

There are numerous ways in which this tax bill could be upgraded into a more useful document. I would like to enumerate a few of the areas in which this legislation is deficient. The first obvious area is that of unincorporated business. This comprises somewhere in the neighbourhood of a million to two million Canadians, and includes the many small storekeepers, the small entrepreneurs, tradesmen and farmers. The new income tax legislation absolutely ignores them because the income tax group in which most of these people would fall will be more heavily taxed than previously.

The progressive income tax is orientated to those who are consumers alone and not to those who must, after their income tax is paid, provide the capital necessary to carry on their small farm, their business or their enterprise. We have heard much about the movement of people in Canada from rural to urban areas. Because this individual, unincorporated entrepreneur is so important to rural investment in Canada, because we are a nation with a sparse population scattered over many hundreds of square miles, we must pay, economically and socially, more attention to this group. The present tax bill will do nothing for these individual businessmen and farmers, and I believe that this is a pity.

Recognition is given to some extent to people who invest in large companies by means of dividend tax credits, but nothing is changed or improved for the group of people who are the unincorporated businessmen. This is a pity because even the most rabid believer in government does not see the small, unincorporated business person or farmer as a cartel or a threat to the economic well-being of Canada.

I would point out that those people who are on salary or wages are in positions where the capital which is provided is sustained by other means than their own, and are in a preferred position as opposed to the unincorporated businessman so far as capital is concerned. These salary or wage people have the option of saving or not saving after their income tax is paid, but this is not so for the unincorporated businessman who must, out of his income after his income tax is paid, provide the capital necessary for the expansion and sustenance of his small enterprise.

This is an area in which the tax bill does nothing, and indeed with the increased tax that most people in this $5,000 to $20,000 bracket will pay as a result of the inauguration of the capital gains tax, they will be worse off than they were previously. As the capital investment needed to provide income increases, the proposed tax structure, so far as these people are concerned, is a retrogressive step. Mr. Speaker, these people should receive more attention from the country to weather the international situation which we are facing and provide a reasonable standard of living without absolute reliance on international trade and finance.

I would next turn, Mr. Speaker, to what I feel is a serious defect in the tax bill and that is the treatment of the small, incorporated business. In my opinion, the treatment accorded the small incorporated business is really no treatment at all from a tax point of view. This is understandable considering that the revenue department expected that the great bulk of the increase in revenue needed to make up for the reduction in the personal income tax would come as a result of the changes in the tax structure relating to small incorporated business. This perhaps explains why the tax department has virtually made a mockery out of the suggestions from the Parliamentary Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which, having heard a great number of representations, suggested that the reduced rate of income tax on the first $35,000 of the profits of an incorporated business was valuable in our economy. Mr. Speaker, the new tax changes would indicate that while the government is paying lip service to an accumulation of capital by the small incorporated business it in effect is effectively preventing the function of this most important facet.

From personal experience, I know that many small incorporated businesses are incorporated solely because of the limited liability feature in the event of bankruptcy. Having studied, in a personal way, the tax structure of small incorporated businesses, I can see very little advantage in the long run, so far as taxation is concerned, in having the business incorporated if the company does not expand. It was useful for a company that was expanding rapidly and needed a fair amount of capital generation. What is wrong with the present proposals? Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that they are too complex and too vague to be of much value. If a company had a good growth pattern, and this I believe is what is needed in our economy, the owner would be discouraged from taking advantage of the reduced taxation on the first $50,000 because it would severely limit his ability to manoeuvre in the future.

I would regard this portion of the tax reform measure as being extremely retrogressive, and if the government feels that the reduced taxation of the first $50,000 of income is good for the economy on the one hand, then it has largely reversed itself by hedging this feature with so many restrictions that it will lose much of its value. If the government intends to restrict the sale of Canadian companies to foreign countries, which is synonymous with America, they are going about it in a heavy-handed way. Whatever we may decide about American capital in Canada, this particular device of preventing the sale of Canadian industry does not seem valuable. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the various restrictions on tax relief for small businesses are so confining that they defeat the purpose of furthering business incentive in a substantial way.

Turning now to the effect of the tax bill on Canada's extractive industries, I would like to say a few words on this subject, Mr. Speaker. Much has been said by the economic nationalists to the effect that every bit of ore mined in Canada should be fully manufactured into consumer goods before being exported. Indeed, it would seem that the economic nationalists believe that we are able to do this. They say that the great employment opportunities are in manufacturing but, Mr. Speaker, Canadian manufacturing, no matter how you look at it, is, on balance, a high cost industry. The extractive industries, the pulp and paper industry and the agriculture industry, have allowed the people of Canada to accumulate the wealth to consume the products that our high priced manufacturing industry produces. Without the exports from the resource industries, there would be a much smaller manufacturing industry in Canada than now exists.

From my observations of the mining industry and the oil and gas industry while on the parliamentary Finance Committee, I would assert that taxation is a cost of doing business. If we increase the taxes, the mining industry will contract; if we decrease the taxes, the mining industry will expand. Assuming that there is a market for the products mined, it seems obvious that increased taxes can only be borne when the price of the mineral rises on the domestic or international market or that more lucrative grades of ore only will be mined. If the tax on the resource industries is substantially increased and there is not a corresponding increase in the price on the international market of that product, then mining will decline. There may be some argument for the contraction of mining as a conservation measure but I think it should be achieved apart from the taxation structure.

Perhaps what makes the debate on resource taxation so obscure is that the areas dependant on the resource industries are so far removed from the high population centres of Montreal and Toronto. Mining towns in my province of Manitoba, like Lynn Lake, Flin Flon and Thompson, would not exist without ore to be mined and a market found for it. On September 21, the Globe and Mail, reported Mr. Goodeve, Treasurer of McIntyre Porcupine Mines Limited as having said:

The tax reform package will make the development of new mines less attractive by lowering the return on mining investment. Certain marginal mines, which would be economic under present conditions, will no longer be viable under the new tax regime.

But these effects probably will not be felt immediately because the new system is to be phased in gradually. 'The most basic uncertainty regarding the new provisions relates to exploration, yet its impact will be more immediate because the investment decisions which must be made now are concerned not with the short-term but with the eventual rates of return from discoveries not yet made, which must compare favourably with investment opportunities elsewhere.'

I think that Mr. Goodeve has made a signification charge against the taxation bill and it is up to the government to prove that his statements are wrong. Similarly, in oil and gas, the proposed taxation changes have been accepted only to the extent that they are much less punitive than the original white paper.

It has been estimated that the oil and gas industry of western Canada has provided for a million more people on the Prairies than we would presently have. When it is remembered that that industry was almost completely developed with American and western Canadian capital, and that the eastern financial groups showed no interest in western oil for many years, I think we have to look carefully at the effect of increasing the flow of taxes to Ottawa and correspondingly decreasing those to the provinces. Last year the estimated reserves of oil, excluding the tar sands, in Alberta, the main oil producing province, declined. This decrease it is suggested came about largely because the White Paper on Taxation caused cessation of drilling and exploration. Mr. Speaker, we hear much of Canadians being hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans. By this tax bill the government has indicated that it wants western Canadians especially to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for central Canada. Although we may have our problems with the Americans, at least we can control them politically in western Canada. The same cannot be said for the Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto axis.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in its statement on co-operatives, the government has adopted a very severe attitude. It is particularly damaging to the prairie regions because of the great importance of producers' co-operatives in that area. The government's proposal will be damaging for all regions. I wish to speak mainly about producer co-operatives and about wheat pools, which are co-operatives. In order to raise the taxes that will be imposed on the wheat pools of the three prairie provinces, which are involved in grain handling there will have to be a substantial increase in the handling charges on grain. This will come at a time of particularly severe crisis in the western economy.

There are great discussions about the need for modernization of the western grain handling industry and massive expenditures would seem to be necessary for this. This particular taxation change, in so far as it effects the wheat pools, means that if the western grain industry is to be modernized, there will have to be a drastic increase in the handling charges for grain. Mr. Speaker, in effect the farmers are going to be hit by a double blow. As it is, the Wheat Pools are responsible for about 50 per cent of the grain handling volume in western Canada. In any case, the farmers will have to pay for modernization of the grain handling system by increased tariffs on grain and, as well, provide massive increases of money for the co-operatives to meet the new tax levies. As well, other producer co-operatives that provide a service to the western farm industry are similarly concerned.

The co-operatives and credit unions, Mr. Speaker, have stated their case most forcibly to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), and I would hope that some reason will prevail. There are substantial ways and means by which the taxation of co-operatives could be changed. I would hope that there will be a full discussion of these clauses at the proper time, that the government will introduce appropriate amendments and at least be more reasonable with regard to its tax on co-operatives and credit unions.

There are a good many areas in the bill which, in a minor way, could be attacked. Those areas are severely restrictive of growth. I refer to areas such as depreciation allowances for buildings, which I feel are too severe, although I admit certain changes ought to have been made. These should be depreciation allowances for buildings different from those brought forward. There needed to be changes in that high income individuals have been able to buy, say, apartment blocks without any fear of having to pay tax. Yet I submit that the clause dealing with this is far too severe. The government seems to have brought forward a cannon, whereas a peashooter would have been much better in this situation. I think, as time goes on, it will be shown that clauses such as this are very restrictive and will impede the growth of small businesses, particularly in the smaller communities.

There is, however, a final and important area that I should like to talk about, namely, the proposal for the taxing of our international accounts. It would appear that the government wishes to renegotiate the tax treaties so that it can levy a tax on capital gains on defined Canadian property and offer to restrict Canada's withholding tax on investment and passive income to 15 per cent, in place of the 25 per cent provided for in the new tax legislation, in the years after 1975. The proposed new legislation significantly changes the treatment of investments by Canadian taxpayers in the shares of non-resident corporations that could be described as foreign affiliates. The present provisos regarding dividends which are deductible in computing taxable incomes received by Canadian corporations from a non-resident corporation in which the Canadian corporation holds more than 25 per cent of the voting shares would be narrowed considerably after 1975. The proposed new law provides that after 1975 only dividends from foreign affiliates in countries with which Canada has a new tax treaty will be deductible in computing taxable income. The proposed new law also includes in a Canadian taxpayer's income an arbitrary amount of "property income" with respect to each of the taxpayer's foreign affiliates. The rules are painted with a broad brush but appear quite arbitrary. The new provisions treat the "passive income" derived from foreign investments more harshly and, in effect, penalize non-operating business incomes.

The proposed law also provides that the capital gains of a non-resident will be taxable. Finally, after 1975, foreign tax credit on the investment income of individuals will be limited to 15 per cent, with the excess being treated only as a deductible expense. In view of the various moves by the United States which will encourage production and investment at home, Bill C-259 is totally inappropriate. Canada is threatening to increase the rate of withholding tax on investment and passive income to non-residents to 25 per cent, just when we need more savings and investment to replace the gap that will be left by the United States programs. Further, the proposed capital gains tax on foreign investments would be more onerous than that imposed by the United States.

Why should foreigners invest in Canada when better tax treatment is available? Canada is hoping to pressure other countries into re-negotiating tax treaties when these other countries are beset by serious global monetary problems. At this time, when it is important for Canada to establish new opportunities to make up for less investments from the U.S., we are going out of our way to antagonize alternative markets and sources of capital. We are penalizing, too, foreign affiliates of Canadian companies, so that retaliation will ensue.

Under the tax bill, foreign affiliates of a Canadian company would have their profits taxed in Canada at the same rate as if the manufacturing were carried on in Canada. This could put such corporations at a disadvantage, compared to other companies located outside Canada. If the foreign affiliate were located in country X with a 20 per cent corporate tax rate, other companies located in country X would be paying taxes at the 20 per cent rate, but not Canadian companies. At a time when virtually everyone agrees that Canada can get the required scale and specialization to compete internationally only through the development of its own multi-national corporations, the tax bill offers nothing. In fact, as mentioned previously, there are positive handicaps offered to such companies which would be severe roadblocks.

I should like to quote from John Meyer's column in the Montreal Gazette of October 12, 1971. He said this about the American surcharge:

• (5:20 p.m.)

On the other hand, some of the conditions—at least two of them—would be very much to Canada's advantage to acknowledge. The first of these is an end to the discrimination against foreign investors, and Canadians investing abroad, which is written into the tax reform legislation.

There never should have been that discrimination in the first place. We'd be wise to get rid of it.

He goes on with other points. This tax bill will not, in my opinion, provide adequate stimulus for jobs in Canada in this decade. It tends to favour the manufacturing industries of central Canada at the expense of the periphery of the country. It assumes that manufacturing is better than resource development per se. At a time when the countries of the world are becoming more interdependent on one another, it assumes that Canadians should look inward. Since the present federal government has its head in Montreal, perhaps it is only natural that it is carrying on a 200-year exploitation as in the days of the Northwest Trading Company, whose line extended out of Montreal through the Ottawa valley and on through Winnipeg, the Prairies and the mountains to the Pacific ocean.

This tax bill will only increase the tendency to fragmentize our country. To western Canadians, the pull of the continent is north and south. The tax bill does not recognize this in any way. Indeed, how could it, considering the authors? it is an inward looking document and will not greatly enhance the goal of a strong independent Canada.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): In taking part in the debate this afternoon on Bill C-259, Mr. Speaker, it seems that one of the major issues and difficulties facing the House at this time is the unintelligibility of this bill. There are many people in this country who do not completely understand what this bill means. I am one of those who do not completely understand all the implications of it.

As we proceed, many members will be forced to vote on provisions of a bill that is very difficult to understand. One tax consultant, Mr. Ferguson, conceded in the August issue of Canadian Business:

Most people in the business world think this law is a great improvement over the White Paper. Whether we are right or not may take years to learn. After all, we are still having appeals about the interpretation of the 1948 law. This new Tax Reform Bill will prove no easier to interpret, and without any question it will be much more difficult for the Department of National Revenue to administer.

More re-writing of the Income Tax Act is not too many years in the future.

Another specialist has summed up this bill with regard to its intelligibility as follows:

Have you been puzzled by the strange silence since Mr. Benson's tax reform Bill was published?

We really have not heard as much about the bill as we did about the white paper.

The reason is that people are waiting for the tax experts to tell them what it means. But after two months of intense study the tax experts are still stupefied with bewilderment.

Well, you may say, so the tax experts are not as clever as they thought. If they have to work a little harder, what's wrong with that? If the tax experts are suffering some temporary agony, they richly deserve it. Besides, they will be more than adequately paid for their trouble.

Unfortunately, things are not this simple. First let me explain that I am not complaining about that kind of tax reforms Mr. Benson wants to give us. I agree with most of those reforms. At least I think I do. The trouble is, I can't tell if the Bill says what Mr. Benson says it does. The Bill is so huge, so complicated, and so badly drafted that it is almost unreadable.

An example of the Bill's tortuous wording is the section describing what a capital gain is. That section, number 39, is about half a page long. As statutes go, that isn't too bad. However, after reading four lines, the reader is directed to turn back to section 3 and read in another page of type. If this were not bad enough, you are told at the same time to read section 3 as though it said the opposite of what it does say.

Rather strange circumstances, Mr. Speaker.

The explanation for this, I think, is that the draftsman, working under great pressure, took what to him was a helpful shortcut. He probably understands what he was saying. But, for several years afterwards, taxpayers, their advisers and judges will have to do these mental gymnastics a thousand times over. Little drafting shortcuts like these are going to cost the country a great deal.

I know that many will say that the tax experts are merely adding hypocrisy to their other sins by complaining. But we are not so selfish and irresponsible as to believe that an economic bonanza for us is necessarily good for the country. None of us want to be the beneficiaries of a law which imposes a higher than necessary compliance cost on the rest of society. As Canadians, we want the laws to be such that most people can understand and comply with them without the constant attendance of a professional adviser.

Everyone knows the amount of money it takes to hire professional help to complete an income tax return.

Few people realize it, but the weakest link in the legislative process is legal drafting. Statute-drafting is the least glamorous and most exacting work a lawyer can have. As a result, practitioners of the art are few, under-valued and grossly over-worked. This, combined with the pressure to get large volumes of legislation through Parliament as quickly as possible, produces many laws which are unclear.

Usually these shortcomings don't matter too much. Most statutes, after all, touch directly only a few people or, if they apply widely, affect one only infrequently. Judges, lawyers and government officials manage to make the laws work reasonably well most of the time. The nuisance and expense occasioned by flaws in a statute are rarely a major problem.

There is a difference between income tax law and criminal law, for instance, Mr. Speaker. It is more necessary that income tax law be easily understood since it affects almost everyone in the country at one time or another. It seems to me that legislation of this sort should be framed with precision and at the same time made as simple as possible. Any cost occasioned businessmen or manufacturers in filling out complicated tax returns will be added to the cost of the products they sell; indeed, there is no other way in which they can reimburse themselves. Thus, any errors or complications in this legislation will cost a great deal of money in the future. The legislation may be a bonanza for our lawyers and accountants but I expect it will cause them a good many headaches too. Many people have contended that this bill should be rewritten. In view of the attitude of the government, I do not think this is likely; the government has already proven it wants the bill passed.

The impetus for this tax legislation came from the Carter commission set up a few years ago by a former government. The commission reported in 1967 and proposed many changes. Then the government published a white paper entitled "Proposals for Tax Reform", I believe in November 1969. I am sure all members are familiar with the response made to that white paper. Thousands of submissions on it were sent to Members of Parliament and to the minister. As I recall, he had to hire staff to help him answer the submissions that were made.

The House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and also the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, heard many submissions and held hearings across Canada on the white paper. The findings of these committees were reported back to Parliament and, I think, acknowledged to a certain extent in the legislation now before us. Certainly the minister seems to have listened to some of them. I believe he has also listened to many of the representations of Conservative members on this side of the House. Compared with the proposals in the white paper, the legislation before us is a considerable modification.

Some parts of the legislation particularly concern me and I should like to turn to these now. One concern is how the legislation will affect farmers. I should like to give hon. members a rundown on the hardships farmers will suffer under the legislation. Farmers and fishermen will still be able to compute their income on a cash basis, as they always have. They will still be entitled to use the averaging basis for computing income, which means they can average their income over any five-year period that they may choose.

Under the former law a farmer could classify his cattle as a basic herd. Any gains or losses would be treated as a capital gain or a capital loss and such gains would be exempt from tax. Under the present bill the basic herd and straight line depreciation provisions will be eliminated and livestock farmers will have until December 31 this year to establish their basic herd. Following that, any gain on the basic herd will be tax free but no new additions to the herd will be allowed. In addition, assets acquired after December 31 must be depreciated in accordance with the diminishing balance system. If proceeds from the sale of assets depreciated on a straight line basis exceed their valuation, then the amount of the excess is regarded as a capital gain.

I think this will be the greatest hardship the farming community will suffer under the new legislation. At the present time a farmer can purchase a combine or a tractor, and since it has a motor it is depreciated at the rate of 20 per cent. Therefore, in five years this machinery would have been completely depreciated. At the same time, it would retain some commercial value and could be traded in on a new machine. In turn, this would mean another farmer who could not afford a new machine could buy a used one. This was regarded as a capital gain and the farmer did not have to pay tax on the amount he realized on the machine.

Under the provisions of the new legislation the proceeds of sale will be taxed as a capital gain, and as I understand the situation the farmers will be very reluctant to trade in any machine for a new one if it still has some commercial value. This will mean that the machinery manufacturing companies will lose business and their employees will suffer. In addition, more farmers will look to custom combining instead of purchasing their own machines. I believe this will be one of the major hardships suffered by farmers under the legislation.

Other capital gains will also be subject to tax. Hobby farmers will be able to deduct only $5,000 of any loss incurred. In this regard I wish to raise a grievance with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) or, more particularly, with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray).

Some tax offices want to be assured in black and white that losses claimed by farmers for income tax purposes did occur in anticipation of their making a gain. It is sometimes quite difficult for the farmers to do this and some of the income tax offices, particularly the one in Kitchener, have been very difficult in this regard. Even when reasonable proof has been furnished, the attitude of these offices has caused farmers tremendous hardship. The offices say the tax will be given back when the farmers actually show a profit as anticipated. This represents a considerable hardship for those involved.

In a general way, any advantages to farmers in respect of income tax will be wiped out under this reform, and we all know that the agricultural industry is not tremendously prosperous. It is an industry which under this government, is engaged in providing cheap food for the rest of the country. I do not believe that is a proper activity in which farmers should be engaged. They should be entitled to as much income as people who belong to unions and will not work for less than $5 per hour.

Valuation day will prove to be another difficult time for farmers. I am not sure I can be in favour of a capital gains tax in view of the situation in which we find ourselves in this country. This is a young country which requires growth and risk capital to develop in the manner we would like. Under the capital gains regulations in the bill a farmer will be allowed an amount similar to that allowed a person owning a house in the city, in accordance with the terms of the white paper. Under this silly recommendation in the white paper they were to be allowed $1,000. This simply means that a lot of people would be doing a great deal of bookkeeping for nothing.

Since the white paper and the presentation of this legislation, that condition has been wiped out for home owners. It has been left in respect of the farmer, who can have a gain of $1,000 on his house, a barn and an acre or so of land, free of capital gains tax, but pay capital gains tax on the rest of the farm. A great many farmers have more than one house and a barn, but the legislation states that only the house the farmer lives in, one barn and a few acres may be exempt from capital gains tax. The change I suggest is that all the buildings on the farm, whether they be one or two sets of buildings, four, five or 20 sets of buildings, should be exempt from capital gains tax.

An article in the Globe and Mail of July 1 suggested that a farmer whose children did not want to carry on the family farm would have to sell his assets and pay capital gains tax on $50,000, for example. He might then reinvest his capital in the market, liquidate three or four years later and find that so far as his investment was concerned he had suffered a loss of $50,000. In all fairness he should not pay any tax because he is no further ahead. He has paid the capital gains tax and has suffered a non-taxable $50,000 loss, therefore he ends up even. Another farmer with the same experience but in the reverse order, having suffered a $50,000 capital loss and later made a $50,000 capital gain would not pay any tax because the legislation provides that a loss can be carried forward indefinitely. This does not seem to be an equitable situation and the legislation should be revised to provide the same treatment in both cases.

[Mr. McKinley.]

My information is that one of our large wheat pools is among the few organizations which has supported this tax reform on the assumption that because farmers represent a low-income group with higher exemptions, many farmers will not pay tax. This is a very foolish way to judge the legislation. We should be making an effort to put farmers in a taxable position.

It has been suggested that the capital gains tax will hit farmers and small businessmen particularly hard because most of them, as we all know, endeavour to retire on the proceeds from the sale of their farms or businesses built up over a lifetime of hard work, and without high living. Now they are being put in a position where the proceeds from all this hard work will be whittled away by capital gains tax. It is suggested that farmers and small businessmen should have a registered retirement plan, the premiums of which should be deducted from the proceeds. We know there is in existence a registered retirement plan, but a sensible solution to the difficulty would be for the government to allow, through this tax legislation, the retired farmer or businessman to sell his assets and invest in the retirement plan before any capital gains tax is charged.

I should also like to refer to the treatment of co-operatives and credit unions under this legislation. These movements have been formed by people getting together for many reasons, one of which is to continue operations when things are difficult. Under the present income tax laws, co-operatives are exempt from tax for the first three years. That advantage will be wiped out as a result of this legislation. We can only assume we will see few, if any, new co-operatives. I do not think this will be good for Canada.

Under this legislation consumer dividends will remain exempt as long as they are distributed. Patronage dividends on production goods can be considered as exempt, but the goods must be taken in as income by the recipient and are taxable at the recipient's personal rate. Patronage dividends for production goods will remain as income under this bill. The capital principle has been drastically changed. At present, co-operatives cannot reduce their taxable income below 3 per cent, but the formula for calculating the tax under the bill we are discussing will include essentially every equity, such as shares, loans to members and general reserves, and the rate has been increased to 5 per cent from 3 per cent. This creates a tremendous hardship for co-operatives.

The only deduction allowed will be the interest paid on loans to members. These changes will have an accumulative effect on loans and co-operative earnings in that the earnings will have to be distributed as patronage dividends on purchases made by members of co-operatives. This means that the earnings of the co-operatives will gradually have to be distributed on the basis of the equity owned by the members. It would force them into a pattern of investor-owned corporations rather than the service corporation which they were initially established to be.

When co-operatives reach the point that this legislation forces upon them, their value as co-ops will be gone. I trust amendments will be made and presented to the government to try to alleviate this situation. When this situation is reached, if it comes, it would be better for co-ops to incorporate as ordinary corporations. It is hard for me to believe that the government really understands what it is trying to do or what the legislation will do, and I hope the government will find some reason to reverse its stand in this regard.

One thing which I think the government should keep in mind at all times with regard to co-operatives is that any dividends paid to the private members of the co-ops are taxed at the regular personal income tax rate, the same as any other dividend. This, in my opinion, together with other taxes that co-ops pay, should be all that the government should try to get from these bodies which are basically service organizations to groups which are usually farming communities. However, now they have appeared in urban centres and they provide many services to citizens of Canada. On occasion the minister has indicated that he may see fit to make some changes in this regard.

I should like to suggest that the same consideration should be given to credit unions. Credit unions are small organizations of groups of people in a town. They could be church groups or any other group, but they come together primarily to provide a service to each other. Basically they come into existence because people have not been able to receive the services they require from banks in the community. This legislation will hit them very hard, and we hope the minister will see fit to make changes in this regard.

Credit unions have advised me that they do not require permanent capital to conduct their operations. They make loans only to the extent that members can borrow. This is regulated by federal legislation at present and they have only members' savings available to lend. They exist only to promote the economic and social interests of their members, individuals united under a common bond. Although they are chartered as legal entities and exist as incorporated companies, they have no incentives and no independent economic goals other than the welfare of their members. There is no need, then, to accumulate earnings in the credit union, and traditionally these have been allocated to members.

Again I would mention that the allocation of any of these earnings by credit unions to members would be taxed on the regular personal basis. I cannot understand why any government would feel the need to create such hardship for credit unions, thus preventing their being useful to their members, because any advantage that would be gained from borrowing or from putting savings into the credit union would be completely wiped out. They have in the past served a very useful purpose in our country and I hope will do so in the future if the opposition can get their ideas through to the government so it will make some changes.

I should like to read a letter which credit unions received from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

> On the occasion of International Credit Union Day, I am very pleased to send my greetings to credit union members in Canada and throughout the world.
> Credit unions have experienced enormous success because they encourage both regular savings and the wise use of credit. But even more important, credit unionism encourages self-help, mutual assistance, and personal involvement. In this sense credit unions are more than financial institutions, they are a positive social force within our communities.
> To over 38 million members of the credit union movement in many countries of the world, I send my best wishes for continued growth and prosperity.

I cannot believe that after sending such a letter to the credit unions the Prime Minister would wish to turn around and force through the House, by his majority, legislation which would practically put credit unions out of business. I trust that amendments will be forthcoming at the committee stage and that the government will accept those which will alleviate the hardship imposed on credit unions and co-operatives through this legislation, so they may continue to serve their members as they have for many years.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair, to resume same at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Translation]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the Canadian Parliament passed Bill C-262, an Act providing that the government would pay out $80,000,000 to counteract the effects of the 10 per cent American surcharge on imports from this country, and support employment in Canada.

Now as the problem today is to tax Canadians more heavily, there is before the House a legislation which is altogether different, namely Bill C-259, entitled "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that Act."

This document contains 710 pages. Indeed, it is the bulkiest ever introduced in this House. Those hon. members who have been sitting here since 1965 will be able to boast of having seen everything and of having been through the mill.

In 1958, we examined Bill C-150, recognized as an omnibus bill, about 1-1/4 inch thick, which gave the green light to a very particular group of individuals. Now we are faced with a 3 inch thick bill bringing certain changes to the Income Tax Act.

After passing a bill favouring certain abnormal Canadians, the government is now ready to pass a bill introducing some changes into the Income Tax Act, namely favouring the messing around with money taken from the pocketbook of normal Canadians.

To maintain the employment level, the government, by presenting an 8 page bill, intends to pay out $80 million in grants. At the same time, it proposes, through a 710 page bill, to tax Canadians more. If an 8 page bill yields $80 million in grants, how many billions could the government collect with a 710 page bill?

Members who have spoken before me have tactfully stated that the bill now under study is confusing but in my mind it is not confusing at all as it is clear that it is simply a bill to collect more money from Canadians.

The way the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) introduces this bill astonishes me. When he accepted the post of Minister of Finance, we thought for a minute that this Canadian would assert himself; but his actions prove the contrary. In introducing this bill to us, he simply proves that he bows to another power.

On August 26 last, at the Royal York Hotel in Toronto, the hon. minister said, and I quote:

> As I said in my speech on the budget, the publication of the white paper was an important step in the evolution of participatory democracy in Canada. Thanks to the ensuing debate and discussions, it has been possible to develop a program of tax reform which, in addition to meeting the needs of Canada, also reflects the views of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, if we merely refer to that quotation, the bill now under consideration owes its birth to participatory democracy, debate and discussion. According to the minister's statement, this bill reflects the views of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I challenge the minister to disclose the contents of most letters which he has received. As for mine, they are available. The earliest goes back to last year at the time when the minister tabled his white paper on tax reform. I still receive some every week and I faithfully keep them.

My constituency is made up of 27,000 families, according to a report published by the Post Office Department in September last. The population of Portneuf is higher than that of Prince Edward Island and I have not yet received a single letter asking me to support the bill of the Minister of Finance.

It is obvious that for the Minister of Finance the needs of Canada are identified with those of big business. For the Minister of Finance, this reform is merely one which reflects the views of his friends who contribute to the electoral fund.

Mr. Speaker, I am still waiting for a letter urging me to support Bill C-259, and I say again that in all those that I had, the reverse is asked as regards the reforms proposed by this present Liberal government. Further to letters from ordinary citizens, I have received some from presidents of industries. The majority of firm directors have never been so concerned with public life, because they feel involved with Bill C-259. They are aware of the fact that 50 per cent of them will have to close shop if the bill passes.

This famous bill could be adopted; so there is reason for concern and that is why Canadian industrialists are worried at the present time. Their letters to us are evidence of this. Whether those industrialists live in the Montreal region, in Portneuf, in Rivière-à-Pierre, in Saint-Raymond, in Pont-Rouge, in l'Ancienne Lorette or Loretteville does not make much difference, the effects of this 710 page bill will be the same.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce attempted to stop the government from taking this action through a well prepared brief sent to us on April 16, 1970.

[Mr. Godin.]

Among the correspondence that I have received since then about Bill C-259, there is a wire sent by Mr. André Martel, president of the Société Coopérative Agricole de Sainte-Catherine. I have in hand two other telegrams, one sent to me by Mr. François Racette, president of the Meunerie coopérative agricole de Saint-Augustin de Portneuf, and the other by Mr. Jean-Paul Julien, president of the Coopérative agricole de Pont-Rouge.

I personally met with other managers, especially with the manager of Les Écureuils Co-opérative.

• (8:10 p.m.)

All these came as a result of the action taken by the executive director of the Coopérative Fédérée de Québec, as evidenced by a letter dated August 19, which I will take the liberty to quote:

> To all managers of farm co-operatives:
> Dear Sirs:
>
> Please find enclosed the following papers:
> (1) Letter addressed to farm co-operative directors.
> (2) Brief explaining the position of Canadian co-operatives concerning Bill C-259.

The executive director then goes on to say:

> We expect that on receiving this letter, you will (a) immediately obtain the agreement of the president of your co-operative, and (b) send a telegram, without any delay, to the member—

The Deputy Speaker (Mr. Honey): Order, please. I recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Will the hon. member please forgive me. I do not want to interrupt his speech, but I would like to point out to him that the situation we are witnessing tonight reflects a lack of courtesy toward the hon. member.

Moreover, I feel it is a disgrace that no representatives of the Department of Finance should be in the House to hear the hon. member's speech and to answer questions as to what proceedings of the House are to follow. Although one minister has just entered the House, neither the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) nor the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray), nor even their parliamentary secretaries are present.

I suggest that is quite an abnormal state of things, to which I want to call the attention of the House because there are certain matters we would like to discuss with representatives of that department.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, concerning the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton-West (Mr. Lambert), may I say that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) asked me to substitute for him today as he had to visit his riding. We know what are the responsibilities of a member of Parliament, and I believe I should mention that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has been very assiduous in the House. Therefore, it is quite normal that he should devote one day to his riding, and I kept my word. I said that I would replace him all day. I have been here all afternoon and this evening, I was one of the first here at 8 o'clock. If the hon. member has any remarks to make either to the parliamentary secretary or to the Minister of Finance, I shall be glad to answer them.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has raised a point of order, but he did not cite any authority or standing order. I think the hon. member has a grievance, as he has stated to the Chair. The government is responsible—

An hon. Member: Irresponsible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —for determining how it conducts its affairs in the House, and it is for the government to determine in what manner it wishes to respond in the circumstances. I think that hon. members have made their points.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was quoting part of a letter which reads as follows:

We expect that as soon you receive this letter, you will (a) obtain immediately the consent of the president of your co-operative and (b) send without delay a telegram to the member for your riding as well as to all Quebec ministers within the federal cabinet. It would be advisable to meet your member if you think he could influence favourably the ministers of the Trudeau cabinet.

That is a concerted action which requires the co-operation of every co-operative in this province and we expect that your co-operative will make it its duty to answer without delay our appeal.

Thanking you in advance, I remain

Faithfully yours,

Geo. -E Turcotte

General manager

Mr. Speaker, having been director of a co-operative for ten years, and having participated in the various activities connected with this function, I can say that in the province of Quebec alone, there are now more than 300 farm co-operatives affiliated to the Coopérative Fédérée. Some consumer co-operatives belong to another chain, that is the Fédération des magasins co-op. According to official statistics published in the report on "Cooperation in Canada in 1969", 1,690,000 citizens of this country were distributed among 2,373 co-operatives. In view of the fact that Social Credit members are not alone in Parliament, I presume that hon. members from other parties, including even Liberals, have received the same kind of correspondence as we have. I am under the impression that they intend to rise and give us their views and those of their co-operatives in respect of the income tax reform bill.

I have received a letter from the Rural Economic Council, Portneuf Chapter. It comes from Donnacona and reads as follows:

Mr. Roland Godin, MP

House of Commons,

Ottawa.

Sir:

The Rural Economic Council, Portneuf Chapter, is strongly opposed to the changes introduced in section 135 of the Income Tax Act as suggested by Bill C-259.

We think that there is no other example in the world of the concept of capital employed being applied in any tax system.

It will be impossible for the co-operatives to raise the funds necessary to reimburse capital and pay dividends with the new provisions of Section 135. It is obvious that if our co-operatives must hand out more capital than they receive, they will be forced out of business within a few years.

This method of taxation is thus anti-social and backwards; since it does not take into account the effect that a durable economic and social revival can only be achieved throughthe people. In view of those principles and their effects on the population as a whole, we believe that co-operation isthe most valuable factor of this awareness of the population.

This is why the Rural Economic Council, Portneuf Chapter, of strongly supports the views of the Conseil Canadien de la Coopération and the Co-operative Union of Canada as they were submitted on August 11 of this year.

Yours truly,

Jean-Paul Julien, President.

Mr. Speaker, I have here the brief mentioned in that letter which is in fact the brief submitted by the Conseil Canadien de la Coopération, a 14-page brief that concludes by asking for a meeting between the directors of the co-operative movement and the Minister of Finance to make known their objections to this bill and discuss the suggestions submitted in the brief.

I have also with me a letter addressed to all members of Parliament by Le Conseil de la Coopération du Québec. This letter, dated September 20, was addressed to us by Le Conseil de la Coopération on behalf of the 21 Quebec federations which operate in all our social sectors. Among these federations is La Fédération des Caisses Populaires Desjardins which has addressed a two-page letter in both official languages to all Members of Parliament. This letter was received on September 24 or 25. It reads as follows, and I quote:

Gentlemen:

Most of you are members of a Credit Union or Caisse populaire. If you are not you know certainly people from your district who are members. Almost a quarter of all Canadians are members of a Caisse populaire or Credit Union.

Bill C-259 is seeking to alter the present tax structure that applies to Caisses populaires and Credit Unions and to eliminate the exemptions they enjoy in practice. The members of the Credit Unions and Caisses populaires do not oppose taxation in itself and agree to pay their share of public expenditures. However, they wish to point out the serious concerns they feel as to the tax rates which shall be applied to the Caisses populaires and Credit Unions. They want to be sure you will keep in mind their concerns—

In connection with the main concerns of the members of the Caisses populaires, the letter stated and I quote:

I. The members of the Credit Unions and Caisses populaires are asking for a tax system equivalent to that granted to private corporations which are allowed a reduced tax rate of 25 p. 100. In effect, private corporations can almost indefinitely claim a reduced tax rate through the payment of equity dividends. Now, the provincial legislation applicable to the Caisses populaires and Credit Unions forbids them from distributing their accumulated reserves to their members thus allowing them to benefit indefinitely from the reduced tax rate.

The credit unions and the caisses populaires request that the rules be changed in order to extend the period during which the reduced rate of taxation of 25 per cent applies to them and ensure them the same situation as private companies.

Mr. Speaker, the caisses populaires, the credit unions went further, since they submitted a brief to the Minister of Finance. That brief was published on August 27 in the newspaper Ensemble. This is quite a comprehensive document from which the Canadian government could draw serious and essential amendments conducive to honest administration.

On the one hand, the present government enacts legislation designed to protect the consumers and, on the other hand, it enacts other legislation aimed at exterminating the associations made up of the same consumers, since those acts tend to the establishment of unfair and arbitrary taxation. In my opinion, we have there an instance of flagrant contradiction.

Everything established in this country under the co-operative system really represents the only wealth of the canadian people since they are the owners and such undertakings cannot be sold to foreigners. Moreover, the co-operative formula is very simple, and within everybody's comprehension. It enables people to get information, to be protected against certain abuses and to derive profits according to their participation. Its application unfortunately was always difficult because high finance always disliked it since it wished to keep control over economic activities.

The federal government, that acted until now under pressures exerted by big corporations, has always maintained certain restrictions on the administration of financial activities of the caisses populaires and consumer co-ops.

Thus now, for instance, owing to their low assets and their non-profit feature, consumer co-operatives are dangerously threatened by Bill C-259. If that legislation is enacted, the expansion plans of the Federation of Co-op Stores to establish sales outlets in urban shopping centres will become very difficult since local co-operatives will no longer be entitled to take part in those plans.

On January 13, 1969, newspapers reported a statement made the day before in England by the right hon. Prime Minister to the effect that, in his opinion, the best way to administer a country was the communist way.

On January 21 last, I showed in the House with evidence in hand that the American communist party was infiltrating into Canada, owing to the support of certain people whose names are on the pay list of some Crown corporations.

Newspapers published recently a statement made by Mr. George Wallace, the Governor of Alabama which was reproduced in La Presse of September 27, 1971 and which reads as follows:

Scrutinizing public opinion before an eventual campain for the Presidency, Mr. Wallace—

—stated, and I quote:

"We have a crypto-communist Prime Minister in Canada, just north of our border. His background is even worse than that of President Castro himself."

Mr. Speaker, we know some liberal Members admit all this privately, and they are concerned about the fact that their chief is leading us on slippery ground.

As the Liberal Party was constituted and maintained for the defence of capitalism it is nevertheless normal for true Liberals to be concerned today about the project of their leader who can no longer hide his cards.

Mr. Speaker, it is evident that co-ops are barrier for those who wish to install communism. In socialist countries, private enterprise is a thing of the past. Since the co-operative movement has been and still is the complement of private undertaking in our country, this probably explains the action of this government, led by the right hon. member for Mount Royal who finally made it to Prime Minister. We see his mischievious smile and with this smile he is now leading his entourage.

Mr. Speaker, the way the Minister of Finance is acting also leads us to feel that Canadians can no longer bank on him. The proof of it is that he is not even here tonight. In spite of that, I come to the conclusion that all is not lost. That the Minister of Finance should be useless, that the Prime Minister, with the co-operation of irresponsible civil servants, should prepare as barbaric a bill as Bill C-259, all that is "small potatoes" since we still have rights in this Parliament. We have the right to speak up, and the right to vote. As for voting, majority wins. This means that a bill proposed by well paid civil servants, unknown and unseen, who work according to the wishes of the Prime Minister, can be without effect unless hon. members approve it.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, will not be the only one to support Bill C-259. It is not even necessary, because the few members of the cabinet working with him are well-known and are pursuing the same aim, that is, to abolish a system which has been tested abroad, with the results we know. However, we realize that among the members and the ministers, there are only a few who hold such views.

I therefore hope that the bill will be defeated, because I think that most will give up prostituting themselves further.

This is how I see things. I am not desperate, because I still believe that there is still a majority of honest Liberals in this House.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if someone were to interrupt me before I get started and say that just about everything has been said about this bill, I would find it difficult to disagree.

An hon. Member: Sit down, then.

Mr. Peters: That is not what he got up to speak about.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): However, I think there is value in placing on the record in more or less tabular form the main changes that people like me think ought to be made to Bill C-259. Accordingly, it is not my purpose to roam around in the upper atmosphere of economic and fiscal policies. These questions are important, but they have been dealt with very well by others who have taken part in the debate.

I do not even intend to take time documenting our contention that this bill is not a piece of major tax reform but simply a number of changes in the present tax law. Rather, as I have already indicated, I wish to summarize six areas in the bill where I think very significant and important changes should be made. Indeed, it is because of the bill's shortcomings in these six areas, either that it does not go far enough or that it goes too far, that I think it should not be put over on the Canadian people at this time.

The first of these areas has to do with the income tax exemption levels. As everyone knows—and it has been repeated many times during the course of this debate—all that this bill is doing in that area is raise the income tax exemption level for a single person from $1,000 to $1,500, and for a married taxpayer from $2,000 to $2,850.

When one considers that the present levels of $1,000 and $2,000 were established in 1949, 22 years ago, and when one also considers the increase that has taken place in the cost of living in that 22-year period, I suggest it is a delusion and a hoax on the Canadian people for the government to raise these exemption levels by only the figures that are set out in this bill. As a low, rock bottom minimum, those figures ought now to be $2,000 a year for a single person and $4,000 a year for a married person. It would even be better if they were $2,500 for a single person and $5,000 for a married person.

When one realizes that it has taken 22 years to get before the House a government proposal to raise the levels that have been in effect all this time, one can only ask, how much longer will it take to get another change? Will it be another 22 years for another few hundred dollars? By that time the whole meaning of exemption levels will have completely disappeared. It would be almost better for nothing to be done at all, and thus for the issue to be regarded as yet unresolved rather than hand the Canadian people these very low exemption levels.

Surely the whole concept of exemption levels is that there is a certain amount of money that people must have to get by, which should not be taxable. I contend, as have many members during the course of this debate, that that amount is much greater than $1,500 for single persons and $2,850 for married persons. This, Mr. Speaker, is one of the major deficiencies of Bill C-259. The fact that the government is going this far is one of the major hoaxes in this piece of legislation. I hope when we get into committee of the whole and reach the appropriate clauses that the government will pay some heed to the arguments that have been made and raise these exemptions to substantially higher levels.

The second area in which I feel this bill is deficient has to do with the amount that is allowed to workers for their expenses on the job. To put in a figure with a limit of $150 a year is an insult. Why bother with such a small allowance? For the average worker who has expenses that he can charge under this heading, his income bracket is lower than that of the wealthy; therefore, the amount that he will actually save in income tax will only be a percentage, whether it is 20 or 30 per cent, of the $150. For the wealthy, it is another little handout, a much larger one in relative terms yet meaningless to them. Those who are in the income brackets such that their tax rates are 40 or 50 per cent will get that much more off their income tax because of this $150 allowance.

I urge two things about this allowance to workers for their expenses for income tax purposes. In the first place, the amount should be higher. In the second place, this is one of many areas where the government should be introducing the concept of tax credits rather than the concept of a specified exemption. The wealthy do not need this concession, but those who earn wages in industry, the people for whom this measure supposedly has been designed, need far more than the $20 or $30 tax relief they may get out of it. They need a credit against their actual income tax for what they have to pay out for expenses incurred in connection with their work. In fact, even more important than the amount that is allowed as an exemption to workers is the need to move into this other approach, namely, the approach of allowing a tax credit instead of special exemptions as proposed in this legislation.

For many years members of this House, particularly members of this party, have been arguing for special consideration in respect of expenses that workers incur. I suppose we should be dancing with joy because at long last this principle is being recognized. But I assure you, Mr. Speaker, there is no such dancing, because the $150 is far too low for the average worker and because in principle it is wrong to do it this way rather than by way of a tax credit. We give tax credits to people who draw dividends and make profits in certain ways, but we seem to forget that approach to the problem when we get to the situation facing our workers.

My third area of criticism has to do with senior citizens. We welcome, of course, the improvements in the tax bill affecting pensioners. There are two main improvements. On the one hand we have the extra allowance for age made universal at age 65, and this allowance is to be raised to $650 per year from the present figure of $500. The other change affecting older people is the decision to regard income received under the guaranteed income supplement as non-taxable.

With respect to the latter, the government has agreed to make it effective January 1, 1971, and this will take care of a number of anomalies. It will solve the sort of problem that veterans under war veterans allowance face; their tax position has been worsened because they were pushed from war veterans allowance over to the guaranteed income supplement. Therefore, we welcome this change. However, if it was possible to make this kind of change that is designed to improve the position of older people effective as of January 1, 1971, why was it not possible to do the same thing with respect to increased exemptions for senior citizens generally? I would urge that such a change be made.

I realize that when we first started asking the minister to make that change retroactive to January 1, 1971, there were still five or six months left in the present calendar year and in a sense there seemed to be more point to it then than there now seems to be, when the end of the year is but 11 or 12 weeks away. But I would point out that the time when people are most conscious of the total amount they have to pay by way of income tax is when they file their returns in April. Unless the government makes this kind of change, it will mean that in April, 1972, when people aged 65 years or over are filing their income tax returns they will be hit between the eyes with the fact that the change that has been made—namely, the $650 exemption at age 65—is not for them until they make out their tax return a year later, in 1973. If there is this concern for the position of our older people which the government has said prompted it to make this change, I would urge that the change be made effective January 1, 1971, along with the change making the guaranteed income supplement non-taxable.

Having made those comments under the heading of what the bill does or fails to do for our older people, I want to urge that much more serious consideration be given to the whole concept of tax credits rather than special exemptions. Just as I argued for this in the case of workers' expenses, so I argue very strongly for it in the case of our elderly and retired people. We welcome the $650 exemption and we welcome its being made universal at age 65. But there are people, not many but some, in that age bracket whose incomes are higher and this change will simply mean that of the $960 that they get as old age security, $650 will be tax free. We have to give this to the wealthy in order to get the principle established for those in the middle and lower income brackets.

I suggest that what we really ought to do is look at the literature that the organization known as Pensioners Concerned has put out and at the literature published by other organizations, and to realize the validity of their claim that retired people should not have to pay any income tax at all if their income does not exceed a certain figure. I think there is good reason and logic to accept the levels suggested by the Pensioners Concerned, which I believe are $3,000 or $3,500 for a single person and $5,000 for a married couple.

I am not suggesting that the income tax exemption levels be raised to those figures for all people 65 years of age and over, because this would give a tremendous bonanza to those in the upper income bracket. But I am saying that retired people whose income is not over $3,500 if they are single, or, if they are married, not over $5,000, should not have to pay income tax at all. The way to cope with this problem is not to fiddle around with the exemption levels, but to make the principle of tax credits applicable in their case. This is the only fair solution to this problem of how to establish exemptions and at the same time establish justice. I think in this area, as in the area of workers' expenses, the concept of tax credits ought to be considered at this time.

I strongly urge that this suggestion be looked upon, not just as an academic exercise that may produce results the next time there is a Carter report, the next time there is a white paper or another round of this sort of thing, because that may be 15 to 20 years away; I think that when we go into committee of the whole on this bill is the time to introduce this concept of tax credits.

In particular I urge, if I may now speak to the second and third points to which I have made reference, that with respect to the allowance to workers for expenses on the job, and with respect to the tax position of senior citizens or retired persons, that we adopt the tax credit principle. In terms of actual dollars, the amount that workers get as a tax credit should bear some reasonable relationship to the expenses they actually incur. In the case of retired people I think that the figures I have already quoted are reasonable.

I urge, as the retired people have urged, that having spent their lives helping to build up this country and having paid taxes, municipal provincial and federal, for decades on end, it would be little enough for a country like Canada to provide for these people in their retirement years a tax credit system that leaves them with the levels of income I have suggested. This, of course, would have to be complemented by pretty substantial increases in old age security—but that is another subject, not covered under this bill. But whatever is the bill that is before us, we must do a great deal more to provide security, justice and dignity for our older people than we have done so far. As far as this bill is concerned, I think that in terms of taxation we can do something for this particular segment of society. I therefore hope the points I have been making will receive serious consideration when we move into committee of the whole.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I move on to my fourth point which relates to the government's intention, as set out in Bill C-259, to abolish the federal estate tax. As members of my party have pointed out on many occasions, we think this is totally wrong. We think it is wrong because it will probably lead to an estate tax war among the provinces. Even apart from that, we think the whole notion that in a society as inequitable and unjust as ours it should be possible for people to pass on great wealth to those who come after them without those who come after having to do anything about it, is completely wrong. We are completely opposed to the proposal in this bill to abolish the estate tax and we hope reconsideration will be given to that matter when we get to that portion of the bill in committee of the whole.

The fifth point I want to make is that although we welcome the decision to introduce the idea of a capital gains tax into our legislation, we think the terms of that tax as set out in the bill are not in keeping with the just society, if that idea is still around, and are not in keeping with the principles of fairness. Everywhere else the ordinary people of the country have to pay taxes on their income on the principle that a dollar is a dollar. When it comes to capital gain, of course, the government has gone soft and suggests the tax will be on only half the dollars one gains in that way. We think this is wrong and that if the principle of a capital gains tax is to be written into our legislation, it should be written in on a proper basis.

My sixth and last heading has to do, again, with something which has been a theme of a great many of the speeches made during this debate, namely, the unfairness of the government in the tax proposals it has set forth regarding co-operatives and credit unions. It has been a delight to some of us to hear many members speak about this, particularly those from the government side of the House. The case has been well made and I do not intend to repeat it in terms of details or argument, but I do urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the government to realize how strong is the feeling about this matter among the many hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are members of co-operatives and credit unions. The clauses of the bill which deal with this matter are quite offensive to many Canadians and I hope that when we get to these clauses something will be done about them.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Where do you stand on that?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where does the government stand, is the real point.

Mr. Woolliams: We want to hear where you stand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I stand in favour of the position taken by the co-operatives and credit unions.

Mr. Woolliams: You stand where the votes are, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I promised myself, even if I did not promise the House, that my remarks during this debate would be brief and that I would try to set them out in tabular form. I am going to impose upon the house for another 90 seconds to list again the six areas about which I have been talking.

They are, the need for a higher exemption level, a better deal in respect of workers' expenses, and improvements so far as old age pensioners are concerned. They include, also, the removal of the clauses which would repeal estate taxes, putting capital gains on the same basis as any other tax, namely that a dollar is a dollar and, finally, giving a decent break to the co-operatives and credit unions of this country. The government's weaknesses on these points make this a bill which is not satisfactory, but if these six points could be met the bill might then be one which we could consider.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Honey in the chair.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, in discussions with hon. members opposite there seems to be agreement that we not proceed with the clause by clause discussion this evening. Perhaps if we start that tomorrow right after orders of the day we can clear it up by tomorrow night.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benson: I doubt that very much. However, there does seem to be agreement among members opposite that at this point we proceed with the next order of business and take the clause by clause discussion of this bill tomorrow or in accordance with an agreement reached by the House leaders. At that time I will make a statement and discuss possible amendments to the legislation.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I think that is one of the few excellent suggestions to come from the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: We will go along with it, but I should like to make one suggestion. During the weeks and weeks of discussion we will have on this bill in committee of the whole, when some good points are made by hon. members on this side, as happens from time to time, we hope the government House leader will consider dealing with some of the good pieces of legislation on the order paper so the country may have the opportunity of seeing them.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, in brief reply to that suggestion I can say I understand my hon. friend's view, that he does not want to deal with this piece of legislation but wants to get on to something else.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if I might make a request which could perhaps be met before we resume the discussion tomorrow. As far as I can ascertain, copies of Bill C-259 are not on our files here in the chamber. If every member of the House of Commons has to carry that book down from upstairs we will all be exhausted before we start. I wonder if arrangements could be made to get a government truck or something in order to make sure there is a copy of the bill in every member's desk before we proceed with it tomorrow.

The Chairman: I understand that will be the case and that hon. members will have a copy available. Hon. members have heard the suggestion. Shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT BILL

MEASURE TO MITIGATE EFFECT ON CANADIAN INDUSTRY OF IMPOSITION OF FOREIGN SURTAXES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-262, to support employment in Canada by mitigating the disruptive effect on Canadian industry of the imposition of foreign import surtaxes or other actions of a like effect.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I understand that discussions have taken place. Because of the desire not to begin the committee stage of the tax bill tonight, because I have not really given the House any advance notice about any other items and, further, because the item upon which I had intended to make a time allocation is about to depart from our midst, I would like merely to advise hon. members that it has not been possible to secure an adjournment of the court action which is to commence tomorrow in Regina. In view of the reluctance of the government—indeed, the refusal of the government—to involve the court in this issue, the government has decided not to proceed further with the grain stabilization bill, and it will make payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow we shall begin the committee stage of the tax bill. If it is the wish of the House, I would be happy to note the unhappy departure from our midst of the grain stabilization bill by calling it ten o'clock.

Mr. Horner: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: I just want to say we would be happy to provide the usual memorial service and headstone.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that we move to the adjournment proceedings at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I invite hon. members who wish to leave the House to do so as quickly as possible so that we may proceed with the adjournment debate and allow the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) to present his point.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[Translation]

FINANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING NEGATIVE INCOME TAX FORMULA

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, on June 16, 1971, I put a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) regarding some tax injustice, more precisely in order to find out, and I quote:

—whether he approves the negative tax formula suggested by many authorities as a method to assure a better distribution of the purchasing power? Does the minister believe that it would be a desirable means to stimulate the economy?

The Chair then stated that my question invited the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the Minister of Finance to give an opinion, and so we did not hear the view of the minister. So, I invite him tonight to tell the public what he thinks of that.

The negative tax is a return which would benefit those who earn less than $3,000 annually.

Mr. Speaker, we all know of course that a tax policy is required to serve first the interests of Canadians and to provide each individual with a vital minimum, as a birthright.

I think it is a reversal of the roles that is needed. It is merely a question of distribution; we should distribut the surplus of our national product, which was of $91 billion in 1971, while consumption was only of $50 billion, which gives a difference of $41 billion.

So, we must give back to the country its national balance and its economic independence. The whole world is asking for economic balance and not equality. Revolutionary experiences carried out in the name of equality have all failed.

Mr. Speaker, there is no economic future with the present system. It is our whole way of thinking that must be changed, so that our governments will not remain deaf to the representations of the people who tell us again and again that what they need is food, clothing, housing and education.

Would a negative tax provide the essential and take these factors into account? I doubt it. But I must admit that it would bring a degree of relief to the poorer classes.

[Mr. Horner.]

Above all, it would be a recognition of the importance of a number of human beings.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we should analyze the causes of all these difficulties which are, after all, only administrative and economic problems which call for the use of the mental faculties of the ruling class.

Mr. Speaker, every individual lives within his family and within society. Everyone does something for choice or for profit. I would say that on the one hand, there is love and on the other, interest. Let us stop believing that the two are necessarily opposed. There must be a way of reconciling one with the other.

Parliament consists of 264 members elected by the citizens of Canada under the Canada Elections Act. It is the responsibility of members to see that justice prevail in 1971 among the 22 million Canadians, according to the production of goods and services in that year.

It may be normal, when exercising supreme authority, that governments are inclined, with equal opportunities, to favour their friends, their constituents or members of their political party, but without prejudice of their love for other Canadians. Interest should not do away with love!

If the Prime Minister has any feelings for the 22 million Canadians who are subjected to the "supreme" authority he shares with the other 29 ministers and the 264 members, he will no doubt see to it that the monetary, economic and political mechanisms bring about a fair distribution of goods and services among these 22 million citizens, according to their essential needs, before someone piles up too large a share of this tremendous production, after having spent what he needed to live in affluence and not in luxury. That is simple and understandable!

If Parliament had the social attitude it should have, capital would automatically become social as well as labour. Credit would automatically become social in all its institutions, in every Canadian family.

The Canadian government makes sure every month that the 22 million citizens are well administered according to the national production, according to the administrative formula recognized by all managers: The revenue is equal to expenses and net profits.

Every Canadian must get a sufficient guaranteed income to provide for his essential expenses, and to allow for a certain margin for savings, profit and contingencies, according to the formula recognized by all—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt the honorable member, but his time has expired.

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this formula of negative taxation is one of the many methods that this government could use to achieve a more equitable redistribution of incomes in favour of those groups with low incomes.

The federal government has developed a whole series of programmes to make direct payments or to provide certain services to the Canadian population. I refer to all the social security measures that have been put forward by the various federal governments that have been in power in recent years. I am thinking particularly in terms of unemployment insurance, medicare, hospital insurance, old age pensions, family allowances and so on. All those measures achieve a redistribution similar to that mentioned by the honourable member.

Of course, if he is talking about the love of the Right Honourable Prime Minister, he will find that all the measures that have been proposed recently by him and his ministers prove his deep love for the Canadian people.

If the government ever sets out to propose a formula of negative taxation, it will do so in the House in an appropriate form and manner and according to the usual method.

AGRICULTURE—POTATOES—ASSURANCE TO PRODUCERS RESPECTING SEED EXPORT MARKET

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to deal again with a matter of great importance to the potato producers of this country but primarily, I think, to the seed producers of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. As is well known, many aspects of agriculture in this country have been severely affected by two recent economic decisions, one taken by this country and one taken by the U.S.

The first was the effect of the floating of the dollar, which had a very serious effect on our agricultural exports to the United States and in effect decreased the competitive advantage that our potatoes and other agricultural products enjoyed in the U.S. Then, of course, more recently we were faced with the imposition of the 10 per cent surtax which has created a very serious problem, as has been acknowledged on a number of occasions by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) in this House, beginning the first week of the reconvened session in early September and as late as this afternoon when the minister made reference to the special attention that was being given to the turkey producers of Canada.

I think that many members of this House, and certainly many thousands of potato growers, have been most unsatisfied with the answers given to date by the Minister of Agriculture with respect to what forms of assistance might be forthcoming for those faced with very serious prohibitions on the entry of their products to the U.S. and the amount of return they could expect for that product. The hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), myself, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) and others have attempted from time to time to obtain a specific answer from the Minister of Agriculture with respect to what forms of assistance will be forthcoming.

The minister has talked in general terms about the agricultural stabilization board, suggesting that under the act assistance would be forthcoming. There have been at least two meetings of which I am aware with the departmental officials and with the ministers of agriculture of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, but no clear statement has yet been brought forth as to the nature of the assistance that will be provided. The minister has indicated that at the appropriate time he will make a statement indicating what assistance will be available in a more specific way, and yet assistance is required almost immediately.

We know that the potato harvest in New Brunswick is almost completed. The potato harvest in Prince Edward Island is more than half way completed. Our harvest comes a little later because of a later frost period and I am informed by the potato shippers in P.E.I. that we have already loaded ships for export, that other ships are being loaded at present and these are primarily destined for U.S. markets. I am also informed that if we do not have an indication within the next week or so of the kind of assistance that the minister will bring forward, markets will be closed off for hundreds of thousands of hundredweights of potatoes that we would normally ship into the seed importing areas of Florida, Puerto Rico and the New England states.

It is a well known fact that most potato producers produce at least 15 per cent to 20 per cent above and beyond that which they can hold in their potato-holding facilities. In other words, these are potatoes that must clear the market before the heavy frost sets in in the middle or late November. Therefore, if potato producers do not have the luxury of holding their product for an indefinite period of time, as might be done with other kinds of produce, they are forced on to market and they must have an assurance immediately as to the kind of assistance that might be provided.

I should like to mention two things that might be taken into consideration. One is the possibility of freight assistance or subsidy that might enable new export markets to be opened up as an alternative to the present U.S. ones which are becoming increasingly difficult for us. I realize that we would have to take into account the necessity of facing certain areas where there might be retaliation through increased tariffs, but I think certainly the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture should be examining the proposal.

Second, if in the employment support bill we have adopted the principle of two-thirds reimbursement for industries directly affected by the Nixon surtax, the same principle could apply to agriculture, namely, a two-thirds reimbursement could at least be given as assistance in direct wages to those involved at the point of assembly, to those involved with stevedoring and the assembling of potato shipments for export. The nature of that program would not open up retaliatory measures on the part of the U.S. and would ensure that the present producers, growers, distributors and shippers would not be adversely affected or be in very great danger of losing their markets entirely.

I trust that the Minister of Agriculture or his representative can give some clear assurance this evening that action of this or a similar nature will be taken within the next few days so that the already serious situation of our potato growers will not be worsened.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) has asked, with respect to the seed potato export market to the United States, if the minister "is not able to offer some indication to the many producers in these two provinces, as to the extent of any assurance". In reply the minister stated that such assurances had been given in a very clear fashion. Indeed, Mr.

Speaker, if I quote from Hansard for September 7, at page 7588 the minister said:

I give an undertaking tonight that we are going to look at these on a commodity by commodity basis and utilize the Agricultural Stabilization Board to assist in those areas which are severely hurt.

I doubt that it is possible to be more clear. Further, in his statement to the House on October 1, 1971, the minister stated that the Agricultural Stabilization Board and the Agricultural Products Board have been authorized to come forward with individual commodity programs designed to help producers adversely affected by the surtax.

With respect to potatoes, both seed and table—because they are treated the same under the surtax provisions—discussions have been taking place between the board and agricultural officials of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island and the minister will be pleased to announce in due course, in the usual manner, any program that develops from these talks.

AIR TRANSPORT—ESTABLISHMENT OF NORDAIR AS REGIONAL CARRIER FOR NORTHEASTERN ONTARIO AND NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC—ONTARIO APPLICATION FOR REGIONAL CHARTER

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, on September 29, as recorded at page 8278 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) the following question:

Under our national air policy as it involves regional carriers, have negotiations been finalized regarding Nordair as the regional carrier for northeastern Ontario and northwestern Quebec?

The minister replied:

Not that I know of, Mr. Speaker. There have been discussions between Air Canada and Nordair with respect to possible exchange or co-operation for certain air routes but to the moment at least, and so far as I know, no conclusions have been reached.

I then asked:

Has a charter been sought from the Canadian Transport Commission by the Ontario government through its commercial carrier, White River Air Service? If so, what role in the regional transportation system is being filled by this application?

The reason I asked this question, Mr. Speaker, is that in northern Ontario we are being told that Air Canada will not be able to service both the area of northeastern Ontario and northwestern Quebec for the very simple reason that it has not any planes on order that will operate economically in that area. The applications that have been made have both been approved by the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission. They were made on September 30 and were in regard to Voyageur Airways Limited and White River Air Services, operating under the name of norOntair.

The Ontario government has got into the regional air service and is operating a circular route that starts in Timmins, or Sault Ste Marie, and covers the towns of Sault Ste Marie, Timmins, Earlton and Sudbury, returning to Sault Ste Marie. This has since been changed and the flights will originate in Sudbury. This airline is operating two aircraft owned by the Ontario government and leased for the sum of $1, and obviously it is going to play a role in the regional air service.

[Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean).]

The Voyageur application, Mr. Speaker, is from Ottawa to North Bay and return, and also is going to play a role. But these two services that are operating in the region do not make any connection with each other, and while it is possible to get on the airline in Earlton and go to Sudbury, if you are coming to Ottawa it is necessary to get from Sudbury to North Bay to make a connection with the other airline. This is the whole problem and it is the problem the Minister of Transport outlined on October 20, 1966, and again on August 15, 1969, when he said that in this case the organization of regional service in the area might require the consideration of route service between North Bay and Ottawa and consequently have an effect on the viability of the service authorized by this decision.

We in northern Ontario, Mr. Speaker, are not interested in getting on an airplane and going around in a circle. We want to get on an airplane at any point in northern Ontario and make connection with the national service in Canada, that is Air Canada, with its lines running east and west, or Canadian Pacific also running east and west. Anything less is already being handled by small charter aircraft in the area. I think it involves a decision by the Minister of Transport to inform the Canadian Transport Commission as to the integration of the various services chartered by the Canadian Transport Commission, to integrate service that will provide the opportunity of travelling from one place in northern Ontario to either the major centres of Montreal, Ottawa or Toronto. Any carrier that has not a direct connection to those major points is not serving the needs of the region of northeastern Ontario nor, I presume, northwestern Quebec.

So I ask the question, Mr. Speaker, because I think it should be brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport that the people in northern Ontario are very concerned that he has not insisted that Air Canada buy a 20-passenger aircraft for this type of service. We in northern Ontario are very much in favour of Air Canada being able to continue the service that we receive and, what is more, in improving that service.

I believe that the more flights a day there are, the more passengers will travel on the airline. To run a passenger aircraft out of my area, leaving in the middle of the day and getting into Toronto or Montreal late in the afternoon does not serve the needs of businessmen. Most businessmen therefore drive. I suggest if we are to charter commercial flights within this region nothing can be served by having them go around like the Ontario government service, in a circle, making no connections with anything, and in fact just moving from my area about 12 businessmen who have an interest in travelling through northeastern Ontario and getting to all the major points.

It seems to me that the Minister of Transport in announcing regional policy has an obligation to see that the Canadian Transport Commission puts this policy into effect. While I am in agreement that they have reserved the right for Nordair to get into the area, we have a bigger obligation and that is not to ask an unknown regional carrier to take on an additional responsibility. We as a Parliament have a responsibility to insist that Air Canada buy the type of aircraft that will enable them to service the regional areas in which they now operate, and continue to do so. Anything less will be a dereliction of duty on the part of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on the subject of negotiations between Air Canada and Nordair, and in answer to the questions asked by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) on September 29, the minister answered that discussions had reached no conclusion at that time. I must say that as far as I know, the situation is still the same and no decisions have been reached.

The hon. member also talked of his concern about the development of air service to northeastern Ontario. I am sure he has now read the decision of the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission on September 30. The decision was in favour of additional air service to service the points of Sudbury, Sault Ste Marie, Timmins and Earlton. The application, as he mentioned in his question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) was made by White River Air Services, Limited.

Briefly, the service in question was considered as an experimental service for a period of three years and there were additional limitations spelled out to the carrier to protect the public interest as well as the competitive position of other air carriers in this region. There also was direct reference to the regional air carrier policy and its application to this service. The proposed service is third level in nature and supplements the existing service in this region.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made some interesting points which I will be glad to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport. I will also provide the hon. member with a copy of the decision which I brought with me.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 9.34 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 13, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

COST OF ROYAL COMMISSION REPORTS FOR 1970

Question No. 1,251—Mr. Gilbert:

1. What was the cost of preparing, printing and distributing of the Royal Commission Reports for 1970?

2. What was the amount of revenue received from the sale of such published reports for 1970?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, Pilotage, Status of Women in Canada, Farm Machinery, Indian Claims and the Commission of Enquiry into Mail Transport in Montreal are concerned, the answer is: 1. The cost of preparing Royal Commission reports during 1970 was $1,204,730. It should be noted that the work of royal commissions is normally directed at the preparation of their reports and as a consequence all of the expenses attributed to various commissions can be considered to be for this purpose. The printing cost of reports for royal commissions during 1970 was $15,153. The distribution cost for individual publications cannot be isolated from the general overhead.

2. The amount of revenue received from the sale of Royal Commission Reports for 1970 was $75,707.

PUBLICATION GRANTS BY CITIZENSHIP BRANCH AND AGENCIES

Question No. 1,324—Mr. Paproski:

1. What grants, in what amounts, have been authorized since March 31, 1970, for publications through the department or agencies for which the Minister without Portfolio (Citizenship) has responsibility?

2. What are the criteria for such grants?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Insofar as the Citizenship Development Branch of the Secretary of State is concerned: 1. (a) Ontario Self-Help Association, $1,000; (b) National Council of Women, $4,000; (c) Fédération des Femmes du Québec, $3,000; (d) Inter-University on Canadian Slavs, $3,000.

2. The Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State awards grants to the above-mentioned organizations using the following objectives and criteria:

(a) Objective: To increase and improve citizenship participation. Criteria: (i) It was impossible for the organization to carry out their project without financial assistance from the Department of the Secretary of State. (ii) The organization was able to continue to fulfil its other commitments. (iii) The organization's membership was representative of its constituency. (iv) The organization had the authority needed to carry out the project. (v) The organization had a clear plan of the project. (vi) The subject matter was of great importance and had applications beyond the project. (vii) The organization had competent project staff.

(b) and (c) Objective: To increase and improve citizenship participation by encouraging group discussions and further research on the recommendations of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Also, to ensure citizens' participation in the feedback process to Government in regard to the implementation of the Royal Commission's recommendations. Criteria: (Same as above.)

(d) Objectives: To increase and improve citizenship participation. To encourage cultural diversification within a bilingual framework particularly following the publication of the fourth volume of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. Criteria: (Same as above.)

INFORMATION CANADA STUDIES

Question No. 1,567—Mr. Comeau:

Will Information Canada carry out studies of any areas this year and, if so (a) which ones (b) what is the aim of the investigations (c) what are the names and addresses of the persons employed on these projects (d) are they part-time or full-time employees (e) what is the estimated cost of each project?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of State): Yes (I) Communications research; (II) federal presence.

(I) Communications Research: (a) 1. Crowsnest Pass. 2. Sugar Beet Fields, Southern Alberta. 3. St. Boniface. 4. Riverdale (Toronto). 5. Sherbrooke. 6. Schefferville. 7. Labrador. 8. Gloucester County, New Brunswick. 9. Southern Nova Scotia. (b) The objective is basic communications research on the areas in which the public lacks information and the most effective means of supplying it. (c) 1. Paul Kane, Ottawa, Ontario; Wesley Hadikin, Edmonton, Alberta. 2. Rodney C. Zacharias, Winnipeg, Manitoba; Elizabeth Steele, Fredericton, New Brunswick. 3. Richard Kozak, St. Boniface, Manitoba; John Campbell, Fredericton, New Brunswick. 4. John West, Riverdale, Ontario; Marianne Farkas, Don Mills, Ontario. 5. Michel Frenet, Montreal, Quebec. 6. Nigel Martin, Halifax Nova Scotia, Montreal, Quebec. 7. Laura Jackson, Rocky Mountain House, Alberta; Lawrence Jackson, Rocky Mountain House, Alberta. 8. Pierre Tremblay, Bathurst, New Brunswick; Helen Sinclair, Toronto, Ontario. 9. Wayne Hutchison, Wolfville, Nova Scotia; Louise Normandeau, Montreal, Quebec. (d) They are all part-time contracted employees. (e) The estimated cost of each project is $7,000, including salaries for a three and a half month period.

(II) Federal Presence: (a) Quebec City and Vancouver. (b) The objective is to study physical aspects of communications with the public by the federal administration in each city. (c) Names: Quebec City, Charles Tod, Ottawa; Robert Masson, Quebec City. Vancouver, Douglas Young, Fredericton; Magdelena Leja, Vancouver. (d) Contract research or public servants working part-time. (e) Cost of each project is about $4,000.

PORT HOPE, ONTARIO—COSTS INCURRED BY ELDORADO NUCLEAR DIVISION TO ZIRCONIUM PRODUCTION

Question No. 1,657—Mr. Hees:

1. What was the total cost of construction, machinery, development and other costs incurred by Eldorado Nuclear Division for the production of zirconium metal billets at the new Port Hope, Ontario plant?

2. Was this plant closed down in August, 1971 after only six months operation and, if so, for what reason?

3. Was the zirconium produced ever sold and, if so, to whom and what happened to that market?

4. Will this plant return to production and, if so, on what date?

5. What costs are incurred while this plant remains idle?

6. Are the zirconium metal billets produced at Port Hope unsaleable on the world market and, if so, for what reasons?

7. Did the government survey this market before deciding to spend ten million dollars on construction and development cost?

8. How did that market analysis change from the commencement of production in February 1971 until August 1971?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Eldorado Nuclear Limited reports as follows: 1. $10,921,000.

2. No; it was closed in April 1971 following 23 months' operation at varying levels of production, for reasons outlined in 3.

3. Some of the zirconium produced was sold to customers in Germany, Japan and in Canada for both domestic use and export. These sales were made under spot or short-term arrangements. One long-term contract was obtained to supply zirconium for use in nuclear power reactors operated by a provincial government-owned utility in Canada. However, the depressed price imposed upon Eldorado as a result of a dramatic price reduction offered by a U.S. producer which had previously supplied zirconium to this utility (as compared with the price paid to that producer by the utility prior to Eldorado's entry into the market) proved too low for Eldorado to economically fill the contract. Also the world-wide delay in the coming into service of nuclear power reactors has been a factor in the failure to acquire export markets.

4. Zirconium production will be resumed as soon as contracts ensuring viable plant operation have been secured.

5. Approximately $32,000 annually, excluding depreciation on idle plant.

6. No; however, the possibility of sales would be enhanced if there were a Canadian rolling and fabricating facility to bring the billets to a more readily marketed form.

7. Yes.

8. See answer to 3 above.

OPERATION LIFT

Question No. 1,686—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many people were on staff of the PFAA office, Department of Agriculture, Regina, prior to the introduction of "Operation Lift"?

2. How many additional people were hired to carry out the administration of this program?

3. What was the total salary for that staff during the fiscal years 1969-70, 1970-71 to date?

4. Were additional funds provided for increased personnel to administer applications under the "Operation Lift" and forage payment programs and, if not, for what reasons?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Forty.

2. 1,008 (casuals) 222.0 man-years (1970-71); 36.6 man-years April 1 to August 31, 1971.

3.	Casuals	PFAA Staff
1969-70	Nil	$325,421
1970-71	$899,794	$296,764
April 1, 1971-August 31, 1971	$ 78,100	$133,743

4. Yes.

EMIGRATION OF SOVIET JEWS TO OTHER COUNTRIES

Question No. 1,713—Mr. Brewin:

Will the government use the opportunity of the visit to Canada of Premier Kosygin to discuss with him the plight of the Soviet Jewry?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Government intends to pursue the enquiries made by the Prime Minister of Premier Kosygin last May concerning emigration of Soviet Jews to Israel or other countries of their choice and to raise again the question of the reunification of Soviet citizens of all ethnic origins with their relatives in Canada.

ADDITIONAL ARMED FORCES COSTS IN QUEBEC CRISIS

Question No. 1,804—Mr. Robinson:

What additional costs were incurred by the Department of National Defence over and above their normal pay, operating and maintenance costs for the operation of the Armed Forces in assisting civil authorities during the period October 12, 1970 to January 5, 1971?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Additional costs incurred in Quebec amounted to $2,109,337 and in the National Capital Area $597,764 for a total of $2,717,101.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LANGUAGE TRAINING

Question No. 1,572—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How much was expended by the Department of the Secretary of State by province and territory for training in each of the following languages (a) English (b) French (c) Ukrainian (d) Italian (e) Polish (f) German (g) others, for the fiscal year 1970-71?

2. What expenditures are contemplated in each of these categories for the fiscal year 1971-72?

Return tabled.

INFESTATION OF SPRUCE BUD-WORM IN FORESTS OF NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 1,639—Mr. Coates:

1. How extensive is the infestation of the spruce bud-worm in Cumberland-Colchester North and has it been determined how it reached Nova Scotia?

2. Are other areas of woodlands in Nova Scotia also affected by the spruce bud-worm and, if so (a) what areas (b) what is the total acreage affected?

3. (a) What actions are being taken to eradicate the problem of the spruce bud-worm (b) is the government involved and, if so, in what manner?

4. Are any other similar types of insects affecting the forests of Nova Scotia and, if so (a) what are they (b) how dangerous are they (c) what actions are being taken to eradicate them?

Return tabled.

MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION—DATA ON OCCUPATIONAL SHORTAGES

Question No. 1,720—Mr. Blackburn:

Has the Department of Manpower and Immigration been collecting data on occupational shortages and, if so (a) since what date (b) how often have these data been collected (c) what were the shortages in Canada and in the five regions for each of the pertinent periods to date in terms of totals and broad occupational classifications?

Return tabled.

STATUTES OF CANADA

Question No. 1,793—Mr. McCleave:

What statutes passed by the Parliament of Canada are in effect but have not been included in the Revised Statutes of Canada, apart from those known in the rules of the House of Commons as private bills?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 244 is acceptable to the government.

SEWAGE DISPOSAL STUDIES, MASSET, B.C.

Motion No. 244—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the results of all studies conducted by the government or any agency or branch thereof since January 1, 1969 relating to sewage disposal and the effects thereof and including programs for sewage treatment plants at or near Masset, British Columbia.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INITIATIVES TO OBTAIN AGREEMENT BY LABOUR AND MANAGEMENT ON WAGE AND PRICE RESTRAINTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the decline in the monthly cost of living index, which is not normal but nevertheless encouraging to see, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has in mind any new initiatives at this time in regard to making another thrust to obtain some agreement or understanding in the matter of wage and price restraints?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that can be announced at this time. The Minister of Finance and myself have often said that we have this matter under review. We are encouraged, as is the Leader of the Opposition, by this decline. Although we would not say that we have licked inflation forever, we are encouraged by the movement, and if we do eventually have to take other decisions we will let them be known to the House.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is encouraging to note that the Prime Minister now recognizes that inflation was licked for a very short time. In view of the apparent acceptance by leaders of organized labour in the United States of the restraint program announced by President Nixon, may I ask the Prime Minister specifically whether he is going to take any new initiatives to examine the possibilities of labour and management in Canada agreeing to some mutually satisfactory approach to restraints, particularly in view of the fact, as I say, that labour in the United States has now accepted that position?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe the House is aware of the fact that meetings have been scheduled, some of which have already taken place, between leaders of industry and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and between labour leaders and the Minister of Labour. These are some of the questions which are being discussed. It is impossible to state at this time that there is any agreement on a future course of procedure, but we are aware of the problem as put by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a further question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister has referred to discussions. Is the Prime Minister putting before management on the one hand and labour on the other a specific proposal regarding counter-inflationary measures, measures of restraint, which the government is prepared to pursue at this time?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, not specific proposals at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—GOVERNMENT PLAN TO CREATE JOBS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): It is now obvious that the Nixon economic program will have serious effects on the Canadian economy. Is the Prime Minister now prepared to announce the contingency program to stimulate the economy and provide more jobs which, as he indicated several weeks ago, he would be prepared to announce if it became evident that the situation was becoming serious?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think the hon. member is right. It is obvious that the American measures are beginning to have effect here in spite of the legislation which has just been adopted by Parliament. As to an announcement, I can only tell the hon. member that it will be made very soon.

Mr. Hees: Has the Prime Minister any plans for improving the relationship between Canada and the United States, which all indications appear to show has deteriorated during the past 12 months?

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Peace River rising on a supplementary question?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was thinking the answer over and had risen about halfway to his feet. Can he not be allowed to answer?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River.

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING INDUSTRY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): In light of the changed situation in Canada causing an overriding necessity to stimulate the economy and provide substantially increased employment, is the government considering a review of its entire program dealing with industry generally, and in that connection has the government replied to the letter written to it by Mr. Filion, President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have received several letters from leaders of industry. I do remember one from Mr. Filion to which I did reply. I must confess I am not clear in my own memory as to what particular representations Mr. Filion made in his letter. If the hon. member will refresh my memory, I might be able to be more helpful.

Mr. Baldwin: I will be glad to send across to the Prime Minister a copy of the speech Mr. Filion made today, and perhaps the Prime Minister might like to comment on it later.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

CO-ORDINATION OF FEDERAL AND QUEBEC PLANS—STATE OF DISCUSSIONS—BASIS OF DISAGREEMENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister inform the House whether discussions at the official level between Ottawa and Quebec regarding the co-ordinating of family allowance plans are still continuing or have been suspended?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): They are still continuing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: In view of reports that serious difficulties have been encountered by the two levels of government and that disagreement is very strong between them, can the minister inform the House when the next meeting is scheduled and also what the basis of the disagreements may be?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the disagreements are not serious. I did note the comments of the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs. I am endeavouring now to check precisely what he did say, and what the meaning behind it was, as a basis for further discussion, but we have not gone through that procedure yet.

Mr. Lewis: Just one more supplementary, Mr. Speaker, and I will be through. In view of the importance of this question not only to social security relations between the federal and Quebec governments but also to these relations throughout the country, would the minister undertake to make a statement to the House as to the progress of these discussions and what obstacles there are in the way of agreement on the proposals of Mr. Castonguay?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether a statement will be necessary, but as soon as we have had further discussions and delineated what the feeling is on both sides I would be pleased to endeavour to let the House know, in whatever manner seems practical.

Mr. Lewis: Are any further meetings scheduled and, if so, for what date?

Mr. Munro: No, Mr. Speaker. No precise date has been set yet. I am just surmising that there will be further meetings.

CO-ORDINATION OF OTTAWA AND QUEBEC PLANS—SUGGESTED MEETING BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Joliette wish to ask a supplementary?

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare a supplementary question.

Since Quebec Health Minister Castonguay said at a press conference yesterday that the negociations failed and that only a meeting with the federal minister responsible could bring changes acceptable to Quebec, does the minister intend to meet Mr. Castonguay and for what date could the meeting be arranged?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The government is considering that now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a supplementary.

DOLLAR IMPACT OF NEW PROGRAM COMPARED WITH PRESENT FAMILY AND YOUTH ALLOWANCE PROGRAMS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, in order to confirm the far reaching implications of the FISP program, would the minister, either in a statement or by press release outside the House, give the country a comparison by region or province of the dollar impact of the FISP program in relation to the present family allowance and youth allowance programs, in view of the fact that this was omitted in the minister's original press release explaining the new program?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister might be allowed to reply to the question although I am sure the hon. member would agree it is not supplementary to the question which was just asked by the hon. member for York South. As the question has been asked, perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister understands the question. I requested this basic statistical information by letter over a week ago and I certainly thought, since we were talking about the implications of the plan as it affects Canada, that a comparison of the dollar impact by region or by province would help all Canadians understand the full implications of the plan.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will get out the hon. member's letter right away and endeavour to answer it to the best of my ability.

Mr. Stanfield: On a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize one last supplementary from the Leader of the Opposition and then recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

CO-ORDINATION OF FEDERAL AND QUEBEC PLANS—BASIS OF DISAGREEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether I understand him correctly. Is he saying he does not understand the points of difference between the representatives of the province of Quebec and his own government with regard to this subject? Is he saying he does not know what the differences are?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that is not what I said. If the Leader of the Opposition was listening—

Mr. Stanfield: I was listening.

Mr. Munro: —he would know I said I had read press reports of what the minister said. I am endeavouring to check on precisely what he did say. We have not had a complete report and I am endeavouring to find out what it is all about.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—REFORMS TO STABILIZE ECONOMY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

As everyone knows, when the United States sneeze Canada catches a cold. Is the government considering a comprehensive program in order to bring about domestic economic reforms which will enable us to develop our country without always being dependent on or in conflict with the United States? Does the government intend to initiate sweeping economic reforms to allow Canadians to live in their own way at home?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Obviously, the answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. The government has already introduced many legislative proposals in the House, including the one now under study. Our tax reform proposals include some whose object is to help Canada exercise greater control over its economy.

RESPONSE TO CRITICISMS OF DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAMS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the earlier criticisms by the Canadian Council on Rural Development and the criticism this week in the fifth annual review of the Atlantic economy published by APEC that the program under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has not established any acceptable goals or targets or objectives, particularly those that might be jointly agreed to by the provinces, for the designated regions, I wonder what steps the minister or his department is taking to answer this obvious concern and problem that has been with the department since its formation some two years ago?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there is only one premise that I accept, the one that APEC has published a report that I have not seen because they have not sent it to me.

Mr. Stanfield: We will send it to you.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): They have sent it to you? They have not sent it to me. I have not seen it so I have not read it. As far as the other premises are concerned, I do not accept them so I cannot answer.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Egmont on a supplementary.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the Leader of the Opposition rising on a point of order?

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I can only assume, in view of the difficulties the government has in understanding communications, that APEC has not considered it worth while to send them the report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a point of order. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It was a good one though. Since the program lists at least one or two officials from the minister's department who will be participating in discussions relative to the recommendations of the council next Tuesday, I assume that the minister's department will have an opportunity to study these suggestions and has already studied the earlier recommendations of the Council on Rural Development to which I referred in my first question and which were made many months ago. Therefore I should like to ask the minister what steps he or his officials have taken to respond to the growing criticism and concern about the over-all effectiveness of the department?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly, all such recommendations and suggestions will be taken under consideration. I have already stated in the House that we do not believe that we are guided by the Holy Ghost and therefore cannot make mistakes. We have attempted to establish worthwhile programs for regional development. Various persons and organizations offer suggestions; we shall study them, but we should not be asked to respond before the reports reach us.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, certainly neither I nor anyone else has ever suggested that the minister's department is being advised by the Holy Ghost.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You are.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I should like that opportunity but so far it has not occurred. As a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could indicate what steps are being taken to examine further or to implement proposals concerning preoccupation with the development of an infrastructure in the Atlantic region and a greater opportunity for regional participation in the planning of future programs?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, as soon as we have the APEC report as well as other reports referred to by the hon. member, and when we have studied them, we shall certainly endeavour to improve our methods so as to reach the objectives which we have set for ourselves. We have no pride to save; we merely want to help and it is possible that we find some shortcomings, but the hon. member can be sure that if we can correct them, we shall do so. However, we do not accept global condemnations which apply but to some particular cases and which have no bearing on any definite program.

[English]

JOBS CREATED UNDER REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I wonder if the minister could tell the House how many jobs have been created by his department under the terms of the Regional Development Incentives Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that a question of that kind ought normally to be placed on the order paper. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley on a supplementary.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is supplementary to that asked by my colleague the hon. member for Egmont. I appreciate that the minister may have difficulty communicating with the Holy Ghost, but I do not intend to ask if he has read the APEC report which was just released or the report of the Canadian Council on Rural Development which was transmitted to him in July this year. What I should like to ask is whether he would make a statement in the House on the report of the Atlantic Development Council which has been in the hands of the minister since April, 1971, that report also having set out goals and targets for the Atlantic area, because we in the Atlantic area have interests to protect and we are not being protected by the sloppy answers of the minister?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Perhaps the Holy Ghost sent the minister a copy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: Because we have interests to protect, Mr. Speaker, I perhaps trespassed a little too far, but only because of the continuing non-answers by this minister to our questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The latter part of the question perhaps was not entirely relevant, but the hon. member might allow the minister to reply to that part of his statement which was a question.

Mr. Nowlan: Perhaps the minister did not understand either the first or the second part of the question, and I should like to put it as clearly as I can. Has the minister yet considered the report of the Atlantic Development Council, which came to him in April of this year, setting out goals and targets and a whole concept of strategy for Atlantic Canada development, and is he prepared to make a statement on that before he does any more bedtime reading?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): In due time, I will surely make a statement in the House. For the time being, we are not ready to do so.

[English]

An hon. Member: The Holy Ghost sent the report.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We ought to go to another subject soon. The hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Nowlan: I suggest that the minister has a little patronage set up in Montreal.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is cheap.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister has set up an office in Montreal for purposes of patronage.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is cheap, cheap.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister is known as Marchand, the patronage man.

An hon. Member: He is the president of "Holy Ghost Incorporated".

SUGGESTED STUDY OF DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAMS BY ECONOMIC COUNCIL

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has he or have his colleagues in the government considered asking the Economic Council of Canada to make a study of the programs or the effect of the programs that his department has been putting into effect during the last two or three years, as directly authorized and referred to in the act setting up the Economic Council of Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, officials of the department are reviewing the programs and constantly trying to consider their efficiency and their output. My department is not very old, Mr. Speaker, having been established a mere two and half years ago. We are endeavouring to find out whether we are achieving our aims and we would like to see the opposition make its contribution instead of trying to create trouble—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood. I apologize to the hon. member for Greenwood. The hon. member for Témiscamingue wishes to raise a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Témiscamingue on a point of order.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has just accused the opposition of creating difficulties for the government. I should like to point out to the minister that, in Canada, it is the government, and not the opposition, that is creating difficulties for everyone.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

USE OF WIRETAPPING IN UNION STRIKE—PROHIBITION IN BILL OF SUCH ACTION BY POLICE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice. In light of reports of police wiretapping against trade union members engaged in a legal strike, will he review Bill C-252 to make sure that it effectively prohibits such police actions and, if not, will he propose the necessary amendments?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that will be one of the matters we shall want to deal with when the legislation reaches the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, would the minister consult with the provincial Attorneys General in order that they may collaborate in putting to an end this objectionable form of industrial espionage?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would think that at this stage under the present law the responsibility is theirs.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In light of the questions just asked about wiretapping and his answers, is he now prepared to accept the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that before wiretapping takes place a judge's order ought to be obtained, instead of leaving this matter in the hands of political people such as the Attorney General of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Minister of Justice rising on a point of order? I suggest that as the question was asked it is not in order.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The point of order arises from the fact there is legislation before the House in the form of a bill and if the hon. member had read it he would know that is just what we provided for.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Has the government paid any living expenses to the FLQ members in Cuba, at least until they can earn a living?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

Mr. Fairweather: I am deferring to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Sharp: It is probably a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since you seem to have ruled out of order the question asked by the hon. member. I would think it important that this question should be answered and not left uncertain.

Mr. Speaker: If a question is ruled out of order and the minister thinks, either on a point of order or a question of privilege, that it should be answered, the minister should make his point on that basis. However, if a question is ruled out of order by the Chair, it is certainly not sufficient for a minister to rise and say that in his view there should be a reply to the question.

Mr. Sharp: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not express myself too clearly. I was not sure whether Your Honour was ruling the question out of order.

Mr. Nowlan: No wonder Washington has trouble.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE OF MINISTER OR PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY DURING QUESTION PERIOD AND DEBATES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Prime Minister embodying a reasonable request about the operation of the House and value returned for dollars spent. Now that there are 27 parliamentary secretaries to share the load, in a manner of speaking, will the right hon. gentleman consider an arrangement whereby either a minister or his parliamentary secretary is here at all times during the question period and during debates?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will consider that question, Mr. Speaker. The need for further parliamentary secretaries is to assist the minister in the House and in parliamentary committees if the minister is tied up with departmental or cabinet affairs. If it is conceivable to work out a timetable by which ministers will be represented in the House every day, I will obviously bring that forward, but I have some doubt whether it is possible.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question. As no more than the seven senior ministers in the government are busy enough to require parliamentary secretaries, is the government setting up a committee to figure out what in the world the other 20 are going to do all day?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order.

HEALTH

BIRTH CONTROL—GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES AND VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the grant by his department of $25,000 to Serena, an organization using birth control methods with a 24 per cent failure rate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: That's like Benson's budget.

Mrs. MacInnis: —will the minister say whether similar grants will be available to municipalities and voluntary bodies—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. MacInnis: —using methods with proven lower failure rates?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Without accepting the premise of the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise her that there already is a cost-sharing arrangement with the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan for many types of family planning services, and some of this must inevitably filter down to the municipalities.

Mrs. MacInnis: Apart from the Family Planning Association of Canada, have any other direct grants been made to organizations using modern birth control methods?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that question should be placed on the order paper or considered at the time of adjournment.

Mrs. MacInnis: Ten o'clock.

ACTION TO EXPAND POISON CONTROL CENTRES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that a federal study into accidental and deliberate poisonings has reported that Canada's poison control centres are having little success in fighting accidental and deliberate poisonings, is the Minister of National Health and Welfare giving consideration to introducing new measures and assisting in expanding poison control centres in light of this report?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will look into the matter further, Mr. Speaker, and report to the hon. member.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the minister in a position today to reply to my question of some days ago regarding the necessity and possibility of more funds being made available soon to the Cape Breton Development Corporation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the corporation's last annual report showed that by the end of 1970 most of its initial capital had been spent or committed and by the end of this year there will be very little left. The corporation's future capital plans are now being prepared and will be reflected when next year's estimates are submitted to Parliament.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SUGGESTED EXAMINATION OF DEPARTMENTAL OPERATIONS BY OFFICIALS IN PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): My question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the sensitivity on the part of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and his officials with regard to criticisms about the programs that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member resume his seat. The hon. member should ask the question. Certainly the way it is premised would tend to indicate that it would not be in order. The hon. member should ask the question directly.

Mr. Coates: I had to substantiate what I was going to request of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I will do it now. In view of this, will the Prime Minister give consideration to having some of the officials in his office carry out an independent examination of the success or failure of DREE and indicate what programs should be altered in order to make it a more successful operation as far as the fight against regional economic disparity is concerned?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly discuss with the President of the Treasury Board whether I should further enlarge my staff to carry out this investigation.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question.

WELFARE

CORNWALL—REFUSAL OF PAYMENTS TO PERSONS WITH LONG HAIR—POSSIBLE VIOLATION OF CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In answer to a question on September 30 the minister told the House he would investigate an incident in Cornwall involving a refusal to give welfare payments to people with long hair to see whether this violated the letter or spirit of the Canada Assistance Plan. Did the minister make this investigation and, if so, can he report to the House at this time?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The matter was looked into, Mr. Speaker. I forget the details of the results of the investigation. I will look into it and report to the hon. member.

In the wake of last week's conference over which the minister presided, is the government now giving serious consideration to asserting Canada's jurisdiction over the continental shelf in so far as fisheries management is concerned and, if so, when may an announcement be expected?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, our primary concern is for sound conservation out over our continental shelf, and we require the co-operation of other nations to bring that about.

GRAIN

FURTHER ACTION ON STABILIZATION BILL FOLLOWING PAYMENTS TO WHEAT BOARD UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the minister responsible for the Wheat Board whether a cheque has gone out to the Wheat Board today, whether it is for $38 million or $62 million and whether, in light of the fact that Bill C-244 still remains on the order paper, he intends to proceed with consultations immediately so that further action may be taken during the present session of Parliament?

An hon. Member: Wouldn't you like that?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): A cheque in the amount of $62.1 million has been paid to the Canadian Wheat Board and, of course, in due course, after making appropriate calculations, the Wheat Board will be paying a much smaller amount to the farmers.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the minister to answer the second part of my question? Will he be holding consultations immediately, or does he intend to let that bill die on the order paper?

[Later:]

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): My supplementary arises from the minister's statement that the sum of approximately $62 million has been paid to the Canadian Wheat Board, money which in reality was owed to the farmers who participated in the pool of that year. What was the significance of his remark that only a portion of this money would be paid to the producers?

Mr. Lang: This has been explained to the House any number of times in recent weeks. A portion of the amount is allocated to the 1969-70 pool, and only that portion will be allocated to producers and received by them at this point in time. The question of whether any other amount allocated to future pools will ever reach the farmers depends on many circumstances, for example, the total state of the pools, circumstances about which we cannot know at this time.

LIFT PROGRAM—AUTHORIZATION FOR REPAYMENT REQUESTS TO FARMERS—LEGAL ACTION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): In view of the fact that a number of requests have gone out to individual farmers from Mr. Riddell, the director of PFAA, seeking repayment of part of the amounts paid to farmers under the Lift program, can the minister inform the House whether this was done under his direction or on the initiative of the director of PFAA?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Any recovery is certainly limited only to amounts which may have been paid in circumstances where there was no entitlement to the payment. As I understand it, this is a required procedure and one of which the Auditor General earnestly approves.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the attention of hon. members that there are only about five minutes left before the end of the question period and apparently there are three or four supplementaries on this subject, which might bring us to the end of the time available.

[Later:]

Mr. Gleave: Further to my earlier question, can the minister inform the House whether any legal action has been taken against individual farmers in an attempt to enforce repayment of part of the Lift payments, or whether any legal action is contemplated by himself or by his department?

Mr. Lang: I do not know of any such specific action at this point but, of course, if moneys are properly owed to the Crown as having been paid on an erroneous basis, legal proceedings might well follow.

CASH ADVANCE PROGRAM—WHEAT BOARD DEMAND FOR ADDITIONAL PAYMENTS BY FARMERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My supplementary refers to the cash advance program in connection with which a similar difficulty has been encountered by reason of the Wheat Board demanding additional payments from farmers. Is the minister aware of this problem, and has he taken action to correct it?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The problem is in no way related to what we have been considering, just as the legislation is in no way related to it. Some difficulty has arisen as a result of farmers and, indeed, some elevator agents, thinking that cash advances could be made at a rate other than the rate prescribed for such advances, and that repayments could likewise be made at a different rate. The law in fact requires a specific rate with respect to advances and repayments. Where this misunderstanding has arisen there has, of course, been some difficulty.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CADET MOVEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING COMMITTEE ON YOUTH RECOMMENDATION THAT FEDERAL FUNDING CEASE

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In his absence I will direct it to the Prime Minister. It arises out of one of the recommendations made to the federal government in the report of the Committee on Youth, the recommendation that federal funding of cadet movements should cease. Can the Prime Minister say whether the government is considering any retrograde step of this nature or whether there is anything to report to the House on this question?

Mr. Speaker: Again, the hon. member's question as asked is not in order. It invites the Prime Minister to indicate whether the government will proceed with a retrograde step. This is argument, and a question should not be asked in those terms.

Mr. Simpson: I will rephrase the question. Has the Prime Minister anything to report to the House with regard to the specific recommendation in the report of the Committee on Youth to which I have referred?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. As the Secretary of State told the House, we are looking at the report and studying specific aspects of the recommendations it contains, but there is nothing we can tell the House at this time.

MANPOWER

ACTION RESPECTING REFUSAL OF APPLICANTS FOR WORK TO ACCEPT SUITABLE JOBS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. On September 23 I addressed a question to him with regard to the skyrocketing cost of welfare in the country and what co-ordination was being established between manpower offices and welfare offices. The minister indicated that he would like to report fully to the House on this matter. I wonder if he is now in a position to do so.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I do not think I would be permitted to make what might be called a full report to the House at this point, but I will be glad to discuss the matter with the hon. member.

PAYMENTS BY GOVERNMENT UNDER TEMPORARY WHEAT RESERVES ACT SINCE JULY 31, 1971

Mr. Arnold Peters (Temiskaming): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of events which took place yesterday, is it now the hon. gentleman's intention to make the monthly payments to the Canadian Wheat Board as required by law under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, and has he done so up to date?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): As far as I know, the only payment which has been made up to this point is the $62.1 million. I will look into the other matter.

Mr. Peters: My inquiry was concerned not with the 1969-70 payment but with the payments which have fallen due on a monthly basis under the terms of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act since July 31 of this year.

Mr. Benson: That is what I offered to look into.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Will an item having to do with the construction policies of the federal and provincial governments as a means of creating employment appear on the agenda of the meeting of first ministers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot guarantee that construction will be on the agenda, but certainly the total package of measures with which we can proceed, including construction, will be on the agenda. It might not be detailed, but certainly it is a subject upon which governments will be free to speak.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): The Prime Minister has referred to this program on a number of occasions, including today. In view of the importance of this program being available as soon as possible, can the right hon. gentleman inform the House now whether we may expect an announcement within the next day or so or whether it will be some weeks hence?

An hon. Member: Very soon.

Mr. Trudeau: As was just said on this side of the House, I said "very soon". It will not be some weeks hence.

Mr. Lewis: You said "very soon" two weeks ago.

Mr. Trudeau: No, I did not. I said "soon" two weeks ago.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POLYMER—PREVENTION OF FURTHER LAY-OFFS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services who is looking after the situation in Sarnia in connection with Polymer. I wonder whether he has anything to report to the House on any solutions he may have in mind?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): I have very little to report apart from what I told the House a day or two ago. I talked with the president of Polymer this morning and he advised me that no further reductions in the work force are contemplated, at least at the present time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact there have been many complaints about the economic justification for these lay-offs and about the lack of proper notice, is the minister looking into this whole area to find the reasoning behind the lay-offs in order that he can report to the House by way of a statement?

Mr. Richardson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have been in very close touch with management. The over-all position is that there are very serious difficulties in the whole petrochemical industry. The company has been faced with reduced sales, lower prices because of competition and rising costs. It is against this background that the reduction in the work force has been necessary.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister has put his finger on the problems in respect of the petrochemical industry, is he prepared to give the House any solutions he has in mind in the form of recommendations to the Prime Minister and the government as to how we can alleviate this very difficult and growing situation in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the minister that if he is going to reply to this further supplementary question he should do so briefly because it seems to me that the question as asked would invite a rather lengthy answer which normally should be made on motions. The minister might reply briefly.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I will not reply further at this time except to say that the government's action in bringing in the employment support bill is helpful to Polymer in the present circumstances.

Mr. Alexander: Never mind that—over and above that?

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REPORTED DANGEROUS RUSTING OF 1965-69 CHEVROLET CARS—PROTECTION OF CANADIAN OWNERS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is his department aware of the situation reported from Detroit today involving an estimated seven million Chevrolet cars, 1965 to 1969 models and the rusting of frames which has caused engine mounting failure—rusting such as we experience in the national capital from time to time—with the threat that many thousands of these cars will be recalled, and can he say whether his department will look into this with a view to protecting the Canadian consumer?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice, but I only received it after coming into the chamber and there has not been time to make a check. I will give him an answer tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 12, consideration in committee on Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I did not want to interrupt the minister's statement and that is why I am taking this opportunity of suggesting that we should decide now how we are to proceed with the committee study of this bill and how votes will be taken. Your Honour will appreciate that the bill contains over 700 pages, and clause 1 in effect repeals practically the whole of the Income Tax Act. The bill contains some 500 pages of more than 200 paragraphs relating to the new act. I think we must determine how we should handle this legislation because clause 1 cannot be relegated to the end in the way we have proceeded on other occasions. Clause 1 in effect repeals six parts of the present Income Tax Act and puts the whole act on the table.

My suggestion is that we have a preliminary round of general discussion, to be followed by a discussion of the clauses and a vote on the clauses by number. I suggest we vote on the clauses by number rather than deferring votes, because of their many interrelationships. Many clauses are consequential upon others, so much so that it would be farcical to defer a vote and expect, either by agreement or on division, to carry another clause which is consequential upon that clause still outstanding. For that reason I propose we deal with the clauses in orderly sequence, to avoid what may become a terribly complicated procedure.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised, I am not averse to the suggestion of the hon. member. As he suggested, I think we might start with a general round of speeches, and after a discussion between myself and other interested parties regarding the handling of clauses and subclauses we could take the vote. I fully agree that a method must be found to deal with this matter because of the number of varying principles involved, some of which are involved in parts of clause 1 and some of which are involved in other parts of the bill.

Clause 1 in effect involves the entire Income Tax Act, and if it is agreeable I would suggest we hold further discussions as to the method of breaking it down. I am in agreement generally that we should break it down because of the number of clauses involved.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, apparently it will not be necessary to take part in an extensive argument at this point, as I thought might be the case, because there seems to be general agreement between the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Edmonton West. I share their views. The gentlemen at the table have no doubt been puzzling over this bill and are aware of the fact that clause 1 is 596 pages in length and about 2½ inches thick. It looks much like the telephone book of the city of London, England. It includes about 257 clauses in respect of a new act and the number of subclauses must be legion several times over. In fact, what we will have before us, when you call clause 1, is a proposed new Income Tax Act.

I realize that one might find precedents for the proposition that technically what is before us is just clause 1 of the bill, and therefore we should debate the whole thing all at once and vote on it all at once. But surely this is a case where common sense ought to prevail. After all, how could the rule of relevance be applied to the 596 pages of clause 1?

I therefore suggest that we first of all agree to have a general discussion, and then at some agreed point we decide that the general discussion has been concluded and we then proceed to deal with the 257 clauses of the new Income Tax Act which will be enacted by clause 1 of Bill C-259. I agree with the Minister of Finance that the details of this agreement can be arrived at by discussion through the usual channels, but I think it will be useful if it is now understood that this common sense procedure is to be adopted.

The Chairman: The Chair has no difficulty in agreeing that we would not want to proceed by calling clause 1 and proceeding to deal with it in its entirety. I gather there is general agreement that there is to be a round of discussion. The hon. member for Edmonton West used that terminology, as did the minister, and the Chair would like clarification of that point. Do hon. members mean by that, only one speaker from each party?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No.

The Chairman: Then it is agreed that there will be a general discussion on clause 1 and that during this interval the leaders of the parties will discuss the procedure we might adopt following that general discussion. If that is the general understanding, the Chair will recognize the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, at the start of the committee's consideration of Bill C-259 I should like to discuss briefly amendments the government is ready to make at this time. With the permission of the committee I will today table substantially all the amendments that the government plans for clause 1, which covers the majority of the tax reforms.

This procedure is intended to allow hon. members time to study the amendments in advance of their formal introduction by the government. The government is in the process of completing several amendments it will propose to the remaining clauses and I intend to table them as soon as possible. Aside from these, there may be further amendments the government will wish to propose as a result of representations which have been received only recently and which are still under consideration. Most amendments can be left for discussion later, but there are two areas of change I will describe because of the attention the issue has received so far during the debate.

Both inside and outside the House the proposed tax treatment of co-operatives and credit unions has received a good deal of discussion. Under the bill as drafted, patronage dividends and interest rebates cannot reduce the income of a co-operative or a credit union below 5 per cent of members' capital employed. The government amendment would provide that patronage dividends could not reduce income, after interest to members, below the lesser of, first, 5 per cent of members' capital employed as proposed in the bill and, second, one-third of the income before patronage dividends but after interest to members. This amendment will ease the impact of the new rules on co-ops and credit unions, particularly in years of low earnings.

In addition, the increase in tax resulting from the limitation on the deduction of patronage dividends and interest rebates will be phased-in over ten years by collecting one-tenth of the increase in the first year, two-tenths in the second year, and so on. This amendment will give credit unions and co-operatives time to adjust to the new rules. This phase-in will be included in the amendments to part III relating to the transitional rules. In addition, the government will propose an amendment to clarify that for credit unions interest on share capital is deductible.

Furthermore, we are proposing some amendments relating to the computation of the opening reserves of a credit union to more appropriately bridge the transition from exempt to taxable status. Representations have been made that credit unions cannot take full advantage of the small business incentive because of provincial reserve requirements. The government is continuing to give consideration to what change in the bill is appropriate to accommodate this special problem and I expect to be able to table next week an amendment dealing with this problem.

I would also like to refer to an amendment the government will propose with respect to the classification of shares of certain investment corporations as foreign property, within the meaning of section 206 as set forth in clause 1 of the bill. Investment corporations, as defined in section 130 in clause 1 of the bill, are special status corporations which, like mutual fund corporations and mutual fund trusts, are public investment vehicles for which substantial conduit treatment is provided by special rules in the bill.

To put investment corporations on a more equal footing with mutual fund corporations and mutual fund trusts, one of the amendments which I have tabled today will provide that shares of an investment corporation purchased by a taxpayer after today will be classified as "foreign property", except as prescribed by regulation. Generally speaking, the operation of the "foreign property" rules as they relate to investment corporations will be effected on the same basis as that prescribed for Canadian mutual funds and pooled funds in the press release which I issued on June 30, 1971, regarding this matter, except that today will be the effective date.

In addition to this change regarding investment corporations, I would like to announce at this time an amendment the government will propose to clause 65 in part III of the bill that will be of importance to registered retirement savings plan trusts that have contractual investment plans with investment corporations, mutual fund corporations, mutual fund trusts or trust company pooled funds whose shares or units will be classified as "foreign property" under the new rules. In order to give these trusts more time to rearrange their contractual plan commitments, this amendment will provide that any such shares or units acquired by a registered retirement savings plan trust before 1974 will, subject to specified limits, be deemed to be "foreign property" acquired by the trust before June 19, 1971.

The rules in subdivision (i) relating to the taxation of passive income—that is, foreign accrual property income—are complex. The complexity is inevitable if the provisions are to be both effective in curtailing abuse and yet fair to those multinational corporations based in Canada which carry on extensive operations in other countries. The government's objective is to achieve a fair balance between these two sometimes competing objectives. We recognize the importance of consulting with those Canadians with overseas investments in striking the appropriate balance.

To provide an opportunity for this consultation to take place, Bill C-259 already provides that the passive income provisions will not take effect on January 1, 1972. Clause 35(3) of the transitional provisions, page 659, provides that the passive income rules will apply only for those taxation years of foreign affiliates that commence after 1972.

We have already received a number of presentations relating to the passive income provisions and it seems clear that some changes to the law in this area should be made before the provisions take effect. However, we have concluded that it would be premature to introduce changes at this time before all representations have been received and given the study they require. Most of the amendments I am tabling are technical, while a few are largely of a relieving nature to overcome potential hardship cases. All are the result of my officials reviewing the bill following submissions by organizations and individuals who have given the bill careful scrutiny since it received first reading at the end of the budget debate.

The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Tax Foundation and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, as well as many other organizations and individuals, have spent a great deal of time and effort in reviewing the bill. I have been particularly impressed with the fact that most of the submissions have not merely focused attention on potential hardship cases but have also indicated instances where amendments are necessary to prevent tax avoidance schemes. The submissions of these organizations and individuals have been valuable. In the main, the amendments are in response to these submissions.

Throughout the debate we have heard a good deal about the complexity of the bill. Bill C-259 is complex, so is the present act. As practitioners gain familiarity with the new system, the issue of complexity will abate. For the average taxpayer the complexity issue has no relevance. Wage earners will continue to complete reasonably simple tax returns. The more complicated provisions of the bill, those involving the corporate tax regime and the provisions dealing with capital gains transactions, are of principal concern to the business community. A complex tax system is nothing more than a reflection of a complex, commercial world.

Much of the complexity in this bill is to relieve taxation. For example, the decision to tax capital gains at only half rates requires much more complicated provisions than if capital gains were treated in the same way as ordinary income. Similarly, certain capital gains—for example, the gain on principal residences—are exempt. These exemptions cause complexity. In addition, while other transactions are not exempt, the tax arising on the transaction is deferred. By this I am referring to amalgamations and certain other types of corporate reorganizations where the relieving provisions require complex rules. The decision to reduce the burden of the double taxation of corporate income necessitates rather complex rules concerning refunds at the corporate level.

Because the bill introduces new concepts there was a need to avoid a retroactive impact. The belief that the bill should not be retroactive resulted in complex transitional rules all of which are designed to prevent the taxation of previous accrued gains and income. The bill appears more complex than it would otherwise be because it also represents a restructuring of the old Income Tax Act. As persons become more familiar with the restructuring, the renumbering, the design and symmetry of the bill will become more apparent and more familiar and be recognized as a desirable objective.

To facilitate hon. members' consideration of the bill I would like to speak for a moment about its structure. There are four parts. Part 1 contains amendments to the present Income Tax Act. It is the basic tax reform bill. Part II consists of proposed changes to other acts that are related to the amendments contained in part 1 of the bill. Part III deals with the coming into force and application of the amendments contained in part I. It sets forth special transitional rules that would apply until such time as the new law becomes fully operative. In addition, this part contains special rules that would apply in the case of certain taxpayers having taxation years not coinciding with the calendar years. Part III is given the short title of "Income Tax Application Rules, 1971." Part IV contains amendments to the present Income Tax Act which are to become effective in 1971.

Part I of the bill repeals all but a few sections of the present Income Tax Act and substitutes new sections. The new sections include many completely new provisions such as those providing for the taxation of capital gains and new deductions. But there are also many instances where the present law is not changed in substance, although the numbering and cross-references will be different than at present.

The explanatory notes opposite page 1 of the bill state that where a particular section, subsection or paragraph contained in the text of the provisions set forth in part I of the bill makes no change in the present law, or makes no change except for necessary alterations in cross-references or for minor alterations in wording or arrangement that are not intended to affect the substance of the present law, the explanatory note opposite the particular section, subsection or paragraph refers only to the corresponding provision of the present law without further elaboration.

Where a particular section, subsection or paragraph continues an existing provision in the present law but makes changes that are intended to affect its substance, the existing provision is identified in the explanatory notes but is marked as "modified".

A totally new provision, or a provision that has been altered in such a manner that there is no readily identifiable corresponding provision in the present law, is marked in the explanatory notes as "new".

Although the amendments to the present Income Tax Act contained in part I of the bill replace almost all the provisions of the present Income Tax Act, the bill does not completely repeal the present act and introduce a new income tax act. The decision to amend the present Income Tax Act rather than to repeal it was made because of the arrangements with the provinces for collection of provincial income taxes. The provincial acts and the collection agreements refer to the present Income Tax Act.

In discussing the provisions in Bill C-259 it will be necessary to refer to parts I, II, III or IV of the bill. At various places it will be necessary to refer to parts of the Income Tax Act which are, of course, quite different. Because the amendments to the present Income Tax Act would replace most of that act, some publications have used the expression "old law" and "new law". The bill itself in the transitional provisions in part III refers to "former act" and "amended act" and also to "old law" and "new law".

Of course there cannot be "old law" and "new law" or a "former act" or "amended act" until Parliament has acted upon Bill C-259, but members may wish to use the term "old law" to refer to the Income Tax Act as it read before any of the amendments contained in Bill C-259, and the term "new law" to refer to the Income Tax Act as it would read after enactment of Bill C-259.

It will be noted that the portion of the bill in quotation marks starting with the heading, "Part I—Income Tax", and ending at line 31 on page 596, are all amendments to the present Income Tax Act. Thus, clause I of the bill starts on page 1 and continues to page 596. Clause 2 of the bill starts on page 596 and succeeding clauses are found in parts II, III and IV of the bill.

It has been suggested that I might file the proposed amendments which the government will make to the bill as we move through it. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would request that the committee rise, report progress and ask permission to sit later this day so that I may table these amendments.

The Chairman: Shall the Committee rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with permission of the House I should like to table the proposed amendments to the income tax bill C-259 which is presently before the House and I would suggest that they be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard so that they may be readily available to all hon. members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair wishes to make a suggestion. The minister has suggested that the amendments appear as an appendix to Hansard. The Chair will make a suggestion solely for the consideration of hon. members, particularly in view of the procedure of printing motions on the order paper at the report stage. Perhaps hon. members would consider whether it would not be easier if that procedure were followed, and then as each particular clause or paragraph was disposed of it could be dropped. This is merely a suggestion.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that it is the wrong place as an appendix to Hansard, because they are not related to any particular document that has previously appeared in Hansard. If they should be amended, they would be much easier to handle perhaps if they were either on the notice page on the order paper, which is a document for circulation in this chamber, or as part of Votes and Proceedings as a matter of record.

I put this suggestion forward with the thought of getting these documents within a reasonable time tomorrow. I think that adding them to Hansard would place a considerable burden on the preparation and printing of tomorrow's Hansard. Mr. Speaker, I shall have something further to say once we get this question settled.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to agree with the suggestion that these amendments be printed as an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings. Several suggestions have been made but I come down in favour of that one. I suggest that they should not be likened to report stage amendments, which are the amendments that appear on the notice paper that is attached to the order paper.

I also make the point that these amendments are numerous. If they are to appear on the notice paper and then be reprinted day after day, I suggest that this is a bit of waste in which we do not need to indulge. I suggest that they be made an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings and that an extra supply of today's Votes and Proceedings be printed so that all hon. members will have copies to refer to when we need them.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, that proposal is quite agreeable to me.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order at this time, consequent on the minister's tabling these amendments. Hon. members who would now be expected to participate in the discussion—I know that many will be basing their remarks on the amendments that have been put forward by the minister—have not had an opportunity of seeing those amendments. It is my suggestion that because of the complexity of the amendments, together with the complexity of a 700-page bill—and when the amendments are printed it will take two or three hours to fold them into the text of the bill—the government and members of the House would accomplish much more if the minister agreed that we adjourn further discussion at this stage until, say, Monday. This would give everyone concerned a proper opportunity of studying the effect of these amendments.

In the interval, after looking at the order paper, I suggest there is considerable legislation of a high priority which the government on a number of occasions has indicated that it wishes to have passed. We could profitably spend the balance of the week on those items. In this connection I am thinking of the item relating to the committee on statutory instruments, and Bill S-9, the Copyright Act. Without even looking at the order paper, I know there are many other items with which the House could occupy itself. I think the minister and all hon. members wish to have a tolerably intelligent discussion on the tax bill, and unless we know what these amendments are it would be impossible to carry on.

There is another point I would like to raise, Mr. Speaker. We want the assurance of the minister at this time that all of his amendments are in conformity with the resolution as amended by the curative motion passed by the House the other day—in other words, this would be appendix A as modified by the amendments contained in the errata sheet to Bill C-259—that any of the amendments now made do not go beyond the terms of the motion and of Bill C-259. As a classic example, if we are now proposing to change the level of exemptions for dependent children, I think we would have to have special procedures.

The minister will have to give that undertaking so that appropriate procedures will be followed. It might be necessary to introduce a new bill to cover this type of amendment. We need an assurance, with respect to any amendment of substance, that it falls within those terms. We do not want to go through the procedure of another curative motion.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the question of House business, this is a matter for negotiation between House leaders and is not for me to decide. I think that hon. members opposite in the past 12 days of debate on the bill have indicated that they have a good deal to say, even without having seen the amendments, which are mainly of a technical nature.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Except on co-ops.

Mr. Benson: With respect to ruling upon the appropriateness of amendments, it is not my duty to do this but, rather, the duty of the Chair as I present the amendments one by one. I am not putting myself in the position of the Speaker. It is the Speaker's duty to decide whether an amendment falls within the context of the resolution, and I respectfully leave this question to him.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I apprehend what the minister has said. I understand his feeling about this matter, but we must look at it from the viewpoint of the members—and I like to think I speak for the members in this House, including those on the other side.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw any intention I had to speak for members on the other side. First we had appendix A, then we had the bill and now we have a large list of amendments being filed. The minister indicated, when he opened his remarks on clause 1, that other amendments were being considered. We look away into the horizon and we see amendment after amendment after amendment coming forward.

Mr. Benson: Have you got any?

Mr. Baldwin: We have lots of amendments. Our approach to the bill is based on what we know of it. It is a difficult enough bill for any ordinary Member of Parliament to consider, to say nothing of the poor, harassed taxpayer. Our approach to this matter must be conditioned by the final version of the bill. Some of us have struggled, sweated and slaved to try to familiarize ourselves, to at least a limited extent within our competence, with what the bill means. Now we are told it is going to be changed. The minister says they are technical changes. From my experience with the minister's department, technical changes may be exceedingly important changes.

Of course, the minister can force us to go ahead with the bill; the government calls the shot on House business. But the speeches that some of us would like to make on clause 1 will to an extent be conditioned by what appears in the small print of these amendments. I say that as kindly as I can to the minister. I realize his problem.

When we get to the end of this study the bill may be hardly recognizable when compared with its original form. But apart from that, there are a number of items on the order paper crying aloud for attention. Surely the minister would not concede too much in agreeing to a limited amount of time to study the amendments. We will work this out between the House leaders, I hope, and decide how long we should take to familiarize ourselves with the amendments and at the same time proceed with other legislative items which the government must have considered important otherwise it would not have placed them on the order paper.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the order of business has been called for today. We will proceed with the order of business. I know how able the honorable member is in dealing with the government House leader, and I assume he would immediately rise from his place and meet with the House leader if he felt so strongly about proceeding with other items.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, why should I do that when the minister says we will proceed with the business as outlined?

Mr. Benson: I said, for today.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I must protest most vehemently to the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Hon. members opposite are sitting under a blanket of ignorance. They have not opened up the bill to really study it. They have not looked at these amendments. The mere putting of the two together will take more than half a day for persons who are used to doing this type of thing, let alone for other hon. members. Hon. members opposite can sit and smirk all they want, but what I am interested in is an intelligent discussion of the bill. I am not making this suggestion merely out of a desire to postpone consideration of the bill; I just want to go ahead with an intelligent discussion of it.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Osler: You have had ten days already.

Mr. Horner: There goes the wheat germ kid.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We know the superior member from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler)—when he opens his mouth he shows us the vacant space between his ears, that is all. In so far as this bill is concerned and the technical provisions therein, I say with all courtesy—I have suggested this to the minister already—that this is the wrong way to go about it. We hope some of the government members will participate in this debate and will not act like rubber stamps or baa'ing sheep with regard to it, because they have not been briefed more than anybody else. We know that the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs is also considering familiarization programs in respect of the bill. I am making the suggestion in order to be helpful and not merely to be—

Mr. Blair: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. the hon. member rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and myself are old friends. I am sure I misunderstood the purport of his remarks. I think it is offensive to the rules of the House for any hon. member to suggest, as he appeared to a minute ago, that members on this side of the House have any need to familiarize themselves—

An hon. Member: He is right.

Mr. Blair: —with this bill and that we are not prepared to take an intelligent part in the debate.

Mr. Alexander: Where are your senior members?

Mr. Blair: I shall deal with the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) at a later stage. All I have suggested, Mr. Speaker, is that many members of this House have a deep and abiding interest in the question of taxation in all its facets. I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton West, who is going to take a leading role in this debate, would not wish to get it off on the wrong tack by suggesting that he and his colleagues are the only ones who are interested and who have studied the bill.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There are poles on the fence line behind you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has before it a point of order, and the hon. member who has just resumed his seat raised a question of privilege. I think the matter of preparedness for debate and willingness to debate is generally a matter of argument or opinion among hon. members on both sides of the House. Before the Chair recognizes other hon. members I think I should ask the House whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has leave to table the amendments and that they be printed as an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that we have agreed to that, may I say a brief word on two other points that have been raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). First with respect to the question of what we do tomorrow, I think it might be best to have that matter referred to a meeting of the House leaders and it can be argued there. I expect there is no objection to spending the rest of today on a general discussion of clause 1.

With respect to the question raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West of whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) can give the assurance that all the amendments he has tabled today are within the terms of the curative motion that we passed a while ago, I suggest, with respect to my good friend who sits near me, that I would not be satisfied just for the minister to tell me that his amendments are all in order. That is for the House to decide either itself or through a decision of the Chair.

It is a good thing that the hon. member raised this point. I would not want it to be assumed that because the Minister of Finance is permitted to table these resolutions today, they are automatically in order. It may be a job for the Chair and the table to go over them—they will know this bill by heart, whether the rest of us do or not—or it may be a question of our having to examine those amendments which we feel are out of order, as we come to them. They may establish some interesting precedents. Indeed, if the minister is able to go beyond the terms of what we have already agreed to as constituted in the resolution, maybe some of us who are private members will be able to do the same thing.

Mr. Woolliams: I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) Mr. Speaker. As I understand it, there are close to 100 amendments and some are very substantial. Debate will either be serious wherein we perform, as the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) says, a deep and abiding role, or it will be a farce. This is not an ordinary group of amendments changing a few adverbs and prepositions: as I understand it, they are substantial amendments.

When it is just a question of printing, surely Your Honour has the power to order how it shall be done. I have not a copy of the amendments, though perhaps our spokesman has one. There is a copy on the other side of the chamber, but we do not have the amendments and I cannot see how we can proceed with this debate without them. If we do, it will become a farce.

Surely we can go on to some other business today. Surely the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) can be reasonable. I think that with a little consideration he and his parliamentary secretary could bring on other business.

The House leaders could then meet and solve the problem, rather than getting into a procedural argument now. In my time in the House I have never seen anything like this, 100 amendments being proposed to a bill of 707 pages and the House asked to take an intelligent view of them this afternoon. It would turn this whole debate into a complete farce. If that is the kind of debate the Minister of Finance is entertaining, members on this side have a different view.

Mr. Benson: It might be difficult for the hon. member to take an intelligent view in any circumstances, Mr. Speaker. We have tabled these amendments at the request of the opposition, rather than introducing them one amendment at a time as we proceed through the bill. In order to facilitate matters, we have introduced them all at once. There was no compulsion to do this; we have done it in order to be co-operative, and now we are hearing complaints.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to discuss the respective intelligence of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), though I would be happy to do so at another time. However, I do not think this is the place to do it, and I hardly think it is the place for the Minister of Finance to do it either. He says he is doing this as a favour. Mr. Speaker, he has introduced a great number of amendments—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Ninety-five.

Mr. Stanfield: —to a very complex bill, amendments which as far as we know have a significant bearing on the bill. Why does he insist on being—excuse the word—so bull-headed in proceeding with the matter this afternoon rather than giving members of the House an opportunity to examine the amendments he has in mind? We should have an opportunity to see if the amendments change the bill significantly, to see to what extent they are technical, as he says they are, and to what extent they are substantial, as I expect a number of them will turn out to be. If the minister wants to proceed, he has his troops on that side of the House and he can go ahead—if that is the way he wants to pass tax legislation in this country, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Arrogant.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we need upset ourselves too much. Obviously, for the balance of today everyone is prepared to deal with the tax bill and it would be inefficient and unsatisfactory at this juncture to switch to another item. It is my understanding that the first 17 pages of the bill are not affected by the amendments. If the traditional practice had been observed, of introducing amendments when the clause to be amended is reached, we would have proceeded today with the first 17 pages before any amendment was called. I suggest that perhaps it would be useful if we were to proceed at least through the first 17 pages before putting the amendments, and thus not waste our time.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With reference to the suggestion of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), hon. members may recall that there was general agreement earlier that there would be what was described as a first round of debate with the House in committee of the whole. Such a suggestion was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I think it was generally agreed to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert); then possibly for the remainder of the day a general discussion could proceed and in the interval the House leaders could meet and take up the question raised by hon. members. Is it the wish of hon. members that we proceed on that basis?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: On division.

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, as the minister himself said a few moments ago, the whole of this tax bill is very complex and some of it is vague. The minister's remarks have been substantiated by tax lawyers and tax experts from one end of the country to the other. Most of these gentlemen who are learned in the subject have not yet found the answers to all the cross-references in the bill. One of the effects of this has been the continuation of uncertainty in the business community, an uncertainty which has led to lack of business expansion. Everybody is marking time because everybody wants to find out what some of the clauses of the bill mean. That may be made evident during the discussions at our committee stage. Until people find out what certain clauses mean, there will be a standstill in business expansion.

This afternoon the minister brought in 95 amendments and suggested that most of them are very technical. Perhaps they are. But he said that some of them are substantive, particularly those dealing with co-operatives and credit unions. Since there are more credit unions, per capita, in my constituency than in any other constituency in Canada, I, for one, no doubt along with many other hon. members on all sides of the House, am keenly interested in what will be the effects of such amendments.

I want to make a substantial part of my remarks this afternoon about credit unions and the originally proposed tax changes concerning credit unions. I am glad the minister has decided to make some changes for the better and I am sure that hon. members on all sides of the House will agree with me. The minister has come under quite a bit of pressure in this regard and he may have guessed that he would come under much more pressure in this House if he did not make changes with respect to the taxing of credit unions. However, we are still very much in the dark. I do not have a copy of the amendments and none of my colleagues, except the financial spokesman of our party, has a copy of them.

Although I carefully listened to the minister, and although the proposed changes may be helpful, I submit that before we can make really appropriate remarks about the changes they will have to be examined carefully by senior, experienced officials of the credit union movement across Canada. On the basis of a few moments hearsay it is pretty difficult for anybody, even for some backbenchers of the government party, to discuss these matters intelligently.

There are a number of items, of course, which we should like to discuss in detail. Perhaps I could deal with some of them briefly in passing. I refer to such matters as the increased tax rates on small businesses, which the minister mentioned previously and the proposed capital cost allowance which will affect the housing industry in Canada and agriculture because of the basic herd system changes. Perhaps some of the amendments deal with these matters. They are important, Mr. Chairman. However, since we will have an opportunity, I suppose, to speak again, because we are in committee of the whole, perhaps some of the matters which we should like to speak on this afternoon could be left until the appropriate clauses are discussed.

I repeat that I am glad to see that the minister has voluntarily made changes for the better with respect to the taxation of credit unions. I know that a great many of my colleagues thought—perhaps not all—that the original proposals were unfair. Myself and a good many members on all sides of the House were entirely opposed to the original changes regarding the tax on credit unions. They were inequitable and crude and struck a death blow at an institution that has done much to help ordinary people help themselves. As most hon. members no doubt know, most of the work done by credit union members is voluntary. The credit unions have taken many innocent victims out of the hands of the loan sharks. They have a great place in Canadian society and I am glad the minister has to some degree recognized this fact. We shall better understand the amendments after we have had a chance to study the newly proposed tax changes with respect to credit unions.

Notwithstanding any technical or substantive changes the minister may have made in this bill, the legislation as proposed still ignores one thing—the principle of growth as it relates to the budget. Of course, a budget can do a number of things. It can promote equity in our society. That, I understand, is what the minister's budget purports to do. This is very important. In the main, proposals such as exempting people in the lower income brackets from income tax are very commendable. We all agree with them. Nevertheless, budgets are supposed to do other things as well as making our society more equitable. They are supposed to raise money. These provisions will certainly raise a great deal more money. Nobody knows quite how much more. Some people estimate that the government will raise about $100 million more, others that it will raise between $500 million and $600 million more. We are not told what this money is for. Perhaps it is for more staff for the Prime Minister or for the ministry—who knows? In any event, we need an explanation as to where this money will go. Some people think this extra money will be spent in different regions of our country. We shall have to wait and see.

A budget is also supposed to promote growth in the economy. Some people put it much more simply; they say that instead of dividing one small melon into smaller and smaller pieces for everybody, it might be better to make the melon grow so that everybody can have a little more. That aspect of the budget, namely, the incentive for growth in the economy, in business, has been almost completely ignored. Only the equity principle seems to prevail.

In this regard it is clear that the London School of Economics and its patron saint, the late Lord Keynes, apparently have had a tremendous influence on our Department of Finance. I studied economics at two institutions during the 1930s and know that the "in" thing was to accept the Keynesian view that the equity principle was of overriding virtue. That may have been true of society in England in the 1930s because growth in that economy was not the paramount thing. The U.K. economy at that time was stagnant and any change in it would have been a change for the better. Unfortunately, some people who have been trained in a certain school of economics accept the principles of that school as dogma, no matter what changes may occur as to time and place. At present the gross national product of Canada is lagging far behind that of other industrialized countries. At the same time, our country has enormous resources and great room for expansion.

Canada should be wanting an expansionist economy. Instead of that, we are not treated to anything but the principles of equity. In other words, we are keeping the small melon and dividing it into smaller and smaller pieces, instead of making the melon grow bigger or having two or three melons. There is nothing like that in the budget. If the government were wise it would ask some of its financial advisers to shake themselves out of the principles of equity. You cannot ignore something that is absolutely essential. The government should tell them to take off Lord Keynes' mantle and the mantle of the London School of Economics generally and do a little rethinking. If they cannot do that, the government had better get rid of them.

I cannot help making a passing comment with regard to the policies apparently promoted by colleagues to my left, the members of the New Democratic Party. The white paper proposals eventually came out after modifications which are involved in this tax bill. As I understand it, the present financial spokesman for that group stated that the only thing wrong was that they did not go far enough.

Mr. Orlikow: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: I am glad to hear one of the members of that party say, "Hear, hear". I thought it may have been the financial critic. It was very much like the remarks made the other day by the Ontario leader of the New Democratic Party. If he had his way the pulp and paper mills would be taxed right out of business. How that would help unemployment, I do not know.

Mr. Orlikow: When did he say that?

Mr. Nesbitt: I heard that the other morning on a paid radio advertisement for the New Democratic Party. He said his party would greatly increase taxes on corporations, the pulp and paper industry in particular. If any industry in Canada is on the ropes today, it is that one. There are a great many reasons, some of which cannot be controlled. That is hardly a sensible thing. If you kill the goose that lays the golden egg, or plow the field in which the melons are growing, you will not have much of an economy.

Business incentives are particularly important because of the continuous rise in unemployment and the inflation we have suffered over the last few years. It is even more important today than a month ago because of the United States surtax on the importation of many of our products. Because of this surtax the present tax bill, even with the amendments, is outdated and unrealistic. It is almost like reading a document of the Medes and Persians.

The minister would be very wise to withdraw this bill. He should have his experts go over it in light of the American actions. This government does not seem to have much affect on the United States and apparently has not been very successful in getting the surtax removed. The government should withdraw the bill until it knows what they are doing or what arrangements they can make with the United States, or deal with parts of it that are not directly affected by the surtax. In any event, it becomes more and more important every day to do something to stimulate our economy. Otherwise more and more plants will close every day. Not only that, but more incentives are needed to encourage Canadians to invest in Canadian equity securities.

The problem of foreign investment in Canada is a very serious one. Many people talk about it and are against it, usually for the wrong reasons. But there are some pretty cogent reasons for Canadians to be worried about foreign investment in this country. In these proposals the minister has at least done one good thing. He has no longer made it more favourable for American investors to purchase Canadian concerns. That anomaly has been removed in the minister's proposals. Despite this very favourable change, in most cases it is still better for Canadians and Canadian corporations to invest in safe Canadian securities, namely, bonds or in United States equity stocks. You can get a higher rate of return because of the growth aspect of American securities.

If there ever was a time in the history of our country when something should be done to promote Canadian ownership and participation in our equity securities, it is now. Everyone is concerned about the rate of foreign investment, not only by the United States but by other countries.

We have these tax proposals and the new amendments. There does not seem to be anything to radically improve the situation. There is one improvement which I have noted. I will not go into the details of the clause, but it is still more advantageous for the average Canadian and many Canadian companies to invest in United States securities because they will get a better return from them as a result of the present tax proposals.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer. Economic problems in Canada have been aggravated by the United States surtax. There is no question about that. Nevertheless, the government—the Prime Minister in particular—are now trying to blame the United States for all our problems. This is nonsense. The problems are economic. They have been steadily growing in Canada over the past two or three years. Not all the blame can be placed on the government; there are other outside sources, such as world conditions and the like. However, many of the problems we have today, such as inflation and high unemployment, can be laid directly on the doorstep of the government and nobody else.

It is true that the government receives its economic advice from the Department of Finance and elsewhere. It goes into some of the Keynesian philosophy on the business cycle. Things are different now. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are the captains of the ship. If things go wrong, they must accept the blame. Suddenly trying to put the blame on the United States for everything that has happened is utter nonsense.

One of the reasons we have had trouble with the United States is the attitude of this government. This has been apparent on numerous occasions without any rhyme, reason or cause. There may be something very deep down in the mind of the Prime Minister—who knows? However, it seems that the Prime Minister in particular, and the cabinet in general have gone out of their way to aggravate, annoy and antagonize the United States, our principal ally and trading partner. I will give some examples of this. During his recent visit to the Soviet Union, the Prime Minister blithely stated that we wanted to get closer to the Soviet Union because of the military threat to Canada from the United States. The daily anti-American barrage from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation reaches large parts of the United States. In the United States that corporation is generally regarded as being government controlled. We know that nothing like that ever happens, but that is what takes place.

A number of cabinet ministers are either warning and welcoming the United States. There is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who I am sorry is not here today. I hope he is recovering from his illness. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is also leading the American attack by making offensive, tough speeches in the United States. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce welcome them. It is no small wonder that people in the United States wonder where in the h—- we are going. Two ministers say one thing and two apparently equally prominent ministers say the opposite.

Toronto is the one place in Canada that probably does not need much foreign capital because it already has plenty of it. The former liberal finance minister, Walter Gordon, a group of Toronto University professors and others who manage to get a lot of publicity, talk about United States investment in Canada. In some cases they have pretty good arguments, but many are for the wrong reasons.

Then there is our defence policy. Although this is not economic, it affects the American attitude. There are also our cuts in NATO expenditures and our defence attitude toward the United States. Then there is our China policy at the United Nations. As I recall it, in the course of the last election the Secretary of State for External Affairs said it would certainly achieve nothing to have Taiwan expelled from the United Nations. But the tune has changed now. We used to hear about British or American domination of our foreign policy. Nowadays it is dominated by Red China, because apparently nothing we do goes without their say-so. Unless we agree with all China's conditions we shall not get their approval. I think it would be a very good thing to recognize Red China at the United Nations, but I do not see what is accomplished by excluding Taiwan.

• (4:00 p.m.)

An hon. Member: A bogus country.

Mr. Nesbitt: Somebody said it is a bogus country. It is not the government of Mainland China, but certainly it is a de facto country. Speaking about bogus nations at the United Nations, what about the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, or Byelorussia? One of the delegates at the United Nations told me that their foreign office consisted of one room in a grocery store in Minsk. Where we see evidence of this type of double-standard of morality at the United Nations, some of the pious platitudes we hear from certain quarters of this House and elsewhere become a little disgusting. I suppose that if Taiwan, by some miracle, became a Communist country, we should not hear that sort of thing; there would be impassioned claims that it was entitled to a seat.

The Chairman: Order. The Chair has so far been able to follow the hon. member, but perhaps the thread of relevancy is a little thin. I would ask the hon. member to turn to the bill before us.

Mr. Nesbitt: I thank Your Honour for bringing the matter to my attention. I was merely referring to the government's China policy at the United Nations and suggesting that perhaps it was not pleasing the United States administration. The government has apparently gone out of its way to antagonize the United States. The matters at issue are not of great importance to this country. People on the government side are pulling feathers out of the eagle's tail for the hell of it, so to speak, and the result is that now, when some Americans feel that tough economic rules have become necessary, they do not listen with a very open ear to objections from this country, as they might have done in other circumstances.

A week or two ago a number of Congressmen visited this country. One of them was reported to have said, "You people don't want to co-operate with us any more; you want to go your own way. Why, then, are you running around asking for special favours from us?" I do not think that is the attitude they should take, but one cannot blame many Americans for feeling this way, bearing in mind all the occasions upon which this government has gone out of its way to antagonize the United States.

Whether we like it or not, we are tied to the Americans and we must make an attempt to bring about a general reconciliation with that country before we can hope to get at least the surtax removed. For a long time we have been taking pot-shots at the United States. Now they are starting to do the same thing to us. It is like the situation in Europe before the First World War—countries drifting aimlessly into a major war. There is no question here of a military war, but we are drifting toward an economic war which is unthinkable, and we must do something about it.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Chairman, like most members of this House I like to think of myself as a humanitarian. When I look up into the press gallery and see that great array with arms on chin, I wonder how much attention is being paid to this debate, to the amendments which came in today and to the fact that in so much of this discussion we have been concerned about details which by and large do not reflect the aspirations of the ordinary people of Canada and do not really deal with their interests in any direct way.

The other day I was talking to one of my constituents. He was asking me about the income tax changes. I said there were over 700 pages in the bill. His reaction was, "All for little me? Do you mean I am so terribly complicated that my affairs, the money I make, the less than $6,000 I earn, the few deductions I am allowed for my children, require over 700 pages of legislation?" The answer, of course, is obvious. Scarcely anything in this legislation deals with the affairs of the ordinary people of this country. Virtually the entire legislation is taken up with attempts to deal with the shenanigans of business and the way in which business affairs are arranged, or with the affairs of the wealthy and the management of their estates.

Rather than attempt to bring in a simpler taxation system which would deal in an equitable way with the affairs of all our taxpayers, we have chosen to accept the continuance of an inequitable system, codifying it again and going through complex gyrations in order to accommodate particular interests and, possibly, to make its impact somewhat less onerous.

This is the situation with which we are dealing. To realize this fact one has only to consider the evidence given before the committee which was set up to consider this subject. Where were the representatives of the multitudes of Canadians, appearing to state their case in favour of tax reform? Mr. Chairman, virtually the entire proceedings were taken up by the special pleadings of representatives of those in Canada who have always had it made. Representatives of every major industry, every major interest, appeared, with few exceptions, to put forward their case. They were perfectly entitled to do so. I am not saying they should not have appeared or that they should not have been heard. But their presence was indicative of the tax system as it exists. If we were concerned with the affairs of the ordinary person, our taxation system could be greatly simplified—the bill could run to 50 pages and still be more than adequate.

But this is not the point of view we have adopted. We are continuing to take the attitude that business knows best and that the role of government is to accommodate itself to the business system, making sure that none of the structures which have been built up in the business world are altered in any significant way. I believe this approach is wrong. Not that I think business is wrong: I believe there is a legitimate place for business, as there is for many of the things which are done in our society. But the majority of the people in a democracy—and, after all, in a democracy they are supposed to get some consideration—are being ignored. The debate in this House is irrelevant for that reason.

The kind of subjects we shall be talking about, the type of housekeeping amendments which have been introduced, probably do not affect more than 1 per cent of the population. Perhaps with the exception of the changes in the situation of the credit unions, nothing of any significance is taking place as far as the basic preoccupations of the people are concerned. It is not technical matters which are important in this context, but ideas requiring political judgment, value judgments, in an attempt to ensure that as far as possible our tax system is based on equity. I hope that as this debate proceeds we can focus attention on the detail which emerges from our clause by clause study in such a way as to show that the present tax system is grossly unfair.

When I look at this bill I think of the way members of this House feel and the feelings of the people I represent. I am sure this reflects the feelings of the majority of the people in Canada. The wage and salary earners of this country look at the proposed tax system represented by Bill C-259 with a view of what it will do for them. It will do precious little for them. It does include a long overdue increase in exemptions, but this does little more than put us back into the position of 12 or 14 years ago. It does not solve some of the problems that exist.

We in this party have pointed out on many occasions that our wage and salary earners are being grossly discriminated against. An individual who derives his income in the form of dividends or returns on capital investment is in a preferred position. The wage earner has to pay tax on his entire income. The wage earner is not only discriminated against because he must pay tax on his entire income; he is discriminated against to the extent that someone else does not pay his full share. These individuals have to pay a higher share because others are required to pay a lower share. This system is destroying the economy of our country.

We are in a critical period in respect of trade and the discriminatory practices recently imposed by the United States. We do not blame the United States for what is essentially a problem in respect of our own economy. If we want to see the problem clearly we have only to look at our old tax system and the continuation of its provisions in Bill C-259. Throughout the history of Canada our tax system has been devised to stimulate the export of raw materials. It has been designed to provide concessions in the way of depletion allowances and tax holidays for new mines. The mining industry pays only a fraction of the tax it should pay and only a fraction of what is being paid by the manufacturing industries in this country. As a result we are inducing people to go into this industry to a greater extent than the normal market forces would dictate, certainly to a greater extent than any sensible or national policy would indicate.

We are faced with a situation in which we are exporting raw materials and importing manufactured goods. When we attempt to export manufactured goods, our greatest exporting customer, representing more than 70 per cent of our export market, says it does not want them and takes discriminatory measures. That market will accept our raw materials and is very glad to do so. It is also happy that we continue a tax system which encourages the export of raw materials. The effect of this policy is to provide an enormous bonus to U.S. residents and the U.S. government. Canada is a very good source of cheap raw materials and profits for foreign investment.

We might think this was not the situation a few years ago, but that is not the case. One might think that among the amendments suggested by the government we would find one to remove the exemptions and the depletion allowances granted resource industries. Such an amendment would have indicated clearly to everyone that Canada no longer intends to continue being a source of raw materials for another country.

In the report of the Science Council of Canada it is stated in startling terms that Canada cannot be both things, a manufacturing country and a developer of raw materials. We must make a choice. This government in its tax bill has made a choice. We are to be an exporter of raw materials. This is the reason we got into the present mess. I am surprised there is not an amendment to wipe out the concessions to resource industries. We in this party intend to take a very strong position in urging the government to realize that this nation is being destroyed by its tax policies. The government should realize that the economy of this country is being frustrated by the continuation of special privileges to the mining and oil industries.

My remarks have been reasonably brief and I conclude on this point. As has been pointed out by many members of this House, the bill before us seems to be more concerned with a minority of people in this country who are engaged in business. We are taking part in an elaborate charade to satisfy this small, vested interest which has been receiving concessions over the years. It is time we paid more attention to the problems of the vast majority of Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Chairman, I want to speak now on behalf of all my fellow citizens who are just as puzzled as we are by the lengthy bill we are to study clause by clause today.

Mr. Chairman, I feel there is a fundamental principle we should stop to consider. It is sometimes advisable and often even urgent to make changes, but this should not be done merely for the sake of change. I fail to see why, in the prevailing economic chaos, facing the tremendous problems that come up in the fiscal field, there should be such irrational haste to bring about massive changes at one fell swoop.

If the study has really been made in depth before bringing in these changes, we certainly would not be witnessing this situation where the government itself does not understand the techniques and changes involved in its own bill. Suffice it to consider the great number of amendments that the minister himself has just tabled to prove this point as well as the large number of errors that have to be corrected.

It is obvious, Mr. Chairman, that the government hastened to make these changes as a result of the economic chaos that we are experiencing. It seems that the government has taken this action because of the need for it, because elections are coming, in order to throw something in the eyes of the people to fascinate them. But, since the odd provisions of this bill that could really help some of our fellow citizens are submerged under all kinds of other items which will bring in with one hand what has been given out by the other, therefore, we must admit that the minister is throwing dust in our eyes.

The whole solution to Canadian tax problems proposed in Bill C-259 is inappropriate. That is why several of the previous speakers pointed it out. This new omnibus bill of an economic nature is a mistake, as was the first one, in the sense that members cannot vote on the whole contents of the bill. There are in it good provisions from which we would like the population to benefit, but it also contains provisions unworthy of any consideration which revolt many Canadians.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Some provisions aim at destroying economic organizations. None the less, we shall be asked to vote on the whole thing. If we vote for it, several sectors of society will blame us for having accepted, for instance, that savings and mutual funds be taxed as credit unions, and if we vote against it, those who would benefit from a more appropriate tax exemption will say that we voted against them.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, that is what I call an unfair tactic, to compel us to remain puzzled in the presence of an abundance of tax amendments that are submitted in an off-hand manner.

So, Mr. Chairman, I believe some order should have prevailed. One or more bills should have been introduced immediately to deal with the most urgent problems. The measures of benefit to the low-income groups, the millions of Canadians whose income is not sufficient to give them the minimum of comfort to which they should normally be entitled, especially in a rich country like Canada, should have been introduced first of all. Consequently, this economic omnibus bill could have been passed in sections. In this way, hon. members could have followed the dictates of their conscience and there could have been some control over each one of the changes proposed in this bill.

If we always let ourselves get mired in such legislative proposals, Mr. Chairman, we are accepting a second principle which is false, that Parliament can always try later to correct the errors we are making today. For my part, I believe that we should today take the time to pass legislation of which the scope is known, not only for the time being, but at least for a reasonable period of time.

And yet, I am sure that such a bill, with the clauses that it contains, will pretty soon compel this Parliament to come back to these same subjects. All the more because what is needed is not only small changes about various tax items, but a genuine comprehensive reform of the whole economic system under which we struggle along.

So, I think that instead of wasting time burdening us with this bill, the government should have taken that time to consider seriously the economic and fiscal proposals which would truly bring about a far reaching, if not final, solution.

Mr. Chairman, the members of the Social Credit party are always ready to assist the government in its investigations and studies, in order to find effective remedies to apply to our entire tax system. This is why we are sorry to see Parliament waste valuable time trying to make some changes, while we would have every opportunity to deal with real causes and take proper remedial steps.

All manufacturers, businessmen and those more especially interested in our economic development, will, as a result of the coming into effect of this new legislation, also waste time, because to complete their income tax returns, they will need a lot of skill in their operations, daily, monthly or yearly. They will constantly wonder to what extent they are working for themselves or for their fellow citizens, knowing that under such a law they are forced to work first and foremost for the government.

Mr. Chairman, that is an extraordinary weakness: it will undermine the interest of our industrialists, their zest and dynamism, so that before long the problem we had tried to solve will have grown worse once again and we will have to reform the tax system.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, I wished to speak early in the debate, and express what the people in my riding and the rest of Quebec, as well as Canada as a whole, think of the bill before the House.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The hon. member was saying a moment ago that he represented the opinion of Quebec. I think that I have a bit of advice for him. I strongly urge him to limit himself to his own point of view, because in the course of his remarks, which I intently followed, he has completely overlooked to mention that 750,000 low-income taxpayers will be exempt from taxation, and that more than 1,250,000 will benefit from tax deductions under the new tax bill.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, I believe that the hon. member has been very attentive, but he must have had a lapse at one point or another because I did say that the bill contained some very good provisions for the people and that I would then feel inclined to vote in favour of such reforms. Unfortunately, it also contains provisions which run counter to the interests of Canada and against which I have to vote. This is precisely why I showed that this bill would have been better divided into several bills, Then I would have been able to shout "yes" to the things I just mentioned to my hon. colleague.

[English]

Mr. Murta: Mr. Chairman, I would like to briefly touch upon five aspects of the tax legislation which I think are pertinent to my riding as well as to a great many ridings in western Canada. These areas are the estate and gift taxes which have an effect on the provinces, the farmers as they will be treated under the tax legislation, the co-operatives and the tax reforms with respect to them, which have been touched upon by a good many speakers, and the credit unions as the tax legislation may affect them. I am happy that the amendments were tabled today. Perhaps some of the topics about which I will be talking will have been dealt with in the amendments. In any event, I feel that my views and criticisms of this legislation are justified.

In my view and that of most interested Canadians, the tax bill is a wholly incomplete and inadequate reform of our tax system. The process has cost millions of dollars directly, and far more in terms of the uncertainty and hesitancy in the economy at this time. For what it has cost, this tax bill with its amendments, with which we will be dealing later this week or the first part of next week, has been a very poor buy. I believe that the tax legislation as brought out fails completely to reform federal tax activities. I think it fails to reform tax sharing and integration with the provinces and it fails to provide greater equity for middle income taxpayers. It continues to tax the poor and it fails to apply a tax credit rather than exemption systems to assist more effectively low income Canadians. It fails to simplify the language and draftsmanship of taxation. No attempt is made to reform tax collection under this legislation.

In dealing with the estate and gift tax as I see it, the decision of the federal government to get out of estate and gift taxes entirely as of December 31, 1971, has been strongly criticized as irresponsible and unfair to the provinces, a danger to orderly taxing Canada and another act in favour of the privileged at the expense of middle income Canadians.

Mr. Mahoney: That is the position of the government of Manitoba. Is it that of the Conservatives also?

Mr. Murta: The proposal means an immediate loss of provincial revenues and further tax competition between the provinces. Last year the federal government paid out $60.4 million as their share of the federal estate tax. Seven of the provinces receive from Ottawa 75 per cent of this tax when collected. Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia have their own succession duties. The removal of this source of revenue for seven provinces will be detrimental to all provinces, and all the provinces are complaining.

The former Premier of Ontario, Mr. John Robarts, has said that the federal decision to eliminate death taxes puts the provinces in the difficult position of having to maintain a tax on wealth until the capital gains tax system matures. He said:

> Far from reform, this approach simply encourages and perhaps makes inevitable internal balkanization and tax competition between competing tax jurisdictions—surely just what any program of true reform should be trying to avoid.

At the finance ministers' conference in June and at the premiers' conference in July, the provinces appealed to the federal government to amend this proposal to remove estate and gift taxes on December 31, 1971. So far, the Minister of Finance has refused. I say "so far" because I have not had a chance to see the amendments. The effect on the provinces is that the validity and success of this tax reform bill is very much compromised by the lack of comprehension and co-operation of governments toward the tax problems and functions of the provinces. The government has, I believe, failed to introduce a tax reform measure that integrates the taxing functions and resources of the three levels of government. Also, it has reduced rather than expanded the taxing base of the provinces. Thirdly, it has put in doubt provincial revenues for the next five years.

The Canadian Manufacturers Association expressed its alarm about the lack of provincial co-ordination involved in the tax act in its August 26, 1971, brief as follows:

> The effect of the proposed corporate and personal income tax rates depends greatly on the action which the provinces may take. With respect to personal income taxes, the impact on the individual which has been calculated and shown in the tables in the summary of 1971 tax reform legislation depends on the provinces imposing a tax of 30 per cent of federal tax. The proposed reduction in corporation income tax rates depends on the provinces not changing their corporation income tax rates. The intended 33 1/3 per cent tax credit with respect to dividends from taxable Canadian corporations will only be given full effect if the provinces adopt a corresponding credit.
> Some of the provinces have expressed concern about the proposed elimination of federal estate and gift taxes on January 1, 1972. They have indicated that this proposal will not only create inequities between the taxation of existing wealth accumulations and future wealth accumulations but will thrust the burden of readjustment, if provincial revenue loss is to be avoided, entirely onto the provinces.
> All these factors require co-ordination of federal and provincial tax policies and make an assessment of the economic impact of the proposed legislation difficult. At the same time, we are concerned that the intention of the Ontario government to give tax credits for provincial sales tax and municipal taxes and not to provide the 15 per cent additional capital cost allowance introduced by the federal government in its December, 1970, budget, are indicative of a trend toward separate provincial tax administrations and policies. Such a trend is, we think, most undesirable and we urge the federal government to co-ordinate tax policy and administration with the provinces.

• (4:40 p.m.)

An area I would like to deal with at some length is the way the taxation proposals will affect farmers and agricultural producers not only of western Canada but of all Canada. Farmers and fishermen will continue to calculate income on a cash basis and retain special averaging provisions. The basic herd and straight line depreciation provisions have been phased out. Livestock farmers will be able to establish basic herds as of December 31, 1971, but no additions may be made to the basic herds after that date. When livestock is sold after December 31, the farmer may consider the sale as being out of the basic herd or the other herd, but the legislation requires that the sale reduces the basic herd when the total livestock on hand is less than the remaining total of the basic herd itself.

Straight line depreciation will continue to be available for assets acquired before the new system starts. Depreciation will be calculated on a diminishing balance system for assets acquired after December 31, 1971. Assets depreciated on a straight line basis subsequently sold for more than the original cost on valuation day will be considered to be a capital gain.

What this means in common terminology is that if a farmer traded in a John Deer tractor that was fully depreciated, on a new model, under today's system if his tractor were valued by the dealer as being worth $7,000 trade-in, this amount would be considered as income and subject to capital gains tax. The farmer would then pay his going rate of income tax of 50 per cent on $7,000, which in this case, depending on the farmer's income, would amount to at least another $700 tax.

Capital gains tax will also affect the land value of farms. In the budget the minister trades a capital gains tax for the estate tax. At present any farm land valued at less than $100,000 is free of estate tax. Under a capital gains tax, if the land increases in value from valuation day onward a farmer pays his going rate of income tax of 50 per cent on the increased value. He then has the privilege of averaging out his income over five years. However, this will still affect many farmers throughout Canada, particularly farmers in Saskatchewan and Alberta where 75 per cent of the estate tax was paid back to the state by those provinces. It will also affect many small farm holdings in the Maritime provinces, and possibly also in Quebec.

Today, if the farmer sees a chance to sell his farm at a profit, as long as he can convince the tax department that he is not in the real estate business any capital gain he may receive is completely tax free. Throughout a farmer's lifetime he may change his farm three or four times, preferably at a profit. Now, with the price of land going up the way it has over the past 20 years, on every one of those occasions he will have to pay a capital gains tax.

These are some of the salient facts which convince me that the budget does little for the agricultural industry. It is also particularly detrimental to co-operatives and hobby farmers and is of no real benefit under the change in the partnership, capital cost allowances for many of the father and son and brother combinations within the agricultural industry. In my opinion, the most detrimental and devastating feature of the budget with respect to the agricultural industry is the capital gains tax. I believe that for western Canada it is a discriminatory tax and I say that we from western Canada should in no way allow this kind of tax to be placed on our holdings.

Another area I would like to touch on briefly is that of co-operatives and how they are affected by this tax reform legislation. I understand this matter has been covered by a good many hon. members but I would like to touch on it briefly. From letters received and interviews granted, we know that co-operatives are very disturbed by the provisions of clause 135 which retain the requirement that prior to the payment of any patronage refunds, income must be allocated to the capital of co-operatives on the basis of a fixed percentage of "capital employed by the taxpayer at the commencement of the taxation year." This has the effect of severely interfering with the freedom and ability of co-operatives to distribute their earnings as patronage refunds. This required allocation is based on the assumption that co-operatives must have corporate income, although in fact they may not have because the same is regarded as properly payable by the co-ops to their members as patronage refunds.

Co-operatives find the allocation of income to capital unreasonable and illogical and view the "capital employed" concept as a form of discriminatory treatment with no similar provision appearing in the proposed tax act affecting other methods of doing business. Co-operatives have pointed out that with the removal of the exemption from taxation of the income of a newly incorporated co-operative for the first three years of its operation, and with the proposed "capital employed" formula contained in clause 135, which has the effect of reducing patronage refunds, it would be most difficult for new co-operatives to be incorporated to service the needs of their members.

The amendments to the Income Tax Act as they affect credit unions are somewhat similar to those with respect to co-ops. They will be taxed in a manner similar to co-operatives in that a deduction will be allowed in computing income for payments made to members pursuant to "allocations in proportion to borrowing." To qualify for deductions these amounts must be paid in the year or within 12 months of the end of the year. The deduction of these payments may not reduce the corporation's taxable income below the amount by which 5 per cent of members' capital employed exceeds amounts paid by the corporation to its members in respect of the members' shares.

I believe the legislation should be amended so that distinctions can be made between big business co-operatives, which need little or no protection, and small credit unions which need, and often deserve, help or encouragement because they exist to fulfil a need not filled by private enterprise institutions.

This is a rather broad outline of the areas of particular interest to me as they pertain to a good many people not only in western Canada but across the country. I hope that among the 95 amendments which the minister tabled this afternoon there will be some that touch on the points I have raised and clarify them in the minds of many Canadians who are waiting to see exactly what will come out of this taxation legislation.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks I should like to make particular reference to two areas of concern and interest to me, the question of taxation of co-operatives and of credit unions. I am in the very happy position of being able to commend the government on one score on the basis of the amendments tabled by the minister today. It would appear to me from first examination of the amendment to clause 137 of the bill that the representations by the credit unions have been taken into account in the proposals now presented by the minister. It appears that in fact it will be possible for a credit union to deduct interest or dividends paid on shares from its taxable income. If our interpretation of what is contained in the bill is correct, I am prepared to commend the government for making this change.

It also appears that the government has taken into account some of the concerns of credit unions about the method of computing allowable reserves. At this moment I am not in a position to comment on whether their representations have adequately been taken into account, but since there are changes in the amendments tabled this afternoon I have some hope that this is the case.

With respect to the taxation of co-operatives I am not in as happy a position, at first glance at least. It would appear that some concession has been made to the representations of the co-operative movement, that some allowance has been made in respect of the very real problems pointed out in the submissions made to the Minister of Finance and to members of all parties in this House.

From my first reading of the proposals presented this afternoon it would appear that co-operatives are to be given an alternative. They can either use the 5 per cent "capital employed" formula set out in Bill C-259 or they can use one-third of taxable income as determined on an ordinary corporation basis. It is very difficult to judge the matter at this time—

Mr. Mahoney: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member would appreciate the information that it is not an alternative; it is in fact that they will be taxed on the lesser of 5 per cent of capital employed or one-third of profits. It automatically operates in their favour; there is no election.

Mr. Burton: I appreciate the point made by the parliamentary secretary, Mr. Chairman. Certainly a co-operative would take whichever option operated best for it. Two options are open and, of course, the amendment states that the taxable amount would be the lesser of those two options as spelled out. It would appear that one option provides for the 5 per cent of capital employed formula as contained in the original bill, and the other would be one-third of the amount of taxable income that might be determined in the ordinary way.

It is very difficult to pass judgment on this change and to see what impact or benefit it will have on co-operatives until detailed study has been given to it. I should like to make a few preliminary comments, however. First of all, I note that the government has left the "capital employed" concept in the bill. Thus it would appear that the government has some rationale for this concept. They feel it is a suitable basis for determining taxation of co-operative organizations. But I think it was pointed out many times during the debate on second reading, Mr. Chairman, that it was very difficult to determine the rationale.

What is the concept of "capital employed"? What sense does it make? It would appear that the government took no heed of the representations, because they have left the "capital employed" concept in the bill while providing another alternative to co-operatives. I think it was pointed out in some of the submissions by the co-operatives that there really is no suitable rationale that would justify the use of the "capital employed" concept, but it has been left in the bill. The 5 per cent figure also has been left in the bill. Hon. members know that up to the present the figure has been 3 per cent of capital employed to be used as a basis in determining taxable income.

I believe this has been in the Income Tax Act since 1946 when certain amendments were passed which affected co-operatives. The figure was changed from 3 per cent to 7 per cent in the white paper, but it was pointed out that this was disastrous for most co-operatives. It now appears that there has been a compromise and the figure in the bill, which remains in the amendment tabled this afternoon, is 5 per cent of capital employed.

Mr. Chairman, I fail to see what rationale there is in the 5 per cent figure. The only rationale that I can think of is that it is half way between 3 per cent and 7 per cent. If the government finds that it can justify that sort of compromise position and defend it, then of course that is what they will have to try to do. However, it does not make sense to me.

Similarly, I suggest that we must look at the long-run implications of the option which has been provided to co-operatives, namely, that one-third of the amount calculated as taxable income would be subject to taxation. It is difficult to determine the rationale for that one-third figure. I am not sure what it is and I am not sure that the minister dealt with it in his remarks this afternoon. If he did, then I did not understand. We are told there is to be a complex phasing-in rule as well, which we will have to study before passing judgment.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

I do not understand why the government could not accept the very simple proposition put forward by the co-operative movement. They suggested that patronage dividends as they applied to the dividend paid out by production co-operatives, which amounts to about 95 per cent of the total dividends paid out, should be taxable in the hands of the recipient at his marginal rate of tax. This means that a member of a co-operative will be taxed on the reward he obtains as a result of patronizing his own organization and making use of the services which he helped establish. Apparently this suggestion was rejected by the government, as were other suggestions which I think would have taken into account the objections raised regarding the tax position of co-operatives.

The parliamentary secretary will be aware that a withholding tax will be imposed on patronage dividends no matter whether the dividend was paid out in cash. So long as it is credited to the member of the co-operative, he will be subject to the withholding tax payment and can deal with it from there in his personal income tax return, as is the case at present with respect to other types of payments which are taxable in the hands of the recipient. For example, a lump sum payment to an individual where he receives a refund of pension contributions is subject to a withholding tax of 10 per cent and is subject to a special tax rate in the hands of the recipient. That 10 per cent is withheld at the time the money is paid out to the recipient.

There is also a proposal that co-operatives be taxed on their undistributed earnings, that is, the earnings which are retained by them, and also on earnings derived as a result of business with those who are not members of the co-operative. There is no question about such earnings being subject to taxation. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this was a very reasonable set of proposals. On initial examination I am disappointed that the government did not see fit to accept those recommendations and adopt what I think was the sensible approach suggested by the co-operative movement.

There are other areas of concern regarding the bill. We shall deal with those when discussing the individual clauses. Of course, I am concerned about the impact that tax changes will have on agriculture and on farming, and we are particularly concerned about the way in which the taxation of capital gains will apply to farms. This, of course, is a complex subject. I do not propose to deal with it at present, except to note that farmers, as all hon. members no doubt are aware, are in a very special and unique position in terms of the type of operation they undertake, the economics of their position and the underlying realities which apply to their operations. These factors must be taken into account in any system in which capital gains are to be taxed.

There are other areas of concern as well. Some of them have been alluded to. I am referring to the proposed changes with regard to basic herds and to the depreciation of farm equipment and farm assets. We shall have to consider these in greater detail when we come to the appropriate clauses of the bill.

This afternoon as we move toward the clause by clause consideration of the bill I wish to make a few general comments. I note that as we are examining this bill in committee of the whole Canada faces an economic crisis. It seems to me that taxation policy cannot be divorced or separated from the over-all economic position and problem which Canada faces. There has been extensive debate in the House about developments which have taken place; they have affected Canada seriously. We are all aware that the annoucement made by President Nixon on August 15, as well as his second announcement made earlier this week regarding the new policy of the United States, shows that the United States is following a new road with respect to its economic policies. This will have very serious consequences and implications for Canada. Canada and the United States are close neighbours, geographically speaking, and we have also been very close in the economic sense. That situation has been brought about and intensified as a result of economic policies followed by the present government and governments in past years. They have allowed our economy to become integrated and tied in with the American economy.

It has been argued many times that this has been to Canada's benefit and that we need capital that has been brought in from the United States in order to provide the level of economic development and expansion we want in this country. At the same time, it must be noted in all honesty that there was a serious gap in Canadian policy because we failed to develop our own capability for savings which are so necessary for capital investment and development. We did not develop our own capacities for the development and expansion of our economy and we did not develop the types of policies which were needed in that regard.

Of course, there have been taxation features which have influenced and affected this course of development in our history. We now face a new situation and the assumptions underlying the government's economic policies over the past number of years have been shown to be false. The fact is that when it came to the crunch, the United States, as might be expected, acted in its own best interests; that is, it acted in its own interest on the basis of judgments made by those who hold political power in that country. They decided what is best for their country. We do not yet know the consequences and implications of that course for Canada. We have been left to thresh about in the dark. The Prime Minister has made statements saying that he does not think the United States is really aware of all the implications that its new policy developments hold for Canada.

It was really sad hearing the Prime Minister make statements like that about a new policy development arising in the United States, especially since it has been contended for a long time that there has always existed a close relationship between Canada and the United States in many fields. We now find, Mr. Chairman, that the government's assumptions concerning these economic policies were false.

In developing its economic policy over the past year or so at least, the government assumed, among other things, that there would be a significant upturn in the United States economy either late this year or early in 1972. It was assumed that this upturn in the United States economy would bring significant "slop over" benefits for Canada and that they had to be taken into account in determining economic policy in this country. That assumption has been shown to be false and the premises on which the government developed its economic policies have been totally shattered.

The government is now threshing about wildly and is trying to find new economic policies for dealing with some of our immediate short-run problems, particularly in view of the upcoming election which probably will take place during the coming year, and for dealing with our long-term problems. It seeks to find a long-term policy for Canada that will be effective in terms of our economic development. The Canadian people have been left very much in the lurch. We have a serious unemployment problem and the government has been slow in coming up with new policies to deal with this situation.

I think it is very necessary to consider appropriate tax cuts if we are to stimulate the economy. I also think that we must focus afresh on and give new consideration to the concept of the Canada Development Corporation. It must be made into a significant instrument of public policy in order to bring about the type of development that will serve Canada's interests in the long run. The government does not seem to be able to tell us at present where it is going with its long-run economic policies and just what are its short-run economic policies. Taxation policy plays an important role in this picture, both with respect to long-run and short-run economic policies. The government has given no answers. We do not know what road it is following. I do not think the government itself knows.

At the same time, we in this House are expected to deal with a taxation bill which the government is parading as a brand new approach to taxation. It is being paraded as the culmination of the government's efforts to reform the income tax system in Canada. It is very difficult for hon. members to pass adequate judgment on the government's policy as demonstrated in the tax bill before us because there seems to be an absence, or vacuum with respect to other areas of economic policy.

I appreciate that this is a most difficult problem for the government. They must sit there and do the best they can because they are determined to complete consideration of the tax bill before the end of the year in order that they can parade this piece of legislation before the electorate when the people go to the polls in the next federal election. Of course, the government will try to make out that this legislation is a significant measure of tax reform for which all Canadians should be thankful and, in particular, for which they should thank the Liberal government. While I can appreciate that government members will do their best to paint such a picture, I think the facts show otherwise. While there has been a certain amount of tidying up—

• (5:10 p.m.)

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Some hon. members have said no.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see the member for Calgary South in his new position. I did not intend to mention him because members from the city of Calgary—and we have had them from Calgary South from time to time—as Tennyson said, come and go. This is one of the burdens he will have to bear at the next election.

I would be derelict in my duty if I did not point out at the outset that what has really happened, and I thought it would happen, is that we have received a large, complex bill of 707 pages and almost 100 amendments. To be able to deal with it in a cogent manner, we should have been given the amendments some days or weeks ago, as a matter of courtesy. The government must have had them.

I say to the member for Calgary South that when his party was in the opposition, if we had tried this with even one amendment the Liberal party would not have allowed it. They were very astute people in opposition. I always gave them credit for that. They were masters of filibuster and procedure. This debate would not have gone on. If I had time I would try to convince the group here that this debate should not be going on. This really shows the arrogance of the government. They are saying, "It does not matter what the opposition says. We will let them make a few little speeches on the first clause of the bill." The member for Calgary South has been here since the rules were changed. He can never understand or appreciate what Committee of the Whole House is all about. He said, "Let them make a few pretty little speeches."

I would be derelict in my duty if I did not bring to the attention of the House and the country that this legislation is going to be rammed through. I have here an editorial from the Ottawa Citizen which is usually quite friendly toward the government. It is entitled "Speed action on the tax bill". I imagine the editor must have been coached a little by the government. No matter what is in this tax bill, the government is going to ram it through. They want it speeded through without much thought.

I make a prediction. Maybe when the member for Calgary South or other members of the government are back practising law or accounting, they will realize that what is being rammed through today is a legal monstrosity. This is what the Bar Association of Canada says. I have never held myself out as an expert on taxes. I do not think there are any such experts in the House. The tax experts have said this is a most complex bill. Maybe Browning correctly summed up the situation when asked about a poem of his. He was asked what it meant. He looked at it and said, "When I wrote that, only God and I understood it. As I think about it now after the months have gone by, only God understands it." That is probably what we are debating right now.

I want to come to grips with one subject that concerns me immediately, that is, relations between the federal government and the provinces as far as this tax bill is concerned. This is a monumental document. I do not know what is in the 100 or so amendments. If there were an examination, even with the great brilliance of the minister and his parliamentary secretary they would not be able to pass it. I am glad to see one officer of the department present who might be able to shed some light on this matter.

With regard to the provinces, accrued gains on capital assets will be taxable at death. Federal estate and gift taxes will be abolished as at December 31, 1971, to avoid double-taxation of such gains. There is no tax on bequests between spouses. The inheriting spouse acquires assets at their original cost to the other spouse. Tax is paid only when the inheriting spouse sells or transfers the asset by gift or bequest. Gifts between spouses, outright or through a trust, are tax free.

The decision of the federal government to get out of estate and gift taxes entirely as of December 31, 1971, has been strongly criticized, not because the provinces are against the abolition of the estate tax but because of the manner in which it is now being done. It has been strongly criticized as irresponsible and unfair to the provinces, a danger to orderly taxation in Canada and another act in favour of the privileged at the expense of middle income Canadians.

What does this proposal suggest? I come from the province of Alberta where there was an agreement between the federal government and the province that 75 per cent of the estate tax was to be returned to the provincial treasury. We had the estate tax abatement act. The former government of Alberta passed a provincial law so that the money was refunded to the estate and therefore benefited the beneficiaries. It was refreshing to hear the member for Regina East talk about the economy. That was done in Alberta for one reason, to help put Canadian capital into the hands of Canadians, particularly Albertans. It was not done to help the rich, the middle-class, or rob the poor but to create a capital pool in order to have a buoyant economy and full employment in the province of Alberta. I believe that today that province has less than 3 per cent unemployment. It has been said, and I believe it is correct, that at the moment we are one of the most buoyant economies. I hope it will last even with this government.

I have heard great academics. I do not know how they were able to become so categorized. I know some of their grades when they were in school. They prize themselves on being academics. They talk about foreign investment, although you do not hear too much about it now. I will have something to say about that in my concluding remarks.

As I see it, the enigma of foreign investment is with those people who talk about it. My friends to the left are rather great at that. They say that Canadians must invest in their own economy. The financial critic of the New Democratic Party seemed to be on all fours with the other socialist party in this country, the Liberals. They say they are going to take money from Canadians who have money to invest. This is the enigma: they say we cannot have foreign investment. How will western Canada end up? It and every other part of Canada will be an alkaline slue. That is what is so important.

I come back to the point about the abolition of capital gains and estate taxes. The proposal means an economic loss of provincial revenues and further tax competition among the provinces. Last year the federal government paid out $60.4 million as their share of the federal estate tax. Seven of the provinces receive from Ottawa 75 per cent of this tax when collected. Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia have their own succession duties. The removal of this source of revenue from the provinces will be detrimental. This bill will cost those provinces of Canada which had an arrangement with the federal government $60.4 million.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Take a look at this red book, the explanation book. It is like the funny papers. I like the cover of that book. I said that in the debate on the white paper. It leads one to think they are helping our millions of taxpayers, countless numbers, at least. I see hon. members opposite applauding. But what really happens? As soon as you erode the provincial treasuries, provinces are obliged to raise taxes from any other source available to them. In most cases the source chosen involves a sales tax.

We in Alberta are the only province where there is no sales tax in force. What will happen when we lose our share of the $60 million? Eventually we shall have to find money from another source, a sales tax or some other tax. That tax will fall on the same people the government pretends to be concerned about, those whom the bill before us would relieve from taxation. All this document does is shift the burden from the federal government to the provincial governments. This document is starving the provinces. That is the first point I wish to make.

Mr. Gibson: Speak up.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, that's all right. I can always rely on the choir on the backbenches opposite. They have only scratched the surface on this bill, yet they say, "Great. Ram it through. We are all part of this great Liberal machine."

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This is the first time you are concerned. They have a Conservative government in Alberta.

Mr. Woolliams: I will let them speak for themselves. The Ontario treasurer took the view that the federal administration had been too hasty. It was argued that the estate and gift taxes should be phased out as the capital gains tax was phased in. I should have thought the government would have come before the House today and declared, "We have made a deal with the provinces. We made a deal before we rammed this legislation through."

In summary, I say this new tax legislation is merely shifting the burden for collecting taxes from the federal government to provincial governments. Increased taxation will fall on those for whom the government professes a special concern, those in the low income brackets. Moreover, of course, any benefit of the small concession connected with personal income tax has already been cancelled out by inflation, something which has partly, at least, been brought about by the government itself.

I wish to deal now with the provisions of this bill as they affect small business. Take this same red book. This is what it says at page 35. It reads very well:

> A reformed low rate of corporate tax is retained as a small business incentive; the rate is 25 per cent on the first $50,000 of business income of Canadian-controlled private corporations.

What the tax bill promises to do is to increase the taxable income allowance from $35,000 to $50,000 and increase the rate of taxation from 21 per cent to 25 per cent. But they raised the gross net income. That sounds good on the face of it, but see what really happens.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What on earth is "gross net income"?

Mr. Woolliams: This is what happens. The maximum amount for which a deduction can be made in any one year is $50,000. This $50,000 is the corporation's business limit. In addition, there is a cumulative limit which, in the simplest situation, amounts to $400,000 of taxable income earned after 1971. In other words, to make it simple, if a corporation shows a taxable profit of $50,000 for eight years it would then have enjoyed the benefit in its growth of a 25 per cent rate on the first $50,000, but the moment it hits a total gross of $400,000 in those eight years, on goes the tax the same as on large corporations.

What do I say about that? This provision is supposed to help small business. Many farmers and ranchers are incorporated. What happens? As soon as a group of people get together in a private corporation, form a company and produce a gross capital of $400,000, then on comes the 50 per cent tax or that rate which applies to foreign corporations and the public corporations of Canada. But this will not be found in the red book. Oh no, because they are trying to sell the candy. There are two things you can pick out when you are debating the economic situation.

I say, therefore, the provinces will be starved of their revenue and small business will be discouraged from expanding because the moment a company expands, builds up a business to assist the Canadian economy on the basis of Canadian investment, along comes the high corporate tax. There is a dishonesty you find at the outset.

Mr. Chairman, the tax policy of any government is the policy through which you effect the kind of taxes and the rate of taxes which are necessary, and whether you have capital gains tax and how it applies to the incomes and various branches is one means by which this or any other government controls the economy.

I would say we have seen a deterioration in the relations between Canada and the United States. I want to say something about that because this debate will be lengthy, on a complex situation. I question whether even members of this House comprehend what effect this bill will have on the economy of Canada, yet it is being brought in at a time when we not only have trouble with the United States on the question of the surtax but also on account of the dollar which was floating so that it was more than equal to the United States dollar. The argument and the debate which has gone on over the years about taxation has had a tremendous effect on the economy of this country, a depressing effect. In fact, I asked Bryce and another adviser at the committee which was studying the white paper, and they said there were many deals which would have helped Canadians and given jobs to Canadians which have not crystallized because of the fear of what was in the white paper. This was the fear hanging over the heads of Canadians. If there is any question about that—and I said this to the hon. member for Calgary South—I shall read it into the record next time I speak, because we have only 20 minutes. I have referred to it on other occasions.

When we talk about our economy, we should have had brought in by the government some policy of control that would deal with what I call the most serious difficulty this country has encountered since 1929. Right now our relationship with the United States has deteriorated to such a level that one has to ask oneself how this deterioration set in. Was it partly because of the tax bill? Was it partly because of the white paper? Was it partly because of the statement in reference to NATO? We have never negotiated with our friends. This Prime Minister said we will reduce our forces in NATO without any discussion with the United States. He has also taken a hard line in respect of NORAD. That is why our position has deteriorated.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Mahoney: Tell us what Diefenbaker said to Kennedy.

Mr. Woolliams: This Prime Minister went to the U.S.S.R. and said, and I quote from a transcript of a press conference given in Moscow on May 20, 1971:

As is well known, Canada is not only a good friend and neighbour of the United States of America, but also its ally in NATO and NORAD, and Canada has increasingly found it important to diversify its channels of communication because of the overpowering presence of the United States of America—

The Prime Minister admits that we are friends of the United States in respect of NATO and NORAD and that we are in a joint partnership in respect of our financial resources, but he goes on to admit that we have never negotiated at any time—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I will be as brief as possible. The transcript of the Prime Minister's press conference reads:

—Canada has increasingly found it important to diversify its channels of communication because of the overpowering presence of the United States of America and that is reflected in a growing consciousness amongst Canadians of the danger to our national identity from a cultural, economic and perhaps even military point of view.

I could quote from other speeches but I will refrain from doing so at this time because I can speak again in 20 minutes. I appreciate the graciousness of hon. members of the committee in allowing me to conclude this point. We have insulted the United States as far as NATO and NORAD are concerned. Our Prime Minister was in a communist country and talked about military importance so far as it affected Canada and the United States. We have insulted the United States in every way. This is the only Prime Minister in my lifetime who has not been able to go to the United States and negotiate with the President. He refuses to write letters or call him on the telephone. And now we are dealing with the serious matter of taxation at a time when our economy is being disrupted.

Let me make a prediction before I sit down. When this winter is over—

Mr. Mahoney: Tell us what Diefenbaker said.

Mr. Woolliams: I know this is getting to the hon. member for Calgary South, but these are the things he will have to defend on a platform when he goes back to Calgary.

This is the only Prime Minister who has never been able to negotiate with the President of the United States. We are now faced with a 10 per cent surcharge against industry. This has a tremendous effect on the industrial might of the province of Ontario. If this policy is continued by the government there will be one million people unemployed in our country this winter.

An hon. Member: That's what you wish and hope.

Mr. Woolliams: The Liberals say that is what I wish and hope, but if they listened to what I have said in the past 20 minutes they would realize that this is the time to bring in a policy to do something for the people of Canada and prevent what I would call the danger of a great depression.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise: Mr. Chairman, before we further pursue the debate, I should, in turn, like to say a few words concerning one portion of the lengthy bill we will be debating over the next months. I expressly say "the next months" since I expect the study of this bill, almost four inches thick, as well as the bundle of amendments that go with it, to take a very long time.

The very fact that Bill C-259 was accompanied by several pages of errata led me to presume an intention to have the legislation adopted in haste.

It led me to believe that I was not alone in entertaining the view that the government study was far from complete, and of this we had proof today when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) himself brought forward his bundle of amendments to alter most of the clauses of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, when the minister made public Bill C-259, the latter was far from being ready for study and from having the assent of the government and probably of the other members of the Cabinet, since when we are about to examine this bill, clause by clause, the government itself introduces amendments.

Every time we have had to consider bills amending tax laws or budgets, I have been fearful. I fear such bills because amendments to the Income Tax Act have always been detrimental to Canadian taxpayers. They have always further deprived the worker, the farmer, the labourer, in short, the one most in need of his income.

Regardless of the level of taxation, it is always the small wage earner and the consumer who bear the brunt of it.

Mr. Béchard: That is why a million workers will not pay any income tax.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, the statement made by the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) is altogether false. The hon. member for Laval

(Mr. Roy) has said a short while ago, following the speech of my colleague for Champlain (Mr. Matte), that 750,000 workers—that is also what the Minister of Finance has said—would be exempted from taxation, under the new bill.

Mr. Chairman, this means that 750,000 workers will be too poor to pay taxes, whereas according to studies made by university professors, labour unions and other persons show that one third of Canadian people live on the threshold of poverty. In spite of this, the minister has the nerve to come here and say that he is glad that 750,000 of these people will not earn enough money to pay income tax. This means that they will have earned the income, the salary of starving people. Such is the government policy and the effect of the just society. Taxpayers do not want to be taxed beyond their ability to pay. We would all like to be tax exempt.

I have in hand some newspaper reports dealing with the matter. In 1964, we could read the following headlines:

Farmers demanding basic tax exemption.

President of Imperial Oil once more speaks against tax system unfair to oil industry.

Beer industry would be too highly taxed, according to Brewery Association.

Insurance companies do not want to be taxed.

CFU wants immediate readjustment of land tax.

Every day and every week, we hear from associations, companies or groups of citizens asking tax exemptions to the government.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member speaks in every way like the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe). I would urge him to be more careful.

Mr. Laprise: I am ashamed not of my colleague, the hon. member for Compton, but rather of the attitude adopted by my friends, the government members, towards the Canadian people.

When we study the report on public accounts in Canada, especially those for 1971 which has just been distributed, we see in subsection 2.10 a table giving the revenue and expenditures of the government. According to the data for 1970-71, direct income taxes amounted to $7,576,000,000, based on preliminary estimates. Indirect taxes amounted to $4,083,000,000 and direct corporate taxes to $2,120,000,000.

Everyone knows that companies have the privilege of including their taxes in their production costs, so that in fact the consumers are paying those taxes for them.

Those figures indicate that $13,779,000,000 are paid more or less directly by Canadian workers.

In paragraph 3.2 of the same report, another chart shows the rate of increase in taxes since 1967. It can be seen that in 1967, 30 per cent of taxes came from the income tax of individuals, while in 1968 that proportion rose to 31 per cent, and in 1969, to 33 per cent, where it remained in 1970, only to rise again in 1971 up to 37 per cent. In the same period, corporate income tax was 19 per cent in 1967, 18 per cent in 1968, 20 per cent in 1969 and 21 per cent in 1970, but decreased to 17 per cent in 1971. While the income tax of individuals rose from 30 to 37 per cent from 1967 to 1971, corporate income tax decreased from 19 per cent in 1967 to 17 per cent in 1971.

When we hear about equity or totalitarianism and when certain people try to distribute wealth in Canada in the manner required by those who advocate it, it is obvious that they do not and never will meet their objectives.

We, in the Social Credit, believe in free enterprise in Canada and in a tax system consistent with this freedom. We also believe that our tax system should be equitable and non-discriminatory. The purpose of a tax system should not be to finance government expenditures but to take money where there is too much of it or to prevent unbalance in any economic area. In my opinion, the purpose of a tax system is to withdraw money when and where there is too much of it.

But today, the government is boasting however apprehensively in presenting Bill C-259 that it will increase the basic income tax exemption in such a manner that 750,000 people will no longer pay taxes.

Well, as I said at the outset of my remarks, there will be too many people who will not earn enough money to provide for their family's needs. Perhaps they would be happy to earn enough to pay a little income tax.

Mr. Béchard: If they did pay any. It is not as bad as that, because they will not pay any.

Mr. Laprise: But where the government deceives the people Mr. Chairman, is in the indirect taxation area: excise tax, tax on the production of manufactured products. The 750,000 people who will not pay direct taxation will have to pay indirect taxation; they will have to pay tax on manufactured products whenever they buy things that their income allows them to buy. That is where lies the injustice of our taxation system, which tries to get money where there is none or not enough.

I have here invoices to prove what I am saying, Mr. Chairman.

Since the tax system in this country amounts to double taxation, it is not surprising to see the government continuously introducing proposals to fight inflation, and that fight is always lost before it starts because the government is not aiming at the right place.

I have here two bills from lumber firms. One is for 488 feet of 2x4s at $58 per 1,000 feet, which amounts to $28.30, and the other for 228 feet of 1x6s, and that amounts to $15.50, for a grand total of $43.80. Then comes in the 11 per cent federal tax on all wood sold. On top of that, you have to add the 8 per cent provincial tax. The Quebec provincial tax is added to the federal tax.

One must not be surprised to see that the people are infuriated at such a tax system and no longer want it. That is where lies the injustice, the government taxes indirectly the Canadian consumers when they go out to buy.

• (5:50 p.m.)

An arduous fight is raging between the three levels, of government, each wishing to get a significant share of the income of the Canadian people. If the federal government really wants to improve its administration, relieve the population and provide it with a better chance of living decently, let it act favourably not only toward a small group of privileged people, but also toward the 750,000 people whose income is considered quite insufficient to meet the needs of their families.

Then, it must reply to objections or requests made by people other than politicians. Not long ago, one could read in the dailies this statement from Mr. Frank E. Case, president of the Montreal Trust, and I quote:

> Up to now, the economy has shown few signs of recovery despite the many provisional solutions put forward by various government organizations. I for one believe that a tax reduction would have been much more beneficial.

The government is trying to make us believe that this reform will result in lower taxes, whereas the federal civil servants tell us that within five years this reform will have boosted tax proceeds by $600 million, and whereas the Ontario civil servants, with the help of an electronic computer, now forecast an increase in federal tax proceeds of the order of one billion dollars. Whether the result be $600 million or $1 billion, it means that this tax reform is nothing but a stirring of the same mixture which will amount to heavier taxes for the Canadian workers.

And Mr. Case added:

> —what was needed to reverse the situation was not an increase in public spending or new capital investments, but rather a new impulse to the purchasing power.

This is the opposite of what the government intends to do in his tax proposals, that is to extort $600 million or $1 billion from the Canadian taxpayers. On the contrary, if the government actually wanted to restart the economy, it would proceed by injecting it with additional purchasing power.

I have on hand another testimony, that of Mr. Grant L. Reuber, an economist and director of the Department of Economics at London's Western University. This is what he had to say in an article published in Le Devoir in May 1971, and I quote:

> This is why the government should persue a "moderately expansionist tax policy", promote expenditures which would stimulate the demand for goods and services thus helping to create employment.
> This could be achieved by lowering personal income tax and federal sales taxes levied on manufactured goods.

It should be noted that Mr. Reuber has not asked that non-taxable income be increased, but rather that federal taxes levied on manufactured goods be reduced.

These are the comments of people who have studied the problem and whose authority is unquestionable. During this debate which as far as I can see, will be protracted, we will have the opportunity of carefully studying each clause together with the consequences of this tax reform. We think that we shall have to submit numerous proposals to amend this bill.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I hear the parliamentary secretary suggesting that I call it six o'clock. I am perfectly prepared to do that if it is the wish of the committee. There seems to be some unanimity in this regard. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: This can be done only by unanimous agreement. Does the committee agree to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

At 5.57 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 14, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Government House,
Ottawa

14 October 1971

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable D. C. Abbott, P.C., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 14th day of October, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis Fremont Trudeau
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

TABLING OF PRESS RELEASE, "ADVERTISING CODE FOR CHILDREN", AND ATTACHED BROADCAST CODE

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table two copies each in both the official languages of a press release entitled "Advertising Code for Children" and the attached broadcast code for advertising for children.

HAULAGE OF LOOSE MATERIALS SAFETY BILL

PROVISIONS RESPECTING CARRIAGE OF LOADS ON PUBLIC HIGHWAYS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-270, respecting the safe haulage of loose materials.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is a very innocuous bill at a time when Canadians are faced with many great problems. However, it is of great concern to many people and has been for many years.

The purpose of this bill is to prevent damage to motor vehicles, to property adjacent to the highway, and to the roadway itself, which can be occasioned by trucks carrying such loose materials as sand, gravel, rock, stone, etc. The bill would require such loads to be adequately covered. The bill deals with federal works and undertakings only as motor vehicles would normally come under provincial jurisdiction. Safe haulage of loose material is a concern of all motorists, pedestrians, horsemen, bicyclists, and even politicians as I am sure this bill applies to them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROVISION OF EMERGENCY DEBATE

On the order: Government Notices of Motions.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning a procedure that might normally be taken at this point. The House leaders met this morning and in the course of their discussion it became evident that there would be a general desire in the House to have an adjournment debate this evening. I understand that at least two of the opposition parties have filed motions with Your Honour for an adjournment debate this evening. We on this side would be agreeable to have such an adjournment debate under the normal rules on a motion that would be moved by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), "That this House do now adjourn for the purpose of discussing the economy." I am sure that motion would be broad enough to cover all of the elements that might be contained in the opposition motions. However, I understand that hon. gentlemen opposite might like to indicate to the House the less neutral content of their motions.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Just briefly, Mr. Speaker, we accept this suggestion, the government having anticipated that the unemployment statistics would require a debate of this kind. As long as the hon. members have a chance to put their motions we are agreeable.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) is in accordance with the understanding we had at our meeting this morning. We agreed that the House should order a debate for eight o'clock tonight. It was, of course, understood that the members of the opposition parties who had filed notices with Your Honour this morning would nevertheless be permitted to present those motions at this time so the House would know the points that they wished to make.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the suggestion made by the President of the Privy Council and the representatives of some of the opposition parties. Is it agreed that we will proceed on this basis?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, here is the motion that I intended to move:

There is no more pressing matter to put before the House than the state of national emergency revealed by the official unemployment figures published today, which show that more than 7 per cent of the labour force is out of work in Canada, and indicate a steady trend in the rise of the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, since the government House Leader has accepted to hold the emergency debate tonight, I will now resume my seat.

[English]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I am doing what I was told, Mr. Speaker, although the exercise may not be very useful at this time. I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the fact that the actual rate of unemployment in September was the highest since 1960 in that month and the adjusted rate the highest since 1961, the appalling prospect of more critical unemployment levels this winter which urgently require a massive program to create hundreds of thousands of additional jobs, a program which should be announced without further delay since valuable time has already been lost.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The agreement which has been reached by hon. members of course makes it easier for the Chair to make a ruling, or perhaps a non-ruling. I gather there is agreement that there should be a debate on this important matter. This debate will take place at eight o'clock this evening on the basis of the submission made for the consideration of hon. members by the President of the Privy Council.

I am not sure that the hon. member for York South would think it necessary for me to refer at this time to the form of the motion he has presented to the House. As hon. members know, we have established and followed somewhat religiously the procedure and form of motion under Standing Order 26, subsection 2 which states that we shall receive from hon. members a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed, that is, without argument and without debate. I would hope that this requirement, which has been followed so strictly until now, would be followed in future as it has been in the past, and I would invite hon. members to co-operate with the Chair in this respect. It is not easy to determine what is debate, what is argument and what is simply a statement of fact, but it has been helpful to all concerned and for the House until now to limit motions under Standing Order 26 to a very bare statement of the facts.

Mr. Baldwin: So bare it is almost indecent.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF SHORT-TERM ECONOMIC FORECASTING UNIT AND IMMEDIATE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the statement which is expected from the Minister of Finance tonight I shall not ask the questions this afternoon that I had intended. However, in view of the obvious discrepancy between the adjusted unemployment figure released today and the forecasts upon which the June budget was based, in all earnestness I should again like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will now support the establishment and assist in the financing of an independent unit responsible for short-term economic forecasting in Canada in order to improve the economic intelligence of the people generally including, not least, that of the government of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the idea deserves consideration but in this particular instance it does appear that the existing short-term economic forecasting units in the universities have made the same mistakes as we have in their misappreciation of the participation rate of the labour force.

Mr. Stanfield: Without in any way accepting the factuality of what the right hon. gentleman has said—I could not do so—may I suggest to my right hon. friend that this only emphasizes the importance—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister not agree that the extent to which other forecasters in the country have been inaccurate only reinforces the request of the Economic Council of Canada that such a short-term forecasting unit be established?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition would not admit that the supplementary as asked is really an argument in support of his original question. I wonder whether in those terms it can be accepted as a supplementary question.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is argument, although very well justified in the circumstances. I am sorry that some of my hon. friends to the rear on the other side are a little upset. I can understand why. In view of the very alarming figures regarding unemployment published today, will the Prime Minister now invite the provinces to attend a conference regarding measures to combat winter unemployment on virtually an emergency basis? In light of these figures will the Prime Minister attempt to convene an immediate meeting with the provinces so that the federal government can confer with the provinces jointly on measures other than those the minister will propose tonight?

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the House knows that I have been attempting precisely this for several weeks and even months now. I have been attempting to get the provinces to sit down with us on an urgent basis to discuss the economic situation in Canada. I cannot at this time give a final report to the House on a date. As the House knows, we had agreed to a date in early December. I have since that time gone back to all the first ministers to obtain agreement on an earlier date, and I may have such an earlier date to announce to the House shortly. As of now I do not have the agreement of all provinces on any one earlier date, but I am still working on it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether, on the basis of the unemployment figures released today, he will not reopen this question with the provinces with a view to convening an immediate meeting on this subject?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I really do not see the point of the question. The provinces know about this and they, themselves, have been trying to get agreement on earlier dates. I agree that perhaps today's figures will make them even more anxious to do so. But when premiers say that they are free on certain dates and not on others, I take their word for it. I sometimes try to get them to adjust dates when that is possible. That is what I am trying to do. I am trying to get universal agreement on some earlier dates. I am telling the House that they have not yet all agreed, and I am trying to proceed by way of co-operation rather than by strong arm methods, which the House always recommends that I not use.

Mr. Baldwin: The Prime Minister should try that method here.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—POSSIBLE ANNOUNCEMENT IN EMERGENCY DEBATE OF PROGRAM TO CREATE JOBS THIS WINTER

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, some hon. members may know the answer to my question better than I do but, since the government House leader has not said anything about it and as I think the information should be on record, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether, when he introduces the motion this evening, he will place before Parliament a program to create jobs this winter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should not like to comment on what I will say tonight at eight o'clock until I say it.

Mr. Lewis: Inasmuch as a general debate on the economy has been held before, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether the House will debate a program for work this winter or whether there will be merely a general debate on the outlook of the economy?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think there has been agreement among the parties that one member from each party will have the opportunity an hour before I speak of seeing exactly what I am going to say in the House so as to be in a position to reply.

Mr. Baldwin: Will a doctor be present in the House when the minister speaks?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. Has he or have officials of his department discussed with representatives of the provinces whatever it is that he is going to say this evening?

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

On October 4 last, the minister stated that the government was now subsidizing two projects undertaken by the Canadian Association of Medical Schools, that is the cost of university training and the determination of the possible number of medical students. Could he tell us when such projects will come to an end?

UNAUTHORIZED EARLY DISCLOSURE OF UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES TO MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked of the Prime Minister. In light of the Gazette's scoop on the unemployment figures this morning, has the government initiated an inquiry into how this newspaper got the figures before the Prime Minister got them?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer this question. I am informed by Statistics Canada that copies of the document were given to the press slightly before eight o'clock this morning. I am told that there was an unauthorized disclosure, the source of which is not yet known. Statistics Canada is investigating this matter.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—REQUEST FOR EARLY DEBATE TO EXPRESS CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is the government planning in the very near future to have a debate in the House in which all members can express their strong and united opposition to the economic pressure being brought to bear on Canada by the United States government, aimed at making this country no more than a supplier of power and raw materials for use by United States industry, and the determination of the people of Canada that this country will remain strong economically and not become an economic vassal of the United States?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in answering the hon. member's question I can say yes to the first part of it. An occasion will certainly be provided to all members of the House to say that in the debate tonight, but I cannot guarantee that all members will want to say that.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REVIEW OF ACTIVITIES DESIGNED TO REDUCE ECONOMIC DISPARITY BETWEEN ATLANTIC PROVINCES AND REST OF CANADA

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the fact that seasonally adjusted unemployment rates in the Atlantic provinces have increased from May to the present time, regularly throughout the summer, and at a higher rate than in any other part of Canada, and as the economic disparity between the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada is increasing, at least measured in these terms, is the minister giving consideration to a special review of the activities of his department which are designed to reduce the economic disparity between the Atlantic provinces and other parts of Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I believe the figures quoted by my hon. friend are incorrect. When you compare the unemployment rate for the Maritime provinces with the average rate in Canada, going back a few years, you see that the relative rate of unemployment is lower, although the absolute rate has increased since the month of May.

[English]

Mr. MacLean: Am I to understand that the minister is satisfied with the rate of unemployment in the Maritime provinces?

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is not what I said.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is debate.

ACTION ON ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING FUNDY TIDAL POWER

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. What action is the minister's department taking in connection with the recommendation of the Atlantic Development Council with regard to his department becoming involved with Fundy tidal power as this would materially assist in decreasing the rate of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think that I answered that question the day before yesterday by saying that we have received two or three reports, namely those of the Science Council and APEC, besides the one just referred to by the hon. member and which we are now considering. We hope to be in a position to make very soon a statement on the matter.

[English]

SUGGESTED DESIGNATION OF PRAIRIE PROVINCES AS SPECIAL REGION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the unemployment figures on the prairies, which show that the adjusted rate again increased this month, can the minister say whether he is contemplating any changes regarding the prairie region or contemplating designating the region so that the prairie provinces will benefit under the Regional Development Incentives Act?

Mr. Stanfield: Let's designate the whole country.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the public has learned through newspapers and other media that the over-all unemployment rate had increased in Canada, in other words the rate is higher in all regions. This is not a problem of regional disparity but rather of general economy and the matter will be discussed tonight when each and every one will have an opportunity to express his opinion.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oxford. Order, please. Perhaps the Chair should recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the statement the minister has just made that this is not a regional problem, does the minister feel that his department can be successful in eliminating regional disparities if we do not have full employment in the country?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ACTION TO EXPEDITE PROCESSING OF CLAIMS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a related question for the Minister of Labour. I realize the minister may have some difficulty in answering the question inasmuch as he only reports to the House for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I have asked the minister this question before. Will he use his good offices with the Unemployment Insurance Commission to do something to try to untangle the administrative mess with regard to the processing of unemployment insurance claims? I ask the question at this time particularly in view of the increase in unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I cannot accept the implication that there is any administrative mess. I can certainly make representations to make sure that the Unemployment Insurance Commission maintains its usual high rate of efficiency, which at this moment means they are processing over 98 per cent of the claims on time. I shall try to improve that to 99 per cent.

Mr. Nesbitt: Does the minister agree that waiting for three and four months in many, many cases amounts to processing on time?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member again that this is debate. I recognize the hon. member for Greenwood.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—REPRESENTATIONS ON STRATEGIC GROUNDS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister now in a position to reply to the question I asked him the other day concerning the strategic implications of the Amchitka test?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Yes, sir. I thank the hon. member again for notice of the question. I am advised that the United States has disclosed officially that the purpose of the proposed nuclear explosion on Amchitka Island is to test the warhead for the Spartan missile, the long-range interceptor component of the Safeguard antiballistic missile system. In the second part of his question the hon. member asked whether I had made any representations on strategic grounds to the United States. I have not done so, although my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has been in active consultation with United States authorities on this point, as the hon. member knows.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

SUGGESTED STUDY BY GOVERNMENTS OF MORE EQUITABLE FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister related to a statement made recently by the Premier of Quebec concerning the coming conference of first ministers on unemployment.

Since the Premier of Quebec stated that he did not place much reliance on such conferences to deal with the problem of unemployment and that in his view the best way to do so would be through a more equitable fiscal distribution between the federal and provincial governments, is the Prime Minister considering the possibility of discussing the matter with the premiers as a means of solving the problem of unemployment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such a statement, but it seems incomplete to me, if it was made since, as the hon. member knows, the provinces are free to set whatever rates of taxation suit them in all direct tax fields. So, if the provinces think that they have not enough money, they can always increase their taxes rather than ask the federal government to give them some.

As for the tax distribution itself, it is true that the present agreements will end next year and that we must, this fall, on dates that will be proclaimed as soon as an understanding has been reached with the provinces, discuss such a question at a federal-provincial conference of both the premiers and the Ministers of Finance.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REGULATION OF TELEVISION ADVERTISING DIRECTED AT CHILDREN—REQUEST THAT EFFECTIVE DATE OF CODE BE ADVANCED

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The Canadian Association of Broadcasters has just made public an advertising code for children. Since this code will be put into effect only on January 1, 1972, that is after the holiday season, I should like to ask the minister if he intends to take the necessary steps to put a stop right now to this harmful advertising?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the code I tabled at the beginning of the day's session became effective as of yesterday. The hon. member asks about further action. I made it clear in the press release I issued yesterday relative to the code that we would, of course, continue to enforce all the laws related to misleading or deceptive advertising, which are laws of the country, in addition to the voluntary code.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC WORKS

CHURCHILL, MAN.—IMMEDIATE IMPLEMENTATION OF REDEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Having regard to the growing economic distress in Canada and its particular impact upon the northern parts of our country, is the government planning to implement immediately its recently announced redevelopment program for Churchill, Manitoba?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are proceeding together with the government of the province of Manitoba. We were awaiting their approval as to their participation. We have now received it and we shall be proceeding on schedule.

Mr. Dinsdale: Does this redevelopment plan involve the modernization of the Port of Churchill and, if so, what amounts are likely to be expended on this aspect of the program?

Mr. Laing: At this stage there is no provision for further investment in the port itself. The proposal is in essence, to close the camp and to move the people who are now at the camp into the town of Churchill itself.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Can the minister say whether work of this nature will be conducted during the coming winter having regard to the unemployment situation in Churchill?

Mr. Laing: The sums we had set aside for this year are on target. I would think that if the province of Manitoba would like to move the work forward more rapidly we would see what we could do on our side.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LEGALITY OF GOVERNMENT FINANCED EXPERIMENT RESPECTING MARIJUANA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. I asked this question the other day of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Minister of Justice was away briefing the wheat case. My question is this: Has he referred the decision to provide $100,000 to cover the cost of an experiment respecting marijuana by a university to the legal officers of his department with a view to determining whether that action is within the law?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I shall have to take that question as notice and give an answer later.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION OF FEDERAL MINISTER IN ELDORADO DISPUTE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received any communication from the Saskatchewan Minister of Labour asking him to intervene in the Eldorado dispute and, if so, what initiative does he plan to take?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I received such a request last week from the Minister of Labour for Saskatchewan pointing out the economic hardships that have resulted from this strike which is now of two months duration. The letter was a very objective one, and I would urge the company, which is a Crown corporation, to act as a good employer, get back to the bargaining table at the first opportunity and resume negotiations with the union.

SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF CERTAIN FUNDS TO POTATO GROWERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Since opposition parties chose to compel the government to pay only $62 million, instead of $100 million, to western farmers, would the minister indicate whether, in view of the $38 million thus saved, he would be prepared to recommend that part of this amount be allocated to potato producers?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member's question should be considered as a suggestion made to the minister.

LIFT PROGRAM—REQUESTS TO FARMERS FOR REPAYMENTS—POSSIBILITY OF PROSECUTIONS

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman's department to proceed with prosecutions in cases where aerial photographs have proved that a farmer's application in connection with the Lift program was incorrect?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am not sure about the question of prosecution or what action is being taken. I really will have to take the question as notice. I am not sure what the hon. member is really asking about, whether the question concerns the collection of money which has been paid out or whether it relates to the Wheat Board with respect to misinformation in permits. I would need more information before I could answer the question.

Mr. Cadieu: Is it true that the PFRA Regina office is making demands with regard to these repayments?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question can be asked in those terms. Perhaps the minister and the hon. member might consult at the end of the question period.

PUBLIC WORKS

HALIFAX—CONSTRUCTION OF BREAKWATER SOUTH OF CONTAINER PIER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works a question. He seems to be in a very positive frame of mind today. Has he decided to go ahead with construction of a breakwater to the south of the container pier in Halifax?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think that this question might better be addressed to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might say that normally this question would be considered at the time of adjournment. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Transport would like to come back at ten o'clock.

UNITED STATES ECONOMIC MEASURES—DISCUSSIONS ON AMERICAN GRIEVANCES—SUBJECTS COVERED

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs which is prompted by a reported statement by a prominent member of the United States treasury department to the effect that Canada and the United States have been holding talks on many, if not all, of the subjects raised in the famous grievance list. Could the minister indicate at what level these discussions have been held, whether they are continuing, and what subjects are being covered?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this question could be directed to myself or to a number of my colleagues since we have all been having discussions of this kind. I think a general answer would be that the discussions have been held at all levels, ministerial and official, with the participation of myself, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and our respective officials. As I said, most of the subjects on the list were familiar. However, some of them were new.

My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. May I ask the minister whether, prior to the recent decision by Imperial Oil to consolidate their prairie operations in Edmonton, or at any time since that decision was made, he has consulted with Imperial Oil to discuss the implications of such consolidation for regional economic dispartity?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this question as notice.

PROPOSED AMCHITKA NUCLEAR TEST—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON POSSIBLE POSTPONEMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question.

I would think that since the United States have announced the forthcoming nuclear test on Amchitka Island the minister has had some consultations with the American authorities on this matter and I would like him to give us some indications that the Americans will take into account the representations made by him or by the government of Canada.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that particular question is that I have been assured that our representations are being taken into account. However, perhaps I could correct the first part of the question put by the hon. gentleman the United States has not yet made a decision to have the test.

Mr. Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REPORTED INTENTION TO PUT LOCAL 1842, INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S ASSOCIATION, UNDER TRUSTEESHIP

Mr. John Roberts (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Has the minister been informed that Mr. Gleason, president of the International Longshoremen's Association, has stated that he intends to put Toronto local 1842, the Toronto harbour local, under trusteeship? If so, have any reasons been advanced for this, and does the Department of Labour intend to intervene in the situation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have received word informally that this could possibly happen. I can assure the House that if the president of an international organization were to put a Canadian local, even though it be a local of an international union, under trusteeship by reason of the fact that it had signed a collective agreement that was in the best interests of its Canadian members, I would be obliged to have another look at my labour bill C-253 which is before the House and include a provision to prevent this type of harassment.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

IMPROVEMENT OF DEPARTMENTAL OPERATIONS IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the fact that the chairman of the Nova Scotia Voluntary Economic Planning Board, Mr. A. R. Harrington, and the president of the Maritime Provinces Board of Trade, Mr. Joseph Zatzman, have added their voices to those of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and declared that DREE's record during its first 30 months of operation is disappointing, has the minister or the government any plans to make DREE's activities more fruitful?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I answered a question in exactly the same terms a few minutes ago.

Mr. Muir: Is the minister aware that the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has attributed DREE's ineffectiveness to its failure to establish firm policy lines and the government's "inept handling of the national economy"?

HEALTH

DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES OF INCLUSION OF MENTAL HEALTH TREATMENT UNDER MEDICARE—DISCONTINUANCE OF CERTAIN GRANTS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Are any discussions under way with the provinces to include mental health treatment as a cost-shared item under medicare?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Not in those direct terms, Mr. Speaker. There are discussions under way with the provinces with respect to altering the cost-sharing arrangements under the medicare and hospitalization acts. If the arrangements were altered this would affect cost-sharing in the area of mental health.

Mr. Harding: Are present federal health grants to the provinces for mental health, t.b., cancer, etc., being phased out? If so, what is the deadline set for the discontinuance of these grants?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, grants such as these have gradually been phased out over a period of years and replaced by national health grants. Many of these grants were originally designed to assist the provinces many years ago to get their health department programs under way. Since then, of course, these programs have become very sophisticated.

MEDICARE AND HOSPITALIZATION—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES ON ACCEPTANCE OF FULL COST IN RETURN FOR FIXED FISCAL EQUIVALENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are discussions under way with the provinces with a view to persuading the provinces to accept the full cost of operating medicare and hospitalization plans in return for a fixed fiscal equivalent?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, this is not the design or intent of the discussions we have been having with the provinces. We have been talking to the provinces about new financial arrangements, perhaps along the lines of some per capita formula, and we have also been insisting upon uniform standards, and so on. These are, in general, the sort of discussions we have been having with the provinces, largely in response, I might add, to a request by the provinces that there be a greater degree of flexibility in the cost-sharing arrangements regarding health care which would enable them to get other programs under way.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for asking another supplementary question but the subject is important. Am I to understand, therefore, that the government is not now pressing forward with the idea of getting out of these cost-sharing plans in the health field entirely and substituting for these plans a fiscal equivalent?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, these discussions are not about the federal government getting out of this area at all. They are an effort on our part to make a positive response to a request of the provinces for some different type of financial arrangements which will allow them to have a greater say about their own priorities in the health field.

DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES ON INCLUSION OF PARAMEDICAL SERVICES UNDER MEDICARE

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether discussions are still going on with regard to the inclusion of paramedical services under medicare, such as optometry, chiropractic, osteopathy and the like?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The general answer is yes, Mr. Speaker, but at the moment the discussions are more concerned with making more flexible financial arrangements in sharing the cost of health services.

INCREASE IN GONORRHEA—SUGGESTED EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM AND EXPANSION OF TREATMENT FACILITIES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): I should like to address my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the alarming statistics on the incidence of gonorrhea in Canada recently reported by the department of National Health and Welfare, has the minister considered instituting an educational program to check the rapid spread of this infection and expanding treatment facilities with the possibility of the use of the new antibiotic, menocycline?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): We have noted the statistics to which the hon. member has referred and we have had meetings between the federal and provincial officials to examine the whole area. We think that we have generally worked out satisfactory joint endeavours to cope with the problem.

MURDER AT STE. THÉRÈSE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONDITIONAL PAROLE OF KILLER

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General concerning the murder which happened yesterday in the town of Sainte-Thérèse.

According to newspaper reports, the alleged murderer would have been paroled against his will. Is the Solicitor General aware of that fact and could he tell the House why that individual was released against his will? Does he intend to report to the House in this connection?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the individual was not released against his will. Since August, he had been working outside the institution in a normal way. The fact remains that the day the murder was committed, the Pinel Institute was notified by the Parole Board early in the morning that the parole of the said individual had been rejected.

I have not yet received any information to the effect that the individual concerned would have been advised of this decision by the Parole Board.

SUGGESTED FURTHER CONSULTATION WITH FARM ORGANIZATIONS ON STABILIZATION BILL

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. In light of the fact that the tax reform bill will probably take considerable time in the House, giving the minister ample opportunity to consult the various organizations regarding Bill C-244, has he written or does he intend to write to these organizations so as to enable him to patch up the bill, give it a shot of adrenalin and revive it again in the House in this session?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In the normal course of events I talk very frequently with agricultural organizations and farmers. Certainly I have been hearing from many of them about their desire to see a stabilization program put into effect along the lines of the one that we had before the House. I will certainly give the question of how to move forward with some such program further consideration.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Peace River, but I should like to bring to the attention of the House that there are only four minutes left before the end of the question period and hon. members will have to try to limit supplementary questions. Perhaps from now on the Chair might turn an eye toward the senior and distinguished members who occupy the fifth row at the back of the House to allow them an opportunity to ask questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Would the minister also take into account in these discussions the possibility of such needed reforms as the payment of storage on farm stored grain and a two-price system?

Mr. Lang: As is well known, these two subjects have absolutely nothing to do with stabilization per se.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EGGS—INQUIRY AS TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENT

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Would he answer today the question I asked him on Tuesday, which he said he would answer yesterday, having to do with whether or not there is any payment due to producers of eggs under the deficiency payment program, the assessment period for which ended at the end of September?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): May I say very briefly with respect to this matter that the mandatory support price, that is, 80 per cent of the previous ten year average, is 28.6 cents per dozen on the basis of grade A large. The cumulative average for the 1970-71 year is 30.4 cents, in other words, 85 per cent of the mandatory support level.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that the question period has expired. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed a supplementary and then we will call orders of the day.

Mr. McKinley: In view of what the minister has said and the disastrous prices still in effect for eggs, would he advise whether or not the Agricultural Products Board is considering a fowl buying program and, if so, how soon will it be announced?

Mr. Olson: No, but the hon. member will recall that we did have an egg purchasing program earlier this year when we took 50,000 30-dozen cases of eggs off the market. If we had been assured that there would be a corresponding cutback in production so that there would not be a surplus in the marketplace again, we probably would have gone farther with that program.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps in fairness the Chair should recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley West before we call orders of the day.

PENITENTIARIES

POSSIBLE PROVISION OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS TO INMATES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. In light of the Solicitor General's recent statement on motions regarding in part the payment of the federal minimum wage to correction institution inmates, would the minister say whether he has considered or reached any decision regarding unemployment insurance deductions from the minimum wage so that upon release of inmates a better economic base might prevail for their re-establishment, since the new act does not seem to provide the same kind of security benefits as the former act did?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Provided the Solicitor General introduces his very enlightened policy of rehabilitation of inmates of penitentiaries and provides them with the minimum wage of $1.75 subject to the normal deductions of income tax, etc., I would be very much in favour of the concept that unemployment insurance contributions be deducted so that on release of an inmate he would be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits as are other Canadians if unemployed.

Mr. Rose: Would the minister indicate to the House whether he would use his good offices to persuade the government to institute such a scheme?

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need to persuade the Solicitor General to bring in what is basically his program which I am sure has the endorsation of the government, but I can assure the hon. member that so far as unemployment insurance is concerned I endorse the concept and will do everything I can to see that it becomes a reality.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has to call orders of the day but has made a mental note of hon. members in the last two rows who desire to ask questions and will try to give them some sort of precedence tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader the usual Thursday question about the business of the House for the rest of this week and next week, and also ask him what days may be available to be used as opposition days under supply motions.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, before replying directly to this question, may I make clear a point that might have been left unclear in our discussion with respect to the adjournment debate at eight o'clock tonight, namely, that the rules with respect to the length of sitting and with respect to the length of speeches will be the rules that apply normally under Standing Order 26. I believe that was understood in our discussion, but it would be helpful if it were nailed down now as part of our understanding.

Mr. Speaker: I gather there is unanimous agreement on the point now made by the President of the Privy Council to the effect that the provisions of Standing Order 26 regarding length of speeches and time allocation will apply to the debate that will take place from eight o'clock on this evening.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: I wish to thank the House very much for that assurance.

This afternoon we will try to vary the menu for hon. members by bringing on the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Conventions item, followed by the weather modification activities legislation, and after that the motion to set up the committee to scrutinize statutory instruments. Next week, in addition to the tax bill, I would like to call two opposition days, one definitely on Thursday and hopefully the other one on Wednesday.

Mr. Baldwin: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion to the government House leader and the other House leaders. There have been some discussions among House leaders with regard to the nature of a motion which would be placed before the House. I think there is general agreement as to the terms of an all-party motion which would deal with the question of nuclear explosions in general, and nuclear explosions in the Amchitka area in particular.

In light of the fact that one of the opposition days which the government House leader has mentioned would probably be at the disposal of this party, we are prepared to devote the time which normally would be taken on the disposition of a motion of that kind to a motion moved by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on which a vote would be taken. This would require a variation of the usual practice. I would suggest to the government House leader, if this is acceptable to him and also acceptable to the other parties, that we undertake this tomorrow because the sooner the better.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Peace River has indicated, there have been some person to person discussions since we discussed this matter at our meeting this morning. I should simply like to say that we would agree with the modification now proposed, namely, that this debate take place tomorrow. However, we would like to suggest that it be limited to two hours, that the speeches be limited to, say, ten minutes each, and that the vote, if necessary, be taken at the end of two hours of debate, which would bring the vote on at about three o'clock tomorrow afternoon. I hope you will forgive us, Mr. Speaker, because we seem to be negotiating in public, but at least we seem to be reaching agreement.

Mr. Baldwin: I think that would be agreeable. It is highly refreshing to have something discussed in public for a change.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agree, on the understanding that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should put down the motion that we would debate so that it would be before us tomorrow. We would call it as the first item under government business, or on motions, whichever is the wish of the House, with the understanding that the time taken would be counted as an opposition day. I thank the hon. member for his suggestion. I know he has more time for opposition business than I have for government business, and so I thank him for that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may it be made clear that the motion to be put down by the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be in the wording that was agreed to by the four House leaders? As for the suggestion that he would move it under motions we would accept that, it being understood that the debate would end two hours after it actually had begun.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Apparently the House leaders are clear on what they have agreed to. I suppose we should let the record speak for itself and proceed on the basis of what has been agreed to by the House leaders on behalf of their parties. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES CONVENTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, INSPECTION, OFFENCES AND PUNISHMENT

On the order:

June 9, 1971—Report state of Bill S-13, An Act to amend the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry—the Minister of the Environment.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to the order of business for today.

Mr. Trudeau: That is finished.

Mr. Baldwin: The Prime Minister, as usual, is far behind. We are dealing with today; he is dealing with yesterday. I was wondering if the government would be prepared to reverse the order and agree to proceed with the weather modification bill, which we understood would be the first item of business. That would clear the air for the rest of the afternoon.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I had been asked previously to vary the order to suit another opposition party. I will now vary it back to suit them both, but in this case I won't be suiting the minister behind me because he wants to proceed with the other item. However, on this occasion the opposition rules, and we will call the weather modification bill.

WEATHER MODIFICATION IDENTIFICATION ACT

PROVISION FOR OBTAINING OF INFORMATION CONCERNING ACTIVITIES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S-11, to provide for the obtaining of information respecting weather modification activities, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment) moved:

That Bill S-11, An Act to provide for the obtaining of information respecting weather modification activities, be amended by deleting clause 5 and substituting the following:

"5. Any information obtained by the Administrator or his authorized representative pursuant to this Act may be made public or made available on request to any member of the public".

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, Bill S-11 was first introduced in the Senate on Tuesday, February 9. It received second reading on March 4, following some brief examination by the Senate Standing Committee on Health and Welfare. On March 18 it received third reading, and was subsequently turned over for our consideration in the House of Commons on March 25.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Following a short debate in the House, the weather modification information bill was studied in detail by the Fisheries and Forestry Committee. A few amendments, most of which by the way, were quite acceptable to the government, were introduced. However, one such amendment is in our view not desirable, and I will say why in the course of my brief remarks.

I should like to remind hon. members that the purpose and intent of the bill is to enable the gathering of information relative to any activity undertaken with the hope and the objective of modifying the weather. Scientists generally recognize that although such weather modification attempts are still in their experimental stage, the day will come when it will be possible not only to precipitate and direct the precipitation of rain clouds, to eliminate fog, and control hail precipitation or to direct it, and indeed by design or by accident for man eventually to exercise some degree of control on regional or global climatalogical patterns. But many of the theories have not gone beyond the experimental stage, with scientific proof lacking to back up many claims. This is perhaps one of the newest and one of the most interesting scientific developments in the last decade. However, we must remind ourselves that to play with the forces of nature on such a grandiose scale may produce undesirable and even catastrophic effects. I do not think this is the time and place to catalogue the various possiblities. I should, nevertheless, refer hon. members to a just recently published report of the Study of Man's Impact on Climate—SMIC for short—entitled "Inadvertent Climate Modification". This is published by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology press.

The report is an excellent, up to date compendium of the most recent thinking, practices and theories with respect to weather modification. I think it would be very useful to have on the official record of this House, for the enlightenment of hon. members and the interested public sectors, the test of the statement endorsed by the Sixth Congress of the World Meteorological Organization held in April, 1971. The statement is a recapitulation of arguments used in the committee in defence of Bill S-11 and is a valuable piece of scientific information on the present state of knowledge and possible practical benefits in some fields of weather modification—in fact those fields which are of concern to Canadians at this stage of the game. I should like to quote from that statement, Mr. Speaker, the brief summaries of the current status of weather modification in several categories, as follows:

Stimulation of Precipitation: Of the many experiments conducted in this field, only a few have clearly demonstrated that seeding has increased the precipitation; in some cases there is even evidence of a decrease in the precipitation. However, there is some evidence that orographic precipitation can be modestly increased by seeding, particularly during the winter, over the mountain ranges of the western U.S.A. There is also some evidence that sub-tropical convective clouds, selected on the basis of numerical models, become taller and larger when they are heavily seeded so as to release latent heat. In view of the high correlation between the size of convective clouds and the rainfall from them, the seeded clouds presumably give more rain that if they had not been seeded. Confirmation, however, is required from further suitably designed experiments.

Dissipation of Fog: Supercooled fog and stratus can be dissipated by seeding them with ice nucleants or by means of cooling agents. This has been brought into operational use at several airports at which there is a relatively high incidence of supercooled fog. The more common warm fog may be dissipated by the use of heat, hygroscopic particles and the down-wash of helicopters. Successful experiments have been reported with each of these techniques but, in addition to other disadvantages, they have been considered too expensive for general use. Recent experiments, guided by numerical modelling and using carefully sized hygroscopic particles, offer some prospects for a more economical technique.

Hail Suppression: After extensive experiments and the development of a model of hail growth, substantial successes in the reduction of hail damage have been reported from the U.S.S.R. Recent experiments in other countries have shown some reduction in hail damage with varying techniques, but more adequate numerical and physical models need to be developed.

Hurricane Modification: Recent hurricane seedings off the eastern U.S.A. coast have been accompanied by reduced maximum wind velocities for short periods. Confirmation is required from further experiments. In view of the limited opportunities for hurricane seeding, there is need for improved numerical hurricane models to strengthen the scientific basis of the hypothesized hurricane modification and to provide guidance for future experiments.

I do not wish to repeat what I said about this bill at the committee stage, Mr. Speaker. I should like now to address myself to the specific amendment which stands in my name. It was my view that at the committee some confusion seemed to surround the wording of clause 5. I should like to remind hon. members that the original wording of that clause was found to be objectionable. The result was that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) submitted an amendment which was adopted by the committee. I am somewhat in disagreement with the use of the word "shall" in the text of the amendment submitted by the hon. for Timiskaming and I am proposing that the word "may" be substituted therefor. I think I can now convince the hon. member for Timiskaming that we are in agreement on the intent of our respective amendments. Our differences of opinion seemed to centre around the use of the word "shall" or "may".

I have two learned opinions on the matter to back up my particular amendment with the use of the word "may". Let me quote from a well-known and respected authority on parliamentary practice, namely Dr. Ollivier who recently retired from his functions in the House of Commons. The report of the committee on health, welfare and social affairs dated February 18, 1969, reads as follows at page 480:

I want to make the distinction between "may" and "shall". When we say that the Governor General may do something, it means that he shall do it. You never say that the Governor in Council shall do something. That is the distinction. If you impose a duty on a commission you say that the commission shall do it, but if you impose a duty on the Governor in Council you say the Governor in Council may do it. On that second point I am not quite in agreement. It forces the Governor in Council to do something.

I think what Dr. Ollivier was saying in a tactful way was that it is not polite in a legislative context to use the word "shall" with reference to the Governor in Council.

The other opinion with respect to the use of the word "shall" or "may" was referred to by my minister and I quote from Hansard of June 21, 1971, at the bottom of page 7182, the second column as follows:

—I have been given by law officers of the Crown who were seconded to my department from the Department of Justice. They have been consistent in recent years in interpreting Canadian legislation and, as a non-lawyer, I do not wish to question their advice in this connection. They use the word "may" rather differently than most of us do in everyday conversation. They use it, implying an obligation, a very serious obligation. The obligation is on the minister. The minister has a public duty, which I am certainly prepared to accept and which I am sure all future ministers of the environment will be prepared to accept, to act in certain ways which are outlined in the bill. This is a duty which will be enforced by Parliament.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I continue quoting:

The word "shall" differs, implying mandatory action enforceable through the courts. It is a question of whom the minister must regard as his master or, to put it another way, who the real master of the minister is. Is it to be Parliament or the courts? If, in the last analysis, his master is the courts, then our draftsmen use "shall". But if it is Parliament, then "may" has real significance and is binding on the minister.

That is my reason, Mr. Speaker, for bringing forward the amendment to clause 5. May I assure all hon. members that the administrator of the act will comply with the intention of the act in its amended form.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House deals with weather modification and, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Corbin) said, it received thorough study when it came before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Over the past few years in Canada weather modification activities have been quite sporadic. However, technology is advancing and we can, therefore, expect that such activities will increase in the years ahead. It is therefore necessary for the authorities to be made aware of any activities that may be contemplated. It is also necessary for them to be informed in detail of all such activities that are to be carried out. This, basically, is the reason behind this bill, a bill which calls for the appointment of an administrator to whom a report must be made, on the required form, by anyone desirous of engaging in weather modification activities.

At this particular point in time, Canadians are not entirely certain that cloud seeding, when carried out, will increase rainfall or alter the weather pattern in any particular part of Canada. However, from a scientific standpoint I believe it is absolutely essential that action, as contemplated in this bill, be taken, so that we may have an awareness of and detailed information on all weather modification activities either contemplated or carried out in Canada.

We do not have too many criticisms of this particular bill. That is unusual. However, it does not state the name of the department which will assume the responsibility for supervising the actions of the administrator and which will supervise and be responsible for tabulating the reports that are filed by people planning to engage in such activities. I presume that the administrator will be operating in co-operation with the Canadian Meteorological Service, since it is part of the responsibility of that service to study the nature and behaviour of our atmosphere. I hope that this question will be resolved by the minister or his parliamentary secretary later, when we debate this bill.

This bill is important not only to Canadians; it is important to North Americans as well as to peoples in all parts of the earth. As we are becoming increasingly aware, our atmosphere knows no international boundaries. In recent years additional emphasis has been placed on cleaning up our environment, which includes the earth, the water on and surrounding the continents and the air we breath. We are aware, for example, of the vibrations that were created around the world before the tests were undertaken on Amchitka Island. Hopefully, these vibrations will result in postponing indefinitely all these tests. In like manner, we are made aware of the effects of fall out from nuclear tests made many years ago, for traces of radioactivity and radioactive substances have been found in our far northern areas. These substances could only have been carried by the winds which blow from the four corners of the globe. It is very important, therefore, that we have control of all activities which may pollute the air we breathe. We, on this side of the House, therefore, support the principle of this bill.

As I said a moment ago, our earth's atmosphere knows no boundaries. I would therefore ask the minister or the parliamentary secretary, what steps were taken and what representations were made to the Russians or to the United States, our two giant neighbours, to ascertain, prior to the drafting of this legislation, whether they are considering something comparable to Bill S-11, since any action taken by either of these two great countries which would pollute their air could have a very damaging effect on Canada. I believe that a topic of this importance should be debated at the United Nations. It might be something that could be undertaken by a special international committee, for unless everyone is alerted to the necessity of cleaning up the atmosphere, of cleaning up all our air, we could all be in trouble.

I understand that the Russians have been carrying out a hail suppression program in some areas of their country. There are reports that they have fired silver iodine artillery shells into hail clouds and, as well, that they have shot rockets into hail clouds, with some degree of success. Since we, in Canada, up to now have only been studying hail storms, has the government given any thought to date to exchanging scientific data with the Russians on this matter in order that destructive hail storms could in future be either broken up or curtailed before valuable crops are destroyed? It would also be interesting to learn if the Americans have perfected hail control programs since they, too, suffer from this atmospheric phenomenon in certain parts of the United States.

One part of the bill, clause 7 dealing with offences and punishments, I believe is worthy of comment. That clause provides that anyone guilty of an offence is liable, on conviction, to a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both. In my view, anyone charged with interfering with the forces of nature, or anyone who is subsequently charged with this offence, should pay a much larger fine than that stipulated in this bill. It seems to me that a $1,000 fine is not a sufficient deterrent with regard to such crime.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate, most sincerely, to interrupt the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). I am wondering whether we are proceeding in an orderly fashion, since we are now considering, at the report stage, the amendment proposed by the parliamentary secretary. I am wondering whether we should not at this stage limit debate to what is before the House and, on third reading, make the type of speech which is being made by the hon. member for South Shore. It seems to me that it might more appropriately be made on third reading, after we have considered the amendment. I appreciate what the hon. member is saying; yet I think that we should be orderly in our consideration of the bill and follow regular procedure. It seems to me that the proper procedure would be for the House to consider the amendment before us and then later this afternoon when we reach the third reading stage of the bill, we might at that point give consideration to other matters which are not at this time before the House.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I shall heed your admonition. As a matter of fact, my next comments were related to the amendments proposed by the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment. I do not have a copy of the amendment. As I understand the suggestion, he was dealing with clause 5 which reads as follows:

• (3:30 p.m.)

Any information obtained by the Administrator or his authorized representative pursuant to this Act may be made public or made available on request to any member of the public,—

The amendment, as I understand it, is to change the word "shall" to read "may". We on this side of the House are concerned about any attempts to curtail information or limit the knowledge which may be available to the general public. We believe that such important information as this obtained by the administrator should definitely be made public on the request of any member of the public. We have always followed the course of endorsing the word "shall" in preference to the word "may". In our view, this removes any possibility of the administrator at any time refusing to give information to any member of the public who may be interested in seeing it. Without any further comment, I wish to place on the record that as far as we in the official opposition are concerned, we prefer to see the bill passed as it is now written, using the word "shall".

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, earlier this afternoon the government House leader indicated that there had been an objection to proceeding with this bill today, but that he had learned from across the floor that the objection had been withdrawn. It was I who had objected, but only because I was hoping the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) could be here because of his keen interest in this piece of legislation. When I learned that it would be impossible for him to be here this afternoon and that he had nominated me to speak in his stead, there was nothing for me to do but withdraw my opposition. It is interesting to note the number of subjects about which one has to learn something when he occupies a role such as I happen to have in this party.

I am very grateful to the parliamentary secretary for his reference to the hon. member for Timiskaming and to the keen interest that he has shown in this whole question of weather modification equipment. This is germane to the report stage amendment now before us, Mr. Speaker, because what the parliamentary secretary is seeking to do is make a change in an amendment that the hon. member for Timiskaming was successful in getting the standing committee to adopt.

Earlier this year the hon. member for Timiskaming filed a public bill in his name, Bill C-24, entitled An Act to Govern, License and Regulate the Operation of Rainmaking Equipment in Canada. During the course of session—it was on April 5—the member was given the right to withdraw his bill and have its subject matter referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry so that the subject matter of his bill could be considered along with that of Bill S-11. The parliamentary secretary also paid tribute to the interest of the hon. member and the work he has done on the subject. I am happy to have this opportunity, in his absence, to commend him on his concern about this whole question.

As for the change that the parliamentary secretary now proposes, even though I am an opponent of split infinitives and of sentences that end with prepositions, and even though I am a stickler on the proper use of such words as "shall" and "will", when it comes to this "shall" and "may" business, I feel like the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). If we really want it done, I would rather say "shall". When I am told I shall do something, I do it, but when I am told I may do something, I may not.

Mr. Baldwin: You never do it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friend, the House Leader of the Official Opposition, knows there are times when we may decide that we shall do certain things. The parliamentary secretary has made the case that has been made frequently, not only by Dr. Ollivier, but by others over the years, that when we are speaking about things that are done by the crown or even done by the executive in the name of the crown, there are circumstances in which "may" has the force of "shall" even though this is not the case in so far as ordinary mortals are concerned.

I am not sure that I can persuade my friend from Timiskaming on this point. He has a language of his own which he uses effectively. It may be impossible to explain to him that «may» means «shall». However, if the parliamentary secretary and the minister are saying to me by nodding their heads, as I think they are, that the word «may» as the parliamentary secretary wants to put it in the bill will nevertheless require the administrator to make this information public and, in particular, will require the administrator to make available to any member of the public who requests it—I stop because I want to see which way they will move their heads. They are nodding them up and down.

Mr. Davis: The hon. member is on the right track.

Mr. Corbin: May I answer the question raised by the hon. member?

Mr. Speaker: The member may rise on a point of order. I gather he already spoke.

Mr. Corbin: I am attempting to answer the question. If I can do it on a point of order—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps the hon. member can ask me a question. He can ask whether I understand such and such.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member understands extremely well the intent of my amendment and I congratulate him for that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you for your patience, Mr. Speaker. We have it on the record and that is what is important. At least I will be able to show what has been said to the hon. member for Timiskaming. If this report stage amendment passes, as report stage amendments moved by the government side usually do, it will be clear that the administrator under Bill S-11, known as the Weahter Modification Information Act, does not have an option. He must make public the information referred to in clause 5 and, in particular, when any member of the public makes a request for that information, it shall be made available to him.

Mr. Corbin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I assure the hon. member that such will be the case. However, I must also tell him at the same time that the information will be made available to the public on request, as long as it does not contravene some other legislation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I suppose that applies to any statute. I hope it is not like the payments to the Wheat Board under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I hope there will be no repetition of our experience in connection with that legislation. The word "shall" is used in that act, and look at what happened. Perhaps we are better off with "may" than with "shall". At any rate this point has been cleared up. I shall get in touch with my hon. friend from Temiskaming and try to persuade him that what he wants is what the bill requires. I am glad to note that the information obtained by the administrator under this act will be available.

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the parliamentary secretary a question? I understand the distinction between "shall" and "may"; as my hon. friend from South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has said, this party has always been concerned that there should be the fullest possible disclosure of information. To this end there is a bill on the order paper, Bill C-250—by chance it happens to be in my own name—calling for public disclosure. It is modelled on the legislation in the United States and in Scandinavia which provides that the onus is on the government to make a case when it wishes to refuse information. Can I have an assurance from the parliamntary secretary that, having examined this bill, he will be prepared to give it reasonable support.

Mr. Speaker: I have to bring to the hon. member's attention that the parliamentary secretary has already spoken. Perhaps the question might be asked and answered in other circumstances, for example, tomorrow during the question period.

Is the House ready for the question?

Motion (Mr. Corbin) agreed to.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries) moved that Bill S-11, to provide for obtaining of information respecting weather modification activities, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave, now.

Mr. Davis moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES CONVENTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, INSPECTION, OFFENCES AND PUNISHMENT

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries) moved that Bill S-13, an Act to amend the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Davis moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Bill S-13 to amend the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act is a very simple piece of legislation. Its purpose is clear. One of the great problems connected with Canada's coastal fishery is that of over-fishing. We badly need enforcement procedures which will allow us to set quotas in co-operation with other countries and make sure that those quotas are not exceeded. This bill provides the legislative support required to enable us to put our enforcement officers on vessels owned and operated by nationals of other countries. It also provides a reciprocal right on the part of other countries to investigate the operations of Canadian commercial fishing vessels on the high seas. In other words, this bill provides legislative authority for a system of inspection on the high seas, particularly in the north Atlantic. It will enable us to enforce reasonable quotas, quotas which will be consistent with sound conservation.

The Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act applies to the north Atlantic and at the present time it covers all those nations which are signatory to the international convention for the northwest Atlantic. These countries include Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iceland, Italy, Japan, Norway, Portugal, Rumania, Spain, U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, Poland, the United States and, of course, Canada. This legislation would enable officers from Canadian fisheries protection vessels to board any fishing vessel owned and operated by the U.S.S.R., or the U.K. or Portugal, for example, check the gear, check the catch, and so on. We shall no longer be operating on the basis of rumours or hearsay as to what other nations are catching off our shores. We shall be able to provide facts, and use these facts in our development of sound conservation measures.

[Mr. Davis.]

As a result of a Canadian initiative, most other countries have passed similar enabling legislation and we expect that this legislation, which is reciprocal, will be in effect in 1972.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I do not intend to take up the time of the House for very many minutes on this bill. We in this party agree with the purpose of this amendment. I might add that the measure has been passed without amendment by the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Increasingly, it is being recognized that the living resources of the sea—and these resources in the northwest Atlantic are very rich—are being over-exploited by the nations of the world. It is more than 20 years since the nations chiefly concerned joined together in the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention, commonly known as ICNAF, to control the exploitation of these resources. To begin with, control was chiefly limited to restrictions on net sizes and so on, regulations which could be generally enforced at the home ports of the vessels involved. For many years, enforcement was the responsibility of the country to which the fishing vessel belonged and which was a signatory to the convention. But as time went on the nations concerned, and Canada most of all, realized that regulations of this kind were not sufficient to safeguard the future of the resources by making sure they were not over-exploited. It was realized there had to be a beginning, at least, of closed seasons in some areas and complete prohibition of fishing for certain types of fish, possibly for given periods.

Concurrent with that, it was recognized that the former method of enforcement would probably not be adequate. As a result, an agreement was arrived at, I think at a meeting at St. John's, Newfoundland, in 1970 whereby the members of ICNAF agreed that there would be reciprocal enforcement among all members with regard to their fishing vessels. The minister will correct me if there are any technical errors in what I have said in that respect, but it was agreed in principle that enforcement officers of any of the signatory nations could enforce the regulations mutually agreed upon regarding the fishing vessel of any of the other nations operating in the ICNAF areas.

I think that this is a very important new principle of international law. We are recognizing that if any Canadian fishing vessel on the high seas infringes the regulations to which we as a nation have agreed, the enforcement officers of any other nation can on request board our vessel and make sure it obeys the law. This would be a principle that probably would be abhorrent to strong advocates of freedom on the high seas in the purest sense. However, on the other side of the coin, I think the time has now come when nations with special problems on the high seas—and most of these waters are classified as the high seas—must get together with other nations and be prepared to relinquish some of their rights for the common good. Further, they should mutually agree to exchange certain rights and obligations so that, as far as humanly possible, all vessels operating within ICNAF areas are made subject to the regulations mutually agreed upon, even if these regulations have to be enforced by the enforcement officers of another member nation.

Having said that, may I say I think this legislation is a step forward. It is a reasonable and forward looking attempt to regulate in a sensible manner the conservation of a renewable resource in the northwest Atlantic, to the future benefit of the countries concerned. In view of our geographical position, if these objectives are achieved I am sure Canada will benefit in the long run more than any other country. We are hoping that this will be the result of this small but very important step that we are now taking.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, last June when we discussed this bill in committee, I think it was generally agreed that no amendments would be offered when it came before the House at report stage, and as we have seen today this has happened. I should like to say that the members of my party are in favour of the legislation. As indicated by the previous speaker, this measure is certainly a step forward in the enforcement of conservation measures as far as the North Atlantic fishery is concerned.

During the discussion of this bill one or two matters did not come through too clearly, so perhaps the minister could clear them up when he concludes debate on this bill. As I recall it, the indication in the discussions last June was that Canadian inspectors would be given the right to inspect the ships of member nations of ICNAF and that these other nations which had inspection ships in the area would likewise have the right to inspect Canadian vessels. One of the points that I think the committee failed to discuss was whether there was any sharing of the cost of inspection.

It is my understanding that some countries—I believe Norway was one but there are other small countries—have no intention of putting inspection ships into this area. While these countries are willing to accept inspection by Canadian or by ships of other member nations, they themselves will have no inspection crews to check the fishing vessels of other nations. Therefore, I am wondering whether there is any kind of pooling arrangement under which the inspection costs are assumed by the nations that inspect, such as Canada, since it is one nation that is not only interested in this fishery but vitally affected by it, or is the cost going to be shared by those nations which do not have ships in the area to do this checking?

I am not too sure how effective Canadian protection officers are going to be in checking vessels that fish the area that has been outlined. We had some discussion of this matter during committee stage, and I was given to understand that the patrol boats would make surprise checks, which I think would be a proper way to carry out their duties. If our inspection forces suspect that the vessels of other nations are not complying with the regulations, say in the matter of fishing gear, size of mesh or type of fish caught, then these vessels can be checked. As I said earlier, I think this is a very good thing.

One point that was raised in committee, and which I would ask the minister to comment on when he concludes this debate, is whether the minister has any further information on the controls desperately needed as far as the inshore salmon fishery is concerned. I believe there are some areas outside the coverage of ICNAF. Certainly, the Atlantic salmon is one species that desperately needs protection, and some of the nations have been reluctant to reduce their catch. I do not think the commission was able to get majority agreement on this point at the last meeting. I might be wrong, but I believe there was hope there would be agreement amongst the nations to reduce the salmon catch, particularly to the west of Greenland where apparently the Atlantic salmon are caught in great quantities and the catching of them seems to have adversely affected propagation of this species in our Canadian waters. If I am wrong on that point, I should like the minister to correct me, or at least to inform us whether he has any further information regarding this particular species.

I do not think there is much more that we can say about the act. It is a very short and limited piece of legislation, but again I want to say that periodic inspections carried out on this very valuable fishery resource is something that we have long required. I am hopeful that we will see more co-operation than ever before among the nations of the world so far as our fishery resources are concerned, and I think that conservation is the key word in resource development. We are glad to see that a number of nations in the world are willing to move progressively to ensure that adequate checks are made in reaping the crops from this particular fishing area. Again I say that we endorsed the bill in committee and that it is the intention of our group to vote for the bill on third reading this afternoon.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I, too, wish to speak briefly on the bill before the House. As the minister has stated, this bill was dealt with by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry which held hearings on these important changes.

This is an important change in the act governing the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries, in view of the fact that our fisheries resources off Atlantic Canada are facing serious depletion. When the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries was set up in 1949 it was charged, as I understand it, with the responsibility of investigating, protecting and conserving the fisheries of the Northwest Atlantic Ocean in order to make possible the maintenance of the maximum sustained catch from these fisheries. It would appear, in view of the decline in our fisheries stocks, that ICNAF has failed to fully discharge its responsibilities. I say this because one of our best managed fisheries resources, if you could use that term, namely our haddock resources, are practically depleted. They are fished in areas called subareas 4 and 5. They have been almost completely destroyed. Unfortunately, this is also true in other areas coming under ICNAF where herring, flatfish, cod, redfish and other species are fished. We heard, for example, a few weeks ago of action taken by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) when he put forth an edict that herring could only be caught in Canada for human consumption. I agreed entirely with that action, but no information was given along with that announcement as to whether the minister or the government had taken any steps to secure agreements with other countries that they, too, would abstain from catching herring for other than human consumption. So today, off the coast of Atlantic Canada we still see the enormous fleets from Europe, the Russian fleet primarily, the fleet from East Germany and the fleet from Poland, to name but a few, and these massive fleets are still taking all the herring they can catch.

I ask the minister, in what manner do we conserve the herring resources in the North Atlantic by limiting the catches of Canadians to herring for human consumption only when there has been absolutely no effort, so far as I know, to obtain agreement from the Europeans to take similar action? This is not conservation, it is only curtailment of Canadian fishing activities. Desirable as this is in order to maintain the fishery, it would appear that other action must be taken or else we are acting in vain, as has already been stated here. Apparently the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries has not been capable of acting in time to take proper preventive measures. It does not act, it reacts after the various species are depleted.

It was mentioned a moment ago by the previous speaker that we face serious loss in the North Atlantic of our salmon resources. Here we have one country, namely Denmark, taking something like four million pounds of salmon a year on the high seas. I realize that efforts have been made to obtain international agreement on the curtailment of the catch of fish, the androgynous species, on the high seas. However, so far as I know, to date no agreement has been reached. So, the Danes are literally milking a cow which they neither own nor feed. We, as Canadians, make efforts to restock our salmon resources but in many cases the last we see of the salmon is when they go down Canadian rivers to the sea. They never come back. We must secure some type of agreement with other countries to prevent this from happening. To travel among Canadian fishermen today is to meet with a group of men who are somewhat frustrated and who are very concerned about their own future as well as the future of their industry in view of what is happening on our continental shelf.

Other countries are taking some action to extend their fisheries jurisdiction. Iceland, for example, which depends for some 90 per cent of its income on the fisheries, has taken action. The Icelandic parliament has introduced a resolution to implement fisheries jurisdiction over their entire continental shelf before November of 1972. When taking that stand they did so for a very definite reason. They wanted to set down their course and to make it clear to all and sundry that this is what they will present as a nation when they come before the 1973 Law of the Sea Conference. They look upon the continental shelf surrounding Iceland as being part and parcel of their country. They maintain that there would not be an Iceland without a continental shelf. I believe this logic could also apply to Canada. We certainly would not be a nation, a country, without our continental shelf. Certainly, a coastal state must have a prime interest in, and a primary concern with the fisheries surrounding its shores.

After all, Mr. Speaker, if you had a right to go to a bank and take out money any time you desired, you would look with disfavour on any action that would bar you from continuing that course of getting funds. Similarly, European countries do not look with favour on any legislation which limits them from taking any quantity of fish they like off our banks, off our continental shelf. I am not saying that we should take over control of the continental shelf and ask all other fishing nations to stop fishing in that area, but I believe that we must take a stand. I believe we must extend Canadian fisheries jurisdiction out to the limit of our continental shelf.

To date our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has expressed concern. Our Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) has expressed concern. Some action has been taken towards establishing a 12-mile limit but today, Mr. Speaker, when you visit fishermen, in-shore fishermen and off-shore fishermen, they talk of the 12-mile limit almost in terms of it being a joke. There is very little fishing activity carried out within 12 miles of our shores. There has been so much over-fishing on our off-shore banks that the amount of fish that can be taken in our in-shore areas is very limited. This accounts for the frustration of our fishermen, and they keep asking their elected representatives "Can nothing be done"?

Some Latin American countries have extended their fishing jurisdictions 200 miles from their shores. Off the coast of Latin America this is very important because when they extend their fishing rights 200 miles from their shores they are covering the Humboldt current, which is one of the richest fishing currents in the world. They have done this in order to protect the fisheries for their own people. We in Canada must consider some type of fishing jurisdiction over our continental shelf if we are to survive as a fishing nation. I submit that we should no longer even consider fishing limits on a 12 miles scale. We should start considering depths, something like a 500 fathom area because this is the depth, or close to that depth, in which some of our deep-sea fishing trawlers are operating.

Now, returning to the bill, which I endorse, because even though it is not going to be too helpful we welcome any assistance that will be beneficial, I question the manner in which it will be enforced. I believe the minister stated that such legislation has been adopted by other countries, and that it will be acceptable to them. But to date, to name but one country, Russia has refused to have any examination made of fishing equipment below decks on its vessels. As I say, I question the manner in which this legislation will be enforced. Possibly the minister, when he winds up the debate, will enlighten us on the manner in which the regulations will be followed and enforced on ships operating on our continental shelf.

Only last Friday we learned of the over-all concern of the people in Atlantic Canada who are engaged in the fishing industry when representatives from Newfoundland, from Nova Scotia, from Prince Edward Island, from Quebec, from New Brunswick met in the West Block with the Minister of the Environment, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). They made a very good presentation, with a written and graphic brief, describing the over-all decline of the fisheries. Some of the figures which they presented to that meeting told a story of over-fishing, of complete disregard for the resources so far as other countries are concerned, a course which, if followed, within the next five years would bring about a total depletion of our over-all fishing resources.

At that meeting we were told that the catch of codfish has declined by 50 per cent in the last five years. We were told that haddock stocks were decimated almost to the point of no return. We were told that European countries were now concentrating on the flat fish, yellowtail, flounder, sole and such species, and that if the overfishing continues these particular species too will soon be decimated. At that meeting they presented certain resolutions which I think should be placed on the records of this House because their suggestions and their proposals are worthy of consideration by the government. They suggested, and I quote:

Speed up the phasing out period of all foreign activity in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. In the process there should be discussions with the Canadian fishing industry on the Canadian aims in dealing with the St. Pierre question and how it relates to the eventual control and management of the continental shelf.

Enforce the 12 mile limit immediately in all areas around the Newfoundland and Labrador coastline and zone or "box off" certain important areas on the east coast for the exclusive use of in-shore fishermen during certain periods of the year.

Obviously, this is not being done. They also recommended that the government exclude gill net fishing from all off-shore banks. Again, I quote:

Discuss with Iceland, Norway and Denmark immediately Iceland's proposal to implement the 50 mile limit which is to be effective in September 1972. Also discuss the plans of the other two countries to follow similar action. We believe this will be a very useful exercise in determining what areas the Icelanders, the Norwegians, the Danes and the Canadians can work together toward achieving the common aim of extension of management control over their respective continental shelves.

Either close out all fishing activity on Hamilton Inlet Bank during the pre-spawning and spawning season for a minimum period of three years or implement immediately a crash quota system to apply for the 1972 fishery and to continue in existence until sufficient research is carried out to determine what quantity of fish can be safely taken annually from this stock and still maintain a maximum sustainable yield.

Close off all fishing activity during the haddock spawning period on the Southern Grand Banks where haddock concentrate for spawning and restrict fishing activity along the western slope of the Grand Banks during the haddock migration period. This action to facilitate the recovery of this important species for which scientists have so little hope at the present time.

Implement sea and air surveillance on whatever scale is necessary to establish the level of activity on our continental shelf and to locate this facility where it can effectively do the job. This type of surveillance is necessary to determine what effort is required in this direction for effective management control on the shelf. This facility should also incorporate the Air Sea Rescue Service which is now totally inadequate to do the job.

Step up research on critical species such as cod, flounder, redfish and haddock in all areas to determine what action is required to maintain sustainable yields. The knowledge of quantities that can be safely taken from fish stocks will bring stability to the industry by determining the fishing effort required and the number of shore jobs which the industry can support. If this knowledge had been available and acted on in the past we would not be here today, stated the groups spokesman!

• (4:20 p.m.)

Make known to the foreign fishing nations our strongest objection to gang fishing which is not only contributing to overfishing but in some cases presents a definite hazard to the lives of Canadian fishermen.

Continue discussions with the Danes and take every possible measure to eliminate high seas fishing for salmon.

Canada should make its position absolutely clear at the 1973 Law of the Sea Conference that Canada as a coastal state will not accept anything less than full management control over the marine resources on the continental shelf by the end of 1973.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the basis of the brief presented to the three ministers on Friday morning. It is a well worded brief and contains some very definite suggestions which we in the Official Opposition endorse. In view of the serious economic conditions faced by the people in Atlantic Canada as a result of the decline in our fisheries resources, I urge the minister to give careful consideration to these well thought out proposals. If acted upon they should be helpful to Canada in establishing our position when we come before the 1973 Law of the Sea Conference where, hopefully, we can gain some control over these fisheries resources which are so important to our people in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister has already spoken and, of course, at this stage of the proceedings may speak again if members give unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacLean: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before the minister closes the debate, perhaps I might ask him if he would indicate to the House what countries so far have passed legislation which will allow enforcement officials of other countries to board their vessels? In other words, what countries have passed legislation comparable to this?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) asked several questions. An important one was whether the international convention for the North Atlantic organization failed in its duty, as outlined in its terms of reference, to conserve the fish stocks of the north Atlantic. I think a short answer has to be, yes, it has failed in its duty. It has failed to conserve the fishery resources of waters commonly described as the high seas.

As a nation, we have extended our own exclusive limits. We have included all of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, all of the bays and inlets around our coast and 12 miles out to sea beyond that. Still we have not covered the largest continental shelf in the world and our own immensely productive shelf off Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

The North Atlantic convention for the conservation of fish stocks has failed to protect those stocks, has failed miserably in a number of cases. It has failed badly in respect of haddock and may be failing in respect of other groundfish species. The mighty cod is either at the point of maximum sustainable yield or has been pushed beyond it. In other words, there is excessive pressure on our ground fishery. Stocks and catches have been failing in recent years.

Having said that International Convention of countries that fish commercially in the North Atlantic has failed in the past 22 years, I owe it to the convention to ask the question whether it can recover its balance and in future do the sort of job it was originally designed to do and asked to do. I think the answer is yes—a qualified yes, if it can have the authority, if all the countries fishing in the north Atlantic will back it or, as is more likely to be the case, it can be used as a medium for negotiating agreements resulting in certain practices such as reducing the fishing efforts of all countries in the North Atlantic it can be a success.

It is making a beginning on haddock. Quotas are now being set up to establish a fishery which will first of all recover and then operate on a sustained yield basis on Georges Bank. An important conference is to take place in Rome next February, an interim meeting of the members of the North Atlantic fishing community. This conference will deal with the matter of quotas. Hopefully, and certainly this is the thrust of the Canadian submission, quotas will be set in respect of herring. Canadian fishermen take half the herring. But, we have a continuing interest in this particular species and there are indications that it, too, is approaching the point of over-exploitation.

Our basic approach is to establish a managed fishery not only in our own exclusive limits but out over all our continental shelf—which in places extends 400 miles into the Atlantic—and all of the slope beyond it and to insist that in future it is by agreement, a managed fishery. It would be necessary for the scientists of the member countries, all 14 of them, to agree on condition of the stock that exist there, the numbers of fish that should be conserved and on a maximum catch, thus ensuring useful production for the indefinite future. There is the tricky question, but I am sure it can be answered, of sharing out the sustainable yield between nations. Finally, there is the matter of policing the extent of the catch and the manner in which the catch is taken. The bill before us addresses itself to the question of policing the catch of all important species.

I was asked several questions today. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) asked whether other countries would share in the policing of this fishing effort. It is true that Canadian fisheries protection vessels will be patrolling off our shelf and a number of other countries will not have vessels of that character in the area. We will be doing more than our share of the policing. Perhaps this is as it should be because we claim it is our shelf. It is much closer to our shores and thus much easier for us to do the policing.

This bill gives us the authority to go on board any vessel of any other country and we will be doing more of this type of inspection. The Canadian taxpayer will be putting up much of the money. When the whole scheme is in effect and all the stocks of the north Atlantic are under a sustained yield management, I think we can then claim, as a coastal state, to have a special position, to have put more into the shelf management operation than the other countries, to be entitled to an increasing share of the pie, so to speak, and to be on the inside track when it comes to sharing of stocks of new species caught in the area. I would hesitate to ask other countries to share in the policing activity when I think this could be a good thing for the future, to assert our sovereignty and to obtain a larger share of the catch under good management in the longer run.

Questions were asked about Atlantic salmon. This is another threatened species of fish. The fishery has been over-exploited all along the east coast of the Atlantic. It is now confined largely to rivers in Canada, principally Labrador, the north shore of Quebec and New Brunswick. There has been fishing pressure from European countries in recent years off Greenland. The Danes are progressively pulling out of that fishery, partly because they expect to go into the European Common Market which precludes them from fishing around Greenland, and partly because the fishery itself has fallen off. They are getting out of the salmon fishery and, using the same fishing vessels, they are fishing off Africa. Indeed, the Danish government is subsidizing the conversion of its salmon vessels, still about a dozen in number, for use in fisheries in other parts of the world.

Our basic approach to the next Law of the Sea Conference and our basic approach to the North Atlantic fishery with respect to salmon is that there should be no fishing by any nation beyond the exclusive limits of that nation. If our resolution passes, at the 1973 Law of the Sea Conference and that law becomes the law of the sea with respect to salmon, there will be no high seas salmon fishery to police, because no nation would take salmon on the high seas.

Our remaining problem will be of course, that any Canadian salmon or salmon spawned in Canadian rivers which swims to within 12 miles of Greenland and which inhabits those waters will continue to be taken by the Eskimos based in Greenland. There will be a continuing problem in that regard, but it will be nothing like the problem we have recently experienced with respect to the unrestricted fishery for Canadian salmon on the high seas.

There was reference to the action which Iceland is proposing. Iceland is now proposing to extend its 12-mile fishing limit to 50 miles. Iceland's principal reason for the change is that the 50-mile limit around Iceland neatly includes most of the continental shelf off Iceland. It does not include all of it; it includes all but a part of it.

Their 50 mile limit is a simple limit; it is easy for captains of fishing vessels to observe. As I say, it is an Icelandic formula. It does not suit Canada because we have a much larger continental shelf. If we were to set it at 50 miles, that would mean that we would have to exclude the 350 miles of the Grand Banks extending eastward from Newfoundland. We intend to include the whole of our shelf, which is, of course, a bigger shelf. We intend to cover the whole shelf and hope to gain management control over the sustained operations over the whole of the shelf. We will share the product of the shelf on a sustained basis with other nations, do the bulk of the policing, if that is the wish of the other nations and, in effect be the manager if not the total exploiter of our shelf.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question. Would he indicate when we can anticipate an announcement by the minister of that policy which he has just enunciated, namely, that we intend to go for the management of the fisheries resources of our entire continental shelf.

Mr. Davis: I think the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) will recall that one of the first speeches I made as Minister of Fisheries I made in Boston. It was about ten pages long and explained our policy. What I said then has been our policy ever since. It is the approach we will take at the next Law of the Sea Conference. We want to make sure that sound conservation practice is extended to the whole of our shelf and its slope. We are prepared to fish our shelf along with other nations on a co-operative basis, but with Canada being on the inside track; and, in so far as the exploitation of new species is concerned, we would have the total fishery. That has been our policy. That is our policy today.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one further question. I hesitate to interrupt the minister. Has the government indicated to the Icelandic government, for example, that we as Canadians will support their resolution which, if I read it correctly, states that their continental shelf fisheries resources will be managed by them in the area between 50 and 70 miles off the shore. That area is to include their natural continental shelf which, in one area, extends out for 70 miles. Will we, as a nation, take the public stand that we are endorsing that type of action in the hope that Iceland, in turn, will support our action when we go before the 1973 Law of the Sea Conference?

Mr. Davis: There is common ground here. We have worked closely with the Icelandic fishing industry in respect of getting the price of fish up, and in respect of the optimum management of the continental shelf. We are interested in the fishery out beyond 50 miles. We are not interested in a 50 mile only policy. What I have referred to is a total shelf policy. We may cheer them on, but I do not think we should follow their policy in detail, Mr. Speaker.

There are one or two other points I should like to touch on, Mr. Speaker. I would not like to leave the impression that our commercial fishery off the east coast is in the process of being wiped out. It is in difficulties, in that the resource itself is under heavy pressure offshore from very large fleets owned by a number of countries. Indeed, the number of countries is increasing. Japan has recently entered the fishery off the east coast as well. Yet the total catch in quantity this year, in 1971, will be in the same order of magnitude as the highest catch ever taken in the North Atlantic. And because of the higher prices which we now obtain for our fisheries products in the markets of the world, the total income to the fishery will be very much higher this year, 1971, than it has ever been. So, in terms of income, we are making progress. It is in terms of fish stocks that, we have a problem, and this is the area in which we must work closely with other nations.

As for the other points which have been raised are concerned, I was asked how many of the 14 nations have already indicated their willingness for reciprocal policing of their vessels by our own officers, and vice versa, in the North Atlantic. I am sorry that I cannot answer that precisely. I think about ten nations have already taken the necessary steps, either by regulation or by passing legislation. All are expected to do so before the convention meets again next year in June. The principal nations about which we are really concerned, the USSR and the United States, have signed and we are anxious to start operating reciprocally with them now.

Perhaps a few statistics could be of interest. I think anyone listening to this debate would have the impression that over the years other offshore nations have been taking the bulk of the fish from our shores and continental shelf. This is true with respect to cod. The offshore nations collectively took two-thirds, and we took about a third of the cod. However, Canadians took more than half of all the other species, including herring which may be in jeopardy, and haddock. The average figure is 50 per cent. Canadians currently take 85 per cent of the total catch of scallops off the east coast. Canadian commercial fishermen take 80 per cent of the pollock. They take 60 per cent of the herring, 50 per cent of the haddock, 50 per cent of the red fish and 50 per cent of the flounders. So, good conservation practices will depend in considerable measure on our own good practice as well as the practice of other nations.

I am glad to note that hon. members in all corners of the House support this legislation. I am convinced that it will help us eventually to develop a policy to bring about orderly production and better remuneration for the commercial fishery in the North Atlantic.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That Standing Order 65(3) be amended by adding thereto the following:

> "(c) On Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, to act as members on the part of this House on the Joint Committee of both Houses established for the purpose of reviewing and scrutinizing statutory instruments standing permanently referred thereto by section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, to consist of 12 members;"

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its Members to act on the proposed joint committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a very few remarks in connection with this motion to establish an additional standing committee, a standing committee that is intended to be a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament. Hon. members will be aware of the history of this process in establishing parliamentary machinery for reviewing regulations and other forms of administrative legislation. The setting up of this scrutiny committee is really the final step in that process.

As hon. members will recall, in the first session of this Parliament, a thorough review of this question was undertaken by a special committee under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). On the basis of the committee report, the government prepared the Statutory Instruments Act which was passed earlier in the present session.

I believe that consultations have been held with members of the opposition with regard to this particular motion and that it has the general acceptance of the House. As has been pointed out in previous speeches that have been made in discussion on the bill, it is intended that the committee will operate in a non-partisan manner—at least that hope has been expressed and agreed to by members who have taken part in previous debates.

It has been suggested by the committee that the chairmanship of the committee be rotated or moved about among members of various parties in the House. Perhaps if that procedure is followed, it will give some incentive to carry out the work of the committee with a minimum of partisanship, although I am certainly not advocating that partisanship be removed from the House of Commons or any of its committees generally.

Even though it will be a joint committee, the committee will be small. It will probably require members who are expert in this field and who, over a period of time, will develop a growing expertise in the examination of statutory instruments, administrative regulations and so on. The work of the committee will be a continuing job because of section 26 of the act which provides for a permanent referral of the subject matter to the committee.

It has been recommended by the committee, under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, that this new scrutiny committee be assisted by a skilled expert staff in order to perform its work effectively. I believe that recommendation of the special committee received the support of the House and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) in the debate on the act. It is probably a good idea to get the committee organized as quickly as possible so that the expert staff required, however, small it may be, can be recruited and assigned to the work of this committee.

I do not propose to say anything further because the ground has already been covered in a previous debate. For those who would like to refer to previous discussions on the work of the scrutiny committee that is proposed in this motion, I refer them to the debate of Monday, March 8, 1971. It contains quite a full account of the discussion at that time in which distinguished members of this House, including the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the Minister of Justice gave their views on the work of the committee. I should revise my inclusion of the name of the member for Winnipeg North Centre because his participation was confined to one or two small interjections. The main burden was carried by the hon. member for Peace River and the Minister of Justice.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we endorse this motion. I am sure it will pass. When the motion does pass, I hope the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) will engage in the usual consultations to secure the submission of names of those from this House who will form the committee so that, in conjunction with the members of the other place, the committee will be formed and immediately commence its operations. One of the first and most difficult tasks the committee will have will be to develop a jurisprudence with regard to this very important issue.

I do not want to traverse the ground we already covered in the debate. However, I should again point out that practically every bill that comes before this House has a clause that deals with regulatory powers granted to a minister, tribunal, board or the governor in council. This is a tremendously important subject. I think this fact is emphasized by item 78 on the Order Paper, a motion standing in the name of the President of the Privy Council which deals with the right of the committee to be appointed to study the kind and nature of legislation to deal with emergencies. There is an amendment to the motion by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) to give the committee the right to look into the circumstances surrounding the problems in Quebec last year. To stress the importance of this motion, if this committee had been active, it would have had the right, pursuant to the Regulations Act, to look at the order in council which contained the proclamation to bring into effect the War Measures Act. I think that simple statement underlines the importance of this committee.

I wish to very briefly put before the House some of the recommendations of the select committee to which the President of the Privy Council referred, and of which I was a member. They are to be found in the third report of that committee of the 1968-69 session. The committee recommended what should be the powers, duties and functions of a standing committee. I will not say anything about the composition of the committee as it will be comprised of members of the other place. I do not have any objection to that. There is something to be said for the fact that it will provide a measure of continuity which may be very important. One proposal is as follows:

All regulations should stand permanently referred to it.

This is what the select committee recommended. This will be brought about by the terms of the statute.

It should strive to operate in an objective and non-partisan way.

I agree with the President of the Privy Council that in this House we operate on the adversary system. Hopefully, not as much of this adversary system is carried into all committees. There is bound to be some. If this committee is going to function, not to place a nail in the last plank of the coffin of bureaucracy but at least a nail on the last rail which will hem bureaucracy in a corral behind it, it will have to examine and scrutinize with a measure of objectivity those things which are referred to it. To that extent, I recommend that when the committee is constituted the first chairman be selected from the ranks of a party other than the government. That, of course, is up to the committee. I like to think that it will at least start out on that basis.

This is the practice in the United Kingdom where the chairman of the special scrutiny committee on statutory instruments is always a member of the opposition. I am not suggesting this should necessarily be the case here, but I hope it would start out like that. "It should have a small membership". That condition is met. "It should normally sit in public session." I do not think there will be any objection to that. "It should be empowered to sit while parliament is not sitting". "It should have adequate staff". I pause here to enlarge upon that recommendation. The success of the United Kingdom committee is to a large extent ensured by the effectiveness of its chief adviser, who is counsel to Mr. Speaker at Westminster. I do not suggest we follow this procedure precisely here, but if this committee is to function effectively in examining statutory instruments and checking the operations of government boards and tribunals which operate under statutory instruments it should have an adviser with some knowledge, some training, some considerable experience, who would function as a kind of ombudsman in collaboration with the committee.

• (4:50 p.m.)

When we consider the thousands of statutory instruments which are passed in a year, I would think it would be physically impossible for this committee to deal with them all. But it is the experience in the United Kingdom and, I think, in Australia, that an effective, capable and learned chief executive operating with the committee is able, through the simple method of making telephone calls and taking part in discussions, to weed out a lot of the difficulties and faults which appear in statutory instruments so that the committee is left with the task of dealing only with matters which cannot be settled by discussion. I would imagine that through telephone coversations or personal discussions a proper officer would be able to weed out most of the areas of difficulty before they get to the committee.

A final proposal is that it should examine regulations on the basis of six criteria:

Are they authorized by the terms of the enabling statute?

That is manifest.

Do they make some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the statute?

That is very important.

Do they trespass unduly on personal rights and liberties?

Have they complied with the provisions of the Regulations Act?

Do they represent an abuse of the power to provide that they should come into force before they are transmitted to the Clerk of the Privy Council?

And so on.

I suggest that a committee which is objective, hard-working and properly staffed would perform a function which has long been needed in this country. I wish to confer my blessing, and the blessing of our party, on this committee. I feel that since the lives, the fortunes and the liberties of the people of Canada are affected to the extent of almost 90 per cent by statutory regulations rather than statutes, this committee will be one of the most important committees to function under the authority of Parliament during the course of the next few years.

I have taken a little longer than I should have taken. I hope that if necessary we can trespass to a limited extent upon the private members' hour in order that this motion may be passed and the process of setting up the committee begun.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of what we ought to do about regulations and other statutory instruments is one which lends itself to lengthy discussion. However, I believe there are not many who wish to speak in the debate today; perhaps there is a general disposition to complete an afternoon of accomplishment by getting this motion through by five o'clock. I shall therefore take only a minute or two to say that, just as we welcomed the passing earlier this session of the statutory instruments bill, we welcome this motion which will establish a standing committee to which statutory instruments, regulations and so on can be referred for scrutiny. I concur in the general attitude which has been expressed both by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) to the effect that this committee must approach its work in an objective manner and also to the effect that it will be engaged in a very important activity.

It is our experience in Parliament time and time again to think we knew what we passed when we gave final approval to a piece of legislation, only to find months later that things were being done or restrictions were being imposed of a kind we did not believe appeared in the bill at all. When we try to find out what happened, we discover that we had given authority to the Governor in Council to make regulations for the carrying out of the purposes of the act and that under this authority restrictive regulations were passed, or restrictive definitions introduced of such a nature as to produce quite a different result from the result we thought had been intended. I could give a number of examples of this sort of thing, but since time is limited, I shall refrain from doing so now. This is an area which the committee ought to scrutinize very carefully. I would hope that with the committee exercising an eagle eye there might in future be fewer departures by way of orders in council from what Parliament really intended.

A few moments ago I said I would not make references to examples. But let me give just one, not in order to be contentious, but merely to make my point. Take the new Unemployment Insurance Act. Because we gave the Governor in Council the power to define "earnings" we found that things were happening which we did not expect and that in many cases benefits were greatly reduced. I use this as one example. There are others. So this kind of job is extremely important, and we are therefore glad to give our support to the motion to establish a standing committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motion, (papers) and public bills.

• (5:00 p.m.)

PRIVATE BILLS

CENTRAL-DEL RIO OILS LIMITED

On the order: Private Bills.

June 10, 1971—Resuming the report stage of Bill S-12, An Act respecting Central-Del Rio Oils Limited, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.—Mr. Harries.

And resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Skoberg, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre),—That Bill S-12, An Act respecting Central-Del Rio Oils Limited, be amended by adding the following to Clause 1 at line 27 on page 1:

"on the condition that sections 52 to 56 of the Bank Act apply to the company mutatis mutandis notwithstanding the provisions of Part I of the Canada Corporations Act."

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I understood the Clerk at the table to be reading an item with respect to Bill S-12, which is No. 3 on the list of private bills. I had understood that we were proceeding with the bill relating to the Royal Victoria Hospital, which is No. 1 in any event.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is quite right; that was merely an oversight.

ROYAL VICTORIA HOSPITAL

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved that Bill S-19, respecting the Royal Victoria Hospital, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend the charter of the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal, one of the great hospitals not only in Canada but in the entire world. It has provided outstanding medical care to several generations of Canadians and produced many great medical personalities.

The Royal Victoria Hospital was incorporated as a charitable corporation by act of Parliament in 1887. Its charter is found in the statutes of Canada 1887, 50-51 Victoria, chapter 125. As members of the House might expect, the charter is very much out of date. It was passed at a time when hospitals were established by individual initiative and philanthropic associations. There was no medicare and very little government intervention. Times have changed and now the state is very much involved.

The purpose of this bill is to bring the charter up to date, and in particular to bring it into line with the provisions of the Quebec Hospitals Act and the medicare legislation. The principal provisions of the bill are as follows. First, it eliminates the right to establish branch hospitals. Second, it eliminates the provisions for ex officio governors. Third, it provides a new method for appointing governors to the board of governors. Fourth, it eliminates certain passages regarding indigent patients due to the introduction of the Quebec Hospitals Act and medicare. Fifth, it eliminates certain references to the laws of England and it changes the provisions regarding the official visitor. Sixth, it eliminates the requirement to obtain the consent of the heirs of Lord Mount Stephen and Lord Strathcona for a change in the charter. Both men have been dead for many years and their heirs are in the third and fourth generation and scattered all over the world. Lastly, the bill amends the charter so that the minister of health of Quebec under the Quebec Hospitals Act can recommend adoption of certain orders in council for financial grants and bond issues.

Since it is urgent that this bill be passed as soon as possible, I would ask the House to give it quick passage at this stage so that it can go to committee.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on this bill. Since such a famous institution as the Royal Victoria Hospital is under discussion, I think acknowledgement should be made of those men who founded it. Eight men founded this hospital, and they were Sir George Stephen, Sir Donald A. Smith, Hon. John J.C. Abbott, Alexander T. Paterson, James Wentworth Buchanan, Richard B. Angus, Andrew Robertson and Thomas Davidson.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

This hospital was established in 1887, at a time when there were not many hospitals in Canada. It was one of the first hospitals in the province of Quebec, and it has achieved a very enviable reputation over the years. It was one of the first hospitals in the province that treated the sick, medically and surgically, and those who were indigent in whole or in part and unable to provide for their own welfare.

I think it might be worthwhile to draw to the attention of the House the fact that hospitals were often founded by religious bodies. In Judaism it was always believed that the rich should look after the poor. The Christian religion established this principle, and Christ himself in his own teachings said—and many Christians at all periods have found the motive for their philanthropy in these words—"Truly, I say to you, as you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me". Some, however, with a materialistic view of the rewards and punishments of the afterlife, have seen, in almsgiving especially, a means of making God their debtor, and this was particularly obvious in the mediaeval period.

When St. Bartholomew's Hospital and Guy's Hospital were established in London in the year 1100, it is interesting to note that a lot of their patients were poor people who had no place to sleep or to rest. They were down and out and they went there to get a meal or to be looked after. Of course, some of them were sick. So that the founding of these hospitals lies in the humanities.

As I have said, the Royal Victoria has a very enviable record. From the time the hospital was a private corporation until the present day it has been one of the famous teaching hospitals in Canada, in fact on the North American continent. It is renowned in the field of medicine and has been made famous by many of its graduates. Among those who have held teaching positions in this institution is the name of Osler, and it is of interest to note that Osler was born about 40 miles north of the city of Toronto. It is a name known in medical circles throughout the world. Osler held the post of professor of medicine at Oxford University. Dr. Archibald, the great chest surgeon, also taught at the Royal Victoria Hospital and at McGill University. Wilder Penfield, the neurosurgeon who established the department of neurosurgery at the hospital is recognized as an authority in his field throughout the world.

I could go on at length to name outstanding doctors who have graduated from this institution, doctors who have not only made their name in the field of medicine in Canada, but in the United States and other countries they visited. In the march of events, however, it is necessary that changes now he made in the charter and statutes of this hospital to comply with the Quebec Hospitals Act and the Quebec medicare plan. It is hoped that under the Quebec Hospitals Act this teaching hospital will continue its great progress, not only in disseminating the knowledge of medicine but in the care of the sick.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, when Parliament in 1971 seeks to amend a statute that has remained intact for 84 years—since 1887—I think it is a unique occasion. I understood the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) to say there is a two-fold purpose in the bill; first, to modernize or bring the charter up to date in the general sense, and second, to make it comply with the Quebec Hospitals Act. I have some wonderment as to what we are really seeking to accomplish, apart from the general purpose of endorsing the hospital itself, its concepts, and what it seeks to do in the medical and health areas. I do not think there is any disagreement about that fact.

When the bill was before the Senate, it was referred to the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I have not followed the proceedings of that Senate committee, so I really do not know at this point what matters the Senate committee inquired into in so far as legalities and constitutional matters are concerned. But perhaps some consideration should be given to just what it is we are seeking to do. Before I get to that, I understood the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce to say that the gentlemen who were the initial sponsors and promoters and who incorporated the Royal Victoria Hospital have long since died. Yet, I see that the names of these individuals who are enumerated in clause 1 of the bill, namely, Sir George Stephen, Baronet, the Honourable Sir Donald Alexander Smith, and the others are the same individuals who are enumerated in the statute of 1887 under section 1.

In this bill we are seeking to repeal section 1 of the statute of 1887 and to replace it with clause 1 of this bill, and yet we still carry on the names of the individuals mentioned in the statute of 1887 as being the incorporators of the Royal Victoria Hospital. I have no argument with that. I assume that it is done out of historic recognition, not out of any legality inasmuch as these gentlemen were the ones who initially incorporated the Royal Victoria Hospital. If it is done out of recognition of the contribution they made to the establishment of a Protestant faith hospital in the city of Montreal with the intention of establishing other hospitals in other provinces, then it is fine with me, although if it is not for the purpose of the recognition of these gentlemen I do not see the legal necessity of saying that there are a number of gentlemen in the city of Montreal in the province of Quebec together with such other persons are as hereafter associated with them. From the point of view of draftsmanship, I do not see any sense in talking in the present tense, about people who are deceased, and saying that there are other persons who are likely to be associated with them, all of whom will carry on the functions of the Royal Victoria Hospital so that it may be a continuing organization and so that it does not decline if individual members of it pass on. This, it seems to me, is a strange sort of approach for Parliament to be taking, and I wonder whether perhaps an explanation could be given by the sponsor of the bill when he has the opportunity to speak in closing the debate.

The other thing that disturbs me and makes me wonder about what precisely we are doing here is the very simple fact that when the Royal Victoria Hospital was incorporated in 1887 it was authorized to do certain things, one of which was to establish a hospital in the city of Montreal to be called the Royal Victoria Hospital. That is fine. The charter goes on to say, also convalescent cottage hospitals as branches thereof at Banff, in the Northwest Territories and in Caledonia Springs in the province of Ontario. Such being the case, I think it was necessary in 1887, since under the provisions of the constitution health is under provincial jurisdiction, to superimpose on top of that a national authority, a federal corporation giving the incorporated Royal Victoria Hospital authority to extend itself beyond the boundary of the province of Quebec, or indeed beyond the boundaries of any other province as the case may be. Presumably, this is what the Parliament did in 1887. It said, yes, we will incorporate the Royal Victoria Hospital with a federal or a national identity and give it a national complexion and a charter, thus authorizing it to go beyond the provincial boundary and into Alberta, the Northwest Territories and Ontario as specified in section 1 of the statute of 1887.

What we seek to do here is to repeal section 1 of the statute and to replace it with something else. Some of the things we replace it with are extracts from the statute of 1887, but there are some things that are left out and one of those is the authority to establish convalescent cottage hospitals in Banff, in the Northwest Territories and in Caledonia Springs in the province of Ontario. We are now saying that all the authority which the Royal Victoria Hospital has under the statute of the Parliament of Canada is to establish a hospital, one only, in the city of Montreal in the province of Quebec, and this is a continuing thing. In fact, the explanatory note to clause 1 reads as follows:

> The purpose of this amendment is to remove the Hospital's power to establish branches outside Quebec. The Quebec Hospitals Act contemplates the establishment of "a hospital" only.

In other words, we are now removing the authority of the hospital to establish itself or branches thereof in other provinces, and we say that its sole authority will be confined to the city of Montreal in the province of Quebec. So, the need to have a national charter seems to disappear. In fact, the constitutional requirement under the BNA Act that health, civil rights, medical care and so on, be under the authority and the exclusive jurisdiction of the respective provinces makes me wonder even more why the Parliament of Canada is involved in this situation. In addition to that, the province of Quebec, probably more so than any other province over the years on a continuing basis, has been extremely jealous, and rightly so, of the constitutional jurisdiction it has under the BNA Act. When the late premier Duplessis was in office, he even contended against becoming involved in expenditures under the Trans-Canada Highway Act and becoming involved in receiving federal grants to universities. There was a strong concern about constitutional jurisdiction within that province. Because of that concern, I wonder whether we as the Parliament of Canada are embarking upon the correct course in seeking to do what we now do under the bill. I wonder whether, in fact, we should not be paying respect to the constitutional jurisdictions of the provinces, in this case the province of Quebec because that is where the hospital is, and is to remain, and whether we should not simply repeal the statute of 1887.

All throughout the explanatory notes to the subsequent clauses of the bill, those following clause 1, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and as also—I am not getting into the details of them now—there are three or four references that I can see, just at a quick glance, wherein clauses or sections of the act of 1887 are being amended to meet the requirements of the Quebec Hospital Act and, in another instance, the Quebec medicare plan. If this is so, if this is the purpose, to have the Quebec Hospital Act prevail, which I am sure is what the case must be within the constitution, why do we have to go through the process of the Parliament of Canada seeking to comply with a law of a province, which that province has exclusive jurisdiction under the constitution to enact in any event?

It would seem to me that if the Quebec National Assembly, exercising its authority under the constitution to pass legislation with respect to hospitals, were in fact to pass such legislation, then any federal legislation would become null and void. How can there be two jurisdictions here? How can there be the Parliament of Canada saying with respect to a particular hospital, "Here is one set of rules, one set of circumstances, one set of proscriptions and activities," and the Quebec National Assembly, exercising its authority under the constitution, saying "Here is another set of circumstances, and here is something else that is going to prevail"? It seems to me that we do not need to go into the process of saying, "Yes, we will pass other legislation now with respect to the Royal Victoria Hospital in order that a statute of the Parliament of Canada and the operations of the Royal Victoria Hospital meet with or comply with the requirements of the Quebec Hospital Act." Surely those operations must do that now. Surely, the Royal Victoria Hospital must comply with the provisions of the Quebec Hospital Act, which is exercised exclusively within that province?

Surely, the operation of the Quebec medicare plan as it has application to the people in that province is paramount and overrides any decisions which the Parliament of Canada might make, because it is operated within the province's exclusive constitutional jurisdiction? These are the doubts or wonderments I have in my mind. I am not objecting to advancing the structure, the authority and the provisions relating to the hospital so that its administration and internal operations may be modernized and brought up to date, reflecting more the needs of the people in that province who go to that hospital. I am not questioning that at all, but what I am questioning is the whole constitutional issue of whether we are really on the right track, and whether or not the most appropriate thing might be simply to repeal the statute of 1887, because obviously the bill before us came here by petition. It is a private bill. It came by petition of the principals of the Royal Victoria Hospital themselves. I do not know who they are at the moment, who signed the petition, or sought to have the bill introduced in the Senate. That is immaterial. But whoever they are, they represent the hospital, and the hospital as a corporate society is saying, "We no longer want to have the authority to establish convalescent cottages outside the province of Quebec. We only want the authority to have the hospital established and maintained within the province of Quebec, as it always has been."

Then they are seeking to say, "In addition to that we want the federal statute that was enacted in 1887"—and presumably there was good reason for its enactment at that time, since there was not any medicare plan, any hospitalization plan,—which was enacted and established at a different time, under a different set of circumstances, and with a different concept about society with respect to medicine, hospitals and payment of bills to be changed now and adjusted to meet the Quebec Hospital Act.

I submit that the Quebec National Assembly, operating within its jurisdiction, has enacted sufficient legislation within its own jurisdiction that we are not competent in a constitutional sense to question it. This is the thought that I have to express. There may be some points I missed in all of this, not having had the opportunity to look at the record of the proceedings before the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee which examined this particular bill. I do not know whether or not this question of the constitution, this question of the exclusive jurisdiction of the province to enact legislation in this field of health and medical care, was discussed in the Senate committee, to what extent it was discussed, and what answers were given by the constitutional authorities. But it seems to me, without that kind of background knowledge of what they did, this is a valid point that should be considered.

I am not saying that we should not give second reading to the bill and refer it to the committee. That will take place in due course this afternoon. But it seems to me that unless those questions are answered, and answered clearly, we are in fact likely to be offending against the British North America Act, against the attitude of the government of Quebec which consistently has been to uphold rigidly and clearly the provisions of the BNA Act in those areas where the Quebec National Assembly has exclusive jurisdiction, and this appears to be one of them. I say that this appears to be one of them, unless there are some constitutional provisions within that act, as there are sometimes, that carry forward a special arrangement outside of the provisions of the constitution, such as was the case in Nova Scotia, where for many years the province of Nova Scotia had a special set of laws relating to divorce matters. They were laws of the Parliament of England that, by virtue of a provision in the BNA Act, were carried forward and remained in effect in what became the province of Nova Scotia.

As I say, there may be some provision in the BNA Act with respect to the Royal Victoria Hospital, or with respect to the establishment of hospitals, which gave at that time some authority to the Parliament of Canada to be able to enact special statute law in that area. These are things that need to be examined. I hope that when the bill gets to committee this question will be cleared up because it would seem rather a needless exercise for us to go through the process of passing a statute with respect to amending the Royal Victoria Hospital Act of 1887, and then find out it was not necessary, that the whole process was ultra vires of our jurisdiction in any event.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

I recognize the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the comments made by previous speakers on this bill and I am happy to note that there is no objection in principle either to the proposal or to its adoption.

I should mention, I think, that on reading the proposed amendments it is clear that the only object of this Senate bill is to amend the act of incorporation of the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal so that it be in accord with the Quebec Hospitals Act.

With regard to the department of National Health and Welfare I would like to say that this matter affects only the internal administrative arrangements of a province and, therefore, does not fall directly under the department's jurisdiction.

The constitutional apprehensions raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) are not, I think, as serious as he seemed to maintain. In my opinion, this legislation, both from the legal and constitutional point of views, is quite acceptable.

I would also like to reply to a question of the hon. member for Skeena about clause 1.

The enumeration contained in clause 1 refers to certain persons incorporated. Those named there are generally designated as the founders of that renowned hospital. It is still customary to mention people belonging to the corporation. This clause lists people who at the beginning set up the corporation and the sole purpose of the proposed amendment is to remove the hospital's power to establish branches outside the province of Quebec. The Quebec Hospitals Act contemplates the establishment of one hospital only.

Finally, I want to point out that the Quebec Hospitals Act could soon be replaced by Bill 65 that provides for complete re-organization of health institutions and social services in the province of Quebec. When the legislation becomes law, it will probably be necessary to amend our legislation.

Anyway, we cannot see anything in the present bill of national scope to which we would feel it a duty to oppose. I must say also that we do not believe the bill runs counter to any provision of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

Therefore, I recommend the adoption of Bill S-19.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read for the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

CENTRAL-DEL RIO OILS LIMITED

The House resumed, from Thursday, June 10, consideration of Bill S-12, respecting Central-Del Rio Oils Limited, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and the amendment of Mr. Skoberg (page 6588).

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, first a point of order in regard to Bill S-21. Did I understand correctly that this bill has been dropped? I did not quite understand the translation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. That bill was stood.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, there was debate when Bill S-12 was before us for second reading, and I am very aware of the debate when it went to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. That was a most unfortunate debate, to say the least. I am also aware that we have an amendment which would call for bringing this company, Central-Del Rio Oils Limited within the sphere of Canadian ownership.

Many people have suggested that we in this House should not be hung up on the idea of Canadian ownership, that there has to be a complete change in the area of ownership of companies. I agree with this and ask the government why they have not brought in regulations in light of the report which the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) made to the cabinet last June.

We are all well aware of the problems that exist in various parts of the country in regard to what should be construed as Canadian ownership and what direction should be given to corporations residing within our boundaries. In view of the concern expressed by many eminent people about the type of regulations we have and the direction the government should be giving, we are entitled to ask that safeguards be written into the bill to spell out clearly where ownership will be Canadian and direction as to the destiny of Canadian corporations, which means the destiny of thousands of employees.

Not long ago I read a book on this subject, entitled "Canada can Thrive," by Raymond Spencer Rodgers. It appears that when we talk about nationalization or nationalism we are all tagged with a name which really means retaliation. In 1958 there was a move afoot to try to bring about this type of nationalism and so gain the respect of the younger people of our country.

We have a difficult situation at present with our good neighbours to the south. Some time ago the Carling Company selected Baltimore as the site for a brewery. The legislature in Maryland vetoed the bill on the ground that this Canadian company was not 51 per cent American owned. In that case the executive power stepped in at the last moment and set the legislation aside. In related incidents involving the U.S. Customs, Canadian corporations have suffered. The book gives examples of various areas where exports are affected. At page 26 appears the following:

> It cannot be said that Ottawa has been vigorous in its approach to this problem in the past.

We talk about the Canadianization of certain industries, about the type of bills we should enact and whether we should introduce amendments that would bring foreign-owned industry under the control of the Canadian people. The book continues:

> During the fourth session of the twenty-fourth Parliament, a private company sought incorporation in Ottawa. Only the most spirited opposition by the old CCF, plus two Conservatives (who were thought to be crossing party lines for having done so—though in fact the matter did not relate to a government bill) prevented the Aurora Pipe Line Company from being completely American in composition.

I am using this as an analogy because it is similar to the case now before us, although the company with which we are concerned, Central-Del Rio, is really Canadian. If we are interested in Canadian ownership and Canadian direction we must ensure that amendments are included in every bill that goes through this House to make absolutely certain that this will be the case. The book continues:

• (5:40 p.m.)

CCF MP Harold Winch said in the debate that "this House of Commons is being asked to give its stamp of approval to a company that first of all has no interest in Alberta. Everything will be exported for secondary industry in the states of Idaho and Montana" through a half-mile long border pipeline, built by a U.S. controlled company.

His colleague, Arnold Peters, added that "if it is necessary to spend $15,000 to build this pipeline, then goodness gracious, surely the Canadian people could afford to do this if it would give them the key to the complete control of the Alberta oil fields and the export markets."

A little lower down the page appear these words:

After months of opposition the backers of Aurora finally made a verbal promise that the majority of the directors were to be Canadians—even if only sleeping directors. And as the bill passed into history, Ernest Broome, the only Tory MP to consistently follow Diefenbaker's theory made this final observation:

"I am pleased with the announcement"—

Even though two Conservatives of those days took a stand to which their party must have taken exception, I have yet to hear any Liberals or Conservatives in debates of this type speak on the difficulties with which Canada is faced. We must all be concerned about Canadian nationalism. I submit that it is not good enough for assurances to be given in the House of Commons. Amendments such as the one proposed should be included in the bill. The preamble ought to say that the company shall remain under Canadian ownership.

It is not good enough for us to be given that assurance by word in the House of Commons. There must be guarantees to make sure that this company continues as a Canadian company. I realize that at this time 90 per cent of the shares are Canadian owned. Nevertheless, as one of the directors forcefully told the committee, we cannot control the destiny of the company once its shares are listed on the stock exchange.

If we are truly concerned about who controls our industry, we should be more concerned about the decision-making process in Canada. We therefore ought to provide, either in a clause or in the preamble of the bill, that companies such as this in Canada will be controlled and directed by Canadian directors who are ordinarily resident in Canada. It seems to me that the definition of "resident in Canada" has arisen in connection with other bills. That is a matter we ought to be concerned about in view of the difficulties Canada faces. It is no use having a corporation say that it will abide by the law of the land and make sure that its ownership remains Canadian: we must see that in writing and in legislation.

Not long ago when this matter was before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications questions were directed to the president of Central-Del Rio Oils Limited regarding the tabling of the first quarter's interim report. I believe we asked for that report to be appended to the transcript of the committee's proceedings. That request was made on May 20, 1970, and as yet the report has not been made available. At that time we wanted to know whether he was prepared to answer questions regarding the inclusion of clauses affecting ownership. Some members of the committee took exception and suggested that the question was not proper.

It seems strange that since the president was prepared to answer such questions, members of the committee—some of whom are in the House this afternoon—took exception to questions which, if answered, would clarify the situation that we face in Canada. We were sincere in trying to elicit that information. If the rest of us are equally sincere, then I suggest there should be no objection to obtaining answers from such witnesses.

It should be noted that on page 12:15 of the committee report an hon. member on the government side is reported as saying:

—there is no government policy, no Canadian policy about foreign ownership as yet, and therefore I think Mr. Skoberg is out of order.

He went on to say:

He cannot force them to go into anything, or promise anything in that direction, unless there is some sort of a policy adopted by Parliament, and there is not such a thing yet.

That state of affairs could go on indefinitely unless the government is prepared to bring in regulations and implement the report which has been submitted by the Minister of National Revenue regarding the ownership of Canadian industry. The cabinet ought to consider the report made to it by the Minister of National Revenue and table it in the House. Perhaps the government is afraid to table it because the minister's report is similar to the Watkins report. Perhaps the government is concerned about statements made by people like Dr. Rotstein who is an associate professor in the department of political economy at the University of Toronto. He is reported as saying that events since August 15 had proven the legitimate concern expressed by Canadians, "some of whom are called nationalists and some of whom are interested in Canadian independence without wanting to be called nationalists."

I suggest that amendments ought to be incorporated in the bill to guarantee the Canadian ownership of this company. I think such amendments would be acceptable to the House, to the company concerned and to the Canadian people. There ought to be in the bill a definition regarding residence. Such a definition is included in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. At the same time there ought to be amendments providing that the majorities of directors of this and similar companies shall at all times be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada. I presume that this type of commitment could be included in this bill. It should be in writing and should not be given verbally. If that were done there would be no reason why bills such as this should not be passed by the House of Commons.

We ought to be concerned about the outstanding shares of this and other companies. That matter ought to be looked at closely. We should take a leaf from the Bank Act amendments on which this amendment is based, because the adoption of such an amendment would guarantee

Canadian ownership. I realize, of course, that if the amendment were adopted the company would face regulations with which other companies are not faced. That brings me back to the original question. Where do we begin establishing so-called Canadian ownership and protecting the Canadian consumer? I submit that if the government had adopted some of the proposals suggested by this party, we should not now face our present dilemma.

I wish to refer to some of the things said on the subject of ownership. What I am about to quote was not said by a raving socialist. He is the vice-chairman of MacMillan Bloedel in Vancouver. He said:

• (5:50 p.m.)

We are no longer a nation of consumers quarrelling with manufacturers and retailers; no longer unions and employers pursuing separate interests; we are no longer separatists with cultural axes to grind.

We are suddenly and simply Canadians without economic allies, very much on our own, and we shall need all our intellectual resources—our plain horse sense—in business, in government and in the universities to devise measures that will defend our aspirations as effectively as the Americans, the Europeans and the Japanese defend theirs.

This was stated by R. W. Bonner, vice-chairman of MacMillan Bloedel, Vancouver.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I have doubts about anything he says.

Mr. Skoberg: It appears from this type of quotation that even people in this position are finally being hurt by the actions of people outside this country. As long as we are not in a position to control our destiny through legislation and even the small amendment we ask to this bill, we are at the disposal of people in other countries.

We are interested in trying to bring about some type of recognition for Canada. We are not married to the amendment. If there are other substitutes, we in our party will be only too pleased to accept them. At the same time, we insist that there be some protection in writing for the Canadian people. In the bill before us there should be some type of resolution, preamble or clause to spell out that the directors of this company should be Canadian for ever and a day. If this can be done, possibly we could accept this bill in so far as the CPR and Central-Del Rio are concerned. We have suggested many times there should be a modification in respect of the number of directors.

If we look at the many comments made by people across this land there is no reason to back off in demanding that there be some type of Canadian ownership. The policy of the company may be their prerogative. At the same time, the type of business that the company carries on, in so far as the protection of the Canadian people and Canadian workmen is concerned, is the prerogative of the Parliament of this country.

Canadian content is one of the main problems we have to face. Canadians all across this country ask about this. When they find there is no employment for them. Today we learned of the increase in unemployment. This question is being asked by young people on street corners and workers in automobile plants throughout the land. They are asking Parliament what it is doing to protect their Canadian heritage. We are being asked to ensure that they will have job opportunities in so far as any operation in Canada is concerned.

I noted another release with regard to the problems we face. This all goes back to the incorporation of Central-Del Rio in so far as the federal charter is concerned. I quote as follows:

The Windsor-based automobile equipment manufacturer last week was awarded a federal government incentive grant for $381,-000 to locate a plant in Sault Ste. Marie that would manufacture machine steel bases and columns.

Because of the changing atmosphere it was decided to locate the plant and carry on business across the border. Even though industrial commissioners in the Soo tried their best to get the management of the plant to reconsider their action, they were informed by the vice-president of the company that they would not move to the Soo because of economic conditions in the country.

I am sure all members are asking themselves what brought about these economic conditions in our country. In fact, what are we really doing to ensure that situations such as this—which is only one of many hundred in the last month or two—are properly dealt with?

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

[Translation]

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act to support employment in Canada by mitigating the disruptive effect on Canadian industry of the imposition of foreign import surtaxes or other actions of a like effect.

An Act to amend the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair to resume same at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO INCREASE EMPLOYMENT AND PRODUCTIVITY

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to special order made earlier this day, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), seconded by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), moves:

That this House do now adjourn.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce certain measures to deal with the current problems facing the Canadian economy and to sustain and reinforce the growth of production and employment now taking place. In terms of production, employment and prices, the Canadian economy is on the course I envisaged at the time of my June budget, before the United States economic measures of last August were announced. The disappointing news concerns unemployment; it is very disappointing. I told this House that I had expected unemployment to fall in the second half of this year, and the hard fact is that the September figure is three-tenths of a point higher than it was a year ago. I do not wish to minimize in any way the seriousness of this fact.

Output is advancing strongly. It grew at an annual rate of 2.3 per cent in the first half of 1970, 3.5 per cent in the second half, and then accelerated to 6.2 per cent in the first half of this year. In the second quarter output was rising at a rate of 8.5 per cent per annum. The strong increase in the August index of industrial production confirms that this pace is being maintained. This, then is the recent record of real production, quite apart from any changes in value attributable to price developments.

Domestic demand has been growing with output. Consumer spending is coming on strongly and, if anything, rather earlier than we had expected. Its pick-up in the second quarter was very pronounced and was distributed widely over the whole range of goods and services.

Capital investment in machinery and plant was up quite vigorously in the second quarter after having fallen in the first. The action here was considerably more than I had counted on for this period.

In housing we are having the best year ever. The September starts were at an annual rate of about 260,000. This figure compares with starts of 191,000 in 1970. Thus, we are well on our way to a level of housing construction this year at least one-fifth higher than we achieved last year.

Employment has been increasing about as forecast. There are some 200,000 more jobs in the economy now than a year ago. Except for the welcome surge in productivity which always takes place at this stage of an expansion, the number of new jobs would be even higher.

The cost of living figure published yesterday shows a decline for the month of September; the index is some 3.5 per cent above the figure for last September. Wholesale prices, according to figures released yesterday, were also down in September and now stand 2.5 per cent above their value a year ago. While we should like to see an even better price performance, these results and especially the very recent trends are encouraging. In this respect we are still well in the forefront among the industrial nations.

Our unemployment rate does not derive from a failure of employment to grow. The growth of employment has largely matched the growth of an increasingly productive economy, as I have said. We observe in the September figures for the first time some effect of the United States measures on the Canadian economy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Be honest.

Mr. Benson: —but the overwhelming fact behind the increases in the unemployment figure is the increased proportion of Canadians of working age who have jobs or who respond in the sample survey as being without a job and looking for work. This proportion, described technically as the labour force participation rate, was higher in the third quarter than ever before in the history of the labour force survey. To my knowledge, no one in government, in business or in the universities predicted such a phenomenon.

No doubt the explanation is complex. Those who are recorded as unemployed include men and women who have lost their regular employment, teenagers of age 14 or older who have decided not to return to school, college students who, for the time being at least, have dropped their courses, women who have decided to seek work, a large number who are seeking part-time work, some who are drawing unemployment insurance and some who are not, and some who are drawing welfare benefits and some who are not. I shall not try to explain the composition of this unemployed group, many of whom are having a very difficult time. Members of this House may be assured that the government is making every effort to obtain full knowledge of the many facets of unemployment in Canada. My purpose this evening is not that: it is to deal with the problem in practical terms.

In the weeks since mid-August I have been aware of a growing feeling of concern in the economy deriving from the unsettled state of the international trade and payments system and from the uncertainty concerning the duration of the United States economic measures and the extent of their impact upon the Canadian economy. This worry threatens to weaken our economic expansion. The government has contributed and will contribute in every way that it can to restoring international stability.

I would like now to propose to the House measures to reinforce the economic expansion and to provide jobs for Canadians who want to work but who have no work to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: I wish to propose, first, a series of expenditure measures to relieve the problem of unemployment in the coming winter and in the months thereafter. By means of this program we will join forces with industry, provincial governments, municipalities and active private groups to create jobs, improve the skills of our work force and encourage economic growth. The program has five parts designed to engage workers quickly, efficiently, usefully and in the regions where jobs are most needed. It will benefit all unemployed groups and it will have long-term value without creating short-term distortions in our economy.

• (8:10 p.m.)

The first is a local initiative program under which the government will grant $50 million to municipalities and their agencies and $50 million to community organizations and other organized groups to finance labour-intensive projects.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: We will be calling on these organizations and groups to submit worth-while projects that will create jobs for the unemployed without delay. We expect to consult with provincial governments forthwith to establish a mechanism for them to approve municipal projects. Appropriate arrangements will be made in respect of the two territories. Regional committees will be created to consult with the local interests who will initiate community projects. This program will be under the direction of my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sabotage.

Mr. Benson: Second, we propose to introduce a new $20 million on-the-job training program with special emphasis on unemployed young people who are ineligible for the existing manpower training programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: We will co-operate closely with industry in this effort. In addition, $15 million will be allocated to an expansion of our existing Canada Manpower program. The on-the-job program is designed to encourage employers to prepare for future economic expansion and to ensure that trainees acquire solid skills to increase their earning capacities and to help them take advantage of new employment opportunities.

Mr. Hees: These are things you have been refusing to do for months. The truth hurts, doesn't it?

Mr. Benson: We are building flexibility into this program—

An hon. Member: You certainly are.

Mr. Benson: —to cover a broad range of employers, and we will help to finance the program by tax incentives or direct payments to employers. The tax incentives will take the form of a 150 per cent write-off of specified costs incurred by a firm in respect of the training it provides. Alternatively, there will be a direct payment of equivalent value provided to those employers for whom this form of assistance is more suitable. Further details of this assistance will be announced later. The training programs will also be administered by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the opposition may find unemployment amusing, but I do not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: We find the whole thing very sad.

Mr. Horner: The government caused it.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please?

Mr. Hees: Talk about deathbed repentance!

Mr. Benson: Third, it is proposed to create a new and improved $160 million special program of loans to provinces and their municipalities to finance additional job creating capital projects. A somewhat similar program announced last December has been very successful. It has funded major highway and community projects across Canada and created many thousands of jobs. To concentrate the job-creating impact in the approaching months we have added an important financial incentive which will relieve provinces and municipalities of $3 for every $4 of on-site labour costs which they incur up to May 31, 1972.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: This is the winter works program that you have been refusing.

An hon. Member: The old winter works is back again.

Mr. Benson: This incentive feature will cover an important part of the total cost of projects financed under this program. We will be consulting the provinces forthwith on the early implementation of the program. Consideration will also be given to the way in which the program might be made applicable in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. This capital loan program is intended to be completed by March 31, 1973.

Fourth, the Department of Public Works and other departments and agencies of government will launch an $80 million program of federal labour-intensive and capital works, embracing a wide range of maintenance and improvement projects. These will include, for example, alterations and improvements in federal buildings and transportation facilities, forest and parks projects and the extension and modernization of other federal installations. Beyond this, I would like to announce a specific allocation of $10 million in loans this year for construction of multi-purpose exhibition buildings. This program will be under the direction of my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: He's a little better, but that's not saying much.

An hon. Member: We are desperate now.

Mr. Benson: Again, our criteria for these projects will ensure that they create a maximum number of jobs, start quickly and concentrate in regions where unemployment is most serious.

Finally, my colleague, the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will accelerate $113 million in loans for public, home owner and student housing, for sewage treatment and for land assembly projects. These loans will be made before the end of this year instead of in 1972. My colleagues with responsibility for individual parts of this comprehensive program will be informing the House of further details shortly.

It is in the corporate sector of the economy that the adverse effects of the American import surtax and the threat of other U.S. measures, coming on top of the appreciation of the Canadian dollar, are having their most serious impact. If the corporate sector of the economy is weak and uncertain we cannot have a sustained growth in job opportunities. I am therefore proposing a substantial cut in corporation taxes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: We urged that three years ago.

An hon. Member: That is going to help the poor!

Mr. Benson: The cut has been designed in such a way as to give to Canadian firms maximum flexibility in responding to the special difficulties they confront and the opportunities they can seize in an expanding economy.

An hon. Member: What expanding economy?

Mr. Benson: I propose that effective July 1, 1971, until the end of 1972 the tax payable by Canadian corporations be reduced by 7 per cent. The whole cost of this reduction will be borne by the federal government. This change, combined with the elimination of the 3 per cent surtax, brings the effective reduction of corporation taxes from last July 1 to 10 per cent.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: In my judgment, help to the private sector to enable it to create more jobs is a most effective way, in present circumstances, of helping all Canadians. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the rates of consumer spending are favourable. Nevertheless, it is the government's view that we must do all we reasonably can to give confidence to the economy and induce increased demand for goods and services. I remind the House that spending by individuals makes up two-thirds of national income and is therefore the base on which the whole economy rests. To this end I propose that effective July 1, 1971, the federal tax payable by persons be reduced by 3 per cent during the period ending December 31, 1972.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: This proposal means that many taxpayers will receive refunds in the winter months, many taxpayers will be paying less tax immediately, and that all taxpayers will be paying less tax in 1972. I want to emphasize that this change is in addition to other important changes in personal income tax for 1971 announced in my budget of June 18. From July 1 we have eliminated the 3 per cent surtax for all Canadians. By eliminating tax on taxable income up to $500 we have taken 750,000 Canadians off the tax rolls since July 1, and effective last January 1 payments under the guaranteed income supplement have been exempt. With the help of this House there will be further alleviation for taxpayers in the lower income bracket if we get Bill C-259 through the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, neither of the tax measures I have proposed today will reduce provincial revenues from corporate or from personal tax sources.

The expenditure programs I have described are designed and will be administered in such a way as to have the earliest possible impact. The corporate tax cut is expected to result in a reduction of federal revenues of $160 million in fiscal year 1971-72, and a reduction of $175 million in fiscal year 1972-73. The cut in personal taxes is expected to reduce federal revenues by $125 million in fiscal year 1971-72 and by $225 million in fiscal year 1972-73.

These changes, combined with other changes that have taken place since my June budget, imply a budgetary deficit in the fiscal year 1971-72 of $1,000 million deriving from revenues of $13,580 million and expenditures of $14,580 million. I now estimate that non-budgetary requirements will be $1,600 million. Total cash requirements for the current fiscal year, apart from funds required to finance or obtained from exchange operations, will thus amount to $2,600 million.

Before concluding my remarks I would like to sum up the total dimension of the program I have proposed today. The total cost of the expenditures and tax reduction measures will be $1,070 million. The impact on Canada's gross national product will be substantial. More important, these programs, with their multiplier effects, will produce a large number of new jobs for Canadians. The economy is strong and growing. The measures I have proposed today are designed to keep it that way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benson: With the permission of the House, Mr. Speaker, I would like to table notice of a ways and means motion covering the tax changes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Has the minister leave to table this document? Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when I heard the applause a minute ago I wondered what it reminded me of. It reminded me of the applause the same people gave the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) when he presented his June budget. They are now applauding—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: —with equal fervour when the minister rises to try to make up for the inadequacies of the June budget. I shall have some comments to make in a few minutes about the specific measures that the minister has proposed. It may be considered a little unkind for me to begin by recalling the past on a night when the minister is making such a vigorous effort. But regardless of the shamefaced reversal of attitude, it is still the same old crowd, still the same old government.

This is the same government that day after day, week after week rejected our demands for its forecasts of economic trends. It is the same government which, refusing to give such forecasts, expressed its confidence that everything was going better and better all the time. It is the same government whose past decisions now stand revealed by the minister himself as ineffective, irrelevant and inappropriate to the needs of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to describe the government as a bungling, incompetent group of economic ignoramuses, because in the present circumstances of the country I do not feel like being that charitable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It will be sufficient to say that the policies of the government have been bankrupt in every sphere of economic activity, bankrupt to the extent that this afternoon the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), in trying to defend his policies, the inadequacy of his regional development policies, had to retreat into the weaknesses of the national economy. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is not his policies that are inadequate; it is the economy of the country as a whole.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Be serious, please.

Mr. Stanfield: I listened to the Minister of Finance and now I am trying to listen to some of the rabble across the way and their catcalls, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: They are a very rude lot.

Mr. Stanfield: Whatever else the minister's speech may have demonstrated, the statement he just made constitutes the clearest possible admission that the government has been wrong in its policies over the past six months and over the past year, and that we have been right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Pierre told us inflation was licked.

Mr. Stanfield: His admission is wrong to the extent that he is coming forward tonight and announcing the government is to spend a million dollars. That is how right we were and how wrong he has been—a million dollars!

Mr. Benson: You don't know the difference between a million and a billion.

Mr. Stanfield: A billion dollars, Mr. Speaker. I know the difference. I do not expect the minister to apologize; I do not think that is particularly relevant. But we now have the government's admission of its own economic incompetence. I do not suppose it came very easily, certainly not in terms of the long time it took for this announcement to come forth. It came from a government cornered in a hole of its own digging. It came when there was no alternative. But it came, and that is about the only good thing, without qualification, that I am able to say about this government.

Nothing could be a clearer demonstration of the inadequacy and inappropriateness of the June budget presented by the Minister of Finance. The predictions of the minister have been wrong all year, Mr. Speaker. Outside economists have predicted some growth in the economy, but independent economists have not predicted any significant reduction in unemployment in the course of 1971 based on the fiscal policies that the minister produced in his June budget. The minister cannot quarrel with that; he knows it is so. Based on what independent economists were saying, I predicted earlier in the year that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment would not fall during 1971, unfortunately, below 6 per cent. The minister jeered at me. He ridiculed me, Mr. Speaker.

Now we have lame explanations about an unexpected growth in the work force, increased participation in the work force. The government has not run into anything that was not predicted long ago by the Economic Council.

Mr. Hees: Pierre told us inflation was licked.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): How is the heavy water there, Bob?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: It is all right.

Mr. Ricard: If you had something heavy in your head, it would be better.

Mr. Stanfield: I know that I am doing all right, too, when I hear that sort of remark from across the floor.

Mr. Ricard: There is a hole in your head; that is why you are not heavy at all.

Mr. Hees: Pierre is ready to leave town.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: We now have massive unemployment. We now have continuing inflation, massive unemployment and a massive deficit. The Minister of Finance has worked himself and the country into a very considerable bind. He has left himself very little room to manœuvre. It is in this unfortunate stance that we are now caught by the United States initiative. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can read this speech if he cannot listen.

It is very late now to tackle problems for this winter—it is mid-October. I am enjoying the good humour of the House tonight. Certainly there has been no sense of urgency shown on the government benches in recent months—no sense of urgency in regard to inviting the provinces to meet, no sense of urgency with regard to announcing a program to tackle massive unemployment; simply the repeated pretence that everything was going along all right and everything was improving.

Mr. Speaker, I think the government must have been incapable of recognizing that the budget was wrong and that its forecasts were wrong. I think its attitude must have been that it just cannot be wrong in its forecasts. Last month it took refuge in the argument about our teenagers. To those of us outside the government the argument seemed so incredible that quite frankly I said it was a dishonest statement. It may be, however, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could not imagine that he and the Minister of Finance and his colleagues could have made such a mistake in judgment, such a mistake in forecasting as that involved not only in the June budget but in the continuing posture and stubbornness demonstrated since then.

It is high time that the government acted. We in this Parliament and the Canadian people have been waiting for months and months for the government to act. The situation has grown worse and worse, yet the government did not act—all it did was talk. It assured us that things were not so bad. The minister tonight says that things are good and yet, Sir, we know better.

The government has described me and other members of the opposition as prophets of gloom and doom. They have described me as the chief gloomster because I have been telling the government and the Canadian people the truth about the situation. I warned the government that it must act, and act quickly and decisively. I said it must cut taxes and I said it must take direct measures to create jobs. But the government did nothing, Mr. Speaker. If I am called the chief gloomster for that, I suppose, considering the source from which it came and the activity of the Minister of Finance tonight, it is a compliment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: It was the only thing that made them act.

Mr. Stanfield: The kindest thing anybody can say about this government is that it has been the victim of its own blind complacency. Unfortunately, the Canadian people and the Canadian economy have been the innocent victims of that complacency. The government has certainly been hurt: we can see that tonight, Mr. Speaker. But that is not relevant. It is the Canadian people who are hurting and hurting even more.

In terms of cost this is a very substantial change after months and months of pretending that nothing was necessary, after months and months of doing nothing. It is a very substantial package that the Minister of Finance has finally produced, in terms of cost. It involves something over a billion dollars. I should like to ask the Prime Minister why they have waited so long. Why have the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister waited until mid-October to introduce these programs, Mr. Speaker? It is inevitable that at this time many of these will be crash programs.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): What is wrong with that?

Mr. Stanfield: What is wrong with it? If my hon. friend does not know what is wrong with it, I doubt if I can explain it to him, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ricard: You would not understand it, anyway.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Hees: The cuts should have been introduced many months ago.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Ricard: Government supporters do not have enough brains to understand these things.

Mr. Nielsen: You have to draw them a little picture.

Mr. Woolliams: It is clear that they made a mistake.

Mr. Stanfield: That is clear to anybody. It is clear that programs such as the minister announced, $50 million for local initiatives, $20 million for training and $160 million for loans to municipalities—

Mr. Trudeau: What's a hundred million?

Mr. Stanfield: What's a hundred million? A great deal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is a great deal, despite the views of the Prime Minister. It is important for this $160 million, and more, to be spent to the best advantage, despite the views the Prime Minister may hold. What possible excuse is there for the government's introducing a crash program at this time instead of earlier, when the program could have been properly planned for the coming winter?

Mr. Hees: And when we suggested it.

Mr. Stanfield: Does anybody on the other side of the House pretend that these programs can be as well worked out now as they could have been when we and everybody else in this country except the government realized they were necessary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Why not talk about winter works?

Mr. Stanfield: My hon. friend mentions winter works. This government has reviled winter works programs, yet that is what this is—a winter works program.

Mr. Hees: They laughed at us.

Mr. Stanfield: Not only did they laugh at us; they waited until it was very late in the year before introducing such a program effectively.

An hon. Member: Read your text, Bob.

An hon. Member: So what has changed?

Mr. Stanfield: What has changed? The winter works programs which the Prime Minister reviled previously have now become appropriate, Mr. Speaker. It will be interesting to see what has changed. May I now talk about taxation cuts, Sir. My time is limited.

An hon. Member: Keep going, Bob.

Mr. Stanfield: The Minister of Finance has proposed a 7 per cent cut in corporation taxes up until the end of 1972.

An hon. Member: Have you any better suggestions?

Mr. Stanfield: If my hon. friend will wait, he will hear them. These cuts involve substantial cost to the treasury; there is no question about that.

An hon. Member: That's an announcement, I suppose.

Mr. Stanfield: There is also no question in my mind that if the Minister of Finance had been prepared to announce a reduction in corporate taxes without such a short terminal date, the effect on incentives might have been substantial.

Mr. Benson: The hon. member should look at Bill C-259.

Mr. Stanfield: All right. The 7 per cent reduction, Sir, is to be effective until December 31, 1972.

Mr. Benson: The hon. member should look at Bill C-259.

Mr. Stanfield: I will look at Bill C-259.

An hon. Member: Explain it to him, Mr. Benson.

Mr. Dinsdale: The minister could not explain anything.

Mr. Stanfield: I ask the Minister of Finance this question: What effect will the short-term corporate tax reduction have upon employment and investment?

Mr. Benson: There is a long-term effect as set out in Bill C-259.

Mr. Stanfield: In Bill C-259?

Mr. Benson: That is right.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister is suggesting that there is to be a reduction of four points over a period of several years. If he is here, those changes will be made. I doubt if anybody in this country is confident that the minister will be here and that he will be able to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I say to the Minister of Finance, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the long-term reduction in corporate income taxes may very well have a substantial effect on incentives and investments, and therefore on unemployment. Therefore, I challenge the Minister of Finance or anybody on his side of the House to explain to us on this side in what way and to what extent this 7 per cent reduction in corporate taxes up the period ending December 31, 1972, will affect employment in this country. This reduction may well provide more money—

An hon. Member: Explain that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I will explain it and make it simple for you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: You had better make it simple.

Mr. Stanfield: It will be simple enough for my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) to understand.

Mr. Hees: They never understand.

Mr. Dinsdale: Make it very simple.

An hon. Member: Draw them a picture.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, a corporate income tax reduction for that limited period of time will make more money available for increased dividends. It will also make more money available for investment, without question. I want the Minister of Finance to tell the country how many new jobs this will create over that limited period of time, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Stanfield: I will explain to my hon. friends what I should like to do.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Stanfield: Hon. members over there seem to be getting a little excited. Once the fact is pointed out to them, most of them are capable of seeing how dumbheaded their own Minister of Finance is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Perhaps they are getting a little embarrassed.

Mr. Stanfield: The 3 per cent reduction in personal income tax is fine. That will be helpful, without question. But, Sir, why was it not possible in June? It was inflationary in June, even though inflation allegedly had been licked. The reduction was inflationary in June. But how much more effective it would have been in June! If instead of having a simple 3 per cent reduction in personal income taxes now, there had been a 6 per cent, 7 per cent or 8 per cent reduction in personal income taxes at that time, would the psychological effect not have been that much greater? Would that not have been better, rather than bringing forward these dribs and drabs, 3 per cent in June and 3 per cent later? Much of the reduction has been thrown away in terms of psychological impact upon the income earners of this country.

Mr. Baldwin: The government was following Liberal dogma.

An hon. Member: Throw your own psychology away.

Mr. Stanfield: Sir, think of the delays. Think of the cost to this country which has arisen as a consequence of the misjudgment, poor forecasting and mistakes which have been made by this government and the Minister of Finance in recent months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: That is shocking.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister is now accepting arguments we put forward as long ago as January and even further back. Think of the enormous cost to the people of this country and to the country itself as a result of that delay. There is also a big cost to the treasury. I say to the Minister of Finance that his 7 per cent corporate tax reduction for that limited period of time is not the effective tax reduction that he ought to be proposing at this time. If he is prepared to extend it further, that would be different. But for the limited period of time it will not be effective.

If the minister envisages a short-term reduction in taxation, something he will commit himself to only until the end of 1972 and no longer, then personal income tax reductions of more than 3 per cent would have been effective, far fairer and more just than these short-term cuts, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: And they would have produced a lot more jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: So far as corporations are concerned, there would have been a much more beneficial effect on investments and incentives—and this would not have cost the government a cent—if the minister had announced that he was going to defer implementation of those parts of his tax reform bill relating to corporations. That would not have cost him a cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the Leader of the Opposition to mention that he has received a three-minute credit to compensate for interruptions, in the same way as the Minister of Finance was granted a three-minute extension of his time to take into account the interruptions when he was speaking. The Leader of the Opposition may pursue his speech with the unanimous consent of the House.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the generosity of the House in this regard. I am pleased to see that the government has recognized the need for action. Some of the measures proposed will certainly be helpful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: If the government takes my advice, it can use this money, as I pointed out, much more effectively and to much greater advantage than it has been. We have had perversely bad judgment from this government in economic matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The budget tonight, coming after the June budget, is the best proof of this. The government has been wallowing around. I say to the minister in all sincerity that the country has no confidence in him. I suggest to him, and I say this to his face through you, Mr. Speaker, we have no confidence in him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: He better resign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I wish to make one further comment. I do not like to make it in this House because I do not like to speak of people who are not here to answer back, but it is necessary to do so. The government needs new economic advisers. There is no better proof of that than this budget tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, although I have seen the government's program only since seven o'clock, it is my intention to deal as well as I can with the actual program presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). I start by expressing some pleasure that at last the government has accepted the challenge of the times and has seen fit, far too late and far too inadequately, to produce a program to deal with the unemployment expected this winter.

The first point I make is that nowhere in his statement and nowhere in the documents that I have seen is there any attempt to estimate either the level of unemployment that may be expected this winter or the number of jobs that the program which the minister has presented will create.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I am particularly concerned about the latter, because there is an indication as to the kind of thing with which we are dealing. In the documents which I have seen, we are informed that the $160 million loan program to municipalities last year produced a total of 13,000 jobs. I ask hon. members to note this. Thirteen thousand jobs were produced with the $160 million, the equivalent, the document states, of 13,000 Canadians for a year. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, the program presented by the Minister of Finance obviously will not even scratch the surface of the real unemployment crisis expected this winter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: It is the duty of the minister to tell this Parliament and the country how many jobs this program is intended to create. On the basis of the information that we now have, it is my guess that we will be lucky if the people without work in Canada this winter have jobs to a total of 30,000 to 50,000 out of a total unemployment likely to be as high as 700,000, 800,000 or more. I am not talking about the multiplier effect that may result six, eight or 10 months from now. I am talking about the four or five months this winter. I stick my neck out to say we will be lucky if 50,000 of the unemployed will have jobs as a result of this program. The reason the minister does this is well illustrated in the nonsense in which he indulged in the introductory paragraph of his speech. He repeated the same pollyanna rubbish that was repeated time and again during the last 18 months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: He still expresses the same complacency and satisfaction with the performance of the economy. I cannot think of anything more nonsensical than this sentence in his speech: "Our unemployment rate is not derived from a failure of employment to grow." How stupid can anyone be, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Of course, the total employment has grown. If it had not grown, we would have two or three million Canadians unemployed. There has been a steady increase in the labour force of between 250,000 and 300,000 for years. If employment did not grow, you would have a cumulative quarter of a million unemployed in each year for the past 10 years in this country. In what kind of rubbish does the Minister of Finance indulge?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: What kind of nonsense does a man complacently place before us which makes the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) grin all evening as he listened to this nonsense? What kind of rubbish is that? Even in the present year, that is a nonsensical, misleading, distorting statement.

Even though there were approximately 200,000 more jobs, the increase in the labour force in this one year was 238,000. Already it fell short by a very substantial proportion to find jobs for the increase in one year, let alone the increase in the labour force over time. He has repeated the same complacent rubbish, as every minister has done. The minister said that we have had an unprecedented increase in the participation rate. Sure, there has been some increase, but let me quote some figures to show what the unprecedented increase has been in the last quarter. I have the figure. I will start with 1967 so I will not have to spend too much time.

In 1967, the participation rate in July was 55.7; August, 55.8; September, 55.5. In 1968, the participation rate for July was 55.5; August, 55.5; September, 55.7. In 1969, the rate in July was 55.6; August, 55.5; September, 55.4. For 1970, the participation rate for July was 55.9; August, 55.6; September, 55.7. For this year, 1971, the participation rate for July was 56; August, 55.8; September, 56. If there was any difference, it was one small part of a small one per cent. The minister tries to seek consolation in that fact as an explanation for the increase in unemployment. How gullible does he think even his own members are?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: How puerile and gullible does he think the people of Canada are about such nonsense?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: Let the government have the decency and the humility to accept the fact that its policies up to now have been wrong and that the unemployment figures are the result of those policies. The Canadian people would appreciate such honesty and frankness. This dishonesty, this distortion is shameful not only for the government but for Parliament where it is pronounced.

Mr. Hogarth: Give the other side of the picture.

Mr. Lewis: I wish, Mr. Speaker, you would tell the spirited gentleman to keep quiet. The program will, I hope with all my heart, do some good. But it is too late. Throughout his submission the minister said the provinces would be consulted as soon as possible. I say to the government, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) that in a federal country such as ours these consultations ought to take place before a minister announces a program, so that the provinces and the municipalities, through the provinces, might have something to say about the priorities and might know what the government intended to propose.

One does not have to be an economist to know that three-quarters of what the minister proposed will take time to come into effect. You cannot make $113 million available to housing and expect that the jobs will be open in December, January or February. They will not. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Andras) has money already available, money which has not yet been picked up. It probably amounts to a great deal more than $113 million. If he has used it all up, he should have been after the government a great deal earlier than now. It takes time for people to invest in housing. It takes time for additional money to become effective.

The whole proposition advanced by the minister amounts, in major part, to a winter works program. I have no objection to that. It is the government which objected to it. Everything is a kind of tokenism. Look at the breakdown of the $113 million for housing and other works. In his statement the minister talked, and the press gallery no doubt noted it, about sewage treatment, roads—

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is what we call public works.

Mr. Lewis: But in the accompanying document the minister said $4 million will be spent on sewage treatment projects. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know how many sewage treatment plants you can build across Canada for $4 million.

Then, again, we are told that $1.7 million is to be set aside for land assembly. How much land assembly can you carry out in the major communities of Canada for $1.7 million? I point these things out because I am anxious that the people of Canada should know that the statements made by the minister have to be read with great care.

I want to say a word about the training program. The sum of $15 million is to be available to expand the present training program. But for what jobs? Is this program to provide additional training both under the present scheme and on the job merely a way of reducing the size of the unemployment rolls, or is it a serious undertaking? What jobs are there for the trained people to take? I notice in the accompanying document that since 1966-1967, when the government's training program was set up, 1,134,485 Canadians have been upgraded and trained under this plan. This is very good, Mr. Speaker. I ask Your Honour to stop and think what this means. It means that approximately one-eighth of our labour force has been through this training scheme.

Mr. Speaker, we must have in this country the most upgraded and trained corps of unemployed in the western world. What are we training these people for? Where are the jobs? What will the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) do with them? What will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) do with them? I am the last to decry the fact that some young people will now receive training and be upgraded. It is necessary to do it. But I say to these people, "Do not be misled." When they have finished their training and upgrading process they stand a chance of being in the same unhappy position as others who have received training and been upgraded—the chance they will leave college and walk the streets. That is what a good many have had to do until now, and that is what a good many will do in the future.

In the few minutes left to me I want to deal with the tax measures. I would first of all draw attention to the double standard which the minister and his colleagues constantly apply. My hon. friends and I noticed this the first minute the minister began to talk about tax changes. Seven per cent for the corporation; 3 per cent for individual Canadians. This is typical of what the government does. Why 7 per cent to the corporations, those penurious, poverty-stricken corporations of Canada? In the last quarter, corporate profits were the highest for some years.

Note, also, that this 7 per cent decrease—I will describe the kind of decrease it is in a moment—is not meant to apply only to the manufacturing industries which might be hit by United States import policies. It will apply to all Canadian corporations, including the resource corporations which already enjoy tax concessions worth hundreds of millions of dollars. These corporations, too, will benefit from the minister's across the board 7 per cent reduction.

Please note, also, that the 7 per cent deduction is not related to the tax rate. It is a reduction in the amount of tax payable, one of the most regressive ways in which tax reductions can be brought about. The payer of lower taxes gets 7 per cent and the payer of higher taxes gets 7 per cent, and in total amount the payer of higher taxes benefits from a much larger chunk of dough. On that point I do not care so much about the 7 per cent reduction for corporations. I care very much, though, about the 3 per cent reduction in income taxes payable by individuals. The changing rates should have been graduated.

Three per cent across the board is not graduated. It means that a person who makes $10,000 a year and over—and only 10 per cent of Canadian taxpayers have taxable incomes of $10,000 or more—will get a great deal more out of the 3 per cent than a person who has a taxable income of $4,000 or $5,000 a year: his 3 per cent will amount to only a few dollars. But for those with higher incomes such as Members of Parliament, that 3 per cent will amount to a pretty large chunk of money.

An hon. Member: You should know about that.

Mr. Lewis: And the lawyers, when they practice, and the doctors and the engineers.

Mr. Mahoney: Don't forget union lawyers.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lewis: I do not intend to lower myself to deal with remarks of that kind. It is obvious that members opposite are attempting to use their wit. Unfortunately, they are only half succeeding. I think it is important to note that a 3 per cent across the board reduction in income tax payable is worth a great deal more to those with high incomes than it is to those with lower incomes. It is a regressive and inequitable way of adjusting the tax system.

I think the people of Canada will greet the announcement today with some relief, as I do, because I would much prefer to have some program than none at all. But the people of Canada will understand that it is far too late and quite inadequate.

[Mr. Lewis.]

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that actual expenditures—I am not talking about income tax losses but actual expenditures—should be two times or even more the amount proposed by the minister if there is to be any sizeable increase in jobs. The goal we should have set ourselves is the creation of at least 250,000 jobs during the winter months. From what one can foretell, this would have provided work for only about one-third of the likely number of unemployed in the dead of this winter. Nothing less justifies our being here and nothing less justifies the existence of this government.

All through the period of increasing unemployment crises the government has shown, as I have said, an attitude of complacency and insensitivity. No other government that I know of in the history of this country has shown greater complacency in the face of obvious difficulty. No other government has shown more insensitivity to human suffering. When the Prime Minister some months ago started his fight against inflation, as he called it, he said he would be prepared to take 6 per cent unemployment. He did not have to take it; more than 6 per cent of the Canadian people, according to the adjusted rate, are in fact taking it, and even on an unadjusted basis we have had unemployment that high. Ever since then no appeal to the government has had any effect. Then, unemployment became so desperate, as the September and August figures show, that even this government could not escape trying to do something about it.

It is a great pity that this action comes so late. Even the small program announced this evening—and it is small—would have helped. It would not have been small had the government not created an unemployment crisis of immense proportions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time expired about a minute ago. He can carry on with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to inquire again whether there is unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I will not be many seconds, let alone minutes. The government's program might have been adequate had not the government created an unemployment situation of crisis proportions. Economists across the country have been pleading with the government to realize that it takes time from the announcement of a program to plan the program, to make investments and to create jobs. Therefore, if the government's program is intended to influence the unemployment situation this winter, it should have been announced last April, May or June, not in the middle of October.

It is regrettable beyond words that this program has been so long delayed. This program is not so imaginative, so ingenious, so unprecedented that it needed all the brains of all the ministers and officials for the last six months to bring it about. This program could have been thought out by knowledgeable people within a period of weeks and been presented much earlier than today. Whatever may happen on election day, for years this government will stand condemned in the eyes of every thinking Canadian as a most ruthless and insensitive government, as a government without the sense of urgency and compassion that every government in a democratic society ought to have.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, after hearing the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), I expected him to announce, at the end of his speech, general elections for the month of December, because, to my mind, the program he has just announced is an election-oriented one.

Mr. Speaker, this is a program mapped out by economists—as usual—who advised the government to present this House and the general public with new measures intended to create employment in Canada. However, other economists, who probably attended the same universities, advised the leader of the Progressive Conservatives telling him exactly the opposite. As for the economists of the New Democratic Party, they suggested another solution.

Mr. Speaker, I was particularly impressed by two paragraphs in the speech by the Minister of Finance. I would like to quote first the last paragraph:

> Mr. Speaker, the economy is strong and growing. The measures I have proposed today are designed to keep it that way.

Now today, hardly a few hours before the minister's statement to the House, I was reading in today's issue of Le Droit two articles which I will quote. First one could read the following:

> Substantial increase in unemployment rate—

In the same issue, another article deals with a "substantial increase in our exports to the United States."

• (9:20 p.m.)

At noon or yesterday, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated: "We are beginning to feel the adverse effects of the 10 per cent surcharge." Today, the newspaper Le Droit announced that Canadian exports to the United States have increased, in spite of the American surcharge. Who is lying to Parliament and to the Canadian people? The economists or the government?

Mr. Speaker, I have been surprised to learn today through newspaper reports that our exports have increased in spite of the surcharge and to hear the government say that the surcharge has brought about the increased unemployment rate. Now, the Minister of Finance said the following:

> Mr. Speaker, the economy is strong and growing.

Everyone agrees, on the contrary that the economy is not growing and that it is far from strong. I continue to quote:

> The measures I have proposed today are designed to keep it that way.

If we keep the economy in its present direction, in one year we shall be worse off than we are now. However, what struck me also were the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who has been crying for several weeks: Give us a program. We too had shouted to the Progressive Conservatives who were in power in 1962: Give us a program. They have waited till they were defeated in the elections. Mr. Speaker, nothing concrete has been suggested.

Members of the New Democratic Party are saying the same thing: This will create only about 15,000 jobs.

Mr. Speaker, it is the economists that I hold responsible for the situation in which we are. They are bad advisers, people who are in the clouds. In French, we say they are fogbound, that they do not keep both feet on the ground. And I am asked: Where are the economists of the Social Credit party? Economists of that sort I do not want!

The true economists, Mr. Speaker, are the farmers, the workers, those who know what it means to earn a dollar and to work to build our country instead of creating difficulties as the economists are now doing.

Economists use fine words. The Finance Minister's speech was written by economists. The minister said that economists—

An hon. Member: Name them.

Mr. Caouette: Oh! I can surely name some. The first one would be the Governor of the Bank of Canada. He knows how to impose an interest rate, but he does not know how to distribute credit nor how to create some on the basis of Canadian production statistics.

I quote further:

> —it is the government's view that we must do all we reasonably can to give confidence to the economy and induce increased demand for goods and services.

This means that we must spend more. It is interesting for the poor man to be told by the government: My friend, if you want to help get the economy moving again, spend a little more. You have nothing but spend more. How clever! An economist claims that we must spend more. I go on with the quotation:

> I remind the House that spending by individuals makes up two-thirds of national income and is therefore the base on which the whole economy rests.

Economists manage to understand that. However, we put up with a system that prevents people from spending because they are without purchasing power. What is done to keep things in order? A little, not very much!

All sorts of task forces are being established: task forces are sent to the Gaspe area to see whether or not there are poor people there; task forces on bilingualism because one hears that French Canadians are responsible for the predicament of English Canadians and vice versa. Both are in a predicament because we do not have the means which would allow our economy to function on a rational and normal basis.

We give away social welfare benefits, old age security pensions and unemployment allowances. The administration of these programs is even costlier. Some needy families receive nothing from social assistance offices while others obtain benefits which they do not need. What do we, of the Social Credit party, suggest?

An hon. Member: Nothing!

Mr. Caouette: Do not misconstrue my words. First of all Canada's entire social legislation should be revamped into one single whole. We should not find an unemployment insurance office here and a labour employment office there; a social welfare assistance office here and an auxiliary office there, and so on. No. The structure of social security must be altered to the extent that we will not even mention social welfare anymore. Social security should be established and it would give people the incentive to work and develop what can be developed in our country.

What do we suggest then? The payment of an income to everyone aged 18 or over. By replacing current programs all Canadians would enjoy the following benefits: social security—not social assistance—which will give all citizens a greater purchasing power and would spur the economy. A bachelor aged 18 or more should get a yearly guaranteed income of $1,500 or $125 per month. If he works, he should not be penalized by being denied his $1,500 payment. This is the poverty threshold in Canada. This would be a minimum that would enable everybody to live. A married couple would receive a yearly $2,500 which is about the equivalent of the pension presently paid to our senior citizens. A married couple with one child would get a yearly $2,550; with two children $3,000; with three children $3,250; with four children $3,500; with five children $3,750; and with six children he would get a maximum of $4,000. Everyone should be assured of that and if an unemployed worker should find a job his guaranteed income should not be discontinued; he should keep it.

At the present, if you claim welfare allowances and you get caught you must pay back the money you received or you will be denied any further allowances. What would you do? Stay at home and refuse to work. In fact, there are many cases of abuse.

Recently, I met a worker on compensation who was receiving $86.54 a week from the province of Quebec. This worker had two children and a fairly high rent to pay. So the compensation payment of $86.54 a week was insufficient. He goes to the welfare office and the manager tells him: You are not entitled to allowances because your income of $86.54 a week is sufficient. He makes him sign a form whereby the worker promises to pay back any amount of welfare he may get while waiting for his compensation. So the worker signs the form and on his way out gives it a second thought, tears up the form, goes back inside and says: I refuse to accept that commitment, I will work it out in some other way.

I know a young man of 29 who one day told his wife: Listen, go to the welfare office, tell them that I left you, that I will stay with my father, and then apply for a welfare allowance! The wife went to the welfare service and the official granted her $220 a month because, on the advice of her husband, she had said that, with her children, she had been deserted. Such a case is becoming typical in Canada.

[Mr. Caouette.]

What I am now suggesting would cost less to the government than all those dishonest schemes people are using to get something out of the welfare system. People are said to be dishonest whereas the legislation itself calls for dishonesty. The law is unfair: it penalizes one citizen in order to help another!

We are suggesting a guaranteed income plan, no matter if the citizen works or not, has money or not. The millionaire would get a yearly guaranteed income as well as the unemployed. If, instead of discouraging work we were to tell the married man with three children, receiving a yearly guaranteed income of $3,250: if you have a job and earn money, you will not lose your $3,250, I am sure that about 80 per cent of the unemployment problem would be solved, because the citizens would be interested in getting a job, knowing there would be at least something to depend upon.

Instead of hiring officials in unemployment insurance or welfare offices, in manpower centres or economists' offices, we would establish our economy on sound bases. That may seem bold, because we are not used to such thinking. But the Prime Minister should realize that the program which was just announced again amounts to nothing more than a bandaid treatment. That will not solve the problem of unemployment in Canada. That is so true that even when the Prime Minister, as I mentioned when beginning my remarks, says we are beginning to feel the effects of the 10 p. 100 American surcharge, at the very same time Statistics Canada register a definite increase in our exports to the United States. Therefore, the tax has not hindered Canadian exports to the United States at all.

As a contribution to the economic development of Canada, we should add on a discount on products manufactured in Canada so that our population may be in a position to sell its goods to Canadian consumers. Instead of granting discounts to Japan, Germany, China or Russia, let us grant them to Canadian consumers on goods produced in Canada in order to help our industries, our manufacturers, our farmers and thus contribute to creation of new industries in our country.

If this proposal were seriously studied, I would undertake to look into the cost for Canada of setting up such a system that would guarantee social security for all, that would not penalize a man for working, or another who can find work for two or three days a week, or else the working mother who goes outside her home to earn a few cents to boost the family's annual income.

Mr. Speaker, the suggestion should be examined by the caucus of every political party in the House and by our economic brains. Let them study it and then tell us if it is nonsense. As I said earlier, I am personally convinced that the program would be cheaper than any of the existing ones. Then, the Minister of Finance or anyone who succeeds him, will be able to conclude his speech with those words: "Mr. Speaker, the economy is strong and moving ahead. The measures I propose today are conceived to keep it in that direction".

If the Finance Minister wants to be logical, if he does not want to play political games or throw dust in the eyes of voters in the event of an early election, he should consider the proposal I just made: a discount on Canadian products, an income, and social security for every Canadian. I am sure that from then on we shall have full employment in Canada, industrialists will not be so much afraid of undertaking capital expenditures and new ventures in Canada. Then, the whole population will be able to say: "At last, we are given an economic formula that provides us with security and personal freedom".

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in opening the discussion tonight and in indicating the measures which were being taken, also reviewed the signs of strength in the economy such as the constant improvement in the gross national product to levels which are very impressive indeed. He also could have referred to the figures of exports, to which the previous speaker referred. Both of these improvements indicate the basic, underlying strength of the Canadian economy and led us on a number of occasions to indicate to all sectors of the economy that the time was ripe for growing and moving ahead in this country.

The figures in growth of employment have also shown significant increases. Hon. gentlemen opposite make some point of the fact that unemployment figures have increased, and will not accept the logic that we have not only what we all very well knew, which is a very rapidly increasing working age population, but that in addition we have what was not so expected or so known, increases in participation rates.

The figures, again, this month which show signs of high unemployment in seasonally adjusted terms also indicate the growth, on a year to year basis, from a year ago of 202,000 new jobs. The significant figures to compare are those which indicate that the working age population in that year grew at a rate of 2.4 per cent while employment grew at a rate of 2.5 per cent, so that employment was growing at a faster rate than the growth of population but not fast enough to take care of the increased participation in the labour force. It is this fact which has led, above all, to the need for special programs at this time.

We of course can take some consolation in the signs of strength in the economy shown by the figures of gross national product and exports and growth in jobs, but we are very concerned as a government and as individuals about any Canadian who is seeking work and cannot in fact find it. For that reason we have before us tonight programs which are designed to create jobs immediately.

The programs are of three basic types. There are the longer term capital projects which will create, of course, fewer direct jobs than other expenditures might in the short-run but which will be of longer term duration and will provide jobs over a longer period of time. These will also, of course, provide significant numbers of indirect jobs over the whole period of the construction. This applies equally to the accelerated CMHC expenditures, the direct expenditures by the government on capital works and the capital programs which will be encouraged by loans to municipalities and provinces across the country.

In this year's program for loans to municipalities for capital works the additional feature has been added of a forgiveness for the jobs created and applied in the immediate short-term period. This will have the effect of channelling this money more into those parts of available capital projects which are in fact easiest to mount and most productive of jobs even in a direct sense. But, of course, the major portion of the expenditures indicated tonight is not of a capital nature but directed specifically to more job-intensive areas. This is true of the direct federal expenditures. It is also true of the extremely important local initiative programs which will allow municipalities and municipal organizations and other responsible organizations across this country with work incentive programs for community betterment to mount those programs quickly and with the direct result of significant job increases in Canada in the immediate period. These programs under local initiatives will be designed to produce the best possible result in terms of the job accomplished, as well as putting to work the greatest possible number of people.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: Who is the consultant, somebody in the States?

Mr. Lang: The criteria for specific application of this program will be available through Manpower centres before long. The centres will be fully involved in the preparation of applications. I want to emphasize again that under this program the emphasis will be upon meritorious projects which produce a good result, as well as upon the labour intensive projects.

Mr. Horner: If you had all this money, why did you have to try to steal $60 million from the farmers?

Mr. Lang: The local initiative programs really invite persons from one end of the country to the other in municipalities and other responsible organizations to apply their vast ingenuity in joining in the solving of the job creation problem and in producing the best possible result.

It is perhaps worthy of note that when the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), the leader of the New Democratic Party, was speaking he seemed to fail to notice this part of the program under which $100 million invites initiative by individuals and groups and municipalities from one end of the country to the other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the third type of expenditure which is involved in the program announced tonight is the availability of funds for training programs. These training programs have been designed from their inception to improve the basic skill or the developed skill of members of the work force, to put them in a better position to perform the new and challenging jobs which are continually being created in this country and which require additional skills. It is worthy of note that at times, whatever the particular unemployment figures may be, there are significant shortages of persons with particular skills for jobs which are available. The training programs are designed to remedy this problem by helping to fit available manpower for the jobs waiting for them. The traditional training programs as they have existed for a number of years will be augmented. Immediate discussions will begin with the provinces—

An hon. Member: The woodshedding course.

Mr. Dinsdale: This is the penitent's plea.

Mr. Lang: —for training which will be initiated here both of the basic and skill development type.

Mr. Horner: Did the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) take you out to the woodshed?

Mr. Dinsdale: Not yet, but he will after this speech.

Mr. Lang: These programs have been specifically designed in a way to involve the wishes of the people involved in them, and have always drawn a distinction between those who have recently emerged into the labour force—

Mr. Woolliams: I will say so.

Mr. Lang: —and those who are basically in a regular education program, and this for what may have been fairly valid reasons.

The new feature in the program is the on the job training.

Mr. Woolliams: What are they going to work at when you have them trained?

Mr. Nielsen: What is new about that?

Mr. Lang: The on the job training program will involve an availability of approximately $20 million through the form largely of tax incentives, through the form of a 150 percent write-off for the wages of approved trainees and, in some small measure, through certain programs for institutions which cannot benefit under the tax incentive program. This program will be available not only to those who have been in the labour force for the three year period, which is the condition for the other program, but will be available also for those who cannot meet that criteria. The Canadian Manpower centres will be fully involved in attempting to assess the potential of individuals referred to on the job training and to assure that the training offered is of a type which is, so far as possible, transferrable to other employment. In this program there will not only be the fullest consultation with the provinces but also with labour unions and industrial management. Indeed, unions will be fully involved in consultations with regard to specific application of the program so that they may be satisfied that it is working.

Mr. Woolliams: When are you calling an election?

Mr. Lang: Certain conditions will be applied to assure that the trainees who are put in jobs do not take places which would go to ordinary employees. For instance, where employees are laid off, the training program will not be available but in all cases the fullest consultation with union organizations will take place.

These expenditures, Mr. Speaker, both of the capital sort and the labour intensive sort which may be mounted early and put more people to work per dollar spent, and the training programs, indicate our concern for the movement into employment of the maximum number of Canadians as soon as possible.

The other programs, the taxation programs announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) indicate our concern about the basic availability in the economy of inducements to expand in the private sector, and the basic strength of the Canadian economy for this kind of growth to take place. There have been some concerns, particularly because of international development, and here the stimulus of tax incentives should offset to a significant degree the problems this has created. A good deal more will be heard in the next few days about the details of these various programs—

Mr. Woolliams: We have heard a lot now, but nothing happens.

Mr. Lang: —and the initiative to put to work those additional members of the labour force who are seeking work, as a result of the changed participation rate, as a result of the tremendous rate of growth in the work force in this country. It should never be forgotten that the challenge which faces us is great.

Mr. Woolliams: It won't be.

Mr. Lang: Considered on a year to year basis at a 2.4 per cent rate, there is an increase in the working age population in the work force of approximately 5 times the increase shown in many of the industrial countries in Europe, and very significantly greater rates than that in the United States.

Mr. Woolliams: How do you account for that?

Mr. Lang: These are the challenges which face us, Mr. Speaker, and the programs put before the House tonight go a long way toward helping the immediate situation and, through those programs and their indirect effects which are of longer range duration, of sustaining even greater growth in the economy in the months ahead.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is time that Canadians are entitled to some honesty from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government. One can understand now why the Prime Minister takes so little part in these debates, takes part in the odd debate on the Speech from the Throne, takes part in the odd debate on Nigeria and takes part in more than the odd debate on television. One can understand why he does not participate in debates in this House now, judging from the weakness of the contribution we have heard for from the minister responsible for the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

• (9:50 p.m.)

An hon. Member: He doesn't care.

Mr. Nielsen: We need honesty from ministers like the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) who comes to this House and says there is no unemployment in the north, when he knows very well there is; from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) who, in response to question after question from this side of the House tells us that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is operating at 98 per cent efficiency, when there is not a member in this House who has not had complaints from his own constituents about the long delays in processing certain claims; from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), who says that the Canadian economy is on the course "I envisaged in my June budget".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That is about as honest—

Mr. Stanfield: Or cold-blooded.

Mr. Nielsen: —or cold-blooded as this government is wont to be on these things. They snow us with statistics. They try to paint a rosy picture. I think the worst offender on the government side is that well snowed Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue, I believe, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney).

An hon. Member: He belongs to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of Finance; that is even worse. To him everything is rosy. Everything is going along fine. And the Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister (Mr. Danson) has thrown the first hand grenade to start off an international trade war. One must only assume that he did it with the knowledge and consent of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). They all paint a glowing picture; yet not one of the ministers and not one of those faceless donkeys on the other side of the House will make a contribution by referring to the rate of unemployment existing in this country. The percentage stands at 7.1 per cent, the highest in a decade. And what do they do? They shrug the figures off and trot forward as a cure-all for this tragic situation promises that were universally implemented by the previous Progressive Conservative government. They march those programs forward.

An hon. Member: Which previous government?

Mr. Nielsen: We need honesty from the minister who has just resumed his seat. He says that there is a new feature to this whole program.

Mr. Stanfield: It is new and improved.

Mr. Nielsen: It is on-the-job training. This program has been in effect for a decade. Why, if it had not been for the shortsightedness of this government in cutting back on that program, it might still be making a contribution to relieve the unemployment facing us now. Talk about confusion; here is confusion personified.

We are in the middle of debating the tax reform legislation in the form of Bill C-259, and the government announces that it has some 100 amendments to make to that bill. Now, the government trots forth another package of confusion. I ask, how in the world are we to conduct a logical debate, which the minister responsible for the Wheat Board talked of in his contribution, on the basis of this kind of confusion?

Mr. Stanfield: Do not go too far away, now.

An hon. Member: I see the Prime minister is leaving.

Mr. Nielsen: I guess the heat is a little much for the Prime Minister. I do not blame him for leaving. He is packed and ready to go. He should go for good.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: They reviled the winter works program and the on-the-job training program, as well as the vocational training program that was implemented by the previous Conservative government. The Minister of Labour was in the House at that time, as was the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Stanfield: This program is new and improved.

Mr. Nielsen: It is new and improved. They scorned our program, scoffed at it and spurned it. They spurned all suggestions which have come from this side of the House over many months, knowing that there would be a severe crisis in the economy and in unemployment. Now, suddenly, they have clasped these programs to their breasts as if they were the originators of these schemes.

An hon. Member: They think they have a new idea.

Mr. Baldwin: It is just a new breast.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a silicone breast. In 1963, when all these Liberals trooped across the country, and there are lots of them here although I notice that the much maligned rump on my right is not here in force tonight, they promised that there would be one million new jobs a year. One million new jobs a year was what they would produce; yet we heard the Minister of Finance taking pride in there being only 200,000 more jobs this year than a year ago. What a pitiful attempt that was to explain that hundreds of thousands people in this country have been made unemployed through the deliberate actions and policies of this government.

An Hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Nielsen: It is gratifying to note that finally the government has agreed that there is an emergency. This bears some examination, since repeated attempts have been made on this side of the House to adjourn the House in order to carry on an emergency debate such as this. Such attempts have been made for several months. Yet, all of a sudden Statistics Canada figures are released for unemployment this month and then this becomes an emergency. Since the government consents, we are allowed to debate it.

There is to be $160 million in a winter works program for building federal buildings, exhibition buildings and CMHC works.

Mr. Stanfield: We should build a memorial for this government and, indeed, for the minister.

Mr. Nielsen: They need a memorial. All this talk about multiplier effect is all gobbledygook. It is an attempt to camouflage the real trouble in which they find themselves. There is nothing really constructive here which will provide remedies and jobs to get us out of the hole. I talked about honesty a minute ago. Oh, yes, the Prime Minister marches forward. He has gone out in order to build a new program to meet the economic crisis caused by the United States "Nixonomics".

An hon. Member: He wants more parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. Nielsen: They do not have to worry over there. They are secure. Only about one third of them are not employed by the government. The rest all have their sinecures. There are cabinet ministers, parliamentary secretaries and all the rest of them.

The Prime Minister, on the CBC program "Encounter" said this a few weeks ago:

We feel that the budgetary measures that the government has taken have put the economy on a growth path. The Gross National Product is increasing;—

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Nielsen:

—consumer demand is increasing;—

An hon. Member: That's true.

Mr. Nielsen:

—housing starts are the largest ever;—

An hon. Member: That's true.

Mr. Nielsen:

—inventories are falling; exports are growing.

Mr. Stanfield: They can go out and spend another $1 billion.

Mr. Nielsen: The Prime Minister says the government has done lots of things for the people. Let him tell that to the 7.1 per cent of the labour force that is unemployed. He admits that it is a shame that there are unemployed people and he says that the unemployed figures are higher than we would like to see. That was back one month ago.

An hon. Member: That was on "Laugh-in".

Mr. Nielsen: And what did he have to say about this winter? He looked forward to this winter with rose coloured glasses and said:

—in terms of the economy itself it will be a better winter.—So in terms of growth of the economy it will be better. In terms of the number of unemployed people and in terms of the relative, the adjusted figures and absolute figures, it will be better.

It is time we stopped fooling around with adjusted, relative, and absolute figures and got some of these unemployed people back to work.

That brings up another thought. When I saw the Minister of Labour sitting on the other side of the House as a backbencher, he always attempted to created the image that he was the champion of the man with the lunch bucket. He always used that phrase when he was devilling for the minister of labour of that time by intervening in labour disputes. I can recall the CBC and Trans-Canada. He always trotted forth his lunch-bucket of the common workingman. He is now Minister of Labour. He has a responsibility to that workingman who is now without work.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: He lost his lunch-bucket.

Mr. Nielsen: Perhaps he did lose his lunch-bucket. It is not an honest image. When discussing a matter as serious as the one now being debated, it is not enough for ministers and members opposite to get up and spout forth a whole host of statistics and paint rosy pictures. It is time they told it like it is. They should tell us what they are going to do in real terms to meet this critical situation of unemployment.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was questioned on the same program by the nationally known syndicated writer, Mr. Lynch, he said with regard to unemployment:

—it will be better.

MR. LYNCH: It will be better.

MR. TRUDEAU: Oh, yes. You know, barring some disaster from south of the border.

That is the scapegoat they are trying to use for their incompetence. They are trying to say because of the actions of the President of the United States, Canada is in the economic mess it is in today. They know full well that mess is their own creation and they do not know how to get out of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: Eric Kierans says that.

Mr. Nielsen: The sensible ones who left the government are the people saying this.

Mr. Francis: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: We hear the member for Ottawa—

An hon. Member: The member from nowhere.

Mr. Nielsen: As the Prime Minister would say, who the hell is he? Let the member get up and make a contribution to this debate, and let him try to get away from this figure of 7.1 per cent. Let any member opposite try to do the same. Instead of applauding ministers who are saying and doing nothing, they should ruddy well be getting up and representing their constituents by telling it like it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I quote from the transcript of the same program:

MR. LYNCH: Well you've had a pretty good disaster from south of the border.

MR. TRUDEAU: Yes, and we have brought in measures which we think will annul that disaster.

Well, the figures today do not exactly bear that out. Later in the program the Prime Minister said:

But whether the end result in the winter and in the spring will be 5 per cent or 4 per cent or more or less, I don't know. What I know is that the economy is moving in the right direction, that the adjusted figures and absolute figures are falling with, as I confessed to the House a few days ago, with the exception of the teenagers.

He said that just three weeks ago. How utterly wrong he was and still is. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) spoke of incompetence. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. What I really like about the transcript—

Mr. Francis: Tell us what you think of tonight's measures.

Mr. Nielsen: The measures are far too late and far too inadequate. All they are is a refurbishing of programs introduced in the early 1960s by the Diefenbaker government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I can remember the four horsemen of the Apocalypse sitting on this side saying to the then government the same things I am now saying.

Mr. Cafik: Geography might have something to do with it. It depends on where you sit.

Mr. Nielsen: Tell that to the hundreds of thousands who are unemployed in the country. It does not make any difference where they sit. The hon. member should tell that to his constituents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That member should not be interjecting.

Mr. Cafik: We are as concerned about unemployment as you are.

Mr. Nielsen: That is fine, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member is concerned, he will get up on behalf of his constituents who are more than hard hit by the unemployment problem in the country.

Mr. Cafik: I intend to do that.

Mr. Nielsen: If he is not spineless, he will get up and do that.

Mr. Cafik: If you will sit down and give us a chance, we will all have a go at it.

Mr. Nielsen: This is rule by divine right. They all have it over there. It is symptomatic of the Liberal party. They believe that only they have the answers. They believe that only they are right. They believe that only they have the right to speak. They believe that any legislation that comes before this House should be approved without even a whimper from the opposition. They do not understand the workings of a democratic institution such as Parliament. That stupid interjection by the hon. member is evidence of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: He supports the lawbreakers.

Mr. Nielsen: The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is just one example of how they are breaking the law. Another document which demonstrates this was tabled in the House on October 8. Members should look at it if they think the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is an isolated example. The Auditor General is so ashamed of the Northern Canada Power Commission's financial report that he will not even certify it; he does not think it is in compliance with the law.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) spoke of the rosy situation. In his last paragraph he said that the economy is strong and growing. According to him and his supporters, we do not have to worry at all. On September 7, 1971, as recorded at page 7580 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance said:

> We are confident that the trend will be that unemployment will continue to decline as the economy gathers further strength. My hon. friends opposite know this will happen, and I hope that the Leader of the Opposition, who guaranteed that unemployment would not go below 6 per cent this year, will turn his leadership over to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings when it does.

It has not. The Minister of Finance was not only wrong in making that statement last September, he was less than honest. As recorded at page 6908 of Hansard, the minister said:

> As to the problems of right now it is evident that unemployment is too high. There is too much slack in the economy. At the same time, costs are still rising at a rate that causes concern about future price developments. It is evident also that these problems are interrelated. They must be treated and solved together. I am sure that we turned the corner last year, and despite some apparent hesitancy are now clearly on the way up.

Some "up," Mr. Speaker!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please, I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): If I understood correctly the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) this evening, Mr. Speaker, he said that he approved of the measures announced but said they should have been implemented sooner. He approved of the measures to the extent that he tried to take credit for them. I would like to deal with both these points.

First, in terms of expanding employment in a free, mixed economy such as ours there are only so many alternatives from which to choose. No matter how many economists we read, we note that more or less the same alternatives are listed time and time again. It is a question of mix and of degree. During the last few months the Leader of the Opposition has suggested all of the alternatives. It is not difficult for him to state this evening that he has suggested these matters before in a general way. If you recommend everything, Mr. Speaker, you are bound to come up with something right from time to time.

Second, his criticism with regard to timing is more serious. He says that our forecasting is poor and that these measures should have been implemented sooner. I admit that timing is the most important element in administering economic policies of this nature. I am not convinced that, given the information which was available, the timing was wrong. It is easy now, after the fact, to claim that the timing was wrong, but on June 18 when the minister presented his last budget, all the indicators were up. At that time there was no way of predicting the United States surcharge. This evening I got the impression from the opposition that in their view the surcharge had not affected the situation in any way. But a few weeks ago, if I read them correctly, they were saying the opposite. Anyway, at the time of the budget there was no way of predicting the United States actions and no way of predicting the worsening of the unemployment situation as it affected young people.

I remember very well the reports which appeared in the newspapers after the June budget and the opinions expressed by economists. There was almost unanimous agreement that it was an expansionary budget, that it was what the economy needed. I think it is important that I should remind hon. members of some of the statistics which were given by the minister tonight with respect to the rate of growth at that time. He pointed out that the rate of growth increased by 2.3 per cent in the first half of 1970, 3.5 per cent in the second half, and 6.2 per cent in the first half of this year. He also stated that in the second quarter of the year output was rising at the rate of 8.5 per cent per annum. So, there was an increase from 2.3 per cent to 8.5 per cent in the growth rate in a short period of one year. All the indications on June 18 were that the economy was on the upswing. I submit that to have applied further expansionary policies at that time would have been irresponsible; it would have meant adding fuel to an economy which did not need it.

People can criticize today, and say the forecasting was poor, but I have not so far heard any specific suggestions from the opposition parties as to ways in which forecasting can be improved. Every country in the world is finding difficulties in forecasting today because no economy is completely closed; we live in an interdependent world and all sorts of factors enter into economic forecasting. I agree we should seek out means of improvement, and I have myself made suggestions with this in mind. Some time ago the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) suggested that an independent short-term forecasting body be set up. I would personally prefer to see the staff and authority of some of the existing short-term forecasting bodies increased. I submit they should be subject to political control and be more responsive to political needs.

The leader of the NDP said the policies presented tonight by the government, though good as far as they went, were inadequate. Unfortunately, as is often the case when he gets warmed up in a debate, he engaged in personal attacks on the Minister of Finance and other ministers. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who spoke before me, did the same thing. I do not know in what way this sort of thing can add to the value of a debate such as this. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) spoke about complacency. He accused members on this side of being complacent with respect to the economic conditions. I think the hon. member confuses noise and volume with interest. He and other members on that side of the House get up and make loud noises, feeling they are showing great interest in a situation. Members of the government, studying the situation in depth, are not making a great noise about it, but the hon. member and his friends regard this as an expression of complacency. Mr. Speaker, seriousness cannot be judged in terms of volume.

One interesting thing about the speech of the leader of the New Democratic Party was this: although he represents a more or less socialistic party he came forward with no real alternative solution. He launched the same type of attack as did the leader of the Official Opposition. He approved in general of what was being done, but said we should have done more of the same a little bit sooner. He offered no real alternatives. In a free, mixed economy such as ours there are not so many alternatives available. It is a question of mix, of timing, of political wisdom and forecasting—and nobody is perfect in all these respects. Nevertheless, I submit the timing was good in view of what was known at the time.

The opposition accused the government of being complacent to the extent that no action was taken. I repeat that the budget of June 18 was a significant budget and that it was recognized as being so at the time. As a matter of fact, most of the members of the opposition stated then that we were about to call an election because it was such an expansionary budget. They claimed in the press and on television that it was the type of expansionary budget which necessarily led to an election. Now, they are saying that nothing was done on June 18. I submit the government took a significant step on June 18, but since then new elements have entered the picture, elements which could not have been predicted. We are now accused of over-estimating the effect of the United States surcharge. Maybe the opposition is under-estimating it tonight, although a few weeks ago they were placing much more emphasis upon it for political purposes. Now, they are saying it has nothing to do with the situation.

The hon. member for York South said he would like to put forward a program which would create 250,000 new jobs. The proposals he had in mind for bringing this about involved more of the same which would mean, I suppose, an even greater deficit. He says the measures which have been introduced will not lead to employment on that scale. I do not know what evidence he relies on to support his own judgment.

Mr. Orlikow: You mention a figure. How many jobs will be produced? That will be seen.

Mr. Allmand: I am not an oracle or a prophet like the hon. member for York South. I believe the measures which were presented to the House tonight are significant and will lead to a great increase in employment.

Mr. Orlikow: How many jobs?

Mr. Allmand: I shall not predict. It is easy to predict when you are in the opposition. You can make all kinds of predictions, and you are bound to be right one time or another.

The leader of the NDP also criticized the government for not consulting with the provinces before introducing this program. He spoke about credibility. I wonder where this leaves his own credibility. If I am not mistaken, it was only a few days ago that he and his party were suggesting that the government should present a program without consulting the provinces. His supporters were saying that if it was not possible to get agreement on an earlier federal-provincial conference, the government should go forward with its plans now and let them be known at once. Tonight he criticized the government for putting these proposals forward before consulting the provinces.

An hon. Member: That should have been done last July.

Mr. Allmand: You fellows will have your chance to speak. This debate can go on all night. The Prime Minister pointed out, in answer to questions, that he had tried to arrange a meeting with the provinces as long ago as last June. He took the initiative in that connection. If a meeting was not held, where does the responsibility lie? A date was set for December. The Prime Minister said he would prefer the meeting to be held earlier. We all hope he will have these meetings soon.

• (10:20 p.m.)

The leader of the New Democratic Party suggested tonight that in putting forward these proposals and programs without consultation we are doing wrong. As far as I know, consultation may have been had with the provinces, but only last week many members of the opposition were suggesting that we do just this. So where is the credibility of the New Democratic Party?

We expect this sort of criticism from the opposition. I have the feeling that if the Minister of Finance had put forward tonight all of the programs suggested by the Conservative party, the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit party, he would have been accused of providing too little, too late, or something to that effect. We expect the type of speech made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), which was mainly directed at the personalities of members of the government and had not very much to do with the proposals put forward or with any serious criticism or analysis of our policies.

I was pleased to note in the measures put forward tonight some of the proposals which I suggested in an opposition debate a week or so ago. I am particularly pleased with the on the job training program which is directed mainly at youth, those who do not qualify for the Canada Manpower retraining program. In speaking in that debate a while ago I referred to the report of the Committee on Youth which has been downgraded to an extent which I think is unjustified. I pointed out that one of the best parts of the Committee on Youth report related to youth unemployment. This committee made some very good recommendations, some of which have tonight been adopted by the government.

In conclusion, I note that members on both sides of the House have expressed great concern at the economic situation in Canada. It is serious. We have all emphasized its seriousness. No one tries to underestimate the seriousness of the situation. But I submit that if we are sincere in what we say about the situation, we should all get behind the government's program and make it a success. I submit that the question of improving the economic situation in Canada is bigger than partisan politics; it is something that requires the co-operation of all members. I hope the government's program will be a success and that we will all play our part.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this occasion I think it would be well to remind hon. members that at this moment the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) are in the press room engaging, I am informed, in a form of television debate. No wonder interest in this House is not very great.

I remember the debate on the western grain industry and reading in the Globe and Mail of the attitude of Saskatchewan farmers in the Assiniboia by-election campaign now under way. Their feeling of alienation has been personified no more than in the great debate that went on in this House for days, in which the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) put forward a grain stabilization bill involving a 1 per cent reduction for the farmers and a cut-off point which meant that the grain stabilization program would be of little use to the farmers before 1980.

This evening the Minister of Finance bettered Scrooge on his deathbed. Having stated, not only all summer but for the last two years, that everything was fine economically he was faced this morning with an unemployment rate of 7.2 per cent. Thereupon he suddenly decided that the economy needed a massive shot in the arm, but I am afraid that much of this massive shot in the arm is going to be wasted. For example, let us examine the winter works program, which essentially is what the program for the municipalities is. It takes months to get such a program properly under way and to see that there is a reasonable return on the dollar. Engineering works, and so on, require a great deal of preparation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet should have realized over the course of the summer that much needed to be done. The Prime Minister did not even get around to setting the date with his provincial counterparts to work out such a program. So this program is announced without any basic preparation having been made with the provinces, let alone with the municipalities. Even in this day and age when our communications are supposed to be better than they were 100 years ago, the municipalities will be hard put to evolve any programs that will be useful and meaningful by way of providing jobs.

Nevertheless, the cut in taxation is welcome. The cut in corporation tax is particularly welcomed by the private sector and should increase opportunities for employment in the future. However, I understand the cut in corporation tax is self-limiting since it will end in 1972. Steps that should have been taken gradually have been taken at a jump. This leads me to wonder whether these measures are an election ploy to blind the Canadian people to the way in which the economy has been so badly run during the past three years.

A number of other features have to be considered in making an assessment, a critical analysis of the situation confronting us. What are some of the forces that have brought us to the present predicament, forces that are both internal as well as external? There are some things we could have done about these problems, but I am sure that history will show that this administration has handled badly both the internal and the external management of our affairs.

The first factor to be considered is that Canada has built up the most comprehensive system of welfare to be found anywhere in the world. Welfare, in its broad sense, is a provincial responsibility, yet the federal government has encouraged and promoted welfare programs ad infinitum, even against provincial protestations that the programs were forced upon the provinces often before they were ready for them. No attempt was made to assess the cost of the programs before they were applied, how they would be managed or how to prevent excessive spending once they were applied, good as the programs themselves were. Only now, when the programs are assuming excessive cost, is the government getting around to curtailing their cost and making some economy moves.

The federal government has been extremely derelict in its duty. Whenever the workability of a program was questioned by the provinces, the federal government invariably answered that in order to ensure universality open-ended programs had to be adopted. Nor have these spending programs yet run their course. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) will be introducing his family income support plan, if we ever get through the tax bill, which in effect will rechannel family allowances to the lower income groups. Granted, much of the family allowances went to people who did not need them, but under the new proposal the total cost will be an additional $150 million.

The recently passed Unemployment Insurance Act is a disguised form of guaranteed income. In committee, Members of Parliament were assured that the plan will operate at a fiscal break-even point when unemployment is at the rate of about 4 per cent, though the figures given were imprecise. When it is considered that unemployment in the sixties averaged well over 5 per cent and that at the present time the unemployment rate is 7.2 per cent, it can be seen that almost half of the unemployment insurance money will come from the federal treasury, according to the estimates made by the Department of Labour.

All this brings me to the main point: what are we doing for Canadian business? It must provide all the goods that we need in order for our welfare economy to survive. Until tonight, the government has given precious little encouragement to business beyond piling tax upon tax. In the Globe and Mail of Tuesday, October 12 the following is said regarding Mr. Nixon, the Liberal leader in Ontario:

> Or take the uncertainty that afflicts business, causing it to pull in its horns and fail to produce the expansion that would have provided jobs— It was caused by the Ottawa Liberal government, lingering for years over a new system of taxation that would have heavily penalized business, withdrawing it—largely under well-researched attack by the Ontario government—replacing it with another system almost as confusing, topping it off with a Competition Act that has business wondering if it will end up in jail or paying a million dollar fine. Instead of providing jobs.

The tax bill now before the House is one suited to a decade long gone by. It is one that favours so-called equity over economic growth, and where there is a conflict between equity for the taxpayers and revenue for the treasury, it comes down firmly on the side of treasury. In this tax bill, the government has discriminated against the millions of Canadians who are individual entrepreneurs, farmers, and storekeepers. It has assumed no responsibility for the unincorporated business sector of the business community. It has not assisted these groups to become more viable.

In the tax laws governing small businesses, the government has taken away substantial freedom of choice from these small businesses. Indeed, they seem only to have paid lipservice to the widely held public sentiment that small businesses should be granted tax concessions in the proposed tax structure. They have hedged this tax portion of the bill so rigidly, in apparent fear that some foreigner will buy a small company, that they have virtually reduced the tax proposals to naught. The government is planning to put curbs on industry under the Labour Code section dealing with technical change, so that a company will not be able to introduce technological changes until the end of a labour contract. On the surface at least, this looks like a device that will hold back technological changes in our industry, and what surer way is there to prevent an efficient industry?

Further, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), in his competition bill, is restricting business in an apparent attempt to create an ideal society where every consumer will be protected to the nth degree. He may well be hedging industry and services with regulations to such an extent that it will be hardly able to breathe.

As the government of a country with the international trading pattern that we have, this government has been behaving in a curious manner. While the United States has been defending the western world with its blood and treasure in Viet Nam, the Canadian government has been systematically cutting down its commitment to NATO and cutting down its own security forces. It has recognized Red China at the expense of Taiwan. It is assiduously engaged in attempting to expel Taiwan from the United Nations in direct contrast to the American position. What did the Globe and Mail say about this in its editorial of October 12? It reads:

> Or consider the coldness which has developed between Canada and the United States, and which has undoubtedly contributed to if not precipitated the U.S. disregard for what U.S. measures may do to Canada's economy.

While in Russia, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has portrayed the United States as a cultural, economic and possibly military threat to Canada.

In the long awaited and apparently now defunct Gray report on foreign ownership in Canada, there was an implication that the government would be sympathetic to the economic nationalists in Canada who portray Canadians as hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans. The Gray report would certainly have been punitive against foreign investment.

The action of the U.S. government in applying the surtax to Canada cannot really be condemned from their point of view. Canada, along with Germany and Japan, is one of the nations at which it was aimed. They did not have any alternative but to correct their balance of payments. Much of the American grievance lies in the automotive pact and the use to which it was being put, such as the Michelin tire plant in Nova Scotia and snowmobiles. All this has created an abnormal balance in favour of Canada. There are many areas in which negotiations would be useful in dealing with the U.S. surcharge. We have to be aware of the change in conditions in the world in which we live. While the world has been coalescing in trading groups such as the European economic union, the Asian group, and North America, we have been doing very little about it. We have assumed that we can operate outside any trading bloc in an independent manner. This may be so, but we cannot do this without a considerable change in the direction of our economy.

Measures should be taken at the internal level to stimulate business, as has been proposed tonight, but also we should give the entrepreneurs a greater place in our society. Our welfare structures should be scrutinized, and we will have to make some decisions to ensure that economies are effected in these fields without a reduction in service. In the international field, we should negotiate with the Americans on the sore points and the so-called grievances with resolution and firmness. Mr. Connally has suggested that Canada has probably met many of the conditions necessary for the removal of the U.S. surtax. It has allowed the dollar to float and it has allowed market realities freely to determine exchange rates. It has made some move toward the reduction of specific barriers to trade. I think that the Canadian government could do its part in hastening the end of the surcharges by declaring its readiness to re-examine promptly the safeguards in the 1965 Canada-U.S. auto pact.

The measures announced tonight by the Minister of Finance should be accepted and promoted. It is unfortunate that they have come so late, and I believe that, particularly with regard to the winter works program, an earlier announcement would have been a more effective way of providing jobs for this coming winter.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon L'Heureux (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in tonight's debate. Last May, when I was elected in my beautiful riding of Chambly, I emphasized the importance of the economy.

Tonight, I want to express my views on unemployment and on the economy of Canada, problems of extreme concern to us, not only because of their present magnitude, but also because of their potential disastrous consequences.

Fortunately, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has announced tonight action to be taken in behalf of Canadians, action which will no doubt help to solve the problem of unemployment and restore stability to the Canadian economy. I want to congratulate him and thank him on behalf of my voters and of all Canadians.

Although we are short of jobs, it is not because of a lack of raw materials in Canada. We own a rich subsoil and huge power resources. The land that our people have developed for more than 200 years is truly immense. I suggest that unemployment is due to the fact that the growth rate of our population increased faster than that of our industries. This is quite obvious, and in my opinion, that is where the problem lies.

We have seen other countries devasted by war that have reached industrial power far greater than anything Canada has ever been able to achieve. These countries do not have our advantages in material resources, but they were aware of a reality that Canada has not recognized until now. These countries were aware of the need to work and of the need of markets for their products.

The good fortune of our neighbours can explain why Canada has, in some measure, been sheltered from the full appreciation of both of these needs. When we were basically an agricultural country, we were able to sell a very large percentage of our gross national product and we were able to afford and sustain relatively new industry under protection.

Other industries started off without protection, and that is why from the beginning they could equip themselves with an organization and specialization that assured them of success.

After 1968, Canadians have found themselves competing in a much freer way in the markets of the world, but particularly in the market of the United States. They could not however equal the high industrialization of others that mass production made possible.

Canadians generally have not matched the productivity of many other countries. Without protection from now on, their industries cannot profitably exist in direct competition with the great new plants located in the United States, Japan and the European Common Market.

As the United States' balance of payments became and remained intolerable to the United States, they have found it necessary to take the moves of the import tax and of other legislation. These added burdens, these protective measures in favour of exports, are beyond the ability of many Canadian manufacturers to stand.

It brings into question the viability of American branch plants in Canada and it most certainly brings into question the viability of Canadian manufacturing plants which must be able to share freely in the North American market.

We should explore with the Americans not only the conditions of immediate removal of the trade limiting taxes, but a continuing policy leading to some assurances to the United States in matters of energy and of raw material.

In my view, the United States must guarantee to Canada an immediate access to the North American market so that our plants in Canada may operate on a footing of equality. This is the only way in which I can see the development in Canada of an industrial society worthy of Canadians as a whole.

The world is being divided into great markets—Southeast Asia, Japan, the European Common Market, and Canada must belong to one of these. The logic of geography dictates that this must be a North American market.

Many organizations—even separatists—havee put forward this logic, but it can only be effectively negotiated by a Canada strong and united in its purpose and its wish.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are participating in this emergency debate tonight because of the disastrous unemployment figures announced today by Statistics Canada. In the month of September, 7.1 per cent of the labour force, on a seasonally adjusted rate, was unemployed. The number of unemployed in September was 434,000 compared with 398,000 in September, 1970.

One would think that this is something unexpected, unpredicted, and nobody knew it would happen. In fact, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) said precisely that when he said that members of the opposition were being wise after the fact. Mr. Speaker, the truth is—and members of the government know it—that the government has consistently misread the economic indicators. The government has been consistently wrong in its estimates of what the level of unemployment would be. Not only has the government been wrong in its estimates of what the level of unemployment would be but it has deliberately chosen to exaggerate unemployment because of its fears about inflation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in December, 1969, that he would not be deterred in his fight against inflation even if the unemployment rate rose to 6 per cent. Well, Mr. Speaker, last month we had an unemployment rate of 7.1 per cent.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), the Prime Minister and—I hesitate to bring this member into the august company I have just mentioned—the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) all predicted that within the last year or so things would be getting better, when in fact they have been getting consistently worse.

On November 12, 1970, the Minister of Finance said:

Recently I suggested publicly that on a seasonal basis . . . unemployment had about reached its peak and expressed confidence that we could look forward to continued improvement.

What was the rate of unemployment then, Mr. Speaker? It was 6.5 per cent. On March 18 of this year the Prime Minister said:

The government has taken a series of steps intended to alter the course of the economic policy . . . Some time must elapse before these steps can be fully efficient.

He went on to say:

I think that all the economic indicators show that the economy is moving.

What was the rate of unemployment then, Mr. Speaker? It was 6.2 per cent. The economy was moving, but in the wrong way. Just a few weeks ago, on September 7, the Minister of Finance said:

Unemployment will continue to decline.

He challenged the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to resign his leadership if the prediction of that hon. gentleman that unemployment would not go below 6 per cent this year did not materialize. What is the unemployment rate now, Mr. Speaker? It is 7.1 per cent. Here is a real gem from the parliamentary secretary, who said on April 27 of this year:

The government is not prepared to accept an unemployment rate of 5½ per cent to 6 per cent seasonally adjusted or otherwise, for the future.

Mr. Speaker, we have not had less than 6 per cent unemployment, seasonally adjusted, for the last 16 months but the parliamentary secretary seems quite willing to accept an unemployment rate of 7.1 per cent. We have heard a great deal from the ministers and the Prime Minister—the Prime Minister who believes in a just society, who believes in participatory democracy, who gives strong leadership to this country compared with the former Liberal Prime Minister who was weak, vacillating and uncertain about what to do.

Mr. Speaker, here are some interesting comparisons. For the month of September, in the four years during which the former Liberal Prime Minister led this country, from 1964 to 1967, the rate of unemployment, seasonally adjusted, varied from a low of 3.6 per cent to a high of 4.5 per cent. In the four years this great Prime Minister has led the country the unemployment rate, seasonally adjusted, for the month of September has varied from a low of 4.7 per cent—the lowest rate under this Prime Minister is higher than the highest rate under the former Prime Minister—to the highest rate yet for the month of September, of 7.1 per cent.

Given the consistently wrong, fraudulent and deceptive predictions of the Minister of Finance and of the Prime Minister, is it any wonder that we are involved in an emergency debate tonight? Is it any wonder that the Minister of Finance comes here tonight and spends the first ten minutes of his speech repeating all the nonsensical arguments he has been making for the last couple of years, that things are getting better and better? The number of people employed, the number of houses being built—everything is getting better except one thing: the patient is dying. We have more unemployment than we have ever had in this country.

These are the simple and concrete facts which cannot be ignored, Mr. Speaker. This government has consistently misjudged what is happening. In any other country where a minister has been so consistently wrong and where the Deputy Minister of Finance has repeatedly in meetings with economists from other government departments and officials from provincial governments berated and lectured them about how wrong they are, they would have been asked to resign. If they had any decency, they would not have waited to be asked. This is the record of this government—consistently ignoring unemployment.

Mr. Perrault: And you need a new record.

Mr. Orlikow: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Perrault) is good at interjecting. But I do not mind, Mr. Speaker, because we have heard him before.

Mr. Perrault: You have been making the same speech around here for ten years.

Mr. Orlikow: The parliamentary secretary says that I have been making the same speech for ten years. The only reason I have done so is because this government is consistently wrong in regard to what has to be done. Mr. Speaker, in most governments one expects that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who represents business and takes the point of view of businessmen, does not worry about the employee; but one expects the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour to have some heart. I do not expect him to have any brains, but I do expect him to have some heart, some compassion, some understanding about what ordinary people want.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the parliamentary secretary were in his place I would recognize him. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I am more than willing to answer a question by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour if he wants to ask it in a proper way, because I know that every time he opens his mouth he puts, not just one foot but both feet into it, or changes his feet. When I have finished, if the parliamentary secretary wishes to rise and defend the government, I shall be glad to hear him.

In September we had the highest rate of unemployment this country has had in the last ten years—a rate of unemployment, Mr. Speaker, higher than that of the worst years under the previous Conservative government about which the Minister of Finance spoke so scathingly. I am willing to listen to him, Mr. Speaker; I am willing to have him defend his government and the 7.1 per cent unemployment.

What is the situation? We have a crash program. I shall talk about that in a few minutes. I said a few moments ago that in September of this year 434,000 people were unemployed, or 7.1 per cent of the labour force at the seasonally adjusted rate. But September is a relatively good month, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Not for the Liberals.

Mr. Orlikow: In September, 1971, we had 10 per cent more unemployed than in September, 1970. I want the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, who said that we could not tolerate 5½ per cent to 6 per cent unemployment, to tell us what is going to happen.

Mr. Nesbitt: He doesn't know.

Mr. Orlikow: In February, 1971, we had 675,000 unemployed. Since we have 10 per cent more unemployed in September of 1971 than we had last September, I predict—after consultations with economists in government and outside who have been consistently more correct in their estimates than the economists to whom the Minister of Finance listens—that in February, 1972, the normal increase in employment which we have had will mean we will have 750,000 unemployed.

Mr. Whelan: No.

Mr. Orlikow: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), when estimating the effects of the Nixon economic policies announced a few weeks ago, estimated that if the U.S. surcharge remains in effect for a full year it will mean a loss of 90,000 jobs. I suggest, from a very simple calculation, that by next February the surcharge will result in another 50,000 unemployed. This means that between the normal unemployment and that caused by the Nixon economic policies we will have 800,000 unemployed.

Tonight the government announced programs which sound pretty good. The leader of our party and others have challenged the government, the Minister of Finance or any other member—the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour who is so ready to interject—to calculate the number of jobs that will be created by these programs.

Mr. Perrault: You estimate it.

Mr. Orlikow: The parliamentary secretary suggests that I make an estimate. I intend to do just that. I predict that the maximum number of jobs produced by these programs—and it will not be in the next four months because there is a considerable time lag between the announcement of a program and its implementation—will be in the neighbourhood of 50,000. Mr. Speaker, that means that in February, 1972, this country will be faced with 750,000 people unemployed. I hope I am wrong. I would love to hear some parliamentary secretary say I am wrong. Although I have been here for close to ten years, I have not discovered what functions parliamentary secretaries serve. However, in the light of estimates prepared by economists attached to the Department of Finance, prepared by economists attached to the Department of Manpower and prepared by economists attached to Statistics Canada, I should be happy to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) or the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Perrault) get up and tell me I am wrong, that I have exaggerated and that there will only be 500,000 or 400,000 people unemployed this coming winter. They will not do that, because they know the figures I have given are pretty close to being correct.

• (11:00 p.m.)

I am not alone in my concern. To show that what I am saying is not particularly partisan, may I quote from a short article which appeared in the Globe and Mail on October 9, headed, "Welfare roll boost expected this winter with job scarcity". The estimates I am about to quote have not been made by politicians, have not been made by economists or by elected people; they have been made by people who have the responsibility of seeing that Canadians do not suffer too much and do not go hungry. Of course, I am talking about the welfare directors of a series of cities in the most prosperous province of this country, Ontario. Here, in part, is how the article reads:

> In Oshawa, where rolls doubled last year, welfare administrator H. G. Chesebrough said last month's announcement by General Motors to lay off workers could swell the welfare rolls. —
> In London the January, 1971, welfare rolls were 33 per cent higher than the January, 1970 rolls—

The administrator there expects the welfare budget to be 15 per cent higher than it was in 1970. I continue quoting:

> In Peterborough, officials predict welfare costs this winter will rise by 25 per cent over last winter. —
> In North Bay, Nipissing District welfare administrator Royal Poulin said he predicts the number of people on welfare will rise by 40 per cent. —
> In August, 1970,—

This will interest the hon. member for Windsor.

> —Windsor's expenditures totalled $197,676. In August, 1971, the figure rose to $310,285.

These are facts. They cannot be ignored or pushed aside by the government, and they will not be met by the hastily conceived and, in many cases, ill conceived proposals brought forward by the Minister of Finance this evening as a result of the government's fright.

What do we have here? We have $113 million in further loans for housing, sewage and land assembly. Any province or city which has had dealings with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation knows that a minimum of one year elapses between the time a proposal is made and when it is approved and work can begin. That $113 million will join the line-up for approval behind the tens of millions of dollars worth of projects that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is considering. Much of that money will not be used in the winter of 1971-72.

Then, we have $35 million for job training. I do not have time to go into details but, as has already been pointed out, we have already upgraded through job training in our Manpower training centres over one million Canadians. As my leader said, this winter we will have the most highly trained unemployed people in the world.

What does the government propose as its major method of dealing with the unemployment crisis? It proposes just what one would expect from a millionaire Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and a big business administration, a 7 per cent cut in corporation taxes. Mr. Speaker, corporation taxes in the last quarter of this year were much higher than they have been for a number of years. There is no sign that corporations need tax cuts to produce more jobs and to expand productive capacity. Why should they expand their productive capacity when this winter three quarters of a million people will be unemployed? How many cars, radios and television sets will the three quarters of a million unemployed be able to buy this coming February?

An hon. Member: Let them buy Canadian made goods.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. His time has expired.

An hon. Member: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member may only continue his remarks if there is unanimous consent. Is there such unanimous consent?

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There is not unanimous consent, so the hon. member may not continue.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, this debate, tonight, on the unemployment which we are experiencing now in Canada, is far from premature, because if it had come about a little sooner, it is quite possible that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) would have opened the Treasury a little sooner, and the situation would not be as serious as it is now.

An old proverb states: Better late than never. Unemployment among the young, especially in the 18 to 25 age group, is a real calamity, and more particularly in the province of Quebec, where employment opportunities for the young in that group are extremely limited.

• (11:10 p.m.)

We invited the government, on several occasions, to do something really practical. Indeed on two opposition days we considered that topic and we did more than just criticize. On those occasions, as was done tonight by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (M. Caouette), we suggested proposals and solutions to the government, in order to help those people who are at present in alarming circumstances.

As the previous speaker said, educated or non educated, young people are doomed to unemployment. Such are the conclusions to be drawn from statistics. I do not have enough time to quote them but most of the hon. members are familiar with them because they are published from time to time and give us the information we need.

The Canadian economy is more and more unable to absorb the multitude of specialized young university people entering the labour market. Short term projections are most pessimistic. Indeed, although the federal authorities refuse all comments on the situation, some experts assert that the labour market for new graduates will be almost inexistent in the spring of 1972.

Mr. Speaker, these are far from encouraging forecasts. Even if the policy announced tonight is applied, I do not see really that we could make an all out effort in such a short period of time as a few months and achieve the objective of sending our young people on the labour market without delay to earn a decent living.

Such is the situation prevailing for the graduates between 18 to 24 years of age from our colleges and universities. That is the deadend young people are facing today, after having made the necessary sacrifices to acquire a sound education: they find no possibility of putting their energy, skills and know-how at the service of their fellow-citizens so that they may enjoy a better standard of living based on our material and human resources.

While considering the situation, one has the feeling of being in a tremendously small country, where there is no room to move and no possibility for our young people to come to a normal fulfilment. And yet as early as 1968, when I first came here, I remember reading a report from the Economic Council which, as a matter of fact, was informing the government of the desastrous economic situation. This same Council was telling the government about a number of ways likely to correct this situation.

Instead of doing something, the government took pleasure in fighting inflation even at the risk of increased unemployment. And we have heard in this House extremely categorical government statements that to fight inflation you cannot help creating unemployment.

In fact, the government allowed the situation to reach a most dangerous level and now claims to be the saviour of the people. The program proposed tonight makes me think of those two poor guys standing by a well. Suddenly one of them deliberately pushes the other into the well. Later, he helps his victim to get out of the well with a ladder. Of course, once he is out of the well the unfortunate guy is in a worse situation than before since his clothes are all wet.

When the government has spent the millions of dollars it is offering this evening, the Canadian people will be worse off than before. Indeed, the loans will have to be paid back as well as the interests running into millions of dollars because we do not want to alter the present financial system and we wish to cling to old methods that may have been adequate some years ago but that are far from being so in 1971.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) talked about a program this evening. I would not wish people to feel that I am criticizing all that has been proposed. I would like to analyse the program objectively and also to see that consideration is given to the fact that it might be possible to improve upon it by amending the regulations respecting the loans and interest rates.

The plan which was announced tonight by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration provides that $35 million be earmarked for trainees who have registered in the manpower training program. I would like, in this respect, to suggest to the government that they change the qualifying conditions for admission to the retraining courses.

I was discussing just today, three cases of people who had been to a manpower center to register for retraining courses and, by reason of existing regulations, they could not be admitted, one because he had not been for at least three years on the labour market, the other because he was 55 years old and it was impossible for him to be retrained in order to earn a decent living, and the third because he did not fulfill the conditions required in the present regulations.

I would suggest that these conditions be amended at least in regard to young people. It is not their fault that they are 18 or 20 years old, that they have just graduated and have not been for at least three years on the labour market as required by regulations. They are unable to pursue their studies and receive such benefits as provided by law. Therefore, I would suggest that these conditions be amended in order not to discourage these young people, but to allow them to follow up their education. If later on they are offered an opportunity to contribute by their knowledge and work to the development of our country, we will not have completely wasted our money.

I should like to comment on another aspect of the program, namely, public works. I recall having often suggested here, in this House, a policy intended to encourage public works, federal, provincial and municipal, to offer the workers job opportunities. I also suggested that those public works be put at the disposal of the public. We would then kill two birds with one stone. Through public works, we would increase the purchasing power of the consumer and simultaneously build useful works from which the country could benefit.

I am pleased with the program as announced, but once again, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with its mode of financing because I have had experience as an administrator in a municipality when the winter works program was in operation. The same problem occurred again and again: Where to find the money to undertake those works? Some advantages were offered by the government to pay for labour, but the fact remains that there are always some materials to buy, some machinery to pay and the programs did no more than that introduced this evening, include any provision to that effect.

In the special development loans program, one can read the following:

> Provinces and municipalities will receive in assistance of $3 for every $4 they spend on labour hired locally for projects approved up to the end of May 1972.

Mr. Speaker, I do not like the expression "from now until the end of May 1972", because although the idea is to promote winter work, I would wish that encouragement be given to summer work as well, for it is less costly for municipalities to have water systems, sewers and so on built in summer than in winter, and people eat as much in summer as they do in winter.

Everybody knows that the labour cost portion of public works is consistently decreasing. The member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (M. Béchard) shakes his head in dissent. I would suggest to him that he ask people who are seriously engaged in construction, and he will be able to see, from the figures he is given, that labour is the smallest item of expenditures related to the construction of municipal services.

This is the reason why I submit that, in the case, at least, of work done by machines, government compensation should also be granted in respect of such necessary equipment. Then comes a statement of the terms under which such loans will be made—I quote:

> The incentive will consist in forgiving loans to the amount of 75 per cent of on-site labour costs incurred up to May 31, 1972.

It seems great, at first glance, for up to 75 per cent of a loan to be forgiven. But here lies the problem: under present rates of interest, few municipalities can afford to get into considerable debt in order to engage in public works. This is, at present, the great problem which every municipality is faced with, and I know what I am talking about. In order to get the 75 per cent they will have to undertake a work program and there will be the difficulty: finding money. The municipalities will go into debt. If they really want to do something, they will have to contract colossal debts. That is the reason why I have come to following conclusions: according to the figures mentioned this evening by the Minister of Finance the situation will be worse once that work program is achieved within four or five years than it is today because municipalities will have to pay back the capital and high interests, as I said at the beginning of my remarks.

Canadian mayors—they are not a candid lot—have already thought about discussing that problem. In April 1971 they submitted a brief to the federal government. Not in the days of Noah, Mr. Speaker, but in 1971. They made an interesting submission and the other day, about a week ago, I urged the Minister of Finance to read it again in order to pick up some ideas and be in a position to announce a more generous policy than the one put forward tonight concerning financing municipalities. I can only assume that he did not take it so much into consideration.

Recently, the Executive Committee of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities brought forward the following press release.

> The Executive Committee of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and municipalities met in Montreal on September 30 and October 1 last in order to discuss, among other things, the major problem of unemployment in Canada, particularly for the coming months. The Executive Committee then perused, and decided to support a request from the City of Toronto asking the federal and provincial governments to contribute financial assistance in the form of grants and loans to municipalities that are anxious to accelerate implementation of projects and initiate new ones in order to reduce the number of people unemployed.
> The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities also urged its members to prepare such programmes for immediate action and, through their provincial association, to call on their provincial government to get financial assistance.

I did not invent this. The mayors and municipalities are requesting financial assistance because they don't have the means to undertake the works that would be necessary within their respective boundaries.

• (11:20 p.m.)

The hon. member for Témiscamingue made very practical suggestions in his speech. I could see that members behind the curtain were laughing. The suggestions seemed funny. However, people should not laugh too long at the Canadian population.

This week, I heard a minister ask the opposition to make suggestions. But some make fun of proposals that are advocated instead of examining them seriously to see if they are sound. Tonight, the hon. member for Témiscamingue suggested we provide security to all Canadians because Canada can do it. The evidence is that there are 800,000 unemployed who are sound and fit to work. They are getting rusty. If we put them to work, we could surely develop our country and produce more. Production would be related to the money guaranteed each Canadian. Whatever way we call it, it is social security for the various categories of Canadians.

Another member has spoken like that. The hon. member for Témiscamingue was rather hard on economists tonight. I hope it will give them food for thought. This is not done out of malice for them but to make them look squarely at problems. As for me, I would quote another economist. He opened his eyes and made a suggestion similar to that of the hon. member for Témiscamingue tonight. In fact, Mr. Theobald said the following:

He has again expressed his conviction that it is impossible to obtain full employment.

I share his view. I go on quoting him:

—However, he added, even if that objective were achieved, there would still be some workers who should be assured of an income. It would be those who are too old or too sick to get a job, whose responsibilities demand that they be spared the obligation of working, for instance, the woman who is alone and who has dependent children. Such would also be the case of students.

Some sneer when there is talk of paying students. That is comical! Yet, it has become necessary. He went on to say:

In order to make possible this guaranteed income . . . in order to establish an official policy to create job opportunities and guarantee an income to all those who are looking for work. He suggested that the initial level of the guaranteed income be set at $1,000 for each adult and $600 for each child.

About a guaranteed income for students, Mr. Theobald stated: "One must admit that it is just as fair to say of a student 'that he is working' as it is to say it of a worker in a factory. The time has come for us to accept the concept of a salary for the student, from age 14 perhaps, with proportionate increases as he gets older. Such a salary would be paid to any student attending a school or a university."

For our part, we advocate the payment of a salary to those who are 18 years of age. So, he goes further than we do.

Mr. Speaker, common sense incites us to reflect on this:

Automation requires that we change the fundamental notion according to which there cannot be any salary without some corresponding work.

In the old days, that was that. If you wanted a dollar, you had to go and earn it through your work. But in 1971, there is so much genius and intelligence around us, we have invented so many machines of all kinds that it is fascinating to watch them operate in our factories. And our unemployed must be satisfied with watching rolling mills shape steel into smooth sheets and powerful mechanical presses stamp parts through electronical systems, while in the old days, workers necessarily had to—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He can carry on with his remarks only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to participate in this debate but I do so now for several reasons. First, I want to make it abundantly clear that as a member of the government and as Minister of Labour I share whatever responsibility the opposition is trying to place on the shoulders of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). The Minister of Finance, I believe, has been subject to an awful lot of unnecessary and unwarranted abuse by members of the opposition in recent weeks.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Mackasey: I welcome back the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock). I have not seen him for about a year and a half. I suppose he has been quite ill.

The second reason I rise to take part in this debate is this: I think it is about time we put to rest the old chestnut which the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) was airing, namely, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country, because he happened to be born to riches rather than to poverty, is insensitive to the burdens and difficulties encountered by working people. This is a very false rap to place on this man, because the whole history of the present Prime Minister, when he had the money and the resources to be independent, callous and insensitive to the needs of the people of this country was just the contrary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (11:30 p.m.)

Mr. Mackasey: The present Prime Minister, in his youth, took the time, when the provincial police in the province of Quebec were no more than the private army of Mr. Duplessis, to march with workers who were on strike in that province. He provided, along with other civil libertarians, including Frank Scott, the type of legal advice that enabled the Witnesses of Jehovah in my province to take their court case to the Supreme Court of Canada and win it. That is hardly the action of a man who is insensitive, callous and unfeeling, as the opposition have tried to portray him to the Canadian people in recent weeks.

There is no use by going on at length because the real interest that the opposition has in the problem of unemployment is perhaps exemplified by the fact that there are less than six of them in the House at this time. Proportionately, they are least in attendance in this House. There are present three members of the Official Opposition. Where is the concern that they have for the poor unemployed people of this country? Why do they not demonstrate their concern by their participation in the debate tonight? Earlier in the debate the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) referred rather sarcastically to the fact that I was known as the man who cared about the man with the lunch pail. I have never been ashamed of caring for such men and I am not today. In the final analysis, the most precious ingredient this country has, its greatest resource, is not machinery, not government, but people.

No one in this House is pleased by the fact that we have an unemployment rate of 7.1 per cent today. No member of this side takes any satisfaction from such a high rate. To try and attribute such an attitude to the Prime Minister of this country, I suspect will not fool many people at the present time.

What has this government done since 1968?

Mr. Yewchuk: Nothing.

Mr. Mackasey: Since the hon. member came to this House a short time ago, he has constantly shown by his remarks exactly that degree of ignorance with which we on this side of the House stamp him. We will all be waiting for him to make a speech without assistance from any notes prepared for him by his research department. Any piece of legislation that I have introduced and had passed by this House affecting that category of person to whom the hon. member for Yukon sarcastically referred as the man with the lunch pail has had the full support of this government. My colleagues have accepted the philosophy of the legislation in question.

Earlier this evening I listened to the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) read a speech, and I suppose he is in the right party because I have yet to hear as reactionary a speech from any member of this House in recent months. On the one hand, he was deploring the fact that 7.1 per cent of the labour force was out of work. On the other hand, he was upset because we have provided enlightened legislation, such as the new Unemployment Insurance Act and the new Labour (Standards) Act; and he made a sly remark about the proposed labour bill which provides ways and means of alleviating the insecurity of people who are fearful of being out of work. I suggest he cannot have it both ways.

There is no substitute for jobs, Mr. Speaker. When members of this House and other people outside the House who should know better, such as leading industrialists and others, deplore the fact that people are on welfare and suggest we must cut back on welfare—as the hon. member suggested earlier—then it is time we put an end to the notion that every person in this country who is drawing welfare is slovenly and lazy or would prefer to draw unemployment insurance rather than work. That is not the fact.

The other day the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), in two good speeches, pointed out that less than 15 per cent of the people drawing welfare in this country are capable of working even if jobs existed. I suggest it is high time we stopped apologizing for the expansion of CAP, for our new unemployment insurance program, and for many other social measures that this government has introduced to the House and had passed since 1968.

I still adhere to the philosophy that people are more important than machines, and I do not apologize to the opposition or to the hon. member for Dauphin for my proposed measure dealing with technological change, which simply means that an employer or an industrialist who intends to introduce technological change to improve his profits should, at the first opportunity, sit down and discuss the effect of this change with the people who will be affected by it. This is just plain decency. It is also time people understood that we no longer have a silent group of workers but well educated people who want jobs. If jobs are not provided by private industry, these people will rise up and make it quite clear that they prefer some other form of government. I am not talking about a switch to government by the party of the Official Opposition; I am talking about a switch to socialism. Heaven knows, our record right now is nothing to write home about with unemployment at the high rate it is. I admit that because I am honest. But God help us if a socialist party were in power at the present time. This is a fact of life that private enterprise had better understand.

Let me look at the economic situation for a moment. Cash savings in this country are at an all time high. There are more people working than ever before in Canadian history; roughly 94 people out of 100 are earning higher wages than ever before in Canadian history. Add to this the fact that inventories are probably at a record low, that there is ample money in the system, that interest rates have dropped, that there are all kinds of incentives built into the economy to enable private enterprise to encourage expansion. Accelerated depreciation is one of the many incentives contained in the last budget. The recent textiles bill that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) introduced encourages the textile industry to rationalize instead of hiding behind high tariff walls, and to become competitive with other countries that flood this country with textiles. This, Mr. Speaker, is progressive Liberal legislation.

Having said that finally everything is in place, that savings are high, inventories are low, money is in ample abundance at the chartered banks and that interest rates have fallen, why the reluctance on the part of private industry to meet its responsibilities and begin to expand? I suggest there has been a series of events beyond the control of the Minister of Finance. This is why I said at the outset that the Minister of Finance is being made the goat of events that are beyond his control.

Let me give the House a very good example. Last year in the province of Quebec an end was brought to uncertainty in the province by the election of a majority government—never mind which party happened to get that majority. What has happened since then? As the economy was about to take off, last October we had the FLQ crisis.

Mr. Horner: Three budgets in a year.

Mr. Mackasey: And there should be as many as six. This kind of flexibility is not outmoded thinking; it is progressive thinking, something the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) knows nothing about. It illustrates the ability of the Minister of Finance to adjust to changing economic conditions. He brings in a series of budgets instead of following the old, stereotyped method of presenting one a year. This is something for which hon. members opposite should applaud the minister, not condemn him. Right after the crisis last fall, and again in March, the minister took ways and means of stimulating—

• (11:40 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member has just arrived from his siesta. He is a fitting example of someone who should not worry about unemployment, considering what a big wheel he is in Alberta and what a wonderful lawyer. If he has something to contribute, let him contribute it, otherwise he should remain silent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: After the FLQ crisis, when the minister felt it was time to stimulate the economy he introduced money into the economy as he did again in March. Again he tried to accelerate the economy in June. As a result of those measures in March and in June the economy improved, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) has pointed out, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) pointed out and as I have repeated tonight. Then came events beyond the control of the Minister of Finance.

It is all right for the opposition to say that the high rate of unemployment is not the result of the surcharge, but the effects of the surcharge have been devastating in a psychological sense, as has the possibility of DISC or certain tax measures designed to bring industry back to the U.S. These are the types of unexpected roadblocks that the Minister of Finance has run into. No one can blame him for the events that have taken place in the U.S.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: As someone asked in the House, what is an acceptable rate of unemployment? To me there is no acceptable rate. The unemployed man has no consolation if the rate of unemployment is 3 per cent but he is out of work. There is no acceptable rate of unemployment. However, there is a practical appreciation of what a country of this size can achieve with a population of 22 million people, running as we do geographically.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, running as we do.

Mr. Mackasey: The point I am trying to make is that even in the days of the Tories the average rate of unemployment between 1958 and 1962 was over 6 per cent. No one questioned that—it was understood. From 1962 to 1970 the average rate of unemployment hovered around 4.8 per cent. That is too high, but that is what the recent history of this country has been and will be more often than not as long as we are under-populated and as long as we have the geographical and periodical climatic conditions which this country has to face.

Tonight I listened to hon. members opposite talking about inflation. They said that all this is the result of inflation. The fact remains that when we decided to do something about inflation we did not have to fire the head of the Bank of Canada, as did the Tories with Mr. Coyne, if they want me to review that for them. The only instrument at the disposal of this government up to this time was fiscal and monetary policy, which is traditional and classic, supplemented by price and wage guidelines, not control. Whether we like it or not, that exercise was successful.

So that with the 6 per cent rate of unemployment which we had prior to the present rate, our rate of inflation was about half of that which the Americans had with an equivalent rate of unemployment. You cannot get away from these statistics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I happen to be one—I am not speaking for the government but for myself—who feels that never again can we tackle the problem of inflation with the blunt instruments of fiscal and monetary policies.

Mr. Woolliams: Tell the Prime Minister that.

Mr. Mackasey: I have said it before, and I have said it in this House.

Mr. Woolliams: Why don't you resign from the cabinet, if you disagree with the Prime Minister?

Mr. Mackasey: If we are going to control inflation and have low rates of unemployment, then we will have to tackle inflation in another way one of these days.

Mr. Woolliams: What is your method?

Mr. Mackasey: It may very well have to be selective controls which were advocated by the former leader of the NDP on December 12, controls which were recommended by the Premier of Saskatchewan in an hysterical outburst over the CBC a couple of weeks ago to which I happened to listen.

The challenge to private industry and to private enterprise is to provide the jobs which more and more people feel, quite properly, is their right in what can be termed potentially one of the richest countries in the world. That is the challenge before the private enterprise system, whether we are in power or the party opposite is in power. How well we meet this challenge may depend on whether the people will turn in desperation to something as outmoded and old-fashioned as socialism.

Mr. Woolliams: Your party took over the last NDP member.

Mr. Mackasey: If you think I am exaggerating you have only to look at the experience in England under Harold Wilson, who had ample opportunity to do what he wanted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: I cannot hear above the babble. I suppose something I am saying is agitating the oil baron from Calgary.

Mr. Woolliams: He flatters me.

Mr. Mackasey: He has developed into one of the senior statesmen around here. Nothing he says excites anyone any more. He has mellowed. Look at him sitting complacently in his seat, worrying about unemployment, since ten minutes to twelve. He has not been here since eight o'clock when we started discussing this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: There is one good thing about the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). I have not always agreed with him but I have found him to be fair. I left here at exactly 10.30 p.m. and I met Hayden Smith from Calgary. I had an interview with him and then I came right back. I am sure the minister will admit that I was here during the speeches of the other ministers. I know he would want to be fair in that regard. I realize that he is quite a player. I will not say what he plays at, but he plays at politics. I know he would want to be fair.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) has only one minute left.

Mr. Mackasey: I would apologize to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Mackasey: First I wish to correct the record, if I am wrong. If the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) was here from eight to 10.30, I did not notice him because he did not say anything, either standing or sitting, in those 2½ hours.

To sum up, I have listened to the opposition, including the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), with my usual attentiveness. I do not believe that leaders of political parties should be heckled unduly. I think they should have a chance to make their point. They are usually non-partisan and serious in their approach. I think we can best summarize the contribution of the hon. gentleman by saying that his only criticism was that what we have done is right but that we did it too late, which is a matter of judgment. I trust the judgment of the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Athabasca wishes to ask a question, but I should point out that the minister's time has expired, so the question could be asked and the answer given only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (11:50 p.m.)

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) put the blame for unemployment and inflation on many things. Would he consider putting the blame where it really lies, and that is on the shoulders of this incompetent government?

Mr. Mackasey: The answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member's asinine intervention only justifies my description of him earlier at the beginning of my speech.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of hearing the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) on former occasions. He has the reputation of being quite an adept debater. I think he has given some indication of that ability this evening, but I would just like to check him, notwithstanding the fact that he may think we are unwarranted in the abuse we heap on the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). We shall continue to do so so long as his fiscal and monetary policies mean that the vast majority of the Canadian people will have to suffer and be deprived of the bare necessities of life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: Vast majority?

Mr. Alexander: You know the criticism does not stem just from this party. The criticism certainly comes from business leaders and from economists. The criticism comes from the persons who are out of work, and from those who fear that they may be out of work. The criticism comes from the mother who is looking for food for her child. So, in all fairness, I think the Minister of Labour should have gone beyond the members of this House. He should have gone into the streets where, if he is not aware of it now—

Mr. Gundlock: He will be there soon.

Mr. Alexander: —he would learn that people are certainly concerned.

To say that these times are trying and disturbing, and that we are in a time of crisis, is certainly an understatement. I am distraught, I am dismayed and disgusted, not because of the programs the government has brought in this evening, since it had no other alternative, but I am dismayed, distraught and disgusted with the complete snow job that has been perpetrated on the Canadian people in the past five or six months as a result of statements that came from the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I should like to say, as we reflect on some of those statements, that I can only properly conclude this government is a sham, a farce and a fraud.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: The statements of the Prime Minister alone would lead one to believe he was trying to bring in confidence when there was no reason to have confidence. Mr. Speaker, this is a classic example. One day in January during the question period the Minister of Finance said:

> I would feel very unhappy with my position as Minister of Finance if there was not an upturn in the economy in 1971 and if unemployment did not trend downward on a seasonally adjusted basis.

This is the sort of theme that has been running through the speeches of the Minister of Finance month after month. I think it is shameful the way he has approached this particular problem. It does not matter how you cut the cake. It does not matter what type of rhetoric comes from the other side, or what statistics come out, the only statistic that means something is the one which appears in every paper in the nation in big half inch print, if not more: "7.1 per cent of the work force is out of work."

Mr. Mahoney: Tell us what you would do.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) will not interject this time. You know what I think of your speeches. I called your intervention asinine. I do not know whether the Minister of Labour—this is through you, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we are not helping this debate, or ourselves or the House, by interruptions. I think that hon. members who have the floor should be given an opportunity to make their speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, the newspaper headlines are important. This is what the people of Canada have been reading this evening, and hearing over television. The Ottawa Journal of October 14, the day of disaster, has a headline "Jobless Trend Most alarming in Ten Years." The Toronto Star reads "Unemployment Rate is Highest in Ten years." The Ottawa Citizen has "Jobless Highest in Decade." Those are the things with which I am concerned.

I listened to the Minister of Labour indicate his compassion and humanity, and I cannot quarrel with that. However, when he tried to explain away the feeling towards the Prime Minister, I felt it was pretty hard for anyone to have any confidence in a man who would, without any hesitation or reservation, say he was prepared to see this country have a 6 per cent level of unemployment as a result of the fight against inflation. I say this with the greatest amount of respect. If he was going to say anything, he should not have said that because it is hard to reconcile his compassion for humanity with the statement "I am prepared to see this country reach 6 per cent unemployment in my fight against inflation." How can you say that a person like that has compassion, has feeling? Why didn't he say, "What my government will attempt to do is reach full employment, whatever that may be"? That would have been a more acceptable statement.

Even though the Prime Minister was prepared to let unemployment rise to 6 per cent, we now have a seasonally adjusted unemployment rate of 7.1 per cent. After continuous prodding by the opposition which gave you some indication of the direction in which you should go in terms of programs, you sat on your haunches—the Minister of Finance in particular. I not only call you breakers of the law but you are also thieves, and I say that with a great deal of respect.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should not be carried away like this. I suggest to him that he should not forget that all speeches in the House require that they be addressed to the Chair. I suggest that this is fundamental and hon. members should never forget it. I invite the hon. member to make his speech to the Chair. If he wants to call me names, well, I will be glad to listen to him.

Mr. Alexander: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for putting me on the right track. Through you, Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that after listening to the announcement of the type of programs that have been brought in—

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), but I believe the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I am too sensitive, and I know the hon. member was carried away, but really I do not think it is parliamentary for the hon. member to refer, even to a collective body, as a group of thieves. I hope you might ask him to withdraw and correct that statement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, my remark has been made. I do not intend to withdraw it unless directed to do so by the Chair. And I will tell you why I used that phrase. When the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was calling for tax cuts, was calling for corporate tax cuts, was calling for personal income tax cuts, the government said, "It cannot work; we cannot do that sort of thing."

Mr. Cafik: How does that make us thieves?

Mr. Alexander: Because we have been telling you month after month that you have to cut taxes, you have to bring about confidence in the economy. And now, all of a sudden, when the panic button is hit, here we have tax cuts.

• (midnight)

Mr. Speaker, I listened with some amusement to the great dissertation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in which he said he envisaged the problems in his June budget. What a ridiculous statement that was. I heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and others complain that we on the backbenches read our speeches. I am not reading anything now because I am deft enough to know what the problems are, but I would suggest that the minister's speech-writer should be fired forthwith. Any time he makes a speech it contains statements like, "I am now aware of a growing feeling about the problems of the economy".

An hon. Member: Why not fire the minister, never mind the speech-writer?

Mr. Alexander: I have heard it said that he should resign.

Mr. Woolliams: Big Ben does it again.

Mr. Alexander: The group around him have been giving him bad advice. Our human resource, Mr. Speaker, is the greatest asset we have, the greatest asset any country can have particularly in respect of democracy and freedom. We can only maintain this asset with a climate wherein the people can obtain some help, wherein they in turn can be taxed in order that we can afford to pay for some of the programs the government is bringing in.

The Minister of Labour has indicated that the vast majority of people on welfare do not want to be, and I readily admit that. But if this government continues its ad hoc approach and complacent attitude we cannot help having more people on welfare. The cities are growing. I understand that the welfare budget of the city of Ottawa is $18 million, much more than was expected. I have not heard anything about the Canada Assistance Program. I hope that it will alleviate the problem. It seems to me that if the city of Toronto is in a predicament and cities all across the country are in the same position, we will have a very bleak Christmas.

I hope members on the other side of the House will not criticize me for reading about 18 lines. The Minister of Labour was careful to point out that there were only three opposition members in the House when he was speaking. I had hoped he would put on record the fact that the member for Hamilton West was at his desk doing his duty.

I am bothered about the loss of production, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to read the following: It has been estimated that for every 1 per cent of unemployment increase in the range 4 per cent to 7 per cent, a country such as Canada loses some 3 per cent of gross national product. Taking a level of full employment, for example, of 3 per cent would mean that we are losing each year, at present levels of unemployment, some 6.9 per cent of gross national product. This may not sound a lot, but if I tell you that this represents some $5 billion worth of goods lost each year to the Canadian public—that is almost $250 lost to each Canadian man, woman and child—by the obstinacy, stupidity and arrogance of the Canadian government, you will see that there is an urgent need to change the policies and the men who lead this country. I say that with a great deal of sincerity.

Mr. Mahoney: We know what the people of Ontario are thinking.

Mr. Alexander: Is that the same overpriced Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney)? He is the axeman, Mr. Speaker, the one who goes around the country telling the Canadian people how well the economy is doing. If the economy is doing so well, why do we have to find this $1 billion tonight?

Mr. Benson: Because the economy is good.

Mr. Alexander: I cannot understand how it can be said the economy is booming when we have to find $1 billion. Mr. Speaker, I see my time has just about run out—

Mr. Perrault: It sure has.

Mr. Alexander: That was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Perrault), a man whom I respect. There is only one thing wrong—he has a big mouth. He should get up and make some suggestions, instead of continually sitting there nattering and making nonsensical interjections.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, for the life of me I cannot understand why it took this government so long to realize that the country was approaching a crisis before it had the gumption or even the brains to bring in these programs. Unfortunately, the type of program they brought in with respect to moneys going to the provincial governments and the municipalities takes time. I think they made a bad mistake in waiting until now before bringing in this program which we all hope will relieve some of the suffering and deprivation with which so many Canadians have been confronted for too long.

Mr. Steven Otto (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. L'Heureux) who made a speech tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Otto: When I made my maiden speech it was in 1962 and I sat in the opposition benches.

An hon. Member: It seems like yesterday.

Mr. Otto: I know that some of the frontbenchers on this side are still wondering which side of the House I am on. From time to time they must think I am still in the opposition benches, but believe me it is not my fault.

An hon. Member: You will have a different speech tonight.

Mr. Otto: In this Parliament especially, I think a good opposition member is required because—I hate to say this—

Mr. Woolliams: Go ahead. I can take it.

Mr. Otto: —of the lackadaisical manner of the opposition.

It was two weeks ago tonight that I spoke on the U.S. surcharge and the DISC program, and I recall that I had some tough words to say about the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

An hon. Member: He is leaving now.

Mr. Otto: I think that is only fair and I do not think anyone in the House can accuse me of not telling it as it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: But you always vote with them. You never put your vote where your mouth is.

Mr. Otto: In order to tell it as it is, I will say that the minister made a good speech tonight and the policy is a good one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Woolliams: That $4,000 really changed your thinking.

An hon. Member: It really fixed you up, Steven.

Mr. Bell: You are getting more like the member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) all the time.

Mr. Otto: I hear comments from the other side, but I can assure them that the position I am supposed to be elevated to is not going to change my feeling about the government. I believe that if the government is right—and it is in this case, as I am going to explain—then it should be given full credit. At the same time, I was very disappointed.

I heard every speech of the opposition. I was disappointed to hear the opposition rehashing old potatoes or rehashing yesterday's speeches, as you might say. They told us what they said one month ago or two months ago, and they could have criticized constructively. That is what they should have done, but what did we hear? In speech after speech we were told that 7.1 per cent of our people are unemployed, that unemployment could rise and that unemployment should be much less. Yet, with regard to those issues that were mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), there was no constructive criticism.

• (12:10 a.m.)

Mr. Horner: Cannot the hon. member do better than that.

Mr. Otto: For the sake of hon. members opposite and for this side as well, may I relate briefly the position in which we find ourselves. We need not go far beyond the surcharge; we do not have to go into those things that are now obvious, matters such as the depreciation credit program of tne American government. We need to consider the DISC program, which will be in effect, and the morale of Canadian business and Canadian workmen who will be affected.

However, in case hon. members accuse the government of not acting promptly enough in this crisis, may I remind the House that this morning the figures showing 7.1 per cent of our people as unemployed were released, and this evening the Minister of Finance presented what is probably the most dramatic budget in the peacetime history of Canada. The government brought forward a deficit budget; it is to spend over $1 billion. Do you know what that means? As I was counting the figures, hundred million by hundred million, I thought to myself, "My god, where are we going?" The budget means that the government has said, "We have confidence in Canada; we will go into deficit financing because we know we will survive independently. Not only will we survive; we will make good." That is an expression of confidence that does this government credit, and it deserves credit for it.

Mr. Woolliams: It is amazing what an appointment will do to a man.

An hon. Member: He has been to the pork barrel.

Mr. Otto: I expected the opposition to speak about many things sensibly and critically. For example, there are municipal projects. I know that the government's program will take care of some; nevertheless, I hoped the opposition would point out to the government that these municipal projects ought to be labour intensive. Much of the equipment and machinery that we use is American made, that is, made outside the country. We must be selective in this regard. I hope the government will be selective in the way it makes funds available for municipal projects. The same thing applies to provinces. We must make sure that much of this $160 million is not used by provinces for political purposes, such as building roads from nowhere to nowhere. The money should be used for the more efficient production of goods rather than for the creation of more efficient labour, so that when we come to the second phase of the program that was introduced tonight, the industries of this nation will be strong and efficient.

Mr. Skoberg: What second phase?

Mr. Otto: We need to spend intelligently, without leaning on our good neighbour to the south. If the money is not spent that way, we ought to make sure that it is spent on well designed projects. It should be spent efficiently and not necessarily on make-work projects.

Hon. members opposite wonder what will be the effect of this $1 billion that is to be injected into the economy. I should like to try to answer the question. I have been in business for many years and have some idea of the effect that $1 billion will have. As I say, over $1 billion is to be spent. Most manufacturers and most people know that money will be available. In the past, manufacturers have limited their inventory and laid off people. Hon. members have heard about that. Manufacturers did so because they were not sure they could sell their goods. Now that they know that $1 billion is to be available in consumers' hands, because that is where the $1 billion will go largely, manufacturers will rehire people and build more inventory so that they can meet the anticipated demand. That will be the immediate reaction of business to a budget such as this.

An hon. Member: Tell Nixon that.

Mr. Otto: I will be speaking about Mr. Nixon a little later.

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Otto: Many worth-while and necessary municipal projects have been shelved. There is now almost $72 million available immediately for those projects. The assumption that municipalities will need to wait between six months and one year before using this money is not correct. It may be good that some projects arising from this program will be slightly delayed, because we will have a regular succession of projects, a regular succession of employment, a regular succession of goods on the market and people with purchasing power. That will avoid first, an upward cycle, and, then, a downward cycle in business.

I am speaking of facts which apply no matter when proposals like these are made, especially proposals as dramatic as these. These are very, very dramatic and, of course, we can expect an enormous reaction to them which will bring psychological benefits to industry and to our people.

Mr. Woolliams: There will be other budgets after this one.

Mr. Otto: May I now say something about corporation taxes vis-à-vis personal exemptions or personal income taxes? I think that $125 million less in taxes represents a relatively small amount. The NDP suggests that this matter ought to be handled on a different basis. I think that all segments of our people ought to be given incentives. After all, they are all consumers and many are producers. Sooner or later we shall have to adopt the American view that there is only one employer, the entrepreneur, businessman or corporation, if you like. I agree that some of the criticisms regarding the tax bill are valid. We should be careful in the forthcoming tax reform bill to make sure that active Canadian producers as opposed to passive investors are the ones who will really benefit in Canada. There is a division between these two classes of people and we must pay attention to this matter in order to increase productivity in this nation during the next year and a half or two years.

In conclusion, and I do not want to take too long, may I say this.

Mr. Horner: Say something, at least.

Mr. Otto: I fully endorse these proposals. I think the minister and the government ought to be complimented, because I think these measures will do much to take care of us during the next year and a half or two years. The government has not produced an over-all program. We still have to look at the long-term aspect, especially when it is realized that the United States is determined to be isolationist in economic matters. We will need to stand independently on our own feet and we need programs which will be long lasting and involve labour, banking, incentives, exports, insurance and the CBC. All these things must be involved.

Mr. Skoberg: When?

Mr. Otto: I think, and this is my own view because I have nothing with which to back it, that this is the first phase of the government's program. I hope that the next part of this long-range program will be introduced within the next month or so. I think that then Canadians will know we intend to make our own way in this world. The very fact that this government is betting $1 billion means in all certainty that we will be able to do this on our own.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have been here all evening listening to speeches from both sides of the House. I have heard a great many reasons for this program and a great many explanations about it.

• (12:20 a.m.)

I listened to the engaging Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). When everything is going so beautifully in the country, when the government has made such a beautiful job of doing things and apparently we have more employment than ever before, it is a mystery why we should have this program. The minister did not clear up the mystery. He did a wonderful job of trying to throw us off the track of thinking clearly. Although he was very engaging, for him, unfortunately, he failed to bamboozle some of us at least.

I will give my explanation for the go ernment bringing in this program at this time. I think it has been forced out of the government by sheer necessity. It has been forced out of a government which has never shown any real concern for the unemployed. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is willing to live with 6 per cent unemployment: he said this. I do not care how many apologies are made for what he did or did not say 20 years ago; I let the facts speak for themselves. The actions of this government speak louder than their words.

I believe this program has been hastily put together. It has been put together by a government which has never shown any real concern for unemployed people. Now that the members of the government face the danger of becoming unemployed in the near future they are beginning to realize for the first time what unemployment might feel like. Consequently, the government has thrown together everything it can from its various departments and will be spending this enormous sum of money as a result.

Unemployment in Canada did not happen yesterday. It did not happen when the surcharge came into effect. For years we have had a steadily growing unemployment problem, increasingly so in recent months. The opposition has been recommending to the government the sort of things it should be doing. We have recommended that it should not be putting all its eggs in the corporation basket. When dealing with problems, this government has the habit of giving the most to big businesses to carry on. We told them that was not the thing to do.

As far back as a year ago last summer we pointed out to the government that business concerns were unable to cope with unemployment. We stated that funds should be given to the municipalities, which were in a very bad way indeed, to enable them to continue their work. The municipalities did not have the wherewithal to carry on this work. The government turned a deaf ear; it paid no attention. Suddenly, out of a hat it picked this enormous spending program. The government is bleeding all over the green carpet tonight for the unemployed.

The government has not paid one iota of attention to the problem of unemployment until now. It is only doing so now because it is losing sector after sector of the Canadian people, having shown such disregard for common, everyday men and women and their families. This government does not care about people. As long as the gross national product is increasing, and as long as some people are getting jobs, the government does not give a hoot about those on the scrap pile, the unemployed. They do not demonstrate this by their words, but by their actions.

Talking about the increase in gross national product is no consolation for those people who cannot share in it or cannot share in making it possible. Talking about the growth of employment is small comfort to those who have looked in vain for jobs for months and even years. This insensitivity to people, this throwing around of professional jargon and concern only for industry rather than people is the reason this government is losing the confidence of section after section of the Canadian people. This program will not win back the confidence of the people. That does not mean the program is a dead loss. It is better than nothing; we know that. Many people who have studied the matter have predicted that three-quarters of a million people will be unemployed next January or February. A maximum of 50,000 jobs is not going to loom very large in the picture.

People may be impressed when the huge figures are publicized tomorrow. Many people were impressed when the Benson budget came out in June, but by the fall they had a chance to see what it was doing and what it meant to the ordinary person. The Benson budget had all kinds of incentives for industry. It let the corporate people off paying their fair share of taxes. The ordinary people will have to pay more than their share of the taxes.

This program will cost a great deal of money. Who will pay for it? Once again the corporations are being let off. The ordinary people will have to pay for it, the same as they are paying for other things at the present time. The financing of this program will merely compound the evils in the tax bill which is before us. It will take years to pay for the program. The people who can least afford it will be paying and paying because of this government's foolish notion that the way to look after the ordinary people is to pay great amounts of money to large corporate businesses and hope the result will trickle down to the ordinary people. It will not. It never has.

One of the most startling figures in the whole unemployment picture published today is the number of people seeking jobs in the month of September compared with Septembers going back to 1956. These are people who have been looking for work for seven months or more. In September 1956, 8.6 per cent of the unemployed had been looking for work for seven months or more. There are variations throughout the years—7 per cent, 18.1 per cent, 13 per cent, and so on. In 1961 it reached 20.3 per cent and decreased thereafter. In September, 1971 22.6 per cent of those unemployed had been looking for work for seven months or more. That is startling.

I want to deal with my own province of British Columbia for a few minutes. The hard fact is that unemployment has been for years eating into the vitals of that province and its people. This is because of the one-sided development that has made us essentially a raw materials province, hewers of wood and drawers of water for the American economy to a large extent, as well as for parts of the Canadian economy. This is because Liberal governments have refused to put safeguards into legislation to provide for Canadian ownership, namely, 51 per cent control of our natural resources. As a result, British Columbians have had to ship out minerals and raw materials of all kinds as well as the jobs, enterprises and growth which go with them. With what result?

I checked today, and found that every pulp mill except those of Crown Zellerback and MacMillan Bloedel, the two giants, has been shut down for at least one month this year. Rayonier has been shut down four times this year. Columbia Cellulose is closing its two mills at Castlegar and Prince Rupert for three weeks. In the metal mines, four have closed down, two silver and two copper, and at least three more are to close in the next six months. Why? Because there is no market at the present time. Talk about consumers! There are not any consumers available and this program will not be able to make them. What happens as a result? These people must crowd into towns, live on unemployment insurance and then get on social assistance.

I want to give something of the facts in Vancouver, the social assistance facts as they are today. I checked them today with the city social administration in Vancouver. The total number of social assistance cases in Vancouver today is 18,108. Remember, these are cases, not families. It means there are about 45,000 individuals in Vancouver receiving relief today at a total welfare cost of $2.1 million a month in direct assistance which does not include administrative costs. The number of employable single men and women is 6,528, at a monthly cost to all three levels of government of $533,000.

The Vancouver figures for social assistance are about 10 per cent higher than they were last year. Those of you who know Vancouver know that we have thousands of young people hanging around, young people who have never had jobs and no hope of jobs. Fifty thousand jobs for all of Canada under this program is a flea bite when it comes to the problem of employing our young people. These are problems that should be being faced, and have not been, by this government in any way, shape or form.

This is a costly program. Who is going to pay for it? As I say, the corporations are being let off their fair share with a 7 per cent reduction in taxes. Individual taxpayers are having much smaller concessions with a 3 per cent reduction. Once again the small taxpayers will get it in the neck. In my riding are many, many elderly people who have saved their homes by dint of the utmost scrimping, by cutting down on their food, trying to give up the drugs and other things they need. These are the people who will have to pay an undue proportion of this $1 billion program which is supposed to deal with our unemployment situation. In addition, I have no confidence that this program in all its vast ramifications and moneys will not result in vast empires being set up by those who are administering it, with spacious offices and all kinds of waiting rooms and people well equipped with telephones and well barricaded from the public. I fear this will take a large portion of the new funds, and the figures we have had on the manpower situation in the last five years have not been reassuring to me that this program will do any better.

Too many people have come to me, men and women alike, pointing out that they were well trained, having taken all the courses they have been allowed to take, and still have no jobs. It was perfectly foolish for the Minister of Finance to say in his speech tonight:

> The on the job program is designed to encourage employers to prepare for future economic expansion and to ensure that trainees acquire solid skills to increase their earning capacities and to help them take advantage of new employment opportunities.

What new employment opportunities? That is what these people want to know. For years they have been going round and round like squirrels in a cage, taking all the training they can get and being told there are no jobs. They have been told by administrators in Manpower that they had better go on welfare—women have been told that—because this is better than to go on looking for non-existent jobs.

For the minister to say, in his engaging manner, that the Prime Minister is after all a man with a big heart and that it is a very nasty thing to say that a government under his auspices could have a bad program, is a pretty strange way to try to draw attention from what is actually happening. The government is trying to cure the present situation with the hair of the dog that bit it approach. The dog that bit it was the policy of making the laws of this country so lax that United States companies could come in and use our resources, control our resources with their capital, take over companies without permitting any secondary development in any province such as we should have.

Now the government comes along and says, "Sure, we shall increase our manpower supplies, increase our industrial training and that sort of thing and educate you up to PhD level." But today you can see people with PhD degrees walking around Vancouver looking for jobs. Knowing these people, it will be no wonder if they take a second look at this program. I hope the program will work, but I am telling you this: this program, Mr. Minister—

An hon. Member: "Mr. Speaker," surely.

Mrs. MacInnis: —will have to do a whole lot better than previous ones in the interests of those who are unemployed. The minister made me leery when he said the program was designed to encourage employers. I think this program should be designed to encourage the unemployed. It is precisely because the government has always wanted to put carrots in front of employers, to make them, hopefully, give jobs, that we are in the mess we are today.

If you want to help the unemployed you must give money to the municipalities and help them with the least amount of frills and administrative costs to give jobs to people and get going with the least possible delay. This is what we must have. To say that we should be prepared now to take this program that has sprung full-fledged from the head of the cabinet, welcome it with loud hosannahs and say it is wonderful when, after all, the government is trying to make up for months and years of neglect, is expecting too much. We hope the program will work. We shall try to make it work but we are from Missouri; we must be shown, because we think of what the government has been doing for years.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, when I heard today in the House of Commons that we were to have another debate on the economy I was surprised that we would leave what we were doing, although I commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) for taking precious time out for this debate.

It is ironic, in my view, that we should be interrupting the debate on the amendments to the Income Tax Act at this time. I realize that pressure from the opposition was such that it was felt it was an advisable thing to do and so we have done it. Although his speech was excellent, resulting in a commendable program which is being well accepted and is appreciated by all of Canada, it could have been made tomorrow on motions. It is unfortunate we have had to take this previous time away from the Income Tax Act.

Tax changes, or proposed tax changes are disruptive, of course. They are disruptive to the business community at any time. After several years and the expenditure of several million dollars, the government is fulfilling its commitment to the Canadian people by presenting a comprehensive, massive bill providing urgent amendments which we know will affect the lives of most Canadians. In my opinion—it is one which is shared, by the way, by many of my acquaintances in the business world—the first priority of the House of Commons is to complete the debate on Bill C-259. Expansion programs that will now go forward as a result of the statement made by the Minister of Finance, corporate structuring, promotional and sales policies, depend to a very large extent on pro forma projections and balance sheets. Anyone who has been involved in the financing of projects that provide more jobs for Canadians must realize that tax positions are an important part.

I have witnessed the delaying tactics used by members of the opposition, and I am sure I will witness many more irresponsible tactics before Bill C-259 reaches a final vote in committee of the whole. To my knowledge, there has never been a time when the people of Canada have been given such a great opportunity to provide some genuine input in the matter of tax changes as during the preparation of this bill.

Canada's economy, especially since August 15, 1971, must of course receive a great deal of attention. As explained by the Minister of Finance tonight, statistics on unemployment having been published this morning the minister rose from his seat tonight and provided a considerable number of solutions to the problems facing us. Perhaps there are more than is absolutely essential, but they are there for the good of the Canadian people and unquestionably will do the right job. We appreciate them very much.

I submit that the number one necessity in aiding Canada's economy is to indicate through Bill C-259 what the business community's share of the cost burden must be as related to the Income Tax Act. Until this decision is made, segments of Canada's economy will continue to jostle for a little better position to enable them to improve themselves taxwise. But when the bill is passed, it will be accepted as the law of the land and Canadians in all walks of life will once again prove, as they have in the past following tax legislation, that they have the confidence not only in themselves but in Canada to continue to advance the economy to the best of their ability.

Regardless of the irresponsible, panic stricken statements of the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party—and I particularly refer to their television performances earlier this day—Canadians are enterprising people. The vast majority of the general public is enterprising. They possess initiative; they are imaginative and creative. In my opinion, these are the essential ingredients of a successful economy.

In my opinion the enemies of a successful economy are, first, uncertainty—uncertainty brought about by delay in the tax bill, second, unfair and unrealistic competition through manipulation by multinational corporations and foreign governments. I also consider that one of the enemies of government is too much unrealistic or undue government interference. Lack of confidence in the economy by the purchasing public is another enemy of the economy. All of us in this House of Commons, jointly and severally, should be working to instil confidence in the Canadian people rather than endeavouring to tear it down, as demonstrated tonight by the television appearances I witnessed and some of the speeches I heard.

Lastly, but certainly not least, I would say that the uncontrollable cost increases that are unmatched by increased productivity are probably the worst enemy of the success of any forward-looking policies. In my opinion, the opposition members of this House are guilty of attempting to destroy the confidence of Canadians in themselves. The business community acknowledges the value of guidelines provided by government. Indeed, the business community insists upon them. The government knows that every Canadian is a vital part of the economy and, given a fair opportunity, will respond.

I acknowledge that the policies of government are of considerable influence on the economy. However, in a democracy governmental policies alone, without the participation of the people involved, cannot succeed. When inflation received its promised attention and proposed guidelines were submitted by the Prime Minister in relation to prices and incomes, the business community at least partly co-operated. But those who are organized and able to demand excessive increases in their revenues not only did not respond but attacked the government in a vicious manner and practically challenged the right of the Prime Minister to suggest the only solution to the inflationary spiral.

I am not relating my remarks entirely to groups we know as labour unions or the labour movement. They are a very important segment of our society. I do not know where we would be today were it not for the work of organized labour which has done its best to bring about a proper sharing of prosperity in this country. Nevertheless we have these pendulum swings, swinging one way a little too far and swinging the other way. I am not suggesting that the labour movement, or organized salaried and wage earners, such as teachers, or landlords and other service industries, are the only contributing factors to inflation, but what we must do at the present time is control costs.

In the days ahead I am convinced it will be proven that the Prime Minister was right. Failure to use a heavy hand may be the only criticism that we will hear in the days and years to come. I have to confess that although I have been in business more years than I care to remember, I do not own a slide rule. The reason for this is that I could not find one showing the multitude of variables that daily beset the businessman. I did learn, possibly the hard way, that when the cost of anything that I purchased went up it was considered inflationary. I also have bruises to prove that when the cost of production went up I either found a way to alleviate the situation or to dodge the banker and the sheriff.

Therefore, I submit that notwithstanding the volumes written by economists, some of them not yet out of school, there are but three ways to beat rising production costs. I bring up this point at this time because we are faced with very serious problems regarding the export of products around the world. At the present time we are confronted with a 10 per cent surtax imposed by the United States, plus two or three other very serious programs recently implemented. We have two things we can do: we can sit here and twiddle our thumbs or we can do something about it.

As I say, I believe there are only three ways to beat rising production costs. The first is to increase productivity to arrest unit costs. The second is to decrease production costs at some other level, although I never really found one. The third is to increase the selling price to maintain the essential percentage above the unit cost. Now, we have inflation. I can recall being aware of the fact that there was no such thing as a static position in business. The operation proceeds forward or backward. A forward movement requires additional risk capital. I hesitate to use the word here, but risk capital, if you will pardon the expression, is derived from profit. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the word "profit" is apparently a dirty word in this place. I was never able to lure investment capital from wage or salary earners. They wanted blue chip investments, and I do not blame them. However, I now find after all these years of reasonally successful operation I was wrong. I should like to quote from the Chilliwack Progress.

• (12:50 a.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pringle: It is one of the greatest weekly newspapers in the country. I am quoting from a statement which was made by Mr. Tommy Douglas. He said this:

[Mr. Pringle.]

Profit does not make jobs, despite President Nixon's stand that "controls on everything except profits will create jobs". Instead, giving big business the go-ahead to create greater profits in order to stimulate the economy would only result in more automation which would mean fewer jobs.

"Redistribution of income is the key to an improved economy", he continued.

Boy, have I been doing things wrong—profit provided all my risk capital and more jobs through expansion. The question in my mind is, whose income is he talking about? This statement could have been a Freudian slip, but at least he told his followers that if the NDP had their way they would redistribute their followers income, unless of course his followers had no income and I doubt this very much. However, I would like to qualify my statement by saying that the affair was a farewell party to Tommy Douglas and I am sure that all of us in this House wish him well in his new position in the wings. At least he had the consideration to retire to the wings.

I was interested in the remarks of the new Leader of the NDP, that master of miscalculation. I heard him say that the 3 per cent reduction in tax was not based on a graduated scale. Surely, even he must realize that all personal income tax is graduated. I would suggest to the Leader of the NDP that if his salary requires a 60 per cent tax, he will now pay 57 per cent. Those who pay 17 per cent will be paying 14 per cent, and three-quarters of a million people will pay no tax when this bill is passed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pringle: May I finish my speech first, and then I will be happy to attempt to answer the hon. member. There is a wide graduation between 14 per cent and 57 per cent. I have an idea what the hon. member will ask me, and I want to think of an answer.

Now that the Minister of Finance has provided the base for a terrific boost to the economy, is it not time that all those who contribute to costs—and I emphasize the word "costs";—did some serious soul-searching. I am not speaking only of the guy who sweeps the floor or the man who puts the money in the vault, but rather about every one of us in the country who contributes in any way to costs. The Americans have thrown down the gauntlet, not only to their trading partners such as we are but to those on the home front as well. A decision has been made in the USA that rising costs must be arrested, not only prices and incomes, but all costs.

I was delighted to learn that the American labour unions have decided to co-operate. I wonder why they did not persuade their Canadian subsidiary unions to do this when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) requested their co-operation for Canada. Therefore, it now appears that there is a really important job for the NDP, and I am happy that I may be the first one to announce this in the House of Commons. After all these years, I believe they could provide a service to the Canadian people. They could persuade organized labour, for whom apparently they are a type of recognized political arm, that Canadian unions should cool it, that they should avoid excessive demands for increases. Possibly they could go a little bit further by providing leadership and by setting an example for the rest of the people.

I have a great deal of respect for members of the labour unions. I have worked with them and many of them are my friends. I am convinced that members of the labour unions would respond if the proper leadership were available. If it becomes evident in the near future that the cost of products in Canada continues to rise, then surely we must act responsibly.

Mr. Lefebvre: Thank you very much.

Mr. Pringle: You are on my side.

Mr. Lefebvre: I am not sure about it.

Mr. Pringle: You are not sure if I am on your side. The ball is in the hands of those who contribute to all the costs of Canadian production. If the costs of our products continue to rise, we will simply not have a market, and that is another word that does not seem to find its way into the House. I am using words such as profits, markets, production, and secondary industries. There is nothing to stop anybody from starting a secondary industry tomorrow if they can find a market, but we do not discuss markets and we do not want to mention the word "profit". These are the two main pedestals on which the economy of any country must stand, because without profits and without markets you do not have lunch boxes. It is all right to talk about people, but people must eat. People require to be paid, and this money must be generated in some way.

In my opinion time is running out, not for my speech but with regard to what we are going to do in the near future. I do not know whether we can keep pump-priming ourselves into prosperity. I think we will have to be realistic as well. Canadians are now challenged to accept their responsibility as autonomous Canadians who place service to their country above all else and lend their hand. I do not care how many criticisms we heard from the opposition members tonight who have made desperation speeches, but regardless of the number of attempts by the government to inject money into the economy I do not think we can succeed without the co-operation of all the Canadian people. I think they are ready and willing to co-operate and I do hope that they will take note of the word "cost".

• (1:00 a.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If I may, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: I should bring to the attention of the House that the hon. member's time has expired. The question could be asked and the answer given only with the consent of the House. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In order to keep the record straight, I wonder if the hon. member is not aware that the Minister of Finance did not announce tonight a reduction in corporation tax of seven percentage points and in personal income tax of three percentage points, but rather a reduction in the tax payable by 7 per cent in one case and 3 per cent in the other? Would not the hon. member like to correct what he said, and then perhaps rethink the results?

Mr. Pringle: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I accept the hon. member's explanation. I know that he is very careful about these things, and if the percentages are as he says, I accept that. So far as I am concerned, it is an improvement to take a percentage off the amount of tax payable rather than change the rate of taxation. I hope I have not challenged the hon. member to another question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the hon. member not realize that that is the most regressive way in which to make a tax change?

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed very much the speech of my hon. friend from Fraser Valley. I hope he will not be upset if once in a while I am critical but, like him, I believe time is running out, and perhaps I will have to depart from adulation from time to time. It has been a most interesting evening. It is not often we talk in this chamber at five after one o'clock in the morning. There are some interesting features about it. When I was called to the telephone half an hour ago I found that there were more cabinet ministers appearing on the television set in the lobby than there were in the House. I only hope the CBC is thinking carefully about what they are doing when they respond to any cabinet ministers who want to address the nation, and not give an alternative group the opportunity to do so, especially when one considers that the assembled opposition happens to represent more people than the government group does in this House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This was CBC and CTV both.

Mr. Macquarrie: I trust this will be reflected upon by those who are the denizens of this particular part of the media.

I am a great believer in political parties. No democracy can function without them. But it is interesting, and I admire those who can do it, that on a night when a special debate is called because unemployment has reached the lowest and most disgraceful figures—they are high actually but they are low in terms of public approval, the worst figures in over a decade—those supporting the government preen themselves on with great satisfaction and stand up, one after another, saying how wonderful things are. I should think that all people of compassion and concern would be sorrowful that the economy of this great country is in such a state that we are breaking records in unemployment.

We have seen tonight a display by a government without plan, without direction, without compassion, and most certainly without humility. And after their errors, repeated errors year after year, a little humility might be a saving grace. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has indicated the acceptance of new formulae, new to him, but which have been advanced time after time by those who sit in this chamber speaking for the opposition parties, and never the suggestion, never the courtesy, of saying, "finally we will accept those suggestions which you have given us to deal with the economy."

I think it is time the people of Canada had their attention directed to the service which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in this Parliament has rendered time after time when great economic questions have faced this country. He has been the first man to sound the clarion call of truth. He was the first man to see the fallacies, the nonsensical ingredients of the white paper. He was the first man to see the errors in the estate tax legislation, and he was the first man to point out the inequities and the vacuity of the government's program in reference to unemployment.

One thing did not surprise me tonight. I have grown accustomed to a situation where each time the Minister of Finance makes a speech he presents a new budget. This is nothing new. This is becoming part of the new system of fiscal flexibility, I suppose. It has been said, and well said—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is the first time a budget has been presented under Standing Order 26.

Mr. Macquarrie: Our expert on the rules, the venerable, learned and hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) points out that this is the first budget that has been presented under Standing Order 26. So. to that novelty I pay whatever tribute such a novelty deserves. But while in fairness, and one wants to be fiar, the government is rustling up some sense of urgency, its members have not ruslted up a sense of shame. They seem not really moved by the power of the terrible figures which are being visited upon the people of Canada tonight. I say that there is not really too much sensivitivy, because I have read carefully the minister's statement, and I heard it. An interesting portion was his collation of the unemployed. He said, and I quote:

> No doubt the explanation is complex. Those who are recorded as unemployed include:
> —men and women who have lost their regular employment;
> —teenagers of age 14 or older who have decided not to return to school;
> —college students who, for the time being at least, have dropped their courses;
> —women who have decided to seek work;
> —a large number who are seeking part-time work;
> —some who are drawing unemployment insurance and some who are not;
> —some who are drawing welfare benefits and some who are not.

My God, he has everybody there but nonagenarians, and there are not too many of those around even in these healthy times. So it is this group, the young, the old, the people who want jobs, the people who don't want jobs, just about everybody, who comprise the unemployed. The situation has become largely like regional disparity. If the whole country is depressed you don't have to single out any one particular area. But, Mr. Speaker, I happen to come from an area that no matter how far the rest of the country depresses, our area still seems to be a little worse off because of the government which is not at the head of affairs. The Atlantic area economy is one which is used to getting the short end of the stick, used to figuring prominently in all those economic indices which are bad, and at the bottom of the list of all those that are good. We are growing used to that, but this does not mean that we are getting to like it.

The other day I was impressed by APEC's statement, and I understood the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) had not read the report which reads as follows:

> The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council has produced a scathing indictment of the federal government's regional development efforts.
> In its fifth annual review, published today, APEC assesses the 30-month record—

Thirty months, not a bad length of time.

> —of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and its predecessor agencies set up by Ottawa to reduce economic disparities in Canada.
> It does not call DREE a failure. But the tone of the report comes close to giving this impression—

We Maritimers are given to euphemism. We don't quite call it a failure.

> The considerable degree of ministerial discretion allowed in the allocation of federal funds makes DREE susceptible to political manipulation—

• (1:10 a.m.)

Finally—and I think this is very germane to a debate such as this—the Atlantic provinces Economic Council report goes on to say:

> The impact of DREE during its first years has also been reduced by national policies designed to dampen inflation.

You remember—a high degree of unemployment would be acceptable because we were going to fight inflation and drive it around the corner. It seems we are living in a circular city, because we never got inflation around the corner. The report continues:

> In spite of suggestions that the region has been shielded from the full extent of these policies, APEC says the federal government's record of balancing economic policies has not been good. It believes, also, that inflation has not been halted, only postponed.

I say that when today's figures show 10.3 per cent unemployment in the Atlantic provinces, this is intolerable and not the kind of thing that any government supporter could preen himself about.

Mr. Muir: It is 25 per cent in some areas.

Mr. Macquarrie: Yes. That is the average for the whole area, a figure which is much higher than it has been for months. I say to the government that its national policies are exacerbating the problems in the Atlantic region and that the things it is doing add to the raw unemployment figures. The government is going about the Atlantic provinces closing down operations and the very thing it should be doing something about, regional disparity, is closing down the DREE office in the Atlantic provinces. The figures nationally are bad enough, but the figures regionally are worse. I say it ill-behoves anyone to score political marks with the economy of this country in its present state.

I am sorry that I do not have any issues of the Chilliwack Progress here, but I have an issue of the Toronto Telegram and I naturally subscribe to all that is said in an article by Dr. Gillies, the dean of administrative studies at York University, one of the most eminent economists this country has ever produced. On October 12 he wrote:

Given the shocking performance of the Canadian economy in the past few years—in some respects the worst of all industrialized societies—it is not astonishing that increasing concern is being expressed about the way economic policy is formulated in Canada.

Amen!

The question is, therefore, not simply whether the Canadian political process works, but whether the particular government in power receives proper advice about economic alternatives. In short, is the system for providing economic information to the decision-makers a good one?

Thoughtful Canadians who have watched the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) come out with the most preposterous forecasts, the most far-fetched prophecies and ill-designed projections time after time, will wonder at the state of this country's economy. We would have been in a mess long ago had it not been for the fact there was a certain viability in our nation and in our people. But we have reached the stage, and every statistic is showing it, where poor government is making a poor economy and where the poor economy is injuring and weakening our nation. How long can this continue? It is a serious mess, a serious situation.

I agree profoundly with all that was said by the hon. lady from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) who must have picked up much of her wisdom when she was married to a distinguished son of Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: She was correct in her appraisal of what the government is doing. However, I am not going to traverse ground which was well covered by my colleagues tonight. Another thing that fascinated me about the Minister's statement tonight was his closing paragraph:

Mr. Speaker, the economy is strong and growing. The measures I have proposed today are designed to keep it that way.

Anybody who can say that can belong to a government which says the Americans do not understand our problems. How can anyone in the United States or anywhere else believe in the credibility of the Minister of Finance? The very night, when unemployment is at its worst in over a decade, he stands up without a smile on his face, without a joke on his lips and says the economy is strong and growing. He is a glaring example of his own incredibility, and I hope that incredibility will lead to his departure from the job in which he has given an incredible performance.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, as you may well understand, I could not remain silent in the wake of the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in view of the prevailing economic situation.

I had the privilege of listening closely to the statement of the Minister of Finance as well as to the succeeding speeches of the leaders of the opposition parties. I must admit very objectively that those leaders made very valid criticisms. I must also acknowledge the seriousness of the economic situation, and I think that it was urgent for the government to make those statements and also that it is our responsibility to seek solutions in order to improve the lot of the Canadian people.

I shall not dwell any longer on unemployment statistics. They have been dealt with often enough. We are all aware of the fact that unemployment plagues our economy. Our Canadian economy is in jeopardy, regardless of what the minister may say. He has insisted it is "strong", that it will continue to be so. He was perhaps verging on exaggeration.

On the other hand, I must recognize, in view of the statements of the Minister of Finance and the commitments made by the government tonight, that the government deserves praise for its efforts.

One can always say it is too little and too late. Yet, it must be recognized that large amounts of money will be spent on improving the difficult situation we are now witnessing.

I am always happy to see someone trying.

• (1:20 a.m.)

In the circumstances, I am of course gratified by the statement made by the Minister of Finance. It would be quite simple to repeat, as so many others have done, that the measure unfortunately comes too late. I must still admit that opposition party leaders, among them the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Stanfield) and the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) have brought forward excellent suggestions and well-founded criticisms.

I must also recognize that for several months party leaders have been recommending that funds be allocated to remedy the prevailing situation.

I believe party leaders were not wrong to express their criticisms and that the Minister of Finance has also shown wisdom by announcing the measures which I hope will be likely to improve the situation. Will it be enough? Only somebody with the gift of second sight can answer that.

I keep turning back to the thought that since effort is always rewarded, I should rejoice when people attempt to improve a really complex situation.

I feel that we have been looking for a long time for some instant solution which would ensure greater well-being for the whole Canadian community. Such an easy answer would be rather surprising.

I met recently with a number of my constituents in order to discuss the needs of my constituency, as well as the present economic situation. I have had occasion, in the past year or so, to suggest to the government that it consider introducing a policy designed to lower to 60 the age of eligibility for old age security pension.

I know that the remarks I have already made certainly have not been noticed by the government as much as I would have wished. Indeed I had discussions with enough constituents of mine to ascertain the merits of that idea and, after having got certain figures which proved that from 350,000 to 400,000 workers were between 60 and 65, I think the government was wrong in seeking the instant solution. Some political parties have perhaps forgotten that there is a simple solution, one which is perhaps too simple to be valid, but I remain convinced that we must consider the possibility of giving the old age security pension to people of 60 and tonight I would like to take the opportunity to submit that proposal to the government.

In my opinion it would be very easy to reduce unemployment by about 70 per cent. But several millions of dollars will be spent to try to implement the proposals made by the Minister of Finance. I fully agree that the government should make all possible efforts and have millions of dollars available, but I wonder if the problem should not be dealt with more seriously by considering the possibility of granting the old age security pension to people of 60.

When referring to a policy liable to create from 350,000 to 400,000 jobs for young people, which would enable them to earn a living and take advantage of a well-deserved retirement at 60 after 30 or 40 years of service, we must at the same time consider the possibility of increasing old age pensions.

Some hon. members may say that I have talked about this policy before. It is not an innovation, nor an invention, but I do intend, as I said a few weeks ago, to repeat it as long as the government will not give it sufficient consideration.

Since this policy could create a social climate much more acceptable than the one we are experiencing today,—I believe it is up to the government to apply it. An old age security policy to provide the first payment at 60 would help to create between 350,000 and 400,000 jobs for the young people who are waiting and costing the government so much. I am wondering if it would not be desirable to take this proposal into consideration due to the importance of this debate. As a matter of fact, this solution would not require an enormous amount of money, since the cost of the 700,000 unemployed is extremely high. Must we repeat that it would be a transfer to allow people 60 years of age to have an income of at least $100 a week?

We did not hesitate to vote for the new unemployment insurance program providing benefits of up to $100 a week. We know full well that several people receive welfare benefits of more than $100 a week and I still cannot understand why the government would not consider the possibility of giving people 60 years of age well deserved vacations, thus reducing the present unemployment by 70 per cent.

Perhaps we shall have to admit that it is not easy to put aside 350,000 to 400,000 workers? Must we ask the government to envisage, for instance, a voluntary pension, a voluntary old age security program for the next six months by making payments of $100 a week to those pensioners? We could find in less than six months 200,000 persons at least who would be interested in leaving their job, since they would be sure of getting a sufficient income. People, 60 and over, would thus continue to be an asset to society since their income would be enough to allow them to take those trips they dreamed about for so long and to live decently.

And in the next six months, let us suppose that such a pension will necessarily be granted to people of 60 thus curing in 12 months this disease called unemployment which is hurting so unfairly the Canadian economy while creating an unfavourable social climate.

I take it upon myself to repeat this request to the government but considering the efforts it has made over the last two years I am not among those who would take this opportunity simply to blame the government saying that it has not done anything. We know very well that for a year and a half now the government has, for instance, spent millions in order to improve the situation. However, one must admit that the expected success has not materialized. I wonder to what extent those responsible in this government are ready to admit that they have not succeeded in providing the better standard of living and the stability that all Canadians and both opposition and government members want.

I take this opportunity to invite the government to consider seriously the possibility of granting the old age security pension at age 60, because, in my view, that would be the least costly solution as we would be providing work for 350,000 to 400,000 persons who cost a great deal to the government. We could also raise the amount of the old age pension, as this is necessary would ensure a sufficient income to those people aged 60 and over. That would give new hope to the young who are waiting for jobs. They are disappointed, and this creates a difficult social climate in Canada.

Events that occurred last year surely demonstrate that the government should hasten to do something which would represent a true solution. Statements by the Minister of Finance tonight were in good faith, and I support them, I am pleased with them, but I wonder just how much they are seeking this cure-all solution that no one, I think, has in this Chamber. It does seem that they have not succeeded in finding a proper solution.

I would therefore restrict myself to a few comments in the hope that the government will consider suggesting a solution. I was expecting tonight that the Minister of Finance would in his speech refer to this policy which I have at heart, because of the opportunity I have had of talking with people in this age group and I know how happy they would be if they were to retire at the age of 60, provided they are assured to obtain from the government the bare necessities of life.

In addition to all the suggestions made by the minister involving several millions of dollars, I dare hope that far greater and far more serious consideration will be given to the housing problem.

I think that the statement mentioned $113 million to be divided among the ten provinces. This is more or less important, but how many hon. members would like to see the 11 per cent tax on building materials eliminated? What mattered was not so much making available millions of dollars for excessive loans to middle-income people. One must recognize that a growth in the building industry would bring about a solution to unemployment. That could be made possible with better loans, an extension of the reimbursement period, as long as the interest rates remain at the same level.

How many hon. members have suggested that the tax on building materials should be eliminated? I for one had the pleasure of making such a recommendation. All those interested in this matter should get together with the government and set up a true policy which would restart the building industry and give work to thousands of unemployed. The government should meet those people immediately.

I was happy to learn today that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) have decided to meet with spokesmen for certain unions and a certain group of businessmen. A few weeks ago during the debate on Bill C-262, I had the opportunity of requesting a summit meeting, acknowledging that nobody had miracle solutions. I asked the government to arrange a conference with unions, management, economists, businessmen and industrialists so that they would join their efforts to find a solution which might be the best one under the circumstances, and admitting that the economy is in a bad predicament.

I would not dare saddle the government with the sole responsibility for our current economic situation. However, I must acknowledge that since we have not found that miracle solution everybody is looking for, it might be possible to find an acceptable solution by following the advice of experienced businessmen, after agreements with employee and employer unions. This would be a way of bringing home to the public, to those unions or organizations that it is important to join hands to try and find a global solution rather than being satisfied with criticizing the government and, especially, rejoicing over the difficulties that it is now experiencing.

I have listened carefully to the speech of the Minister of Finance and I was disappointed to see that some hon. members were happy to witness the problems the government is facing, whereas we know very well the price the Canadian people will have to pay to get them settled. We might do well—I must repeat it—to ask the members of the House to suggest interesting solutions that the government could keep in mind in order to provide for the well-being of people and iron out present difficulties.

I must recognize that certain opposition members and even some of their leaders, recommended the reduction in personal income tax a few months ago. Now the government does just that. As some people criticized the government for it, the delay was a costly one, but I nevertheless recognize that the government realized the situation and is making efforts to deal with it.

I also recognize that projections made a few months ago were refuted by events. I believe now the government should not be ashamed of recognizing that some projections were wrong and that they surely need better qualified economic advisers.

I should not like to deprive other members of the opportunity to speak. I will limit myself to those few comments, in the hope, in the event I did not shed any light—I am not qualified for that—of at least having made suggestions worthy of greater attention on the part of the government.

[English]

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed pleased to take part in this debate. I consider this a very important matter and one of great concern. In particular, it is of great concern to the riding that I represent. We have a great deal of unemployment in my riding. Many people who live and work there are now out of a job. We have great concern about this. It is a riding where the United States surcharge is affecting manufacturing and industry in general to a great extent. It is a riding where there is a great deal of uncertainty about the future. We have a great deal of concern for these people. It is a riding where businesses and corporations have been phasing out because of circumstances over which they have no control.

I represent these working people. I have concern for them. The party of which I am a member also has concern for them. As a matter of fact, the Liberal party of Canada has always been known as the workingman's party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson: That is true, in spite of what members of the New Democratic Party may say. They may represent the big unions but they do not represent the working people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson: This government has concern for the people. It wants to help people, reduce unemployment, provide jobs and curtail inflation. For two years we have been trying to do this through the Prices and Incomes Commission which has been successful in part with their voluntary restraints. They received support from every sector except the New Democratic Party and the big unions.

What did the members of the NDP say? They said, "No, we are not going to support Canadians in this venture—not one bit. We want everything we can get out of the economy and we are going to take it. We do not care who suffers." Even though this may be at the expense of the unorganized, the pensioners, widows and orphans, they could not care less. They want to have their cake and eat it too.

Mr. Muir: There is no cake with Trudeau.

Mr. Robinson: This is a flexible government. It is flexible to changes in the economy and changes in society. It is ready, willing and able to make tough decisions. It made a tough decision today when it in effect pumped $1 billion into the economy.

I was disappointed with the approach taken by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). His whole attitude was one of "I told you so." He did not have anything constructive to say. He made no suggestions, only destructive criticism. One can have nothing but contempt for this kind of approach. What did the leader of the New Democratic Party have to say? It was the usual gloom and doom approach of too little, too late. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that $1 billion is a great deal of money to be considered as too little.

This government realizes the time has come to prime the economic pump, and you don't do that with a thimbleful of water; you use a whole pailful if you want results. That is what the government is doing. The government means business. It prefers to take action and take it effectively.

The leader of the New Democratic Party talked about the 7 per cent corporate tax cut. He seemed to think this was a terrible thing. In effect, he said it discriminates against private individuals who receive an income tax cut of 3 per cent. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, where do the jobs come from? Who creates the jobs? The NDP cannot fool the people into thinking they create the jobs. The people know that jobs are created by industry. They are not taken in by the hypocrisy of the NDP and its philosophy. We want to prime the economy and that is exactly what we are doing. I believe the steps taken will prove effective. We want jobs.

Mr. Alexander: For whom?

Mr. Robinson: We want to create as many as possible in the labour sector. That is exactly what we are doing. I should like to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) for his thoughtful in-depth approach to stimulating all sectors of the economy. I would say that $1,070 million will provide economic stimulation. It certainly is not any band-aid approach. In effect, it is a complete bandage. Added to the $80 million we approved the other day, it will certainly give confidence to the business community, stimulate the economy and create more jobs. The program outlined by the minister is far-reaching and objective. It is no death-bed repentance of Benson as has been suggested. On the contrary, it illustrates the determination of the government to resolve the fiscal and economic difficulties brought about by the United States surcharge and other factors.

The program is imaginative and diversified. It provides for immediate relief projects as well as for long-term benefits. It provides help to municipalities and provinces. It helps industry and business. It helps the untrained worker, the trained worker and the unemployed. It provides for on-the-job training, a new concept to help the worker in this changing technological age. The government takes cognizance of the fact that we live in a changing world, a changing society. We live in a society with changing values, in a complete era of change. This government is heedful of change when change is needed. It is also capable of making big decisions when big decisions are needed. I am sure the big decision made today to stimulate the economy with $1 billion will stimulate the economy to the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard a very interesting speech from the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson), one which will certainly well qualify him to be No. 28 on the list of parliamentary secretaries, whatever the precise figure may be. You can always live in hope, just like the unemployed in this country.

The hon. member said the government was not taking a band-aid approach when it brought forward this program of economic stimulation tonight. I agree with him. It is not a band-aid approach. But, unfortunately for the people of Canada, they have just about bled to death before the government could find anything to put on the wound. That is the sad thing. One has to look at the situation today and compare it with the situation three and a half years ago when the government went to the people of Canada and talked about a just society, talked about the elimination of regional economic disparity, talked about streamlining Parliament, talked about doing all the things that were great and wonderful for the Canadian people. And the Canadian people bought it.

What did the government do? First of all, they came back and streamlined Parliament. They took almost all the power away that the opposition has possessed in the past, so there was no problem left for the government in passing the legislation that it is desired to pass.

The next thing we found happening was that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was manufacturing a super bureaucracy, a bureaucracy that has now grown to the point that he has 81 people on his personal staff, according to the last answer I received on the subject, at a total cost in excess of $800,000 to the Canadian taxpayer, and that the Privy Council Office had a staff of 206 people at last count at a total cost of in excess of $2.5 million annually to the Canadian taxpayer. The technocrats were put together. The super bureaucrats were put together. They were going to produce a new and vital type of government which was going to solve all the problems faced by the Canadian people.

What do we find today? We find ourselves in a position where we have the highest unemployment rate in a decade. We find ourselves in a position where a government, which a year ago was creating unemployment, now does not know how to stop it from continuously snowballing and snowballing to a point where we can very easily have three quarter of a million to a million unemployed before the winter is over. They deliberately created it.

I was pleased to listen to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) speaking tonight. Tonight, the minister condemned the policy that last year he said was courageous when the Prime Minister said we could live with an unemployment rate of 6 per cent. He said: Never again will the government endeavour to create unemployment to combat inflation. We knew what it was like to face a recession, because when we became the government in 1957 we inherited a recession. We knew how hard it was to stimulate the economy. We told them not to put the brakes on because if they did it they would get themselves into a situation from which they could not extricate themselves. Now, we find that the government has to pump over $1 billion into the economy in the hope of alleviating what is snowballing into probably the worst economic recession since the dirty 'thirties.

Mr. Woolliams: Depression.

Mr. Coates: Recession, depression, it does not really make any difference what you call it. For a great many people in this country it means nothing but misery and suffering. With this tremendous staff the Prime Minister has around him one would have thought that before now we could have had something original in the way of programs to stimulate the economy. When one examines what this government is proposing, one finds it is exactly what the Diefenbaker administration used between 1957 and 1961 to stimulate the economy. Dress it up any way you want, it is exactly the same thing. But the sad fact is that these proposals should have been put into effect last April, not today—certainly at the latest last June when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brought down his budget.

• (1:50 a.m.)

We have now reached a point in this Parliament where the credibility gap of the Minister of Finance is wider and deeper than the Grand Canyon. There is no way that any Canadian can put faith any longer in what the Minister says. His usefulness as a member of the executive has been spent. As a matter of fact, it was spent a long time ago. The only way this government can hope to revive any of its credibility is to have a cabinet shuffle and remove the Minister of Finance at the earliest possible moment. I hope that when the Prime Minister holds his press conference tomorrow he will tell the Canadian people that the government of this country is going to have a new Minister of Finance. As a matter of fact, if he told us we were going to have no Minister of Finance we would be better off than keeping the present one.

Yesterday I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether he would use some of the 287 people he has on his staff to re-examine the policies under DREE, to see whether there was not a better way of implementing programs that would assist in eliminating economic disparity which has now spread across the whole nation. No longer is it unique to the maritime provinces and parts of Quebec; it is everywhere in Canada. The Prime Minister replied to me, "Well, I will speak with the President of the Treasury Board and see if I can get some more staff". No doubt the Prime Minister was trying to be sarcastic and was inferring that I was asking questions about his staff.

I think the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) made the best suggestion. He suggested it would be of value if the Prime Minister were willing to add at least two people to his staff—a psychologist to help him understand what is going on in the world and a psychiatrist to help him understand what his government is doing. Even if this cost the taxpayer another $40,000 it would probably be a good idea to take on this extra staff. Then, hopefully, we would get some programs and proposals that would benefit the unemployed of this nation.

Looking at some of the proposals that have been made, I note that among other things the government is providing $100 million for projects to be developed through municipal and community organizations. I wonder what type of program this is going to be. I would hate to think that this winter we are to have a repetition of the Opportunities for Youth program of this summer. I think that as much as the Canadian public wants to see unemployment alleviated and the government go to almost any length to achieve that end, it would rather see something better than the screwball schemes that were incorporated in the Opportunities for Youth program this summer which brought discredit to our young people, many of whom were enthusiastic, dedicated and objective in their ideas. I hope there will be a better type of screening apparatus set up by the government regarding the proposals that will be coming forth from community organizations as to winter works projects.

No one objects to the pump-priming the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) talked about. But we do object to the fact that these proposals are made now rather than last April, May or June at a time when provincial and municipal governments would have been able to dovetail their programs with the federal scheme, thereby allowing for a concerted effort to meet the high rate of unemployment which today is very much in evidence in every province.

We are now in the position where many of the programs that are being undertaken will not effectively come into operation until next spring. The fact is that the unemployed will be unemployed all winter whether or not the government endeavours to do anything about it. This is a pretty sad situation for many people. Many of the unemployed already have been unemployed for four months and they face another three or four months before they have any hope of there being employment opportunities.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) displayed his knowledge of urban affairs in an excellent contribution this evening. He pointed out the great dilemma of the big cities of Canada in the field of welfare and asked where they will get the money to pay welfare to people who require it during the winter. All welfare budgets in the big cities have, in the minds of the financiers, gone beyond all comprehension. They do not know where to find the money they require. They cannot go to their taxpayers for more. I hope that some of the $1,070 million that is to be pumped into the economy will find its way into the treasuries of the municipalities of the nation to assist them to meet welfare payments which they are forced to make to people who cannot find work even if they want to work, as most of them do.

I think the best way to describe this government is that it is one that swallows itself. It said one thing yesterday, and this evening it goes off in the opposite direction. We are happy to see it go in the opposite direction because certainly its former policies were going in the wrong direction. In fact, we are not sure that the government is even competent to implement the policies and programs it is proposing.

I should like to take a moment to describe a situation that very clearly indicates just how two-faced this government has been, and compare yesterday with today. Among many of the things that are described as ways and means of combating inflation is a much broadened manpower program.

• (2:00 a.m.)

On April 30, I received a reply to a letter that I wrote to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) on March 19. In that letter I asked the minister to assist me in increasing the size of an upgrading school in the town of Amherst sponsored by Manpower. I wanted it doubled in size because I knew there were many people who required upgrading in my constituency, who desired it, and who would then be in a position to take vocational training and then enter the labour market. This would not do them much good now, but at least they would be qualified. I asked the minister for his assistance. He explained to me in a long letter why this could not be done. He said, in effect, that in November 1970 additional funds became available for the training of the unemployed in the winter months, and another 15 trainees were referred to training. They terminated their courses on March 26, 1971. He said:

> As this program is now terminated, the number of trainees is again based on regular allocations and presently 45 students are attending upgrading courses.

In other words, there was no way in which I was going to obtain any more money from the manpower program to assist the unemployed who wanted upgrading.

The situation in the town of Springhill was exactly the same. The member of the legislature for Cumberland Centre wrote me enclosing a letter from the Springhill Chamber of Commerce. They wanted an upgrading course established in the town of Springhill similar to that which existed in Amherst. This is what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) wrote to Mr. Raymond M. Smith, M.L.A., and to William B. Harroun, secretary of the Springhill Chamber of Commerce. The letter is dated May 27 and it reads:

This is further to my departmental Assistant's letter of May 7, 1971 about occupational training in the town of Springhill.

At the present time a basic training for skill development school with a capacity of 45 trainees is operating in Amherst. A large proportion of the trainees at Amherst are from Springhill. There is a backlog of clients for the basic training for skill development course in both Springhill and Amherst and they will be provided with training as quickly as possible. However, it is not possible to establish facilities to accommodate all those requiring training at the same time.

Some training is being provided at the Cumberland County Regional Vocational School in Springhill on a second-shift basis. Officials of the department will discuss with the province the possibility of increasing the training offered at this school. It is not considered desirable at this time to recommend to the province that additional training facilities be established at Springhill. It is felt that the Amherst school will be able to adequately service the area.

Maybe now at this late date the Minister of Manpower and Immigration will reconsider his decision.

I want to put this second letter on the record as well because it comes from the minister's departmental assistant. It is about one of the many people who were trying to secure this training. This is what it said:

This is further to my letter of August 10, 1971, concerning Mrs. (Geraldine) Babineau (Rushton) Springhill, Nova Scotia.

The report I have received from the Amherst Canada Manpower Centre indicates that the number of persons who wish to take basic training courses in Springhill is much greater than the number of training places made available. In such circumstances, it becomes necessary to establish a stand-by list of those persons who cannot be referred to training as soon as they register.

Mrs. Babineau's name is entered on such a list at the Springhill Canada Manpower Centre and she will be notified as soon as a training place becomes available. Regretfully it is not possible to state a specific date on which a course will be available to her.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say a few words about the economic situation, the government's projects and the conditions to their implementation.

The government has been made aware of the economic conditions. It decided to act against unemployment increase, to react to distressed requests, cost of living increase and economic imbalance. All those things made the government respond in the proper manner.

I do not want to take too long at this late hour. I shall go straight to the point. I would not like to repeat what the previous speakers said, because so many things were said. Figures were given; I shall not go over them.

The economic stagnation will get worse. We will lighten the tax burden insofar as we will let this government accumulate huge deficits and let our institutions go heavily into debt and pay exorbitant interest rates to big business.

[Mr. Coates.]

But never, in this chamber, did those responsible put the finger on the real economic ailment. The economic situation will go from bad to worse; we will have to spend billions, which will create awful deficits at all levels of government, especially for the federal government.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) says that we will accumulate in 1973 a deficit of $2.6 billion, whereas we already have one of $1 billion for this year. And in 1972, we will have one of $2,600,000,000, with all the programs and all the tax exemptions that are being granted to the people. To enable the people to breathe a little, increased deficits will be allowed. Through those conditions alone, we will succeed in balancing the economy. The economy will become more and more unbalanced and those programs, tax increases, higher debts and increased deficits will never foster a balance of the economy.

The people will never be satisfied in this wealthy country. We could profit therefrom, provided that we drive the Canadian people to the wall. When some advantages are granted to Canadians, the time comes where they must be removed, after some relaxation of the economy. It is then necessary to impose restrictions on credit and to increase taxes to again balance the budget.

I warn the government: the economic measures taken today will not last long and we will accumulate frightful debts we will be unable to pay. I must tell the Canadian people they will not enjoy for long the advantages of this policy which it is claimed will save everyone.

To hear the economists and politicians talk, and in particular the Minister of Finance, the entire Canadian society has been pulled out of stagnation, is once more on a stable footing. That is nothing but sham; that is a lie. On the contrary: the Canadian people are being plunged into appalling stagnation which will have disastrous consequence within a few months.

When a new government comes to power, it will be said logically that it will have to balance its budget. A government that has a deficit and that unbalances the taxpayers' budget to balance its own, establishes an unbalanced system, which has no reason for being, and those who accept this are totally wrong. This error will continue if those salvaging bodies, the benefits of which are acclaimed today, are maintained.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people, those who do not understand our economy, who do not know where we are going, who are not aware of our responsibilities and of the consequences of the actions taken, believe that this makes sense. There are even members here who in my opinion are not aware of the consequences that that will bring about. As a matter of fact, that will not settle in any way the prevailing unbalanced economic problem.

Mr. Speaker. I would urge the government to bring in real social measures, to lower the cost of living. I would ask them to reduce taxes, to decrease interest rates, to issue new credit without interest in order to cure the present economic uneasiness. That would be real social measures, real economic measures, real measures designed to balance our outmoded economic system. It is completely off balance and those measures will never balance our unbalanced economy.

Mr. Speaker, I will not go any farther tonight, because I think that I have said enough.

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, we have been listening to a lengthy dissertation about the economic problems which face Canada. Tonight, we saw the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) come out with a budget which cannot really be answered in a normal and formal budget debate. That is perhaps why we still find ourselves here debating the pros and cons of the economy, and the worth and strength of the measures proposed by the Minister of Finance.

Many people have said that the minister is reducing personal income tax by 3 per cent and corporation tax by 7 per cent, providing $340 million for municipal projects in something like a modern winter works program, and coupled with this, job retraining. To really understand Canada's economic plight one can quote the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) who said something to the effect that never again should any government try—I wrote down what he said—to control inflation by fiscal and monetary measures which bring about high unemployment. We all well remember the Prime Minister's famous statement that he did not care if he brought about 6 per cent unemployment, that he could live with it, and the people could either take it or lump it. He was going to cure or control inflation.

But in studying the economy one has to take a quick look at what really did happen. From 1965 to 1968, Canada had the highest rate of inflation in the western world. The Prime Minister then took over and he became obsessed with the idea of curing inflation. On several occasions, the Minister of Finance boasted that from 1968 to 1970 Canada had the lowest rate of inflation. So, we were experimenting, and I agree with the Minister of Labour that never again should a government use a cruel, blunt tool in such a fashion as to bring about unemployment.

Finally on May 30, 1970, the Minister of Finance had to float the Canadian dollar because he, too, had been obsessed with the idea of stopping inflation, and he found there was just too much pressure on the Canadian dollar. This came about partly because the white paper on tax reform frightened the economic community in Canada. Has the confidence of the economic sector been restored? That is the question we really have to ask ourselves. Up until tonight, it certainly has not been restored. We would like to think that it can be restored, but when one hears about the Gray Report, and what the government is going to do to foreign corporations and foreign investment in Canada, one wonders. We do not know whether that report is shelved or written into Bill C-259. I believe a lot of it is written into Bill C-259. That bill still has the economic community of Canada somewhat worried.

We have been through what might be called an exercise in tax reform that has lasted between eight to ten years. The country has become worried about it. The tax reform bill is 700 pages long. Yesterday, the Minister of Finance filed 100 amendments. Now today, before we have even finished study of clause 1 in committee of the whole, the minister brings in a budget of quite mammoth size, turning loose over $1 billion more in our economy. But all the while the very tax legislation that we are going to study is going to increase taxes by $850 million.

Mr. Mahoney: That is sheer nonsense, and you know it.

Mr. Horner: The hon. parliamentary secretary must have just wakened, Mr. Speaker. In any case, the business community has not got confidence in the Canadian government. It is worried and frightened. Its members look ahead, as did Mr. Filion in his speech in Quebec not so long ago. He asked what do we see? We see the American surtax, and this government trying to get into a trade war. Apparently, we are going to use all our options.

That reminds me of a former premier of Alberta who did not call an election for June. He said he was keeping all his options open. In fact, he was closing his options, and in fact that is what the government is doing with regard to the American surtax measure. Members of the government brought it on themselves, and it is too bad the Canadian economy will have to suffer because of their thoughtless action.

In January, 1970, the Prime Minister made his famous statement about 6 per cent unemployment. Tonight, he went out of the House of Commons laughing, and said to the Minister of Labour, "Bryce, you had better look after it; you won't need any help." Then, he went out laughing about 7.1 per cent unemployment and the measures which the Minister of Finance hopes will be of benefit. The 7 per cent reduction in corporation tax will not be immediately felt in the economy. In fact, it may take some time before it is ploughed back into business, into job creation, because of the loss of confidence in the Canadian government shown by the business community.

Money today is leaving Canada. It is not a question of foreign investment in Canada anymore. We are now in a position where money is leaving Canada. Canadians are looking for a place more secure than Canada in which to invest their money. In a country so rich in natural resources that, to me, is nearly a sin. It is because people have lost confidence. They are looking ahead and they see the labour code introduced by the Minister of Labour. The labour code bill introduced by the Minister of Labour is frightening business. Now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) has introduced a competition bill, which also frightens business, a bill under which he is going to set up a seven man tribunal, appointed for ten years, answering to nobody, ruling authoritatively on both sides of a question, dealing with business amalgamations, foreign investment, and the whole role of Canadian corporations in Canada. I do not believe this will really benefit the unemployed.

The Minister of Finance can come out with all the job retraining programs he likes, and with all the municipal programs he likes. After a while people will be retrained, but there will be no use in being retrained if there are no jobs. There will be no jobs unless the country grapples with the fact that the business community has to have confidence in the government. The government has to pay attention to the country and show some concern and interest. This government has failed to do that.

Just last week we were debating whether the government should pay the $60 million to the farmers. If they had wanted to establish an acreage payment program, the bill might have gone through. The Minister of Finance said the farmers could not have it both ways. He said, "You take the $60 million or the $100 million; we haven't got the money". All of a sudden the government has a billion dollars when last week they did not have $60 million. In order to manage a society and in order to manage an economy, you have to be sensitive to every little condition that may arise in every region. You cannot operate as insensitively as the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with his cold, callous attitude toward many Canadians. You must be concerned.

Two years ago the government should have primed the pump. There are few people on the government side in the House of Commons who know anything about pump-priming and pumping water. Once the water stops flowing it sometimes takes a prime to get it going again. The government shut off the pump.

Mr. Mahoney: Sheer nonsense!

Mr. Horner: It is always nonsense to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) who is so knowledgeable. He has an air of arrogance, but I know deep down he really is not.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said that the unemployment rate is no higher than it was in the sixties. But we had the Governor of the Bank of Canada controlling the money supply in 1960 and part of 1961. Our money supply did not increase at all, it shrank. We had high unemployment because there was no money in the economy.

The Minister of Finance admitted that the money supply is growing at a faster rate than ever before. In other words, they are creating money to cut down on the number of unemployed. But when the community into which the money is poured has no confidence in the business climate created by this government, the money is of no real use. That is why we have over 7 per cent unemployment today. The government has destroyed the confidence of the country.

In his speech the Minister of Labour said that everybody should be afraid the NDP is going to take over and things would be worse. I am not afraid of the NDP or their philosophy—how can it be worse?

Mr. Mahoney: At least they have a chance.

Mr. Horner: How can it be worse when you have a government that is not interested in the country or the people?

Mr. Mahoney: You have no alternative.

Mr. Horner: Now, we have this very nice person from Calgary South with so much knowledge expressing an opinion which again shows that he must be a very arrogant person. I know he is not, but he gives that impression and I wish he did not. My constituency borders his and I would like to think that we can be compatible some of the time.

The economy is in a poor state today because the government has deliberately destroyed confidence in the business world. Somehow or other more interest must be shown in Canada and what affects the economy. When this is done maybe some confidence will return and we will see a reduction in unemployment next summer. I noticed that the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Finance would make no predictions for this winter. The Minister of Labour suggested that savings are at an all-time high. They are, and people are not reinvesting. The white paper on taxation started this fear in the business community and the attitudes of the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister contributed to it, as did the Competition Act and a number of other things.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): At two thirty in the morning, Mr. Speaker, I am sure everyone is wide awake—

An hon. Member: On this side anyway.

Mr. Mahoney: That is the only time you wake up.

Mr. Skoberg: I would like to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) and the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) referred to the Prices and Incomes Commission it seemed strange that the Minister of Labour and his parliamentary secretary were not applauding. Those members blamed the labour movement for not being involved with the Prices and Incomes Commission. Anyone who has looked into the situation realizes that the labour movement was prepared to go along with the commission if it had added the third ingredient, profits, and if it had added dividends and interest rates. But the commission had only two ideas, prices and incomes. The other things did not matter.

I was very surprised that the hon. member for Fraser Valley East and the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore, who pretend to be supporters of the workers of this country, would attack these people as they have tonight. I believe they should look into the record when they compare the labour movement in Canada to that in the United States. They suggested that the labour movement in Canada was not prepared to co-operate in an effort to stabilize the various aspects of the economy that affect every person in this country.

I have heard considerable talk tonight, Mr. Speaker, about generating money and jobs. We have had considerable debate in this House for the last two weeks concerning the prairie agricultural economy. We heard tonight that if so many millions of dollars are put into the economy it will generate jobs and provide an uplift for the economy generally. I suggest that if the sums the government now talks of had been made available earlier, if the government had paid out $100 million under the so-called acreage payments, if it had paid out the $95 million owing to the farmers under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, and if it had paid out the $70 million that ought to have been available under a two-price system for wheat, $1 billion would have been put into the economy. That would have created many jobs for manufacturing industries in central Canada and would have brought untold benefits to the Canadian economy.

Somehow we are hung up with the idea that money put into the western economy does not generate many job opportunities elsewhere. I suggest that the economy of western Canada is as important as that of central Canada and the economy of eastern Canada, in exactly the same way, is important to the economy of central Canada.

I think we have all heard of the local opportunities programs. I read about it two or three weeks ago in one of the editions of Labour News. It is said that local opportunities programs will be initiated and that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) will probably have jurisdiction over them. I think the kindest thing we could do to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is unload from his shoulders some of the jobs that he now has.

Mr. Benjamin: There we have lost opportunities.

Mr. Skoberg: I suggest that the present load the minister is carrying is big for him. We know what has happened so far as Manpower is concerned. We know that in many cases people cannot undertake more than 52 weeks training at one time. In some instances they must wait before undertaking another period of retraining. Some people do this for three years. Some people who have been able to continue training under manpower training programs for up to two years have tried to get a few extra weeks' training but have been told that no money is available. Tonight we heard that extra money is to be made available for the retraining of people. I think the minister will agree that such manpower programs are needed and that they will bring about the results we all desire.

In addition to these responsibilities the minister also answers in this House for the Canadian Wheat Board. That alone is a full-time job. It is passing strange that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) does not have responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board. It seems to me that the minister is on the chopping block and that they are trying to spread one minister around too far. He cannot possibly do an adequate and satisfactory job in the many areas for which he has responsibility.

Mr. Benjamin: He is expendable.

Mr. Skoberg: All members of the House know that the minister's immigration responsibilities take up much of his time. One may rest assured that he cannot therefore deal satisfactorily with all the additional programs for which he is responsible. If the programs announced tonight are to be successful, I suggest that responsibility should be shared by another minister. Perhaps his parliamentary secretary could help. I submit, again, that it is not possible for the minister who has been given responsibility for these programs to do a satisfactory job with regard to them, and his failure will dishearten the people of Canada who expect good results.

Some hon. members have said that regional committees will be established under the Department of Manpower and Immigration. We have seen such regional committees throughout Canada and have noted that some regions received tremendous benefits whereas others received practically nothing. There ought to be an equal distribution of the benefits of this whole program. It is not good enough having a job acceleration program in one part of the country if you completely forget about the rest of the country. I am sure that all hon. members are aware of this problem. Unless the government corrects what is wrong, such programs will do more to disunite this country than almost anything else.

We heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) speak of the various programs for which he is responsible. I give him full credit for some excellent legislation that is now before the House, or will be before us, touching labour problems. At the same time, I draw to his attention a situation involving Canadian Pacific Railway. It has been suggested that the Canadian Pacific will be cutting back on certain facilities. As of today there is to be a cut-back with regard to 25 porters and a reduction of between 20 and 25 dining cars. The company also is to reduce the size of the transcontinental "Canadian." There will be two sleeping cars operating between Vancouver and Montreal and Vancouver and Toronto.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame.

Mr. Skoberg: Not long ago we were under the impression that we were adopting a new transportation policy. The head of the Canadian Transport Commission is only concerned about economics and not about service to the public. We thought the commission had decided that there would be adequate main line passenger service, but we are now advised that this service will consist of about eight cars operating on the Vancouver-Toronto-Montreal runs. The commission's decision will mean a loss of job opportunities. Before making that decision it ought to have undertaken research into the matter. It is not good enough to say that we will provide money for certain fields of transportation.

We are all concerned about STOL, or short take-off and landing aircraft. Yet when you talk to Europeans about STOL aircraft service between Ottawa and Montreal they say the idea is absolutely nuts. The United States, to use an example, is pouring millions of dollars into ground transportation facilities. I hope that any amounts we spend on transport will include moneys for research and development to make use of existing facilities. Think of the operation of a STOL aircraft carrying 12 people, and compare that with a transport operation utilizing present facilities. Many additional jobs could be provided under a suitable transport program. Whether that is asking too much, I do not know.

I wish to raise another area of concern. I am sorry that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Andras) is not here at 2.40 in the morning to listen to me. I point out that our entire land assembly program is a complete shambles. The minister has many times suggested that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation adequately serves the needs of the country. How can he say that in light of the many applications for student housing coming from the universities and colleges of this country? Those applicants are told that no money is available for them. This type of building program could create a tremendous number of job opportunities.

If the minister is truly concerned about urban development and wishes to provide houses for as many people as possible, why is money not made available for land assembly and why is there not legislation that will provide for the expropriation of land now in the hands of land speculators? If the minister is concerned about these areas, he should do something. He should try to bring about co-operation that will enable citizens in the lower income brackets to avail themselves of some of our land.

• (2:40 a.m.)

We can talk all we want about creating jobs. This is one of the main purposes of the program. Some members have said that we should not criticize the 7 per cent and the 3 per cent. This is one of the areas where people who have it will get more, and those who do not have it will end up with less. The shots are being called outside this country. Makeshift policies are being developed with regard to Japan and Russia, among other countries. Makeshift policies will not work in this country unless we are able to call the shots. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is not prepared to indicate to the House what he intends to do in this other area, these makeshift job opportunities will not be successful. The whole thing hinges on the fact that the shots must be called in Canada. You cannot call the shot in one area and expect any real development in another.

We hope some of the provisions and suggestions made tonight by the Minister of Finance will have a rub-off effect. There must be meaningful planning on a regional basis. All the talk and rhetoric we heard tonight will do nothing to strengthen the economy of this country.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. In accordance with the special order made earlier today, the Chair is satisfied that the debate is over. I therefore declare the motion carried. The House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock this morning.

At 2:45 a.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 15, 1971

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EXPRESSION OF OPPOSITION OF HOUSE OF COMMONS TO AMCHITKA AND OTHER NUCLEAR TESTS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

Whereas the continued testing of nuclear warheads by the nuclear powers adds to the dangers of the nuclear arms race and may seriously pollute the human environment, and

Whereas the scheduled nuclear test at Amchitka is of particular concern to Canadians because of its proximity to Canada's west coast,

This Canadian House of Commons calls on all nuclear powers to cease all testing of nuclear devices, and particularly, calls on the President of the United States to cancel the test at Amchitka scheduled for this month.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak for all members of this House and for all parties when I say how happy we are that the House has set aside time to give all hon. members an opportunity to register their support for the firm stand taken by Canada in opposition to continued nuclear weapons testing, and to the Amchitka test in particular.

• (11:10 a.m.)

The world is made apprehensive by continuing nuclear arms tests; it is becoming weary of the endless delays that are postponing a complete test ban. By this resolution, Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons, freely and truly representative of all the Canadian people, adds its voice to a universal call to the governments of the nuclear powers to have done with it.

It is a tragic comment on our world, Mr. Speaker, that even as we say this we must continue to accept the balance of nuclear deterrence as the foundation of the uneasy equilibrium that protects us all from the horror of total war. Let us hope that peace will not forever rest on such an unsure base.

This objective can be achieved slowly and with great difficulty through the continuing work of the Geneva Disarmament Committee and through imaginative initiatives such as the SALT talks, upon which so many of our hopes are centred. I doubt if it can be achieved by the detonation of more efficient bombs whether designed for offensive or defensive purposes.

In the Geneva Disarmament Committee, Canada has been working with others to find a solution to the deadlock between the United States and the Soviet Union on the need for on-site inspections to monitor an underground test ban. Recent Canadian technical studies presented to the Geneva Committee indicate that there is excellent promise of being able to monitor, by seismological means, underground explosions other than the very smallest. Continuing research, investment in more effective monitoring facilities and improved international exchange of seismic data taken together have reduced the question of inspection to more manageable proportions.

The Canadian technical studies cannot eliminate all the uncertainties and ambiguities involved in the detection of violations and evasions of an underground test ban. The time has come, however, for the two major nuclear powers to make the effort needed to bridge the gap between them and to achieve reliable identification of those smaller seismic events that existing seismological monitoring facilities cannot classify effectively.

Unless the two major nuclear powers are willing to accept effective restraints on their arms race and on the competition in the improvement of their own nuclear weapons—as they are committed to do under Article VI of the Non-Proliferation Treaty—they cannot expect the two less highly developed nuclear powers, France and China, and the so-called "near-nuclear powers" to accept or respect the restraints of the non-proliferation agreement which the United States and the Soviet Union sponsored. That France and China should adhere to the Moscow Partial Test Ban Treaty is of the greatest importance, since it is the tests they are carrying out in the atmosphere that pose the major threat of radioactive contamination of the world environment.

The problem of verification is not yet completely solved, and the achievement of an underground test ban will take time. Until this can be achieved, both major powers should institute immediate mutual restraints to reduce the size and number of their underground tests, starting with high-yield tests like the Soviet explosion of September 27 and the proposed United States test on Amchitka Island this fall. Such measures should present no insurmountable problems of verification.

In my recent statements to the United Nations Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy on September 6, to the Geneva Disarmament Committee on September 7, to the General Assembly of the United Nations on September 29, and in discussions with the Secretary of State of the United States and the Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union in New York on October 1 and 2, I have made Canada's position on this question abundantly clear. I have also referred specifically in the General Assembly and in my conversations with both Foreign Ministers to our specific objections to the high-yield tests, the Soviet test of September 27 and the planned United States test at Amchitka.

In the course of my meeting with Mr. Rogers, I stressed the serious concern Canadians throughout the country and particularly in the west feel about the Amchitka test. I dealt with the serious implications of such tests—primarily the threat posed to the world by the continuation of unrestrained testing and the consequent escalation in the nuclear arms race and the danger to the environment and ecology of the whole Pacific northwest, a danger which cannot be entirely eliminated.

These repeated, reinforced and re-emphasized representations, multilateral and bilateral alike, add force to the clear and forthright formal approach the Canadian government made to the United States government as early as last February, by way of a note that I later tabled in the House on March 29 last. I am assured by Secretary Rogers that the serious concerns of the Canadian government and people are fully appreciated by the United States administration at the highest level. The final decision on whether to proceed with the Amchitka test has not yet been taken; it is in the hands of President Nixon. There is room for hope that the United States will cancel the test, demonstrating at once their respect for the clearly expressed opinion of large sectors of its own population, millions of Canadians and men of good will in many nations, and a determination on the United States' part not to contribute to further reciprocal escalation in the nuclear arms race.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to speak on this important resolution. I begin by saying I support it strongly and predict its passage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I urge upon all hon. members that they support this declaration of opinion by this House. I am happy with the way in which this matter has been handled and am proud that my own party suggested that we devote time allotted to us in order that this important subject may be dealt with in this multipartisan way, if I may use that expression.

I must make it clear that while I favour this resolution I do not withdraw from my conviction that the Prime Minister of this country should convey directly to the President of the United States the view of Canadians on this very serious question. I regret that in the deterioration of Canada-United States relations we seem to be reduced to indirect discourse, and one wonders if the hot line has grown cold or atrophied from disuse.

While we are especially concerned about the Amchitka test which has such dangerous possibilities, we must not ignore the fact that other nations are also conducting explosions which make their grim contribution to a deterioration of some aspect of the environment. While there may be arguments about the degree of danger from fallout, there is unfortunately no doubt that the world is a little more polluted, the environment a little more poisoned, after each detonation. Thus we should call for the end of tests. As my old boss, Hon. Howard Green, used to put it at the United Nations, "We are against nuclear testing—period".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: Because the United States is a great functional democracy and divulges to its own people and the world its intentions and therefore allows for the build-up of public opinion, we should not appear to be concerned only with American tests and blissfully casual about the mighty explosions set off by the military machines of China, Russia and France. It is worth noting that we usually learn of the Chinese and Russian detonations when they register on the detection devices of Jodrell Bank or some other monitoring station.

Canada sometimes gets the reputation in the international community of being a "preachy" country. In this instance I like the sermon. But we must be careful that we are multidirectional in our uninvited exhortations and unsolicited precepts. For instance I could never see that British military supplies sold to South Africa were any more iniquitous than those sold by France.

Having said this, I do not hesitate in urging as strongly as I can upon the United States President the abandonment of the planned Amchitka test. The project has been given the name Cannikin and I appeal to our neighbours' leader to "can the Cannikin".

I make this appeal not because I desire that the United States weaken itself militarily. I cannot see how any Canadian could see any advantage for Canada in such a course. I join in this because with all its faults, all its errors and even in these strained times, I regard the United States as a great country. I would like to see it give leadership in this field as it has in so many others and make a major contribution toward the attainment of the real goal, namely, the cessation by all nations of all nuclear testing. In calling for the cancellation of this test on Amchitka Island I join not only the legislature and the people of British Columbia and other Canadians; I join a great expression of American public opinion.

Amchitka is part of Alaska, about 1,400 miles west southwest of Anchorage and therefore about the same distance from British Columbia's coast. The anxiety of the people of Alaska has been clearly expressed by the leaders of that state.

Senator Gravel said recently:

> To go ahead with this test is courting a risk of magnitude we cannot determine. The risk is not worth taking. Our national security will not be imperilled if the test is cancelled.

• (11:20 a.m.)

The possibilities of serious ill effects have been outlined. Indeed, the dangers are really frightening. There is no universal law which decrees that man could not destroy himself. There is grave danger in pushing the risk too far. I would rather stop far too soon than push to the brink of an ecolocatastrophe. But apart from that we must consider the less than fatal errors we may be committing. When will we learn that we must conserve, not pillage, the heritage we have been given?

How many more species of fish must be tabbed with mercury pollution before we wake up? How much dislocation of the habitat of birdlife will we continue to tolerate? How many times must we blast and scar the earth's surface before we learn the dangers of what we are doing?

I commend those in our society who seek to awaken us to the need of giving urgent thought and urgent attention to the conservation of our environment. The voyage of the halibut boat, Greenpeace, might have been a stunt or a gimmick. It was also a splendid and valuable dramatization of a question which after generations of environmental plundering cannot be overemphasized.

I suppose it is an oversimplification to state that a civilized people must give thought to succeeding generations. In those lands like ours which have in so many ways advanced our environmental heritage was not too well preserved by those who went before. It is our challenge to make amends. The time at our disposal is not unlimited.

With all earnestness I support the resolution moved by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). I hope we can in this special debate convey to President Nixon our genuine concern over this matter.

In this we are at one with the Congress of his own country which overwhelmingly calls for a ban on Amchitka. The President of the United States has many burdens, multitudinous problems, as is expected of a world leader. I fervently hope that he will enhance his stature and enlarge his influence for good by announcing that this test will not go forward—as the minister says, and he is more casual in his phraseology than I, that he will have done with it. I hope too that the other nations, not named but surely embraced in this resolution, will follow suit.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, I wrote the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) some days ago urging that such a motion be placed before the House. On behalf of my colleagues and myself I congratulate the government for having done so.

I support every word said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). We are all very delighted that the House of Commons has been given this opportunity, I hope unanimously, to declare itself against both nuclear tests in general and the Amchitka test in particular.

I have watched the international situation, Mr. Speaker. I often think we are living in a world of insanity because of the nuclear problem. The super powers already have the capacity to destroy this earth and everything on it several times over. Yet we do not stop. We continue trying to develop bigger and stronger weapons to destroy ourselves, always with the excuse that it is being done for defensive and deterrent purposes. I deny that, Mr. Speaker.

I have a strong conviction that there are vested interests involved which are not sensitive to the needs of the world and to the dangers to peace and humanity as the result of this nuclear escalation. I think there are vested interests in the military who in peacetime cannot justify their existence unless they are constantly preparing for war which they say they hope will not happen but which at some point may happen if this kind of escalation continues. I think there are vested interests in the industrial sphere where large corporations have been tied up with the development of nuclear weapons from which they have derived great power and immense profits which they do not want to let go. I think there are vested interests in certain areas of the world which, on the Communist side, consider every western gesture as contemptible and, on the western side, consider every Soviet stance as dangerous and distrustful. There are vested interests on all sides to keep the world aflame with hate and distrust, and these are dangerous interests to our community.

I think it is important for our civilization to say to these big nuclear powers, the Soviet Union as well as the United States and perhaps France and China, that humanity will not last if they continue with this insanity and that we as Canadian members of this Parliament plead with the nuclear powers throughout the world to finish these nuclear tests and the nuclear escalation before it gets to the point at which deterrence becomes impossible and destruction becomes inevitable.

As Canadians we are concerned particularly with the proposed test on Amchitka Island because it is close to us. I emphasize that as far as my party is concerned we are not opposed merely to the Amchitka test. That is why I was in agreement with broadening the resolution so that it would include our opposition to all nuclear testing. We are not concerned merely with Amchitka because it is close to Canada; we are concerned with the world situation.

But it is natural we should be particulary concerned and worried about the Amchitka test because the ecological and other consequences will fall immediately on our future generations. Let it be said again that we join, with all people in Canada in pleading with the President of the United States to cancel the Amchitka test. We join in this plea with those who have already spoken, with most of the people in the United States and with millions of people across the world.

I say, if I may without presumption, to President Nixon that there are moments in the life and duties of a person carrying large responsibilities when he can rise above political considerations for a moment and show leadership and imagination of a kind which will mark him in history as a great man. I say to the President of the United States that the resolution of Congress which has placed the possibility of cancelling the Amchitka test solely in his hands gives him an opportunity to show the world a mark of greatness, a mark of appreciation of the dangers of nuclear testing. I plead with him to take advantage of the opportunity for the sake of humanity and for the sake of world peace.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to join the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) as well as the representatives of other parties in protesting against the nuclear tests which the United States are preparing to undertake.

When danger is threatening a nation, governments forget their differences and unite with a view to objecting against the American action. Unity is still more complete as the danger is great and this is why Canada is concerned this morning. Our country is worried. We have always been, Mr. Speaker, against nuclear weapons and have always strongly objected against all nuclear tests by the so-called great powers.

Some people imagine that because the great powers are involved they can do anything, even if they endanger the existence of mankind.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we should demand of the great powers, both eastern and western, that they put an end immediately to these nuclear tests which represent a threat, as I said before, for the universe, and particularly for areas located near the testing site, such as our country.

It is useless for me to expound lengthily on the consequences of such explosions. We have had concrete examples of radioactive fall-out. Long-term effects and radioactive fall-out are a threat not only for humans but for all forms of life.

The minister said a little while ago that the United States had not as yet arrived at a final decision. I would request the minister and the cabinet to renew, if need be, representations to the President of the United States in order that such experiences be abandoned by his country once and for all. May the United States give the example, since they can claim at this time to be the most powerful country in the world. May they put an end to those most dangerous experiences, feared by all the nations of the world.

And if the United States are experimenting improvements to the continental defence, they have no right to imperil everybody's life in anticipation of an eventual nuclear attack.

Today, in North America, a struggle must be engaged against these great powers, and it is a struggle against a form of pollution. We have already undertaken, in our areas and in our country, a fight against pollution, and today, despite all threats of air and water pollution, the greatest pollution is one to be banned forever, that is atmospheric pollution arising from nuclear blasts.

That is the first step to take, and we can then keep on working together in order to further clean the air and water of this country so that we may live here more contented and healthier.

• (11:30 a.m.)

[English]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few brief words about the possible environmental effects of the explosion of a five megaton bomb on Amchitka this fall. These effects are likely to be pollution effects. They are likely to be ecological effects. There may not be a major earthquake resulting from this explosion or a tidal wave, but there is likely to be a pollution effect extending beyond the territorial limits of the United States.

Pollution effects have resulted from previous underground blasts. More than one in four of the underground blasts in the United States have resulted in venting—in other words, in the loss of radioactive material from below ground to the atmosphere. Statistics over the past 25 years covering some 230 underground blasts in the continental United States show that 67 have vented, some to a lesser extent, some to a greater extent. So the probability is more than one in four, if we look back on history, of a venting to the atmosphere occurring at Amchitka.

There will, of course, be contamination of ground water as well. The last underground test in the United States was carried out in Nevada approximately a year ago, on December 18, 1970. There was an accidental venting. This was not forecast. Indeed, the United States Atomic Energy Commission said that no venting could occur or would occur. In fact, venting did occur. This venting resulted in a cloud of radioactive dust which was seen locally and which moved slowly in a north and then a northeasterly direction across the United States, and finally disappeared over Canada in the vicinity of Thunder Bay where it was knocked down by a thunder storm.

We have monitoring stations in Canada, and a few days later the radioactive level over Windsor and Toronto was found to be double the level under normal circumstances. So that the likelihood that venting will occur in the proportion of one in four is proven. The effects may be felt several thousand miles away. Certainly they are likely to be detected.

The proposed explosion of the Cannikin device at Amchitka will involve a charge 250 times as powerful as that used in the last underground test, the one in Nevada I previously described. According to the authorities I have consulted, there is no possibility that seismic waves from the explosion could do damage or even be felt in Canada, and no scientific ground exists for concern about the possibility of triggering an earthquake in western Canada. So that an earthquake is really out of the question in so far as Canadians are concerned.

These same authorities have advised me, after much consideration, that the possibility of a tsunami wave or tidal wave is relatively remote, but the element of risk to Canada cannot be quantified and complete assurance cannot be given because of the inherent uncertainties. So that while earthquake effects in Canada are unlikely, there is a remote possibility of a tidal wave.

To get to the pollution aspect, there is a one in four possibility of releases to the air. There is a certainty of contamination of ground waters in the area. Water moves through underground cracks and fissures. It is more likely to move underground in that part of the world because it is an area which is generally prone to earthquakes. It follows that ground waters which are in the immediate vicinity of the explosion on Amchitka may well seep out in time and contaminate surrounding waters. Amchitka is an island. It has a three-mile territorial limit. Underground waters eventually will percolate out from the rock under the island into the territorial waters and out into the ocean beyond the territorial limits of Alaska and therefore the United States.

• (11:40 a.m.)

In my view, this becomes a matter not only of United States concern but of international concern. It is a matter which is referred to in a general way in the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty of 1963. My reading of that treaty is that no nation can contaminate the environment beyond its own territory. This raises the question in my mind of why the United States chose to move its explosions and testing from the middle of the continental United States to a remote island, like Amchitka, surrounded by international waters.

I would again urge all members of the House of Commons to oppose this explosion, this nuclear test, not only because it is one of a possible sequence of ever larger explosions but because it could have a pollution effect and an environmental effect beyond Amchitka, that is, out into international waters as well as into the waters of the United States itself.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If I may I should like to ask the minister a question. Three weeks ago I placed a starred question on the order paper concerning the number of air sampling stations which have been added to the national surveillance network following passage of the Clean Air Act and particularly pertaining to the subject which is under discussion today. There has been no answer. Can the minister give the House any assurance concerning whether there has been a stepping up of the surveillance system or whether we may soon expect an answer to this question?

Mr. Davis: The surveillance system is being expanded. Additional monitoring stations are being installed. I do not have the statistics at hand but I will try to expedite an answer to the question.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to say I find it rather odd that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) made the speech he did in the General Assembly a short time ago and the speech in support of this motion in the House today in view of the stated declaration of policy in the government white paper on defence issued under the name of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) just a few weeks ago. I would like to say more about this if our time were not limited because there would seem to be a contradiction between the policy of one government department and another.

I wish to commend to hon. members an article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram of October 7 under the authorship of Lubor J. Zink. This article emphasizes the very point I should like to bring out, namely, that there is a contradiction of policy. Members may laugh, but let me tell the House that a few weeks ago we received the white paper issued by the Minister of National Defence which contains the following statement:

> The only direct external military threat to Canada's national security today is that of a large-scale nuclear attack on North America—It is far from being the theoretically ideal means of maintaining peace, but the government, while continuing to participate in the arms control deliberations, remains convinced that there is nothing to replace it at present. Therefore, Canada must do what it can to ensure the continued effectiveness of the deterrent system—
> From a potential enemy's point of view, however, North America can only logically be seen as one set of targets. Canada's centres of population and industry logically form part of the major target plan for a strategic nuclear attack on North America—
> The government concluded in its defence review that co-operation with the United States in North American defence will remain essential so long as our joint security depends on stability in the strategic military balance. Canada's objective is to make, within the limits of our resources, an effective contribution to continued stability by assisting in the surveillance and warning systems and in the protection of the U.S. retaliatory capability as necessary. Co-operation between Canada and the U.S. in the joint defence of North America is vital for sovereignty and security—
> This over-all co-operation strengthens the U.S. retaliatory capability, and hence deterrence.

Without going further into that, I should like to say I appreciate the concern of members of the House in all parties as well as the concern of the Canadian people with regard to the Amchitka underground nuclear test. I share that concern. I believe the main reason for our concern is the potential use of nuclear power as a weapon of war. Let us examine the history of the atomic bomb. We know the bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki ended a war. However, the lesson which mankind apparently failed to learn from this event was that these same bombs made it abundantly clear that we must not have another war, particularly between countries that possess atomic weapons. If mankind is to survive and if the governments of the world are sincere in their search for everlasting peace, then their goal must be to abolish war, not just one weapon.

Some historians have stated that total universal disarmament and abolition of war are impossible. Nevertheless, I believe that all governments have no other choice. They must strive to seek some solution to outlaw military conflict entirely. Since 1918 I believe all reasonable people have been against war. In the years between the first and second world wars we made the mistake of believing that we could abolish military conflict by refraining from preparing for it. Unfortunately this approach, as history on many occasions has proved, was not shared by Adolph Hitler, the head of the German government of that day. These facts were revealed to all the world from the testimony of the German generals at the Nuremberg trials. It was because Britain, in particular, was so weak defensively that Hitler was prompted to start his offensive against the world. In other words, it was anticipated by Hitler that because of his modern war machinery there was no power on earth strong enough to deal with an all-out offensive by his forces. He made the assessment that no country had forces that could deter him in his goal of world domination.

I often think of the lives that could have been saved and the misery that could have been avoided if the British government had not been swayed by those who believed in unilateral disarmament regardless of the consequences. Britain at that time was considered a major world leader and as such had responsibilities, one of which was assurance to the smaller countries, particularly those in the Commonwealth group, that she was capable and prepared to protect them against aggression from a hostile force. I suggest the British government of that day either ignored that commitment of protection or at least underestimated its capabilities to produce the defence it had guaranteed.

We have been told that because of the arguments put forth by pacifist groups against rearmament and the waste of public funds on defensive measures, the British government was pressured into adopting defensive policies that were totally inadequate and to a large extent responsible for the world disaster that took place during World War II. After the events that took place during that period of our history, many governments were faced with the reality that, so long as there are hostile forces on the world scene, the only way to prevent war is to maintain equal if not superior military strength.

In the interval between the end of World War II and the present, we have not reached an acceptable solution to outlaw or prevent war. I believe the existence of a deterrent force during this period has prevented a major universal nuclear conflict. So long as one major power on the other side, be it Russia or China, has nuclear bombs and the means to deliver them, then the western nations must also have them, as a deterrent force. Surely the Cuban affair would confirm such a thought.

The American press informs us that the Amchitka test is important because it will be the only one made to test the Safeguard anti-ballistic missile system warhead. They also say cancellation would be read by the Soviet Union as a sign of weakness, possibly indicating that the United States is not serious about developing the anti-ballistic missile. The Soviet Union fired off a three-megaton device underground a few days ago and the U.S. test is a necessary response if the Americans are to bargain for a strong position when the strategic arms limitation talks resume at Helsinki in November.

What we in Canada must decide is, are we against just one tool of war, the nuclear weapon, or against war itself? Whichever way we decide, we must face the realities.

This House can pass all the pious resolutions or motions it wishes, and the government of Canada can make all the self-righteous protests it wants, but the fact remains that the world's dominant nations will not be listening. Under the present circumstances we are powerless to materially change the present battle for nuclear supremacy which is taking place between the world's major powers.

I believe it is about time this country stopped pussyfooting. It is about time we stood up and were counted. Either we want freedom enough to fight for it, or we do not. It is about time we made it perfectly clear we are either pro-Communist or pro-democracy.

Because of the actions of this government during the past several years, no nation is sure of where we stand. There is no doubt in my mind that the United States of America is the champion of those things which we as Canadians wish to preserve: individual liberty, political freedom, the rule of law, and democratic government. Surely no Canadian can equate the United States and the Communist colossus equally in terms of Canada's interests.

There is an unpleasant mean-spirited theory current today in this country that we can have our cake and eat it too, that is, that we can enjoy all the benefits of having a guardian without doing anything to help him. Some promoters of this theory go even farther; they would even hold his arm when it is raised to ward off a blow. This criticism of the United States defence plans is part and parcel of a recent and most unsavoury national stance that Canada has adopted since 1963 when the present government came to power. Those Canadians who sincerely wish to see national freedom and individual liberty preserved have no other choice but to stand or fall with the United States. If our own history means anything to us and if we are in any way grateful for the protective umbrella under which we are now and have been living, then we should desist from destructive criticism and from the petty nagging implied in this motion put forward by the government.

It may be that there are some Canadians who look to the day of a communist triumph. This may be the reason why no official protest was forwarded by our government to other nations when it was made known that these nations were preparing nuclear tests. If those of you in this Parliament are sincere and wish to impress the world with the sincerity of your opposition to nuclear testing, then I suggest you begin in a positive way by banning the production of all uranium within your borders. If, on the other hand, the government is using the sincerity of some hon. members on this topic for political gain or some external scheme, then it is more corrupt and dangerous than I would have believed.

Recent press reports inform us that our Secretary of State for External Affairs espoused in the General Assembly of the United Nations the cause of Communist China and complained about nuclear tests. They further stated that the Canadian minister called for an end to nuclear tests and became the first western spokesman to point the finger at the United States and the Soviet Union.

Many Canadians, as well as the people of other free countries, are wondering why he did not point the finger at other nations, such as France and Mainland China, who were known by him to have programs of a similar nature. Was he protecting Canadian uranium interests or were the countries he failed to mention preferred customers whose involvement he did not wish to disclose? We are entitled to an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member but I interrupt him to bring to the attention of the House that the hon. member's time has expired. He can complete his remarks with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My impression was that there was not unanimous consent. Perhaps I might inquire again whether there is unanimity to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have heard that there is not unanimous consent, so the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, as one who has been interested in the issue of nuclear tests on Amchitka for a long time, in fact as the one who first raised it in the House as early as July of 1969, naturally I am very pleased to speak today in support of the motion before us. I wish to thank and congratulate the House leaders of all parties for the successful negotiations leading to the debate today in which members have an opportunity to express their views on the lunacy of further nuclear testing by those countries described in the resolution as the nuclear powers.

I can fully appreciate the position taken by some members, particularly the hon. member who has just spoken, who sincerely feel and believe that some of us are always ready to jump on the United States for its transgressions but remain silent when some other country such as Mainland China or the U.S.S.R. indulges in similar actions.

That is one reason why I am pleased to support this all-party motion, and I hope it will pass unanimously. This motion avoids pointing a self-righteous finger at the United States alone but instead condemns further nuclear testing by any country as a threat to the human existence on this planet.

But the Amchitka blast is of urgent and pressing consideration. Understandably enough, the concern is most emphatically expressed on the west coast of both the United States and Canada, notably in British Columbia and Alaska, but I might add that Japan is a good deal closer to the test sight than is Vancouver and the Japanese are equally concerned about the test, and so are many private organizations and even American government departments.

The reasons for this opposition are, of course, fairly well known. There is the threat of earthquakes and tidal waves triggered by this five-megaton blast predicted to register at least seven points on the Richter scale, a system for measuring such explosions or earthquakes. The Atomic Energy Commission in 1969 admitted the dangers of explosions of such magnitude in a pamphlet issued in that year.

It said:

> The Amchitka test area merits special attention because it is located near one of the earth's most seismically active regions. Inasmuch as earthquake mechanisms are not completely understood, no absolute statement can be made about the possibility of triggering an earthquake of large magnitude in this area.

People are also concerned about the $190 million cost of such a risky explosion to test a warhead which has already been declared by United States defence experts, or at least by some of them, as an obsolete part of the United States ABM weapon system. There is also the threat of contamination of the environment through nuclear leakage into international waters, which could poison the seabed for centuries. Finally, and most gravely, there is the contribution to the nuclear arms race that such a test will stimulate in the other nuclear countries at a time when the strategic arms limitation talks or SALT talks are progressing.

These reasons seem greatly convincing to me, and I hope they will be equally convincing to the President of the United States who is solely in charge and completely alone in deciding whether or not this horrible device is to be detonated. His is an awesome responsibility.

I have it on excellent authority that seven secret American government department reports on this topic were submitted to President Nixon of which five, including a report of the U.S. Department of the Interior, opposed the Amchitka detonation. Efforts to get copies of these reports by American elected officials such as Senator Mike Gravel of Alaska have been frustrated completely. Americans are continuing through court injuctions, appeals by elected officials and other interested people such as environmentalists and by other means to oppose the Amchitka test. I hope that this debate today will assist these Americans in persuading President Nixon to decline approval for the trigger to be pulled.

• (12 noon)

What we are discussing today is an issue so important to the future of life on this planet that our present problems of unemployment and other serious issues facing Canadians, as real as they are, shrink microscopically in proportion to the question of human survival that is before us. I am prepared, on the invitation of Senator Gravel, to go to Washington next Thursday with a few backbenchers from all parties—three have already agreed to accompany me—to support and assist in any way I can the American opposition to the proposed test.

I am pleased that we in this House have at least had an opportunity to discuss and debate this issue fairly fully with the co-operation of all parties. It is an issue that has grown in magnitude through the initiative of many Members of Parliament, again in all parties, and through public representations over the period of two years or more since we first raised this question until the point we have reached today.

I also hope that all appeals and especially the appeals of west coast school children will not go unheeded and that the President of the United States will listen and decide against the insanity of continued nuclear testing and, as the head of the world's major power, as the head of a state which is probably our best friend, best customer and best protector, decides that nuclear testing must be stopped and that Amchitka would be an excellent place at which to stop it.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think it is extremely significant that the majority of the members who hope to be able to participate in this debate today are from the west coast. The fact that the proposed Amchitka blast is to take place on the Pacific rim is of deep concern to all west coast members, indeed to all the people living in the state of Alaska, in the territory of the Yukon and in the province of British Columbia.

I know, Sir, that the short remarks I am going to make will be made on behalf of every Member of Parliament from the province of British Columbia. We have discussed the matter sufficiently over recent weeks, regardless of our party affiliations, to be assured that each of us has done something and each of us is diametrically opposed to the proposed nuclear test at Amchitka. If other hon. members from British Columbia, on either side of the House, do not speak on this issue today it is merely because duties have taken them elsewhere and because the matter has come before the House today with some suddenness.

In the last analysis, and with the greatest respect to some of the remarks made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), I think that to a large extent the general public is becoming weary of delays in the progress with regard to the banning of nuclear testing. I think that the failure of the major governments to agree has left the peoples of the world constantly living in an atmosphere of insecurity, regardless of how remote nuclear warfare might be.

It is now 20 years since Hiroshima and Nagasaki. All of us remember the absolute terror created by the devastation of atomic bombing. The horror of the picture of what took place at that time, is still with us despite the fact it is now 20 years since that event. It is contrary to all the instincts of manking that this type of activity should ever be contemplated again, but as long as nuclear testing continues the possibility remains.

With the greatest respect to all the diplomats in the world I think that the peoples of the world are fed up with "diplomatise", excuses, constant rationalization and constant suggestions that if they do this we might do that, and if we do that they might do this. I think this is very much brought home to us by the new generation which last week in British Columbia peacefully paraded in the streets showing their pacifism and how deeply concerned even they are about this furtherance of nuclear testing.

The news that the Amchitka blast may be set off is a drastic setback to the cause of peace. Regardless of how one looks at it, it is contrary to all common sense and it is contrary to all moral sense.

I appreciate the argument put forward by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh). It is the argument we have heard for so many years. It is the argument that leaves us still under a cloud of possible annihilation. The concept that this nation should stand and fall with the United States, is in my opinion, a concept conceived in nonsense and nurtured in possible destruction. We should always stand or fall with mankind, but regardless of what the Americans do we must do whatever we can to stop them when we think they are wrong, and the same with the Russians, the Chinese, and any other nations that pursue this course.

Apart from that concept, and apart from any environmental damage that might be caused by this blast, as set forth by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis), or the remote possibility of earthquakes or whatever may result, apart from all that I think that if President Nixon proceeds with this program it will be disastrous for the relationships between Canada and the United States. It will certainly be disastrous for those relationships on the west coast. There will set in not necessarily a hatred, not necessarily a violent anti-American reaction, but a very deep resentment, the kind that exists when your best friend has betrayed you. The good will that has been built up for almost a century with the American people will be destroyed completely.

Economic differences between Canada and the United States can be resolved. We may be resentful of what they have done but those differences can be resolved. We can survive economically. We can see their position on Viet Nam even though we do not agree with it, and it does not build resentment up among us. But for them to be indifferent to the survival of mankind because of their own nationalistic ends will leave in the people of the province of British Columbia the deepest possible resentment. It is true that the Russians are going to do testing and have done so, and also the Chinese. But we do not expect much from them. We never have. But from the United States we expect appreciation, and we expect moral evaluation, and if this test goes ahead we will not get it.

With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it can be suggested that the white paper put forward by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), in which he says we will co-operate with the United States, means co-operation to the extent of annihilation. Of course we will co-operate with the United States. Of course we realize our common interests and common destiny, but if they are going to go ahead with the destruction of the ecology and fiddle around with the whole destiny of the human race we are not going to stand idly by and co-operate. That is the time when co-operation ceases and resistance should begin.

In that connection I am very satisfied that the people of British Columbia, certainly the people I represent who are most concerned, are properly concerned. I think they have protested in every conceivable way that could be said to be peaceful protest, and I am beginning to wonder when peaceful protest may stop with regard to actions of this kind if the United States does not react appropriately. I am quite satisfied, too, that the Members of Parliament from British Columbia in all parties have done what they can. Certainly we have all wired President Nixon, we have all spoken to Americans on the embassy staff as and when we could. The last step which the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) has suggested is a good one, but one wonders how effective it might be.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs is to be commended for the stand he has taken. The suggestion that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should go to Washington is somewhat futile when one considers that the government, not one member of it, speaks for this nation. We should not endow the Prime Minister with some greater power than the government because he does not have it although on occasions the opposition accuses him of having it.

This debate should terminate with the unanimous adoption of this resolution representing the views of all parties, and certainly the Secretary of State for External Affairs should see to it that the United States ambassador, as a special favour to this nation, draws it to the attention of the President of the United States immediately and personally.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take a little different tack as I start my remarks and I am sorry that the member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) has left the chamber. I hope he really does not believe that sneering at what he called "diplomatise" is very relevant in this debate. It was George Ignatieff of Canada who at the Geneva Disarmament Conference was able to have the Soviet Union and the United States accept most features of a draft treaty presented as an alternative to a treaty that those two superpowers tried to foist upon the nations that make up that conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I do not think that the cause that most of us apparently espouse, the end of nuclear testing, is helped if we allow ourselves to denigrate the real and extraordinary work done in Geneva in the last couple of years.

Ten minutes is ample time in which to express a view about the proposed underground testing of a nuclear device at Amchitka and to say that I am against all nuclear weapons testing, no matter what the excuse. As a consequence I am very pleased to support this resolution. I know that in some quarters it is considered pious for Canadian Members of Parliament to express a view on a test that should not be made unilaterally when it affects the people of so many countries beyond the borders of the United States.

It seems to me that one of the troubles of the world today is that the meaning of words has become diminished because of the way that statesmen—to use a cliché—use them. Some years ago, with the signing of the test ban treaty, we thought the treaty meant what it said until we read the fine print and found that our bravos were really quite hollow because the fine print said that underground testing could continue.

I think the extremely clear statement made by the Minister for the Environment (Mr. Davis) on the leakage, I think the word was, from the Nevada—

Mr. Macquarrie: Venting.

Mr. Fairweather: I am afraid a poor lawyer has not the capacity to keep up with the language of nuclear testing but I am told the word is venting. Venting or leaking, it is an intolerable situation that any country in the world can explode a device which affects the people of other countries. It is a well known concept of common law that if I do damage to my neighbour, my neighbour has cause for action. But unfortunately there is no device by which innocent people of the world can bring an action against nations because we are still tribal people.

Surely the business of government should be that of safeguarding and fostering human life. Unfortunately the business of government has recently been preoccupied with death, with killing and being killed. Some people shrug and ask why they should bother with an issue like this when a decision has already been made. But the decision on Amchitka has not been made and I think we would abdicate our responsibilities as a concerned country if we did not make our voice heard loudly, clearly and unequivocally in Washington.

In the September 25, 1971, issue of Saturday Review that great citizen of the world, Norman Cousins, had a most interesting and helpful editorial entitled "Amchitka and Tribalism". I have not time to read it all nor would the House be interested in a long review of the editorial. However, Mr. Cousins does pose two or three interesting questions. One is, where do people turn for protection? They cannot very well complain to the United States since that government proposes to do the exploding if the decision is made. They cannot go to the International Court of Justice because unfortunately at this stage in the march toward civility that court only deals with disputes between nations. An added irony is that we are helping. One of Canada's officials is in charge of the conference to be held in Stockholm next year on the environment, but citizens of the world cannot go there to get any justice.

As the Minister of the Environment said, the pollution aspect of this test is one that concerns all of us. I should like to read to the House one paragraph of this editorial:

> Here, then, is the tragic flaw in the organization of human society. The ultimate need on earth is for the protection and preservation of life. Yet no workable authority exists beyond the nation. The nation arrogates to itself the authority and the power to decide what it does not only inside but outside its borders.

This is the great dilemma which I face and the frustration I have with the United States and other countries that explode nuclear devices and do harm to innocent people because of radioactive fall-out. There is no place for the citizen of the world to turn as the world is now constituted. The editorial continues:

> What it does inside or outside its borders may constitute, as the Amchitka test illustrates, a possible danger to other people and to the world environment as a whole. But there is no legal process by which such danger can be averted. In a larger sense, there is no legal process by which human destiny can be protected and served.

Those who know Norman Cousins know that he has tested the conscience of man during this generation. I think the challenge he has put before us is exemplified in how man is able to respond. In Geneva Mr. Ignatieff and other officials are responding in a positive way.

I share the views of those hon. members who hope that President Nixon will be apprised of this debate and will take cognizance of the views of those people in the world who would be directly affected by a decision that he alone can make.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, rarely in this House has there been such a degree of unanimity on an issue. Today we have heard members of all parties express their opposition and concern about the pending nuclear test at Amchitka.

What is this test at Amchitka? Canninkin is the code name for the largest underground nuclear test ever conducted by the United States. The blast would have the force of five megatons, the equivalent of 5 million tons of t.n.t. or 250 times the power of the bomb dropped at Hiroshima. It is planned, as hon. members know, for an area which is geologically unstable.

• (12:20 p.m.)

The suggestion has been made in this debate that there is a pressing American necessity for proceeding with this test. They suggest that there is virtual unanimity in the United States regarding the desirability of this test. But this view represents an utter distortion of the actual position.

There is substantial American opposition to the pending test, to the credit of many enlightened friends in the United States. The hearings which have been held in Alaska brought forth the fact that there is great opposition to the test. Indeed, only those with a special interest in defence seem to be pressing the alleged need for the test at present. Let me quote to the House the views of a spokesman for the Federation of American Scientists, the outstanding scientific group in the United States:

> Jeremy J. Stone, director of the 2,000-member Federation of American Scientists, claims Cannikin was conceived by the AEC in 1966 under President Johnson to test the Spartan missile, an anti-Chinese missile defense system. However, Mr. Stone contends, the Nixon administration in early 1969 revised the ABM program to have the defense of Minuteman ICBM's against a Soviet threat as its primary purpose, with the defense of cities from a China attack as a supplemental program. "There now is ample reason to believe that a majority of the U.S. Senate will not support an anti-Chinese ABM," he says, adding that the Spartan missile isn't necessary in the ICBM defence system.
> "Basically," Mr. Stone argues, "Cannikin is a bureaucratic oversight—an experiment that has been waiting to be cancelled."

The suggestion made is that the project has been tied up in military bureaucracy for a number of years and there is now no rational basis for proceeding with it.

Other testimony developed at the Alaska hearings indicated that the defence department of the United States has announced an intention to develop an improved Spartan with a warhead of much lower yield. The improved Spartan is designed to give the Safeguard system a greater ability to intercept submarine-launched missiles as well as intercontinental missiles. Many defence planners believe, according to testimony given, that in essence there is nothing important which the basic Spartan can do that the improved Spartan cannot do better.

It is really difficult to come to any conclusion except that certain military planners in the United States want to proceed with the test merely for the sake of going ahead with it. The events which may have provided justification for the test at one time have now passed. We are particularly concerned in the Canadian northwest with this United States proposal for testing at Amchitka. Our view in no way should be construed as one that would tolerate, on the other hand, nuclear testing by other nations. All testing poses a danger to man, and it is fallacy to suggest that any part of the world can remain immune from the effects of testing, be that testing atmospheric or underground.

In 1969, when I was with the Canadian delegation at the United Nations, I had an opportunity to serve on a committee which reviewed the report of the United Nations Scientific Committee set up to determine the effects of nuclear radiation. The UNSCEAR Committee was formed in 1955. It is made up of scientists of many nations. Canada, the U.S.S.R. and the United States have representatives on the committee. Despite major differences in the ideologies of the countries represented on the committee these scientists agreed, on the basis of scientific evidence which they had collected, that even underground testing poses the risk of environmental pollution. These scientists from all over the world expressed concern about the possibility of brain damage to unborn children resulting from radiation.

They warned that severe damage to the nervous system can be caused by radiation, whatever the source of that radiation may be. They pointed at the real danger of severe mental retardation in these unborn children. Exposure to radiation may result in an increase in the number of chromosomal aberrations, they say. These aberrations, we are told, are clearly of genetic importance and may in fact comprise the major component of the genetic damage resulting from radiation exposure. World scientists are engaged now in the process of checking the findings gathered thus far, findings which indicate that the very chromosomes which decide the future genetics of mankind and the ability of man to survive are affected by nuclear radiation.

According to a report recently issued by Professor Ernest Sternglass, professor of radiation physics at Pittsburgh University school of medicine, the deaths of 400,000 children in the United States and 100,000 children in Britain had resulted from nuclear tests in the mid-1960's in the United States and Britain. He estimated that 10,000 die with each megaton detonated in atmospheric testing.

In the face of this kind of counsel by world scientists, what has been the Canadian government's actions? I would remind those who are critical of the Canadian government's position that no nation has spoken out more vigorously against all nuclear testing than this nation and no government has spoken out more vigorously than the Canadian government. On many occasions the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has made representations at the Geneva Disarmament Conference, at the United Nations and at the intergovernmental level. He has expressed the continuing Canadian concern and opposition to nuclear testing on the part of any nation in the world. This opposition has not been restricted to testing by the United States; it has been extended to and includes other nations.

Some critics suggest that the Prime Minister of this country has remained silent and has been unwilling to make any representations in this field.

Mr. Brewin: Who has suggested that?

Mr. Perrault: They either do not know or neglect to observe that on October 17, 1970 the Prime Minister said:

—the whole problem of nuclear testing is being discussed and Canadians are saying things and the government and its representative in Geneva are talking very much about this. We have advanced certain means—if we can agree to the prohibition, for instance, of underground testing. We have advanced certain Canadian devices which will permit to police this prohibition. Therefore we are very much concerned with it—

Then he commented about the Amchitka Aleutian test and said that we object, using these words:

—some people rightly or wrongly think that there would be a direct menace to the lives on the west coast.

The Prime Minister then went on to say:

We have taken the position that we want a moratorium on testing; we want the countries of the world to stop their testing. We have added support to the strategic arms limitation talks. We have encouraged both the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A. to get on with them. We have participated actively in all the discussions on nuclear bans in Geneva. We are a member of the 18-nation disarmament conference. We are as active as we can be in them, but we cannot yet dictate policy to the countries which are proceeding with these tests. But we are a signatory, as you know, to the non-proliferation treaty and we are trying to get other countries to sign it—

That shows just some of the efforts made by the Canadian government in recent months and years. Clearly, this government is opposed to testing in any form on the part of any nation in the world. We have provided this kind of leadership because we are convinced that the future of mankind is threatened not only by underground tests at Amchitka but by tests conducted by other nations including the Soviet Union, the People's Republic of China as well as by the atmospheric testing carried out by France.

We are all concerned about the possible effects of nuclear radiation. No one can feel complacent about nuclear testing, and it does not matter who does the testing and what form the testing takes. The pending Amchitka test is just as deplorable as the Soviet tests which were undertaken a few days ago. The sooner the people of the world make known their absolute opposition to testing by any country, the better will be the chance that battered mankind will be able to survive. It is gratifying to see the unanimity in the House at this time on this question.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, there are two particular reasons why I wish to add a few words to the discussion today on the resolution before us calling for the halting of nuclear tests in general and the cancellation of the Amchitka underground nuclear test in particular. My first reason stems from the fact that I have recently returned, along with other hon. members of the House, from Washington. We went to one of the national parks of the United States and spent a whole week in an intensive appraisal of the operation of the United States national parks system. During the course of that week we had the opportunity to participate in discussions with the top people in their national parks service. These people are dedicated to the preservation in perpetuity of natural beauty in an unpolluted state in some of the choicest areas that lie within the boundaries of our neighbouring country. We also had an opportunity of meeting with members of the National Advisory Council on Parks, a very interesting and important body of citizens in the United States. We had discussions with the heads of all the great voluntary national conservation organizations in the United States, organizations comprised of thousands of citizens.

As a result of that experience I am much more aware than I might otherwise have been of the fact that literally millions of President Nixon's fellow citizens are today hoping and praying that he will see fit to cancel the Amchitka test. They will be encouraged and happy because of the fact that a motion in the terms now before us is being discussed in the Canadian House of Commons. This is one reason why it is most fortunate and opportune that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has today brought forward this motion for discussion and, hopefully, unanimous endorsation, by the Canadian House of Commons.

I am not going to attempt to cover the ground that some of the previous speakers have covered with regard to the broad issues involved in nuclear testing, underground or otherwise. In speaking as they have in this chamber today they have spoken not only on behalf of all Canadians, not only on behalf of citizens in other places throughout the world, but have also voiced the sentiments that I know are held by many millions of citizens in the country to the south, our closest neighbour, upon whose executive head has been placed the responsibility of deciding whether this test will be carried out.

My second reason for wanting to say a few words is that, if there are immediate disastrous results from this test should it take place, it is my constituents who will be in the first line of fire. I have a very vivid recollection of the events on a certain Easter weekend not many years ago. As a result of a natural earthquake in Alaska and the tidal wave resulting therefrom, many citizens and many communities in Comox-Alberni suffered disastrous effects. The present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing), who visited the area shortly afterwards as a member of the Canadian government, can confirm what I am saying. The memory of that situation is still very fresh in the minds of the residents of Comox-Alberni who suffered from the effects of that tidal wave.

Many reputable scientists have said there is a possibility that the effect of this underground nuclear explosion in the proportions which are contemplated could directly or indirectly trigger another earthquake or tidal wave. When the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) spoke earlier he suggested that the possibility of direct earthquake effects is remote. The advice he has received may very well indicate that this is the case. I certainly hope this is so. He did indicate there is a possibility that there might be a resulting tidal wave. This is one of the reasons why my constituents in particular are gravely concerned about the possible results that may flow from this underground nuclear explosion if President Nixon does not cancel it. My constituents in particular are hoping and praying that they will not be subjected to an avoidable tidal wave. We recognize the fact that we live in one of the more unstable geological regions of the world and that there is always the possibility of a major earthquake and tidal wave which may affect us. However, we feel it is complete insanity for man to accelerate or increase the possibility of that kind of event taking place.

We also recognize that the other pollutant effects to which the Minister of the Environment referred briefly, if they affect Canadians, will affect us as quickly and probably with more impact than any other part of the country. This is further reason for our opposition to this event taking place. It is further reason why the residents of Comox-Alberni, almost to the last individual, are completely in support of the resolution introduced today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We all recognize the fact that the decision is not ours. We realize that this motion is only an expression of opinion. However, I hope the remarks that have been made by the members who preceded me and who have gone into various aspects of the matter will be an indication that we have seriously assessed this question from many sides. I hope that through the appropriate channels the discussion we are having today in the Canadian House of Commons will be brought to the attention of the President of the United States and that he will give it proper weight in his consideration leading to the decision which he has been asked to make by the Congress of the United States.

I hope this resolution will be passed unanimously and that shortly there will be an announcement which will enable us all to breathe a little more freely.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we have not seen today how much virtue there can be in short speeches. We are nearing the end of two hours of debate but even so we have heard almost every aspect of this question canvassed and canvassed very thoroughly. Ten minute speeches have been the rule and I believe that as a result those who have taken part have concentrated their thoughts more closely than usual and have, frankly, made better speeches than they would have made had they used 20 or 30 minutes. I intend to attempt to use less than ten minutes, possibly only five.

• (12:40 p.m.)

It is not my purpose to attempt to cover ground which has been so ably covered by speakers on both sides of the House. I wish to deal only with one small aspect of this matter which I have not yet heard raised during the debate. I believe it strengthens the decision which this chamber is, hopefully, about to take unanimously. I should like to raise the question whether the proposed blast at Amchitka would not constitute a violation by the United States of the nuclear test ban treaty. I want to read a section of this treaty, paragraph (b) of article I. For the sake of clarity I will have to read paragraph (a) first. It states:

1. Each of the Parties to this Treaty undertakes to prohibit, to prevent and not to carry out any nuclear weapon test explosion, at any place under its jurisdiction or control.

(a) in the atmosphere; beyond its limits, including outer space; or underwater, including territorial waters or high seas; or—

This is the significant section for my purposes:

—(b) in any other environment if such explosion causes radioactive debris to be present outside the territorial limits of the State under whose jurisdiction or control such explosion is conducted.

The section continues, but the foregoing is the significant point, Mr. Speaker.

The blast at Amchitka will in all probability cause pollution of ground water at the very least and it is almost inconceivable that this contaminated water will not extend beyond the three-mile territorial limit of United States waters. It is inconceivable upon the evidence—and I refer now to the figures given earlier by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis)—if there is leakage into the atmosphere as occurred in 67 out of 230 tests in Nevada, one out of every four, that this contamination would not be carried in the atmosphere into Canada.

The United States is not, of course, the country most grievously at fault in this matter. The Chinese and the French have been detonating in the atmosphere itself and we know from our pollution readings that when they do radioactivity increases in the Canadian skies. But those countries are not signatories to the test ban treaty. The United States is. I suggest there is a serious question to be raised as to whether the United States, if it proceeds with the Amchitka test, would not be in violation of the treaty it has signed.

There are others, Mr. Speaker, who wish to be heard in this debate. I shall take my seat in a moment. I hope Parliament will express itself unanimously in favour of this resolution. Perhaps parliamentarians of other nations will also speak up as this Parliament is doing and speak for the people of the world. I trust that our voices will be heard and heeded. I thank hon. members for their attention.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need say anything on the substance of the debate. I believe the views which have been expressed have all been directed toward one end, namely, to confirming that this motion is one which deserves support generally throughout the House. And I presume the motion will shortly be passed. I am hopeful that this matter might well be disposed of before one o'clock in order that when we return at two o'clock we shall be able to carry on with Routine Proceedings.

I wish to bring only one other point to the attention of the House. I do not think the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was deliberately in error, but I think some credit should be given to the Official Opposition for their co-operation on this occasion, something of an impasse having been reached on finding ways and means of bringing this motion before the House in a form which would provide an opportunity for the expression of opinions. Our party did agree to forgo one opposition day, a day which would normally be ours, in order that this time could be so spent. If I may say so without partisanship, that is something of a sacrifice when one considers there are so many opportunities of usefully spending opposition days.

The House has initiated a debate on this matter. We hope it will be concluded and that the motion will secure the support of hon. members.

Mr. Sharp: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the matter raised by the House leader for the Progressive Conservative party, I know the hon. member shares my view that it is desirable to have evidence of the very strong support which is being given on both sides of the House to this motion. I would suggest that the vote might be taken as soon as we reassemble at two o'clock. This would not be more than the two hours which had originally been allotted. I should like, for example, to have the Prime Minister here and I am sure he would wish to have leading members of this party present in the House when the question is decided.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We would agree to this. Perhaps if there are no more speakers at this point we could call it one o'clock and take the vote when we come back at two o'clock.

Mr. Baldwin: I wonder how the question can be put. Is it the intention that there should be a recorded vote? None of us knows that. Maybe the question might be put, and then we could reassemble at two o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion now made is that the question be put at this time and, if there is to be a formal vote, hon. members would reconvene at two o'clock for the afternoon session and the bells would be allowed to ring and members would be called in for the vote. Is this the way in which we should proceed?

Mr. Deachman: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, at this moment there are a number of people who are not in the chamber but who are within the grounds of Parliament and who will be here for the question period. I believe we would be better advised to leave the matter of the vote until after the lunch hour when we shall have a fuller House and a more expressive idea of the will of Parliament on this issue.

Mr. Speaker: There would have to be agreement then since, normally, as soon as a debate is ended the question has to be put. But if this is the desire of hon. members we shall call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to the agreement made prior to one o'clock today the Chair will now put the question on the motion which was under debate this morning. All those in favour of the said motion will be please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Mr. McIntosh: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried on division. Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURCHARGE—REPRESENTATIONS FOR REMOVAL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the United States has granted an exemption from the 10 per cent surcharge to various nations that are exporters of textiles in return for certain concessions, is the government confident that the Canadian case with respect to exemptions has been put forcefully and eloquently enough by the Canadian government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I realize that this is the first question of the question period and that I should not be too difficult procedurally, but it does seem to me that the question might be rephrased and put in another way. The hon. member is asking whether the government is confident that a position has been put in a satisfactory way. A question asked in those terms invites the expression of an opinion, and I am wondering whether it should be accepted. As I said, I do not want to be difficult so perhaps the Prime Minister might be allowed to reply.

Mr. Baldwin: The Chair said you might be allowed to reply.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says I can try to answer. I think there is a bit of confusion in this question. There is no indication that the United States has made any concessions to the Japanese beyond those they made to Canada a long while ago. The lifting of the surcharge is conditional upon these textiles and other items going on quota. As hon. members know, though perhaps not the hon. member, there is no surcharge on our goods going to the United States on quota.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURCHARGE—POSSIBILITY OF BILATERAL DISCUSSIONS FOR REMOVAL—MORE FORCEFUL REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADA

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, apparently the Prime Minister and I are not ad idem; as usual, he is a little distance behind. May I ask him a very simple question. It now having been established that the United States will conduct bilateral discussions with other countries regarding removal of the surcharge, will the Canadian government not step up its efforts and, in the language of Mr. Speaker, rephrase its request to the United States and make it more forceful and eloquent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will continue to make our representations to the United States. Once again so far as the premise of the question is concerned, the hon. member should realize that from the very outset there was toward Canada this kind of bilateral exemption of many Canadian goods from the United States surcharge. The Japanese have not been as forceful and persuasive as we because they have taken several months to reach the stage that we reached in a week.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURCHARGE—FAILURE OF PRIME MINISTER TO NEGOTIATE DIRECTLY WITH PRESIDENT NIXON

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that has been put in different ways to the Prime Minister, but in view of what happened last night he might like to answer it. Since the Prime Minister has neither telephoned nor written personally to the President of the United States, would he advise the House and the country why he will not seek direct contact with the President and, as Prime Minister of this country, try to negotiate with the President a better deal for Canada, as has been done in the past?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am really overwhelmed by the confidence that is repeatedly expressed in me by members on the opposite side. I am certain that this will lay to rest forever the charge that it is I, rather than they, who is working toward a presidential system. They should know that under the parliamentary system when relations between countries are normal, exchanges and representations are made at the highest level between ministers responsible for foreign affairs. Therefore, we have made representation to the United States at the very highest level in contacts between the two countries. If the opposition want me to embark on types of personal diplomacy toward the United States, once again I can only thank them for approving of the type of personal diplomacy which I thought was valid in relation to other countries, but which did not seem to have their wholehearted endorsement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF VISIT TO CANADA OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would share the diplomacy and tell us whether there is any merit in the suggestion that Canada urge upon the President of the United States that that gentleman make a visit to this country before visiting the USSR and mainland China or would he tell us when it is expected that the President will visit Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have no firm dates yet, but the United States government let it be known to us they would seek a visit sometime in the first half of next year, I understand sometime in the spring. The dates have not been firmly set up, and I do not think anyone knows yet whether it will be before or after Mr. Nixon visits Peking and Moscow.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one more supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North on a supplementary, and then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

ALLEGED FAILURE OF PRIME MINISTER TO TALK DIRECTLY TO PRESIDENT NIXON

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope you do not take this as argumentative, but in view of the answer could the Prime Minister now explain to the House and the country why he contacts directly heads of state of other countries but not the United States, such as the USSR and others.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member should really recall that the first head of state, so far as I can recall, I did contact by a personal visit after my election was the President of the United States of America. Now, the fact I have also visited the Premier of the USSR a couple of years after that, is surely vindicated by the fact that the President of the United States is now saying he is going to do the same thing.

UNEMPLOYMENT—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER THAT AN AMOUNT IS NECESSARY FOR HEALTHY ECONOMY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Was the Prime Minister stating government policy at his noon hour press conference when he indicated that a certain amount of unemployment is necessary for a healthy and growing economy, and can he say what level of unemployment he thinks would achieve this purpose.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I understood what I think I understood the question is based on a false premise.

ENTRY OF WOMEN INTO LABOUR MARKET—REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER EXPLAIN REASON

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary to the Prime Minister in respect of his noon hour speech. He expressed concern that women who, up to this point, apparently have been satisfied to play bridge and carry on works of benevolence have suddenly got it into their heads to join the labour market. Would he be willing to make an early statement concerning the reason for this sudden change, whether it is economic or merely the result of whim or the effect of the media upon women.

Mr. Jamieson: They can't stand their husbands.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the Minister of Transport really got in ahead of me. I was going to say that I do not object to making a statement but, in this particular case, I am at a loss to be able to explain why the women want to get away from their husbands at any particular time of life. I have no particular explanation for it but I am embarked on a case study now which might bring some light to it.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF ALLEGED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING REASONS PEOPLE SEEK WORK

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary for the Prime Minister as a result of his press conference at noon. Would the Prime Minister care to clarify his statement to the effect that people are saying, when surveyed they are looking for work, for religious, philosophical and ethical reasons. Did the Prime Minister mean that they are not really looking for work.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some doubt whether questions of this nature, in respect of a press conference which took place outside the House, which go from sentence to sentence and which could be commented on for 40 minutes, are in order. However, the Prime Minister may wish to reply to this question. It seems to me there might be other questions other hon. members might like to ask.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question itself surely translates a very curious misconception. When I say people are doing things for philosophical or religious reasons, obviously I do not mean they are not really doing things. I am surprised at the hon. member's suggested philosophy that when people do things for religious purposes they really do not mean it.

POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER SELECTIVE TAX CUTS TO ASSIST LABOUR INTENSIVE MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the corporate tax cuts announced yesterday were across the board, are further selective cuts to be introduced to assist labour intensive manufacturing industries.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I knew this would happen, but not on the first day. No matter how many tax cuts we announce, I am sure there will always be on the next day representations from the opposition that we should do more somewhere else. The answer is no, not today, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been commenting on opposition tactics. In light of the fact that the government has now adopted the oppsition's proposals, I would think he might be a little more careful in his statements.

POSSIBLE TAX INCENTIVES TO STIMULATE PURCHASE OF CANADIAN EQUIPMENT AND MACHINERY

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, of course we are trying to focus in upon the point at which there is need in this country at this rather sad moment. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to introduce special investment tax incentives to stimulate purchases of Canadian equipment and machinery.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member suggests we have overlooked an important area while his House Leader says we have adopted their own measures, so perhaps they should get together.

CORPORATE TAXES—CONTRADICTION BETWEEN GOVERNMENT PROGRAM AND BILL C-259—POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF BILL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be able to help the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the statement made last night and Bill C-259, which is still before the House, are contradictory in that one would cut the taxes of corporations and the other would increase them, is the government going to withdraw Bill C-259?

POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF INDIAN COMMUNITIES IN ECONOMIC INCENTIVES PROGRAM—DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is any special attention being paid by his department or by other government departments to the inclusion of Indian communities in the benefits under the economic incentives program announced last night.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the Indian reserves have been included in the government program in the same way as other municipalities of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could advise the House if these efforts are being made through his department or through other departments or both.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF NUMBER OF JOBS PROVIDED BY NEW GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. How many jobs does the government estimate will be provided by the program that was announced by the Finance Minister last night involving $1 billion.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I suppose it would be possible to make some rough calculations of the number of jobs affected by these measures, but how many jobs will be created and how many people will change their jobs to take new ones I cannot say and I do not think I can obtain the figure.

NUMBER OF JOBS PROVIDED BY NEW PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ESTIMATE BY DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Would the Prime Minister consider tabling the estimates for employment which would have been provided this winter in the absence of the program announced last night by the finance minister which would be prepared by the economists working for the Department of Finance?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO WHEN ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROJECTS WILL BE MADE AND BY WHOM

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): My question is for the Minister of Public Works and it is in connection with the announcement made last night regarding public works programs. May I ask the minister whether he expects that the Newfoundland portion will be announced before, say, October 28.

In view of the fact that the minister is not replying, may I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might try asking another question. I doubt that he should ask a supplementary question to the first one.

Mr. Bell: May I ask, then, whether these announcements of the Newfoundland public works will be made by the minister's colleague, the Minister of Transport, or will they be made in the usual way by the premier of Newfoundland?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): May I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I do not have any resentment with regard to the matter; I am only sorry that since there is not a Newfoundland member on the other side of the House they have to fall back on the New Brunswickers.

Mr. Bell: May I say on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that there was to be one Newfoundlander here every day, but unfortunately that gentleman is sick today.

REPRESENTATIONS TO PREMIER KOSYGIN REGARDING POLITICAL PRISONERS IN UKRAINE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): My question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In Winnipeg the Prime Minister stated that certain representations will be made to Premier Kosygin regarding the treatment of political prisoners in the Ukraine. Before the premier's visit, will the Prime Minister inform the House what those representations will be?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I told the group which I was meeting that if they made certain representations on which we agreed verbally, then I would transmit them to Premier Kosygin. If they do transmit these representations to me, I will have no objection to making them public, but for the time being I have not received them and therefore I cannot speak of them.

ALASKA HIGHWAY—MEETING IN WASHINGTON TO DISCUSS UPGRADING

Mr. Robert Borrie (Prince George-Peace River): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister advise the House when we may expect the second meeting of the American and Canadian officials to deal with the upgrading of the Alaska Highway?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): The second meeting took place in Washington on Thursday of last week. The results were not as optimistic as I had hoped.

HEALTH

CIGARETTE ADVERTISING—DISCUSSIONS WITH INDUSTRY REGARDING TERMINATION DATE

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence I was going to put it to his parliamentary secretary, but I do not see him here either at the moment. Perhaps someone opposite might take notice of the question. Actually, it is a question which I tried to ask yesterday as a supplementary question to one asked of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs about misleading advertising. This is the question I want to ask of the Minister of National Health and Welfare: can the minister indicate what is the status or progress of the talks which I understand are going on between representatives of his department and the cigarette industry with regard to the termination date of cigarette advertising. I hope someone will take notice of the question.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SALARY INCREASES FOR MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES—REQUEST FOR DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I have a question for either the Minister of National Defence or the President of the Treasury Board. Is it the intention of the government to increase the salaries of members of the armed services, and does the government intend to increase them by 18 per cent retroactive to October 1970?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): The question of the pay and allowances for the armed forces is now being considered, and I hope to make an announcement within a month.

Mr. Coates: Could the minister indicate when the announcement will be made?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I hope to be able to make an announcement within a month.

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—DIFFERENCES BETWEEN FEDERAL AND QUEBEC PLANS—SUGGESTED MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND MR. BOURASSA

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Recognizing the difficulties between the Quebec and Ottawa governments with regard to family allowances, and as the Quebec premier indicated yesterday that he was willing to discuss the matter personally with the Prime Minister, can the latter tell us whether he is ready to take it up with the Quebec premier, and when could he do so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have absolutely no objection to personal negotiations, Mr. Speaker, but we felt negotiations were making good progress between the officials and the ministers; as I trust them implicitly, I should prefer the talks to continue at that level. But if the Quebec premier wants to deal with me personally, I am quite agreeable to that.

THE CANADIAN MINT

POSSIBLE RELOCATION IN WINNIPEG

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): My question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the minister's statements in Manitoba, can he tell the House if and when the new Canadian Mint will be located in Winnipeg?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): I have advised the House before that no decision has been reached concerning the location of the new facilities for the Mint.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is for the Minister of Supply and Services apropos the $50 million that was allocated last night to municipal bodies for works in the immediate future. Since the federal government has direct control over this, would the Minister of Supply and Services use his good offices to see that Saskatchewan gets perhaps more than its share because there was another situation over which we had no control—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please; that is a representation, not a question.

TEXTILES—REPORT OF COMMISSION ON SKIRT MANUFACTURING

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Gamelin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

We have now reached the middle of October and, some two weeks ago, the minister told us that a policy would be announced or at least that a report from the Textile and Clothing Board would be presented at this time. Can the minister give us any information on that?

THE "CANADIAN"—ALLEGED REDUCTION OF CONSISTS—ADEQUACY OF ACCOMMODATION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him whether he has looked into the matter of the reduction of consists of the CPR train "The Canadian" taking effect today, and would he report to the House as to what the situation is?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I understand that at this time of year it is normal to change the consist of a number of trains. I would draw to the attention of the House that the requirement is that the number of cars be adequate to the traffic operation, but I will obtain more details and inform the hon. member.

Mr. Benjamin: May I ask the minister whether, in view of the fact that the consist will now be made up of one sleeper from Montreal to Vancouver and one from Toronto to Vancouver, which is not adequate in the opinion of many, the minister would take a mean pill and make representations to the CPR on behalf of the government requesting a larger consist of this train for the rest of this year.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It may not be adequate but it will be cosy, and I will be glad to make these representations.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You took the wrong kind of pill.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Prime Minister. Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have to say that the suggestion of the minister is the one which I would want to repeat today.

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Were the winter works programs announced last night developed after first having had consultation with the provinces and/or the municipalities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, consultation will take place and indeed has taken place. When the minister was speaking yesterday evening I believe he indicated—but perhaps he did not—that his officials already that afternoon had contacted the departments of the treasury of all provinces and had told them we wanted to meet with their officials as early as possible next week to explain the details of the program to them as they affect the provinces and municipalities. I believe that now they are trying to arrange such a meeting for the middle of this coming week, to be followed some time afterward by a meeting of ministers of finance.

Mr. Ryan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It was part of the minister's announcement that there would be this meeting, but my question is concerned with what happened before that. Were there consultations with the provinces and/or the municipalities before this announcement was made, and did they approve of the federal government's initiative?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. The House knows that we have too much respect for the parliamentary system to consult with provinces on a budgetary measure of this kind before making it known to this House.

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—METHOD OF ALLOCATING FUNDS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Will any limits be placed on the amount granted to a province for assistance to municipalities, or will this be done on a first come, first served basis until the funds are used up?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this fund will be apportioned according to a rather complicated formula involving many factors, one of which, of course, will be the rate of unemployment in various parts of Canada, the need—and especially the possibility—of getting ahead with the work as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the minister can reply briefly to the question. The hon. member has invited the minister to say what action has been taken by his department over a period of time. That question should normally be answered by a statement on motions. As I say, I hope the minister can reply briefly.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows he cannot ask a question in those terms. He can ask whether action is being taken, but for a member simply to ask whether a communication has been received by a minister is not sufficient.

Mr. Skoberg: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the communication having been received by the Minister of Transport, can he say whether he is going to allow ample time for the Canadian Merchant Service Guild to make representations to his department?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since I suspect the hon. member had a hand in writing the question, perhaps he can also lend me a hand in writing the answer.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I think I said in answer to an earlier question today, our representations to the Americans cover a very wide area. Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to indicate when the government will announce its policy with respect to the many rail line relocation projects which have been under study for some time in respect of a number of Canadian cities such as Regina?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Not an actual date, Mr. Speaker, although I am pleased to advise the House—and I seem to recall having made reference to it a few days ago—that a substantial contract has been awarded for a study in Winnipeg which is now under way with the agreement of all parties concerned and is designed to arrive at a national program for all such projects. I would think this project would be completed during the current year.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS FUNDS FOR INVESTIGATION OF PROJECTS, ADVANCES FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-193, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) moves motion No. 1 as follows:

That Bill C-193, an act to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, be amended by deleting line 9 on page 1 thereof and substituting therefor the words "five members".

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, before discussing this amendment I have what is probably a question of privilege in connection with the obligations of the government to file the annual financial statements of Northern Canada Power Commission. The financial statements of the commission are prepared to the end of March each year, and by the laws of the country the government is required to table these financial statements each year. This year, the current financial statement of the commission was tabled on October 8.

In addition to the tabling requirement there is a requirement that the report receive certification by the Auditor General. Quick reference to the document tabled in this House on October 8 will reveal that because of the highly unsatisfactory state of the commission, the Auditor General withheld his approval of the financial statement.

The financial report that should have been filed normally consists of a breakdown, by plant, of the operating expenses of the plant and of the income received as a result of its operation. In the document that was filed on October 8 that statement is missing. During the last three years I have had to write to and call officials in the department and in the commission. I wanted them to produce that independent station-by-station breakdown which they are required to keep under the provisions of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act. I submit that the station-by-station, or plant-by-plant breakdown is part and parcel of the financial statement of the commission. Since it was not available, the Auditor General withheld certification of the document that was tabled on October 8. That was one of his reasons.

My question of privilege resolves itself to this: the commission, or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) through whom the commission reports to Parliament, has not complied with the law as set out in the Northern Canada Power Commission Act and has not tabled the financial statement that the law requires to be tabled.

We cannot debate intelligently requirements under the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, the legislation which the government is trying to amend, unless the existing law is complied with. One provision of the act, as I have said, requires each plant in the system to be self-sustaining. We have no way of knowing whether plants within the system are self-sustaining unless an individual, plant-by-plant breakdown is tabled as part and parcel of the accounts of the commission.

Information required by law to be tabled in Parliament has been withheld from Parliament. That omission, in my submission, ought to be rectified immediately before we continue this debate. The withholding from the House of information which is required by law to be tabled by the minister, any government official or government agency, constitutes a breach of the privileges of this House. That information has not been made available.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think the report was duly tabled in the House. I must add that the reports brought in by departments and Crown corporations are still dealt with by the Public Accounts Committee, and each year the committee's report is submitted and may be considered. I do not know exactly what the hon. member is talking about. Furthermore, he has not given me notice to the effect that the question would be raised. I think that within the committee we could give the necessary explanations, but this question is not at all relevant to the consideration of the bill at this stage, the report stage.

I do not think that this question of privilege is in order.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to the hon. member's presentation, and although he may have a grievance I do not think the matter can be brought under the umbrella of breach of parliamentary privilege. The hon. member submits that the minister or someone on behalf of the government is in breach of the law in that there has been a failure to file a document.

Although I appreciate that any such omission may complicate the consideration of a piece of legislation before the House, I do not think it can be considered to be a breach of parliamentary privilege which can give rise to a motion and the referral of the matter to a committee. Even if that were the case, I suggest to the hon. member that the matter which is before the House would still be before us and we would have to consider the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I do not think I can be of much assistance to the hon. member with regard to his suggestion that the matter be considered by way of breach of parliamentary privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: With great respect, perhaps Your Honour's lack of knowledge of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, the government's amendments now before us and my amendment has prevented the Chair from appreciating the full import and seriousness of the omission in this case. Each year so far the provisions of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act have been complied with. A full and complete financial disclosure has been made and the commission's financial statement has been tabled. This is the first year in which the commission and the government have departed from that course.

There is no way for us to debate this bill intelligently, in light of amendments before the House, unless we are given the type of information that I hold in my hand. This information was tabled last year; it is part of the financial statement. It is entitled "Northern Canada Power Commission statement of income and expenses for the year ended March 31, 1970". This is a three-sheet breakdown of income and expenses, by plant. We cannot intelligently consider the amendments before the House unless the current information is placed before us and the minister is prepared to table it immediately. Only if that is done can I and others wishing to participate in this debate compare the information on an annual basis. If the information is not made available immediately, I am prepared to move the adjournment of the House until such time as the minister brings it foward, as he is required to do by law.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, there is to my knowledge no provision in the law for the chairman of the Commission to produce a statement of those expenditures—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member and to the minister that the point has been made clearly. I am not saying that the hon. member for Yukon does not have a point and I did not wish to disagree with the hon. member when he suggests that the Chair does not understand the situation. Such a suggestion has been made before and I do not deny the hon. member's right to repeat it.

The hon. member has the right to certain recourse if he thinks a matter cannot be proceeded with intelligently and logically. I have in mind that there is perhaps only one logical recourse of which he and other hon. members may avail themselves when a matter is difficult to proceed with. When such difficulties arise, very often an understanding is reached among representatives of the parties as to the possibility of postponing consideration of the bill. If no such arrangement can be reached among the parties, I see nothing wrong with the course of action contemplated by the hon. member for Yukon.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, that question of privilege should be addressed to the House without notice. I am told that I should table that report. I do not object, but I am not the chairman of that corporation. Also perhaps the hon. member should have had the courtesy to tell the House that he had asked the chairman of the Commission for the information he wanted to have, and that he received it yesterday.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, only 20 minutes or half an hour ago the government deigned to inform the House that the bill before us would be the first item of government business. As for the minister's arguing that he is not the president of the corporation, that argument bears little weight. We know that. Nevertheless, he is the minister responsible for the commission.

Mr. Chrétien: We have nothing to hide.

Mr. Nielsen: He is the minister responsible for the actions of the commission and he is the minister through whom the commission reports to Parliament. I have an alternative suggestion to make to the minister, because neither I nor anybody else on this side of the House has any wish to impede the progress of the business of this House. Since the information must be readily available in order to have an intelligent debate on this subject, since it has always been made available in the past—the law requiring it to be made available—and since the Auditor General has refused to certify certain documents because the information has not been made available, I am prepared to suggest to the minister that he should adjourn the debate until such time as this information is brought to him by his officials.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this bill is before the House and I am ready to proceed with it. We have nothing to hide. The hon. member has certain information. If he wants to use it, he may do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Yukon has the floor.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, in face of the truculence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) I see no alternative. He says he has nothing to hide. Then why was this information not tabled, as the law requires? Why did the Auditor General not certify the accounts of the commission? Something is wrong. We will not know what is wrong until we get the plant-by-plant breakdown. And when we get it, I know what we will find wrong. We will find that the commission has been in breach of the very law by virtue of which it exists. One provision of the act requires that eery plant be self-sufficient. The commission will be wrong, because the only plant in the system that is making huge profits—and we know that reductions are being applied as is required—is the one that exists—

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he should either deal with his motion which is before the House or take some other action. I would indicate, in all kindness to the hon. member, that in view of the fact that he already has a motion before the House he cannot move a second motion. If it is his intention to suggest there should be an adjournment of the debate, he should yield the floor to another hon. member who will have the opportunity to make such a motion. As the hon. member well knows, no member can have two motions before the House at the same time.

Mr. Nielsen: I intended to say that the only plant making a huge profit is at Whitehorse. It is the consumers there who are suffering because of this breach of the law. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That the debate be adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member failed to hear me. I said he cannot move another motion because he already has a motion before the House. It is not competent for him, procedurally, to move such a motion. If the hon. member has completed his remarks the Chair will recognize another member who will be given an opportunity to move the motion.

Mr. Chrétien: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I wish to inform the House of the facts. There is no requirement by law—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Chretien: The hon. member has received a copy—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Chrétien: He can table it if he wants.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is obviously a dispute between the hon. member and the minister as to the circumstances of this matter. That is not what is before the House at the present time. The hon. member for Yukon feels the matter is one which should be dealt with by way of a question of privilege. After consideration I indicated that is not the way in which it should be considered by the House. The importance of the matter, from the point of view of the hon. member, was brought to the attention of the House by a motion in the form suggested by the hon. member for Yukon. We should not have a debate on the aspect of the matter which is now being brought to our attention by the minister.

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a question of privilege which is quite separate from the other. I want to make it clear that my remarks thus far have not been on my amendment but only on the question of privilege and to deny categorically that I have received the 1971 statement, as has been asserted by the minister. I wrote for it some time ago but have not yet received it.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege which the hon. member has raised. If every member of this House who wanted to debate a bill did not like what was going on and moved the adjournment of the House, how could we make progress?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, in light of the discussion, which I will not repeat, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams):

That this debate be adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Baldwin: Four o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Because of the fact that we worked the staff rather late last night—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —and in view of the fact that there have already been discussions regarding the possibility of suspending the private members' hour, and since we are not now making very good progress and since we did something worth-while earlier today, I suggest we call it five o'clock.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the understanding that fatigue has gripped the opposition, I would be happy to call it five o'clock.

Mr. Baldwin: That is correct, Mr. Speaker; we are nauseated by what we heard last night.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir: I did not see you here this morning at 2.30, Allan.

Mr. Dinsdale: I rise on a point order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the House leader has called it five o'clock, I should like to extend an invitation to all hon. members to hear some good music in front of the Peace Tower. It will commence almost immediately. The staff band of the Salvation Army is playing there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: "Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast". It will pave the way for a good weekend.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): According to the agreement just made, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 3.43 p.m. the House adjourned, without queston put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 18, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO RIGHT HON. MEMBER FOR PRINCE ALBERT ON RETURN

Mr. Speaker: May I at the outset say how pleased all hon. members are to see the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker)—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —back with us and looking so dangerously well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION

ALLEGED MISREPRESENTATIONS IN TABLING OF REPORT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to request the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In the Votes and Proceedings of the House for October 8, 1971, No. 187, at page 864, under the heading "Returns and Reports Deposited with the Clerk of the House" appears the following purported record of a proceeding in this House:

By Mr. Chrétien, a member of the Queen's Privy Council,—Report of the Northern Canada Power Commission for the year ended March 31, 1971, pursuant to section 24 of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, chapter N-21, R.S.C., 1970, together with the accounts and financial statement certified by the Auditor General, pursuant to section 75(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970.—Sessional Paper No. 283-1-196.

Mr. Speaker, this entry contains two allegations intended to mislead this House.

The first allegation is a misrepresentation of the law. The report purports to be made pursuant to section 24 of the Northern Canada Power Commission Act. The report was not tabled pursuant to section 24: the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the officers of the commission violated the law by failing to file a return as required by that section.

The second wrongful allegation is a misstatement of fact. The Auditor General, an officer of this House, did not certify the accounts and financial statement of the commission pursuant to section 75(3) of the Financial Administration Act. On the contrary, he advised the minister:

Due to the continuing unsatisfactory condition of the records, I am unable to express an opinion as required by section 77 of the Financial Administration Act on the validity of either the accounts or the financial statements for the year ended March 31, 1971.

There also appear to be other violations of the law by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and by the officers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member knows, the purpose of this Standing Order is that all members may have the opportunity to move a motion in very special circumstances without the 48-hour notice normally required under the Standing Orders. The interpretation of this section is that hon. members have to indicate briefly why there is urgency and what the motion is. I suggest to hon. members and to the hon. member for the Yukon that the Standing Order does not make it possible for hon. members to make lengthy statements in support of a motion. I am sure the hon. member will want to take that into account and indicate as soon as possible what the motion is that he proposes for the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the only reason I felt that it should be a little more detailed than usual under Standing Order 43 was that two officers of this House were involved, namely, the Clerk of this House and the Auditor General. In any event, I had almost completed the sentence, the rest of it being—of the commission as detailed by the Auditor General in paragraph 131 of his report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1970. I therefore propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That the report of the Northern Canada Power Commission for the year ended March 31, 1971, deposited in this House on the 8th October 1971, as Sessional Paper No. 283-1-196, be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to inquire into violations of law by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the responsible past and present officers of the commission in their conduct and management of the affairs of the Commission; and, as well, to inquire into violations of the rules, practices and conventions of this House with respect to the depositing of the said report in this House; and to report to this House, as quickly as possible, its findings and recommendations.

And that it be an order of this House that, pending the report of the committee and further order by this House thereon, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be suspended from the service of this House; and that this House urge the government to suspend the officers of the Northern Canada Power Commission from their duties in the Public Service and place the conduct and management of the commission under the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INDIAN EDUCATION IN NORTHEASTERN ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the escalation of the school boycott by Indian students in northeastern Alberta. The issue has been aggravated this past weekend by the supportive action of another reserve, bringing the total number of students now being withheld to 1,600. This action, if allowed to continue, may very well escalate into a province-wide walk out, since today the chiefs of 43 Alberta bands are meeting to discuss further courses of action.

In view of the minister's continued refusal to visit the reserves affected, and his failure to respond with any positive commitment to overcome the problems and difficulties which are being experienced, I propose to move—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member says that he is now going to move the motion. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members again, and to the attention of the hon. member for Vegreville in particular, that Standing Order 43 does not make it possible and does not entitle hon. members to make speeches, accusations and charges. The hon. member must realize that under the Standing Order there is no possibility for any member on behalf of another party or on behalf of the government to reply to the statement made under the terms of the Standing Order. I suggest to all hon. members that the Standing Order can be used only for the purposes of indicating the urgency of the matter, not to argue in support of the motion and that the motion must be put as briefly and succinctly as possible.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I was merely trying to outline the gravity of the situation and was about to put the motion. I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That the government take immediate action to appoint a mediator to investigate and examine all aspects of the situation with a view to recommending a satisfactory solution as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not and the motion cannot be put.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINES—GUIDELINES

Question No. 1,304—Mr. Barnett:

1. Within the guidelines laid down by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for a MacKenzie pipeline system (a) how many residents does the Minister estimate will be employed in the building of oil and gas pipelines (b) how many residents would be employed in continuing operations?

2. (a) What is the estimated cost of (i) a gas pipeline (ii) an oil pipeline through the MacKenzie Valley (b) will the government require that a percentage of the equity be raised in Canada and, if so, what amount in each case?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Estimates of potential northern resident employment of a gas and oil pipeline through the MacKenzie Valley are: (a) on construction, 800 to 1,000; (b) on operations, 150 to 170. Depending on the outcome of the studies there are possibilities of additional employment but until these studies are concluded, it is not possible to give an estimated number.

2. (a) It is estimated that northern pipelines may cost around one million dollars per mile; however, no firm estimate of total cost can be prepared until final design criteria have been prepared based on operating requirements, ground conditions, and environmental protection stipulations. (b) The Government guidelines on northern pipelines issued in August, 1970, indicated that the extent to which it is proposed by the applicants, Canadians should have an opportunity of participating in the financing and ownership of the pipelines, will be of particular interest to the Government.

ASSOCIATION OF CANADIAN AUTHORS AND COMPOSERS

Question No. 1,623—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. Is the Association of Canadian Authors and Composers officially recognized by the government?

2. Is this Association subsidized by the government and, if so, by what departments?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. There is no association known as Association of Canadian Authors and Composers. In the question, reference was probably intended to be made to the Composers, Authors and Publishers Association of Canada Limited, commonly referred to as CAPAC. The Composers, Authors and Publishers Association of Canada Limited is a performing rights society within the provisions of section 48 of the Copyright Act, R.S.C. 1970, chap. C-30.

2. The Composers, Authors and Publishers Association of Canada Limited is a private company with share capital, incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act and is not subsidized by the government.

Questions

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—INCENTIVE PROGRAMS

Question No. 1,650—Mr. Broadbent:

1. What programs of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources provide grants, subsidies and other cash incentives to private industry?

2. What amount was provided to industry through each program in each of the past five years?

3. What amount, by program, has gone to each of the five major regions of Canada in the same years?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. (a) Subsidies to the coal mining industry; (b) subsidies to the coking industry; (c) assistance to gold mining operators.

2. (a) Subsidies — coal industries: 1966-67, $37,698,975; 1967-68, $33,332,465; 1968-69, $6,510,792; 1969-70, $8,595,733; 1970-71, $5,939,251. RIDING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 1,705—Mr. Stewart (Marquette):

For the last twelve years what amount has been spent each year at Riding Mountain National Park in the following categories (a) maintenance and upkeep (b) improvements (c) administration?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development):

	1968–69	1969–70	1970–71
1. (a) Maintenance and Upkeep	861,386	771,441	805,289

(c) Administration	125,741	157,083	155,871

NOTE. The information requested prior to 1968–69 is not readily available and would have necessitated extensive research at prohibitive costs to the taxpayers.

JOB VACANCY SURVEY

Question No. 1,719—Mr. Blackburn:

1. What was the total expenditure associated with the development and the operation of the Job Vacancy Survey, in each of the fiscal years since 1966-67?

[Mr. Olson.]

2. How many full-time employees associated with the Job Vacancy Survey were on the payroll of Statistics Canada and the Department of Manpower and Immigration at the end of the fiscal years 1966-67, 1967-68, 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71?

3. What is the operational definition of a vacancy in the survey?

4. What is the first month in which results from the Survey were prepared?

5. How many vacancies were found in Canada and in the five regions in this first month and in subsequent months to date?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Manpower and Immigration and Statistics Canada as follows:

1. Fiscal Years	Statistics Canada	Department Manpower and Immigration	Total Dollars
1966–67	—	—	—
1967–68	289,254	—	289,254

1969–70	100	5	105
1970–71	99	7	106

3. The definition of job vacancies used in the present Canadian Job Vacancy Survey is a job: (1) That was vacant for the full reference day. (2) For which some specific recruiting action was undertaken during a specified time period. (3) That was open to workers from outside the establishment and (4) Was either immediately available or available at a specified future starting date.

4. June, 1970.

5. The data from the Job Vacancy Survey are being evaluated and prepared for publication. In the initial publication, monthly data for the period commencing June 1970 forward will be reported. Thereafter, the data will be reported monthly. Publication is scheduled to begin before the end of 1971.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA ACT

Question No. 1,747—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Is the government considering an amendment to the Supreme Court of Canada Act to solve the backlog of cases waiting to be argued?

2. Will such amendment require all civil appeals, regardless of the amount of money involved, to come before the Court first in the form of a motion seeking leave to appeal?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Consideration is being given to the best method of reducing the workload of appeals that is presently coming before the court and it is the intention to consult the Canadian Bar Association and other interested groups in this regard.

*CLEAN AIR ACT—ESTABLISHMENT OF AIR SAMPLING STATIONS

Question No. 1,750—Mr. Aiken:

1. Following passage of the Clean Air Act, have any new sampling stations been added to the national surveillance network and, if so, how many?

2. Are additional funds being allocated for the work of the air sampling program?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, new stations are being added continuously to our National Air Pollution Surveillance Network. This program has been accelerating since January, 1970. This past summer, for example, we have added stations in both Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland as well as the province of Quebec. Our coverage as of this date is 237 sampling instruments in 36 cities across all ten provinces. This reflects a substantial improvement over the situation on January, 1970 when the coverage consisted of 128 instruments, 20 cities, and seven provinces.

The answer to the second part of the question is yes. Additional funds are being allocated to the air sampling program as well as to the whole of the air pollution control program as a result of passage of the Clean Air Act. These additional funds will be reflected in supplementary estimates for next year and in the main estimates for next year as part of my department's environmental quality program.

ACADIAN CABLE T.V. LIMITED

Question No. 1,751—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Has Acadian Cable T.V. Limited a licence to operate a cablevision system in St. Stephen, Milltown or any other location in New Brunswick?

2. Was the company's application denied by CRTC and, if so (a) on what date (b) what steps does CRTC intend to take to compel Acadian Cable T.V. Limited to cease operations?

3. Is Acadian Cable T.V. Limited operating a cable undertaking without a licence contrary to the Broadcasting Act and Regulations?

4. Has A. Clayton Weatherby a licence to operate a cable undertaking in St. Stephen and Milltown, or any other location in New Brunswick and, if so, when was this licence issued?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission as follows: 1. No.

2. Yes. (a) Public Announcement dated March 5, 1971. (b) The CRTC is still investigating the matter.

3. The CRTC is still investigating the matter.

4. The CRTC issued a licence to Alexander Clayton Weatherby to carry on a broadcasting receiving undertaking to serve St. Stephen and Milltown, New Brunswick, on November 2, 1970.

NOVA SCOTIA—FORESTRY RESEARCH

Question No. 1,779—Mr. MacKay:

Has the Department of the Environment participated in silviculture projects in the Province of Nova Scotia and, if so (a) to what extent in the last fiscal year (b) what amount of financial assistance has been given that Province for forestry research and development?

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Environment): Yes, (a) The Department of the Environment has conducted or collaborated in fifteen active silviculture projects throughout Nova Scotia in 1970-71. This work involved the full or part-time employment of eleven professional and eleven technical staff of the Maritimes Forest Research Centre. (b) No direct financial assistance for forestry research and development has been made in 1970-71 to that province.

COMPENSATION TO SWORDFISH INDUSTRY OF CANADA

Question No. 1,805—Mr. McCleave:

Has a formula been agreed to with regard to the compensation to the swordfish industry of Canada and, if so (a) what is the formula (b) what consideration does the formula give to the plight of crew members?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Yes. (a) Vessels which gained substantial portions of their 1970 fishing incomes from swordfishing are being compensated on a 50-50 basis by the Governments of Canada and Nova Scotia in accordance with the following formulae: two-thirds of the new cost of overboard fishing gear which is exclusive to the swordfishing industry, and one-half of the new cost of on-deck equipment which is exclusive to the swordfishing industry. The Government of Canada is purchasing, at cost, stocks of Canadian-caught swordfish held by Canadian firms. (b) The compensation afforded to vessel owners, together with technical assistance provided by the two governments, will assist materially in re-equipping such vessels for participation in other fisheries, and thereby provide employment opportunities for crew members. The Canadian Government has also offered retraining assistance for crew members on request.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ASSAULT ON PREMIER KOSYGIN WHILE VISITING PARLIAMENT HILL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any statement to make with regard to the reported assault on Premier Kosygin on Parliament Hill and any report to make with regard to security arrangements or any explanation as to how this could have happened to a guest of the government of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot report on the latter part of the question. I have asked for a clarification of what happened in terms of the security arrangements. I was present at the incident. I can only say it was a most regrettable one and certainly a very humiliating event for Canadians to have suffered. It makes one ashamed at the way some Canadians or people in Canada seem to be more interested in problems elsewhere than in exercising Canadian democratic rights and respecting the basic laws of our country.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON ALLOCATION OF FUNDS AND CRITERIA TO BE USED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It is with regard to the local initiative program which will probably come to be known as LIP. I ask the minister whether the government is able now to announce the distribution of the $100 million which has been allocated for this program. In view of the fact that its primary purpose is to provide jobs for the unemployed, will the government use the same formula which it is using for the special loan development program or are other criteria to be used and can the minister tell the House what those criteria are?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the exact figures with me, but certainly the intention is to use basically similar criteria to those used in allocating the special development loan funds.

Mr. Douglas: Can the minister now or very soon give to the House the exact amounts which will be allocated to each province and can he tell the House whether there will be any allocation within the provinces on the basis of unemployment in specific regions?

Mr. Lang: I shall certainly look into the question of doing this. In the case of the local initiatives program there may be something in the nature of a preliminary administrative allocation. There may well be some flexibility depending on the type of applications which in fact come foward.

BASIS OF ALLOCATION OF FUNDS FOR SEWAGE TREATMENT PLANTS AND LAND ASSEMBLY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he can tell us the basis upon which the government proposes to allocate the princely sums of $4 million for sewage treatment plants and $1.7 million for land assembly?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply, but the hon. member will appreciate that the Chair has some reservations about the form of the question.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): These amounts are part of the total amount of $113 million which is an advancement of commitments that would normally have been made in the subsequent period.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—INCLUSION OF YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—AMOUNTS TO BE ALLOCATED

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration with respect to the press release on this subject which came from his department listing the approximate allocations to be made to each of the ten provinces but omitting the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Can the minister tell us whether the Yukon and the Northwest Territories will be included in the program and, if so, will he indicate the amounts to be allotted to them in the same way as he has done for the provinces?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Yukon and the Northwest Territories are included in the program.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister answer the second part of the question as to the amounts to be allotted to the two territories?

Mr. Lang: I will certainly do that, if and when I do the other.

GOVERNMENT PROGRAM TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT—NUMBER OF JOBS TO BE CREATED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether the government is yet in a position to give an indication of the total number of new jobs to be created by the program announced last Thursday night?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. It is very difficult to measure. A large number of jobs will be created as a result of the program, but I do not think one can tie it down to specific figures at this time. It would just be a matter of guessing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Could the minister at least tell us what the government's target is?

Mr. Benson: The government's target is to reduce unemployment in Canada as much as possible.

OLD AGE SECURITY—LOWERING OF PENSIONABLE AGE TO PROMOTE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the government is interested in creating new jobs in Canada, does it consider granting the old age security pension to 60-year old citizens as well as to their spouse even if they have not yet reached 60, in order to create new job opportunities for young people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that we have announced a $1 billion program. I would like to say that such a scheme is not included in the $1 billion program and that at the present time, we have no intention of doing so.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, would the right hon. Prime Minister be willing to add another quarter of a billion dollars, so that those elderly people might get the pension as soon as they reach 60?

Mr. Trudeau: Why should the leader of the Créditiste party be so stingy, Mr. Speaker. Why not another billion and a half?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

IMPROVEMENT OF DEPARTMENTAL OPERATIONS IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the reports of the Atlantic Development Council, the Rural Development Council and, more recently, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, which all agree that the minister's department is overly centralized, inefficient and aimless, can the minister tell the House whether some over-all action is now to be taken to reform his department's structures, goals and priorities, and whether a statement will be made soon?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, at least 50 per cent of the moneys allotted to my department were used in the Maritime provinces to create jobs, set up companies, develop the economy and help Devco. However, I wonder whether the hon. member wants to start a debate; I see no objections to it, but he certainly will not get a yes or a no for an answer.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: I wonder whether the minister is now prepared to answer the question I asked instead of throwing a red herring across the House. I asked specifically whether he is now prepared to respond to the recommendations of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council which charge that his department is aimlessly going about the business of regional development and that it is overly centralized.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): My reply was as narrow-minded and mean as the question of the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to hand the minister a copy of the APEC fifth annual review, since obviously the minister has not read it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was recognized for the purpose of asking a supplementary.

Mr. McGrath: More specifically, may I ask the minister whether he is prepared to assure the House that expenditures under his department will not be used to bolster the sagging Smallwood administration in Newfoundland during the next week and a half?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF AGREEMENTS WITH NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the minister now in a position to advise the House whether or not there are any agreements between the federal authority and the province of Nova Scotia which are ready for formalization by signature?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will inquire and answer the hon. member on Wednesday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: You said you would do that last week.

[Mr. McGrath.]

CANADA LABOUR CODE

RETENTION IN BILL AND STRENGTHENING OF MEASURES CONCERNING TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of certain reports may I ask the minister whether he has any intention of withdrawing from his bill relating to industrial relations the measures having to do with technological change, or is he, rather, planning to strengthen those sections and make them more along the lines of the Freedman report?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it would be inconceivable that any legislation brought in after 28 years would not deal with technological change and I have no intention of withdrawing those parts of the bill. When I tabled the bill in June I did, however, invite representations from labour and management, the purpose of which is to improve the bill. It is quite possible that some amendments may be introduced to that part of the bill, the basic objective being not to nullify the sections but to improve them.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LEGALITY OF GOVERNMENT FINANCED EXPERIMENT RESPECTING MARIJUANA—MORATORIUM ON PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. On October 14 I asked him whether his legal officers had looked into the question whether it was legal under the law of Canada for the government to offer $100,000 for students to use marijuana, hashish and other drugs for experimental purposes, and whether the minister had consulted his legal advisers in this respect.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have taken the matter up with them, but whether or not I would be free under the rules of the House to give a direct reply is another question.

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest respect to the Minister of Justice—I know he is hedging—I am not asking the minister for a legal answer. I am asking him whether he has taken the matter up with his legal advisers and is putting a moratorium on all prosecutions in view of the fact that it is illegal to carry on such experiments?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the part of the question I should like to answer is that there is no moratorium.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Justice given his personal endorsation to the spending of $100,000 on the use of marijuana and hashish by students and other young people?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is a question that I would be expected to answer since it concerns the administration of another department.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice. Have any arrests been made among personnel at the Experimental Farm for growing and possessing this illegal drug? If such arrests have not been made under the provisions of the Criminal Code, then under what law are they being exempted?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There have been no such arrests, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I asked the Attorney General of Canada an ordinary, straightforward question whether the government is permitting certain people in society to break the law and is endorsing the breaking of the law, while at the same time prosecuting other people for similar offences. Surely that is a question of privilege affecting every member of the House and every Canadian. We have seen lawbreakers on that side of the House before and they are breaking the law again.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LABOUR RELATIONS

POSITION OF ELDORADO STRIKE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I might preface my question, Sir, by saying that I was so touched by the reception by all hon. members that, having regard to my Welsh blood, if it had not been for the rules of the House of Commons I might well have burst into a paean of praise. My question today, therefore, will be unprovocative, as always.

I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question concerning the situation in Uranium City and the strike there at Eldorado Nuclear Corporation. What is the present position, has the strike been settled, and what is the government doing in this regard?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): In light of the fact that I have had the honour of having the first question by the right hon. gentleman since his return directed to me, my answer will be as non-partisan as possible. Last Friday, on the initiative of a member of the opposition, the hon. member for Meadow Lake, a meeting was held in Ottawa chaired by an official of the Department of Labour and attended by people from management and labour as well as the mayor of that community and the president of the Chamber of Commerce. As a result of that meeting I have been informed by my department that both management and labour now welcome mediation services of the Department of Labour. A mediator has been appointed and I imagine that negotiatons will resume as early as tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is all to the good, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister do everything he can to secure a settlement through the mediator because what has happened there is strangling business and destroying that very enterprising town?

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have already appointed one of our top mediators, Mr. Tysoe, from Vancouver, and if that is not sufficient then other means will be placed at the disposal of management and labour if it is found necessary. My instinct tells me that if both sides have the same consideration for the community as expressed by the right hon. gentleman a settlement could be arrived at very shortly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A Crown corporation should give of its best.

IMPERIAL OIL CONSOLIDATION OF PRAIRIE OPERATIONS IN EDMONTON—CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER ON IMPLICATIONS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday I asked a question concerning the consolidation of the Imperial Oil refinery plants in the Prairie provinces at Edmonton. I wonder whether the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is now prepared to answer?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I presume that when the hon. member refers to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration he means me. I have inquired into that case. There was no consultation with the department by Imperial Oil regarding the consolidation of the operations of the company at Edmonton. Four months ago an official of the company was in touch with the department in order to find out what kind of assistance could be given to the company in connection with its consolidation process. He was told that there was no incentive at all because Edmonton is not a designated region and, as the hon. member knows, refineries are not covered by the Regional Development Incentives Act. This is the only information we have.

The day previous to the announcement there was a meeting between my officials and officials of the department of the government of Saskatchewan. I do not know whether the government of Saskatchewan knew about the decision of Imperial Oil but the question was not raised.

Mr. Rowland: In light of the fact the minister has already pointed out that Edmonton is considered to be an area of rapid economic growth and Winnipeg and Regina are not, would the minister undertake to hold consultations with Imperial Oil with a view to seeing whether or not the consolidated plant could be located in an area of slower economic growth?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The only bargaining power I have as minister is to offer a grant when a plant is located in a designated region. I have no other power unless the hon. member wishes me only to intervene in order to discuss the company's decision to consolidate outside Saskatchewan, and this is an entirely different problem.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF SOME GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS TO NORTHERN TOWNS TO PROVIDE MORE VIABLE ECONOMY

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the recent announcement that a considerable number of federal civil servants and departmental officers are being transferred to Hull and in view of the report that the Minister of Supply and Services is endeavouring to have the Canadian Mint transferred to Winnipeg, would the Prime Minister give consideration in any further planning of decentralization to the transfer of some government departments to northern towns or cities in Canada which are one-industry towns in order to provide a more viable economy for those towns and also avoid the problems of urban sprawl?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): My first comment on the question is that certainly the first two postulates are disjointed and although the first one may be right the second, I believe, is apocryphal. Beyond saying that, I think that every party in the House has done its best to decentralize Ottawa's main industry, which is politics. I am sure that many of us are preoccupied with decentralizing Ottawa in that sense and perhaps creating urban blight across the country. But I cannot see how the solution proposed by the hon. member will solve the problem of centralized and decentralized administration. I could go on, but I think that is enough.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACHIEVING OF AGREEMENTS WITH U.S.S.R. DURING PREMIER KOSYGIN'S VISIT TO CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether it is the intention of his government that an agreement should be reached between Canada and the U.S.S.R. with regard to trade relations during Premier Kosygin's visit and, if so, when the House will be informed as to contents of such agreement?

An hon. Member: Have you any suggestions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously we will be discussing trade between the two countries but so far as I know there is no intention to sign a trade agreement, if that is the hon. member's question.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the intention of the right hon. gentleman that his government should reach any agreement with regard to scientific, technological or cultural matters with the U.S.S.R. during Premier Kosygin's visit and, if so, when will the House be informed as to the contents of any such agreement?

Mr. Trudeau: These subjects also are under discussion. It is conceivable that we might sign some general agreement along these lines, but the discussions have not proceeded far enough for us to make a report, even a progress report, to the House at this time.

TRADE

INCREASE IN IMPORTS FROM JAPAN—POSSIBILITY OF DUMPING BECAUSE OF UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): My question is for the Prime Minister. Statistics Canada has reported that imports from Japan rose by 26.8 per cent in the month of September. Is the government satisfied that Japan is not dumping goods in Canada because of the United States surcharge situation and, if not, is the government going to make a statement in connection with this matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We are watching this situation very closely and if there is any evidence of dumping we will act under our laws to prevent it.

Mr. Ryan: As recommended by the Canadian Manufacturer's Association, is the government speeding up investigation of suspected dumping activities of Japan and other countries as a result of the U.S. surcharge?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce the other day or the other week indicated that he has these problems under review and that if necessary he would take action, as I said in my previous answer would be done.

MANPOWER

TRAINING—REMOVAL OF REQUIREMENT OF THREE YEARS IN WORK FORCE TO ASSIST WOMEN AND YOUNG PEOPLE

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In order to assist the large number of women and young people now seeking employment, is it his intention to introduce legislation which will amend the occupational training act so that living allowances can be extended to people who have not been in the labour force for three years?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The first and immediate intention is to shape the on the job training programs which have most recently been announced in such a way that they will be available for people who are prevented from enjoying the benefits of the other program.

Mrs. MacInnis: Would this mean that women or young people, without having been in the labour force, could avail themselves of manpower training with allowances?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it would be misleading to simply answer yes because the matter of allowances may be the wrong emphasis since persons in on the job training may be receiving salaries at going rates within the area, with compensation to the employer for a large portion of that salary. The answer, in conclusion, is yes. Without the qualifications for the current training program the person can be put into an on the job training program and receive the benefit of it.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION—POSSIBLE APPOINTMENT OF EXTRA BODIES TO CLEAR BACKLOG OF CASES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs arises out of a suggestion made on Friday as recorded on page 8754 of Hansard. Will extra bodies be appointed on a temporary basis to the Canadian Pension Commission to deal with the several thousand cases of veterans which are backlogged behind the very good and non-partisan veterans legislation of this House?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the very generous amendments to the Pension Act of last spring it is true there is a much greater number of applications for pensions than before and it will take some time before this backlog can be processed completely. However, I wish to assure the hon. member that the full contingent of commissioners that can be appointed under the act have been appointed. They are very much aware of this backlog and are working with all possible diligence.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Can the minister advise the House what will be the rate of interest to be paid western farmers on moneys long overdue and owing them under the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would expect to be able to make an announcement very shortly about the exact amount which will be going to the Prairie farmers in the very near future, an amount which will include the interest referred to by the hon. member and also some adjustments in view of the time at which the Wheat Board has been able to make its final calculation with regard to the 1969-70 pool.

Mr. Southam: Can the minister assure the House that the rate of interest paid will be commensurate with that which the farmers themselves have to pay when they borrow money?

REQUEST FOR GRANT TO ESTABLISH CARDBOARD MANUFACTURING PLANT AT CABANO

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In view of the importance, for the population of eastern Quebec, of the establishment of a cardboard plant at Cabano, can the minister tell the House if the Société populaire des pâtes et papiers du Québec has applied for a grant to establish such a plant at Cabano?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I think the hon. member asked the same question about a month ago and I answered at that time that we had not received any application. I will check if we have since received one and I will be in a position to answer the hon. member within a few days.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have a supplementary?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I assume the request has been made.

May I ask the hon. minister whether he would, after perusal, be prepared to recommend that his officials give the matter special attention, so that a reply may be sent as promptly as possible?

FINANCE

POLICY RESPECTING EXCHANGE LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday on the program "Cross Country Checkup" the minister indicated that the economy today is much stronger than it was in 1961 because there is no danger of the dollar being devalued. Was the minister stating government policy? Is it his intention to maintain the Canadian dollar at par with the United States dollar?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian dollar is floating freely.

Mr. Baldwin: So is the government.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the minister use his customary capacity in respect of these matters to change the situation in view of the fact that there has been a drastic reduction in exports with resulting unemployment among Canadians?

Mr. Benson: First of all, there has not been a reduction in exports. Exports have been climbing. Second, we have not intervened in the value of the dollar since it was floated except to keep changes on a regular basis without having wide fluctuations.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the fact that the increase in exports is in the resource field, which is Canada's heritage, rather than in manufactured articles, would the minister take the necessary action?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

CANADIAN CULTURE

MULTICULTURALISM POLICY—AMOUNT OF FUNDS TO BE AVAILABLE AND CRITERIA FOR ALLOCATION—CONSULTATION WITH ETHNIC GROUPS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this question is addressed to either the Secretary of State or the Minister of State in charge of the citizenship branch, whichever minister is responsible. Would the minister consider making an early statement on motions spelling out the amounts of money that will be made available by the government to help develop the cultures of the minority ethnic groups, as announced by the Prime Minister about a week ago, the criteria that will be used in allocating the funds and whether meetings will be held with organizations representing the various ethnic groups to discuss the types of programs which will be undertaken by such groups?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, all these subjects are under active consideration. There certainly will be consultations with the various cultural and ethnic groups across Canada and there will be significant funds available to develop the program.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the great expectations among the various groups because of the Prime Minister's statement, will there be an early announcement concerning the type of programs and amounts of money available so that these groups and organizations can begin planning the kind of work they want to do?

Mr. O'Connell: Yes, this information will be available in due course.

DISPOSITION OF GRANTS TO PROVINCES FOR FRENCH LANGUAGE INSTRUCTION

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, this question is addressed to the Secretary of State. [Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): The answer is as follows. When it was agreed to refund provinces for the teaching of a second language or the official language of the parents' choice, provincial governments accepted to pursue some objectives. However, it was understood that after a full year, and when six or seven more months would have allowed us to get complete results of operations undertaken under the program, we would engage in a collective and detailed revision of measures taken and we would try to determine if grants really helped reach the objectives approved by the provinces at the beginning. We shall soon make this revision which, besides, was announced the moment the program was initiated.

PROGRESS IN DEVELOPMENT OF FUR FARM CENTRE

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. What progress is being made respecting the development of the fur farm research centre as a component of the national research centre?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the plan that the hon. member is aware of is still in place, but so far as the details of what progress is being or has been made, since the last time that he raised the question, I have sent an inquiry for that information.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I also have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate to the house the progress within his department on the effects of the 10 per cent United States import surcharge on Canadian agricultural products and if it is his intention to make a statement in this regard to indicate what assistance will be made available?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member will find it very useful to read the statement I made in the House on September 7 and then another one about three weeks later.

Mr. Coates: In view of the fact that this is not September—it is October—and I believe that there must be in-depth information available to the minister now that was not available to him then, I would like to know when we might hear about what action his department is going to take to assist agriculture?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The House has heard about specific action that has been taken with respect to some products, and there are other cases such as the assistance for potatoes. In that case a series of meetings was held last week attended by the Premier of Prince Edward Island and the Premier of New Brunswick, and as soon as a consensus is reached on what would be the most useful kind of program that too will be announced.

In light of that dreary statistic can he advise whether managerial, executive and professional persons and programs will be included in the in-industry training and retraining programs announced last week?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, at this stage I would have in a basic way, to take that question as notice rather than comment on it specifically.

Mr. Macquarrie: In light of declining job opportunities for professionals and other highly educated and skilled people, is the government preparing a national industrial development strategy as urged by the Science Council and others and, if so, will action be taken this fall?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the government has very significant industrial policies and many of the programs of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, are directed to developments of a high technological nature in Canada, which are useful in assuring jobs for the most highly skilled.

GREAT LAKES—POSSIBLE DELAY IN SIGNING AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the recent report that there will be a delay in the signing of the Canada-U.S. agreement for a clean-up of the Great Lakes, I would like to ask the minister if any delay is anticipated in signing the agreement and, if so, what is the reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm that there will be any delay. When I met Secretary Rodgers in New York a few weeks ago I asked him to look into the question because I was concerned about the implications of the recent decision concerning the use of detergents in the United States upon the progress of the program that they and we had agreed upon, and I have not yet had a reply from the United States government as to whether there will be any resultant delay. I hope there will not be any delay.

Mr. Harding: Are some terms of the agreement still to be negotiated and will the meeting of the water quality standards, set for 1975, be changed?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is our hope that the objective will not be changed. Of course this involves agreement with the United States, and I have not had any information yet that the objective has been changed by the United States. We continue to adhere to this as a feasible and, we hope, acceptable objective.

COMPETITION BILL

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION IN LIGHT OF DEVELOPMENTS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In light of recent developments, is the minister having another look at Bill C-256, commonly called the competition act and, if not, why not?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not a case of having another look. I indicated in late June, when the bill was introduced for first reading, that it was not the intention of the government to proceed with passage of the legislation this session but to invite suggestions on it. That is what I have done and we are now receiving suggestions. In so far as the suggestions are constructive and useful, they will be given very careful attention.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DESIGNATION OF DEPARTMENT TO IMPLEMENT WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I would like to know if the government has designated or intends to designate one department to implement that portion of the Benson bundle announced last Thursday referring to the winter works program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the terminology of the hon. member is quite within the rules, but I suppose the intent of the question is understood by the minister to whom it was directed. Perhaps we should allow the question to be answered.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the program is to be co-ordinated by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. That is the way it will be unbundled.

RESPONSIBILITY OF MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION IN RESPECT OF WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I wonder whether he will be responsible for any part of the program dealing with works, the creation of jobs and, if so, will the minister assure the House that he will consult with the Atlantic Development Council, other agencies in his department and APEC, and perhaps he might even consider consulting the Holy Ghost, who seems to be on the side of these agencies—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps I might rephrase my question and again direct it to the minister who does not seem to be plugged into the Holy Ghost or anybody else. Would he tell the House whether or not he has any responsibility for any part of the programs announced by the Minister of Finance, especially with respect to the works program and, if so, will he consult with the provinces?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, some programs will surely come under my department. They will undoubtedly be the subject of consultations with the provinces, which for that matter is what I do on a regular and systematic basis for all the other programs administered by my department.

[Mr. Basford.]

Inquiries of the Ministry

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON NATURE OF PROJECTS, AMOUNTS OF MONEY AVAILABLE AND FINAL DECISION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since the municipalities and private organizations will want to start work on employement-creating projects as early as possible, may I ask the minister whether he will be making an announcement to the House and the public regarding the nature of projects that will be approved, the amounts of money that will be available to each province, and where the final decision will lie, whether it will be with the local manpower offices to which applications will be made or will the applications be made to, checked and vetted in Ottawa?

Mr. McIlraith: You can expect an answer soon.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, very soon.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 13, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Boulanger in the chair.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate at this stage of the debate on the proposals for tax reform, I want to raise certain objections for the consideration of the Minister of Finance and his officials, I hope there is still time to correct what I believe to be an inequitable situation as it affects various aspects of community life within the constituency that I represent. My time is limited and I may have more comments to make later, but at the moment I wish to deal with one or two items in the hope that they may be elaborated upon when other members rise to speak.

There are many objectionable areas in the present proposal. In rural areas where farm incomes are low, not many farmers in the past have had to use chartered accountants to prepare their income tax returns. Over the years they had become accustomed to completing the forms themselves and were able to do so at a minimum cost. The present proposals with regard to evaluation day for property make things so complicated that farmers may find it necessary to turn to professionals for help. I can easily realize why the Minister of Finance would want to establish such a system. As an accountant himself, he has to do something for his friends and this is one way of giving them a little bit of the windfall he would have liked to have when he was in business. Of course, after this reform it may happen that he will be back in the accounting business himself.

I, personally, have strong objections to the concept of a capital gains tax. I realize that my party has come out for it to a limited degree. But many parts of my constituency are only 25 or 30 years old, and I do not believe this type of area will be best served by the introduction of a capital gains tax. Indeed, I think it will be a deterrent, a mistake, but I will not dwell too long on that aspect. I know that members of the NDP feel the capital gains tax does not go far enough. Of course, you cannot convince them that anyone who is in business is not a millionaire or a multimillionaire, that there are many people in business who do not make vast fortunes. For some reason the NDP feels that you must go after anybody who calls himself a company or a corporation.

In the end, I believe the people to be hurt are those who the government is professing to help. Let me examine one aspect which is very discriminatory as far as the farmer is concerned. The new proposals provide that a home on one acre of ground shall be exempt. This is fine for people living in cities and towns but when we compare a city home with a farm home is there any equity in this form of taxation? Certainly, there is not. Anyone who has ever looked at the real estate section of a newspaper realizes that city homes have appreciated in value, in fact, have skyrocketed. Many homes in Toronto and Vancouver are worth $50,000 or $60,000 but how many in the rural areas are worth that much? In the magazine section of the Ottawa Citizen last weekend, there was an article which pointed out that lots in the Vancouver area are valued at $15,000 to $20,000. But the Minister of Finance should consider that a home on a quarter section of land in the west might be comparable to a lot which is usually less than an acre. An acre of land within city limits could be worth as much as a million dollars but there is not much farmland that would sell for a million dollars an acre.

I know that the minister is comparing like with like, home with home or acre with acre but he is certainly not comparing value with value. I concede that it is always going to be difficult to have equity. In the west where land is divided by quarter section or section or in acres, any deed you hold is to land which has not been subdivided. A lot has been subdivided. In cities many homes of 50 years of age have and will appreciate because of the shortage of housing. In the country a home can cost $20,000 but because of a reduction in family size and the changing pattern of education as well as the deterioration of community life, large homes are no longer being built. The value of the home on the farm may go down, whereas the value of the city home goes up. That distinction must be drawn and the minister ought to consider it. After all, what can a man do with an acre of land? Is he to incur the legal costs of subdividing an acre?

It could be that a farmer has built at $15,000 home on a $10,000 parcel of land to which he has title. That is quite possible. In any event, consideration must be given to that parcel of land on which the farm home is built. In some cases, land values have gone up and homes have appreciated. It may be that land values will continue climbing. At the same time, I think that the suggestion I am making is a fairer and more equitable way of looking at this question. I realize that the minister is to allow annual depreciation of $1,000 against the home. At the same time, it must be realized that in many cases the farmer has to trade-off some of his land simply to stay in business. If the minister wishes to be fair, he will leave open to farmers the option with respect to that $1,000 annual depreciation in home value. In any event, the amount of revenue the government will lose in these cases will not be great.

In the few minutes remaining, I wish to touch on several other areas, including co-operatives. I have received representations in that regard. In also wish to touch on lumbering, which affects my area, and mining. There is one other aspect applying to farmers that I shall touch on. I wish to talk about the accrual system of depreciation. I believe the minister should allow either the accrual system or the straight-line system of depreciation. If he maintains that the accrual system should be used, he ought to realize that only in the first two years will the accrual system be of advantage to a farmer, and only if the farmer buys a new machine. That is, the system will bring advantages in the calculation of income tax. Yet I ask, how many farmers are in a position to trade their machinery every two years? Not very many, I suggest. Usually, if a farmer trades within two years, he has bought a lemon and wishes to get rid of it. In that case he will take a loss, anyway. If that farmer wants to remain efficient, and that is the aspect to which the government has failed to give consideration, he must trade his machinery when necessary. I submit that under the accrual system the farmer will simply delay trading his machinery. He will try to get as much out of it as possible in write-off benefits. Yet, if he holds on to his machinery for too long, his efficiency will suffer.

Look at it another way, Mr. Chairman. If a farmer has great sales in one year, he will certainly not trade his machinery in that year if he has at his disposal unused accumulated depreciation benefits, because that unused depreciation will be charged against his income tax if he trades. So, he must wait for a year in which his sales are low. That year, when he ought to tighten his belt, will be the only time he can write off the accumulated depreciation against income tax. Because of his low return in that year, he can use the unused portion of his accrued depreciation and write it off in that year. That is to say, he will have to add the unused portion of his depreciation to his income tax. That is what will happen under the accrual system. So, the farmer will not trade in the good year but must wait for a bad year. This approach defies all logic. Would any banker grant you a loan if you told him you have had a bad year? Would he not say to you, "What's the matter with you, man; get with it and tighten your belt. You should not take out a loan this year because you may have another bad year next year." Yet that is precisely the position the farmer will be in if the minister adopts the accrual system as against the straight-line system, as proposed.

The fact is that in farming income is typically low in relation to investment, obsolescence is rapid, inflation of farmers costs continues year after year, and more expensive and sophisticated machinery, equipment and structures have to be constantly introduced into the business.

The Federation suggests that the farmers should be allowed to retain the option of depreciating assets on a straightline basis. They go on to say, as recorded on page 7, that they believe farmers must:

Be able to maintain a separate bookkeeping on assets acquired up to December 13-71 on the present straightline basis, with assets subsequently purchased separately set up on a diminishing balance basis. . . . That capital gains if any, be calculated on the difference between disposition price and original cost or Valuation Day value, whichever is the higher.

I will go even farther than the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and suggest that either system ought to be allowed. One must realize that farmers have constantly struggled to maintain efficiency, and we should not deprive them of any leeway in that regard. Farmers, I think, have been fairly good businessmen over the years and have tried, whenever possible, to remain in business. I do not think that hemming them in under an accrual system will work to their advantage or to the advantage of the industry, as a whole.

Another aspect that I wish to cover, if I have time, relates to the basic herd concept. Mr. Chairman, it takes years and years to build up a basic herd. Yet you can dispose of that herd in one easy sale. All you must do is order a truck to pick up the herd and take it to market, and that is the end of your herd which has taken years and years to establish. The Federation of Agriculture deals with this. They believe that a herd should be treated as capital. I think there would be an advantage to farmers if the minister were to treat the herd as capital. As I have already pointed out, it takes years to establish a herd. Also, you can dispose of the herd in one easy sale. I realize that the averaging concept may come into play. Yet averaging could be useful for only four or five years if you have had a series of setbacks after a period of good years.

One must also consider the case of the farmer who, for reasons of health, must dispose of his cattle or capital. Possibly the farmer and his son have been working together, and perhaps the son has been doing most of the manual work. Perhaps the son finds that they cannot carry on the business, and they must therefore dispose of the herd. I think the minister ought to look at this matter on the basis of previously calculated income tax or on the basis of future income tax that may be calculated. I think he ought to consider the 20 or 25 years it may have taken to build up a herd of this type. The minister ought to take all this into consideration.

I now wish to touch briefly on co-operatives. Many people in my riding have had experience with co-operatives or credit unions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member may continue only with the unanimous consent of the committee. Is there such unanimous consent?

[Mr. Korchinski.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Korchinski: I thank the committee, Mr. Chairman. I will be very brief. I only want to deal briefly with the "co-op" aspect of the proposal. Many co-operatives have been established to service a local need. I agree with this concept. I have done my share of work in this field. I think the objection which is made by members of the co-operative movement with regard to double taxation is valid. Although the minister has introduced some amendments, the Co-operative Union of Canada does not think they go far enough to meet their requirements. Perhaps the minister may wish at this time or some time in the future to exempt the local co-operatives, since they serve a local need.

Some co-operatives have become large monopolies. They were established in earlier days to cut down on the unfairness and unethical practices of some individuals. They have served a need. Once they become large corporations, they are somewhat of a nightmare to many small businessmen in the communities. In some instances they speed up the day when small communities become depleted. Once communities are depleted, it is only through the co-operatives that any type of service can be maintained or sustained. At that time no enterpriser will go into the community because he fears he will lose money on the venture. Many co-operatives are established as a result.

In the interest of maintaining some form of service in the small communities, the minister should look upon co-operatives as small enterprises. They should be kept separate from the large enterprises. In so doing, the minister will meet some of the objections which the small businessmen have to the co-operative idea. At the same time, the minister must realize that we have to maintain the small credit unions in communities where the banks have failed to help the local businessmen and farmers. In cases where the banks simply refuse to make loans on the basis of past experience, the credit unions have often done so. The interest rate may be higher for that reason.

I will not take up any more of the time of the committee. I again thank the committee for having allowed me a few extra minutes. I may elaborate on these points at a later time.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I make no claim to having read every word of the 707 page bill which the minister has placed before us for consideration. I make no apology for that at this point because it seems that this mammoth bill is largely the result of the inconsistency of the government's approach to fair taxation. Had the government seen fit to put before this House the basic principles of the royal commission report, commonly referred to as the Carter report, we could have had a much less extensive and more readily understandable bill than the one we are considering today.

Mr. Mahoney: Would you have read it?

Mr. Barnett: However, the choice has been that of the government and this is the bill we have to consider. I rise this afternoon to deal with one aspect of the bill. The hon. member who preceded me touched on this aspect in his closing remarks. I will not attempt to take quite the same line of attack as he did.

I suppose other hon. members received, as I did, a letter from the Co-operative Union of Canada dated October 15, 1971. I wish to put the contents of this letter on record. The letter, addressed to Members of the House of Commons, reads as follows:

> Since we wrote to you on September 20th, the government has introduced amendments to Section 135 of Bill C-259 relating to the taxation of co-operatives.
> Co-operatives wish to advise you these amendments do not meet the objections of co-operatives.
> Co-operatives insist that the fundamental distinction in their nature be respected by the taxation statute. These distinctions are:
> (a) the co-operative provides primarily a self-help service required by its members.
> (b) the co-operative distributes its earnings to its members in proportion to member business.
> (c) the co-operative raises and "services" its equity capital by revolving the same in relation to the use of the co-operative by its members.
> (d) the capital contributed by a member of the co-operative is to provide himself with services and not to produce a return on investment.
> Co-operatives request that they be permitted to distribute the income from member business to their members as a patronage refund as is intended by their charters, bylaws and nature with no limitation. These distributions, of course, will be dealt with by the members in their personal taxable income in a manner similar to the distributions of the earning of a partnership to its members.
> Yours sincerely,
> W. B. Melvin, President, on behalf of Co-operative Union of Canada and Le Conseil canadien de la Coopération

As a member of this House, I say at once that I stand four-square behind the statement submitted by the president of the Co-operative Union of Canada. It is little short of disgraceful that a government which calls itself Liberal and sometimes expresses a desire for a free society in this country, should, by a taxation law, seek to twist and distort the basic freedom of co-operatives to operate as co-operatives. This is the issue that has to be joined at this point.

There is a lot of talk from time to time by various political spokesmen in this country about what is referred to as free enterprise. If we are going to have freedom of enterprise, there should be freedom of enterprise. The citizens of Canada who decide they wish to band together as a non-profit organization to operate as a co-operative should be allowed to do so. The Minister of Finance has no moral right to place a tax bill before this House which negates the basic principles of co-operatives. This is what he is obviously doing, as one can see by referring to the letter from the president of the Co-operative Union of Canada.

An hon. Member: What would Carter have done?

Mr. Barnett: That is a very good question. If the principles of the Carter commission report had been followed, this sort of nonsense about co-operatives would not be before us. The Carter commission recommended, in effect, that we move toward doing away with the complicated system of taxing income in the hands of corporations and again in the hands of individuals. As far as the corporation tax is concerned, the government has rejected that principle. It is trying to suck the co-operatives into the basket, and that is why I say that was a very good question.

At the outset of my remarks, I said that if the government had brought in a tax bill based upon the principles of the Carter commission report, we would not be indulging in this silly nonsense of trying to twist, squirm and appease the multitudinous members of co-operatives. I want to make it clear that I, as an individual, and the party to which I belong, as a matter of policy accept the principle that co-operatives should be encouraged to develop freely along the lines on which they were organized. We should not seek to twist and distort the basic principles of the co-operative movement with income tax laws like the one presently before us, even with the so-called concessions the minister has put before the House. I have been a member of consumer co-operatives for many years.

I, and other members, recognize the fact that the credit unions are essentially co-operatives in the business of lending money. They operate on the same basis. The credit unions have placed their position before us along much the same lines as have the co-operative unions. One of the briefs which has been received has come from the Ontario Credit Union movement. I have a copy here of a letter which was addressed to me under date of October 4, 1971 by the Ontario Credit Union League. They raise this question of what constitutes fair taxation. They point out that there is held an inaccurate opinion that there are tax concessions made to credit unions. I have received for a number of years, now, a lot of drivel from this so-called Equitable Tax Foundation which has been trying to argue that co-operatives and credit unions are receiving special tax concessions. I have looked at it, and then done what I thought was appropriate—I put it in the waste basket. Apparently the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has been sucked in by this sort of drivel and propaganda. I suppose one should not be too surprised at that. It is a symptom of the type of hodge-podge Liberal policies so often wind up as being.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Let us not be fooled by the amendments the minister has suggested should be made to the bill. The president of the co-operative union has placed the issue squarely before us and I, as one member of this House, am prepared to stand behind that position with the support, I believe, of every member of my party. We do not want any of this weaseling and squirming, this effort to appease the credit unions and the co-operatives on the one hand and the private corporations on the other hand. Members of our party have admitted from time to time in various debates there is a place in what is sometimes called a mixed economy for the private profit making type of enterprise. We have never said we intend to abolish it or discriminate against it. But we have also said we believe there is a place for the co-operative type of enterprise, that it should be allowed to operate freely and be available to those who wish to use it in its varying forms and manifestations. So I wish to register my strong protest against the bill we have before us, even with the suggested amendments which are apparently to be foisted upon the co-operative movements unless somehow we can persuade the majority of members of this House to reject the proposals of the government in this field as they stand.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I have spoken several times on the general principles embodied in the legislation with which we are now dealing. I have expressed the opinion that what we have before us is not by any stretch of the imagination tax reform but simply tax change; that the tinkering the government proposes is mere tinkering and that the inequities of our tax system as outlined by the Carter Commission, which made it very clear that the people in the lower income brackets are paying substantially more in tax than they ought to pay, and that the people in the middle and upper income brackets are paying substantially less, will continue after this proposed revision of our tax system.

I wish to deal specifically today with one matter which has been raised with some success, but not enough, by the co-operatives and credit union movement. Unfortunately, after the government tabled its white paper in response to the Carter Commission Report, and after the minister brought in his bill, unfortunately, but not too surprisingly, the vast bulk of the representations which were made to the minister and to the parliamentary committee which dealt with the white paper and the bill on taxation came from those who had the ability, the knowledge and the money to hire experts to make the representations outlining the complaints which they felt should be made, namely, the business community, the self-employed people who felt that the minor changes which the minister first proposed in his white paper and the even smaller changes which he proposed in his tax bill, went too far. The vast bulk of the people, the ordinary people, the wage and salary-earners who pay every penny of income tax which the law requires them to pay, who have no way of making deductions for expenses or trips or anything else, were not able to make representations.

Mr. Osler: They did it in Winnipeg last week, did they not?

Mr. Orlikow: It is an interesting development we see in regard to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler). When he was running as a candidate he was careful to try to create the impression that he was just an ordinary citizen like everybody else. But since he has come down here, increasingly we find in his interjections and in his speeches—and I do not mind them, because he usually puts his foot into his mouth—that the real person comes out. He is from one of the few top families in Winnipeg. They've got it made, and he is going to keep on seeing that they are protected. That is the kind of interjections we get from him.

Mr. Osler: I asked you whether it was only rich people who gave you the gears in Winnipeg last week.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair feels that the committee should not proceed in this direction through conversation or interjections from one side or the other. Speeches should be relevant to the bill before us without referring to private members and their capacity or their personality.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Orlikow: I shall be happy to discuss the principle of this bill. If the hon. member will stop interjecting he will not get the kind of replies which his interjections deserve.

The one group which made representations, and very strong representations, to the minister, to other cabinet ministers and to every Member of Parliament, was the co-operative and credit unions. They made their views known strongly. Let me quote from a press release put out some time ago by the United Co-operatives of Ontario with regard to the proposals contained in this bill:

• (3:40 p.m.)

Upon careful study of the proposed tax legislation presented to the ways and means committee, the Co-operative Union of Canada finds that compliance with these proposals will create extreme difficulties for co-operatives. The net result will be to force co-operatives to abandon their basic nature—

The Co-operative Union of Canada feels it is not the prerogative of a taxation body to interfere with the relationship between an organization and its members. The taxation imposed should be in keeping with the nature of the taxpayer. The proposed legislation totally disregards objections raised in the Co-operative Union's submission to Mr. Benson and to the taxation committee of the House of Commons and of the Senate.

The proposals failed to take into consideration the basic nature and method of operation of a co-operative, which is to distribute surplus earnings to members in proportion to the business they have done with their co-op rather than in relation to capital investment.

Co-operative philosophy, regulations, etc. make it impractical for most co-ops to distribute their surplus earnings as proposed. Further the proposals failed to recognize the difference between the nature of equity capital employed by co-operatives and by other corporations.

If there is one group that has done a great deal to protect the ordinary citizen, it is the credit union. This is the one organization that protects not the Member of Parliament, the businessman, the doctor or lawyer, who can usually go the bank and arrange a loan if they get into financial difficulty, but the ordinary citizens who do not have much income or any collateral to offer as security for a loan from the bank and who in increasing numbers are being forced to go to the loan companies.

I am not going to criticize the loan companies. They are not breaking any law in this country; they are fulfilling a function that no other organization with the exception of the credit union has been fulfilling. But the loan companies have been doing so at exorbitant cost, to say the least. They have been acting legally but, in my view, unconscionably, lending money to citizens in this country at interest rates of 18, 24, 30 per cent per annum. Anyone who doubts this needs only look at the interest rates charged by finance companies on the purchase of automobiles. No one can argue today that an automobile is any longer a luxury; it has become a necessity in this country. The one organization that has stood between the loan companies—the "loan sharks"—and the ordinary citizens is the credit union. If any government brought in any legislation that would destory the credit unions, it was the original bill brought in by the Minister of Finance.

As a result of representations made by the co-operatives and credit unions to Members of Parliament and the government, the minister has announced a series of amendments, I think 95 in all, to this bill. Nevertheless, today I was in touch with representatives of the credit unions in this country, and while they are pleased with some of the changes and agree that some of the amendments that the minister introduced go part of the way to overcoming the problems the original bill created for them, they made it very clear that there are still some sections of the bill that must be amended. If they are not amended, then the ability of the credit unions to function, to grow and to give the kind of protection they have been giving increasingly to thousands of Canadians who need this organization will be jeopardized.

Let me put on the record the comments which the representatives of the credit unions made to me today in the hope that it is not too late and that the Minister of Finance will demonstrate that he does sometimes listen not only to the representations made by mining, gas and oil companies but also those made by ordinary citizens. Perhaps within the next few days the minister will add another couple of amendments to the 95 he has already tabled so as to take care of the difficulties created by this legislation for the credit unions.

The officials from the credit unions have told me that the section of the bill dealing with the opening reserve that will be established on January 1, 1972, as now drafted, leaves a good deal to be desired. The government proposes to allow credit unions reserves similar to those held by banks. The credit unions are concerned about what will happen to the statutory reserves they are required to hold and maintain by the provinces, and about whether they will be taxed retroactively. The credit unions are asking that they be allowed to begin the taxation year in January 1972 at point zero; in other words, that their prior reserves that have been built up under the requirements of provincial legislation be ignored so that new reserves can be accumulated, as is the case with other corporations. I want to make it clear that the credit unions are not asking for any special consideration but that they be given the same treatment as other corporations.

The credit unions are concerned about one other important aspect of the tax legislation, and this is the small business limit concept. Credit unions will not be permitted to take advantage of the small business limit concept. Small business, under the proposal made by the minister, will be permitted to set aside reserves of $50,000 a year which will be taxed at the low rate of 25 per cent rather than the usual 50 per cent. Credit unions, as they understand it, will not be permitted to do this because the reserve funds required by the provinces are locked in and therefore cannot be distributed to the members. Since the credit unions will be unable to distribute any dividends to the members, they will not be able to reduce their taxable income.

I think that what the credit unions want is fairly simple to understand and is a very fair request to make. They want the same tax incentives that are now allowed small business. Although credit unions are large organizations with many thousands of members, I would imagine that, in 99.9 per cent of the cases, those members are in a much poorer financial position than the small businessman who will be permitted a lower tax rate. As I say, the credit unions are asking for the same kind of treatment in the matter of taxation that small businesses will be permitted under this legislation, and as I say it is not too late for the minister to bring in a further amendment that will give the credit unions this kind of treatment. No proposal that I know of was greeted with such unanimous criticism by the credit unions and co-operatives as the original proposal made by the minister. I hope the minister will do something pretty substantial to meet what I consider to be the very legitimate concerns of the credit unions and co-operatives in respect of this legislation.

I should like to deal with just one more matter before I sit down and that is my feeling that the minister, while appearing to try to meet the needs of ordinary citizens in a much more equitable manner by raising income tax exemptions from $1,000 to $1,500 for a single person and from $2,000 to $2,850 for married couples, in fact has not come anywhere close to meeting what the situation was when the $1,000 per single person and $2,000 per married person basic exemption was put into the legislation more than 20 years ago. Need I remind the minister of the tremendous increase in the cost of living in the past 22 years since that floor was set for calculating income tax exemption? Need I remind the minister that under his proposal there will be tens of thousands, probably hundreds of thousands of Canadian citizens who will be paygng ihcome taxı7evenı7though,ı7according to thecalculations of the Economic Council of Canada, they are in fact living in poverty?

It seems to me that there is something wrong in principle, and something cruel, about a government in the year 1971 proposing that people who are living in poverty should be required to pay any income tax. I urge the minister to adopt the proposals put forward by organizations such as those representing the pensioners who have suggested that the minimum basic exemption in calculating income tax should be $2,000 a year for a single person and $4,000 a year for a married one. I know that the minister has been very adept at putting on the record again and again, the fact that hundreds of thousands of people will no longer have to pay income tax when the new schedule and the new exemptions which he is proposing are put into effect. But the minister has been very careful not to explain to the public how little income tax is paid by those who will now be exempt, a few dollars a year. Of course it is good that they should not be paying it, but those people should not have been paying income tax for years. What the minister has done is in fact too little and too late.

The minister has done the same kind of public relations job, the same kind of snow job, as he did the other day when he announced in his package of last Thursday that in order to try to get the economy moving, the economy which he has been saying has been doing very well, in order to reduce unemployment, there would be a cut of 3 per cent in income tax. An across-the-board cut for the person with a taxable income of $4,000 or $5,000 a year comes to a few cents a week. To the person earning $20,000 a year or $30,000 a year a 3 per cent cut in income tax is a very substantial amount of money. So, last Thursday the minister did what he has done on nearly every occasion on which, when I have heard him make a proposal for change, he has given more to those who already have than to those who do not have.

May I express this last plea to the minister before I sit down, that the minister give serious consideration to wiping out the kind of restrictive proposals in this tax legislation which he originally proposed for co-operatives and credit unions; that he meet their very reasonable suggestion that their task of looking after their members, who are on the whole very ordinary citizens in the moderate income brackets, be not made more difficult than it has been and that he do things to help them to get more members and to expand their services to those people who really need the kind of service which they perform; and also that the minister give serious and favourable consideration to raising basic exemptions on income tax so that those people who cannot afford to pay income tax, people in the lower income brackets earning less than $2,000 a year and family people earning less than $4,000 a year, not be required to pay any income tax at all.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, one of the features of Bill C-259 would eliminate an exemption which hitherto has existed with respect to prospectors. I want to devote some of my remarks this afternoon to the impact that this proposed legislation will have on the mining industry generally and on the oil and gas industries. Perhaps the place to start is where most new mines start, with the hard work and dedication of the individual prospector. As was pointed out in the letter by the management of the British Columbia and Yukon Chamber of Mines to the Prime Minister on September 1 last, the fact has been clearly established that:

> —prospectors are vitally important to the future of our mineral industry. You will note that prospectors in British Columbia-Yukon have been responsible for discovering at least 1,377 million tons of ore valued at $8,605 million, and that it would take 97,000 man years of work to extract the ore. In other words, a great many jobs for Canadians over a period of many years.

Bill C-259 would abolish the existing exemption of prospectors so that the proceeds of their efforts, if they ever do realize them, are free of tax. That was not the attitude, however, of the standing committee because in its final report dealing with the white paper on taxation the committee recommended that prospectors be exempted from this tax. Unfortunately, not only the Minister of Finance but the government did not see fit to accept the recommendations of the standing committee. However, that is not surprising and it is another indication of the so-called reform of the committee system and how useless it is. The mining industry in Canada has become the country's most important industry, accounting for perhaps more than 40 per cent of Canada's export dollars, with well over 25 Canadian communities being entirely dependent upon the industry, and in the north, not only whole communities but in the case of the Yukon the whole of that geographic entity, is dependent almost entirely and absolutely on a healthy and viable mining industry. The industry is a little over 100 years old and already it consists of some 240 or more producing mines. Several briefs were presented to the standing committee when the whitepaper proposals were considered. One of the best, and perhaps one of the most humorous, was the brief presented by Dean Vaughan who heads a group of prospectors from Toronto. He says on page two of that brief—and I believe this is actually what happened in respect of one of the proposals in Bill C-259—if this country were secretly invaded by hostile Martians intent on crippling the Canadian economy, they would be very well advised to infiltrate our government and politically cripple the mining industry, which has created for the Canadian economy more than $40 billion in new wealth in the past 25 years. And then he asked, how better could these Martian politicians, under the guise of tax reform and social reform, sabotage the third largest mining industry in the world. He suggests a timetable by which that sabotage could be carried on by the federal government. He says that the leader, in this case he would be the Minister of Finance, would recommend to his superiors, the Prime Minister and his government, the following program.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

The first item would be to tax new mining ventures to death before they are on their feet. That is exactly what these proposals will accomplish. Instead of waiting until new mines are in production and contributing to the wealth of the country, we are going to start taxing them before these mines are even discovered by imposing a tax on the potential gains of the prospector, a prospector who in some cases has been searching for mineral deposits for some 20 years, or a quarter of a century, and who may never realize anything from his efforts. Certainly, the odds are highly against any single prospector hitting it twice.

The second step in Mr. Vaughan's program would be to immobilize the self-employed prospector by cutting off his supply of risk capital via the imposition of a capital gains tax on money won by the prospector and his grubstakers. That is exactly what happens now. It takes a good deal of persuasion to convince hard-headed business persons to invest in such a high risk venture as a prospector or grubstaking a prospector in the search for new mines. A prospector can promise nothing but hard work and, usually in my part of the country in any event, a very short season. There is no guarantee to the investor that he will have any return on his high risk investment.

The third step suggested in the program is to harass the mining industry as a whole by enacting emotional, hasty and retroactive restrictions in an otherwise free economy. Again, that is what the proposals in Bill C-259 are aimed at. The fourth step suggested is to conspire to establish a lack of confidence within the country and throughout the mining industry, not only here but outside our borders, and in the minds of foreign investors regarding future socialistic and jingoistic political ambitions.

In a report produced recently for the British Columbia Mining Association by an internationally recognized firm of chartered accountants, Prince, Waterhouse, it is estimated that the investment capital inflow in mining activities in the Yukon in 1970 after the publication of the white paper proposals was reduced by 72 per cent over the preceding year. The white paper on taxation and the proposal to replace the Yukon Quartz Mining Act with Bill C-187, the Yukon Minerals Act and the Land Use Regulations, combine to scare off investment capital to that extent and I daresay to the same extent this year. Unless some relief is forthcoming, and unless we have some statement from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and from the Minister of Finance, we face a more bleak year ahead so far as exploration activity in the Yukon is concerned during the season of 1972.

As a fifth step in his program of sabotaging the industry, Mr. Vaughan suggests the introduction of prejudicial legislation regarding foreign ownership; for example, England may control Canadian uranium mines but the United States may not. We have seen the reaction across the border with regard to the restrictive legislation that has been imposed with regard to the inflow of capital investment into this country from south of the border. This government is in deep trouble with regard to its relations with the United States. It is inconceivable that there could have been such rapid deterioration of our Canada-United States relations in so short a time. Investor confidence in the United States so far as investment in our mineral and resource industries is concerned has hit a new low. This is one reason we find our economic plight in the Yukon so desperate and why we have so little to look forward to during the forthcoming season. This is an industry which is highly risky so far as investment capital is concerned. It is an industry which, instead of having restrictive provisions such as are proposed in Bill C-259 and C-187, should be given incentives.

The sixth point in Mr. Vaughan's program for sabotaging the industry would be to sell foreign investors and companies mining exploration permits under one set of rules, then change the rules in the middle of the game and then change the rules back again. For example, look at what happened to Gulf Oil at Woollaston Lake and Phillips Petroleum and Atlantic Richfield in the Arctic. We have a good example of that in the intention of the government to include a power to make regulations in Bill C-187. That fits hand in glove with the powers which will exist under the legislation before us and also the power under the Territorial Lands Act under which all oil and gas exploration permits are granted.

The seventh step in the program would be to impose sweeping uneconomic legislation restricting the disposal or sale of concentrates or mining products with no industry-wide dialogue or advanced notice. That is precisely what was proposed in Bill C-187 where the minister would have absolute control over any ore exported from the country in excess of I believe 5,000 tons. I could be mistaken on that figure. In other words it was not management of the mining industry by the investors and shareholders but rather was management of the industry by the government. This is state control over an industry which has enjoyed its spectacular growth as a result of incentives and freedoms in the past.

As a final step in his program to sabotage the mining industry, Mr. Vaughan suggests we impose a recurring five-year reassessment of capital gains tax, with all its attendant catastrophic implications. If there is one area where capital gains should not apply it is in the area of the gains which are achieved by the prospector who discovers the mines in the first place. Any member of this committee who has knowledge of or personal acquaintanceship with prospectors, knows the hardships which these individuals must endure, for the most part over many, many years, before they realize anything from their efforts.

It is said, not only by the Minister of Finance but by his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that technology has rendered the prospector obsolete. I submit that this is not so, and that new mines and new mineral prospects continue to be discovered by the prospector in the initial instance. Why should a Canadian in the position of a prospector who works for 20 years or a quarter of a century,—I know several in this category who have spent their money and efforts over the course of those long, arduous years—and who happens to become successful, wind up paying a tax on the gain that he might make from his participation in a producing mine?

As I pointed out a moment ago, in the last 100 years there were 240 mines discovered. Assuming an individual prospector was responsible for each individual discovery, what real gain does the government get from taxing 240 individual prospectors, instead of adopting the approach of giving them some incentives to discover new mineral prospects in the hope that they can bring new mines into production. Certainly, the government will derive more revenue from taxing new producing mines and from taxing all the employees of those mines than from taxing the individual prospectors.

There are several factors in the fiscal approach of the government which are scaring off investment capital from minerals. We might ask ourselves why some of the greatest incentives for hunting oil and gas in Canada are not created by Ottawa, by our fiscal measures, or by any fiscal measures adopted in the provinces, but actually come from Washington, for Americans? Why is it that Canadians are not prone to invest in the development of their own country, in one of the greatest single areas where development would be welcomed, and in fact is needed? Why does U.S. capital come across in greater volume than it comes from within our own country? I suggest that despite the new tax reforms proposed in Bill C-259 the greatest incentives for hunting oil and gas in Canada will continue to come from Washington for Americans, and not from the provinces or from Ottawa.

When the past minister of communications resigned from the federal cabinet he did not lose much time in expressing his dissatisfaction with our present economic policies. One key are of his discontent was that Canada's mismanagement of its natural resources and the apparently favourable tax climate in which natural resource companies operate, were to our detriment. In fact natural resource companies, such as those in the Canadian oil and gas industry, are severely handicapped in Canada by existing tax laws. I cannot bring myself to agree with the position that is taken by members of the NDP. It simply bespeaks an ignorance or lack of information on this subject, and I say that with great respect. Tax laws in the United States make it easier for foreign owned companies to operate in Canada, and they are also one of the main reasons why much of Canada's oil and gas industry is owned by companies in the United States.

The key to a successful oil and gas operation is the productivity of its exploration program, and that goes for the hard rock industry as well. Without exploration no minerals would be found. Without exploration no oil and gas would be found. That is certainly fundamental. Some of the greatest incentives for hunting oil and gas in Canada are not created here in this country, in Ottawa or in the provinces, but come from Washington for Americans. I want to illustrate this.

Under Canada's present tax laws no real incentive or encouragement is given to Canadians to participate in a risk taking venture. We have given them some meagre incentives which the government now wants to abolish. Quite to the contrary, however, American tax laws favour the use of essentially private capital in such ventures. These laws provide a means by which well to do Americans—by that I mean people with surplus capital who are looking for investment areas—can find relief from high taxes. I am going to discuss this by describing what the industry calls drilling funds.

A drilling fund is essentially a pool of risk taking money, collected from well off professionals such as doctors, lawyers, engineers and others who may be paying as much as 50 per cent of their top layer of income in tax. Millions of dollars are pouring into Canada from such U.S. drilling funds. The key to the success of the American drilling fund is that the fund guarantees, by virtue of U.S. law, a 92 per cent tax write off. On an initial investment of—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. However, with the unanimous consent of the House, the hon. member may carry on with his remarks. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Agreed.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: I thank members of the committee. I was discussing a drilling fund, and the fact that U.S. tax laws provide a 92 per cent tax write off for people fortunate enough to invest $10,000, $5,000, or whatever it may be in such a drilling fund. Let us take $10,000 as an example. $9,200 is deductible, and 8 per cent is commission on the purchase of fund units and is non-deductible. Thus the investor saves $4,600 in tax, making his net cost in that investment only $5,400.

If oil or gas is found, the investor has an additional source of income from the newly discovered oil or gas well. If he makes an annual income from the newly discovered well, of again let us say $10,000, he has to declare this additional income, which is taxable. However, this time the investor is given a 22½ per cent depletion allowance, leaving a taxable income of only $7,750. If he reinvests the $7,750 in the drilling fund he can again get a 92 per cent write off, and now claims $3,875 as a tax write off. And so it goes. According to Art Klimchuck, who is a vice president of American Quasar Petroleum Co., only 167,000 of an estimated 2,600,000 U.S. taxpayers in the 50 per cent bracket have used such funds. Obviously, this kind of investment has barely touched its potential.

Two examples will illustrate the effect such a drilling fund has on Canada's oil and gas industry. The first is the Canadian-American Resources Fund Inc. (Can-Am), an offshoot of the previously mentioned American Quasar Petroleum Co. Each investor in Can-Am buys his participation in $5,000 units as a partner in a venture, not as a shareholder. Can-Am makes drilling money available to Quasar Petroleum Ltd. of Calgary, a Canadian subsidiary of American Quasar. The profits from this joint venture are split 60 per cent to the fund's partners and 40 per cent to Quasar. For the individual fund partner, success means income and failure means success because of a lighter tax burden through write-offs.

The second example is Husky Oil. According to Gene Roark, President of the Company, Husky was able to raise $32.5 million in the United States through its drilling fund at a time when the stock market was severely depressed. Much of this money will be spent in Canada on Husky's extensive nation-wide exploration program. Implementation of Bill C-259, as presently proposed, will continue to favour those elements in the tax structure that have led to the foreign domination of Canada's oil and gas industries. At a time when some public concern favours Canadian nationalism in this area, some serious changes are warranted that would at least provide parity incentives for Canadian investors in the oil and gas industries.

According to the views of the former minister of communications, the hon. member for Duvernay, it is quite true that natural resource companies in Canada enjoy a favoured tax position relative to other industries in Canada. This, however, is not the main point of contention; much more important than Canadian tax favours to natural resources companies is the fact that American companies operating in Canada enjoy an even more favoured position under American tax laws. If Canada is truly concerned about ownership of its own resources and the participation of Canadians in the development of Canada and is not using that ploy as a political straw man, then Bill C-259 will do little to foster these aims.

Perhaps the only solution to this problem is that tax laws in Canada should provide the same basis for at least a fair competition with foreign concerns. This objective could be achieved in one of two ways—provide a shelter for Canadian companies or change the tax laws so that they would provide a true incentive for Canadians to participate in risk ventures and the ultimate development of our own resources, regardless of the tax position of these industries relative to other industries in Canada. This is precisely the principle which I think the government is overlooking in the restrictions now being placed on this industry in Canada, not only the mining industry but the oil and gas industry as well.

Mr. Chairman, I have other submissions to make with respect to the principle of the bill as it affects the mining industry itself upon which I have not touched. I have spoken about the mining industry in which the prospector is going to be almost eliminated by Bill C-259 and one or two aspects that affect the oil and gas industry, contrasting our laws and those of the United States. I have not touched on the hard rock industry and I propose to do that at another stage of these committee proceedings.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I agree completely with what the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had to say about prospecting. I well understand that people in his riding are interested in such activities. Some of my own electors are also highly interested, but I believe that prospectors have never been truly recognized by government authorities, whether provincial or federal. Prospectors have often been deprived of their rights, and the situation is the same today.

Recently, I mentioned, as an example, an incident that occurred in the federal riding of Villeneuve. A prospector named Lavoie had truly discovered a mine in Senneterre and, when the Department of National Defence decided to build a radar station there, the prospector was simply thrown out. His lands were nearly confiscated and the Department of National Defence failed to pay him any indemnity.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to prospecting, the government should, through Bill C-259, show greater generosity and a greater awareness of existing opportunities. In Northwestern Quebec, there are huge mining possibilities. However, the government failed to encourage prospecting. They did not omit to tax prospectors with incomes but they omitted to help them, to encourage them when they were in financial difficulties.

I agree with the comments of the hon. member for Yukon regarding prospectors and the possibility of developing new mines in our respective regions.

Bill C-259 is the natural result of the famous White Paper that has been so much talked about across Canada. The government has tried to put into concrete form the White Paper data in this Bill C-259 which is so complex that even chartered accountants are giving up trying to understand it. One accountant explains it one way, while another explains it another way. Even economists can't figure it out. It is so true that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) had to bring in 97 amendments to his own bill C-259. This means that nobody really understood what was meant by this reform of our present tax system.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, fiscal reform brings about no increase in the total national income of Canadians. I suggest that Bill C-259 will be of little benefit to the poor. However, it will leave the rich practically unaffected whereas the middle class will be most directly hit.

People earning $8,000 to $60,000 a year are the ones who will offset tax reductions announced in regard to small wage-earners and those whose yearly incomes are very large.

It is therefore the middle class that Bill C-259 tends to eliminate and it has been followed by the announcement, a few days ago, of the famous program of winter works and government assistance to municipalities and provinces. In June last, when the Minister of Finance introduced his budget, he had to maintain surcharges and special or temporary taxes. He now says that he is ready to reduce taxes in order to increase purchasing power and to undertake federal public works estimated at $1 billion.

This morning, I heard the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien)—I regret that he is not here—on the Frenchie Jarraud program in Montreal. He was asked why there were no funds available to develop our natural resources. The minister answered, with all humility I'm sure, that he was not a Créditiste and could not print money.

I would have liked to talk to the minister this morning to ask him where the government is taking that $1 billion in deficit, which it is ready to spend across Canada. It did not exist before the statement of the Minister of Finance and yet it could be found. So why not find more money? As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was saying this afternoon, why be so stingy, why not be more generous? I am willing to be more generous, but the Prime Minister is not. But he was ready to spend up to $1.07 billion, independently of Bill C-259.

Through this bill, it is proposed to help the people in the low income bracket. One can read in the papers that the government is striking 750,000 small wage earners from the income tax rolls.

Mr. Béchard: That is true!

Mr. Caouette: This measure is worth how much to them? A couple of hot dogs each! The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) did not even figure the saving for these people. However, when one talks about the sheer number—750,000—this number is striking, but it is only powder thrown in the eyes of the public.

It is mere window-dressing for the electors of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine. That can do for a while, but not forever—and I say it for the benefit of the hon. member—because people will not be laughed at indefinitely.

It is so true that in order to make this famous bill complete, the government has to foresee a deficit of $1.07 billion. When I was asking last year that more credit be put into circulation, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine thought it was funny. Today, the government is putting in $1.07 billion, which do not come from anybody, which are created—

Mr. Béchard: That is pure demagogy.

Mr. Caouette: That's it, let's hear about demagogy. Demagogues! For the hon. member's information, it is spineless characters of his kind who do not have the guts to rise and make claims on behalf of the people—

Mr. Béchard: The hon. member should have listened to the programme of his party.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I hear the hon. member refer to our party. If there is a demagogue in his area, he is the one. As a matter of fact, his own constituents in the Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine area are the ones who say so. If he wants to see letters—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Béchard: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Caouette: Go ahead.

Mr. Béchard: I would like him to name those who call me a demagogue.

Mr. Caouette: If the hon. member will come to my office as soon I am finished, I will show him letters from people in his constituency of Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine who attended the recent Créditiste convention in Hull. Those people told me in so many words that the member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine was gutless—

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order or a question of privilege?

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a question to the leader of the Social Credit Party.

Since they attended the convention in Hull, and elected him by a vast majority, I trust he will give me their names, for they must have registered. Other than Créditistes, naturally!

Mr. Caouette: Earlier I invited the member to come to my office to check the names. It is so true that his electors think he is a demagogue, that even his colleagues find it amusing that I should give him a tongue-lashing. It does him good.

Mr. Béchard: He is far more of a demagogue than I am.

Mr. Caouette: That is his reply.

An hon. Member: That is the only word he knows.

Mr. Caouette: The only answer he can give.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member to kindly address the Chair and, at the same time, to bring up logical questions as well as give logical answers.

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

As a member of the House, I wish to protest against what you have just said. It is not for the chairman at a sitting to decide during a discussion whether or not an hon. member is talking with logic. I would like to remind you that it was your duty to call to order the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, who was desperately shouting "demagogy" without having been recognized by you, while my colleague from Témiscamingue was in fact dealing with the subject. I would therefore appreciate it if you would clarify that matter and call to order the hon. members opposite. If they do not have the guts to stand up, at least they should listen.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I simply said that my remarks were intended for all hon. members.

Mr. Caouette: Honestly, it is all the same to me. You may address them to me personally, that will not disturb me and will not prevent me from saying what I think of the hon. members opposite.

Mr. Béchard: The same goes for me too.

[Mr. Béchard.]

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madelaine says that the same goes for him too. I do not care because it does not bother me so much.

The hon. member may always resort to a speech explaining wherefrom his government is going to obtain the $1,070,000,000 which will be distributed all over Canada. Wherefrom? Let him tell us. If he does not know, then let him listen to me. As far as I am concerned, I can tell him because I know where this money will come from. It does not come the hon. member's pockets or the prime minister's or the treasury but from the finance and credit comptrollers. This is money which we are borrowing to create a $1,070,000,000 deficit. This loan will probably be placed as usual in the United States. The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madelaine, together with others, will probably crawl their way to the United States begging them to finance the development of our natural ressources and enable us to do what we can and must do here, in our country. We are opposed to such a scheme.

Let us turn to the Bank of Canada. Digit "7" is the same whether it is written by the Bank of Canada or the United States. Would the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine care to tell me the difference between the two.

And when the Americans lend us some money let us not kid ourselves. They do not base their credit on their assets but on what we will be developing in Canada. This is so true that if we were not developing anything the Americans would not lend us anything. If we keep on borrowing from them at interest rates of 9 or 9¼ per cent, it is quite clear that in 25 or 30 years from now all that will have been developed will belong to the Americans and we will still hear people say, we must regain control over our economy.

Mr. Speaker, we are completely on the wrong track, completely wrong. When we expose the truth in such broad daylight we are called demagogues by irresponsible men such as the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine. We are used to that. I could hear the same things 25 years ago when I first came to this House. But today, for example, we are proving what we used to say 25 years ago: We are stating facts. This is so true that in June—not even six months ago—the Minister of Finance had to tinker with taxation and say: We need revenues. The expected deficit is $400 million. We shall be in for $1 billion 70 million by trying to reduce taxes not by increasing them. A 3 per cent tax reduction will affect personal income. A miner working at Noranda mine and paying now $300 in yearly taxes will have his taxes decreased by $9: that is the approximate cost of two hot dogs and three ice creams. Nine dollars a year is not even 75 cents a month.

Mr. Béchard: It is $9 less.

Mr. Caouette: Is the government going to say it has been quite generous for those people?

An hon. Member: This hurts.

Mr. Caouette: No, it is far from hurting. But this $1 billion 70 million will hurt you.

Mr. Chairman, we do say that we should spread affluence instead of poverty among Canadians. If the Minister of Finance, in bill C-259, determined that any annual income under $5,000 for married people and under $3,000 for single people is to be tax-free, the whole problem would be settled.

Social welfare should be replaced by some better formula, for, among other things, Bill C-259 includes social welfare. And social welfare—I touched upon the subject last week and shall say more today—gives rise to crying abuses in several respects. It might be objected that the provinces make the decisions, that the offices are administered by them and that the federal government pays 50 per cent of the expenditures, which is true. However, if the federal government pays 50 per cent, I feel that it should be entitled to control what goes on in some provinces. We know full well that some people are paid welfare allowances whereas they do not need them, and vice versa. That happens in Montreal as well as at home.

On a recent air trip, I met a worker who receives a pension from the Quebec Workmen's Compensation Commission. He gets $86.54 per week; that is the maximum. According to him, it is not enough. So he went to the regional welfare bureau to get more money. He was told he had enough and could not get more but that if he was short of money at the time, he could get an advance, providing he would sign a form stating that he would pay back the money upon getting his next cheque. The worker said he would not sign, that he would find some other way. Therefore he went back home and said to his wife: "Go to the welfare bureau, say I deserted you, that we are separated, that I live with my father, that you are left with our two children and need welfare benefits." His wife complied and went to the welfare bureau. The manager said: "Madam, you are entitled to it." And ever since, they have been paying her $220 per month because of her statement that her husband had left her. Such are the abuses brought about by the welfare system and the same is true of unemployment insurance. Some jobless people, if caught working a few days, are punished by discontinuation of benefits for a week or two. If the person can get away with it, he gets his unemployment insurance benefits. In this way it is a game of hide-and-seek with the welfare system as a whole.

Under the present system, if a person receiving welfare benefits attempts to work he is immediately cut off from payments and if he has worked only a few days, he also comes off badly. So, what does he decide to do? Stay at home without moving, which is an incentive to sloth instead of an incentive to work.

I am convinced that the program I am suggesting would cost less than the present one. I invite hon. members to make a simple calculation. I would suggest social security payments to all citizens, including members of this House. Single persons with an income from $1,500, couples who get over $2,500 would be entitled to them and each child up to the sixth would receive $250. This would mean a maximum annual income of $4,000 for each family with six children, if such social security payments were guaranteed to each Canadian. Hon. members, the poor, the small wage-earner, indeed everybody would receive that payment and if the farmer, the labourer, the miner, the unemployed or the welfare recipient find some work, the amount guaranteed as social security would not be cut off. This payment would be made in addition to his salary. If the individual involved has a family which would allow him to receive $3,000 per year and finds some employment where he can earn $4,000 or $5,000 per year, it would assure him a yearly income of $8,000. And this, Mr. Chairman—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has now expired, including the two minutes for the questions which he answered. The hon. member cannot carry on, unless he obtains unanimous consent. Does the House authorize the hon. member to continue?

An hon. Member: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I am sorry, but I have heard a no.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson).

[English]

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to allow the hon. member for Témiscamingue to carry on if he has permission from the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I would like you to ask the House again whether the hon. member for Témiscamingue might be allowed to continue his speech.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I shall ask the question again. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for Témiscamingue to continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Témiscamingue.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Caouette: I thank you, Mr. Chairman. I also heard a no, but at any rate, I wish to thank my colleagues for their courtesy, even the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) who has been one of the first ones to say go ahead. I thank him.

Mr. Chairman, we are clearly in a democratic Parliament. Thus the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine may not share my views on certain matters the same way as I may not share his, but one point on which we agree is that everybody must enjoy freedom of speech, which is not seen in certain foreign countries, something that we would not wish to happen in this country.

Mr. Chairman, I will nevertheless take no advantage of that generosity of hon. members. As I was saying, the social security which we are promoting would enable us for instance to do away with almost all assistance and social welfare offices and to eliminate exorbitant expenses incurred by most provinces. I suggest that more than 50 per cent of the money allocated to social welfare is handed out to bureaucrats responsible for the administration of provincial plans.

Even if 50 per cent of the monies are paid by the federal government, these people take offence at a federal intervention. This is absolutely intolerable. Offices are organized where it is fantastic to note that service is better than in the offices of federal members of Parliament. Huge sums are allocated to an administration where in most cases people on relief, the really needy are forgotten.

I say that a program of social security for all would eliminate the heavy bureaucracy which is more harmful than helpful. That would surely create surprises. A social welfare officer, for example, who draws a salary of $18,000, $20,000 or $25,000 as a deputy minister or department head perhaps will be disturbed a little, but should a whole population be disturbed instead of a public servant or a bureaucrat? This is the question which must be put.

In my opinion, a national program of social security would eliminate all these expenditures, even unemployment insurance benefits, because an unemployed would get as much in social security payments as he is now getting for other reasons. And he would be allowed to work while drawing an allowance under the social security program.

In my mind, members of parliament, government, people concerned by public affairs should seriously consider the establishment of a program which would help everyone, and not only one category of people at the expense of another.

In English, they say: "Take away from those who have something in order to give to others who have nothing. Take away from the haves to give to the have nots". I say that quite often. "At the end you will have all kinds of have nots and no more haves in this country. And it is exactly what is going to happen".

But we are in a position to vote credits required for the development of our country. It is so true that, as I said earlier, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance confirmed it last Thursday when they announced their program of assistance to municipalities and provinces. We do not object to help being given to the provinces and the municipalities; but we do object to the fact that those billion dollars be equal to a debt towards a few oddballs who have never built anything in Canada, except debts to plunge into debt those who are building the country.

Our party would like to see a responsible government making use of the services of our national bank, the Bank of Canada, which was not instituted for nothing. To date it has not fulfilled its function.

The right hon. Mackenzie King—who in spite of everything, is the spiritual father of all hon. members on the government benches—stated, way back in 1935, that: once a country divests itself of its control of credit and money, it is of little importance who legislates in that country. Once the practice of charging exorbitant interest rates takes command, it ruins any nation! Canada is no exception. This is so true that the more we legislate, the more we mess about with budgets, and the more we submit mini and big budgets, the more trouble we invite.

It was alleged, last week, that the unhappy state of affairs in Canada and the increase in unemployment during the month of September should be attributed to the 10 per cent American surtax on Canadian exports to the United States. Nevertheless, on the same day, just a few hours later one could read in the Ottawa and Hull newspapers that in spite of the 10 per cent surcharge our exports to the United States had increased by 9 per cent in September. The tax has been in force since and the number of unemployed has increased even then! There is some inconsistency in that.

Mr. Speaker, let us use the services of a bank that was created for us, that is the Bank of Canada. This is not demagogy since it is our bank. Instead of going to the United States, let us go and see Mr. Rasminsky and tell him that the final decision rests with the Parliament of Canada and not the Bank of Canada. It is up to us to decide, and instead of going to the United States to get the one billion dollars we need let us have Mr. Rasminsky print them. This would be better because it would cost us less to create our own credit to finance our school boards, our municipalities and our provinces.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we could say that such a bank would promote the establishment of a genuine social security scheme under which there would no longer be any discrimination against the various social segments of our society. As a consequence, we could guarantee economic security and personal freedom to all. That is what my colleagues of the Social Credit party are advocating, that has been our objective since we have been sitting here and that is why we invite our colleagues to study this program seriously and objectively.

If the Liberal members agree, I am going to vote like them. If the Conservative members also agree, they have only one thing to do: to come and sit among us. Of course NDP members would gain much by becoming Créditistes.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Does the hon. member for Montréal-Bourassa wish to ask a question?

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Chairman, I wish to put a question to the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

The Chairman: Will the hon. member for Témiscamingue allow a question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Chairman, last week the hon. member made a speech in which he mentioned his social security program designed for all Canadians. This week he is making another speech in which he again refers to social security. The matter is very complex and, from what I could understand, he is quoting the figures of $1,500 and $2,500 for a family, and of $250 for a child. Last week, he did not seem to trust the Canadian economists and said that he would have proper research made to determine what the Canadian people would have to pay in return for this program apparently quite clear in his mind.

This is the question I should like to ask him: Does he know anyone who could give us figures as to the total cost of the plan he advocates?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, that question gives me much pleasure and proves that my good friend, the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa, or is it Ahuntsic?

An hon. Member: Montreal-Bourassa.

Mr. Caouette: —Montreal-Bourassa. It is a pleasure to reply to that question and it proves he was watching television last night. The hon. member is eager for information.

Mr. Chairman, I do not have the statistics in hand, but I am sure that without bureaucracy, it would cost the Canadian people, under the program I advocate, less than it costs at the present time with the program in force in all the Canadian provinces.

In any case, as soon as I get the statistics—they are being prepared—it will be a pleasure for me to inform the hon. member.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Would the hon. member allow me a further question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): With respect to social welfare, would not the program advocated by the hon. member create a problem in connection with federal and provincial jurisdictions since some welfare programs come, at present, under provincial jurisdiction and others are under federal jurisdiction?

Mr. Caouette: I suggest the federal-provincial conflicts would be eliminated by the establishment of a national plan. Family allowances and old age pensions in the amount of $80 would come under federal jurisdiction. Then, no province would be opposed to such a program if everyone was treated on an equal footing.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Does the hon. member not believe that the government could then be described as a centralizing power?

Mr. Caouette: No, I do not think that we are regarded as centralists because of the old age security pensions. I readily admit that we will still meet with swelled heads like Michel Chartrand, Reggie Chartrand and Lemieux, from Montreal, but nevertheless our program is of national interest and intended for the whole Canadian people.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak generally about one aspect of Bill C-259 that has not been mentioned heretofore and which I believe is of vital concern to a great number of the Canadian people. I refer to the section of the bill that eliminates the gift tax.

The elimination of the gift tax not only creates difficulties for the provincial governments because of the lack of consultation with them and the loss of revenue it constitutes for most of them, but it is also logical that the capital gains aspect of the bill as introduced—assuming this provision will be passed—be phased in with the elimination of the gift tax to avoid complete disruption for the provinces and also for those people who have been vitally concerned with this aspect under the previous tax laws.

To begin with, I should like to commend the government for increasing the allowable tax deduction for recognized charitable organizations from 10 per cent to 20 per cent. I believe this is a very positive way of providing an incentive for Canadian citizens to participate more directly in many worth-while organizations that come under the category of "charitable organization". I am thinking particularly in this regard of the new "ngo"—non-government organizations—department of CIDA.

It is the policy of the government to allot a certain portion of its budget to this department of CIDA in order to encourage the non-governmental organizations—the private sector organizations—to participate in and contribute to international development. It is rather interesting to note that the private organizations have made a very sizeable contribution to the emergency created by the Pakistani refugees in India at the present time. In fact, as of the end of last month the government itself had directly contributed $6,098,610 to the refugee fund to relieve the disastrous situation in India. Private organizations over the same period of time, according to the records, contributed $1,393,216, though I believe the amount contributed is actually greater than this figure since some money has been sent directly to India without notice being given to the government. In any event, this contribution is more than 20 per cent of the contribution made by the government.

This is the kind of participation and involvement that I think is good, and it is to this end that the ngo department of CIDA was established. I also note in this regard that during this time the provincial governments had given some $370,000, which means that the citizens of Canada have directly donated more than four times the amount contributed by the provincial governments. I am referring only to the amount given for the relief of the Pakistani refugees; there are many other forms of international and emergency relief, not to mention charitable donations to home based projects.

I believe that what I have to say this afternoon is representative of the views held by a wide range of non-governmental organizations. I do not mention only those organizations that are related to religious bodies, but if I may speak generally may I say I am voicing opinions held by the Jewish Congress, representatives of the Jewish faith, the opinion of the Catholic church and its various organizations coming within the category of registered charitable organizations, and I am speaking also for a broad section of the Protestant churches.

In addition to these religious organizations, I am speaking for organizations such as UNICEF, the Community Funds and Councils of Canada, the Canadian Hospitals Association, CARE of Canada, the National Council of the YMCA, the many associations across the land having to do with retarded children which do a tremendous amount of work on a voluntary basis, and also for the Canadian Institute for the Blind. The gift tax proposals affect a broad range of organizations, and I do not think the government has fully realized that its proposals affect this aspect of charitable giving.

In my opinion, the Canadian way of life is greatly enriched through efforts and contributions made by charitable organizations. Many of them provide facilities for education, physical development and research. Many others help alleviate the hardships that often come in the wake of disasters, such as the Pakistani refugee emergency. Opportunities to serve society become available in a way that could not be provided by government, and as a result the government is relieved of many administrative and financial costs that would otherwise have to be provided out of taxation.

I feel that the needs of the Canadian people and of the Canadian government would be better served by encouraging private charity and philanthropy to support endeavours of a philanthropic nature, where otherwise they could become needs that the public would expect the government to meet. It is a rather sad commentary on the attitude that we take to one another today that so many people in Canada regard it as not their responsibility to meet these needs; rather they look to government to meet them. Therefore, I think we should be careful to see that nothing is done that would impair charitable giving; rather, we should provide incentives and encouragement. From this standpoint, the elimination of the gift tax will have an adverse effect.

If the government were required to meet all these needs, I feel that the quality of the services would suffer simply by reason of scarcity of funds. The proposed increase of the permitted charitable deduction from 10 per cent to 20 per cent of the taxpayer's income provided for in Bill C-259 is a great encouragement. However, other provisions in Bill C-259, namely those that impose a capital gains tax at the time a gift or bequest is made to a registered Canadian charitable organization, may very well jeopardize the concept of charitable giving in Canada as we know it. Liberalizing the tax laws of Canada in favour of charitable organizations will result in a very small loss of revenue to the government. However, I believe that the benefits to the community will greatly outweigh such loss and will actually reduce the need for government expenditure and subsidy.

The proposed new Income Tax Act contains several sections that change the present provisions relating to gifts for charitable purposes. One major change is the increase from 10 per cent to 20 per cent of permitted charitable deductions. Unfortunately, the sections relating to deemed realizations on capital gains at the time of a gift or on death do not except gifts or bequests to registered Canadian charitable organizations. I believe that under the old tax laws there probably existed many loopholes of which organizations took advantage to go outside the intent of the law, and I believe that such loopholes should be closed. My comments relate to legitimate charitable organizations, and I recognize that the government has a responsibility to see there is no evasion of the law. Inasmuch as the imposition of the capital gains tax on such deemed realizations was apparently meant to replace the tax received under the estate tax and the gift tax sections of the Income Tax Act, neither of which of course previously taxed gifts or bequests to registered Canadian charitable organizations, it concerned us greatly that under the proposed new sections the government will not only not be carrying out at least its old views, encouraging charitable giving, but in fact will be severaly penalizing any donors who may wish to make gifts to registered Canadian charitable organizations.

So I would respectfully submit that gifts or bequests made by any person to registered Canadian charitable organizations should not be subjected to a capital gains tax, and further, that the value of such gifts should be based upon the fair market value of the asset as at the date of the transfer. In section 70(5) it is provided that a depreciable property of a deceased taxpayer is deemed to have been disposed of, at a fair market price, on the date of death of the owner. The "amount" realized is then liable to a capital gains assessment. Similarly, paragraph 69(1)(b) provides that the same situation applies where a taxpayer makes a gift of such property to any person, inter vivos, or literally "among the living".

These rules would have a seriously inhibiting effect on a person who wishes to bequeath property to a charitable organization, or who wishes to make an outright gift of it while he still lives. A person making a donation of property which had originally cost $10,000 and which is now worth $50,000, would find himself assessed as though he were making a personal profit of $40,000, 50 per cent of which would be taxable. The raised limit of 20 per cent of income allowable as tax deductible donations to charity, that is to make a gift such as the one mentioned above worth $50,000 and to avoid a tax on $20,000, would require a person to have an income of at least $100,000 over a two year period according to the paragraphs on valuation day produces and capital gains contained in the bill. To fully realize a tax saving on the entire $50,000, a person would need an income of $250,000 over the two years.

The minority report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, the report of the House of Commons standing committee, and the report of the Senate committee on the white paper proposals for tax reform, have some very interesting statements to make in this regard. In these reports a number of unbiased observers concluded that the application of a capital gains tax to charitable gifts of appreciated property would create unfair tax burdens inconsistent with the policy of encouraging such gifts, which has always formed part of Canada's tax system. While a number of donors do make outright gifts or bequests to charities, many others would prefer to irrevocably transfer money, securities or other assets to a trust which would pay the donor or his nominee an income during his lifetime, and possibly to his spouse for her life if she survives him, and on the death of the survivor the remainder would go to a registered Canadian charitable organization.

The Department of National Revenue has interpreted the provisions of the present Income Tax Act to permit a charitable deduction to donors who purchase a charitable annuity from registered Canadian charitable organizations for any excess of the purchase price of the annuity over the amount expected to be returned to the donor. Since this type of charitable deduction is already being permitted by the government, it would not appear to be a large extension of that idea to permit similar deductions for gifts to charitable remainder trusts.

The new Income Tax Act should encourage the creation of charitable remainder trusts, and therefore we would suggest that there should be amendments to Bill C-259 which would permit donors to create inter vivos and testamentary charitable remainder trusts such that the following benefits would accrue: first, that any capital gain on such disposition to the trust should not be deemed as taxable to either the donor or to the trust; second, that the gift value be based upon the fair market value of the assets on the date of transfer; third, that the donor obtain some type of income tax deduction for his irrevocable gift of future interest to the charity; fourth, that the deduction generated be subject to the 20 per cent of income limitation or such other limitation as the government may agree to, and the carry over provision with respect to the unused surplus of such charitable donation be increased from one year to five years in view of the amounts usually involved; and fifth, that the wording of the act be made clear to permit a donor to give appreciated property other than cash.

I think also that it would be wise to allow this new act to encourage a pooled income fund concept which is a variation of the simple charitable remainder trust. Under this method, donors make gifts to a pooled income fund, where it is invested together with gifts of others who make similar life income gifts. The donor receives his share of pooled income fund earnings each year during his lifetime and on his death the remainder of his gift would become the property of the charity. I would suggest that this type of gift have similar tax benefits as we suggested for the simple charitable remainder trust.

Another but a new concept—because what I have just mentioned is really contained under the present legislation but omitted under the new through the elimination of the gift tax—would be provision for a short term trust. Under this method, a donor would be entitled to place part of his property into a trust for the benefit of a registered Canadian charitable organization for a short term, say two to five years, during which time the income from such property would be transferred to the charity and at the end of the term the donor could recall the property from the trust at the same cost base at which the property went into the trust, and then proceed as before. I believe also that it would be very wise if Bill C-259 contained a provision which would extend the carry over provision which at the present time is only for one year but which could well go for five years to permit donors to take full advantage of the charitable deductions.

I believe that these suggestions are much more worthwhile and of much greater significance to more Canadian people than most of us realize. I believe that by adopting such changes the government would continue to encourage a society in which individuals are generous in helping each other, and would be encouraged to give as a means of demonstrating good civic responsibility and in fulfilling their sense of moral responsibility. Therefore, not being able to move amendments of this type when we come to clause by clause consideration, I urge that the government give serious consideration to the implementation of these simple but basic suggestions as they relate to charitable giving. The present law is changed in a negative way in Bill C-259, probably in a way that was not really intended.

Mr. Coates: I should like to participate in this debate by taking a somewhat more general approach than the hon. member for Red Deer, although the thought behind the proposition that he advanced to the government should be given the consideration it deserves and should result in amendment No. 98 being proposed by the government and placed before the House for consideration. I should like to take a more general approach and go back to the period of time when the government brought forward its proposals in the white paper on tax reform. At that time, it was suggested to the Canadian public that we were going to have a complete reform of taxation in Canada and that, as a result of it, many changes would be made in the taxing system. As we look at the situation today, and as we watched the Minister of Finance perform the other evening, we discovered that from that period until now there has been a very depressing reaction within the business community. It is very easy for the government to say that the 650,000 people who are unemployed in this country are unemployed because of the 10 per cent surcharge or because of some other situation beyond their control.

The very depressing situation within the business community started with the government's white paper on taxation. For over two years, the business community of this nation was put through the wringer. Members of the business community had no idea what would happen. They continued making suggestions to the government, and warned of the great dangers they faced and the difficulty they had in planning their programs. They also pointed out the instability which had been created in the minds of businessmen in this country. The government paid absolutely no attention. It went forward and one did not know from one day to the next what we would have in the way of tax legislation. Certainly, a businessman who wished to prepare himself had no idea what he would have to pay in the way of taxes when the government finally made up its mind concerning what the tax reform legislation would be. So, in June we were pleasantly surprised by Bill C-259 because it certainly is not as damaging as we were originally led to believe it would be. At the same time, however, there are a great many aspects of this legislation which do anything but create confidence in the minds of members of the business community.

I listened with great interest a few months ago to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when he explained to the House that money for development goes to areas where the businessman can obtain the greatest return and expect the greatest amount of stability. Certainly, no businessman in this nation or in the world could become very excited about Canada as a place in which to invest money during the whole, long searching period in which the government forced the business community to wait while it determined what the tax policy would be. Then, last June the government brought forth its tax legislation. In many aspects it is depressing to the business community. It also limits the confidence that should have been built up at that time because of the very evident signs that the economy is in trouble. But the government went forward and introduced its capital gains tax, this and that and other things.

Then, after all the period of time in which the government could consider what its tax reform legislation would involve, 97 amendments are slapped before us to be incorporated in the biggest bill which I believe has ever been presented in this House. Regardless of whether or not the amendments were the result of consideration and representations, the bill certainly is not a very stabilizing factor for the business community because, once again, any plans any businessman might have will have to await the consideration of the amendments that are proposed.

I come from the Atlantic provinces of Canada. We must expect the federal government to provide legislation that is conducive to the attraction of capital from all over the world to our area in the hope that we can develop our economy in such a manner that it will produce jobs for the 15 per cent or 20 per cent of our people who will face unemployment this coming winter. There is no way this government will create any confidence in the minds of any businessman in the world community. Certainly, this government will not create any confidence in the minds of any persons in this nation sufficient to encourage them to invest money in any enterprises that would produce employment. Certainly there is nothing about the Minister of Finance or his proposals, whether they be those of the other evening or of last June, or any others, that would create any confidence in the mind of a businessman.

Surely, one of the first steps this government should take would be to provide this country with a minister of finance who would instil confidence in the business community and give the business community a feeling that Canada is a good place in which to invest money. We must have confidence in government planning, and that has been non-existent up to the present time. Every time the government is provided with information by Statistics Canada it has to change its predictions because every time that information is different from what the minister had predicted it would be. It is only common sense that if this is the type of direction we have from this government at the present time, no businessman in his right mind would have any confidence in what the government says or in the way in which it does something. Unless something is done about the finance portfolio and soon, we cannot expect anything more than a greater degree of unemployment in the months ahead. This is the sad and unfortunate fact of life in Canada today. It is very depressing that any Canadian should find himself in this situation.

If we believe it is depressing, it certainly is depressing for the 650,000 unemployed and the additional 100,000 who today are frightened to death because they know that before the winter is over they also will be without jobs. It is a desperate, frightening situation for every municipal government in this nation which has to provide the money to pay welfare to those who are unemployed and are not eligible for unemployment insurance because they have not worked long enough in the past 12 month period. Certainly, the federal government in its time in office has done nothing to produce the money to help these municipalities in any way. In fact, the government has done everything to scare the money away and has placed additional burdens on the shoulders of these municipalities. It is a desperate situation in which we find ourselves at the present time. It will not improve. It will not or cannot improve so long as the present Minister of Finance holds that portfolio. The sooner something is done about that, the better off everybody in this nation will be. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I see the hon member for Calgary North, perhaps he and other hon members would permit me to read the proceedings for the adjournment debate this evening.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Health—Birth Control—Grants to municipalities and voluntary organizations; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External Affairs—Conference of Francophone countries—Appointment of delegates, voting instructions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Let us hear about justice.

Mr. Woolliams: I hope my good friend from St. Boniface will bear with me today, because the last time I spoke and the last time my leader spoke, the hon. member frequently expressed himself from where he sat. I know he is a good member, conscientious and always polite outside the House. I hope he will exercise some restraint inside the House today.

I want to start by touching on two points. The first is what happened here on the night of October 14. I would remind the committee that on June 18 the government presented a supplementary budget. On October 14 the government announced there would be a second supplementary budget. This means, basically, when you look at the tally, that there have been two supplementary budgets in 35 sitting days of Parliament. That fits into the picture presented by the last speaker, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North. This is exactly what he was warning the country, the government and Parliament about—the uncertainty.

Unfortunately, the government has buried the two minor tax changes presented in the supplementary budget of last June in a 700-page bill of so-called tax reform. For the record, now that we have had a chance to review them, the government has tabled 95 proposed amendments, some of which are rather substantial although others are minor. So in a period of economic crisis in Canada there have been three budgets presented in one session. The Minister of Labour used that in his speech the other night, in supporting the government.

Mr. Nielsen: Lunch-bucket Mackasey.

Mr. Woolliams: He said that we have the most flexible Minister of Finance since confederation, a man who could move at every opportunity. As I say, during a period of economic crisis there have been three budgets in one session. We will now be spending weeks discussing a revamping of the tax structure and this, basically, will be somewhat of a waste of time. In committee of the whole we are now debating 700 pages of tax reform. If that bill were passed right now, I ask what effect would the supplementary budget, the mini-budget of October 14, have if its provisions were read together with the changes proposed in this bill?

I do not think the Minister of Finance, the parliamentary secretary or their experts can deny that in various provisions the bill basically puts taxes up. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance frowning, but if he will give me a few moments I will cite examples of where taxes are going up. If I understand correctly what happened the other night, the government got the country into such an economic mess, with unemployment now up to 7.1 per cent, seasonally adjusted, in some places 8.9 per cent—I believe this is so in the province of Quebec—and more than 8 per cent in the Maritimes, that the ministers said to themselves, "We will have to follow the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition. We will have to do what he has been asking us to do for months. We will have to reduce taxes." So they came in here and reduced personal income tax by 3 per cent and corporate tax by 7 per cent.

I am not the only one who feels this way about what has been going on during this session, with three budgets. This is a three-budget government. I heard the Prime Minister say during his press conference the other day, "Don't worry. If we find that things change, even tomorrow we will have another budget." The government is going from budget to budget to budget. Things move up and down like the mercury in a thermometer. The hon. member for Calgary South knows that the temperature in that city can change very rapidly during the winter. It can be 30 below and rise to 50 above within a short space of time. This is exactly the way with the government's economic policy; it is up and down all the time.

I listened carefully to the Minister of Labour the other night. He put his finger on the government's trouble. He is a likeable chap. As the hon. member for Yukon said, he is the friend of the lunch-bucket group, the labour group. I have spent some time overseas with him. He has a likeable character. There are times when he stumbles onto the truth. This is what he said, as recorded at page 8714 of Hansard, and it is an astonishing admission. I have not seen it written up anywhere. It is not very long. After he had cried about unemployment and talked about what the Bank of Canada and the government were going to do, somebody got to him and he became excited. Somebody said, "Hear, hear," and the minister said:

> I happen to be one—

I have heard that expression many times over during my years in this House.

> I happen to be one—I am not speaking for the government—

He was very careful because he remembered the cabinet oath and he could see his salary on the line. He did not want to go to the woodshed. Only one minister went to the woodshed.

> —I am not speaking for the government but for myself—who feels that never again can we tackle the problem of inflation with the blunt instruments of fiscal and monetary policies.

That is exactly what the opposition has been saying for months during the question period and in numerous debates on the budgets. Now the Minister of Labour agrees.

Mr. Coates: He said last year that 6 per cent unemployment was courageous.

Mr. Woolliams: It may have been, and the Prime Minister said you could take it or lump it. If ever there was a piece of legislation that should be shelved, it is this tax measure, because if you worry the business world and the labour world, you are worrying the whole economy and creating instability across the board. The government should withdraw this tax measure. I guess it doesn't take a lot of brains—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That statement will be printed.

Mr. Woolliams: I heard my hon. friend from St. Boniface. He has an open mouth but not an open mind. I hope that when the people of St. Boniface read the debates they will realize and appreciate this.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, if the opposition would only make sense in what they say, I would be glad to get up and give them a reply. But I do not think what they say is worth it.

Mr. Nielsen: You have been told not to say anything.

Mr. Woolliams: There is an old expression we use out west, and perhaps they know it in Manitoba: Let us talk about wood. How is your head?

The government should immediately withdraw this bill because again it is creating economic chaos. If there is to be any good come out of what was done the other night by the government and the Minister of Finance, no doubt after hours of debate in cabinet, this bill should be withdrawn. This will put more cold water on the economy. The Minister of Labour was right in saying that we should not use blunt instruments to tackle inflation. That is the first point I want to make.

I would ask, therefore, that special consideration be given to withdrawing this bill. If the member for St. Boniface feels this is a good piece of legislation and that the policies of the government of ever-increasing taxes will get the economy going, then he does not agree with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Labour or the front benches. I do not know where he stands, because he is always in his seat.

The next thing that I should like to deal with in connection with the debate of October 14 is the statement of the Minister of Finance which adds to my argument that this bill should be withdrawn because, basically, it is the fourth budget. The Minister of Finance began by saying:

I should like to announce certain measures to deal with the current problems facing the Canadian economy and to sustain and reinforce the growth of production and employment now taking place. In terms of production, employment and prices, the Canadian economy is on the course I envisaged at the time of my June budget, before the United States economic measures of last August were announced.

Let it be clear that all of us agree that with the United States imposing the surcharge and with the problems of our exchange with trading nations, we are in economic trouble. But prior to the announcement of these measures and the actions taken by the United States there was between 6 per cent and 7 per cent unemployment in this country. To date, however, there has been no fall-off in exports: the record shows that they have remained stable—so the surcharge has not affected the economy. If the government wants to hide under the economic umbrella of the United States surcharge and what it has done to our trade, there are no facts to support this. Unemployment is at almost the identical level it was before, and our exports have increased. That argument does not hold water.

This government's policy for the control of inflation has been wrong, Mr. Chairman. As the Minister of Labour said, they used a blunt instrument. It was so blunt it was a sledge hammer and it brought about 7 per cent unemployment. The Minister of Finance continued:

No doubt the explanation is complex.

Of course it is complex. The minister then said that those who are recorded as unemployed include men and women who have lost their regular employment, teenagers and older people. He went on to list the number of people out of work. This was exactly the message that the Prime Minister tried to leave at his press conference, that more women were coming out of the homes and the woodwork and applying for jobs, that everything the Minister of Finance predicted was correct except that they did not realize that more people would be looking for jobs. He said that was the only mistake the government made. Well, it is a pretty important mistake. However, ever since I came to this House governments have been saying that more people have been going to work than previously. The GNP is based on population growth, on wealth growth, on our total economic growth. If the government missed that point, they missed everything—and now they are making excuses.

The third thing the minister said was that the government is going to retrain people. I received today an interesting letter from a university student who owes the government $2,900 for a grant obtained under the university loans system. He has two degrees but has returned to university because he cannot get a job. He has received a letter from a collection agency giving him seven days to pay the $2,900. I will send the letter to the parliamentary secretary. I am sure he will be interested in it. I called the bank and they told me it was not their responsibility. Now the matter is in the hands of a collection agency and it is between the Minister of Finance and the bank. Unless this student pays within seven days, his savings in the bank will be garnisheed. That is the type of program the government is operating at the present time. What is the use of training people when there are no jobs for them? As the Leader of the New Democratic Party said in that debate, we will be the most overtrained, unemployed nation in the world.

The government must get the economy moving. On the question of reduction of taxes, we on this side of the House go along with the government. True, they poured $1 billion into the economy, but that has to be analysed. The truth is, when they brought in the mini-budget they already had $750 million; so they added only $250 million. A deficit of $1 billion might have some good side affects. When the Progressive Conservative party formed the government and had to face the problems of deficit financing, the Liberal party said, "You have to balance the budget". I hear the hon. member for St. Boniface talking from his seat again. The wind blows and blows and blows!

I want to come to another point in reference to the $1 billion deficit. It may affect our exchange so that our dollar may fall below that of the United States. We will be able to do business with the United States and other countries if our dollar is below par value. The mini-budget is good; there are good facts in it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: It may be late, but it is better late than never. But now the government is bringing back a tax bill that will hit it on the head. We are back where we started, if we pass this bill. It is the middle-income group that will pay more taxes under the new bill. If a million people are taken off the tax rolls—I am not sure whether it is a million or half a million—the taxes have to come from middle-income people, because expenditures are continually increasing. Surely that can be understood even by the hon. member for St. Boniface. They are undoing what they tried to do the other night when, basically, everybody with some reservations offered congratulations to the government for listening, after three years of economic stagnation.

I have not very much time left and will have to deal with further points later. But I should like to speak on the question of the petroleum industry. The hon. member for St. Boniface is still talking; he never ceases. He is like a twin debater, but unfortunately his words do not get into Hansard.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Go ahead; read what you have there.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't worry about my reading. When I first came to this House members made speeches without reading, but today speeches are read, read, read. The bureaucrats write the speeches for them and members don't know what they are reading. That is why the Minister of Finance is in this mess.

Mr. Nielsen: The member for St. Boniface cannot even read.

Mr. Barnett: Quiet, boys, or we will not get to the question of oil before six o'clock.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: In its submission to the Minister of Finance, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada has made a preliminary review of the 1971 tax reform legislation in respect of those provisions which particularly affect the oil and gas business.

The Chairman: Order, please. I see the hon. member is about to read a document. Before he does so, I must advise him that his time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee. I see we have seven minutes left. The Independent Petroleum Association said this in their submission:

While the full impact of a number of important changes in taxation policy may not be known for some time, our association feels certain matters require reconsideration prior to the enactment of legislation.

The oil and gas industry today is most important for our economy. It is important for the economy of the country generally and for the economy of western Canada in particular. That industry, as will be seen if one checks the figures, is responsible in large part for our favourable balance of trade with the United States. Basically, through that industry we sell a raw commodity: we sell crude petroleum and natural gas—energy-producing fuels needed by the United States in very large quantities. An application has been before the National Energy Board. It may have made its decision, or it may be about to decide. It concerns the export, over ten years, of an additional 2.5 trillion cubic feet of natural gas to the United States. That country is hungry for energy. It needs our crude petroleum and natural gas and by-products of those commodities.

I hope that the hon. member for Calgary South, who I know understands these matters, will bend a sympathetic ear to requests for changes in the legislation, because the oil and gas industry is needed in order to keep other industries healthy. The well-being of that industry is felt through the gross national product of Canada. From that industry comes thousands and thousands of jobs all across the country. I do not have the figures with me, but I submit that $300 million or $400 million spent by that industry of western Canada finds its way to Ontario industries. The oil and gas industry orders valves, pipes, steel and other products. If we keep the oil and gas industry healthy we shall help to keep industry throughout the country healthy, including industry in Ontario and other provinces.

The association in its brief went on to say:

We are relieved that some of the provisions of the white paper—

The provisions that were considered by the committee.

—which we felt would present serious problems for the Canadian economy, and for our industry in particular, have been dropped from the legislation.

Some provisions have been dropped and they are glad to note that. The association continues:

However, we are concerned that certain changes in the proposed legislation which seem entirely appropriate have not been made. The areas which still continue to give us concern are as follows—

The first matter giving them concern—this was discussed in my party's caucus when we were the government, and I am sure it is discussed in the government's caucus and elsewhere—is that of depletion. In order to put this question properly before the parliamentary secretary I will read from the association's brief. They put the matter in better words than I could use:

Our association—

The Independent Petroleum Association of Canada.

—continues to feel that the abandonment of the depletion concept as it is generally understood in the worldwide oil industry and its replacement with the concept of 'earned depletion' will not attract the necessary capital to the Canadian petroleum industry.

I pause there. There is not very much competition in the case of companies exploring for and developing the sale of natural gas because natural gas is a continental export. Nevertheless, Canadian companies that are engaged in the development and exploration of crude petroleum are in competition with companies throughout the world. We have been fortunate in this regard. There are periodic ups and downs in the petroleum business, in line with the law of supply and demand. Those ups and downs follow economic and international conditions throughout the world. For instance, supplies of petroleum from the Middle East or from Venezuela may be cut off, and at those times the United States requires from us more petroleum. Basically, however, we are on a quota.

The point I wish to make before six o'clock—I will continue these remarks another time—is that in order for companies that are Canadian-owned or financed by Canadian investments to compete, they should be subject to the same tax laws in Canada as similar companies in other countries. Only that way will companies which are developing oil resources in Alberta, in our north and elsewhere stay healthy and in business. We must recognize that there are fluctuations in the market. Sometimes such companies must continue development in other countries in order to ensure their survival in the worldwide oil development program.

I congratulate the parliamentary secretary for the position he has reached in the House. He is from my city and I think he is a very capable man. I just hope he will take to heart the recommendations of the Independent Petroleum Association's brief. I will have more to say about their recommendations, perhaps not this evening but later in this debate.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I feel at a considerable disadvantage in speaking on this bill because it is so enormous and complex. A great sheath of amendments has been filed in the past few days. It has been difficult to make an assessment of the bill which is almost incomprehensible to many people much more knowledgeable about such things than I am. This bill assumes great significance, particularly at this time of our changed conditions in face of the American surtax and the mini-budget presented last Thursday.

The tax bill has only passed second reading. We are now only on a general discussion of its clauses. At the moment, large portions of the bill are being rewritten. We can expect this process to continue as more of its provisions are found to be contradictory. The bill will be subject to differing and conflicting interpretations, with some unforeseen results. It may ultimately be self-defeating to the avowed purposes of the so-called tax reform. It really means it is difficult to have tax reform. We can have tax change.

Even if the bill moves quickly through the legislative process, the odds against its implementation seem to have lengthened. The sheer complexity of the bill is staggering. This in itself is a considerable obstacle. Further, Mr. Chairman, new barriers have been erected by the American surtax and American objections to the bill. I think it is very significant that the Americans have possession of the bargaining power with which to make their objections stick.

Certain things in this bill have already attracted the interest of the Americans. Pension funds are required, under the reform legislation, to limit their foreign assets to 10 per cent in order to retain their tax-free status. The Minister of Finance has made the same case for limiting the qualification for lowering the corporate tax on the first $50,000 to Canadian-controlled companies. While we may feel these measures are beneficial to us, they have invited the interest of the Americans. This is of significance. It is one of the things included in the so-called shopping list which was leaked to the Chicago newspaper last week.

The Minister of Finance has denied that there is discrimination. However, if one set of investors is given favourable tax treatment there is certainly discrimination against the other. I do not think many in Canada have "bought" the argument of the Minister of Finance. Certainly the Americans have not. We will see whether there will be any changes in the future.

I wish to specifically deal with the small business deductions. This aspect of the proposed tax changes came in for a great deal of discussion during the hearings on the white paper on tax reform. It was no secret that the authors of the white paper believed that the small business deductions should be wiped out entirely. Indeed, their tables indicated they expected to get the bulk of the money to make up the deficit for lowering the personal income tax from wiping out the small business reduced taxation on the first $35,000 of profit.

It is significant to note that everyone was in general favour of the retention of the reduced rate for small business, including the very large corporations. They all suggested that the small business alleviation was very useful and necessary, even though it was agreed that it should not be available for very large corporations. There was some agreement that some restrictions should be put into the new reform legislation. My criticism is that these have been far too great, larger than necessary and may well defeat the purpose of the small business alleviation.

It should be noted at the outset that the incentive is in fact restricted to an incorporated enterprise and is not available to a proprietorship, partnership or business trust. This is not good. It is one of the weaknesses in the taxation bill now before us. The preservation of the distinction between forms of business enterprise for tax purposes will make it impossible for the courts to look to substance rather than form in many instances, for the form is deemed by the tax statute itself to make substantial differences in tax treatment. I think this is a problem that we have in tax legislation. We do not recognize the unincorporated business, the individual entrepreneur, nearly enough in our economic community.

Generally speaking, the present tax on corporations, regardless of the size or nationality of the ownership, is 21 per cent on the first $35,000 of taxable income and 50 per cent on the excess. The new bill will cause a reduction of one percentage point per year until it reaches 46 per cent. This, of course, has been changed by the minister's announcement of a reduction of 7 per cent only until the end of 1972, when presumably it will revert to 49 per cent unless the government decrees otherwise.

The clauses dealing with small business deductions have been subjected to such rigidly prescribed conditions that it is doubtful they will do the job that this reduced rate was supposed to do. Indeed, it is one of the items in the so-called shopping list which the Americans felt discriminated against them. There are so many restrictions in the tax bill on small business that it seems almost certain that many will not take advantage of it.

Under the new tax rates the small business incentive is significantly less generous than the present low rate, particularly when the annual taxable income is less than $35,000 and where the corporation accumulates its taxable income. For instance, a corporation which recorded earnings of $30,000 would be required to pay $6,300 in taxes, whereas under the new rate it would pay a further $1,450. So the new tax proposals are far less generous than in the past, particularly in light of the proposal to reduce the corporation tax rate from 50 per cent to 46 per cent—at the present time, from 50 per cent to 43 per cent.

It is significant that small business will soon be taxed at the rate of 25 per cent. In an extreme situation it could happen that an otherwise qualified corporation which earned a taxable income of $400,000 in the first year of the new system and paid no dividends would be eligible for $50,000 of small business deduction in that year and no subsequent small business deduction. It would then cease to qualify for the small business deduction. This can be contrasted with the present system where both corporations would be eligible for the low rate of tax on the first $35,000. It is also significant that taxable incomes are important factors in the cumulative deduction account, so that the $400,000 maximum amount would be net of business losses, but would include non-business income and capital gains, which would have the effect of significantly reducing the attractiveness of the small business low rate.

The corporations eligible for the small business rate have been significantly reduced in number. They must be private corporations resident in Canada. They cannot be public corporations or controlled in any manner whatsoever by a public corporation, and they cannot be held in any manner whatsoever by one or more non-resident corporations. A public corporation is defined as one listed on the Canadian Stock Exchange or by definition of the minister.

Mr. Chairman, because payment of dividends can extend the period for eligibility, there will be considerable jockeying going on between not paying dividends, facing a potentially higher capital gain, and not getting further small business deduction on the one hand and, on the other hand, paying dividends, thereby extending eligibility for the small business deduction which potentially reduces the subsequent capital gain, but facing the immediate impact of personal taxation.

The new tax changes basically require an owner to run his business to comply with the regulations so that he can obtain the best tax advantage rather than running his business as an expansionary corporation. In dealing with the matter of so-called ineligible investments, the bill seems to be quite complex. The thrust of the intended procedure is to ensure that the 25 per cent small business deduction is available only where the funds are used to expand business or have been brought to personal tax by dividend distribution. The corporation can no longer be used to shelter excess funds from personal tax unless the excess funds are invested in short-term paper or bank accounts. One major criticism of the bill in this area relates to its complexity so far as small business is concerned. It appears that the small business corporation has most of the accounting difficulty of the larger business, and additional problems in complying with clause 125. What, in effect, is the 25 per cent tax on business income on Canadian-controlled private corporations is arrived at by deductions from the usual corporation tax rate. The tax decreases as the general corporation rate decreases, thus arriving at the 25 per cent figure at all times. It might have been simpler to have taken the 25 per cent tax rate on the small business when the preferred rate ends.

In the clauses dealing with the Canadian-controlled private company which has taken advantage of the small business low rate of taxes, an interesting situation would arise. The complicated formula for the new tax is applicable, but in fact it means that there will be a recapture of the small business deduction benefit previously received, minus an allowance for dividends previously paid. The maximum amount recapturable would be $100,000. It appears obvious that control could change voluntarily by the sale of that control to non-residents, but could also occur involuntarily with the death of a Canadian controlling shareholder who bequeaths his shares to a non-resident heir.

The tax would also not become exigible if control were acquired by a Canadian public corporation or if the company itself went public. It would appear that in both these cases subsequent conversion to a private corporation controlled by non-residents would trigger the tax. The apparent intent of these new clauses is presumably to prevent the sale of Canadian companies to non-residents. This required refund of the small business deduction tax savings is likely to depress the price a non-resident is prepared to pay for the shares of the corporation, particularly where the price placed on the shares is close to break-up value.

When taken together with the deductibility of interest on money borrowed to buy shares, it would seemingly place acquisition-minded Canadian corporations in a better competitive position vis-à-vis their non-resident competitors. However, this aspect is one of government policy. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) stated in his budget speech on June 18, "We intend that the small business incentive be available only to Canadians, that it should encourage Canadian ownership of our expanding business. Accordingly, if control is acquired by non-residents, the corporation must repay over a five-year period the tax advantage it has received".

However, it is pointed out that clause 190 appears to apply only to share purchases and that the whole principle of the clause can be circumvented by foreign companies making a purchase of assets. This would create an artificial situation. In addition, we note that to the extent the cumulative deduction account has a positive value, a Canadian purchaser may also be driven to purchase assets rather than shares. We therefore question whether the proposed legislation has done anything except require a sale of assets rather than a sale of shares as far as the United States resident purchaser is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, in the clause related to small business deductions the government has significantly narrowed the small business advantage. It has increased the tax on all those who are eligible from 21 per cent to 25 per cent under the $35,000 profit. Only in the group making from $35,000 to $50,000 profit will there be any significant tax relief, and this group seems very limited.

In effect, under this act the government has substantially reduced tax relief to small business. The effect of clause 125 on small businesses which some years are over $50,000 and some years under is to discriminate against them. If there is in excess of $50,000 in any one year, it cannot be applied against the deficiency in another year. It seems likely that only small businesses which do not intend to grow will be happy with this proposed tax feature. Companies that had a good growth potential might still decide to pay full taxes in order to increase their leeway for future selling.

The clauses dealing with the sale of companies to non-residents are definitely discriminatory and are viewed as such by the rest of the world. By allowing capital to move freely across our borders we are, in my opinion, improving prospects for Canada's independence far more than by setting up nationalistic barriers to investment. New capital bolsters our economy by strengthening it, and it is that strength that will help ensure our national survival. The clause dealing with the sale of small companies to foreign investors, losing tax incentives earned in previous years, seems to me a retrogressive step.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I should like to touch on two aspects of the bill before the committee. One is its effect on co-operatives and credit unions, the other its effect on the farming sector in general. I have spoken before in this House about its effects on co-operatives and credit unions and I do so again only because I am daily receiving representations from national offices of co-operatives as well as from local co-operatives and credit unions in my constituency. Since being here I have yet to receive so many representations expressing serious concern, not simply that less money will be saved by the members of co-ops or credit unions but that co-operatives and credit unions will not be able to stay in business at all or be able effectively to discharge their responsibilities to the people in their community, those who established the credit unions in the first place.

The credit unions in western Canada, and I suppose in central Canada as well, offer an alternative to the regular commercial bank. They do not displace the commercial banking system; in business centres of any size one will see both the credit union and the commercial bank doing business and operating effectively. However, to a very large extent they probably have displaced finance companies in small centres or, if they have not displaced them, have certainly served needs well enough to limit the operation of finance companies, as we use the term, in such communities. If that is the case, then the credit union is saving those communities a considerable amount of money as well as increasing the spending power of the people. For those reasons I become very concerned when the government proposes what is almost a punitive tax in this regard.

I should like to read part of a letter I received from the Langham Credit Union. They say:

> In connection with the taxation proposals affecting credit unions, the board of directors of the Langham credit union, at our meeting on October 12, have gone on record as being opposed to the taxation of dividends and guarantee reserves of credit unions.
> The board of directors have acted on behalf of the interests of our 1,200 members and ask for your support of our position when the tax bill is being debated.

I also received a letter from the Hafford credit union some 40 miles further to the north, who write in the same vein. I am not going to quote the letter, but it does set out in detail the amount of money they handle as well as the amount of credits which pass to their members. The total savings in this community amounted to $948,062. In terms of business operations these days, that is not a large amount, but this credit union is pretty important to the people of the community because it allows them to use their money to help themselves. This credit union states that its members are quite willing to pay taxes on the income they have, but they do not think that any tax proposals put through this House should prevent their using the money to effect savings.

Consumer and production co-operatives seem even more concerned about how this legislation will affect them. These co-operatives include retail outlets in the city of Saskatoon as well as the Federated Co-operative which operates refineries, feed mills and lumber mills and manufactures fertilizer. This is a large, producer-oriented organization.

• (8:30 p.m.)

In the House today the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion was asked whether he could do something about Imperial Oil moving refineries from a certain area in western Canada so as to ensure that some development was left in less industrialized areas. As I recall, his reply was that he did not have control in those areas, that he could lend money to commercial organizations such as Imperial Oil—although I do not know why it would be necessary—in order to influence their decision, but that that essentially was the limit of his power. I suspect he was quite right.

However, there is one refinery in Regina which is owned by co-operatives and which will stay in the area. No government will have to bribe it to stay in the area and no law is necessary to force it to stay there, because it is owned by the people of the area and that is where they want it. With their money they built it and it is Canadian owned; we do not have to worry about the Americans, the Japanese or any other country owning it and moving it away.

There is another reason why I find it so difficult to understand the approach of the government with regard to co-operatives in western Canada. If it is employment we want, we want institutions that can employ people and improve their standard of living such as co-operatives, credit unions and credit societies that are gradually built up over the years and can provide this service. It may be that as we carry on with this very complicated and, as the previous speaker said, complex and wide ranging bill affecting a great many people, some changes will be made. But it started out pretty badly and has left a great many people wondering what its objective really is, whether it is to raise money, to please the equitable tax foundation or to cut down the effectiveness of co-operatives as real competitors within our society, because that is what they are.

I should like to say a few words regarding farm taxation as it is dealt with in the bill. One thing about which we are concerned with regard to farm taxation is that the method of taxation does not make it any easier than it is now for the family farm or the individually operated or controlled farm to survive. Some aspects of this bill seem to work against the survival of the individual farm, particularly in the areas of capital formation and the maintenance of capital in the individual farm.

Individual farms are not very strong units in terms of capital formation and the retention of capital; that is, the resources available to them are usually limited. This is demonstrated by the fact that over the years we have had the Farm Credit Corporation lending money to farms and we have had to set up a federal agency to provide working capital for farm structures to enable them to expand to a workable size. This would indicate to anyone who thinks about it that the ability of the individual farm to gather together working capital is limited. The fact that provincial governments have moved into this field from time to time indicates the same thing. Yet the bill takes no account of this fact in its approach to the capital gains tax.

It seems to me that some thought should be given to the possibility of not collecting a capital gains tax so long as the transfer is made within the family from one generation to another. It should be possible to devise a method whereby capital gains tax was not collected so long as the farm remained within the family. If at some point it was transferred out of the family's hands and a realized capital gain was made, the taxing body would be entitled to treat that unit in the same way as any other business enterprise with regard to recovery at that point.

I do not know whether members across the way are as concerned as we are about the continuance of the family farm or the individually-operated farm as against the corporate structure. If they are, they should try to ensure that the tax structure is such that the family farm can survive and continue to operate.

There are two other areas of concern that occur to me, one of which is the basic herd concept. The proposal is to eliminate the basic herd concept, and that is not good. The simple idea behind the basic herd concept was to allow an accumulation of capital in a basic herd because it was difficult for the farmer to acquire in one chunk the amount of capital necessary to put together a complete herd, and this was a method by which capital could be accumulated and a herd built up. It is as simple as that.

I sat with a group on a reserve in Saskatchewan listening to them talk about getting together a couple of hundred thousand dollars to build a herd. The first thing they talked about was management, and the second was money, where to get the money with which to go into this kind of enterprise. We had a system which permitted this kind of accumulation and I cannot understand why it is now thought necessary to tear it down.

The same consideration should be given to the depreciation of farm machinery. I would hope we could continue with the straight line depreciation which permits the retention of gains when machinery is traded back. There may be those who complain because any capital gain that may be made at the time of the trade is not taxed immediately. But I suggest that if we insist that any capital gains be recovered at the time machinery is traded, one of two things will happen—either the capital value of farm machinery as a whole, as well as the investment, will decline or the method of trading farm machinery will be completely altered in the very near future; because it should be obvious that a farmer can hardly pay the income tax on a capital gain of $5,000 when he does not have any actual cash out of the deal.

The alternative, of course, is to buy the new machine at the lowest possible price and sell the old machine outright for whatever it will bring. This would cause a major change in dealership operations as well as farm operations in respect of the purchase of machinery. If this is the government's objective, all right, but surely the government should understand what it is doing and what the net result will be.

These are the few points I wanted to make in a general way this evening. My main point is that by this bill you can change the structures which exist in respect of doing business in the farm sector, you can tear co-operatives down and cause a great deal of difficulty, but it will take much smarter men and a government with a much greater understanding of the needs of the farmer and the rural community to put these structures together again.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, not having participated previously in this debate, I thought I should make a few comments at this time on Bill C-259. I join those who have said that the effect of this bill on co-operatives and credit unions will not be good. The government talks about its financial and monetary policies to curb inflation, but why does it have to increase the tax on organizations which are providing services and goods to ordinary people?

Co-operatives and credit unions will not go out of business because of this bill: they will stay in business, but will have to charge more for the goods and services they provide to the people. Probably they will not be in a position to pay the same kind of dividends to people who hold shares in their organizations. This item in the bill is inflationary because the people who use these goods and services will have to pay more for them because the government thinks it will get a little more money by taxing co-operatives and credit unions. I hope the government will take a second look at this part of the legislation which is obnoxious to many people.

A good deal has been said about the size of this bill, its proliferation of material and how it will affect the lives of Canadians. We have had income tax bills before. Probably there were loopholes in the legislation and areas which did not cover all the fields in which the government might collect money. However, rather than bring in this huge monstrosity I think the government might have been wise to consider other income tax legislation and amend it here and there, instead of bringing in this bill which lawyers and accountants say will be so difficult to understand that they are not sure it will provide the benefit or advantage that has been suggested.

Most of us in this House realize from time to time that the people of Canada never have been too happy about paying income tax, because most of us have had people come to us with income tax problems. These people ask us to get them out of a mess with the government, or with the law so they can look their fellow man in the face again. When this legislation becomes law, the courts probably will not be large enough to handle all the cases because no one will be able to understand what is going on.

We remember the feeling people had when a man came to their door with a briefcase and said he was going to charge them with an infraction of the income tax laws. Many of us have had the experience of farmers who wondered whether someone was coming to say something was wrong with their income tax return. This feeling will be magnified as a result of the immense bill we have before us tonight. And even that is not big enough because we understand there are to be 100 more amendments to it. Of course, the parliamentary secretary will realize this is not new in respect of this government. I would like someone to point out how many pieces of legislation have been brought in here in the last five years which have not had to be amended either by the government itself or through the assistance of the opposition. It is about time, with the proliferation of people in the government, that the government could bring in a piece of legislation which would not have to be amended.

Mr. Mahoney: It is respect for the opposition.

Mr. Howe: Oh! Here we have the government arguing that the opposition is wasting time, and the parliamentary secretary indicating it is the opposition which improves the legislation. I had thought that with all the parliamentary secretaries and ministries of state there would not be many problems in preparing a piece of legislation.

Here, again, we have a piece of legislation which was mentioned in the budget of last June, and then just last Thursday they had to bring in another mini-budget to fill in the holes because they began to realize this legislation would do nothing for the economy of the nation and that it was necessary to bolster it up. But we know this is not the first time a Liberal government has got our country into a mess. I refer to 1957 when a Conservative government was elected. We found quite a mess in those days. Somebody found the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce and in it was the whole story.

Some of the features which were brought in last Thursday are supposed to be new. But how different are they from the measures the Conservative government adopted in 1957 to clean up the mess they inherited from the Liberal party? We are told about the thousands of people who are to be taken off the income tax rolls. The Hon. Donald Fleming did that in 1959 in order to bolster the economy after the mess we inherited. Hon. members opposite would not wish to remember or think about that.

Why are the farmers in such a mess today? It is because the government did not sell the wheat in the west and told the farmers to diversify. Farmers turned to the production of hogs and chickens and flooded the whole country with these products, with the result that agriculture is in a terribly depressed condition at this time. There are one or two suggestions I should like to make in respect of omissions from this bill, matters which were also left out of the mini-budget of last week. I refer to the fact that in spite of all the representations made by prospective home owners and householder organizations that the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials should be eliminated, this has not been done. I think it is very important that it be done at the present time because despite the announcement last Thursday that the government will be making more money available for the building of houses, the average individual today finds housing too expensive. Steps should be taken to reduce the cost of house building. If the sales tax were removed it would cut the cost of a house by $1,000—just enough to meet the inflation in house building for a one-year period.

According to Statistics Canada, between August, 1970, and August, 1971, the cost of lumber and lumber products went up by 12.3 per cent. What effect will that have on the building industry? It means that a man buying or building a house will have to pay a price that he really cannot afford. There are thousands of people in Canada who cannot meet present mortgage costs even though those costs are spread over a 30-year period. Most of us, Mr. Chairman, would be very disturbed if we had to carry the mortgage costs that some of our children have to meet today. If the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials were removed, it would be a tremendous incentive to people who want to buy their own homes.

I remind hon. members that a few years ago the government instituted a $500 bonus program payable to individuals who built their houses in wintertime. A recent survey by Manpower Services Limited indicates that there will be a 23.1 per cent reduction in personnel employed in the building and construction industry this winter. We have a lot of unemployment now, Mr. Chairman, but here is a survey which says there will be a 23.1 per cent reduction in personnel employed in this industry. If the government gave an incentive to people to build their own houses during wintertime, by eliminating the 11 per cent sales tax and offering a $500 bonus, this could have a tremendous effect on the industry and on keeping people employed in it.

There is another suggestion I wish to make. It would cost the government a little money but it is a program that worked in the days when we were in power. It would help some of the people in the building industry whose employment is threatened. I suggest an advertising program urging people to do repairs, plumbing and plastering during the winter months. Hon. members will remember the slogan, "Why wait for spring? Do it now." It was effective. The government should give some thought to reinstituting that program.

I do not think we have enough incentive programs for people to improve their way of life, the service they give, the product they make and the job they do. Many of us are disturbed that production per man in Canada has dropped considerably over the last year or so. In the Ottawa Journal of Friday, June 18, there was an editorial entitled, "Canada Would Be The 47th State." It quoted the views of Robert Bonner, the former Attorney General of British Columbia, who retired from politics and became vice-chairman of MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. He made these points speaking at the University of Western Ontario:

> There was a time when Canada ranked second only to the U.S. as measured by gross national product per capita. We are now fourth in world rank by this measure—Sweden and Switzerland having displaced us in recent years.
> If we are going to spend as the American Joneses, whom we unconsciously imitate, we should first try to earn as the Joneses do.
> Canadian income per capita ranked ahead only of West Virginia, Alabama, Arkansas and Mississippi.

Our productive capacity per individual has dropped and this has had inflationary consequences. I believe that the government should introduce legislation providing an incentive to those corporations and companies which allow employee participation in profits. Such corporations should receive a special tax concession. If an individual knows he is going to get a little more for working harder and producing a better product, in turn his efforts will increase the gross national product.

Corporations would be able to reduce the price of their products or the services they supply. Such a program would create better employer-worker relations. The employee would feel he had a stake in the business. Today we hear many manufacturers complain that they have to take reduced prices for many of their products that are classed as seconds simply because of poor workmanship. This has an adverse effect on their profits. There are companies which operate in this way at the present time, but if the government provided incentives to corporations to allow employee participation it would be a great help in combating inflation, reducing costs and bringing about better employer-employee relations.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, when I look at this bill, see how long we will spend on it—not to mention the 95 amendments tabled by the minister—and realize the number of businessmen, accountants and lawyers who will have to spend weeks and months trying to understand and interpret it, I feel it should be withdrawn. If implemented now, it will interfere with the ideas presented to us last Thursday night, ideas that might do the job that the government has been attempting for so long, namely, get the economy out of low gear.

I agree with the article in the Toronto Globe and Mail of October 15, headed "No Time for New Tax Law." From it I read the following excerpts:

> W. A. Macdonald, Toronto tax expert, this week neatly capsuled for the Ontario Economic Council some of the reasons why it would be wiser to put the tax bill back on the shelf for the time being.
> For one thing, it is so big and so complicated that only a few experts can ever hope to understand it and even they don't yet. As Mr. Macdonald says, it's ironic that a government which insists that business make everything understandable for the consumer should not give two pins about making taxation understandable for the taxpayer. On this score alone the bill should be delayed for proper assessment . . .
> Finally, will the tax bill do anything to strengthen the Canadian economy to meet the pressures created by Mr. Nixon? The answer has to be no. It could damage the capacity of our industry to compete, it could enlarge our problems with the United States, our biggest customer, it would certainly divert vast stocks of both public and private energy to the sterile business of examining the tax structure when that energy is urgently needed on the economic front.
> It hardly seems necessary to add that Finance Minister Edgar Benson should do at once what he should have done before—withdraw that tax bill and concentrate all his efforts on our real problems.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: Withdraw the bill and then resign.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the government will take into consideration the suggestions I have made which I think are important if we are to get our economy back on track.

[Translation]

Mr. Rodrigue: Mr. Chairman, I would like at this stage in the consideration of this bill to make a few comments on tax reform.

Almost two years ago, the government tabled a White Paper on tax reform. The White Paper and the introduction of the bill before us have not thus been conjured out of thin air. The bulky measure has been in preparation for at least ten years.

Indeed, that measure will have far-reaching effects on our economy. A great number of Canadians will be involved one way or another by the proposed changes. A certain number of persons—allegedly 700,000—will no longer have to pay income tax, which means that since they do not have a sufficient income, the experts of the department have decided to strike the names of those taxpayers off their lists.

On the other hand, new kinds of income will henceforth become taxable, probably in order to allow the government to collect the same revenue. I would be surprised by the contrary.

By the way cuts and additions have been made here and there, I would be surprised if the government were to collect less. I think it will collect more especially because of the new factors included in that tax reform.

Consequently the government is about to collect more. Experts say such is not the case but past experience allows us to believe it will be so.

After the supplementary budget was announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on October 14—budget that will show a deficit of over $1 billion—the government goes on following the beaten track. Interest rates will be pushed higher by new debts. Consequently, tax receipts will have to be maintained at the present level and perhaps increased. However, the bill now under study will ensure the continuity of tax receipts and everything in the bill has been planned to that effect. I am sure that this objective will be reached.

Since some people had nothing left because they had been squeezed until they were dead broke, it became necessary in order to keep the same level of tax income to impose another group by adding new elements to the tax system. So that was the trick.

In ten years from now, this group called the middle class will be eliminated, because we will then be at the same point we now are. The problem will be very hard to solve. Groups of experts and economists will be at work two years hence, to prepare the next tax reform, which will likely be introduced in this House in the eighties. Then, the middle class will not appear any longer on the list, because it will no longer be able to contribute to taxation. The tax burden will then be carried by the better off people. What we call tax reform is not really a reform at all.

In a speech the Minister of Finance delivered in Toronto on August 26 last, he stated, and I quote:

> As I stated in my budget speech, the publication of the white paper has been an important stage in the development of participatory democracy in Canada. Thanks to the debate, the discussion it gave rise to, it has been possible to develop a tax reform program which not only meets Canada's needs but also reflects the views of the Canadian people.

I have received many letters and briefs from individuals, groups of citizens, co-operatives, caisses populaires and credit unions. Having read them, I have a feeling that "participatory democracy" is not functioning very well. I am rather inclined that it is a one way proposition.

I might understand better if the hon. minister were more specific about what he means when he speaks of the "needs of Canada and the Canadian people".

The tabling, by the minister, of 95 amendments to his own bill is another indication that he has doubts, that the proposed reforms are not specific enough, or that they have not been studied in depth. Is it any wonder, then, that there should be protests? We cannot expect the people to understand every proposed change, when those who have drafted and considered them for years are "lost" and unable to give straight explanations, especially on the clauses concerning co-operatives, caisses populaires and credit unions.

In the case of co-operatives, the government has introduced a new aspect in its taxation system, that is the concept of used capital. This new element in the legislation and which applies exclusively to co-operatives and credit unions seems to me to be discriminatory.

Bill C-259 is aimed at burdening co-operatives and credit unions with tax loads similar to those which must be assumed by other kinds of ventures, while they do not enjoy the same advantages. They are submitted to a taxation method which is inconsistent with their nature and which would require, if they wanted to comply therewith, that they renounce their fundamental characters.

Co-operatives and credit unions are unlike other businesses. They do not enjoy the privileges granted to big corporations or to banks, which may mint the credit of society. All that co-operatives have managed to gather is voluntary service.

It matters, at this stage, to recall the elements which distinguish co-operatives from other firms. First, these are firms whose members are owners and users. Then, these are corporations whose members exercise control in a democratic fashion. And last, these are firms whose members distribute the benefits at the end of the year, not in proportion to invested capital, but on the basis of the use of services.

Starting from these three elements, one may say that co-operatives, caisses populaires and credit unions are different from other firms.

Bill C-259 purports to interfere with the internal management of co-operatives and the relationship between the corporation and its members, and this, against the basic rules of co-operation. The tax system to which Bill C-259 will subject co-operatives does not only retain the concept of an arbitrary return on the capital employed for the purpose of determining the income of such institutions; it also gives definitions and proposes a series of provisions which increase the gravity of the consequences of the use of that taxation formula, the latter having no logical basis and being, to all appearances, discriminating.

The co-operative movement has always stated clearly that it is not asking for any preferential treatment, but that it wants co-operative associations to be recognized for what they are. Far from acceding to this request, Bill C-259 places co-operatives and credit and savings unions in an unfavourable position by comparison with companies and other corporations.

When the government proposes, in the case of caisses populaires and the credit unions, that the social capital—which we call social shares—be considered on the same footing as company shares, that is simply arbitrary.

The members' savings called "shares" are, for all practical purposes, demand deposits which may be withdrawn at any time. In short, such amounts are deposits similar to those committed to trust companies.

As the capital of the caisses populaires and credit unions does not appreciate, there cannot be any capital gains. It is exactly like all other funds deposited with trust and finance companies and banks.

It is no secret that trust companies and chartered banks are accepting deposits in the same way as the caisses populaires and credit unions. Are such deposits subjected or will they be subjected to the requirements which are anticipated for the caisses populaires and credit unions? I do not think so. So, why incorporate these provisions in clause 137?

Contrary to what we are led to believe by the tax reform bill and the minister's interpretation, the caisses populaires do not need permanent capital to operate. They lend to their members the savings they receive on a day to day basis, or, very seldom, the amounts they are legally entitled to borrow. Therefore, aside from reserves for doubtful debts, they have no capital. They exist solely in order to promote the economic and social interests of their members, whose welfare is their only objective.

Up to now, the bonus paid to members out of social capital was viewed by the government as interest income and reported on T-5 forms, tax being paid by members receiving such interest.

The attitude of Bill C-259 towards caisses populaires and credit unions is arbitrary and anti-democratic. It is flatly taxing voluntary activities of people who for many years have been working without remuneration for these co-operatives, resulting in the accumulation of their present reserves and those of credit unions. Credit unions have been built up through voluntary service and dedication.

I know in some sectors they are viewed with disfavour, which is easy to understand since they do not allow for control and manipulation at will of the savings of the people. Thence the necessity for inequitable legislation to destroy the instruments the people have given themselves, building them up through their work over many years.

For the last 20 years, the caisse populaire in my hometown has financed the construction of some 1,000 housing units while the CMHC has built 53 only. If the people had had to wait until the government provided them with houses, I wonder where we would be today. I do not mention here the various loans granted to businessmen and individuals who would have been required to pay higher interest rates to finance companies which are nothing but branches in disguise of chartered banks.

The caisses populaires and credit unions have greatly assisted thousands of people in Canada and to some of them this help was the stepping stone which has enabled them to solve their financial difficulties and obtain the bare necessities of life. The merits and the part which credit unions have played in Canada are being recognized today across the country to the extent that if they did not exist, it would be necessary to create them.

We must keep in mind that people who put their money in cooperatives or caisses populaires are liable to income tax. There is no question that dividends received from savings organizations should be taxable, regardless of the level at which each member is taxed.

The whole of society will suffer great hardships unless we provide for some adjustment of our tax system to the structures and the unique role of co-operatives, caisses populaires and credit unions.

I have asked on several occasions during this session, on behalf of all Canadians, and particularly of the people in my constituency, for more equitable tax exemptions.

The $1,000 personal exemption is totally inadequate, in view of the price increases to which we have been subjected for the past 20 years.

The bill now under consideration would increase exemptions to $1,500 for single taxpayers and $2,850 for married, taxpayers—which amounts, for all practical purposes, to $29 a week for a single person, and $55 a week for a married couple.

Those amounts are even below the minimum needed to live decently which has been set by the Economic Council of Canada, a governmental body.

The present amounts of $1,000 and $2,000 were set 22 years ago, in 1949. If it took 22 years to economists and top civil servants to achieve such a result, I am wondering how long we will have to wait until a proposal is brought before the House again in order to review the basic exemptions proposed in this bill.

If he really wants to be realistic the minister should review his position concerning basic exemptions and think it over more carefully in order to take into account the present circumstances, especially the cost of living.

[English]

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a little of the committee's time and make a few points regarding Bill C-259 while we are still on the general discussion. I hope to be able to make further observations when we discuss the bill clause by clause. We are discussing one of the most difficult and complex pieces of legislation that has ever been presented to Parliament. It is immensely complicated. I only read as far as page 8, and anyone who does not think it is complicated need only look at such subclauses as are found on that page of the bill. I think it is worth putting clause 6(2)(a) on the record. It deals with the reasonable stand-by minimum amount charge with respect to the operation of a car and provides as follows:

—where the employer owned the automobile at any time in the year, an amount in respect of its capital cost to the employer equal to the percentage thereof obtained when 1 per cent is multiplied by the quotient obtained when such of the aggregate number of days hereinbefore referred to as were days during which the employer owned the automobile is divided by 30 (except that if the quotient so obtained is not a full number it shall be taken to the nearest full number or, if there is no nearest full number, then to the full number next below it)—

And so on.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, there is no simultaneous translation.

Mr. Nesbitt: Who on earth could translate that?

Mr. Bell: Explain.

Mr. Hales: I said it was complicated and I illustrated my point by reading part of one subclause.

Mr. Mahoney: That should not be beyond the grasp of the average individual.

Mr. Hales: This bill is tremendously important to the taxpayer and has a great effect on the pocketbooks of Canadians.

Mr. Nesbitt: It will help to line the pocketbooks of lawyers and accountants.

Mr. Hales: The new tax system will have tremendous ramifications for us all. Certainly, the new income tax bill is a complex tax structure. In our consideration of this bill we must think of something else, too. This bill was drafted some time ago when the economy of the country was supposed to be moving ahead. Now the atmosphere is entirely different. Our economic outlook is far from good. We are faced with the 10 per cent United States surcharge. We have Great Britain entering the European Common Market and many other economic clouds hanging over us. They were not there when the bill was drafted.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Does the bill fit the present-day situation? If we ask ourselves that question sincerely, we will have to say no, it does not. Beyond the impact of the bill on individuals there is another aspect of taxation which affects the whole economy. That is its capacity for growth in the country, its capacity to adapt to changing conditions in the country and changing conditions in the world. The question we must ask ourselves and the government is, what does this tax package really accomplish in terms of the health of the whole Canadian economy? What do these changes do, for example, to help us fight the battle of massive unemployment and the battle of inflation? What do they do to improve or even maintain our trading position in the world where all the established trading partners are under attack and have been for a long time?

With regard to world trade, what is there in this bill that will take care of the situation of the United Kingdom entering the European Common Market? What about the free trade aspect of this situation? What discussions went on with regard to consideration of the products which we now sell to the United Kingdom? Was any thought given to Canada becoming an associate member of the European Common Market? I doubt whether this bill will fit into the general economic situation when we consider all these categories.

In the short time that is available to me I will restrict my remarks to four or five headings. First, the rearrangement of depreciation on residential apartments or accommodation; second, the concern of municipalities regarding tax reform on anti-pollution devices; third, how this new tax bill will affect the farmers as I see it in my particular area. I will mention one or two examples of the new tax as it affects the taxpayer who thinks he will have a great reduction in income tax. I think I will be able to show that it is not very great. There is also the idea of why some arrangement was not made for the young married couple, for example, buying a home. They are paying principal and interest on their mortgage, and no arrangement has been made and no thought given to their being able to deduct the interest payments from their taxable income.

I would like now to make a few comments under each of these headings, Mr. Chairman. With regard to the arrangement of the depreciation on residential apartments, this new tax bill will have no effect other than to raise rents and interest rates. It seems most unfair that the government has changed the rules of the game halfway through. Many people in Canada have invested their money in apartment buildings. They did so because there was a certain money into residential buildings, thereby providing housing or residences which are so badly needed in Canada.

Under this new bill there will be the matter of the terminal tax liability taking place. Each year the depreciation will have to be written off. There are other facts stated in that clause which are very complicated. I must admit that I do not fully understand them, even lawyers and accountants will have their problems. In any event, it will not be conducive for people to invest their savings in apartment buildings, etc. They will not be keen to do so. It certainly will not be attractive for them to put their money into such enterprises. If this is the case, we will have higher rents and higher interest rates, two things we cannot afford in this country. We want the opposite. We want rents to come down and interest rates to be lowered.

With regard to the concern of municipalities in connection with tax on anti-pollution material, I understand the association of mayors and reeves is quite concerned about this. On June 18 the Minister of Finance said:

> To further encourage the acquisition of anti-pollution equipment, I wish to announce the immediate withdrawal of the sales tax on such equipment used in production. This new exemption will apply to all machinery and apparatus which manufacturers or producers acquire to detect, prevent, remove or reduce pollutants of water, soil or air. The exemption will reduce revenues by about $8 million a year.

The municipalities are not to have the same privilege. The manufacturers and producers will be granted a blanket exemption from federal sales tax on all anti-pollution equipment. Municipalities will continue to be granted only a very few specific exemptions. The minister stated that the extension of this exemption to municipalities would create complex problems of definition. It is hard for me to realize why it would create a problem to arrive at a definition as between municipalities and the manufacturers who are going to buy such anti-pollution equipment. It seems most unfair that municipalities are discriminated against.

I wish to say a few words about how this bill will affect the farming community. There are several ways in which this bill will have very serious effects on farmers. Many have already been discussed in the House, but I would like to re-emphasize the extent to which these changes will work to the detriment of Canadian farmers. One general point is that all provisions applicable to farmers as individuals should in principle be applicable to family-held farming corporations. Many farmers have discussed this whole bookkeeping matter with their accountants. In many cases where there is a father and son arrangement, a partnership of brothers or some other family arrangement, they have been told it would be wise to incorporate their farms, there would be certain advantages. The same principle that applies to corporations should apply to the individual farmer.

What about the transfer of a farm within a family, whether by sale or inheritance, without realization of capital gains? This is very important. As I understand it, there is no provision for farms to be transferred within a family, except to a spouse, whether by sale or inheritance without immediate realization of capital gains. This is true of a sale or transfer of a farm to a son, or inheritance of the farm by a son.

We have been informed that this problem can be avoided in many cases by good estate planning through incorporation of a farm, and this may well be so. But even in such a case the death of a son, who would be the holder of common shares in an incorporation, prior to that of the father could result in realization of taxable capital gains while the father was still in active charge of the running of the farm, creating severe financial problems. There would be no alternative but to call an auction sale and sell the pure-bred herd which had been developed over the years and handed down. Now this kind of legislation comes in and there is no alternative but to fold up the whole works and call an auction sale.

Apart from this, I do not think it should in all cases be necessary for a farmer to incorporate in order to achieve stability and continuity of the farm business within the family. Payment of tax on capital gains out of the tied up assets of an on-going family farming operation could, and probably would be disruptive. I would strongly urge that the transfer of a farm to the son or daughter of a farmer, whether by sale, gift or inheritance carry with it no realization of capital gains at that time but that in later disposition capital gains be calculated on the basis of the evaluation initially established for capital gains purposes.

There is another clause in the bill which states that a farmer must be in residence on the farm during each year for which he qualifies for the $1,000 farm exemption option. There are real problems here. One only has to look at farming practices in western Canada and elsewhere. Some people do not have their principal residence on the farm; for reasons of the education of their children or other social amenities they live in adjacent towns or villages. This is especially prevalent in the prairie provinces. It should be possible, for years in which a taxpayer is engaged in farming, to utilize this option even if he is not resident on the farm. There are many problems which evolve from this. A son might be using the farm home while both he and his father work on the farm; the father might be retired and living off the farmstead while the farm continues to be worked by the son or hired help. There are many cases where this practice is prevalent.

The question of the basic herd has been discussed very thoroughly here tonight so I do not propose to take up the time of the committee other than to say that a farmer's capital investment in livestock should be treated as capital investment, and the only way in which this can be done is the way in which it has been done in the past, on the basis of a basic herd. Then we come to valuation day. When the value of the herd is to be established there are many things that come into the problem. It may be the time of year when the herd is not in its best condition, it may be a time when markets are at a low point, or it may be a time when the cows are in calf. All these things come into this question and create problems.

Then we have the matter of straight line depreciation. This is to be discontinued. Under the present bill, suppose a farmer bought a tractor for $10,000 and wrote it off down to $5,000; it appeared on his books as $5,000 and he traded it on a new one and a dealer allowed him $6,000 for the tractor. That $6,000 is not taxable under the present bill. Now he does not enjoy that option. He is to have a diminishing depreciation balance system which means, in the same circumstances, that with a $10,000 tractor he depreciates it to $5,000, trades it in and gets $6,000 for it, so he will have a gain of $1,000 and that $1,000 will be treated as capital gain. I do not think the farmer realizes that this is the situation he will face.

The first time he realizes what the government has done to him by changing straight line depreciation to the diminishing balance system will be when he trades his tractor for a new one. I think this is most serious, because farming is an operation which has to keep improving due to technological discoveries and inventions and with new machines coming out all the time. He has to replace his machinery frequently and this new tax will be a very serious handicap for him.

Many people think there is to be a great cut-back in taxes for Canadian taxpayers. I have considered the case of a married person with two children and an income of $8,000 a year. Under the present bill the tax would be $1,215. Under the new bill it will be $1,089. This is a reduction of $126 a year. Divide 52 into that amount and you get a cut of about $2.40 a week in income tax. This is a pretty small deal. It would pay for about five gallons of gas and he would burn that much up in no time going to and from work. So $2.40 a week is not much of a reduction. That is the way the working man looks at it—what comes off his weekly or bi-weekly cheque. When he sees about $2 a week taken off, he is not likely to be very enthusiastic about the new bill.

Take a single taxpayer getting the very minimum, or what we call a breadline wage of $1.50 an hour. He will be obliged to pay tax. He was paying a tax of $230 a year. Now that is to be cut to $204, a saving of $26 for a whole year. Divide that by 52 and you get a reduction of 50 cents per week. So it is not as attractive as we have been led to believe.

I do not know why provision was not made to take care of young people who are buying a home and struggling to pay off the mortgage. Principal and interest payments fall due every month or every six months, yet no thought has been given to allowing taxpayers to write off mortgage interest as part of their expenses, as is allowed business. I do not understand why.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Mr. Baldwin: Carry on.

The Chairman: Is it the unanimous wish of the committee that the hon. member be allowed to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hales: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I shall trespass on the time of the committee for only a very few minutes. As I was saying, I cannot understand why that was not done. Business is allowed to write off interest on mortgages, yet no similar consideration has been given to the position of a family buying a house. I cannot understand why this matter was not given consideration.

I shall conclude by saying that I think the minister has two things to consider and decide. Let me make two recommendations. First, this vast volume of 707 pages, weighing 5 pounds 14 ounces, should be divided into the portion that it is essential to complete by January 1, 1972. I think it is an imposition on the House to ask us to complete the whole bill in a thorough and a comprehensive way between now and the end of the year. It would be much better for the minister to pick out those sections that he feels should come into operation on January 1, 1972, and let us deal with them.

Second, I think the minister should give serious consideration to postponing the bill in view of the economic climate in this country and in the world in general. Now seems to be the wrong time in our history to bring in a revision as comprehensive as this to the tax structure of Canada. It would be much better to wait until the economy settles down and we know where we are going and what the future has in store for us.

In closing I should like to read two or three questions asked in a letter that I received today:

> Mr. Benson claims the economy is moving ahead at a fast rate. If so, why are so many municipalities complaining about their heavy welfare costs?
> Mr. Benson claims an unknown quantity of persons have joined the work force and given a false picture of the unemployment statistics. If this is the case, again, why are the welfare rolls so inflated? Can it be that a vast majority of welfare recipients are not destitute and in need of welfare?
> Mr. Benson reduces taxes after stating the government is ever watchful and take measures when needed. If this is the case, how did he bring down a program on the same day as the statistics were released? Are they satisfied with 7 per cent unemployment?
>
> The government, just a few weeks ago, proclaimed the "winter works programs were wasteful and not effective". Why have they now brought down a program which dwarfs all other "winter works programs"?
> It would seem to me the Liberal government are incompetent and arrogant and care little for the economy except as a political tool. Frankly, I am quite worried about the future and feel that we are in for a great deal of economic trouble unless we do something without weighing the political consequences first.

These are some of the sentiments of worried Canadians.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to my hon. friend and was tremendously impressed by what he had to say, as I am sure were hon. members opposite. However, as I have listened to what has been said by members on this side I have noticed that not one member on the government benches has risen to challenge the collective wisdom that has issued from this side of the House. If one member on the other side had had the courage to rise, I would have expected him to say something about the comments that have been made on this side, so we must take it for granted that hon. members opposite accept with some concern what we have been saying but have not the courage to admit it. I am afraid that when they come to vote they will follow the party line, as usual, and I regret this very much.

I was impressed by what the hon. member for Wellington had to say. He thought one thing the minister might do is to withdraw the bill. I would go one step further and say that he should withdraw the bill and resign, though I do not say necessarily in that order.

Mr. Hogarth: Do you think you would get any support for that proposition over here?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, I think there is quite a bit of support for that proposition over there, but the fear of political liquidation that faces hon. members who would sometimes like to express their views prevents their doing so. After all, there may yet be a few changes in parliamentary secretary positions, and a few ministers of state have yet to be appointed.

I refuse to be distracted by comments from hon. members opposite, let me return to my thought about the minister resigning after he first withdraws his bill. I thought of the nearest literary similarity to this, which is found in "A Tale of Two Cities", when at the end of the book Sydney Carter walked to the guillotine. As he did so he said: "It is far, far better thing that I do, than I have ever done." Cannot we visualize the Minister of Finance ascending the steps of the political guillotine, clutching his withdrawn bill to him and uttering those tremendous words?

We like the Minister of Finance, he is a fine fellow, but as a minister he has been an awful disaster, a catastrophe. We know it, the country knows it and I think some of his colleagues know it. If he would withdraw the bill and resign, he would still have a place left for himself in the hearts of the Canadian people.

Mr. Perrault: You are biased over there.

Mr. Baldwin: No, not biased; I am being completely objective in making that statement. I should like to say this about the bill, though we will be given an opportunity to deal with it in more detail when we enter clause by clause study. In view of the hour I must speak until ten o'clock, because we certainly do not want the vote on third reading tonight. The essence of a tax measure should be simplicity and equity, and this bill fails dismally on both counts. As far as the wording is concerned, I could read some of the bill's provisions which were referred to by the hon. member for Wellington. However, there is no doubt in my mind that what has happened here is that although there are a very few elements of tax reform, the people in the department, operating through the minister, have smuggled into the bill a large number of administrative decisions to make easier the administration of the bill, and at the expense of the poor harassed taxpayer. That is the end result of most of the changes that are envisaged.

We are told by those who are on the bridge of the Canadian ship of state to be calm, to be reassured, not to worry or fret, because all that has happened was known and was predictable; that we are in fact following a scientifically charted course that will lead us away from the abyss to the highlands of safety and security—what is known as the "Benson Big Rock Candy Mountain". What nauseating nonsense, Mr. Chairman!

Mr. Mahoney: You said it; it is your speech.

Mr. Baldwin: It is not only the people who are the elected representatives who are taking this course, those who have been chosen through the elective process to run the show, but their advisers, the modern witch doctors who are the new high priests at the altar of scientific economics, those who daily deal in the esoteric mysteries of predicting the course of human economic affairs. To these we have built great temples in Ottawa, and as they utter their incantations and follow their daily rituals, having looked deep into the holy vessels of their trade, they tell us what do to, how to do it, what will come to pass, when it will come, when we will go to the bathroom, what we will do when we get there, and how long we will stay. This is the kind of advice we are now getting from the economic advisers to the government.

If they should be out in their calculations, do they and their political masters accept the blame? No, of course not. Our employment figures are higher than they should be. Who is responsible? It is all those wretched and ungrateful people who insist upon working but are not supposed to work. They are the women who succumb to social pressures, as was indicated by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration; those ungrateful women who, instead of staying home as they are supposed to and being a statistic according to the statistics of the minister and his advisers, want to go out to work because they have to make a living and supplement the incomes of their husbands in order to make ends meet. That is the reason—

• (9:50 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Are you against that?

Mr. Baldwin: I am for it, but it is the ministers, the government and the Prime Minister, who should know better now. In their statements they have said that the unemployment statistics are unexpected because these wretched people insist on working. This is the kind of drivel which we are being handed.

Then there are the young people who, unable to pursue their training because of financial difficulties, want a job. When these people do this, when they refuse to be statistics within the level of the statistical information furnished, it is enough to make a bureaucrat give up and want to quit his job. They are the masses who do not respond to what bureaucrats want them to do, who refuse to accept their position in the statistical scenario which has been written, and who insist on their right to work because there is more dignity and honesty in a job than in being an unemployment statistic.

It was this government or its predecessor of the same party, with the advice of the same people, which said in 1965, "We must pay the Seaway workers an increase of 30 per cent," which set in motion an inflationary trend which did so much to destroy the economic life of this country. It was this government which said to us that with medicare and the pension plan our troubles were over, and now gives us the same bland assurance about unemployment insurance, a new labour code, a new competition act and a changed incidence of family allowances. They say that when these are passed we will have arrived at the millenium. What garbage!

Each time our great prophets solemnly and pompously told us that, and for a short while we accepted it; we had some belief in their hypotheses. But then the people began to wonder. They found it difficult to believe that the last few years would have left such a record of hopes blighted, of promises broken, of near disasters, of high intentions frustrated and low intentions consummated if we had been guided by other than error and mistake.

This reached its consummation when last Thursday the Minister of Finance and his fellow wanderers in the economic desert who do not have a chart and do not know how to look up at the stars made a statement in the House as to what their intentions were. Everything they had stood for, every premise which they had laid down, every cardinal economic philosophy which they had accepted was discarded when they did the greatest about-face in recent history.

An hon. Member: Try to be objective.

Mr. Baldwin: Many people have changed their minds, and it is proper they should; but none has left such a slimy trail behind him as the Minister of Finance in what he did last Thursday. Just one week before, the Minister of Finance and his colleagues—not only his discredited colleagues—has spoken against a positive program of tax reduction and industrial stimulation and incentive and had voted against it. I will not take the time, and even if I had the time the rules would probably prohibit me from going into greater detail, but on Thursday, October 7, there was a motion for discussion and a question for decision in the House which laid down a program of stimulating the economy, of providing for tax cuts and incentives, the sort of program which members of this party and of the party to my left had been pleading that the government embrace but which was rejected out of hand by the government which voted against it. The Minister of Finance, his parliamentary secretary and the Minister of Agriculture all voted against it.

Mr. Mahoney: Your timing is lousy.

Mr. Baldwin: It is precisely the same thing which one week later they brought to the House and with great, pompous assurances said, "This is what the government will do". How can anybody have confidence in a government composed of people like that?

Mr. Mahoney: Get up and cheer, Jed. Don't criticize the opposition like that.

An hon. Member: Don't get partisan.

Mr. Baldwin: I have much more to say. I simply want to repeat what I started out with on the same high, objective level, that it is about time this government reviewed its position, assessed its intentions and said to the people of Canada that there may well be a need for tax relief and a need to deal with these other issues of which I have spoken, but the primary issue in this country today is to provide a climate and incentives which give effect to the instinctive human inclination to improve one's position. In that way, with the kind of incentives we need, this country may indeed move ahead and get out of the slough of despondency which this government has brought upon us.

Even at this late date, if the government really intended to do that, I am confident they would get the kind of support on this side of the House which would be necessary for a program of that kind. But we cannot believe the government, we cannot have confidence in it, nor can the people of Canada, when we consider the type of antics in which they have engaged.

I will suspend this part of my address and leave more severe castigations, in which I intend to engage at a later date, in the hope that the government will give some heed to what I have to say and will decide to act in a reasonable and moderate way to bring back to this country the kind of economic climate which it is entitled to have.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McQuaid: Mr. Chairman, it would be a shame to spoil a good speech by starting so late this evening. With your permission, may I call it ten o'clock?

The Chairman: The hon. member has my permission. If he has the permission of other hon. members, we may call it ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—BIRTH CONTROL—GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES AND VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I referred the other evening to a grant of $25,000 made by the Department of National Health and Welfare to an organization called Serena which uses birth control measures with a 25 per cent failure rate. What I tried to find out from the minister was whether similar grants would be available to municipalities and voluntary organizations using methods with proven lower failure rates. Instead of simply answering my question, the minister went into the filter-down theory under the Canada Assistance Plan and indicated his refusal to accept my statement that Serena has a 25 per cent failure rate. This may have been because I made an error and said 24 per cent, but I doubt it.

The minister's rejection of the 25 per cent failure rate figure is curious because it was taken from a survey made by a special committee of eminent physicians named by the minister himself. On page 6 of the report, the preface of which is written by the minister, appears the following paragraph:

> The contraceptive effectiveness of the rhythm method, if correctly taught, understood and consistently practised, especially if the temperature rhythm method is used, could achieve a low pregnancy rate of 1.8 per 100 women per year. However, statistics show that, possibly because of irregular cycles, or inexpert and careless timing, the result is a pregnancy rate of 25 per 100 women per year.

My question did not refer to what could be in the statistics; it referred to what actually is. The minister appears to be very forgetful in the matter of this report. I think he is also very forgetful of the great need to promote birth control on a large scale in Canada now. The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, published almost a year ago, stated that in Canada families with higher education and in higher income brackets have had easy access to birth control methods. The poor and less educated have not. They also want an opportunity to plan their families. The principal responsibility for disseminating information on birth control methods rests with the health and welfare authorities.

The report recommends that the Department of National Health and Welfare do two things. First, prepare and offer birth control information free of charge to provincial and territorial authorities, associations, organizations and individuals. Second, give financial assistance through national health grants and national welfare grants to train health and welfare workers in family planning techniques. What has the department done? This is what I have been trying to find out for some time. In September I put questions on the order paper asking what organizations had been given grants for birth control activities and how much each had received, what organizations had been turned down and how much money they had wanted, what organizations are still being considered and for how much they are asking. So far I have had no answers.

Last week I asked if, in view of the $25,000 grant to an organization with a 25 per cent failure rate, other organizations with a proven lower rate of failure could get similar grants. I hope I can get an answer tonight. This is a serious matter for thousands of women and men across Canada who need access to hospital clinics, municipal health centres and premises of various other kinds where they can get the knowledge and the contraceptive means to plan, space and limit their families.

What the minister has done so far—that is, to the best of my knowledge—is to provide a total of $125,000 for birth control purposes throughout Canada. This is tokenism. So long as he does not take this matter more seriously we are bound to see the rate of abortions, legal and otherwise, remain at unnecessarily high levels, and there is no use pretending otherwise. The only way to bring that rate down is to provide birth control knowledge and contraceptives. The initiative in this campaign which the provincial and municipal authorities must share rests squarely on the shoulders of the minister.

Once again I ask my question: Are organizations with a lower failure rate—lower proven failure rate according to the minister—given access to grants similar to the $25,000 grant that was given to Serena, an organization with a 25 per cent failure rate?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's comments I would like to reassure her as to the intentions of the government with regard to birth control.

It is a fact that the Canadian government intends to subsidize those organizations dealing with family planning. It has already been doing so for some time. The government has also indicated that it would contribute to an international program to help those countries that want to set up family planning services.

I would remind the hon. member that until now the government has made a grant of $100,000 to the Canadian Family Planning Federation.

It is also true, as the hon. member pointed out, that the Department of National Health and Welfare has made a grant of $25,000 to Serena, a birth control organization, to help it finance the printing and distribution of information on family planning.

I would like to call the hon. member's attention on a paper by Mr. R. Tietze, entitled "Ranking of Contraceptive Methods by Levels of Effectiveness" and submitted in 1971, in Boston, to the American Association of Medical Specialists in Family Planning, in which he classifies the sympto-thermal method as one of the most effective. This method must be distinguished from the calendar method. In proof of this, Messrs B. Vincent and associates have prepared a report entitled "Review of Temperature Methods in Contraception" which indicates that one failure occurred in 17,500 cycles. The method used for this calculation is as follows: 1,200 cycles are equivalent to 100 woman-year cycles. It is therefore found a 0.1 failure rate per 1,000 woman-year cycles. An international study mentioned an experiment conducted with 195 Canadian couples using this method. No pregnancy occurred over 1564 months.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CONFERENCE OF FRANCOPHONE COUNTRIES—APPOINTMENT OF DELEGATES, VOTING INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, after the Dickensian, Demosthenesian and biblical statement of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), I feel like a minor prophet. The question which I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) on October 12, the reply to which prompted my intervention tonight, was not my first inquiry concerning the conference of Francophone countries.

On October 1, I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) some questions on the conference. On that same day he intimated to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) that as soon as conveniently appropriate a statement would be made in the House. So far, Sir, we have not heard that statement in the House. It is regrettable that confusion and misunderstanding should be allowed to develop on this matter because of failure to communicate but, as is so often the case, we must depend on statements made outside the chamber, or made by ministers in other jurisdictions, for information on matters of vital concern to the Parliament of Canada.

A Canadian Press item of October 9 indicates that after negotiations between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Cultural Affairs of Quebec an agreement had been entered into which gives Quebec the status of a participating government. I quote:

> This gives Quebec the right to a separate delegation at the conference, a veto in matters under its jurisdiction and the right to participate wholly in all the institutions and administrative councils in the agency.

There are a number of interesting questions which arise from this statement. In the first place, one wonders by whom the judgment would be made as to whether a matter discussed at the conference would be under federal or provincial jurisdiction. One asks, further, about the role of the other provinces in Canada. Have they sought participating government status? If they have not, and this would appear to be the case, what is their position in reference to matters which in administration are under provincial jurisdiction? Does one province, namely, the province of Quebec, speak for all of them? Is it the sole custodian of French language rights?

As I walked past the centre block on the day the conference was held, I noticed that five flags were showing as symbols of people of this country—the flag of Canada, the flags of Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick. Although I did not detect the New Brunswick flag, I presume it was there. I saw all the others.

Another matter on which there has been too little information, although it has been sought, concerns the appointment of the delegations. Presumably the "participating" government of Quebec would appoint its own delegation. Would the provinces other than Quebec have any role in naming the rest, or are they appointed by the federal government and do they form a part of the federal side of the representation when the conference gets under way—a conference, we must remember, of sovereign states?

Another matter which should be considered is the role of those other provinces which have Francophonic people within their bounds and for whom the provinces are carrying out programs in the extension and development of French language institutions. Are these people and their provinces without voice altogether at the conference of the Francophonic countries?

I still believe that the one area in which the competence and jurisdiction of the national government must be clearly supreme is in the field of international affairs. Divided jurisdictions and internal vetoes within delegations are in fact a diminution of this sovereignty of the national government. We may for the sake of harmony be as euphemistic as we can about the terms we use to describe the arrangements, but nevertheless there has been a significant diminution of this government's role in the external affairs field.

Regrettably, this has been accompanied by a degree of confusion which cannot be helpful to the Canadian image. In the last two or three years we are developing abroad the impression that we are a country which makes a poor job of handling its own economy. It is to be hoped that we will not continue to rub off the lustre of our international reputation by poorly conceived and awkwardly executed arrangements to solve internal intensions through the external field.

Even at this late date I ask the government to be forthcoming, to tell the people and their parliamentarians what is going on. Let the truth be told, let the record be set straight, let the information be revealed. These recent exercises in indirect discourse and secretive arrangements can do nothing but harm to this country.

It ill-behooves a government once dedicated to participatory democracy to be so unwilling to divulge techniques whereby the nation's external face is being altered. The creators of Information Canada surely should tell the story of our changing external profile even at this late date, and I invite a full statement on this disquieting matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to thank the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) for his effective contribution to the Francophone countries throughout the world and I hope he will continue to support the assistance that the government is providing to the Francophone states.

Following an invitation from the Secretariat of the Cultural and Technical Co-operation Agency to the Second General Conference of the Agency, the government appointed a delegation to represent Canada at that conference.

That delegation was headed by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), and I had the great honour to go with him. It also included ministers and officials from the governments of Quebec, New Brunswick, Ontario and Manitoba as well as federal public servants. A press release was issued last October 8 on this subject matter. As regards the vote, that question did not come up at this conference. It is provided that Canada will vote following consultations taking into account the interests of the provincial and federal governments. No difficulty is therefore expected in this regard.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:16 p.m.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT ACTIONS TO STRENGTHEN—ALLEGED LACK OF INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY—POSITION ON RATIONALIZATION AND MERGERS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. This last week end the minister, speaking to the Canadian Export Association, indicated the possibility of some dramatic new government moves to strengthen the economy. In anticipation that this was based on something serious, I wonder whether the minister could share his knowledge with the House and tell us just what these moves might be?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did my very best to indicate that I was not announcing any particular move, that the government was reviewing the situation and might have further difficult decisions to make. I went out of my way to say that I was not announcing anything dramatic at that moment, but the sort of thing I had in mind was all through my speech. I hope hon. members have read it. I also indicated that we were reviewing the general adjustment program to find ways and means to contribute more to the rationalization and modernization process, especially in some sectors of industry which have not yet reached their full productive capability.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On the particular point of the minister's reference to the rationalization of industry is he, in saying what he did, suggesting that the government is in full agreement with the comment of the Science Council of Canada that Canada had no industrial strategy and therefore this was perhaps one of the main reasons for some economic weakness in the country.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I pointed out to the Canadian Export Association that this was not right. I was the first one to say that there were improvements to be made, but to say the government has no industrial strategy is far from the truth.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Further to the speech—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member wants to ask a further supplementary. He prefaces it by saying "further to the speech." The hon. member knows better than I that it is difficult during the question period to go over the details of a speech made outside the House. I, of course, exercised some latitude in allowing the question and the supplementary. Perhaps the question might be asked directly rather than by reference to a speech by the minister.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I hope I have not made too much reference to the speech, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the minister's views on mergers and rationalizations and the view that the government might have to take some positive action in this regard, is the minister suggesting that the government, including the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, will be moving into forced rationalizations, mergers and combinations of Canadian industry and business?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I think the position of the government on mergers is very clear. We are in favour of mergers when they can be reconciled with the competition policy. Strangely enough, at the moment we have a situation in which a number of business associations are saying that the bill on competition tries to prevent mergers and yet at the same time we have associations, for example, the pulp and paper group, writing to us and asking us to by all means implement this bill as fast as possible because they have a number of mergers they would like to bring about which they cannot do under the present law.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING REMOVAL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I also wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the United States Secretary of the Treasury, John Connally, has stated that the United States is conducting both bilateral and multilateral negotiations with a view to the removal of the 10 per cent surcharge on imports, and in view of the fact that apparently an agreement has been reached between the governments of the United States and West Germany for the removal of the 10 per cent surcharge, may I ask what negotiations are being conducted between the government of Canada and the government of the United States? Are they presently going on and by whom are they being conducted?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the removal of the surcharge for West Germany is entirely news to me. I will check on it and find out whether it is true. With regard to Canada-United States discussions on the so-called irritants, the last time we were in Washington, and after that in discussions between American and Canadian officials, it was indicated to us that at the moment the Americans were reviewing the list of their irritants. I understood very clearly that the Americans would be in touch with us after they completed their preparatory work. We in Canada are doing the same. On a number of occasions in the House the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and myself have stated we are willing to enter into negotiations on these so-called irritants with the United States as soon as they are ready.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that the governments of other countries, notably Japan and West Germany, have been carrying on bilateral discussions, am I to understand from the minister's statement that at the present time no discussions are going on with the American government at any level? If that is correct, may I ask the minister when it is planned to resume discussions on this very important matter?

Mr. Pepin: My simple understanding of these matters is that the Americans probably considered their irritants with Japan and Germany to be more urgent to resolve than their irritants with Canada.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—INQUIRY AS TO UNITED STATES REQUEST TO DISCUSS TIRES AND SNOWMOBILES UNDER AUTO PACT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the United States government indicated that it wishes to discuss the problem of tires and snowmobiles under the Canada-United States auto pact?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge anyway.

POSSIBLE UNITED STATES BAN ON IMPORT OF CANADIAN SUGAR AND URANIUM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a further supplementary question for the minister. In the speech he made at Montebello the hon. gentleman indicated that the United States might ban the shipment of Canadian sugar and uranium to that country. May I ask whether such an intention has been communicated to him by the government of the United States and, if so, how imminent is such action?

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): That was not in my speech, Mr. Speaker. I was ad-libbing at the time. I was saying that in the past few days the Americans have announced that there was at least a possibility of the continuation of the embargo on the export of uranium from Canada to the United States, and also with relation to confectionery products—certain types of sugared goods—some limitations of their export from Canada to the United States. What I said with regard to sugar applies only to confectionery products going to the United States from Canada.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES RESPECTING REMOVAL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have listened very carefully to the minister's answers. Are we to take it that there are really no negotiations going on between Canada and the United States at the present time and that there will be none until the United States says to Canada: You may now negotiate with us? Is that really what the minister is telling the House?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): That is my understanding. There is nothing wrong in that. The United States administration has told us they are preparing a list of their irritants and their case in support of their claims. For our part, we have said we have a list of our own to introduce. When it suits their purpose, when it is convenient to them to do so, we have indicated we are very keen, very willing, to enter into negotiations with them. As I said a moment ago, it seems to me obvious that the negotiations which the Americans have just been conducting with the Japanese on the subject of textiles for example must have had priority over discussions concerning the irritants they have with respect to Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We shall return to this subject again—the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, in particular, has a supplementary to ask—but the Chair will now recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN ASSISTANCE TO PRIVATE MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—REMUNERATION OF RESEARCH STAFF

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

A few days ago, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked the President of the Treasury Board whether the government was considering the possibility of granting additional assistance to hon. members and the President of the Treasury Board answered that he would reply in a few days. Is the minister now in a position to tell us whether the government really intends to assist hon. members and to increase the amounts earmarked for researchers for the various political parties?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows quite well that the matter comes under the House of Commons rather than the Treasury Board.

I answered that I was willing to hand over the matter to the committee the House had entrusted it to, but that, to date, there is no satisfactory solution to the problem.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Can the minister tell us when the commissioners of Internal Economy will meet to reach a decision that is advantageous for Parliament?

M. Speaker: Order. I believe the Chair should now remind the hon. member that his supplementary should normally be addressed to the Chair, which has taken note of it.

Mr. Caouette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I admit that I should address myself to the Chair at this stage, but if the Chair or the Commissioners of Internal Economy do not have the necessary funds, my question is therefore in order and I can ask the fund administrator if he is ready to or if—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—CANADIAN ACTION REQUIRED FOR RESUMPTION OF NORMAL TRADE RELATIONS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether the House is to understand that, despite the severe dislocations the United States surcharge has caused in the Canadian economy, the United States up to this point has not indicated, either in general or in particular, what action it requires the Canadian government to take so that normal trading relations can be resumed?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The United States government has not indicated such, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize a few supplementaries but hon. members will appreciate that we are still on the first question after nearly 15 minutes of questioning, so there should not be too many supplementaries. For the moment the Chair will see the hon. member for Peace River and then the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated that he and the government were contemplating doing something either dramatic or useful. Will the minister discuss with his colleague the Minister of Finance and with the Prime Minister and hope that they will do something useful for a change?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

UNITED STATES IMPORT SURTAX—PROTECTION OF PROVINCIALLY ASSISTED INDUSTRIES AGAINST POSSIBLE U.S. DISCRIMINATORY ACTION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Will the minister assure us that in preparing Canada's position, as he indicated to the hon. member for Calgary North was being done, Canada will fight any stand taken by the United States that seeks to discriminate against such provincially assisted industries as Michelin?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister said yes but it would be nice to have it on the record.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): We will prepare our case as well as we can, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CADET MOVEMENT—MILITARY COLLEGES—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING CONTINUATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, having got a "yes" answer from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, perhaps the Minister of National Defence would answer a question for me respecting his present position regarding cadet training programs across the country and the recommendation that they be dropped?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I can confirm here statements I have made outside the House, as well as in the white paper, that the recommendation of the committee on youth in this regard will not be accepted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Quite the contrary; we will try to find all possible resources to further assist the cadet movement.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that thousands of Canadians will appreciate that statement. Is the minister in a good enough mood this afternoon to give the same assurance in regard to military colleges?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Exactly the same answer, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

MICHELIN TIRE PLANT—REPORTED UNITED STATES OBJECTION TO GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT AS UNFAIR TRADE ADVANTAGE—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has been reported that the United States treasury department has initiated a study of the Michelin tire plant and whether the involvement of the government constitutes an unfair trade advantage. Is the government going to make a clear statement on this issue to the United States treasury department and, if so, when?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the decision of the government on Michelin is a well known one and will be incorporated in the Order in Council when the plant begins production. There has been no turning back from that position and it remains government policy.

Mr. Crouse: Would the government be prepared to halt further talks on the auto pact if any action against Michelin were taken?

Mr. Pepin: I do not see the relationship between the two subjects but—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the question as asked is hypothetical.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE RECIPIENTS RECEIVE FULL BENEFIT OF INCREASE IN PENSION AND SUPPLEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. On September 9 I asked the minister if the government would take the necessary steps so that war veterans allowance recipients who are in receipt of the guaranteed income supplement would not have their allowances cut back but would get the full benefit of the increase of $2.70 a month in the pension and supplement which is to come into effect in January. The minister said the matter was being looked into and would be considered with the usual sympathy. Can the minister say whether the appropriate Order in Council has been passed or other appropriate action has yet been taken?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not correct to assume that this will take place on January 1. It will be at the commencement of the next fiscal year, the first day of April. This matter will be decided long before that time. It is not decided now.

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING UNDESIRABLE EFFECTS OF PROPOSED UNITED STATES DISC LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO MEET THREAT

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the increasing anxiety in Canada about the DISC legislation now before the United States senate, has the government made any diplomatic representations to the United States in regard to the undesirable effects it would have, or has the government taken any multilateral diplomatic action to persuade the United States not to proceed with this type of program?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have made all possible representations on that subject, first when the DISC program was introduced in Congress for the first time a couple of years ago, and we have repeated those representations more recently when it was introduced again. Our position on DISC, which is that it is contrary to GATT, is very well known by the United States administration and by Congressmen too.

Mr. Harkness: Is the government preparing any tax measures or any other measures which will enable Canadian industry to meet the DISC threat if this program is actually put into operation by the United States?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, that will be known in due course. I do not think it would be normal for us to do these things before these bills actually become United States law. As we have seen, they have been substantially amended during the process of being debated in committee of Congress. This bill is now in the full Congress, and what is there may not be what comes out.

Mr. Harkness: Do I understand that the government has made no contingency plans whatsoever to meet this very serious threat?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I was rebuked a moment ago for saying we have other things in reserve. Now I cannot walk both sides of the fence. If my hon. friend says we have no contingency plans, I point out that the Prime Minister has said on a number of occasions that we have.

MEETING OF MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE WITH BUSINESSMEN AND UNION REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

I was happy to learn last week that a meeting was scheduled to which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Labour, trade union representatives and some businessmen would participate.

I would like to ask the minister if this meeting was held and if a price and wage freeze policy was discussed with the trade unions. In the negative, when will this meeting take place and will the above mentioned subjects be discussed?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade annd Commerce): As far as I am concerned, the last meeting I had was with the members of the Advisory Council of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the government competition policy and the new Labour Code were the subject matters of these discussions. Businessmen have made certain points which have been discussed by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Deputy Minister of Labour.

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to ask the minister whether he anticipates to meet with labour representatives in order to discuss the prevailing economic difficulties.

Mr. Pepin: Not insofar as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, but I presume that the Minister of Labour has already done so or will be able to do it.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POLYMER—LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES WITH ONE DAY'S NOTICE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday I put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister concerning the lay-off of 250 employees of Polymer Corporation with only 24 hours' notice, and the Prime Minister indicated that he would reply to the question today. I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister has the reply?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no reply on his behalf.

Mr. Nesbitt: Could the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether any of his colleagues who are here might have a reply? I see one minister rising.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): In reply, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that no employees received less than four weeks severance pay, and several received much longer periods of severance pay depending on their seniority. The question of one day's notice is really not relevant because by giving longer notice management could have had the employees standing around in the plant with nothing to do. It was far better both from the management and the employees' point of view that once there was no further work for them they have the opportunity to get out and find other jobs. Of those who were laid off last month 37 out of the total of 65 have already found new employment.

Mr. Nesbitt: I take it from the minister's rather circuitous answer that the 250 men were in fact laid off on 24 hours' notice?

Mr. Richardson: No, Mr. Speaker. Some have not received notice. The company announced several weeks ago that there could be a reduction in the work force as large as 250, but it has not yet been found necessary to reduce the work force by that number. I might say that very strong representations have been made to me by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton and I have a long report from him which has been very helpful.

Mr. Nesbitt: A further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will be running short of time very soon. The hon. member for Oxford may have a further supplementary and then the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Wellington.

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the minister on behalf of the government undertake to see, if employees are dismissed in other Crown corporations, that appropriate notice is given so that no improper example will be set for industry in general by the actions of the government?

Mr. Richardson: I think the hon. member has to distinguish between notice and severance pay.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we are reaching the area of debate at this point. I shall now recognize the hon. member for Wellington.

POLYMER—REASON FOR LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of Supply and Services. Was this lay-off in fact due to Polymer having lost their prime contract with Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company which purchased its supplies from Japan?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): No, Mr. Speaker, not directly. I replied earlier in the House that this was a management decision but it was based on difficult markets and not related just to the Goodyear market. The company has been successful in retaining a large part of the Goodyear business.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Science and Technology to inform the House whether or not the government is conducting any studies concerning the technological and economic feasibility of rehabilitating the disastrous Deuterium heavy water plant at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, this is a question which I think might perhaps be more properly answered by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Nystrom: If the Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is in the House today perhaps he would answer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): If I might answer the question, Mr. Speaker, the situation is quite simple. The government has authorized Atomic Energy of Canada to negotiate with Deuterium of Canada and with the government of Nova Scotia a solution that might lead to the rehabilitation of the plant.

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FRENCH-SPEAKING PILOTS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence, I shall address it to the President of the Treasury Board.

As Acting Prime Minister, would he tell us if he has read the statement made recently by the Quebec Minister of Education to the effect that only 5 per cent of Canadian airline pilots, including those of Air Canada, are French-speaking? Does the minister intend to correct this and what policy does he intend to announce in order to allow French-speaking pilots a larger share of the jobs?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have no personal knowledge of this matter, but I am prepared to make inquiries.

Mr. Valade: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. As this was published in a newspaper—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has risen on a question of privilege.

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FRENCH-SPEAKING PILOTS

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Sainte-Marie wish to ask a supplementary?

Mr. Valade: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board a supplementary question. If it is established that only 5 per cent of Canadian airlines pilots are French-speaking, does the minister intend to make a statement and bring about corrective measures to the situation so that Francophone Canadians be allowed their share in air transport—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will admit that his question is hypothetical. I do not think it can be asked in those terms.

[Later:]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask another supplementary to the President of the Treasury Board.

In the inquiry suggested by my colleague, could the minister make sure that over 5 per cent of French Canadians have the required knowledge and skill for this kind of work?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think this is still an assumption I cannot accept without making an inquiry, but like the hon. member for Yukon I believe the main criterion is passenger safety.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question just raised by the hon. member, can the minister assure the House and the country at large that the paramount criterion for the employment of any pilot by major airlines or other airlines in the country will continue to be skill and capability rather than any other criteria and will he convey the government's policy in that regard to the national and other airlines?

Mr. Drury: I do not think the government would have difficulty in agreeing that the sine qua non for employment would be skill and safety precautions.

RESUMPTION OF STUDY OF POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF HEAVY WATER PLANT AT MONTMAGNY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of his absence due to illness, I shall address it to his Parliamentary Secretary and, should he be unable to reply, the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce might be able to do so.

The question, concerning the possibility of establishing a heavy water plant in Montmagny, was placed on the Order Paper in 1969 and the reply given was that no such study had been carried out.

In view of the existing controversy, I should like to ask the following question: Was a special study effectively carried out in 1970 concerning the establishment of a heavy water plant in Montmagny?

Mr. Speaker: I am under the impression that the question as formulated should normally be placed on the Order Paper. The hon. member is asking whether a given action was taken last year by the government. I feel a question so phrased is normally placed on the Order Paper. Should the matter be urgent, could the hon. member perhaps so inform the Chair so that it might be discussed on the adjournment motion.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as you suggest, I inform you that I wish to raise this question at the time of adjournment, since it is very urgent.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question addressed to the Minister of Justice the other day by the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Yukon concerning marijuana. With regard to the growing of marijuana at the Experimental Farm in Ottawa and the experiment being conducted at the University of Calgary—I assume the hon. member was referring to that university—it is my information that both these experiments are being carried out under the authority—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary.

[English]

The hon. member for Yukon is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we all want to hear the statement of the parliamentary secretary, but my recollection of yesterday's events is that my friend from Calgary North asked a question, I asked a supplementary question, and we got our answers from the minister. We are all interested to hear the answer from the parliamentary secretary, but I suggest we should go back to motions to do so.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: If the parliamentary secretary wishes to give a short reply in the question period he can, of course, do so. I have no way of knowing the extent of the statement or answer he wishes to give. If it is extensive there is no question that the hon. member for Yukon has a good point and that the parliamentary secretary should seek leave to return to motions. If the parliamentary secretary proceeds to make a long reply, I will invite him to return to motions. Is it agreed that we return to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The parliamentary secretary is not seeking leave to return to motions.

ASSESSMENT OF EFFECTS OF POSSIBLE OIL SPILLS IN GEORGIA STRAIT—AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA ON JOINT SURVEY

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. I should like to return to the question I asked on September 29 about the Science Council's recommendation a year ago of a joint study by Ottawa and British Columbia of the uses of the whole environment in the Strait of Georgia and nearby waters. Has the minister entered into negotiations with the province of British Columbia for such a study?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): I have had a number of discussions with the relevant ministers of the British Columbia government in this connection and I am hopeful that within the next few weeks we will be able to reach a formal understanding in this connection.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask the minister whether or not these discussions included the area up river, namely, the Moran Dam area on the Fraser River?

Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker. Essentially the areas concerned are the Strait of Georgia and the lower reaches of the Fraser River.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister whether the discussions with the British Columbia government include any canvassing of the possibility of establishing a marine park in Georgia Strait?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Can the Parliamentary Secretary tell us whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare intends to change his family income security plan in order to reconcile it with the needs of the province of Quebec?

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the discussions are not at a standstill, quite the contrary. FOREIGN AUTOMOBILE COMPANIES MARKETING PRODUCT IN CANADA—TRANSFER OF ADVERTISING CONTRACTS TO UNITED STATES AGENCIES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is his department taking any action to require foreign companies which market automobiles in Canada to make their expenditures on marketing and advertising in Canada? I ask this question in light of the fact it is reported that several of these companies are moving their advertising and planning offices as well as their advertising contracts from Canada to the United States.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): There is no law, nor, I suspect, should there be one, regulating where people should buy advertising. This is a free society in which people are surely entitled to spend their money where they wish.

FISHERIES

SALE OF VESSELS TO UNITED STATES INTERESTS—PREVENTION OF USE TO COMPETE WITH CANADIAN FISHERMEN ON WEST COAST

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries concerning the first auction under the buy-back program in British Columbia. In view of reports that a substantial number of the vessels sold at this auction went to American interests at fire sale prices to go into competitive fishery, is the minister either considering cancelling this program or at least ensuring that in future sales no vessels will go into a fishery competitive with the Canadian fishery on the west coast?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member is referring to a program for the retirement of commercial salmon fishing boats on the west coast. A number have been sold to citizens of the United States and other countries and they will be used mainly for recreational purposes. Boats over five tons are not permitted to participate in the commercial fishery of the United States by United States law. In any case the over-all agreement on the division of the salmon catch on the west coast between Canada and the United States preclude the use of these vessels to Canada's disadvantage.

FINANCE

USE OF COLLECTION AGENCIES TO OBTAIN REPAYMENT OF STUDENT LOANS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a question for the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. He may want to take it as notice. Has his department, which looks after student loans, placed in the hands of financial collection agencies the collection of moneys lent to students who are in arrears on repayment, are unemployed and unable to pay but have been instructed through an unusual letter that they must pay forthwith or action will be taken?

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I will have to take the precise question as notice. However, in general it is only after the banks have exhausted the usual collection procedures and the government has been called upon to make good on the guarantee that the Department of Finance is directly concerned with recovering the money. Accordingly, any such instance would be a default of long standing.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION WITH MANITOBA IN INCOME SUPPORT AND RETRAINING PLAN FOR LAKE WINNIPEG FISHERMEN

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): My question is for the Minister of the Environment in his capacity as Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister refused to participate on a dollar for dollar basis with the government of Manitoba in an income support and job retraining plan for Lake Winnipeg fishermen forced out of work as a result of the lake being partially closed to fishing because of pollution?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): The short answer is that my department is concerned with the development of an economic fishery and is not engaged in contructing an income support program for this segment of the Canadian population.

Mr. Rowland: Has the minister received representations to this effect from the government of Manitoba, and if the minister's department is not directly concerned has he rerouted them to the appropriate departments for their consideration, and is active consideration being given by the government of Canada to these plans?

Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker. The government of Manitoba has been in touch with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in this connection.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Monday, October 18, consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

[English]

Mr. McQuaid: I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to speak at any great length at this stage of the proceedings, although I shall be speaking from time to time as various clauses of the bill are to be studied. I rise at this time to make a special plea on behalf of those citizens of Canada who find themselves in the lower income bracket but who are taxed. Before doing that, however, I should like to point out again how very complicated the bill is with which this Parliament is faced. Last evening the hon. member for Wellington placed a section of the bill on the record as an example of the complicated language which it contains and there are many such illustrations. I should like to place another section on the record and ask the minister, his deputy or some competent person to give an explanation of it.

I refer to section 87 subsection (2) (y). Section 87 has 34 subsections running from (a) to (z) and then the alphabet is repeated with subsections (aa), (bb) etc. Let me read this subsection:

(y) for the purpose of computing the cumulative deduction account (within the meaning assigned by subsection 125(6) of the new corporation at the end of a taxation year immediately preceding its first taxation year or at the end of any subsequent taxation year there shall be added to the amount determined under paragraph 125(6)(b) from which the aggregate of the amounts referred to in subparagraphs (iii) to (v) thereof is to be subtracted, the aggregate of amounts each of which is an amount in respect of a predecessor corporation, equal to the amount that would have been the predecessor corporation's cumulative deduction account immediately before the amalgamation if paragraph 125(6)(b) had been read without reference to subparagraph (v) thereof;

This is only one illustration, but there are many such sections throughout this proposed bill which I suggest will make it virtually impossible for the ordinary taxpayer to prepare his own income tax return in future. If the chartered accountants and lawyers are ever able to understand this bill themselves, they are going to have a bonanza because the ordinary taxpayer will not be able to understand it. I plead with the minister, with the government and with the officials who drafted the bill to take it back and try to draft it in language that the ordinary taxpayer can understand because he is the one who will be affected by it. As I said before, I should like to make a special plea to the government for some consideration for those people who may find themselves in a taxable bracket, yet whose income is very low by ordinary standards.

I give the government credit for having increased the exemption for single persons to $1,500 and for married people to $2,850. This is actually the first change of any significance that has been made since 1949, but I seriously suggest that it does not go far enough inasmuch as it does not afford sufficient relief to those people whose taxable income is very, very low. The increase in the exemption does not begin to reflect the erosion in the dollar since 1949. The fault does not lie with the present government, but these changes should have been made progressively over the years as the purchasing power of the dollar declined. In this way substantial relief would have been given to the taxpayer.

The Economic Council of Canada has said that the minimum amount that a married man requires in order to get along today is $3,000. This figure was apparently arrived at after a very careful review of today's cost of living. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the basic exemption for a married man should be $3,000 rather than $2,850 and for the single person it should be $1,900. These figures would be more in line with the recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada. However, I suggest that there should be a higher exemption for people in the lower income bracket. The $3,000 exemption is fine for a man who is making $12,000, $15,000 or $20,000 a year but the man in, say, the $8,000 range should have a higher basic exemption.

I suggest that the married man whose income is less than $8,000 should have an exemption of $5,000. This would give consideration to the fact that a man is trying to support himself and his family on that income. Why can this man's basic exemption not be more than that of the man earning $12,000, $15,000 or $20,000 a year? Is there anything unreasonable about that? It is giving relief to the man who may be taxable according to the present law but whose income is, ordinarily speaking, comparatively low. I suggest some such formula should be adopted by the government. If a married man's net income is less than $8,000 he should be given a basic exemption of at least $5,000.

The same thing applies to the single person. The basic exemption of the single man whose annual net income is, say, $5,000 should be higher than the exemption of the single man earning $12,000, $15,000 or $20,000. I suggest that the basic exemption of the single man whose net income is in the $5,000 range ought to be $3,500. I cannot see any particular reason why some formula like that could not be worked out. I am sure it could be worked out and, if worked out, it would give much needed relief. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I speak from experience. I have prepared every year, I suppose, a couple of hundred income tax returns for various clients. Although some of these people have taxable incomes, I can assure you that it is a real hardship for them to pay even small amounts of taxes. It is hard for these people to pay what, to us, probably looks like a very small amount of tax, yet to them it is a large amount of money. I think it is only fair that additional relief be given to these people. I plead with the government to consider my suggestions before the bill is finally passed.

I realize that it is not in order for anybody on this side of the House to suggest an amendment with regard to this matter, because such amendment would interfere with the revenues of the country. However, I plead with hon. members on the other side of the House to give consideration to changes along the lines I have suggested, so that taxpayers who may earn a taxable income but who find themselves in the lower income brackets, will be given additional consideration and additional relief. That would not entail a very great loss of revenue for the government of Canada.

An hon. Member: How much?

Mr. McQuaid: An hon. member asks, how much. I have not made that calculation, but it is not a killing amount.

An hon. Member: It would cost over $1 billion.

Mr. McQuaid: It might cost over $1 billion. Yet, the other day the government thought nothing of spending more than $1 billion in order to provide relief in the current situation. The people I have talked about need this relief, and consideration should be given to them. They are hard-working Canadian citizens doing their best to raise their families as good Canadian citizens. Every encouragement ought to be given to them. If a married man's income is below $8,000 a year, I assure you that no matter in which part of Canada he lives, he will have a difficult time making ends meet. Often he cannot make ends meet.

As proof of that you need only look at the number of loans which have been put out by the various finance companies of Canada, at interest rates of 24 per cent. These companies are only in business because these people must borrow to make ends meet. It would be most worth-while, and very much appreciated by the Canadian taxpayer, if the government would consider giving additional relief to these people. I am confident that those in the higher income brackets will not take exception to this and will be only too glad to pay their share of taxes if they feel that undue hardship is not being imposed upon those who are less fortunate in the amount they earn.

There is another matter that I think ought to be considered, and that is the exemptions which are presently allowed for dependent children. The present exemption, of course, is $300 for a child under 16 and $550, I believe, for a child over 16. Under the new bill this $300 exemption is to be reduced, as I understand it, by $1 for every $2 of the dependent's income in excess of $1,000. There $550 exemption, as I understand it, will be reduced by $1 for each dollar by which the dependent's income exceeds $1,050, I believe. I suggest seriously that it is virtually impossible, given today's way of living, to raise a child under 16 for $300 a year. I challenge any member of this House to tell me that he can support a child under 16 and give that child the education which he or she naturally requires on $300 a year. I challenge any member of the House to tell me that he does that in his own home. It just cannot be done, Mr. Chairman; we know it and the government knows it. I, therefore, suggest it is only fair that some additional relief be given in this direction.

The same applies to the child of over 16, because $550 is far from sufficient to clothe, feed and educate a child who is over 16. It just cannot be done. Again, I plead with the government to give additional consideration to these children and additional consideration to the parents of these children who are doing their best, as I said before, to bring up their families as good Canadian citizens. Why cannot that exemption be raised a little? The present exemption level has been in effect for quite some time. The erosion of the dollar has had its effect; and if $300 was enough five or ten years ago, it certainly is not enough today. I, therefore, ask the government, before it finally asks this House to approve the bill, to give serious consideration to these two matters, the matter of increasing basic exemptions for married and single people whose incomes are in the low brackets and the matter of increasing exemptions for dependent children. Additional consideration ought to be given to people who are trying to raise families, and the government ought to increase dependent children exemption levels to levels which are more in line with the actual cost of educating, feeding and clothing a child today.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, when I spoke at the second reading stage, of this bill, I said that I intended to further my analysis of the bill as far as the taxpayers, the corporations and the proposed measures are concerned.

Yesterday morning, on my way to Ottawa from Montmagny, I was listening on the radio to a program during which people are invited to express their views on various matters. Yesterday's topic was: What do you think about the income tax reduction proposed last week by the government when a public works program was announced in order to reduce unemployment in Canada? Most listeners who answered the question seemed totally or partially unaware of the exact nature of the problem.

This leads me to say that unfortunately not enough information is given to the population. They may sometimes discuss problems and bills in which they are directly interested but the impact of which they cannot grasp completely. Now, to my mind, it is increasingly urgent that our taxes be levied in such a way as to relieve the individual and the family and allow the worker to benefit from reductions now denied him but allowed corporations.

The problem is extremely serious and is now being studied by the workers, through their professional organizations; that is why I am drawing it to the attention of the government.

I should also like to prove, with the help of a table published when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brought down his 1971-72 budget, that progressively individuals are contributing more and more, through income tax, to government expenditures, while corporations are correspondingly paying less. In short, the evil has just been displaced.

Government revenues at the federal, provincial and municipal levels during the financial year 1960-61 amounted to some $9,700 million and in 1970-71 to $28,500 million. The taxpayers' share for the payment of the above-mentioned government expenditures was $2 billion in 1960-61 and $9 billion in 1970-71 with respective percentages of 20.6 per cent and 31.5 per cent. Consequently, in 10 years, the total share of government revenues from personal income tax has increased by almost 11 per cent.

Another provision of Bill C-259 authorizes taxpayers to deduct from their income amounts received from their employers as travelling expenses. Now, all hon. members are not aware of the problems which sometimes occur and it is advisable to remind the minister that some abuses are committed in that field at the workers' expense.

What will happen when employers, as is the case now, alas, give for an employee an address other than his real one, so as to officially put him closer to his work and thus deprive him of the compensation under the terms of the law, be it provincial or federal, so that it is the employer who will cash in the compensation instead of the employee. Consequently, I suggest that a closer supervision be exercised in this area, so that abuses may be reported.

Mr. Chairman, other elements of personal income have or will become taxable under this legislation, such as benefits from income maintenance insurance plans to which the employer has contributed and adult training allowances. At the present time, under existing regulations, a person who is being retrained and who receives a weekly allowance does not have to mention it in his income tax return; under the new act he will have to do so, even if this allowance is sometimes the only income he has to provide for his family. That will therefore worsen his financial situation instead of improving it.

That provision applies also to allowances received under the Textile and Clothing Board Act. In fact, that paragraph is especially hard on workers who are liable to become unemployed, especially in Montmagny or in other Canadian localities where the textile industry is gradually reducing the number of its employees. Now, it happens that a board provided compensation which becomes taxable under the new legislation, just like unemployment insurance benefits, scholarships over the $500 deducible for income tax purposes.

The tax cut announced by the Minister of Finance last week is 3 per cent on personal income. This is definitely insufficient, I think, even if the minister said that it will take 750,000 Canadians off the tax rolls effective July 1, 1971. Now, when this figure was mentioned in the House, an hon. member from the government side said loudly: Well, there is a million people who will be exempted.

In my opinion, the government should not be happy that 750,000 Canadians are too poor to pay income tax. It means that too many single Canadians earn less than $1,500 and too many married ones less than $2,850. Is it conceivable that those two categories of people can live on as little as $1,500 and $2,850?

We are told we are going too far when we suggest to raise basic exemptions to $3,000 for single people and $5,000 for married people. But let us seriously consider the matter. Could we, members of Parliament, live in our circle or the one to which we confine those people, with $1,500 or $2,850 a year? Those amounts are clearly not enough and, in a few moments, I shall indicate how we could close the gap in order to allow the government to assume its responsibilities in all areas, with the required funds available to it.

I should also want to illustrate the real situation of the consumers, the workers of Canada in relation to prices they now have to pay and those prevailing 20 or 22 years ago, according to a scale showing the gradual increase in the cost of living.

Thus, the consumer price index, in June 1971, was 135.0 in relation to the basic year 1961. The converted consumer price index for all items based on 1949 was 174.4.

It must be noted that the food and housing sectors, which are key sectors affecting every citizen, and especially those in the lower income bracket, show an index above the 135.0 average, that is 135.9 and 137.5 respectively, according to the Statistics Canada daily bulletin dated September 16, 1971. Those are government figures.

When establishing an index for the personal income tax basic exemptions, we find that this index has obviously remained at 100.0 for the last 20 years, since the amount of basic exemptions has not changed during that period. Compared to what we find in the proposed bill, this index would become 150.0 for single taxpayers and 142.5 for married couples.

Therefore, this index is at a much lower level than the consumer prices index. The compensation, if we can talk of compensation, is therefore only partial and inadequate, taking into account the galloping growth of the cost of living and the frantic increase of almost all indices having a direct incidence on the low income taxpayers.

Moreover the proposed basic exemptions put us far below the poverty levels set by the Economic Council of Canada in Chapter 6 of its Fifth Annual Review entitled "The Challenge of Growth and Change". One should take into account that those definitions are not absolute ones but approximations based on available data. These estimates have been compiled by Statistics Canada.

Two sets of figures can be arrived at. You can consider as poor all people who spend 70 per cent or more of their income on food, clothing and housing. In this case, the level would be at $1,500 for single people and at $2,500 for families of two.

You can also consider as poor all people who spend 60 per cent of their income on food, clothing and housing. In that case, Mr. Chairman, the level would be at $2,000 a year for single people and at $3,500 for families of two or for married couples without children.

In the first case you could consider 30 per cent of the Canadian people as poor and in the second case more than 40 per cent. Apparently the government took into account only the first calculation in setting up the new basic exemption rates. It should be noted that it represents a very moderate and conservative poverty level.

It is said, at page 103 of the Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada—I quote:

> Poverty in Canada is real. Its numbers are not in the thousands, but the millions. There is more of it than our society can tolerate, more than our economy can afford, and far more than existing measures and efforts can cope with. Its persistence, at a time when the bulk of Canadians enjoy one of the highest standards of living in the world, is a disgrace.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Then at page 104 there is this very interesting statement:

> To feel poverty is, among other things, to feel oneself an unwilling outsider—a virtual nonparticipant in the society in which one lives. The problem of poverty in developed industrial societies is increasingly viewed not as a sheer lack of essentials to sustain life, but as an insufficient access to certain goods, services, and conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living.

I cannot speak at great length at this stage as time goes quickly, but let us consider this and see whether it would not be possible to improve conditions further so that more Canadians could have access to that natural wealth available to us and that everyone may enjoy easy circumstances, and I do not mean to become a millionnaire.

According to the Minister of Finance, a good taxation system should respond to a country's economic and social needs. It should relieve the lower income taxpayer whose tax burden is too heavy on account of the cumulative effect of income taxes, sales tax and property tax at all levels of government. People in the low income bracket bear too great a share of the taxation burden.

And the figures I quoted prove it. There was no change in the basic exemptions for more than 20 years. There was nevertheless a substantial increase in the provincial and federal sales tax. The government sees the increase in exemptions from $1,000 to $1,500 and from $2,000 to $2,850 as the most general and basic measure to grant tax relief.

Having shown that individuals are more heavily taxed in 1971 than they were in 1970, I quoted figures that are available to hon. members and the Minister of Finance, who is being invited to amend this bill so as to allow the small wage earners to enjoy larger exemptions and, consequently, a decent living.

However, to have the necessary money to administer the public sector and provide the services people expect, the government will have to find that money somewhere. This is why, seasonably and unseasonably, faithful to the mandate I got from my electors in Bellechasse, I feel it my duty to again tell the government that a thorough monetary reform is essential to put the Canadian dollar at the service of Canadian people.

Mr. Chairman, I am well aware that the government could issue savings bonds for its own financing but, for instance, if I agree with the idea suggested a few weeks ago on the CBC network by a Bank of Canada official to the effect that Canadian taxpayers benefit from the issue of bonds by the government in that the taxpayers may get interest on the savings they want to use to buy government bonds, he should have added that all government bonds bought by chartered banks are used by them as reserves which permit them, under the law, to create new credit by multiplying by fourteen—if they want to—the total amount of the government bonds, which means that a $1,000 bond may be used to create new credit amounting to $14,000 and on which chartered banks can collect interest.

As for such interest, it is paid by Canadians and that is why we want this financing system to be changed so as to relieve the Treasury of this burden—interest paid to these banks which are exploiting Canadian credit to their benefit. That is what Mr. Edison had to say on this question. I would like to quote his words on bonds and currency.

If this country can issue a one dollar bond, it can issue a one dollar bill. A note is as good as a bill. The difference between them is that the bond allows the holder to collect twice the amount of the bond and an additional 20 per cent—

That was some time ago. Today, he would say 14 times instead of twice.

I continue:

—whereas the bill does not profit anybody except those who contribute to the basis of its value.

It is nonsense to say that this country can issue $30 million in bonds, but not $30 million in bills. They both constitute a promise to pay, but one fattens the money lender and the other helps the public.

The credit standing of a government is based on the people. Why then is the public denied the benefit of its own prime credit standing by having a currency unburdened with interest—instead of bankers benefiting from the people's credit through interest-bearing bonds?

If the government were to adopt the policy of increasing the national assets instead of helping feed those who collect interests (the national debt consists entirely of service charges), you would witness an era of progress and prosperity in this country which otherwise will never materialize.

Mr. Chairman, I think that this great thinker had thoroughly studied the system before voicing such a sensible opinion on our monetary system and showing what the government could do in order to obtain the funds required to serve the community well.

The Deputy Chairman: Order! I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has now expired.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to take part in the discussion of this bill this afternoon, particularly since the bill is in committee of the whole. As you know, I am probably one of the strongest advocates in the House of Commons for a return to this traditional system of having bills reviewed by the entire House rather than a powerless committee. When members of the Liberal party have had an opportunity to read and to study representations made to the committee of the whole on the bill before us, I am sure that they will recommend in caucus to their leader that there be a return in the near future to some of the traditional rules that make Parliament so meaningful.

May I make one other point before I comment on Bill C-259? Under the new rules I find it somewhat frustrating that, in the absolutely sincere desire of the Speaker to accommodate as many members on this side of the House as possible and to allow them to ask questions in a limited one hour question period, what the Speaker is really doing, unintentionally, is preventing certain members from pursuing very serious questions. What I am saying is no reflection at all upon the Speaker himself who, as I say, is absolutely sincere in his desire to protect the rights of members; but in the exercise of this desire some of us are denied the opportunity of pursuing to the end serious questions during a one hour question period. Again may I say I hope that the members on the Liberal side of the House will recommend to the leader of their party the restoration of procedures and traditions that should be followed in the institution that I know to be Parliament.

In discussing the bill before the committee, I must say I do not know what a Member of Parliament must do to convince the Minister of Finance that by the actions he has taken since assuming his office some years ago he has done very little to ingratiate himself to the Canadian people. He has presented so many mini-budgets since the introduction of the white paper that Bill C-259 will be completely emasculated before it becomes law. I think that in the government's mad desire to cover up its bungling of the economy generally, and as a result of its total loss of communications with our allies across the border, the United States, the Minister of Finance is trying to repair the damage done by bad policies by presenting mini-budgets.

Over the last several months the members of this party have made certain strong recommendations to the minister. We suggested some months ago that the government substantially reduce personal taxes, that the government substantially reduce corporate taxes, thus giving some degree of incentive for expansion. Both of these recommendations were accepted last week, and we now have a meagre 3 per cent reduction in personal income tax and a 7 per cent reduction in corporate tax. To me, Mr. Chairman, this action represents an act of total and complete frustration; it is too little, too late.

Earlier in the year we strongly suggested to the government that we should return to some of the programs implemented in the early 1960's, such as the winter works program. The reports and information that have come across my desk indicate that the Minister of Finance, and certainly the leader of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister of Canada, would not consider a program like this because it was a Tory program of the early 1960's. There is some semblance of a winter works program in the offing now. I notice that in the last few days delegations from various provincial governments have been in Ottawa asking for relief, for some clarification of existing policy so as to determine whether or not they will qualify for benefits under the announced program and, if so, when someone in Ottawa will let them know how and when to act.

I think that the problem we in western Canada in particular encounter is that we have to contend with weather that is much more severe than the weather in eastern Canada. I am sure that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance knows the type of conditions in which we in western Canada have to work.

Mr. Mahoney: The weather in Calgary is not nearly so severe as the weather in Ottawa.

Mr. Skoreyko: It is as far as homebuilding and construction generally are concerned. We have asked for an injection of funds in the area of land acquisition. We have asked for an injection of funds into the housebuilding industry in general. Some time ago, it was announced that assistance for low cost housing would be entertained by the government, and we were told that the government would look at any development that would create homes for the needy. Recently an application from Edmonton arrived on the desk of the minister responsible for housing. The applicant was requesting the minister to consider making funds available, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or whatever was the responsible body, for the development of a mobile homes park. When I contacted the minister's office there was some suggestion that there might be legislation under which such a program could conceivably be covered, but in the end the answer I was given was to the effect that no such program existed and therefore nothing could be done for the applicant concerned. Very fortunately for the city of Edmonton, the party in question was able to obtain money privately. The development is now going ahead and providing 900 badly needed homes in the area at a cost that people can afford.

We have already asked the government seriously to consider removing discriminatory legislation that prevents commercial developments in certain cities across Canada taking advantage of the depreciation allowance write-off provision. When that legislation was brought in, to all intents and purposes, it was supposed to be a temporary measure, first for one year, and then for two years. Surely, it is now time that the government considered putting Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton on an equal footing with Montreal and the other major cities of the country.

The other day when I spoke in support of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West I dealt at some length with the proposals in Bill C-259 having to do with incentives to the oil industry in western Canada. I pointed out that the companies participating in activities in the Mackenzie delta will require vast sums of money in the near future in order to continue development there. As the parliamentary secretary well knows, I pointed out that our companies can operate within a fair and reasonable tax structure, if given desired tax benefits equal to those provided for foreign competitors. I pointed out that in order for our people to reap the benefits of this kind of development, our companies must have a tax structure in Canada that would enable them to generate and attract vast sums of money as capital for this kind of venture.

I pointed out that the government should be looking seriously at offshore exploration. This kind of development has interested the United States government for many years. On CBC television only a week ago there was a lengthy documentary dealing with the potential resources under the waters off North America. It is not inconceivable that within the next ten, 15 or 20 years the prime suppliers of our oil needs in North America will be those companies that are drilling in the waters of the Pacific and the Atlantic off our mainland. I suggest that implementation of Bill C-259 as presently proposed will continue to favour those elements in the tax structure which lead to foreign domination of Canada's oil industry. At a time when public concern favours nationalism in this area, some serious changes are warranted that at least would provide parity incentives for Canadian investors in the oil and gas industries.

Perhaps the only solution to this problem is that tax laws in Canada should provide some basis for at least fair competition with foreign concerns. This objective could be achieved in one of two ways—providing a shelter for Canadian companies or changing the tax laws to provide a true incentive for Canadians to participate in risk ventures which lead ultimately to its development of our own resources, regardless of the tax position of these industries relative to other industries in Canada.

Bill C-259 is a bulky document. I think that the way in which the government has approached tax reform as a whole is cumbersome and unyielding. It has adopted an unprecedented approach to tax reform proposals. First, we had that well known white paper, and then an invitation by the government for Canadians to participate in discussing that document. Over and over and over again, we heard contradictory statements from the Minister of Finance, attempting to clarify some of the confusion that arose therefrom. Is it not ironic that the government could spend $44,000 to put out a document known as "The Proposals for Tax Reform," and then spend $190,000 to answer the criticism arising therefrom? Then it came out with another document that probably cost equally as much, called "Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation," which is not even related to the first one.

I want to put on record the views of the Canadian Council for Fair Taxation as found in their publication, Guardian, with respect to the white paper on taxation. This is what they have to say about this "disturbing socialist document," and I quote:

> It is a little difficult to understand a man such as Mr. Benson who is recently reported by the press as saying "I didn't go to university to benefit society generally." We believe you, Mr. Benson, and this raises the question—just who is supposed to benefit from your activities in government? Most responsible people would like to think that their efforts benefit society as a whole, but possibly Mr. Benson is primarily interested in benefiting a small group of radical theoreticians in Ottawa who believe that it is their God-given duty to turn Canada into a socialist state.
> It is doubtful that many Liberal M. P.'s are any more delighted with the white paper proposals than are their opposite numbers in the Conservative party. The fact is that these proposals are now Pierre Elliott Trudeau's proposals. This was made abundantly clear on March 4 when he spoke in defence of the proposals in Toronto's Royal York Hotel during a fund raising dinner of the Toronto and District Liberal Association.
> At one point in his speech he said "We have deliberately provoked a public discussion, with all its political risks, so that Canadians will have an opportunity to make constructive suggestions and the government will be able to improve its proposals."

Mr. Deachman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. gentleman would be willing to identify what he is reading from, the date of it, and the author, so that we would know the source of that material?

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I cannot help it if the honourable whip is asleep. I said I was quoting from Guardian of April, 1970. If he had been paying attention he would have known that.

Mr. Deachman: What Guardian is that? Is it the Manchester Guardian?

Mr. Noble: A guardian angel.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member is entitled to ask for identification of the document, but the hon. member for Edmonton East has said that, to his satisfaction, he identified the document.

Mr. Skoreyko: I am not reading from the guardian that has been protecting the whip's political future. Now, going back to the point at which I was interrupted, I quote:

At one point in his speech he said "We have deliberately provoked a public discussion, with all its political risks, so that Canadians will have an opportunity to make constructive suggestions and the government will be able to improve its proposals."

Well, they have improved them, Mr. Chairman. They have improved them thoroughly. As I pointed out a minute ago, there is no relationship between the two documents. These two documents are not even cousins. I continue to quote:

In the next breath, Mr. Trudeau is quoted as saying the paper is too complex for anyone to be for it or against it. Why publish proposals if they are too complex for Canadians to understand? Why encourage discussion and then turn around and try to intimidate opponents of the proposals, as he did at the dinner, by saying that his government will not be "bullied or blackmailed by hysterical charges or threats."

• (3:50 p.m.)

That kind of language is not new to us. We have listened to it since 1968. We hope the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and others in the Liberal party will be able to justify that kind of language at the next election. I pointed out earlier that Bill C-259 is so thoroughly complicated that in my discussions I find that chartered accountants—certainly I am not one—and lawyers who purport to be tax experts all say the same thing in the end. They find this legislation very difficult to interpret. Indeed, they find the bill extremely difficult to translate into everyday language so that everyone can understand it. If I were to speak about all the anomalies in this bill I would be here quite late in the afternoon.

What are some of the anomalies? First of all, it is unique. I thought for once the government would be sensitive to the individual who has to provide himself with certain tools of his trade or profession in order to be able to earn a living. The government of Canada has allowed $150 for the replacement of those very essential tools. I suggest there are not very many votes in that kind of legislation. Mr. Chairman, I see you are about to catch my eye.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, it is my duty in my capacity as member for Lotbinière to speak on this matter since it gives rise to a genuine interest on the part of my fellow citizens.

Before dealing with the main subject, I would like first of all to mention two points. In the first place, our society cannot tolerate a poverty level as high as that which is prevailing now. As my colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) was saying, the victims of poverty are no longer numbered in thousands, but in millions. The state of dependence of those underprivileged persons is frustrating and disheartening. They see no hope in the future. Furthermore, the most expensive things for them are housing, food and clothing, in view of the uncontrollable increase in the cost of living and despite the fight of this government against inflation.

It is therefore my duty, as member for Lotbinière, to speak out in this House and to say on behalf of my fellow citizens that this situation is totally unacceptable and shameful to Canadians, and to demand a sweeping monetary reform in order to have in this country more justice, humanity and fairness.

Mr. Chairman the study of Bill C-259 casts a shadow over the whole federal administration because it cannot, under the present administrative concepts, exist without the taxation system. In fact, sufficient revenues must be assured to the federal government in order to assist its administration and projects while giving, through a revamped, updated and more equitable tax system, more justice to the Canadian taxpayers.

Governmental objectives may be commendable but it does not necessarily follow that they are reached by the present tax proposals.

The main estimates give a good idea of the expenditures forecast by the government. For the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1971 and ending March 31, 1972, the government has forecast expenditures totalling $14,352 million, that is approximately $660 per capita. Consequently, to cover at least partly these foreseeable expenditures, the federal government must collect an average of $660 from each Canadian citizen, whatever his age or revenue.

However, as all Canadians do not pay income tax, some of them do not earn enough to do so, only a certain number of Canadians bear the brunt of taxes. In fact, Mr. Chairman, children, people without income, mothers who slave away at home but do not gain any earnings, do nothing to fill the coffers of the state. On the other hand, the redistribution of government expenditures, per capita, represents, as I said, the amount of $660; this means that the tax burden is increasing for a decreasing number od Canadians, since fewer and fewer of them earn enough to pay income tax according to the scales drawn up.

For instance, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) himself plans to exempt 750,000 Canadians of taxes; this means that, as time goes by, the burden which grows increasingly heavier in proportion to rising governmental expenditures is re-apportioned among an increasingly restricted number of Canadian citizens.

Needless to say that no taxpayer can be compelled to pay taxes if he has not a sufficient income to do so. Whatever one may think, we must not necessarily rejoice because there are fewer and fewer Canadian taxpayers, since it means that they are penniless, therefore entirely dependent on governments for the necessities of life or minimum means of living. In other words, poverty continues to grow even if governments are increasing programs, studies, projects and slogans such as that about the just society which never came true.

All those individuals who do not assume their tax burden are effectively excluded from the economic life and consequently, do not take part in production. They are increasingly helpless as far as consumption is concerned, that is they do not have the necessary means to satisfy their legitimate consumer needs. Indeed, if on account of old age, youth, studies or physical or mental condition a person has no income, this means that he is unable to satisfy his minimum requirements. Thence the main duty of the authorities of this country, at every level, is to set up the required programs to enable these persons to participate in the economic life of the country, to get their rightful share of the national production, that is to be able to play their role as consumers in a worthy and satisfactory manner.

• (4:00 p.m.)

And that, Mr. Chairman, can only be done through a tax exemption. But we must go further and ensure social security to all Canadians. And, one must admit that present programs, both federal and provincial, are not only insufficient but also often provocative and humiliating at all times. In fact, the administration of such programs is by itself extremely costly. The largest part of the funds available for social security are systematically eaten up by administrative costs, the payment of the staff whose output, in general and very often, is not equal to 20 per cent of what it could be. The thousands of investigators who travel through our ridings to find the one case where assistance could be refused must be paid.

That is where we stand with these many investigations, all equally ridiculous and embarrassing for their victims. Help cannot be given without an investigation which often looks like provocation, blackmail or intimidation.

A government official—I did not talk like that before becoming a member of Parliament, as I was not sure of it, but I can say it now—is a man who protects his job and future; he does not serve the public. The pencil is a fine tool not to be manipulated with the feet.

Anyhow, there are still good officials and I readily admit it but they are drowned in the diversity and complexity of programs, in the number of cases submitted and in their wish to get promotions. The frightening number of officials costs a mint of money. It goes without saying that government expenditures in that area—and everybody will agree with me—will go on increasing but the problem will never be really solved.

Let us consider for one moment the fact that on each tax dollar paid by a Canadian taxpayer, more than 25 per cent—or 25 cents—is spent to finance the health and social welfare programs. That item is the largest of the budget and it will continue to increase because Canadians have always less income to enable them to contribute to the tax system by paying personal income tax. Has social welfare become Canada's main industry?

When we are told that a new tax table will help lower the level of poverty in Canada, it is all completely false, it is misleading our citizens, because if the government agrees to deprive itself of one source of income by granting exemptions to a number of Canadians, it is because it cannot do otherwise. As a matter of fact, these people having almost no income are no longer able to pay tax. The government is not doing them any favour by granting them an exemption; it only recognizes their poverty.

This brings me to the second point of my remarks. Those who pay and will continue to pay the greater share of income tax under this tax reform will be, as the Minister of Finance said himself, those in the middle class, that is those whose income is between $7,500 and $12,000 a year. They are the ones who will suffer most from this tax reform. Those people will pay for those who are exempted and they will not get more services from governments in return. By increasing their tax burden, the government will continue to discourage their personal initiative, their interest in earning more, in progressing and, in the end, they will become the next group of poor. Tomorrow, we shall be asked as members of Parliament to examine government measures to assist them. In fact, government programs now in effect apply to only two groups. They are first designed for rich people whose progress we are furthering through innumerable grants to business for investment or employment purposes, and vote-getting, if possible. On the other hand, government assistance goes to the very poor that we keep on making poorer since government programs do not suffice even to guarantee them a minimum, the major part of funds being swallowed up by administration costs.

Thus big businesses depend on social economic assistance and the poorest are on plain social assistance. Whichever it is the one in between pays. The intermediary class falls between two chairs. The corner shopkeeper, the small employer, the workman, the farmer, those who move heaven and earth to make a living, bring up their families as decently as possible and remain the least bit independent pay for the rich, the haves and also for the have-nots, those who have nothing, who are in poverty. And it is precisely that class which, according to the new tax tables will be most heavily taxed on income.

Just what does the government want? That is the great question.

The debate on fiscal reform raises again the question of the government's general administration and its guiding principles. The following conclusions should therefore not come as a surprise: First of all, poverty continues to increase in Canada at a staggering rate. Secondly, increasingly more Canadians are directly dependent on public handouts to make a pretense of living. Thirdly, increasingly fewer Canadians are producing. One needs only to look at the number of unemployed, non-producers and therefore earning no income to realize it. Fourthly, fewer and fewer Canadians are able to adequately enjoy consumer goods, that is to say that their basic needs are never met because of unsufficient resources. Fifthly, the various programs aimed at creating jobs and bringing social relief are finally no more than poultices on a wooden leg and one must be blind to ignore that.

By the way, even this government realizes that, because it announced last week that more than a billion dollar would be put not into circulation but at the disposal of Canadian industries in order to create jobs and to fight poverty. This shows how this government failed to solve that problem. Therefore we only can find the solution in a thorough monetary reform essentially aimed at the individuals in order to give them financial security, whoever they may be, without affecting their personal freedom.

To do that, we must base such thorough monetary reform on the fact that every Canadian has to fulfil his role as a fullfledged consumer when he is excluded from the process of production without being responsible for it. Only in this way shall we succeed in solving the basic problem—which can be expressed in the following paradox: how can poverty be so great in such a rich country?

This is why I fail to see how the proposed tax reform is going to help solve the economic problem of Canada. This tax reform is mere window-dressing. We just go round in circles within a system which, in the last resort, systematically creates poverty instead of checking it.

I will therefore request that rather than complex tax reform which will solve nothing, thorough monetary reform be effected which will ensure healthy, normal development for every Canadian, regardless of language, race, religion or wealth.

[English]

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Chairman, I will speak briefly in this clause by clause discussion because, as the committee knows, the discussion on clause 1 allows for a rather wide ranging debate. I will be very specific. I said at second reading stage of this debate that I felt there should be no unnecessary delay. I felt that was the case because there had been so much discussion in the country on tax reform. I felt it was only fair to Canadian citizens and businesses and all those participating in the economy that the ground rules under which they will be operating be decided upon by Parliament as soon as possible.

• (4:10 p.m.)

I have also expressed my broad support for the measures before us. In the past I have argued strongly on behalf of higher exemptions, particularly for senior citizens. They are in this bill. There are a number of other provisions which we on this side of the House have argued for and they are in this bill and should be approved.

The only reason I am speaking at this time, Mr. Chairman, is as a result of a very interesting and important meeting which I had in my constituency last week with members of the Peterborough Credit Union movement. The meeting was convened by the members and what struck me most about it was the reasonable tone and the reasonable approach of all the people there. They made no attempt to vilify the government; they never called into question the intentions of the government, but simply placed their case before me, outlining the implications of this bill to their credit unions. I was so impressed by the high mindedness and reasonableness of their representations that I felt I would like to make their case before this committee to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of Finance himself.

Mr. Chairman, in this debate other hon. members have alluded to expressions of concern from credit unions, co-operatives, and representatives of the Caisse Populaire about the implications of the provisions in this bill. A week or so ago amendments were tabled by the minister which seriously alter the impact of the original provisions of the bill. I think these amendments are a move towards meeting the objections and anxieties expressed by the representatives of the credit unions. In my discussions with the representatives of the credit unions in Peterborough, they agreed.

I think it is important when constituents make their objections and fears known that this House, either in its capacity as the House of Commons or in committee of the whole, deal with such expressions of concern. I should like to read short excerpts from one or two letters to indicate the sort of comment I have been receiving. Here is part of a letter from a lady residing on Harvey Street in Peterborough:

> Credit unions have been in Canada for 50 years and I have been a member for over 35 years.
> This volunteer organization has been of great benefit to me when banks would not help me.
> There are many citizens in Peterborough who have had the same experience as I have had. When this number is multiplied by every area in Canada the number of citizens helped would reach the millions.

This is an expression from a lady at Lakefield, Ontario, the area in which I am a resident:

> Being a worker in the credit union, I am in position to see the help it has been to people who may not have received from other sources, it has been a great help to me at various times.

The point being made in both these letters, and the one I am about to read, is that credit unions have been of immense help to a wide variety of citizens who have found that other financial institutions were not available to help them. They have helped the people largely through self-help operation and, in turn, they have performed a service to the country which other financial institutions failed to do. I think it is important that this be recognized.

Here is a letter from Mr. Phillip Day, one of the leading figures in the credit union movement in the Peterborough area. He writes:

> I am writing this letter out of concern for the fate of our credit unions. As you are probably well aware, the credit union movement has provided an invaluable service to the millions over the years who have needed financial assistance, financial assistance at reasonable and moral rates of interest.

I think that is an extremely important point.

There are credit unions and credit unions, Mr. Chairman. There are large credit unions with large reserves, credit unions operating in some provinces which compare in practically every respect to banking institutions. One would be hard pressed to say that they should not bear the same tax load as other financial institutions. The Minister of Finance has to deal with the law as it applies in all parts of the country. We cannot have laws applying to different provinces. The minister has to take into consideration the fact that there are large and extremely affluent credit unions which in many instances should probably be dealt with in the same way as banks. However, there are other credit unions, and a number are in my constituency, which are small, parish credit unions, entirely operated by volunteers which serve the people of the parish in a way that no other financial institution has been prepared to do up to the present time. One parish credit union has written to me, as have a number of its members.

I should like to read a brief excerpt from a letter written by the secretary to St. Paul's (Lakefield) Parish Credit Union Limited. This covers several points made in other letters which I shall not read, and it reads as follows:

> Most credit unions are formed by groups of people with very limited financial resources but by combining their resources were able to help each other within their community, parish or industry, depending upon the limits of their bond of association.
> In the case of St. Paul's (Lakefield) Parish Credit Union—it was formed about 17 years ago by 20 interested but impoverished people. We worked together, saved together, pooled our limited resources to help each other, worked and served without remuneration for the benefit of group as we were able and thus helped our community as well as ourselves.

Policies, decisions and election of officers are run in a democratic manner on the basis of one member, one vote.

Seventeen years ago many people were caught in a vicious poverty cycle. Unable to borrow money to buy a house they were condemned to rent at every increasing rental fees without hope of reprieve, or unable to borrow funds to start a small business or to become self-employed, they were forced to keep working at whatever was available just to keep from falling more deeply into poverty.

If you will recall, banks at that time were unwilling to loan money unless secured by bonds or other like collateral. Thus if a man had to borrow, he was forced to deal with the loan sharks of finance companies who charged very high rates of interest (over 20 per cent), and in addition had hidden or penalty charges with which they snared the unwary borrower.

Credit unions gave the average man the chance to better himself by encouraging him to save whatever he was able and for which he was able to earn a reasonable return of 3 per cent to 6 per cent. In addition he could borrow money for any useful purpose at a reasonable rate of interest (1 per cent per month on the unpaid balance). The loan being covered by life and disability insurance.

Mr. Chairman, this letter expresses very succinctly, in part, the history of a small credit union in a small parish in a small village in central Ontario, namely, Lakefield. It expresses a history which has been repeated time and time again in various parts of this country. It expresses the service that credit unions of this kind have given to people who were denied comparable services at comparable rates by other financial institutions.

Mr. Alexander: When did you find that out?

Mr. Faulkner: If the hon. member for Hamilton West will bear with me, he will learn something from this speech. I know there are credit unions in Hamilton. We have heard a great deal from him on other subjects and now he should develop the same capacity for listening as he has developed for speaking.

I said I wanted to be brief, Mr. Chairman. I am simply making this intervention because these matters were raised at the meeting I had with credit union representatives in Peterborough. At the end of the meeting a resolution which had originally been put forward by the Ontario Credit Union League Limited was agreed to. They felt that if the government could see fit to accept this proposal it would help the small credit unions considerably. I am putting it forward, having outlined the background to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of Finance himself. I ask them earnestly and sincerely to consider this proposal and to see if they cannot accommodate the desires of the people with whom I met the other night. I will simply read the proposal:

That credit unions which, within 90 days of the end of the fiscal year, distribute sufficient earnings, after providing for the statutory transfer to the guarantee fund, to reduce their undivided earnings to an amount not in excess of 5 per cent of their net income (after the required transfer to the guarantee fund) for the fiscal year shall be exempt from tax.

This proposal, it was felt, would protect the small parish credit union and would protect those credit unions which distribute money to members which, as we know, is taxed at the personal level. This proposal was put to me seriously and sincerely. It is a proposal which I now commend to the government. I ask the government to consider it carefully and see if it cannot be incorporated in the bill. I have talked to the Minister of Finance and have talked to the parliamentary secretary. They are compassionate, generous men and, I am sure, if they can possibly accommodate my constituents, they will.

Mr. Alexander: And what does the parliamentary secretary say? Is it yes or no?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Chairman, first may I commend the hon. member for Peterborough for bringing forward the case of the credit unions in his constituency.

Mr. Alexander: He was showing compassion.

Mr. Nystrom: I hope that we can get agreement in this House about the type of amendments that will be moved relating to credit unions and co-operatives. I know that last week the Minister of Finance introduced a number of amendments relating to credit unions, and I know that some of those amendments go in the direction that credit unions want. Nevertheless, co-operatives and co-operative union people of Canada are still unhappy about the lack of real consideration which has been given to the co-operative movement. The hon. member for Peterborough suggested in his speech that there are many people on this side of the House who, like myself, want to see the tax bill as proposed amended to take into account many of the suggestions made by the co-operatives and credit unions of this country. I know that many members of the Conservative party and of the Social Credit party feel the same way; so, perhaps we ought to convince—

Mr. Alexander: The parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Nystrom: —the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Alexander: The parliamentary secretary is the one whom we must convince.

Mr. Nystrom: Seriously, we must try to convince the Minister of Finance to bring in more amendments to this tax bill. Since a number of people on both sides of the House agree on the types of amendments needed in this area, let us bring them forward.

Mr. Mahoney: At the rate we are going, we will never have the chance.

Mr. Nystrom: Let us show the people that there is participatory democracy at work in this country. Let us listen to the grass roots opinion. We can arrive at a consensus.

Since I come from Saskatchewan, the co-operative movement is particularly important to me. I have always been an active and ardent supporter of credit unions, co-operatives and wheat pools. In the 1930's many farmers and working people of my province faced difficult economic conditions. First, they could not grow the grain because of the drought, and even if they managed to grow something they could not sell their produce. They had to fight the grain exchange in Winnipeg and the many other agencies that they found overpowering. Many people saw in co-operatives their only means of defence, and that is how this idea spread across the province of Saskatchewan.

Today you can go to almost any small town or village in my province and find a co-operative store. That store is run and directed by local members who are residents of the community. You will also find that in many small towns and villages in my province there is a credit union where local people deposit their money and borrow money that is needed to keep a business, farm or household going. The grain growers of the province got together and formed the wheat pools. As I said, all these organizations form an important and integral part of rural life, indeed, of all life, in Saskatchewan. I do not want to see this way of life threatened. I think it is valuable and should be preserved.

Really, the basic philosophy behind a co-operative is different from that behind a corporate business enterprise. The purpose of the co-operative is very much different from the purpose of the huge multi-national corporation or of any other corporation in the country. For example, the money made by credit unions and co-operatives is not really a profit. Any surplus earned by the co-operative represents savings for the advantage of the members. The co-operative, therefore, does not really earn an income in the way that other corporations or business enterprises earn an income. The money that co-operatives or credit unions make as profit, if you want to call it that, is paid out in turn to the members in the form of dividends. Of course, this money is taxed at the personal level after it is in the hands of the individual members. The very philosophy of the co-operative is that one member shall have one vote. Co-operatives have arisen because people of a community have got together, regardless of financial background, and formed an institution with which to help themselves. This is the type of thing we ought to be encouraging and not discouraging in Canada.

There are many co-operatives, credit unions and other co-operative institutions in my constituency. I have received literally dozens of letters from them. I could follow the example of the hon. member for Peterborough and read several letters from older people who have been in the co-operative and credit union movements for many years. I could read several letters from managers from various credit unions and co-operatives who are expressing concern about the effects of the tax bill; however, I will not do that at this time. I shall simply read part of one letter that I received the other day from the general manager of the Yorkton Credit Union, one of the largest credit unions in our part of Saskatchewan. To show hon. members how well accepted and widely used this institution is, may I quote one or two sentences from the letter, as follows:

> We are writing to you as the representative of this constituency in the House of Commons in Ottawa in connection with the new tax provisions now before Parliament. This credit union is made up of 5,932 members—

That, Mr. Chairman, shows that nearly 6,000 people in one community belong to one credit union. As the hon. member for Peterborough said, many of these people could not get the financial assistance they need from private banks or private financial institutions, and therefore they make use of their credit union.

I realize that some of the amendments which have been introduced go a long way towards satisfying some of the wishes of the credit union movement. As I said before, I hope the minister and the parliamentary secretary will display the same attitude towards the co-operatives.

I think all members of the House received a letter the other day, dated October 15, 1971, from the Co-operative Union of Canada. That letter is very important and I should like to read part of it this afternoon. It is addressed to all members of the House of Commons and reads:

> Gentlemen:
> Since we wrote to you on September 20th, the government has introduced amendments to Section 135 of Bill C-259 relating to the taxation of co-operatives.
> Co-operatives wish to advise you that these amendments do not meet the objections of co-operatives.
> Co-operatives insist that the fundamental distinctions in their nature be respected by the taxation statute. These distinctions are:—

I think it is important to note the distinctions between co-operatives and private corporations. I continue quoting:

> (a) the co-operative provides primarily a self-help service required by its members.
> (b) the co-operative distributes its earnings to its members in proportion to member business.
> (c) the co-operative raises and "services" its equity capital by revolving the same in relation to the use of the co-operative by its members.
> (d) the capital contributed by a member of the co-operative is to provide himself with services and not to produce a return on investment.

These are some of the things that we must keep in mind when considering the legislation that is before us. There are a number of other things I could say in relation to co-operatives and credit unions. I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, that congenial soul, will take these suggestions very seriously. I am sure he now understands the objections of co-operatives right across Canada.

• (4:30 p.m.)

As I have said before to the parliamentary secretary, these cooperatives are very much a part of life in Saskatchewan, particularly in the small communities. We all know about the rural urban shift. Last year the population in the province of Saskatchewan dropped by over 30,000. One of the things that makes a rural community viable is a co-operative or a credit union. If we do anything to impede that development, we add to the rapid exit of people from rural Canada to the urban centres. This is of real concern to many Canadians. We should not try to expedite that trend in any way, shape or form through the taxation system. We should be doing exactly the reverse, trying to help people stay and find jobs in rural areas.

I want to make a few general comments on the tax bill before us. It is a very big and comprehensive bill containing over 700 pages, but it does not represent real tax reform. I was surprised and perhaps even amused by the remarks of the member for Edmonton East. He complained about the tax bill being a very socialistic measure. I do not know how anyone in his right mind could take these comments even a little bit seriously. This is exactly what the bill is not because it protects the status quo in this country. It continues many of the inequities we have had in our tax system for many years.

In 1962, the Diefenbaker government appointed a royal commission to study taxation which was known as the Carter Commission on Taxation. This commission stated that Canada has one of the most unfair tax systems of any country in the world, and that we should do something to remedy it as rapidly as possible. It referred to the hundreds of millions of dollars that are escaping taxation in this country. The reference was to many of the oil companies and extractive industries that each year receive a beautiful tax holiday from the people of Canada. The hon. member for Duvernay, who left the Liberal cabinet a short while ago, made many speeches on this topic. It is about time we started taking him and other economists very seriously with regard to what we are doing to our economy.

Why do we continue to give tax holidays, extra benefits and concessions to many of the large extractive and resource corporations in this country? They do not provide many jobs. As everyone knows, we are exporting jobs by following this type of policy, a situation which would be changed to a large degree if we changed our taxation system to make these corporations pay their fair share of taxation in relation to everyone else in the economy. This is one of the more serious gaps in this huge tax reform bill. I believe these corporations should be paying their fair share of the taxes. If they did, they would be making a greater contribution to Canada and its economy.

We have a 7.1 per cent rate of unemployment in Canada. One reason for this situation is that a large part of our economy is foreign owned. We are a branch plant economy. When things go wrong in the United States, naturally the branch plants here close down. In order that the United States may protect itself, it must make things difficult here. It is like a tree that is in trouble. If something happens to a tree, it is the branch that dies first, not the trunk. Those are things we should be considering on a long-term basis instead of the little reforms contained in this tax bill. This would be one way of having full employment in Canada. It is something we will have to do.

Another point I want to make is that the tax bill before us, as it is constituted, is not based on the principle of equity. We still have a great deal of inequity in our tax system, and this bill will not change that. In the special budget announcement made the other day, we were told that corporate taxes will be lowered by 7 per cent for the next year and a half and personal income tax by 3 per cent of the tax payable. Here again we see the inequity in our tax system. The 3 per cent reduction in income tax is also regressive, not progressive, taxation. It helps the person earning $30,000, $40,00 or $50,000, as well as Members of Parliament, more than it helps the vast majority of Canadian people. These are the types of things we should be getting away from. Many people on the extreme right of the political spectrum say that if we do this, we will discourage initiative. But they forget that very few people in this country have that type of money.

In this type of legislation, we are protecting only a privileged few. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, over 90 per cent of the people in this country do not own any stocks or bonds and do not collect any money from the stock market. Of those who do, many do not collect very much. If we reformed the taxation system, we would be encouraging the vast number of Canadian people who are ordinary citizens. In turn, we would be stimulating the economy and giving the ordinary person a fair chance. We would be encouraging his initiative rather than that of some director of a multinational corporation who is probably sitting in New York or Chicago. This is the direction in which we should be going.

Let us not get carried away by the hysterical fear of socialism held by some of the extremists in the Conservative party. Let us look at it in a sensible way. If we redistribute wealth and power in this country, the ordinary worker, farmer and small businessman can play a meaningful role in the economy of this country. That is not being done today. Let us not kid or fool ourselves. The gap between the rich and the poor is the same today as it was 20 years ago. It is only necessary to look at the Senate report on poverty to ascertain this fact. It pointed out that the top 20 per cent of the Canadian people earned 40 per cent of the income in this country and the bottom 20 per cent earned 7 per cent. It has been this way for the past 20 or 30 years.

An hon. Member: That was in 1961.

Mr. Nystrom: That was in 1961. Those figures are relevant up to, and including, 1968 and 1969. This government has not done anything significant to change the fundamental structure of taxation and power in this country. It is those things we should be doing immediately.

In conclusion, I wish to again encourage the parliamentary secretary to bring in more amendments concerning co-operatives. We have a consensus on that. At least we can get that far on the tax bill now before us. We should forget some of our old hang-ups about protecting and giving gifts to multinational corporations, and begin helping the ordinary Joe in Canada. We can do it. If we do, we will have a much more viable economy and country in which to live.

The Chairman: Order. Before I recognize the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe, I might be permitted to read the details of the proceedings for the adjournment debate this evening.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Use of informers—Repudiation of statements by Robert Eadie and father; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland)—Taxation—Succession duties and gift taxes—Proposed federal abandonment—Reply to provincial requests for delay; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—Regional Economic Expansion—Inquiry as to signing of agreements with Nova Scotia.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF OPPOSITION DAY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I felt hon. members might wish to be aware that we propose to call an opposition day for Thursday. I thought it would be a good idea to announce this information to the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You did very well, speaking from this side of the chamber.

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-259, to amend the Income Tax Act and to make certain provisions and alterations in the statute law related to or consequential upon the amendments to that act—Mr. Benson—Mr. Honey in the chair.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Chairman, in speaking to Bill C-259 I intend, first of all, to make a few preliminary observations. When this government took office three years ago there was a mood of excitement and curiosity in the country at large. I am sure none of us were immune to that mood. Post-Centennial Canada was to witness an apparent turning of ways. In the Liberal party a new leadership had materialized, a new style, a whole new government. Or so it seemed. There were new phrases in the air—participatory democracy, the just society, co-operative federalism, the new politics. Well, these weren't really new phrases, they had been in current use for some time. The difference was that they were being used as techniques on the political platform, and this gave them an aura of newness and mystery. Of course, we were all curious to see how those phrases would be turned into action. And here we are, Mr. Chairman, three years later, debating a bill on tax reform, a bill which grew out of a white paper which showed that the government had fumbled and failed in its attempt at participatory democracy. This bill cannot be described as reform because it does not aspire to a just society, it merely covers up for a few years some of the more glaring injustices which now exist. It is a bill so difficult to read and so secretive in its intentions that it smells of the rankest of the old politics. It is a bill which flies in the face of even the least generous concept of co-operative federalism.

Since other members of the committee will be addressing themselves to many different aspects of these issues, I shall confine my remarks this afternoon to the subject of federal-provincial relations. Of course, I do not mean to imply that these are separate issues—they all hang together as a cloak of this government's arrogance. But for the sake of emphasis, I would like to highlight certain aspects that are of particular importance to the provinces.

With its assault on the nation's economy over the past three years, the government has not only aggravated the condition of the provincial economies, but has seriously constricted their ability to solve their problems. Every time the federal government puts its leaden foot on the economy the provinces must pay the cost through increased welfare payments. It is indeed shocking, therefore, that this bill should give so little deference to the provinces and the dire economic straits into which the government has thrown them.

The need to co-ordinate federal tax policy with provincial and municipal taxes is becoming increasingly urgent. The rate of municipal and provincial expenditures combined is growing at a much faster pace than those of the federal government. It is no longer good enough to dismiss flippantly the discrepancy between provincial revenues and expenditures by saying that the provinces can simply raise their own taxes to make up the difference.

In the first place, if this government is truly concerned with a more rational and just system of taxation, it must face the fact that all taxes ultimately come from the same taxpayers. In the second place, apart from income tax, provincial revenue is raised from far more regressive sources. Increased sales and property taxes fall heavily on those low income groups the federal government so piously pretends to help. In the third place, every time the government amends the federal structure of taxation, provincial revenues are immediately affected. It makes only good sense, economically and politically, to consult with the provinces and co-operate with them on the issue of taxation. Why, then, Mr. Chairman, has the government failed to do so?

Perhaps the federal government is not concerned about driving the provincial governments to the point of exasperation at which they will have to set up their own independent tax systems. It would be a good election issue for the Liberal party which sees itself as the only vehicle of national unity. After allowing balkanization to take place as a result of its own callous neglect, it could argue before the Canadian electorate that it would put the provincial governments in their places.

The former premier of Ontario, John Robarts, has charged that the new legislation on tax reform shows no regard for the position of the provinces and municipalities in the total tax picture. He has called for a fully integrated and co-ordinated package of tax reforms and social security reforms. Such a program would take time and care to accomplish. It would also take courage, not because the provinces are unwilling to negotiate, but because the Minister of Finance would have to reverse his attitude of stubborn pride in his past accomplishments. We in the Official Opposition hope to give him every opportunity to adopt a more open-minded attitude.

As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out on September 14, the fiasco of the white paper originated in the peculiar stubbornness of the Minister of Finance in refusing to change his mind. We urge him not to repeat that error. Quebec's minister of revenue has asked the federal government for more time in which to refine the Quebec provincial tax system before the federal proposals become law. The Province of Ontario has asked for a system of tax credits to replace the current system of exemptions and expenses. We in the opposition have also called for the introduction of tax credits. They would be of far greater assistance to the low income taxpayer than the increased exemptions the government proposes. Furthermore, if the government were willing to negotiate with the provinces on this issue, a way could be found to integrate these tax credits with provincial taxes. This would have the humane and rational effect of reducing the regressive nature of provincial taxes. Ideally, a low income taxpayer should be able to apply his unused tax credits to his property taxes, for example, and obtain a refund therefrom.

We are not asking that such a program be introduced immediately. All we are asking is that the federal government finally acknowledge that the individual taxpayer is a unity; he is not split up into three parts, each of which takes on a different economic personality depending upon which government he is dealing with. A willingness to delay this bill and negotiate with the provinces in the entire field of taxation would be such an acknowledgement.

I remarked earlier, Mr. Chairman, that provincial revenues are closely linked to federal tax policy. To ignore this fact is to be irresponsible. Yet the Minister of Finance has gone ahead and thrown the provinces into a quandary over the abolition of the estate taxes and left them with the worry of how to replace the revenues they had received through the abatement program. Since the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have attempted to become tax havens for the wealthy by returning their portion of the abatement to the estate we can applaud the Minister of Finance for justly seeking to neutralize these attempts. The replacing of the estate tax with the uniform capital gains tax will effectively remove these anomalies in time.

The criticism we have to offer is levelled at the inimitable method which the Minister of Finance employs. If the tax reform bill is passed on January 1, 1972 we shall witness an even more unequal death tax jungle than now exists. This will come about, not because the minister lacked good intention, but because he lacked good common sense. At the present time only the three provinces of British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec have their own succession or estate tax laws. After January 1, 1972, these three will be the only provinces collecting death duties and, in order to avoid double taxation and prevent a flight of wealth from their jurisdictions, they will probably have to repeal their laws. In the meantime, the Province of Manitoba, for example, can become a tax haven for the wealthy of Ontario. I am sure our colleagues in opposition, the members of the NDP, will assure us that the province of Manitoba has no desire to become a tax haven for the wealthy.

In addition to these anomalies which will follow in the wake of the Finance Minister's stroll through the jungle of estate tax reform, the provinces are to be handed the burden of finding revenues to replace their losses over the five years while the capital gains tax matures. Manitoba's finance minister has estimated that his province will lose up to $50 million in revenue during this period. This may seem like peanuts to the federal government, which is frequently inclined to spend such sums of money in trivial ways, but it will represent a serious blow to Manitobans who are already so heavily taxed. Again, it is not good enough for the government to wash their hands of the consequences of their own legislation. It is not good enough to simply say that the provinces will have to do the best they can and face up to their own freedom to be responsible for their own taxing and spending. Tying another knot in the financial straitjacket the provinces are in and calling it freedom is the ultimate in irresponsibility.

Since the government has for the past two years so loudly and repetitiously proclaimed itself to be on the side of equity, it is incredible to find in this bill so blatant a discrimination against the taxpayers of the three provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. I am referring here to the proposal in the bill to include and tax as income those contributions made by an employer on behalf of his employees to a public medical care plan. The taxpayers of those provinces will now be penalized for living where they do, while the taxpayers of other provinces will escape extra taxation because their medicare expenses come out of general revenue. Even more unfairly, while the taxpayer must claim his employer's contributions as income, he will not be allowed to deduct his own contributions as expenses. So the government is going to cut the deck both ways.

To try and imagine the decision making process behind this proposal is mind-boggling. The government may try and defend the proposal by arguing that these wealthy provinces can well afford to pay the extra taxes which they claim will net an additional return of $90 million, $58 million of which will come from Ontario alone. Yet the most elementary common sense will tell you that a person earning $5,000 in Ontario is no wealthier than a person earning $5,000 in Quebec. And if there are people earning $10,000 in Alberta, they are individually no better off than the fewer individuals in that wage bracket in Saskatchewan.

But even the present government cannot be so slow-witted as not to appreciate that. It is possible that they have taken a philosophic position on the issue of medicare premiums and hope to force those provinces to abandon them. In the strange reasoning behind such an attitude, the taxpayer would not direct his annoyance at the federal government for artificially raising his income, but would direct it at the provincial government that has a system of premiums. Well, only an election can bear out such a proposition. It is interesting to note, incidentally, that if the government are opposed to the imposition of premiums on philosophic grounds, they did not allow their principles to interfere with the active assistance given by the finance minister's parliamentary secretary to the Social Credit League of Alberta in the past provincial election—one of the political parties and governments which has introduced a system of medicare premiums.

Regardless of what one's feelings are on the issue of medicare premiums, it is unwise and unfair to reduce the serious problem of tax reform to the level of political gamemanship with the provinces. And this is precisely what this proposal will do. It is time the government rose to a new level of maturity in its relationship with the provinces. The first step in this direction would be to delay the introduction of the tax reform legislation now proposed. We urge the government to sit down with the provinces and work out a rational system of taxation that adopts as its first premise the fact that all jurisdictions obtain their revenues from the same taxpayers.

Four years ago the Ontario committee on taxation recommended such negotiations, and I quote their proposal:

> We agree that the income base on which provincial taxes apply should be set by the federal government and that major responsibility for broad stabilization policy rests with that government. But it does not follow that the provinces should be deprived of a significant voice in the determination of the tax base and in stabilization policy, and we are convinced that consultation between the federal and provincial governments should take place prior to the implementation of any proposed income tax amendments. In particular, we believe that unilateral changes by the federal government in the common base of the personal income tax cannot be justified, for they directly affect the yield of the tax to the provinces.

Without resorting to the euphoric language that characterized the election of 1968, we seriously feel that a new attitude of co-operation is called for. Should the government continue to neglect the stakes the provinces have in the federal tax system, those jurisdictions may increasingly be forced to find their own independent economic paths. The strains upon confederation would be increased and unnecessarily so. The federal government must not allow this to happen by default. It should assume a role of active responsibility by delaying this bill and calling the province together as soon as possible.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, before discussing the other aspects of Bill C-259 that affect the mining industry, I want to direct the attention of the committee to the specific problem northerners have in meeting the cost of living in the north and the weight of taxation that is added to that cost. The government has recognized the principle that since it costs more for its employees to live in the north, it should therefore compensate them by providing a northern living allowance or isolated post allowance. For various points throughout the north, a formula has been devised and the northern allowance set over and above the regular salary for a single man, with an even higher allowance for a married man. Recently there was a cut in the northern allowance to which strenuous objection was taken by the civil service organizations, but to no avail. Notwithstanding the fact that costs across the board have risen, the government none the less decided to reduce the northern allowances.

My point is that the government has adopted the principle with respect to its own employees that, in addition to the ordinary salary paid the employees, which is in line with salaries paid to non-government employees in the work force, it has seen fit to pay an amount to compensate them for the increased cost of living in northern areas. If this be the case, and if this is a proper principle upon which to act, then surely the same kind of reasoning should prevail with regard to non-governmental employees who live in the north. If I am correct in that reasoning, then surely the only approach that can be taken to these employees is to give them different tax treatment from those in the south.

I know that this matter has been brought up on many occasions in the past, but has been dismissed by the argument that tax treatment for all Canadians must be the same, regardless of whether they come from our most easterly city of St. John's, Newfoundland or our most westerly city of Whitehorse in the Yukon. Nevertheless I think it timely to make the further plea, that the government once again reconsider its stand and that it provide an incentive for Canadians to settle in our north.

I had the good fortune to travel with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on a journey to Australia to compare conditions affecting not only the aboriginal peoples in that country but also industrial development, particularly in the resource field, with conditions in our work. I was impressed by the approach that the Australian government had taken in its Northern Territory, and I know that others who accompanied the minister on that occasion were equally impressed, particularly the hon. member for Northwest Territories. Not only does the Australian government provide an incentive to its employees to serve in the Northern Territory; It also provides the same kind of incentive to non-government employees to establish themselves and to settle in the Northern Territory of Australia. They provide those incentives by means of tax incentives. It works, and there is no reason why it should not work in Canada. The Australian government provides incentives in the way of tax cuts to non-government employees who reside in its northern territories for precisely the same reasons that exist in our northern territories. Fuel costs more; light costs more; freight rates are higher; food costs are higher. Virtually everything that is consumed in Canada's northern territories must be freighted in from what we call the outside.

It might interest hon. members to know that an average fuel bill during the winter months—contrast this with the price paid in Ontario—for a tight home and for a modest sized home runs anywhere from $30 to $50 a month. It might also interest hon. members to know that the monthly light bill for an average family in a modest home is anywhere between $20 and $25 a month. I ask you to contrast those costs with the costs that have to be met by residents in this province, or for that matter anywhere else in Canada except perhaps the far northern areas of Quebec, Newfoundland, Labrador and the like.

The freight rates that are applicable to food and other consumer items coming up from Vancouver or Edmonton, and indeed from the eastern part of the country, have to be regarded in terms of Whitehorse being the most westerly city in Canada. From Vancouver goods must travel 1,500 miles up the west coast, and from Edmonton must travel 1,300 miles and more into the interior of the Yukon by highway. This is one of the reasons why costs are higher in the Yukon. This is one of the reasons why the government, in order to compensate its employees, adds to ordinary salaries an isolated post allowance. You can imagine what those freight rates do to the cost of food and other consumer items.

Another factor in our tax system that really skyrockets the cost of living in our northern territories is the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. This tax is odious enough and onerous enough in the southern sections of the country, putting restrictions on new construction which would create higher employment. The abolition of the sales tax has been advocated over and over again by the Leader of the Opposition and by all of us on this side of the chamber. But when one adds that 11 per cent sales tax on building materials to the cost of a stick of lumber, or one pound of insulation, or a bag of cement that has to travel from our southern areas all the way to Whitehorse, Dawson, Inuvik, Yellowknife, or wherever else it is destined for in the north, it just places costs away beyond reasonableness. I do not think hon. members realize that building costs in the north generally are 20 per cent to 30 per cent higher than they are in any other community in Canada.

Yet there is still this almost pathological resistance to a recognition of the principle that the same kind of treatment should be afforded to all citizens of the north, and not just to government employees. I suggest it is time that the government cease discriminating against the ordinary citizen of the north and give him the same treatment as it gives to its own employees. I was expecting, and I still expect, the hon. member for Northwest Territories to take up the torch in this debate on this subject. I do not think that there has been any time in which I have been resident in the Yukon—for some 20 years now—when the people up there have not made representations to the effect that the government should encourage the permanent settlement of Canada's northern areas. One of the ways in which that could be accomplished would be by providing tax incentives for Canadians to settle the north. The argument might be made, "Well, you had the opportunity when your government was in power to do just that." I am not making any excuses for it not happening when the country was governed by the party of which I am a member. I still think it is a good idea. I did then. I failed to sell it then, but there is no reason why the principle cannot be sold now.

Passing to mining once again, there were one or two matters which I omitted from my remarks yesterday with respect to the prospector, and I am going to cure that omission in due course. But for the moment I want to discuss the effect of the proposals in the bill before us, when taken together with the other legislation now pending in this Parliament, on the mining industry generally. I have spoken of costs so far as they affect the individual living in the north. The individuals in the north have many occupations. Among those are truckers who haul mining products, and drive transport with respect to the operations of producing mines. There are explorers. There are prospectors. There are miners. People are engaged in virtually every occupation in connection with exploration, development and production of mine products.

The mining companies themselves, which are becoming fewer, have the same kind of costs to meet, and more so than their counterparts in the south. In order for a mine product in the Yukon or Northwest Territories to be competitive with the product of its counterpart in the southern areas of Canada it must be a significantly higher grade product. One can imagine that if that assertion be correct, and I submit that it is, the number of new mines that could be brought into production of relatively lower grade product if only they could compete with southern mining products. The reason they cannot compete is the fantastic cost of finding a mine, developing a mine, bringing it into production, and transporting its product into the southern and world markets. In order for a product in these northern areas to be competitive at all, the grade of the product has to be so much superior to that in the southern areas, thus making it economically feasible to develop a producing mine. I say this by way of background to illustrate that every single cost that is added to the process of exploration, to the process of development, to the process of bringing in a producing mine in the Yukon, simply makes the product of that mine less competitive with its southern counterpart.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

It can be put another way. The more costs which are added to mining operations in the Yukon, the less value will be its proven assets or reserves, so that eventually given a certain grade of mine product, which is economic at the moment, there is a point at which, as costs are added, the ore becomes uneconomic and the mine must close. These costs can be added by taxation or by poor management. They can have the same effect as a fall in the market price of the mineral that that particular mine is producing. They can be added by increased royalties and by labour costs. There are several ways. But the most significant manner in which costs are added to mining operations is through royalties and taxation. In the last three to four years in the Yukon, five new mines have gone into production and in the last year and a half to two years all but one of those mines have ceased producing. One of the four which has ceased producing is now carrying on further exploration work and is refinancing, but the other three are gone because the value of the ore pinched out, as well as other things such as increased costs. I am not suggesting for a moment it was these taxation measures which brought about those closures, but I am suggesting that other current legislation before this House, taken together with the threat of the white paper proposals for taxation, certainly had a bearing on those closures.

(5:10 p.m.)

If the proposals in respect of the elimination of the three-year tax exemption period and if the proposals with regard to earned depletion go on as proposed in Bill C-259, the costs attendant upon those two changes will be in themselves sufficient to eliminate the several possibilities of new mines. I cannot state instances. The effect of these proposals is simply to raise the level of the value of the ore that has to be found before a new mine can come into production. I am not making this case on behalf of the mining industry, as some might charge me with doing, but am making it on the basis that the mining industry is one of the most important industries in our economy today. It is the third largest mining industry in the world, second only to the United States and the Soviet Union. The mining industry in the 100 years in which we have been a nation has had a spectacular growth because of the incentives that have been provided to encourage that growth. All of a sudden these incentives are to be removed by Bill C-259. I said a moment ago I was not making this plea on behalf of the mining industry. I say now I am making it on behalf of Canada as a whole. Canada cannot afford to so inhibit one of its most important industries as to diminish the immensely significant contribution that industry has made to the over-all national economic fabric. I charge this government with doing just that.

I said a moment ago that I would come back to the subject of prospectors and I shall do so now. Many Canadians, both in the mining industry and outside, know of the traditional prospector who spends much of his life in the bush seeking ore deposits. In the Yukon the practice, as I am sure it is in the Northwest Territories, is for a prospector to hole up in the winter, find employment, and earn enough money so that he can spend the next prospecting season searching for what he hopes will be the mother lode. These men often do not have the kind of education many people have. They are single and sometimes are real strangers to the southern society. Yet prospectors have been one of the most important groups of indidivuals that have contributed to the growth and expansion of our economy. The last time I spoke on this subject I said that in the last 100 years some 240 mines were discovered in Canada. Most of those were discovered by those intrepid individuals who follow this life style I have just described.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate in committee on Bill C-259, one is immediately impressed once again by the size of the bill and the importance of it.

Mr. Mahoney: About four pounds.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Calgary South suggests to me that it weighs four pounds. I would rather concern myself with the economic weight of the bill than its physical weight. The economic weight is indeed a millstone around the necks of many people in view of its damage to the Canadian economy today. I cannot help but quote from the Vancouver newspaper The Province of October 16. Under the heading "There was a crystal ball . . ." the article reads:

> Two years ago the Economic Council of Canada, which was assigned responsibility for warning of the economic shoals ahead, offered the view that this country had gone as far as it should in the war on inflation. Further fiscal and monetary restraints, the Council declared, could raise unemployment and slow the economy with only marginal effects on the rate of price increases and costs. What did the government do then?
> Two years ago Mr. Benson was budgeting for a $250 million surplus in order to soak up inflation. The Bank of Canada was promoting a policy of tight money and high interest rates. Dr. John Young, chairman of the then new Prices and Incomes Commission was warning that fiscal and monetary screws might have to be tightened further if voluntary restrain failed to halt inflation.

What's happening now? Mr. Benson is budgeting for a billion dollar deficit to cover the cost of the most massive single injection ever made by a Canadian government to stimulate the economy.

So we have all this following the very clear warning by the Economic Council of Canada concerning the economic pitfalls which might well lie ahead. The article continues:

> In its 1969 summation the Economic Council was surprisingly prophetic. If Canada persisted in its tough fiscal and monetary policy through that fall the country would run the risk of a severe recession in 1970. And once the economy turned sour, the Council added, it probably would not be revived quickly by any set of policies.

The author of the article suggests, "Mr. Benson please note". Well, everybody knows that Mr. Benson did not note and that the Prime Minister did not note. He said that in spite of the 6 per cent rate of unemployment we are to continue our fight against inflation. Today I believe many economists recognize that the fact we did curtail the expansion of our economy too much between 1968 and 1970 brought on a great deal more unemployment than was necessary. Many economists admit this now, and even some people in government circles are quietly suggesting that they erred throughout that particular period. The question readily poses itself: what is the solution today?

Let us suppose, for example, that the economists are right and the economy was turned off too much in 1968 to 1970. What does that leave us with today, and how do we bring ourselves out of it? We heard the budgetary statement made by the Minister of Finance last Thursday evening in which he proclaimed that it was the government's intention to turn loose $1,070 million into the economy within the next short period and that this would start the economy rolling again. How does this bill, which results from the budget of June 1971, compare with the minister's budgetary statement? Does it conflict with it or does it agree with it? This is what members of the House of Commons should ask themselves. We have had the budget of 1971, the budgetary statement of last week and the surtax imposed by the United States.

It seems to me that Bill C-259 conflicts with the budgetary statement, which only goes to prove that we are thoroughly tied to the North American market and therefore should gauge our actions by the situation in the U.S. Perhaps there is no easy solution to the problem confronting Canada. The budgetary statement of last week, the June budget of this year and the American surtax present a most serious challenge to the Canadian government and the Canadian people, but to ignore the facts only demonstrates an unwillingness on the part of the government to face the facts.

The inflationary pressures between 1965 and 1970 were obvious to everyone. They were also obvious to the government. As I stated in my opening remarks, the government turned the screws too sharply on inflation between 1968 and 1970. What factors contributed to inflation in that period? One only has to look at the statistics reported in the Bank of Canada's annual report of 1970. Labour costs increased 77 per cent from 1965 to 1970. Farm costs decreased by 2 per cent, and business stayed exactly even. Indirect taxes increased by 13.8 per cent, and other components increased by 11.2 per cent. These are facts that should be obvious to everyone. Labour income has increased out of line with any increase in productivity. In fact, it has increased 30 per cent faster.

The reason I mention the increase in labour income is that it is a key factor in inflation. This is why President Nixon has brought in wage and price controls in the United States. One of the most surprising aspects of President Nixon's wage and price controls in the U.S. is the fact that, by and large, labour unions have accepted wage controls. They have done so because basically they know that wages have outstripped productivity. We have done nicely in the last 20 years. We have made substantial gains in productivity through the advent of technological advances. But in recent years our productivity has not kept up with our wage increases. In fact, the 1970 annual report of the Bank of Canada suggests that wage increases have outstripped productivity by 90 per cent. When prices have to rise to accommodate the excess, and when markets do not absorb the price increase brought about by the greater cost of productivity, there must be a cut back in production. This is really what is happening in Canada.

The gigantic increase in costs has failed to be absorbed by an increase in productivity, thus bringing about a situation in which the market was unable to absorb the price increases in the commodity. One result of this was a cut back in production, bringing about greater unemployment which no one in our society welcomes or likes. Newspapers throughout all of Canada in the last six months—and one could compile a file of those newspaper reports—have reported cut backs in various plants all the way from General Motors, that the big, sinful giant which is dominating the Canadian economy—if one wished to paint that type of picture of General Motors—to Polymer, the Canadian government owned corporation. All of them have cut back production because the market has been unable to absorb the increased cost of their products.

What does the bill before Parliament do? I think there are a number of steps we should be taking, but I do not believe the government is inclined to take them. I think the first step should be to restore confidence in the nation, confidence in the business community that this nation has the wherewithal to compete with the United States, Japan, West Germany and the European Common Market, to put our products on the markets of the western world and to sell them.

Bill C-259 does not provide the business community with sufficient confidence to re-invest. The minister in his budgetary statement said that corporations would be given a 7 per cent reduction in their tax and that private individuals would be given a 3 per cent reduction in their income tax. As reported in today's paper, a 3 per cent reduction for a single individual earning $6,000 a year is only $12. That is not too much. The person who will be $12 richer because of that 3 per cent reduction is not going to go out and create employment for too many people. The person earning $50,000 a year will save only $314 as a result of the 3 per cent reduction. This is not much to encourage confidence within the business community, and encouragement is what is needed to get the masses who are unemployed back into the labour force to contribute to the development of this country.

We must consider some of the more basic costs. The other night in a speech on the budgetary papers I said that we should withdraw the competition bill and the labour code amendments suggested by the Minister of Labour. We must go further than that and demonstrate clearly that money creates employment within Canada. I recall that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said in this House that up until the fall of 1970 his department had created 16,000 jobs at a cost of "X" million dollars. This worked out to something like $5,000 per job and did not take into account the contribution of private industry. Under the regional expansion program it took an investment of nearly $6,000 to create a job. Let us suppose that is one-fifth of the capital investment required to create one job. This means that $30,000 would be required. Let us suppose it could be done more cheaply, say for half; it would still require a capital investment of $15,000 to create one job. Let us say that 500,000 people are out of work. If we multiply $15,000 by 500,000 we get an idea of the kind of investment that is required. I suggest that the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary secretary should look at the facts.

Money is not coming into Canada; it is leaving. Provincial governments and municipalities are not going abroad to borrow. We must ask ourselves if the federal government should be discouraging foreign investment in this country. I am not discussing who should control foreign investment because as a Canadian I believe that we should, but it should be brought into this country to help create trade. But how should we do this, Mr. Chairman? Is Bill C-259 the answer? In my opinion, it is not.

In my opinion, Bill C-259 should be divided in order to give the lower income groups the benefits which may be derived under it. It should be recognized that although inflation is a problem, unemployment is a greater problem. How can these two problems be resolved? Now that the United States has put a freeze on wages, Canada should announce an intention to peg its dollar at 95 cents. This would instill confidence within the business community. If this policy were announced, the immediate result might be an influx of money. To offset this, along with pegging the dollar at 95 cents there should be the announcement of an intention to freeze prices and wages in Canada as long as our major trading partner keeps the same freeze in its country.

The hon. member for Trinity suggested that a wage freeze should be imposed upon unions and prices in this country. If this were done without pegging the dollar, there would be an immediate tendency to force up the value of our dollar. I suggest that it should be stated unequivocally that it is our intention to peg the dollar at 95 cents and to establish a board to impose wage and price controls. In that way the business community would regain confidence and people would be back to work. Part of this bill, not all of it, should be discarded. There should be a tax reduction for the lower income groups and a reconsideration of the capital gains tax and the other measures which increase taxes throughout Canada.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, in view of the far reaching ramifications of Bill C-259, dealing with an over-all revamping of our tax structure, one area that has received little attention is the section dealing with international income. The recent action of the United States government in imposing a 10 per cent surcharge on imports, their avowed aim with DISC and their employment reduction tax to increase industry in that country, coupled with the impending expansion of the European Common Market with the probability of further trade restrictions, leads me to believe that this bill should receive serious consideration.

All these things may well cause serious distortions in our economy. We saw evidence of this in the government rushing through $80 million worth of aid to Canadian exporters who might be hurt by the surcharge. These measures may conceivably cause complete disruption of trade for Canadian exporters. Time will tell—but there is probably little Canada can do in the immediate future to influence the international situation.

As far as the long-term situation is concerned, the most serious of the United States moves could be the DISC proposals—the Domestic International Sales Corporation. This proposal, which is at the moment going through the United States legislative process, would encourage United States manufacturers to produce goods at home rather than import them from branch plants abroad such as in Canada. If Canada is not in a position to implement offsetting measures immediately, there could be an immediate diversion of production from Canadian to American plants. In the long run there could be a more devastating effect on the Canadian economy, that of new factory and plant expansion which is today in the planning stage in both countries reverting to the United States.

James McAvity, President of the Canadian Export Association, in Montebello yesterday, according to the Globe and Mail report of today, also warned of the dangers of the DISC proposals and said the Canadian government had given little consideration to the matter. He said the Canadian Export Association had suggested that the government plan offsetting measures now and postpone certain tax changes. He called for the federal government to reassess the tax changes in light of changes in the world trading economy and Canada's position in it. He had this to say:

> Even now, the position is that Ottawa will take steps if and when the DISC is adopted but meanwhile the tax reform must stand.
> In light of the drastic changes in the trade and economic situation in the world around us, it seems incredible that the government is stubbornly pressing legislation which was designed to fit circumstances prevailing a year or two ago, and is so clearly not appropriate to the situation existing today

In a speech before the Toronto Board of Trade, Mr. William MacDonald, Toronto tax lawyer, is reported to have made similar criticisms. In his speech to the Toronto Board of Trade, Mr. MacDonald said Canada is moving in the opposite direction from the United States when it comes to creating new international trading markets. The new tax proposals would make Canadian companies liable to rates of taxation on foreign profits that are the same as those on domestic profits, while in the United States the DISC proposals would reduce domestic taxes to the levels of income taxes in the countries where United States goods are forced to compete. It would appear that as a result of tax reforms it will be prohibitive for Canadians to compete. At least two companies have so far moved their operations out of the country, he said.

He went on to lay the blame at the feet of the federal government, suggested that the federal government was not particularly interested in the private sector and compared the federal government to the French General Staff in the First World War. The General Staff had developed a plan for an offensive before the beginning of the war and was unwilling to abandon it even in the face of greatly altered circumstances. The government seems intent on adopting similar attitudes toward tax changes: they must go through at all costs.

In this legislation there are provisions that are restrictive to multinational corporations and come at a time when Canada could possibly benefit from a growing isolationist sentiment in the United States. We must remember that multinational corporations are with us—they are here, for good or for bad.

Mr. MacDonald concluded his remarks by suggesting that the complex tax changes be delayed until the end of 1972 to permit ample time for assessment, training and a smoother transitional period. In the international field, he rejected the approach outlined in the tax reform bill with regard to restricting any changes to stop the diversion of income from Canada which is not related to business activities abroad. He went on to speak about a very important aspect of the economy that we must consider very seriously and said:

> The fact that Canada is an open economy, not by choice but by necessity, means we must, above all, travel light so that we can adapt to the changing winds of fortune coming from the outside and over which we have little control.
> The trouble with recent policies is that they threaten to weigh us down into immobility.

There are in the new tax bill major changes which affect non-residents. First, the tax bill proposes that non-residents should be subjected to a tax computed on capital gains realized on the sale of certain Canadian properties. I do not think that provision was included previously. Second, there would be a change in the treatment of discounts earned by non-residents on debentures, notes and the like. Third, after 1975 the normal rate of Canadian withholding tax on investment and passive income to non-residents would be increased to 25 per cent if the non-resident lives in the country with which Canada does not have a tax treaty. Also, provisions exempting certain interest payments from withholding would be withdrawn.

Fourth, certain pension payments would be subject to a withholding tax. Fifth, the special branch tax levied on non-resident corporations—the tax that in principle is in place of the normal withholding tax on dividends paid by resident corporations to non-residents—would be extended to corporations that are resident in Canada but do not meet the qualification of a "Canadian corporation". Sixth, after 1975 this tax would be increased to 25 per cent and the same increase in rate would be levied from non-resident insurance companies.

In assessing the proposed changes affecting non-residents, it will be seen that the major changes under these provisions are the increased withholding tax rates, the taxation of specific capital gains relating to Canadian property and the taxation of several types of Canadian source income which were previous exempt. Even though many of these changes do not take effect until 1976, many of the proposals may be considered detrimental to the residents of other countries as, for instance, the proposed capital gains tax.

This would indicate that the renegotiation of existing tax treaties will not be easy since in the early 1970s we will be occupied with the great monetary problems the world is facing before the economic situation settles down. After 1975 the general withholding rate will be increased from 15 per cent to 25 per cent. In general, this thrust in the new tax bill would seem to make investment in Canada considerably less attractive than in the past.

There seems to be excessive rigidity in the section dealing with pension payments to individuals. Under the present act, many payments of a deferred income nature are not subject to non-residents withholding tax except in the case of old age security pensions, social assistance payments made on a means test basis, and the first $1,290 of Canada or Quebec Pension Plan payments. The new bill makes all such payments subject to the non-resident withholding tax rules, that is, to 15 per cent after 1972 and 25 per cent after 1975.

The withholding tax will be broadened to include Canada and Quebec Pension Plan payments in excess of $1,290 per annum, retiring allowances, supplementary unemployment benefit plan payments, registered retirement savings plan payments and deferred profit-sharing plan payments as well as income averaging annuity contract payments and the income portion of other annuity payments. If the non-resident wishes, he may elect to be treated as if he were resident in Canada in respect of all of these payments with the exception of the last two. In that case he will add to his Canadian business and employment income all the payments previously referred to, and compute his Canadian tax payable as if he were a resident of Canada and as if the amount arrived at were his total income. If the tax withheld is 15 per cent or 25 per cent, as the case may be, and exceeds the tax so computed, he could obtain a refund of the excess. The election must be made on an annual basis.

The presumed rationale of this proposal is that most of these payments originated from funds the contributions to which were tax-deductible and, as a consequence, Canada should collect some tax when they are paid. The old age security pension, at $960 plus the first $1,290 under the Canada Pension Plan totals $2,250, which just about equals the single person exemption. This amount would not have been taxable even where the individual was resident elsewhere. These proposals, again, are subject to the renegotiation of treaties with the country in which the pensioner resides and, as already suggested, there is likely to be some hard bargaining in these matters. Whatever is withheld at source in Canada is likely to be eligible for foreign tax credit abroad to the disadvantage of the foreign treasury.

This provision will seemingly render more difficult the retiring of our elderly, particularly in countries where there are no tax treaties of significance. Because of the nature of our climate, many people for health reasons must seek a milder climate, with these restrictions. Many of them are of very limited income. It seems that we will be working a hardship on many people who can ill afford it. Presumably, these people will be subject to tax in the country in which they reside, so that if there is no tax treaty real hardship can result.

Regarding the treatment of investments by Canadian taxpayers and the shares of non-resident corporations that can be described as foreign affiliates, the proposed legislation considerably narrows the option because after 1975 the dividends received by a Canadian corporation from a non-resident corporation in which it holds more than 25 per cent of the dividend shares are deductible in computing taxable income. The proposed new laws also provide that after 1975 only dividends from foreign affiliates in countries with whom Canada has new tax treaties will be deductible in computing tax income.

It appears that at a time when the United States is moving to encourage its production and investment, Bill C-259 is tending to have the opposite effect by increasing the rate of withholding tax on investment and passive income to non-residents to 25 per cent although we will need more savings and investments to replace the gap that will be left by the United States' programs. It seems that Canada is attempting to pressure many countries to establish tax treaties; but the chances of this occurring do not seem to be great, considering the present unsettled state of the world.

Some of the thrust of the proposed legislation seems to be designed to provide tax havens from being effective. This is to be commended, but in some respects it may well be a rigid and cumbersome act. In general, the tax proposals in so far as international income is concerned seem to be directed at reducing the outflow of Canadian capital and inflow of foreign capital. It is doubtful if this is the road that we should be journeying on in the 1970s when, presumably, capital will be in short supply.

We must provide a great many jobs for our people. We must provide for those who were born during the 1950s when there was a high rate of birth. We will need all the opportunities and capital we can get to provide jobs for these people in the 1970s. Perhaps after 1980 we can look to a period when job production will not need to be so great, but I suggest the section of the tax reform bill dealing with international income is unnecessarily restrictive. It runs counter to what the Americans are doing. At this time we should be more expansive in our economy and encourage industry to take part in the international financial field.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, it is always nice to see in the House the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles de la Madeleine (Mr. Béchard), whose only task seems to be to say: Agreed . . . let's have it—

Mr. Béchard: —At the right time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Sure, at the right time. The hon. member has not yet spoken.

Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the House, I would very much appreciate taking advantage of the dinner hour to nurse a bad cold.

So may I call it six o'clock—

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the Chair to resume same at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I hope I shall have the consideration of the committee tonight. I guarantee I shall not long inflict myself on hon. members. I managed to pick up a western breed of cold germ this weekend and I am afraid it is more virile than I am normally.

I am taking part in the debate in committee at this late stage of the general discussion for a number of reasons. First, I was aware that some amendments would be put down, but never was I prepared for the flood of 95 amendments which we had last Wednesday afternoon. Some people might ask, "What does it matter that we should have 95 amendments?" I don't know; but it took until Friday morning to get those amendments into printed form, and since that time it has taken one very experienced girl until four o'clock this afternoon, in working hours, to cut out and insert into Bill C-259 the amendments in the appropriate places and index the text of the bill. If hon. members feel they are competent to understand this text, know their way around it without having the amendments inserted and without an index, I can only say they are taking the bill on a basis of pure, blind faith. Even some of the amendments have errors in them, as we have noticed. For this reason nothing can be taken on the basis of faith or trust.

Then there is a question which is present in the minds of everyone: How much of the bill is actually being rewritten at the present time? There was, in effect, an attempt to rewrite it in part on Thursday evening when the minister went through the exercise of making a statement which amounted to a mini-budget. This means another bill is making yet further amendments to the present act. And, of course, we have not yet touched the Customs Tariff and the Excise Tax Act amendments to the budget of last June. Now we are being asked to ram this thing through. There are suggestions of an allotment of time with respect to committee stage and perhaps to the other stages in order that the bill may go through. But hon. members opposite do not even know what they are getting. They know there are further substantive amendments to come.

Mr. Gibson: Surely that is what one would expect in a tax bill, a bill proposing tax reform.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): So you are ramming it through?

Mr. Gibson: No, we are not ramming it through.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The idea of ramming legislation through is ever present. Every time someone over there sees two people on this side rise to make a speech, they say "filibuster".

Mr. Gibson: Let's get on with it right now.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I wish the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth would get to his feet and make a sensible presentation from time to time. I will refer to him in due course.

Mr. Gibson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, if we could get on to deal with the substance of the bill I suggest we could move much more expeditiously, instead of making procedural criticism.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I can deal with that insignificant remark, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I merely want to say that what we heard was not a point of order but a matter of debate.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): He doesn't know the difference.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): True; the hon. member doesn't know the difference between a point of order and a matter of debate any more than he knows how to distinguish substance from detail in this bill.

This afternoon my hon. friend from Dauphin made reference to a speech delivered by Mr. William MacDonald, a prominent Toronto tax lawyer. He quoted at length from this speech. The point he made is one which should be on the record because hon. members opposite would otherwise pay no attention to it. One of the things that struck me was that the government is going ahead with its tax plan in much the same way as if it were proceeding with an elaborate military plan of some bygone era.

While circumstances have changed a great deal, the government is still trying to put through the same tax changes. It is very apparent that this is so because circumstances in the period between last year, when we had the white paper, and this spring, when Bill C-259 was being drafted and considered by the government, altered a great deal because of economic conditions. The Minister of Finance himself admitted that the circumstances had changed by his complete about-face between his June budget and the statement he made the other night. The circumstances changed as a result of the action taken by the United States government. I would invite hon. members to read some of the commentators who know a good deal about the situation in Canada. For example, I am sure they read John Meyer who writes in the Montreal Gazette and other newspapers.

This bill is a rewriting of the white paper. I have a briefcase full of briefs from the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Bar Association, from chartered accountants and any number of worth-while bodies that have made very pertinent and telling commentaries about the language of or difficulties seen in the clauses of this bill. Yet as this great machine here rolls on, we are expected to grind out these clauses one by one. They are already being rewritten and I am willing to bet that we will see another sheaf of editorial amendments as this bill is considered.

On second reading we were asked to approve a certain bill, yet it is still being changed. The reason it is being changed is that the government was not aware of what it was preparing in Bill C-259. It had not the slightest idea of the effect of a good number of the provisions. Thus we have witnessed an event this year that has no predecessor in Canadian history. The hon. member for Peterborough can nod his head sagely, but he has not the slightest conception of this bill or the slightest conception of just what will happen as a result of its provisions.

Mr. Faulkner: Let the hon. member put his own position, not mine.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We will put our position, and we will put it time and time again. In view of the changes that have been made in the nature and philosophy of this measure, we are going to get objections from the United States. We have already had many objections from Canadians. For instance, take the case of foreign investment in retirement trust funds. There is supposed to be a certain minimum ceiling on foreign investment. We are getting a lot of static from foreign countries in regard to this restriction. Canadian objectors are getting nowhere, so we will see whether foreign objectors have more clout. A list has already been produced on behalf of the United States government, which incidentally seems to have more authenticity than hon. members opposite credited to it.

Another point is that certain continuing rights and provisions in this bill are subject to renegotiation in regard to tax treatment. Given the present climate of relations between, for instance, Canada and the United States, between which two countries there is a most important tax treaty in existence, surely no member of this House is naïve enough to think that this treaty will not have to be renegotiated, under the terms of this bill, in order to give equality to Canadians. Do hon. members opposite think that these negotiations will be successful within the next five or ten years?

In the interval, of course, Canadian investors and businessmen are going to take it in the neck. The same situation prevails in our relations with Great Britain. There was a conference this summer attended by some noted Canadians, including the former Prime Minister of the Liberal party and authorities from Great Britain in government and in business, which discussed the level of relations between Canada and the United Kingdom, two countries where once again effective tax treaties must be maintained. Yet we are doing many things to foreign investors in this bill.

Mr. Faulkner: What things?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We are reducing returns on foreign investments. We are making conditions much worse for foreign investors in this country. There may also be found a good deal of economic nationalism in this bill. Small companies' proposals are replete with economic nationalism of a kind to which there will be a great deal of objection from Canadians and foreigners alike. Therefore, is this the best time for the negotiation of tax treaties, when we look for certain advantages?

Mr. Faulkner: Pure fantasy.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): At a time when the Canadian economy requires more incentives, greater encouragement to production and to savings, what is the government doing? It is imposing a greater tax burden on production on the savings of Canadians. That is the net result of Bill C-259.

Another part of the bill that I suggest will cause a great deal of difficulty is this. Simply passing the bill in this House and in the other place and putting it on the statute books will not make effective its provisions. One aspect of this bill, from the white paper on, has been totally neglected by the government. It has been brushed aside, or swept under the carpet, if I may use another simile, because the government does not like the difficulties it foresees. I refer to co-ordination and co-operation with the provinces. I should like to put on the record what the Canadian Manufacturers Association had to say in this respect. I think they put the position quite well. They said:

> The effect of the proposed corporate and personal income tax rates depends greatly on the action which the provinces may take.

I pause to say that the hon. member for Peterborough is one of those who deludes himself that everything should conform to the federal point of view; that if the federal government shall speak, the provinces shall follow.

Mr. Faulkner: The CMA is not the spokesman of the provinces.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The members of the CMA are the ones who will suffer the effects of the federal government's attitude to these tax changes; that is the point. It is the meat in the sandwich which is protesting now. I invite the hon. member from Peterborough to talk with certain provincial treasurers—not only the one in the province of Ontario but others—and learn their attitude toward these tax changes.

(8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Faulkner: Let us hear from them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We have.

Mr. Faulkner: Not through the CMA.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am also talking about businessmen who will suffer from these changes. We hear from the provinces, at least the government does, but it never publishes the results of these conferences with the provinces on these points. I think they are to meet within the next few weeks. I suppose the hon. member would want us to have the bill passed by that time, then the provinces could comment on the nature of the changes. That is just how stupid the whole thing is. I continue with my quotation:

> With respect to personal income taxes, the impact on the individual which has been calculated and shown in the tables in the Summary of 1971 Tax Reform Legislation depends on the provinces imposing a tax of 30 per cent of federal tax. The proposed reduction in corporation income tax rates depends on the provinces not changing their corporation income tax rates. The intended 33 193 per cent tax credit with respect to dividends from taxable Canadian corporations will only be given full effect if the provinces adopt a corresponding credit.

In other words, that would require action by ten different legislatures. We have not heard that they intend to do so.

> Some of the provinces have expressed concern about the proposed elimination of federal estate and gift taxes on January 1, 1972.

Manitoba is one of them.

> They have indicated that this proposal will not only create inequities between the taxation of existing wealth accumulations and future wealth accumulations, but will thrust the burden of readjustment, if provincial revenue loss is to be avoided, entirely on to the provinces.

All these factors require co-ordination of federal and provincial tax policies and make an assessment of the economic impact of the proposed legislation difficult. At the same time, we are concerned that the intention of the Ontario government to give tax credits for provincial sales tax and municipal taxes and not to provide the 15 per cent additional capital cost allowance introduced by the federal government in its December, 1970, budget, are indicative of a trend towards separate provincial tax administrations and policies. Such a trend is, we think, most undesirable and we urge the federal government to co-ordinate tax policy and administration with the provinces.

That is basically the point I wish to make, that the government has failed to take into account co-ordination and simplicity of administration of a major tax act in co-operation with the provinces. There is one further point I wish to refer to but I can defer that until another occasion because I have just about reached the time allotted to me.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will make just one point if I have the permission of hon. members. It is in reference to a particular clause.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It might be preferable to clarify the situation. It seems that hon. members are agreeable to allowing the hon. member to complete his remarks. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and through you I thank members of the committee. I think the parliamentary secretary has an idea of what I wish to say. I want to highlight one of the difficulties that has arisen in trying to close the door to a tax haven through clause 146(1)(g) dealing with the type of investments that may be permitted in retirement savings trust funds. We know that in the past it was wide open and that terrible abuses could be created—in fact, almost by individuals walking down the street into a trust company, entering into a trust agreement to deposit $2,500, then turning around, cross-borrowing and each walking out with $2,500. We have heard of trust funds set up for the benefit of race horses and to maintain professional equipment for a doctor or a dentist. All of this was possible for those who were ingenious enough to go and do it, and it benefited them in a way that should not have been so.

In his attempts to close the door, the Minister of Finance has gone too far. His proposal will effectively wipe out the method whereby organizations such as the B.C. Teachers Federation set up a supplementary retirement savings plan. This applies to other groups of individuals as well. I know of one group in the province of Alberta which set up a co-operative retirement savings fund plan where all the funds are not channelled to their personal benefit but, by reason of being an investment co-operative on a pro rata share basis, in a period of three years they have been able to put $600,000 into housing construction, particularly where the conventional sources of lending do not normally go. Where banks, insurance companies and even CMHC refuse to go, these people are prepared to put up money—perhaps at a slightly higher rate of interest—and in so doing they fulfil a social need.

It was the same way with the B.C. Teachers Federation retirement savings plan under which designated portions of these supplementary savings plans are turned over to a trustee, who then advances the money against notes of an affiliated credit union, which then turns around and invests the money in housing for teachers. The whole system has grown up in the period since 1951 to the point where their assets now exceed $37 million.

One of the main features about it is that the funds have been able to provide housing for teachers in outlying places. Teachers have been able to get credit facilities. This extends throughout British Columbia, and now the regulations have been changed so that the plan will cover teachers from the province of Alberta, in particular teachers who may have about ten years service to go and whose original retirement plans were predicated on much lower salaries. Now that they have much higher salaries they are able to divert savings into supplementary pension plans.

If the bill as now designed will not permit these notes from the credit union to be an acceptable form of investment for the retirement savings plan, unless the minister is able to assure us that under the regulations they can be designated as an appropriate investment the whole plan is in complete jeopardy. I would make a special plea to the minister, through his parliamentary secretary, to consider the representations that have been made so that this very worth-while plan will not be scuppered because it was caught in a net that was cast much wider than had been anticipated. Again, Mr. Chairman, thank hon. members for giving me extra time to put that point on record.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, it was interesting to hear some of the comments made by the hon. member for Edmonton West, who seemed to suggest that there was a lack of knowledge about this bill on the part of members on this side of the chamber. I would suggest to the hon. member that he is incorrect in this assumption and that some of the better ideas and recommendations have in fact come from the government benches.

I would not expect that each individual member of this party would be as well versed on each and every clause of the bill as the hon. member for Edmonton West, because he has a particular responsibility in this field. It seems to me, however, that he is carrying the weight of the world on his shoulders and might take a lesson from this party. He should do some organizing and get some people to speak on the subject of credit unions and on other subjects, rather than feel he has to cover each individual subject himself.

The hon. member states that changes have been made to this bill. I would be the first to concede that and to welcome it. I would think further changes will in fact be made because the government has indicated it is not rigid, is not inflexible and is prepared to listen and to make changes where changes are warranted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: It is a good thing you are not under oath when you say that.

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member indicated there is more truth than fiction in the newspaper reporting. I am happy he is not running the country because I would hate to think he would react to every newspaper article, develop government policy in answer to newspaper articles and then go to a foreign government and say, "We do not know what your official position is, but we are reacting to the leak in a particular paper because we have no other source of contact." If that is the way the opposition would run the country, thank heaven they do not have that responsibility.

Much has been made about the fact that this is a complicated bill and that changes have been made. I suggest, with the greatest respect, that if the hon. member for Edmonton West would consider this matter for a couple of weeks and then come forward with all the changes he would like to see made, if we accepted them we would have the credit unions, the bankers, the Bar Association and others all telling us what was wrong with the hon. member's bill. Listening to the hon. member one would think he had the idea that tax legislation can be done in this way: Tell us what you make, tell us what you spend, tell us what you have left, and send it in.

If the hon. member wants to read some complicated tax legislation I would refer him to the Ontario succession duty act which was supposed to be revised in 1970. There is no easy or uncomplicated way to draw up tax legislation. No one knows that better than the hon. member for Edmonton West. In the Ontario legislation there is a short-form mortgages bill and a long-form mortgages bill, and then they spend a fortune explaining what they mean in each piece of legislation. It is extremely complicated.

Speaking for myself, I should much prefer to get on with the clause by clause study of this bill. I take exception to the suggestion that we are trying to ram something through. How does one do that? I wish I knew how to do it in respect of legislation as complicated as this. I think we should deal with the clauses which are important and then apply a time allocation to our considerations. I suggest to the hon. member for Edmonton West that through his practice in court he knows that time limits are placed on speeches and cross-examination even when dealing with the lives of individuals.

It would be one thing if we had all the time in the world to discuss this legislation, but we do not have that. If the hon. member for Peace River does not stop interjecting, perhaps it would be a good thing to have a time allocation.

Mr. Baldwin: You will have lots of time after the next election.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I think by now, after second reading stage and now on the clause by clause study of the bill, particularly clause 1, we have gone through the usual process which seems to be ritualistic around here. The cabinet minister highlights that which is good in the bill, opposition spokesmen criticize that which they think is bad, and then we have a series of addresses from each side of the House in what has become the usual channel. The only people who seem to have broken away from that channel—and more power and credit to them—are the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo, the hon. member for Gloucester and, this afternoon, the hon. member for Peterborough with his brilliant speech.

We are endeavouring to be as objective as possible in this most partisan of places. One of the most thought provoking addresses—certainly the best we have heard on credit unions—was delivered, when we were discussing an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West, by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand. I would commend the re-reading of his address to the Minister of Finance, particularly with respect to the comments he made about co-operatives and credit unions, as well as caisses populaires.

Mr. Baldwin: Read it to me. I never heard it.

Mr. Cullen: I am not surprised that the hon. member for Peace River did not hear it; he is too busy interjecting to listen. Similarly, I felt that the Minister of National Revenue and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance admirably put the position of the government insofar as this bill is concerned. The minister stressed that which is positive, and the parliamentary secretary answered some of the criticisms from the other side, at least those which he thought warranted comment.

In my opinion, the white paper approach to legislation is good government but I am not certain it is good politics. The government member faced with a white paper, particularly the backbencher, must endeavour to explain without defending the recommendations of the government and at the same time point out to any audience he may be addressing, "Here are some of the suggestions the government has to make. I would like to hear your comments before the legislation is drafted".

All through the debate on the white paper we heard that the government was rigid, that it was committed to the white paper approach and that any changes would be mere tokenism. The rug was somewhat pulled out from under the opposition when the changes made were, not mere tokenism but changes which gave effect to recommendations made by the public at large and by representatives of various groups who addressed the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. Effect was also given to recommendations made in the committee's reports. This having been done, the opposition party, finding that government members advance the correct approach that should be taken to white papers and have thereby regained credibility with the population, now find themselves in the difficult position of trying to convince the Canadian public that the government backed down or backed away from the white paper.

It is for this reason I feel the white paper approach is in fact good government, because it does give the people an opportunity to have their say and to participate. In respect of whether or not it is good politics, I still need some convincing—because if we stick to the provisions of a white paper then the government is being rigid, and if changes are made then the position is taken that the government is backing away. It is almost impossible to win that kind of argument on a political platform.

Be that as it may, I am frankly more interested in good government than politics and I commend the Minister of Finance for his approach to this particular problem of letting the people who are knowledgeable have their say. It is for this reason I am participating in the debate. Recognizing that the Minister of Finance listened to representation from so many people in respect of his white paper and made major changes in the approach suggested in that document, I am hoping he will once again listen to the people of the credit unions and co-operatives, because in my opinion the credit union case that is being made in the reports, briefs, correspondence and telephone calls is a good one. In fact, it is an excellent one.

Mr. Baldwin: How are you going to vote on it?

Mr. Cullen: Wait and see. The credit unions are concerned with people, and not with profit. Their strongest argument is the fact that they speak on behalf of and out of consideration for their members. Credit unions are self-help organizations. The Prime Minister himself, in commending credit unions across Canada, said in part:

> But even more important credit unionism encourages self-help, mutual assistance and personal involvement.

I say "Hear, hear" to that because it accurately sets forth my opinion of credit unions. In the past too many people, when dealing with government, have had a tendency not to write but to throw up their hands and say, "What's the use?" This minister and the government have encouraged people in the belief that their ideas are considered, their correspondence is read, and where changes can be made they are made.

(8:40 p.m.)

Sometimes decisions are made which are contrary to views expressed in a letter, but I am satisfied that these letters do receive consideration from all Members of Parliament. I want to quote from three letters from my constituents which I think typify the credit union approach. The first is from Mr. B. J. Kane, president of the Dow Chemical, Sarnia, Employees Credit Union. He says in part in his letter to me:

> We sincerely hope you are aware of the basic principles of credit unions and their self-help philosophy which enables a group of people—

Mr. Baldwin: Why don't you table the letter?

Mr. Cullen: I continue reading the letter:

> —restricted by a close bond of association, to obtain a better standard of living. This is accomplished by their own efforts within their own ranks and produces better citizens—

This is the part I like:

> —who do not have to call on outside agencies to help in time of need. Surely, this aspect alone benefits the general public by removing the necessity of obtaining aid through tax supported government departments.

Mr. Ed Odell, treasurer-manager of the Moore Credit Union Limited says in one paragraph of a letter to me:

> Twenty-four credit unions in Lambton county were organized for service to their members, not for profit. They are simply vehicles by which their members of a catholic parish, the employees of an industry or the residents of some small community like Forest, Port Lamton or Corunna, help each other by bringing together these people with a little money to save for those needing temporary financial assistance. Moore Credit Union is not seeking profit but brings together working people needing credit and working people who have savings to pool with their neighbour or brother employees. Our members who do receive a modest dividend or earnings on their share savings already pay tax on such income, to tax these same earnings in the form of income from the operation of the credit union is, in our view, a double taxation and should not be passed into law in Canada.

I think the hon. member for Peterborough made a good point this afternoon when he indicated that there are credit unions and credit unions, and some of them are certainly larger than the type referred to by Mr. Odell. I should like to refer to another part of his letter where he writes:

> In Lambton county, including Sarnia, there are only seven out of the twenty four credit unions with anything like an office open for daily business. There are three Catholic parish credit unions in Sarnia who are very small and are run on volunteer help as are the other fourteen to bring the total to twenty four. One credit union formed over a year to help the employees of a particular group of offices in Sarnia is struggling along with a volunteer secretary-treasurer and a board of directors.

He makes the point that these are community-minded people. Mr. John Kedwell, president of the Imperial Oil Employees, Sarnia, Credit Union Limited said the following in his usual succinct and honest way:

> It has always been our belief that credit unions should not be taxed—

This is probably the crux, that credit unions should not be taxed and, if they have to be taxed, to what degree? Mr. Kedwell, in taking this position with regard to credit unions, takes the obvious stand on their behalf and says that credit unions should not be taxed—> —since they are non-profit, non-public and member-owned operated by groups of people attempting to meet their own credit needs at reasonable cost—

I have read excerpts from these letters because in my opinion these are people speaking out to government. These are community-minded people, as they have so often tried to stress, people who deserve a tax break because of the services they perform on behalf of fellow human beings.

Just as the Minister of Finance made substantial changes in his white paper—and as is demonstrated by the fact that he brought down a substantial number of amendments—it is my hope that the minister will look very carefully at the sections affecting credit unions and particularly at the comments the hon. member for Peterborough made this afternoon. I am satisfied that the people of Canada have had an opportunity to have their say. Now we have the law before us. I say, let us get on with the clause by clause study and let us give the benefit to the people who will get the benefit under this marvellous piece of tax legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member answer a question? In light of the hon. member's apparent dissatisfaction with the present clauses with regard to the taxing of co-operatives and credit unions, and in light of the fact that it is likely that if we ever get a chance to move on, amendments will be offered from this side of the House in this regard, will the hon. member indicate whether he will support amendments which will be put forward with respect to this particular clause, provided hon. members opposite stop talking, so we can move that far?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: When I was making my address in support of this marvellous piece of legislation the only interjections I heard were from the opposite side. If amendments you will be proposing are as weak as the interjections, I will not be able to support them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, before considering this bill clause by clause, I should like to speak to it as a whole.

I realize that on the government's side, they would like to see this bill passed in a hurry, as was indicated by the preceding speaker. But when we consider the importance and consequences of this bill, it is only right to take all the time required to make a detailed study of it, for the protection of the people in general.

Unlike my colleagues, I do not have time to show how extremely complex this bill is. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), to whom I would readily confer a degree as tax-collector emeritus, the best that Canada has ever had, has brought forward a very confuse, dark and unpopular legislation, as we have been able to realize for the past two years.

This bill is confusing since all Canadian financial experts, and particularly accountants, cannot make anything, or almost, out of it. In the briefs submitted, this has been shown to us and we have been made to realize this quite often.

Once more, the government showed that it could not leave the beaten track of the taxation system we have known, and this is why the government and its consultants find it difficult to suggest something other than moving around the taxes or the individuals taxed to a larger or lesser degree.

Mr. Chairman, here I only wish to recall, as an example, what the president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce said on December 9, 1969, about the white paper, and I quote:

> The economic consequences of the proposals made in the white paper, as well as of the principles on which they are based, represent a threat for the economy and the people of Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do believe that such criticism is more than serious.

[English]

Mr. A. Gordon Archibald, president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, had this to say on September 17, 1971:

• (8.50 p.m.)

> —businessmen have been "severely tested and almost strangled in the jungle of government regulations—"
>
> "Many businessmen will want out, and business will cease to attract new, young talent."

[Mr. Baldwin.]

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, one businessman said that this new Bill C-259 "is a disturbing socialist document".

What is more obvious, I believe, is that the government had asked the Senate Committee on Poverty to inquire on poverty in Canada. Now, on June 22, 1971, four of the committee members, four economists appointed by the government, had to resign because they could not produce a report according to what they thought and believed good for Canada as a whole. I should like to quote from an article entitled "The Canadian economic system tolerates and even creates poverty", published in the June 22, 1971 edition of La Presse. It said:

> The Canadian economic system not only tolerates poverty, but creates it, maintains it and makes the problem even worse.

Such was the statement made by the four economists, Peter Penz, Brian Hill, Bill Cameron and Ian Adams who resigned from the Senate Committee on Poverty in April, because they disagreed with the committee chairman, Senator David Croll. That was understandable; the committee report was not to hurt the government. Those members said the following:

We resigned because the chairman—would not accept a candid evaluation of our society, said the four outgoing members in Last Post's last edition.

> What he really wanted was a doleful discussion on what it means to be poor—

For a long time already, hon. members have deplored poverty in Canada and complained about the great number of poor people. But when it comes to adopting measures to achieve tax reform in order to help the poor, the government or the establishment, must not get hurt. There is no getting away from the beaten track, the orthodox economic principles that date back 200 years.

I quote further on:

> —an indignant denunciation of the inequities of the present welfare system, followed by an argument in favour of a guaranteed annual income.
> And above all, he did not want the people to know why they were poor.

They did not want the four members of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty to tell the Canadian people and Parliament why Canadians are poor. In fact, they had been appointed to determine the degree of poverty in Canada, and its reasons. When the members of this Senate committee tried to determine the reasons of this poverty, they had to resign so as not to hurt the government. I resume the quotation:

> Besides, this is why social reforms have always been in adequate and have always come too late in this country.

It is not the Creditistes who say that social reforms are inadequate and come too late. The economists and the experts chosen by the party in power, members of a Senate committee, have come to the conclusion advocated by the Creditistes since 1935.

And I quote again:

> The four resigning members of the Senate Committee on Poverty consider that poverty is built in the Canadian economic system, is aggravated by government policies and is not in the least hindered by welfare, housing, legal and medical programs.

About 40 per cent of the total income is shared among 20 per cent of the population, so that the gap between the rich and the poor is getting wider and wider all the time.

Mr. Chairman, we have been saying for years that the gap between the rich and the poor is still broadening. We are advocating a solution to raise the standard of living of the poor without reducing that of the rich whereas the socialists want to reduce the standard of living of the rich and give the impression that more will be distributed to the poor when all socialist countries of the world have socialized, nationalized, taxed without giving more to those who wanted more. Here is what the four economists are still repeating, and I quote:

In fighting inflation—

—and this what the present government has done—

—at the expense of employment the government, according to them, has made heavier the burden of the poor who are earning low wages and who are always first to be fired and last to be hired.

It seems to me that it would be time to listen to the Créditistes because we have succeeded in convincing the government economists even before we could convince the members opposite.

I also have here a document which I think is extremely important and which is from one of the greatest prime ministers of the free world, Sir Winston Churchill who had this to say:

[English]

Sir Winston Churchill had more than an inkling of what was, and is, wrong when giving his Romanes Lecture—"Parliamentary Government and the Economic Problem"—at Oxford, on June 19, 1930. He said: "The classical doctrines of economics have for nearly a century found their citadels in the treasury and the Bank of England ... Whatever we may think about those doctrines ... we can clearly see that they do not correspond to what is going on now ... It is certain that the economic problem with which we are now confronted is not adequately solved, indeed is not solved at all, by the teachings of the textbooks, however grand may be their logic. however illustrious may be their authors ...

If the doctrines of the old economists no longer serve for the purposes of our society, they must be replaced by a new body of doctrine—

Beyond our immediate difficulty lies the root problem of modern world economics; namely, the strange discordance between the consuming and producing power ... Who would have though that it would be easier to produce by toil and skill all the most necessary or desirable commodities than it is to find consumers for them? Who would have thought that cheap and abundant supplies of all the basic commodities should find the science and civilization of the world unable to utilize them? Have all our triumphs of research and organization bequathed us only a new punishment—the curse of plenty? Are we really to believe that no better adjustment can be made between supply and demand? Yet the fact remains that every attempt has so far failed. Many various attempts have been made, from the extremes of communism in Russia to the extremes of capitalism in the United States. They include every form of fiscal policy and currency policy, But all have failed, and we have advanced little further in this quest than in barbaric times. Surely it is this mysterious crack and fissure at the basis of all our arrangements and apparatus upon which the keenest minds throughout the world should be concentrated. Lasting fame and great advantage would attend the nation which first secured the prize ...

Economic problems, unlike political issues, cannot be solved by any expression, however vehement, of the national will, but only by taking the right action. You cannot cure cancer by a majority. What is wanted is a remedy. Everyone knows what the people wish. They wish for more prosperity. How to get it? That is the grim question ...

Parliament is upon its trial, and if it continues to show itself incapable of offering sincere and effective guidance at this juncture, our parliamentary institutions, so admirable in the political sphere, may well fall under a far reaching condemnation.

[English]

• (9:00 p.m.)

And today we see Churchill's prediction coming true. Parliament "put upon its trial" has failed to resolve the "discordance between our producing and consuming power", with the result that it has become the object of the ridicule and hostility of the persons whom it is supposed to serve.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I could also quote statements by three American presidents. Moreover, in 1935, at a time when the Social Credit party had assumed power in Alberta, a former prime minister of Canada who wanted to secure the support of Social Creditors, particularly in Alberta and Saskatchewan, said the following, and I quote:

[English]

Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to Government, and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of Parliament and democracy is idle and futile.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, these words were uttered 36 years ago. In his tax reform, the best Canadian "taxman", in reforming the country's finances, has only caused taxes to change places, and this is the reason why Social Credit members in this House are not only opposed to Bill C-259, but are equally shocked to see that whenever the government wishes to get money out of Canadian pockets, he resorts to a bill of more than 700 pages.

On the other hand, when it comes to helping those who have stood in defence of Canada, as for example the war veterans, a 4-page bill is deemed sufficient. But to pump money out, destroy private enterprise in Canada, or threaten it further, a 700-page bill is needed. To help those who fought for our country in times of war, those we told to go fight for Christianity and civilization, a 4-page bill was enough. To reward those who financed the war, who did not go to the front, who only had to line up figures in their bank accounts, and lend money to the federal government to increase our debts by several billions of dollars, a 700-page bill is introduced.

Mr. Chairman, we will have the opportunity of coming back to those clauses of the bill; we will take all the time needed to perform our duty in this House, to represent not the world of finance but the Canadian people who deserve better than a bill drawn up by experts with a view to gradually but totally dispossessing them.

Mr. Chairman, I should also like to read part of the communist program. I quote:

[English]

The Communist Manifesto by Karl Marx was first published in English in 1850. This was long before we had such a thing as income tax. It was also before the days of the central bank, with its long tentacles of control. In chapter 11 of this very revealing book, its author is discussing methods by which the whole world can be brought under communism. I quote from page 152 as follows:

These measures will of course be different in different countries.

Nevertheless, in the most advanced countries, the following will be pretty generally applicable.

1. Abolition of property in land and application of all rents of land to public purposes.

2. A heavy progressive or graduated income tax.

3. Abolition of all right of inheritance . . .

6. Centralization of the means of communication and transport in the hands of the state.

These are only the first four of Karl Marx's ten important points but they are sufficient for our purposes at this time. Look at point No. 2—"A heavy progressive or graduated income tax." Now let us compare it with part of paragraph 1, section 9, of the Benson white paper which reads as follows:

This concept of "ability to pay"—

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is now expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the House to allow the hon. member for Shefford to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, do I have the unanimous consent of the House, yes or no?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair is powerless to determine who gives consent and who does not; the Chair heard nays. So there is no unanimous consent and I have to recognize the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard).

• (9.10 p.m.)

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I would have liked my colleague from Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) to enjoy the same privileges which were granted to other members, and it is unfortunate to see the "nays" coming from the government side.

Mr. Chairman, although I only want to speak briefly on the measure now before us, I feel duty bound to make some comments on behalf of my constituents.

It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to speak about the bill under consideration without first saying a few words about the white paper introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

We remember that when the Minister of Finance tabled his white paper, there was nothing more perfect, everything had been fully looked into, and it was going to solve all income tax problems.

The opposition undertook a thorough study of that white paper. We voiced our opposition and refuted the objections of the government members. We were accused of taking too long, of filibustering. We were blamed for all possible and imaginable ills.

Finally, the minister realized that we were right because protests began to flow from all sides of the House at once. Financial exports, accountants, lawyers, in short everybody gathered to let the minister know that his proposal was entirely inacceptable and that it ought to be seriously reviewed. The minister was finally forced to see the light and do over again, though still most imperfectly, the work already started.

We now have before us Bill C-259. When this measure was introduced, it was something perfect which had to pass then and there because it had been hatched by a Liberal government. According to our friends across the way, a liberal government simply cannot make mistakes.

We have begun our consideration of this legislative proposal which no one understands, and we have raised objections. The public in general has done the same and, following a committee study, the Minister himself has proposed a hundred amendments or so.

So, Mr. Chairman, even if we are accused of extending the debate, we, of the official opposition, are only doing our duty when we raise objections or when we propose amendments to a bill. We do it to fulfil our duty to our electors. We want them and the Canadian people to have good laws that are very easy to understand and easy to apply.

But it seems, Mr. Chairman, that we are dealing with a government unable to take a clear and firm position that anyone can understand. Apparently, proposals must contain loopholes for certain classes of people. It is so much more satisfactory to bring in something good, something understandable, something simple that the government should, I think, apply itself to it and follow the advice of those who are close to the people.

If the government acts in this way, it is because it lost touch with the people. It has no longer any contact—

Mr. Rondeau: It never had any.

Mr. Ricard: —my friend from Shefford says that it never had any and I think he is rather right. But more and more it is losing touch with the people. No wonder then that most of our laws are enacted so as to benefit as much as possible the "big" ones and to injure the "little" ones or average Canadians. There are so many indirect taxes that the low income Canadian can hardly make ends meet at the end of the year.

For many months, many years even, we have been urging the government to bring about the partial or total removal of the 11 per cent tax on building materials. It is known that when the building trade slows down many Canadian workmen are deprived of their livelihood. It is often said that activity in the building trade is a sign of prosperity. Well, the 11 per cent tax is now a hindrance to construction and the government would do well to take the best interest of the people into consideration and remove this 11 per cent tax as speedily as possible.

Mr. Chairman, under the minister's new proposals, it is those earning $7,000 to $12,000 a year who will be carrying the burden of the new fiscal system. If there is a segment of our population deserving of the government's attention, it is certainly the citizens earning from $7,000 to $12,000 a year. The government should be far more generous towards that class of society, and grant them even greater exemptions. Under the present tax system, the general public harbour a continual feeling of despondency which affects initiative on the part of small and middle businessmen and manufacturers.

Instead of racking his brains in order to find ways to tax small and middle industries, the Minister of Finance would do better to think up means of making available to those industries, which have already played a very important part in the economic life of this country, low interest loans which would allow them to continue their contribution to the economic life of our country.

Canada needs good workmen, good farmers, and also good businessmen and good manufacturers in order for its economy to expand rather than deteriorate as it is doing at present.

Everybody knows that last year the number of bankruptcies increased dramatically, and the debts which caused those bankruptcies are at present 50 per cent higher than in 1970.

Mr. Chairman, if that does not show that the economic health of our country is threatened, I do not see what other sign could be found. It was funny to hear the Minister of Finance last Thursday night tell us that we have a strong economy and that he expected continued progress. That caused laughter not only in the House but also outside. To be convinced, Mr. Chairman, one only has to look at the quotations on the stock exchange. This indicates very clearly what the economic life is like at the present time, and the stock market is a true reflection of what is happening in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I was greatly surprised to hear this afternoon my good friend the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) state that, at last, he had discovered there were in Canada caisses populaires and credit unions. For months, we tried to convince the government that it should give special consideration to caisses populaires and credit unions, because these two types of financial institutions had rendered great services to this country. While the large financial institutions were refusing workers the loans they needed to build a house of their own, the caisses populaires and credit unions have done the utmost to accommodate the people in the lower income bracket, so much so that one can see in all Canadian cities at least one sector that has been developed through the loans granted by the credit unions or caisses populaires.

So I would ask my friend the hon. member for Peterborough to put forward the views of those people who have rendered immense services to the population and to make the Minister of Finance understand that he has an obligation—although I doubt that he could do it—to avoid taking measures that would sink those Canadian financial institutions that have done so much and that still have so much to do.

Mr. Chairman, I received letters from co-operatives but I will dispense with reading them. I would also like to join with those that have appealed to this House in favour of the caisses populaires so they will receive the treatment they deserve and be allowed to continue helping low wage earners.

In concluding my remarks, I would also like to ask for more generous personal exemptions for those who are the foundation of our society, labourers, farm hands, and workers in general, for they are in the final analysis the big taxpayers in the country. They deserve special attention. I also wish the government would finally accept the obvious and recognize that our demands are not made only on our behalf but on that of all Canadians.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, not very long ago, the federal government published a booklet prepared by the Treasury Board and entitled: "How Your Tax Dollar Is Spent". This booklet was based on the government's estimates for the fiscal year 1971-72. Needless to say that this question is topical today, since we are discussing Bill C-259 on tax reform. People are complaining—justifiably enough—that they are being taxed more and more heavily. One should ask oneself what the government is doing with the taxes it collects.

On every taxpayer's dollar, the government spends 25 cents on health and welfare programs and 14 cents on economic development and "support". Given the fact that this government is as much interested in encouraging big business as in achieving the economic development of the country, it earmarks 14 cents of every tax dollar for the national debt and service 13 cents to defray national defence. Nobody knows whom we are fighting or whom we are defending and why, but anyway, it costs 13 cents of every tax dollar in peace time. Transfer payments to provinces cost 9 cents of every tax dollar whilst 7 cents are spent on transport and communications, 6 cents on internal overhead, 4 cents on general government services, 4 cents on education assistance, 2 cents on culture and recreation and 2 cents on external affairs, which makes a total of $1.

This is how the federal government is spending the taxpayers' money.

This is leading to several conclusions and, among others, that the major government item in the budget is health.

Confronted with the continued increase in unemployment and inflation, the government announced last week, through the Minister of Finance, a reduction in individual and corporate taxes. This is another government move, apart from the tax reform, to fight inflation and unemployment.

The House will remember that since 1968, each time the Minister of Finance tabled a budget, he claimed that the measures he was introducing would either decrease unemployment or eliminate inflation. But since every endeavour led to failure, the Minister of Finance again rose and smiled and introduced a new budget, saying that he would increase the grants here and there, only to awake shortly afterwards with another budget designed to compensate for previous failures.

And now even though recent Bill C-259 has not yet been enacted, the Minister of Finance wants it to be amended. I understand for not only this bill in its present form is far from acceptable but the co-operatives, for instance, even with the amendment proposed by the Minister of Finance, will be no better off than before.

Mr. Chairman, this shows way that the bill before the House will not solve the present problem, since the minister himself agrees to lower personal income tax by 3 per cent and corporate income tax by 7 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, that is an example of what I call administrative manipulation of our fellow citizens' tax, which really amounts to nothing, an aspect which I did not have time to deal with this afternoon. That is why I wish to speak once more.

I should like to emphasize that the government has two sources of financing: the taxpayers' money, increasing from year to year, and the loans raised in foreign countries. That is how the government finance their administrative expenditures, according to their own priorities.

Now it has been proven that taxes keep on rising from year to year. The government may say that is normal since their expenditures also increase. But as the Canadian taxpayers are unable to fill in, with their income and taxes, all the public administrative expenditures, the government for the past ten, twenty, even a hundred years, let us say since 1967 at least, has had to borrow money abroad in order to finance this country, which means, if I quote the title of the publication "How your tax dollar is spent", that we come to the following result:

Canada's public debt amounted to $38 billion in October, 1970, and the Minister of Finance has forecast new government borrowings of $1.9 billion in 1971-72 to cover an anticipated $600 million deficit in the fiscal year, and a $1.3 billion net cash requirement for non-budgetary investments such as housing, transportation, and loans to developing countries.

Incidentally, it must be noted that the government admits that the money it lends to foreign countries at a low interest rate is money it has borrowed itself from other countries at a high rate. Anyway, that is not the question. In fact, at this time, the government anticipates a $600 million deficit and will have to borrow $1,900 million. That deficit has to be made up one way or another. The government borrows from other countries.

On the other hand, they say that they will borrow from those sources $1,900 million to pay non-budgetary expenses. Both amounts come to more than $1,900 million, plus $600 million, which means that we now arrive at $2.5 billion. These are debts, borrowings made this year for the 1971-72 fiscal year.

According to last week's estimates, this debt will be increased by almost $1 billion. We now have almost $3 billion. The debt amounted already to $38 billion. The service of the public debt, that is interest and capital payments on the public debt, will cost $1.995 billion in 1971-72, or, in other words, 14 cents on each dollar paid to the federal government. That is what is said in this government pamphlet.

Mr. Chairman, I say this is pure demagogy in a certain way. This is a monumental joke. This is the way we are administered. On the one hand, Canadian taxpayers are in debt up to their eyes and overtaxed, and on the other hand, the government increases its expenditures. Borrowings are increased so that in order to pay the interest on its debts, the government falls back on the taxpayer, increases the income tax to pay for those borrowings and the interest, which means that at the present time, excluding the two and one half billion dollars deficit predicted, we lose 14 cents on every tax dollar.

There then, Mr. Chairman, is the overwhelming proof that the income of Canadians, on the whole, is burdened by the public debt accumulated by successive governments, liberal as well as conservative. This proves that the most inflationary factor is the progressive indebtedness of governments. We speak of federal government debts, but we could speak as well of the debts of the provinces, municipalities and school boards. The taxpayers must, through their taxes, pay the interest and the principal on those debts, on all debts, municipal, school, provincial and federal so that finally they get discouraged because there is no end to it.

Yet, financing the development of our country would be simple if we turned to the financial institutions we have, such as the Bank of Canada; the Canadian taxpayers would save that much.

It will be said that it is the miracle solution, the stupid solution of the Créditistes. However, nothing proves that the present system is not absurd. Indeed, it is inflationary, while the one we advocate is not. When it is suggested that Social Credit will create inflation by using Canadian financial institutions, it is not true, because inflation exists at the present time. Social Credit is the solution which does not lead to inflation.

What difference is there between $7 coming from the United States and Europe or $7 from the Bank of Canada, if both amounts are based on Canadian development? The big difference just the same is that the $7 from the Bank of Canada will be reimbursed only once, since the amount is lent to the Canadian people while the $7 from the United States or elsewhere must be repaid with interests. As a result, the taxpayers through their taxes will have to pay three bridges to big business and one to themselves, three trans-Quebec highways to big business and one to themselves, three Trans-Canada highways to big business and one to themselves, three James Bay projects to big business and one to themselves, four Quebec Hydro, at the very least, given the interests and the indebtedness that this corporation has contracted with the Americans, and one Quebec Hydro to themselves, all this according to the wishes of politicians of the old school, so as to become masters in our own house.

Mr. Chairman, are we masters in our own house, when we are kneeling in front of big business to ask them for permission to breathe in our own country?

Mr. Chairman, this means that as we are discussing Bill C-259—more than 710 pages on how to tax our fellow citizens—we ought to question the financing system of this government so that the latter will add a third source of financing. If the only sources of financing for this government are loans and taxes, it should add a third one, the Bank of Canada, in order to finance the public sector of Canada.

The Economic Council of Canada, in its eighth annual review published in September 1971 under the title: "Design for Decision-Making", states that the public sector in Canada is expanding more and more and is becoming more and more costly. I invite my colleagues to read this report which was not published by the Creditistes but by the government. It says that more and more the public sector of the Canadian economy is gaining in importance over the private sector.

That, Mr. Chairman, means—if one is able to understand the situation—that the proposed tax reform will not solve the problem but that, on the contrary, another measure will be needed in a couple of years, perhaps twice as thick as this one, to solve another problem, because expenses will continue to rise in the public sector because of its increasing importance.

Mr. Chairman, they devise all kinds of ways to tax our fellow citizens with bills that even officials do not understand. They propose a superficial tax reform which not only fails to solve the problem, but affects a new class of unprotected people, namely the average wage-earner with an income between $7,500 and $12,000. They will have to pay the grants awarded to large companies as well as the tax exemptions allowed to 750,000 other Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, we should be ashamed to say that 750,000 Canadians will be tax exempt, which means that 750,000 other Canadians do not have enough income to pay taxes and have to live on welfare. This means that 750,000 other Canadians are outside the economic system of production and are thus deprived of consumer goods.

Mr. Chairman, it is more and more imperative that the government stop joking about this question, come back to earth and look seriously into the Social Credit proposals. What has it to lose? In any case, it is now in a vicious circle.

But, Mr. Chairman, I doubt that the government will look into the Social Credit doctrine.

• (9:40 p.m.)

I think the only way the administration can solve the problem is by calling a general election. The best example of this is found in the publication of the Treasury Board entitled "How your tax dollar is spent". Here what it says on page 23, and I quote:

This interest payment is—

It is mentioned here that 14 cents of every tax dollar pay for interest on our debt. In fact, to make Canadians swallow the interest payment on our debt to foreigners, the government says, as one can read on page 23, and I quote:

This interest payment is almost wholly—

Mr. Chairman, it is dishonest, it is insidious, I continue to quote:

This interest payment is almost wholly a return on investments in Canada by Canadians.

Let one Canadian stand up, whether he is a farmer, a labourer or anything else, and show me the dividend cheque he has received from the federal government for investments in his country: No Canadian can do it. The only investments that bear interest are the Canada savings bonds, and they do not even finance 30 per cent of the Canadian government administration. The balance is loans, Mr. Chairman, for which Canadians receive no interest.

However, in this brochure designed to sell taxes to Canadians, the government tells them: Continue, it is a good thing to borrow abroad, a good thing for you to pay taxes of over 14 cents per dollar to the federal government as interest on our debt, because actually that is just reimbursement for what you have invested.

That is all pure ballyhoo, pure demagogy, blatant lies, Mr. Chairman. There is not a word of truth in what is written there and I shall go even further, saying that the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board, the authors of that text, should be sued by Canadians because that is not truth, it is shear phantasy, it shows how dishonest some people can sometimes be, in the belief that power belongs to them.

Mr. Chairman, the autority to administer may belong to the government, but the authority to finance that government belongs to the Canadian people and they require the government to make use of its financial institutions in order to help it ensure the sound and normal development of the country by taking part in and by getting its financial institutions, like the Bank of Canada, involved in the financing of the public sector. As I said, and as pointed out by the Economic Council of Canada, it is increasingly costly.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of this House, I am really sorry to see how keen they are to tax our Canadian people and to see how little the members on the other side are interested in seeking solutions in order to alleviate the tax burden of our fellow-citizens.

I urge the hon. member to read the booklet entitled "How your tax dollar is spent" and, if they have the courage, to go and read it in their riding. Then we shall perhaps be able to discuss matters on an equal footing. But if some people want to go on playing games and concealing the truth from the Canadian people, if this country keeps getting bogged down and if its financial situation continues to deteriorate, the day will come when only a tiny minority will be paying income tax, while most of the other citizens will be on welfare. Believe it or not, there remains one fact which nobody can laugh off: how is it that a country as rich as Canada has so many poor?

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, when we look at the massive bill before us—in fact, as the whole matter of tax reform, the white paper and Bill C-259—and what all this legislation has cost the Canadian taxpayer, we must ask whether the exercise has really been worth while. I believe the changes proposed in this bill could have been incorporated during the course of a normal budget.

I was a member of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which travelled through the western provinces receiving briefs and hearing the reactions of the public to the white paper proposals. We were constantly reminded of the repercussions which those proposals were having on trade expansion and on construction, resulting in a reluctance to embark upon new ventures, all of which had a cooling effect on the whole economy.

There is no need to say that today we have an economy which is dreadfully sick, with high unemployment, inflation and one of the highest rates of bankruptcy we have experienced. To realize this one has only to be reminded of the postponement of the plans of Syncrude, in northern Alberta—a $300 million venture which was postponed deliberately as a result of the tax proposals enunciated in the white paper.

I do not believe we will ever know, in terms of dollars and cents, exactly what the whole exercise has cost the Canadian taxpayer. But suffice it to say that it has been plenty. We will never be able to assess, in terms of dollars and cents, the misery and hardship created as the result of lay-offs, lack of confidence in the economy and lack of suitable employment. We have suffered from lack of an expanding labour market which has been brought about in large measure by the effects of the white paper that was published in 1969.

We might ask ourselves why this uncertainty has existed. I believe the answer could be summarized by referring to page 5 of the white paper in which it was said that the government's proposals were the result of careful study of tax principles, practices and impact, and that the government believed they were the best practical proposals "to attain our objectives in present circumstances." Mr. Chairman, I submit that that was a pretty firm declaration. It was a firm commitment that the white paper proposals, so far as the government was concerned, were an almost perfect approach to change not only the tax structure but also the social and philosophical attitudes of Canadians.

Businesses large and small, and corporations foreign and domestic became very apprehensive about the future. To date many patchwork measures have been undertaken in an attempt to stimulate the economy. Recently we have experienced a situation arising from actions taken by the United States. It is obvious to me that much of the uncertainty and stagnation of our economy was caused by the white paper proposals put forth in November, 1969. I have already said that probably we will never know the exact amount of the losses incurred as a result of this exercise, but we do know that the economy has suffered considerably. It has suffered as a result of the ostensible determination to inject equity into the tax system.

We know that the direct cost of the exercise was something in the order of $10 million. This was outlined in an article in the Ottawa Journal on July 10. We know that the exercise, right here in the House of Commons, was very costly—something in the order of $1 million. The cost of the hearings conducted by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs was $601,321. The amount it spent for research staff and studies was $200,818, and the cost of calling witnesses was $8,766. The Senate committee had similar costs. The business community also had high expenses in hiring professional help in order to present its case adequately before the committee.

Not only do we have an expensive tax structure but we have a complicated tax structure; a myriad of changes which can serve only to confuse the average taxpayer. This may force the average taxpayer to engage the services of accountants and other professional people, which in normal circumstances might not be necessary. I believe this has been adequately enunciated by those who attended the convention of the Canadian Bar Association. It was readily supported by professional accountants and others. We have a situation in respect of the new measures incorporated in Bill C-259 which will make Canada a nation of bookkeepers.

I should like to deal briefly with the effect of this legislation on small business and the impact it will have on the agricultural community, including co-operatives. In respect of co-operatives it will have a very devastating effect on those organizations which provide services to the agricultural community. I think of the small, seed cleaning plants, for example, which provide a service to farmers at cost and which will find themselves in a very difficult situation in attempting to carry on under the new proposals. Members of the Vermilion Seed Cleaning Association met with me and pointed out that under their present policy they are not making money but are merely providing a service to the farm community. They were unable to accumulate any money under the old system and stated that under the new system they will have to increase the tariff to farmers in order to remain solvent. I believe the same thing applies to other small co-operative organizations such as the livestock co-operative and many other small groups which provide services not provided by private enterprise.

One does not have to be much of a tax expert—I certainly am not—to realize that this bill will have a serious effect on agriculture and small business. While the capital gains tax implications are obvious, little has been said about the much greater tax disadvantage the farming community will suffer because of the new measures. This leads one to realize that even the Minister of Finance and the tax experts who work in conjunction with the authors of the task force report on agriculture want to do away with two-thirds of the farmers of our country.

Mr. Mahoney: You must do better than that if you want to continue for another four minutes.

Mr. Mazankowski: I will be here as long as you will. The situation, simply, is that the type of legislation brought forth by this government has been deliberately aimed at destroying the family farm and the welfare and occupation of farmers.

Mr. Mahoney: You don't believe that.

Mr. Mazankowski: There is no doubt about it. The notorious Bill C-176, Operation Lift which more properly should be named operation "Flop," the stabilization bill and then what has commonly been referred to as the adjustment program which has been brought forth in the form of a so-called white paper are aimed at speeding up the rationalization process in the farming community. From reading the statistics provided by DBS we know the effects of the cost-price squeeze and the strangulation which has taken place since this government assumed office. We know the government is well on its way to succeeding in what I refer to as a measure of occupational genocide.

We know that in 1966 the total net realized farm income in the three western provinces was in the order of $1 billion. This decreased in 1970 to a net realized income of roughly $500 million, a reduction of 50 per cent. Yet we have a government which intends to bring in tax measures which would further aggravate the situation.

The point I am making is that we are creating a situation in which the removal of two-thirds of the farmers from the land will in fact will become a reality. We know many farmers have found themselves in the position of being in a cost-price squeeze. The cost of their input has increased since 1967 by roughly 8 per cent, while in the same period the price of the goods they sell has decreased by roughly 11 per cent. This type of situation cannot continue. It must be recognized that agriculture is indeed a risky business. The Minister of Finance and the parliamentary secretary—I do not believe he has a great deal of sympathy for the agricultural community—have not seen fit to incorporate any measures which would take cognizance of this fact.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

I would not want to be nasty to anybody, but I have not heard, because the sound system was not working, the progress report to the Chair, following the meeting of the committee of the whole.

Would it be possible for you to repeat the report which has just been brought forward?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: To answer the hon. member, the report handed to me read as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the committee of the whole has considered a certain bill and has invited me to report progress and request leave to resume consideration at the next sitting of the House.

Such is the report handed to me.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): That was read in French by the Assistant Deputy Chairman of the committee of the whole.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—USE OF INFORMERS—REPUDIATION OF STATEMENTS BY ROBERT EADIE AND FATHER

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to be able to put our good friend the hon. member for New Westminister, now Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General, (Mr. Hogarth), through his baptismal fire.

In a speech to the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police on September 2, his boss the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) said that the work of the police calls for "a much greater degree of open public discussion about police policy". As we know, the matter that brings us here tonight is the affairs of father Eadie and son Eadie—that is, the young fellow who was informer, and his father. I had asked a question about the activities of the younger Eadie and the statement to the House of the Solicitor General keeps us here tonight.

As former U.S. attorney general Ramsay Clark said—

No area of police activity calls for greater skill or discipline than drug control. Of all consensual crimes, the victim here is least reliable and least likely to co-operate. His dependence on his supplier is great. Most traffickers are users themselves and therefore doubly dangerous—dangerous as persons dealing in serious crime and dangerous as unstable individuals. Evidence is difficult to obtain in drug cases. Historically narcotics agents have worked under cover and through informers.

Mr. Clark, I imagine, is regarded by most of us, or at least those who have some knowledge of the law, as one of the great lawyers of our times. He went on to say:

Informers, rarely wholly reliable, are even more rarely so in narcotics cases.

Now we come to the case of the Eadies, and especially Eadie junior who appears to have earned his living from giving information to the police about drug users. His father has spoken on this matter. Whether the RCMP used intimidation to recruit his son, as he claims they did, by threatening to have him "busted" on planted evidence and sent back to the reformatory is one of the serious questions that has come out of this whole melancholy case.

Robert Wayne Eadie, on the CBC program of September 9, said his son had been paid $305 by the RCMP over 2 ½ years dating back to when he was a youth of 18 for supplying information that had led to three arrests, that his son had been forced to supply information to the RCMP after they had been contacted by the Cornwall police who were holding him on a charge of drunkenness, and that his parents were never notified that he was being paid as an informer. He said that the RCMP coerced his son into providing information by threatening to plant drugs on him and prosecute him, and that his career as an informant ended after he was severely beaten by six guys and left for dead. He said his son lost his teeth because of this action.

The Solicitor General told us in the House that the practice of paying juveniles for information given by them to the police is repugnant. That this practice did not add appreciably to the efficiency of police operations I think almost anybody here could believe.

Before that, on August 15, the Solicitor General had told the Canadian public that the RCMP would not have a young person on the payroll as an informer. That leaves us in the position where we are very much in doubt about police operations. Perhaps we are left in doubt as to whether anybody should now be in jail because of information given to any court by a young person under oath. We are also left in some doubt as to the rapport between the Solicitor General and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

This is a subject totally repugnant to me, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, if I did not have the particular responsibility I would not be raising it this evening. I suppose, like most citizens, I would like to believe that everything was working for the best of all possible worlds. However, because of the rather substantial differences between people in different positions I feel it my duty and obligation to raise the matter tonight. I hope my hon. friend, who has had a great career in the courts—much more than I have had—in dealing with this type of matter and dealing with crime, will be able to support some of the points I have raised.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this question which has been raised by the hon. member, and which is indeed a very serious subject, the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) has very little to add to what was said in his statement on motions on September 17 last as reported in Hansard at page 7937. This dealt both with the policy of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with respect to the employment of informers of a young age and with the Eadie case.

Specifically, five allegations were made by young Eadie. First, that he was forced to supply the RCMP with information relating to drug offences under threat of returning to prison. This was refuted, as reported in Hansard at page 7938. Second, Mr. Eadie alleged that his parents were not aware of his activities. This was refuted at the same page. Third was the allegation that there was a threat to plant drugs upon him if he did not provide the police with information. This was refuted. Fourth, he alleged that he gave information which resulted in three arrests. This was not necessarily refuted; the RCMP reported that he gave information on 21 occasions which resulted in successful police action in respect of 14. Fifth, he alleged that he was threatened with physical harm because he was a police informer, or at least that it was found out, and that the police refused him protection. This was categorically denied.

In respect of the statement on motions made by the Solicitor General, I think it is to be noted that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) made specific mention of the fact that it is sometimes inadvisable to rely on statements made by paid informers. Indeed, as my hon. friend knows, the rules of evidence are such that this type of evidence must be corroborated in any court of law.

In any event, on September 30, the young man went on television again. It was this second appearance that gave rise to these proceedings tonight. At that time it did not appear to the Solicitor General that he said much that he had not alleged before, and there was very little that could be added. In that broadcast it was alleged that the Solicitor General was wrong with respect to the fact that Eadie's parents were informed. The Solicitor General has reviewed the file and contacted the Royal Canadian Mounted Police again on this point. It is suggested that there is a difference in fact here, and the Solicitor General relies on the previous statement that he made.

The second allegation made in the new broadcast, that he was forced to inform about drugs under threat by the RCMP, is also denied, as it was before. The third allegation is that he was beaten up because he was a drug informant and that he asked for protection. Similarly, there is nothing to add to what was said before. The fourth allegation was, and this was somewhat new in that broadcast—

[Mr. McCleave.]

(10:10 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, might I have half a minute to finish?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hogarth: The fourth allegation is that he was contacted by the RCMP in November, 1968, that he provided information one week later and that he received payment for this information during Christmas of 1968. This is denied by the RCMP. The records indicate that the first payment to him was made on April 30, 1969. I regret that is all the information we have to provide. There has been a thorough looking into of the case on behalf of the RCMP.

TAXATION—SUCCESSION DUTIES AND GIFT TAXES—PROPOSED FEDERAL ABANDONMENT—REPLY TO PROVINCIAL REQUESTS FOR DELAY

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on October 8, as reported at page 8554 of Hansard, I directed the following question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

I understand the Prime Minister has now sent a reply to the previous letter of August 6 requesting a one-year delay in the implementation of the proposals regarding changes in succession duties and gift taxes. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is now in a position to inform the House of the nature of his reply?

The Prime Minister said in reply:

—I indicated that my reply was to the effect that we were not going to delay the implementation of the government's decision, subject to our getting the legislation through the House, of course. I added that federal officials and ministers would be prepared to discuss with provinces that desire to have discussion ways in which we might assist them in preparing to raise their own taxes if they wanted to step in where the federal government had stepped out. As the House knows, the announcement was to the effect that we would not continue collecting these taxes but that if the provinces wanted to start collecting them we would try to assist them to do so.

In a word, Mr. Speaker, that reply is completely unreasonable. If the provinces are to collect estate and gift taxes, they must first pass legislation. They do not know at this moment when the tax bill before this House will pass, so they cannot very well begin the procedures necessary for the passage of the legislation. There is no time available to them to consult with other provinces in an attempt to establish the sort of uniformity necessary in estate and gift tax legislation, if they are to be administered by the provinces. There is no time available for them, after the bill before this House passes, for the framing of their own legislation. There is no time available for them to call special sessions of their own legislatures in order that their legislation may come into effect on January 1, 1972.

Their request was entirely reasonable and I fail to understand why the government has not acceded to it. In view of the problems the provinces would face in attempting to get all these tasks completed by January 1, 1971, the Prime Minister's offer of assistance is nothing more than hot air.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That should be "1972."

Mr. Rowland: Yes, 1972. If a vast jungle is not to be created in the field of succession duties and gift taxes, then the federal government must agree to this eminently reasonable request on the part of the provincial governments for a one-year suspension in the proclamation of that portion of Bill C-259 which provides for the complete withdrawal of the federal government from the imposition of estate and gift taxes.

The provinces need time to consult, if there is to be any uniformity in their approach to the problem. Surely even a complete cretin can see the need for a large measure of uniformity in the area of taxation. If the rich provinces, for example, were to decide that they do not need that revenue and therefore they will not impose any gift taxes, what would happen to the poor provinces? In Manitoba, the revenue gained from gift and estate taxes is equal to a 1 per cent surcharge in income tax. Where are you to find that kind of revenue?

If the richer provinces decide not to impose estate taxes because there is not enough time to get the legislation through, the poor provinces must follow suit and further narrow an already too narrow tax base. This is a completely backward step that the federal government has taken. It should never have abandoned the field of estate and gift taxes. Indeed, it should never have contemplated that step. One of the major purposes of a proper system of taxation is to equitably redistribute the wealth of society. Estate taxes and gift taxes are one of the best means of so doing.

Why should a person receive an immense boost over his neighbours simply because, for example, he was fortunate enough to be born into a family having a rich uncle? If a man has worked hard and used his ingenuity and initiative to accumulate wealth beyond that possessed by his neighbours, I can understand the desire on the part of society to let him keep it. However, if he has done absolutely nothing to warrant more wealth than his neighbours, other than being born into a family with wealth to pass on, I fail to see why society should not get a cut, given the fact that no man, no matter how hard working or how ingenious, succeeds without relying in some degree upon the services provided by society.

Abandoning estate and gift taxes is, as I have said on a number of occasions, a retrograde step. Not allowing provinces time to avoid the potential confusion resulting from an attempt to impose estate and gift taxes on their own, without consultation with one another, is absolutely criminal. I ask the members of this House to remember that eight out of ten premiers requested the one year's delay. These premiers represent every major political philosophy in this country.

I am astounded by the degree of arrogance—I realize that "arrogance" is an overworked word in this House but it is the only way to describe this cavlier rejection of a request by eight out of ten premiers—and stupidity required to deny that request. It will not make one iota of difference to the government's budget if it delays the imposition of that portion of the bill for one year, because it represents an abandonment of revenue and not a source of revenue. It creates no problem whatsoever with the budget. If the government cannot see logic, why not be gracious and accede to the provincial governments' request which is absolutely reasonable and necessary?

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on September 22, 1971, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wrote the chairman of the premiers' conference reaffirming the federal government's decision to repeal federal estate and gift taxes effective January 1, 1972. The federal government has no intention of continuing this form of taxation when capital gains are included in the tax base as provided in the June 18 budget.

The federal government is, nevertheless, prepared to afford technical and administrative assistance to provinces wishing to enter these fields. This offer of assistance was communicated to provincial finance ministers by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on October 14 and expresses our willingness to administer a succession duty imposed by any province that is not presently levying succession duties, that is, provinces that do not themselves have the staff and facilities to administer such a duty.

The offer is contingent upon the following conditions being met: One, at least four provinces must enter into the agreements; two, each participating province would enact a model act providing that the base of the succession duty would be the same; three, some degree of uniformity of rates would be provided under the model acts having regard to the rates now in effect in those provinces imposing their own succession duties; four, that administrative procedures be reasonable in terms of the rights of taxpayers; five, it would be clear that the federal government's role is purely administrative and the presentation to the public would make clear that it is a provincial, not a federal tax. There are a number of other conditions, including provision for a reasonable administration fee and a three-year term of agreement.

A similar offer has been made in connection with the gift tax, with the proviso that the minimum of four provinces participating be provinces that have entered into the collection agreements for succession duties. Officials of the federal and provincial finance departments concerned will be meeting very soon to discuss the offer. With regard to the matter of time, the government does not anticipate that the House will take an undue time to pass Bill C-259 in view of the numerous benefits to Canadian taxpayers and the economy which are embodied in it.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Most provinces are expected to adapt their own income tax systems to the federal system. We hope the House and the other place will soon pass Bill C-259 into law so that the provincial legislatures can meet and at least receive budget speeches from their governments before the end of the year.

Mr. Rowlands: We can't do that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How can a grown man be so childish?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF AGREEMENTS WITH NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, the burden of my message tonight arises out of a question I asked in this House several times of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion having to do with what I consider to be a breakdown in communication between the provincial authority in Nova Scotia and the federal authority in Ottawa. In this context, it has to do with agreements.

On October 7 I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), as reported at page 8516 of Hansard, whether the minister could indicate the present status of a subagreement under the basic agreement between the federal authority and the province of Nova Scotia, which is an agreement entitled "Nova Scotia federal-provincial agreement on special areas and highways," dated at a point in the administration in Nova Scotia of Hon. George Isaac Smith who was then Premier of Nova Scotia. I asked the question particularly in light of a headline which had appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of September 14, 1971, which read "$40 million more from DREE: Highway work to take half". The article

The Nova Scotia government is expected to sign a formal agreement with Ottawa next week whereby the province will receive an additional $40 million in grants and loans under the regional economic expansion (DREE) program.

Half of the money will be committed to highway work, with the bulk of the balance going to projects in the Halifax-Dartmouth metropolitan area.

Premier Gerald Regan told a news conference at Province House yesterday that the funds are an extension of the province's existing DREE agreement plus another $20 million for highway work.

He and finance minister Peter Nicholson gave newsmen only sketchy information about details of the new programs, saying that more information could be revealed upon official signing of the agreement with Ottawa.

The new money constitutes a one-year extension of Nova Scotia's existing $34 million DREE package, from June 30, 1972, to June 30, 1973.

Mr. Regan said his government opted for a short-term agreement so that more detailed planning could be conducted on a proposed three-year package covering the period April 1, 1972, to June 30, 1975. It was better for a new government deciding its options and long-term programs to secure a short-term agreement so that greater attention could be given to the future, he said.

Some surprise was registered in Nova Scotia at an announcement being made at that point by the Premier, but he explained he was making it then because he was off to Malaysia to attend a conference.

When I raised the question in the House of Commons the minister indicated that he had no awareness of what I was talking about. On the basis of the article I have read, I cannot question the veracity of the minister, because he said he knew nothing about it, but I do without hesitation question the veracity of the Premier of Nova Scotia. This is the second time I have raised the question, only to learn there is still no awareness on the part of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion as to what in hell this is all about, and I am a little fed up with lying and evasion of public trust. God damn it, what is going on? The minister is too lazy to be here tonight. I ask the parliamentary secretary to tell us whether he knows anything about this or not.

I have come from a testimonial dinner tonight in honour of a man who represents the epitomy of integrity in this country, a former hon. member from British Columbia, Mr. Howard Green, a man who embodies what is important to this institution and has done so over the years. The people of Nova Scotia do not need any misleading information to be given to them. Either the people of Nova Scotia have government by headline or they have government on the basis of consultation with the senior government. It is that question and that question alone that brings me here this evening.

I should like to know whether or not there is about to be signed, or has been signed within the last week or ten days, an extension of or amendment to the original DREE agreement between the federal authority and the province of Nova Scotia to grant the province of Nova Scotia some $40 million in funds. If that is not the case, then I wish the parliamentary secretary to the minister would get to his feet and tell the people of Nova Scotia that Mr. Regan does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) raised this matter on the "late show." As part of my new duties I have been reading back through the minutes of proceedings of the Standing Committee on Regional Development and I can testify to the hon. member's continuing interest in this subject. Obviously, as he indicated tonight, this is a subject on which he feels very strongly, and rightly so.

He did say that the minister said in the House that he did not know anything about this matter. If the hon. member would look back to Hansard he would see that what the minister actually said was whether it would be possible to know to which agreement the hon. member was referring, because there were several agreements to which he might have been referring. So it was not a declaration of ignorance; he was asking the hon. member for information.

The hon. member also said that there has been a breakdown in communications. This is not so. In fact, to the contrary. We have recently completed negotiations in regard to two agreements with the government of Nova Scotia, one dealing with highway projects and the other,—I am sure the hon. member is happy to know—dealing with the development of the special areas of Halifax-Dartmouth and the Strait of Canso. The latter represents an extension of the term of an earlier agreement that was signed last year. These two agreements have now received the approval of the Governor in Council and within the next day or two a letter will be sent to Premier Regan to make arrangements for the signing of the agreements. In accordance with normal practice, details will be announced jointly by the two governments as soon as possible after the agreements have been signed.

I am sure the hon. member will be pleased at these developments and I thank him for his continuing interest in the affairs of the department.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.
