I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the Controller of Customs to this state of affairs. It seems to me that the greatest pains should be taken, if we wish to measure the condition of our foreign trade, to credit the country with every dollar of exports from our shores. It seems to me that the absolute accuracy might be obtained if that rule which at present prevails, is continued, and the exports credited to the port nearest to the place of shipment. At the same time there should be an accurate entry kept of the exports from every port of the Dominion, whether by sea or by railway. By that means it seems to me that object might be accomplished. I trust the House will pardon me for bringing it at this late hour, to their attention and to the attention of the Controller.

Mr. WOOD. In reply to the hon. gentleman I must say that I think he is labouring under a misapprehension of the facts. It is quite true that all goods that are shipped abroad are entered at the nearest port to the place of shipment. But I beg to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to a clause in the Customs Act, as to which he has apparently been misinformed, or at least, his attention cannot have been drawn to it. Section 101 meets completely the case that my hon. friend has made out. I will read this section, and leave it to the hon. gentleman himself to fight it out with Collector Ruel at the port of St. John. He is a very good officer, and I do not think he would act in ignorance of this plain section :

Before clearance is granted to any vessel bound to a port or place out of Canada, the owners, shippers or consignors of the cargo on board such vessel shall deliver to the collector or other proper officer of customs, entries of such parts of the cargo as are shipped by them respectively, and shall verify the same by oath ; and such entries shall specify the kinds and quantities of the articles shipped by them respectively, and the value of the total quantity of each kind of article, and whether the said goods are of Canadian or foreign production or manufacture ; and such oath shall state that such entry contains a full, just and true account of all articles laden on board of such vessel by such owners, shippers or consignors respectively ; and that the values of such articles are truly stated according to their actual cost, or the value which they truly bear at the port and time of exportation ; and, in case the goods so shipped, or any part thereof, are, or is, liable by law to any export duty, the amount of such duty shall be stated in such entry ; and no such entry shall be valid, and no clearance shall be granted to such vessel until such duty is paid to the collector or other proper officer of Customs.

Now, compliance with that section was the plain duty of Collector Ruel, and would meet the case which the hon. gentleman has put so eloquently before the House. I was very much surprised to hear the hon. gentleman speak of the Trade and Navigation Returns in the way he did, surprised, because I am quite sure that any such blunders, for I can characterize them as nothing else, perpetrated at any port of exit or entry in this country where sea laden vessels are going forth to the world, would have been discovered long ago. I cannot for the life of me see how the hon. gentleman came to be so misinformed upon the law of the case ; and I cannot, as I said before, believe that the collector of customs at the port of St. John would have neglected his duty in so important a particular as this. There is no inconsistency in having goods entered for export at the port nearest to the place where the consignor makes the delivery, and in accordance with section 101 this, so far as I know, has been done. I shall look into the matter very carefully to see whether I am wrong in my pretension. I cannot be wrong in the construction of the Act ; and if there has been any mistake at the port of St. John in the direction indicated by the hon. member for St. John, I can assure him that I will look into the matter at once.

Mr. WALLACE. In addition to what has been correctly stated by the Controller of Customs, I may say that each vessel sailing from this country has to make a clearance or manifest in which every article of the cargo has to be distinctly specified to the collector of customs. That is in addition to the outward entry made by the exporters themselves, so there is a double check. The only point the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) raises is whether the exports shall be credited to the city of St. John, to the place where the goods leave the country, or to some other inland port from which the goods have been sent. That is a matter of not much importance, but it has been the common custom of the department and the proper one to credit the goods to the inland town, or wherever the goods are carried from by the exporter. If the exporter sends them from the city of Montreal, as in this case to Halifax or St. John, the goods would be credited to Montreal ; but if he is a St. John exporter, he credits them to that port, and I think very properly. So I think the returns as they are now prepared give an accurate report of the exports of the country.

Mr. HAZEN. That was not the point I raised. The point I raised was not whether they were credited to St. John, or some other point, but said the feeling prevailed among many of the merchants in that community who give attention to these trade matters, as appears from that article in the "Sun," which I read to the House, that there is a large quantity of goods being shipped from this country that do not appear in the trade returns at all, and are not credited to any port, and that is the point I wished to raise.

I think the section read by the Controller of Customs meets the case, and I hope he will ask Collector Ruel for a report on the matter, because if there is any misunderstanding or any misapprehension of the facts on a question of importance like that, the sooner it is cleared up, the better. The collector at the port of St. John is one of the oldest and most experienced collectors in the service, and I am sure he would strive to the utmost to do what was right.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRAYERS.

TRANSIT OF AMERICAN CATTLE THROUGH CANADA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to ask the attention of the House to a matter which took place on Friday, and which it appears to me requires a good deal of explanation. It will be in the memory of the House, that on the motion to adjourn last Friday, my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) asked that the Government should lay on the Table at the earliest moment the Order in Council and all other papers bearing on the question of the scheduling of Canadian cattle. To this the Minister of Agriculture replied :

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Government will be very pleased to lay on the Table, perhaps on Monday, the papers in connection with the matter which the hon. gentleman has referred to.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Might I inquire of the Minister whether the Order in Council giving his permission has been passed ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman will see on Monday exactly what has been done.

Now, Sir, I find in the "Star" of Friday, which was published at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, (these answers being given by the Minister of Agriculture at 6 o'clock) a declaration that an Order in Council was passed on Thursday in the following terms:—

An Order in Council was passed yesterday looking towards the return of the conditions that existed prior to the establishment of the cattle quarantine between Canada and the United States. It permits the shipment of American cattle from St. John, and is in the following terms : That the regulations relating to the quarantine and transit of the United States cattle through Canada shall be, and the same are hereby amended in such way as to allow shipment of United States cattle from the port of St. John, in New Brunswick, subject to the following conditions : 1. That the regulations relating to the inspection and isolation of United States cattle passing through Canada in transit from one United States port to another be made applicable to cattle shipped from the port of St. John. 2. That such cattle not having pratique in Canada, but simply passing through in bond, be shipped as United States, and not Canadian cattle.

If that be as stated here, a true report of the Order in Council passed on Thursday, published in the "Star" newspaper at 4 o'clock on Friday, while we at 6 o'clock on the same day were told that the Government would tell us on Monday what would be done ; all I can say is : it appears to me that the House has been treated with very gross discourtesy indeed, and an explanation is due—if there be an explanation—to the House and to my hon. friends, as to how it came to pass that this was communicated to newspapers, and that the information was refused to members in this House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In answer to the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), I may say that he has read correctly the conversation which took place across the House, between the hon. member from North York (Mr. Mulock) and myself on Friday last. The position which I took then was the correct one under the circumstances. At that time the Order in Council had been passed by the Council but was not signed by the Governor General, and as the hon. gentleman quite well knows, I had no business to give any information to this House as to the facts which had been brought before Council, and upon which a decision had taken place, but which decision had not been communicated to His Excellency, and approved, and signed by him. As to the facts having been given to the newspapers, I may say that I was myself astounded. As the reporters in the gallery who asked me the question upon Friday will bear me out, I refused to give them any information whatever, and I confess that the resentment of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), as against this fact being given to the newspapers, was joined in most heartily by myself. I have no explanation to offer to the House, except simply to say that I knew nothing whatever in regard to it, and I was astonished, and pained, when I found that it was done. Now, as to my position in the matter. I intended to bring the Order down to the House yesterday. I had it in my pocket, but as attention was not called to it I forgot about it, because I was not feeling very well and not paying very close attention to matters that were going on at the time the House adjourned. I have the Order in Council in my hand now, Mr. Speaker, and I will ask your permission to lay it on the Table. In doing so, I offer just this word of explanation made necessary by reason of the fact that the position of the Government has been misrepresented to some extent. I want to say two things. In the first place none of those restrictions, none of those regulations thought necessary for the purpose of protecting the health of Canadian herds, are to be in any sense withdrawn or made less. In the second place,—and I make this explanation because I have been asked many questions by telegrams and by letters from shippers interested—I say in the second place: The Order in Council is not intended to relate to one steamship company or the other, but is a general Order in Council dealing with the shipment of American cattle from the port of St. John. I wish, Sir, to repeat and emphasize that so far as I am concerned, the communication was not given to the public press by me, nor do I believe it was given to the public press by any of my officers, and I desire to express my humiliation that it was not given to this House before it was given to the press.

Mr. LAURIER. Was the Order published in the press the correct one?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I know nothing of the publication, except that I was informed of it by parties who had seen it.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, just one word before you proceed to the Orders of the Day.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the discussion is to continue it must be put in order by a motion.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say. I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) to make clear a portion of his statement, in order that there should be no misapprehension as to the nature of his explanation. I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) to say, that the terms under which this traffic of American cattle through Canada was to be conducted, were the terms applicable to the same traffic from the United States through Canada as heretofore existing. The Order in Council which the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) read, states that this traffic via St. John, N.B., was to be conducted subject to all the terms heretofore applicable to traffic from the States through Canada.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) understood me quite correctly, except that I would add this: My statement was a general statement saying that none of the regulations, and none of the restrictions thought necessary for the safety of Canadian herds, would be in any sense withdrawn and we continue—I speak generally now—all these restrictions and all these regulations thought necessary, when the trade was simply a transit trade through Canada; with the addition of other safeguards because of the fact that the cattle are being shipped from a Canadian port.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not going to argue the question now. I only want to find out clearly what is correct. The regulations that were thought necessary, among other things involved quarantining cattle for ninety days, I think. Is that one of the terms that is continued now?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) quite knows that for the transit trade, these quarantine regulations were not observed.

Mr. MULOCK. I am aware of the law and the regulations on the subject. I ask if these cattle require to be quarantined at all in this country?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all; the hon. gentleman knows that very well.

Mr. FOSTER. Before proceeding to the Orders of the Day, Mr. Speaker—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Excuse me. An adjournment is about to be moved on this question—because we must have some information on that point.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe the correct way to bring a paper of this kind down so that it may appear on the records is to move that an Address of the House issue for the production of the paper. I therefore move:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that he will cause to be laid on the Table, all Orders in Council relating to the transit of American cattle through Canada to be shipped at the port of St. John.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is unquestionably a very important matter. The transportation of American cattle through Canada formerly caused a great deal of trouble, and eventually resulted in the scheduling of our cattle by Great Britain. The very lax manner in which that business was conducted years ago brought down on the farmers of this country a very serious restriction. I think we should have full information from the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) whether any communications have passed between this Government and the United States Government with regard to the removal of the restriction that is now placed on Canadian cattle passing through the United States in transit to Great Britain. If we give the Americans the privilege of competitive points for the shipment of their cattle, it is right that they should extend the same privilege to us. If our cattle shippers had had the advantage of shipping by American lines years ago, it would have been a great saving to them. The hon. Minister of Agriculture did not quite satisfy the House on the question put by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) with regard to the regulations now in force. Prior to the order imposing a quarantine of ninety days on cattle shipped in transit through this country, the regulations were very lax, though it was intended they should be very strict. Now, we want to know what course will be adopted in regard to American cattle shipped by the port of St. John, and also why the order confines the privilege to that port. Why are American shippers not allowed to send their cattle to other ports as well? The old regulations provided that a Government agent should go on each train, that the cattle should be inspected on the American side by a veterinarian before being sent to Canada, and that they should be sent to the port of export under the charge of a Canadian officer. We want to know whether these regulations are to be continued in regard to cattle exported from St. John. It is very important that we should know this, because, if American cattle are to be admitted promiscuously to any port close to the United States, such as St. John, the disease which unfortunately resulted in the scheduling of our cattle may again be brought into Canada. I would also like to know if any communication has passed between the Government of Canada and the United States Government with the view of securing to the Canadian exporter the privilege of shipping his cattle by New York, Boston, or Portland. If we have removed our quarantine of ninety days, the United States Government should remove theirs, and allow our cattle to be shipped by their ports. We want to know whether we may look forward hopefully to the restoration of this privilege in the coming spring, when there will be no doubt a large number of fat cattle ready for export from this country; for April, May, and June are the months when the largest number of stall-fed cattle are exported. What are we getting in return for the privilege we have thus granted to American exporters?

Mr. LAURIER. There is in this matter, a question of privilege that appears to have been lost sight of. The hon. Minister stated that he was not at all responsible for the publication of this Order in Council in the newspapers before it was communicated to Parliament. I have no doubt that it was not through him that this gross breach of the privileges of this House was committed; but whoever it was, somebody has been guilty of it. We do not know to-day who it was; but somebody must have had access to the order, and sent it to the press, because, on comparing the order presented to-day with the text in the newspaper, I find that the publication is a verbatim copy of the Order in Council itself. It is evident that somebody had access either to the Minister's report to the Council or to the Order in Council. Somebody is responsible for that, and I submit that the answer given by the hon. gentleman is not complete. He has stated that he intends to take steps to find out who is responsible for this breach of privilege. I am not aware that such a thing has happened before in Canada, though I believe it has happened in the United States Congress. As this is the first breach of this kind that has taken place here, I think both sides of the House should resent such conduct, and should see that, as far as possible, the guilty party is found out and punished.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So far as that is concerned, I shall take steps to inquire how this matter was given to the press.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to have an answer from the Minister of Agriculture to the points I raised, if he is in a position to give it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I saw another hon. member rising, and I thought it would be better to reply to both at the same time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As I understand the Order, read from the newspaper by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), it discriminates against every other port in Canada in favour of St. John, and I suppose the hon. Minister will be able to explain why that was done. Certainly to make an order of that sort requires some very full explanations on the part of the Government, and some very good reasons to justify this discrimination. With regard to the breach of privilege, there can be no doubt that such was committed. Either the order was communicated by some party, who knew its contents, in the department of the hon. gentleman, or was communicated from the Department of the Privy Council. One or the other must have furnished a copy of this order to the press. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) says that this is introducing a practice which has, to some extent, prevailed in the United States, but to which we have hitherto been strangers in this country. This is the first instance in Canada of anything of the kind. In England, at the time of the Berlin Conference, the secret treaty between England and Turkey was communicated improperly, by some one in the Foreign Office, to the London press, and it certainly produced as great excitement in the United Kingdom as if there had been a declaration of war. And I think with good reason. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is bound to make a most thorough investigation and to see that the confidence of the Government in this regard is not to be violated with impunity. There is but one course for the Government to take towards parties who are guilty of such gross breach of duty, and the House will expect the hon. gentleman to discharge his duty in this regard.

Mr. McMILLAN. Last year I asked for copies of all correspondence between this Government and any one on its behalf and the United States Government with regard to arrangements concerning the shipment through Canada of American cattle, and vice versa. Those papers have never been brought down. We have been told from time to time that a statement would be given to the House, but so far none has been given. If the Americans are allowed to ship their cattle through Canadian territory, our Government should certainly take steps to get our cattle shipped through American territory. It would be of great benefit to us if we could, in the winter season, ship our cattle via Boston or New York, and I see no reason why we should not be allowed to do so in exchange for the equal privilege which we grant American shippers. The Cattlemen's Association passed a resolution some time ago asking the Canadian Government, if possible, to get the quarantine regulations withdrawn, so as to enable us to ship through any port in the United States. It is of the utmost importance to the cattle trade of Canada, which is in a very low condition at present, that something should be done.

Mr. HAZEN. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he and his constituents, who are shippers of cattle, should consider the advisability of using the port of St. John, which now furnishes ample facilities for the trade. There are now running from that port to Great Britain three lines—one to Glasgow, one to Liverpool, and the other to London. Two of these lines—the Beaver Line and the Donaldson Line—are admirably adapted for the cattle trade. Their boats have already taken out of the port of St. John during this season a large quantity of western Canadian cattle. One of them, in one trip, carried over two thousand sheep. It seems to me that, as patriotic Canadians, our cattle shippers should encourage Canadian ports in preference to foreign ports, when our own ports give equal facilities. A few days ago I received a telegram from the agent of the Beaver Line, informing me that he had entered into a contract for the shipment of sufficient cattle from the distant province of Manitoba to fill all the steamers of that line going out from St. John. If cattle from Manitoba can be shipped with advantage to Great Britain from St. John, it seems to me that cattle from Ontario could be shipped with equal advantage. Under the contract which the Government have entered into with the Beaver Line of steamers and with the city of St. John, that line is compelled to carry freight and produce from the western part of Canada to Great Britain at rates not higher than those charged for the same classes of goods out of the ports of Boston and Portland. They have to meet competition at every point, and I just call the hon. gentleman's attention to the matter so that he may be aware that the port of St. John offers quite as good facilities for the shipment of Canadian cattle as can possibly be obtained in any of the ports of the United States.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) had been watching the papers of late, he would have noticed that when this order was given by the Canadian Government, a somewhat similar order was given by the American Government, allowing the privilege of shipping Canadian cattle from Portland and one or two other ports. With regard to the statement of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I do not think it should be allowed to go uncontradicted. His statement was to the effect that the way in which the quarantine regulations were carried out in Canada resulted in our cattle being scheduled in England. The hon. gentleman is certainly wide of the mark in making that statement. It was on account of the finding of disease in the lungs of two animals that were taken from Canada which they declared to be similar to pleuro-pneumonia, and not because there was any laxity in carrying out the quarantine regulations as regards American cattle shipped through Canada.

Mr. MULOCK. Whatever the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) may consider as having been the reason, the British Government, at all events, has given what they consider their reason, and that was the finding that certain Canadian cattle were afflicted with pleuro-pneumonia. That was the finding of the court of inquiry, whose investigation was not confined to the case of the two cattle. There were appeals from that finding, and the British Government had subsequent investigations, and rightly or wrongly the reports were that more than two cattle were found on subsequent occasions suffering from this disease. So that we may as well accept the finding of the court without imagining, on mere suspicion, other reasons why the British Government took the particular course it did. If this were the proper occasion, I think it could be very well shown that the hon. member for North Wellington was entirely within the facts when he made the statement he did.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. MULOCK. It was my duty to prove beyond all question in this House how this arose.

Mr. IVES. You tried to for six hours, but without success.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman had not a word to say against it. He floundered for hours in an effort to dispose of the facts I had presented, but from that day to this neither he nor any of his friends have succeeded in disposing of them. There are certain records showing a distinct bargain under which the transit of cattle through Canada from the United States to Great Britain was to take place. These regulations were the result of an agreement between Great Britain and Canada, and they were set aside, grossly neglected, violated and ignored by the Canadian Government. Now, does the hon.

gentleman from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) deny that ?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Then the hon. gentleman denies the facts.

Mr. SPROULE. I say they were not grossly neglected.

Mr. MULOCK. I will give the hon. gentleman an instance. One of the terms of the agreement between Great Britain and Canada was that not one single animal was to come into Canada from the United States unless put under quarantine.

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. MULOCK. I have here the "Hansard" of 1894, but, without wearying the House with reading I will say that in the debate in July, 1894, I read and placed on record the documents in this case. Though I have not looked at them for some time—this debate having sprung up without warning—I assert in the presence of this House that these records show what I state to be true. They have been before the country for a year and a half. They show that there was a distinct treaty between Great Britain and Canada, that if Great Britain would not schedule Canadian cattle, we would only allow American cattle to pass through Canada to England in bond secured in a certain way, and with that exception would not allow one single beast to linger in Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. gentleman read the conditions, seeing he has them there.

Mr. MULOCK. I will read if you wish.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. Then the House will understand that I read at the request of the hon. gentleman. We shall see whether I can make good what I say. And, that there may be no misunderstanding as to what I say, I will repeat it in advance. Not having looked at these documents for 18 months, it is just possible I may be in error, but I think I am not. I assert that on the occasion in question, Great Britain had established an embargo against American cattle entering Great Britain, and was about to extend the embargo to Canadian cattle. The Canadian Government, through the instrumentality of my hon. friend to my left (Sir Hector Langevin), then a member of the Government, opened negotiations with the Imperial authorities and induced them not to embrace Canadian cattle in the embargo. The hon. gentleman had correspondence with the English Government, and that correspondence became the foundation of the terms arrived at. The terms arrived at were substantially these:—That if we would conduct this transit trade in a certain way and, with that exception, totally prohibit the importation of American cattle into Canadian territory, the British authorities would not schedule Canada. My hon. friend (Sir Hector Langevin) remembers this and says it is right. I assert that, in violation of that bargain, the Canadian Government allowed American cattle to come into Canada year by year for a term of years, without quarantining them, without inspecting them, without adopting the first regulation to carry out the terms of that agreement. I assert not merely that they violated the bargain in admitting American cattle at all, but that they grossly disregarded their obligation and admitted those cattle without the first attempt to ascertain whether they were healthy or not.

Mr. DALY. Where was that ?

Mr. MULOCK. I will show you. That is what I assert to have been the bargain. I will read the documents and the House will see whether I am correct or not. On the 25th April, 1879, Sir Hector Langevin, being then in England, addressed the following letter to the English Government upon this question:—

The undersigned, as representing the Government of Canada, has learned with concern the improbability of the consent of the Imperial Government being obtained to the reception upon the same terms of Canadian cattle, of cattle shipped from the United States through Canada via a Canadian port. But, while regarding this result, the Canadian Government will highly appreciate the interest displayed by the Right Hon. the Privy Council in considering the question and endeavouring to reach such a solution of it as would relieve the cattle trade of Canada from the heavy loss entailed upon it by the present order of things.

Assuming, therefore, that the proposal heretofore under discussion cannot be further pressed on the consideration of the Imperial Government with a reasonable expectation of its acceptance, the undersigned venture to submit a suggestion which, if acted upon, will effect an important and most desirable improvement in the condition of the carrying trade in Canada, without infringing the Imperial Statute, and without incurring any risk of transmitting the disease either to Canada or to this country.

The cattle carried by the Canadian railways may be divided into three classes: those which are imported; those which are intended to be shipped from Canadian ports, and those which only pass through a part of Canada in their transit from some point in the United States to some other point in that country.

The proclamation of the Canadian Government—

There was a proclamation then in existence.

—prohibits the entrance of cattle from the United States for any of these purposes, but it is obvious that there is a wide distinction between a mere transit across Canada from one point in a foreign territory to another, and shipments of foreign cattle from Canadian ports.

It is to the latter class of transaction—

That is the transportation of cattle from the United States to a Canadian port and thence to Great Britain—

—that the proposal of the Canadian Government was more directly applicable. But, with regard to the transit of cattle, the undersigned venture to submit, that it would not be necessary to schedule Canadian cattle merely because of such transit, provided effectual precautions be taken to prevent the possibility of contagion from the animals when in transit.

Then the memorandum goes on to refer to our railway system and to describe the route taken by the cattle trains—that is, from Detroit easterly crossing the Suspension Bridge to the United States, or via Rouse's Point to Montreal—and proceeds :

These journeys are all performed continuously. The cattle are landed in the United States in closed vans, called cattle cars, prepared for the purpose. They enter Canada in these vans, and they remain in them until they reach their destination, being fed and watered in them, and not being removed from them on the way for any purpose whatever, and it seems plain that, if their transit could be so regulated as to prevent the possibility of contact, directly or indirectly, with Canadian cattle, there would be no ground for placing Canada among the countries scheduled merely because of such transit.

The undersigned is unable at the moment to lay before the Right Honourable the Privy Council any complete plan for such regulation of transit, but it appears to him that it might be effected by adopting some such precautions as the following :—

1st. That steps be taken to ensure the retention of the animals in transit in the cattle cars from the time they enter Canada until they have left it.

2nd. That a plan be adopted for separating the cars used for the transport of foreign cattle, from those to be used for the movement of cattle from one point in Canada to another, and for preventing those used for the former purposes from being applied to the latter.

3rd. That means be adopted for preventing the manure of the cattle in transit from remaining in the country, or for destroying it in some effectual manner.

Well, that document received a reply on 2nd May. The English Government, through the Secretary of the Privy Council, sent the following letter to Sir Hector Langevin :—

Sir,—I am directed by the Lords of the Council to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, inclosing memorandum on the subject of the transit of cattle from one part of the United States to another, through Canada, in which arrangements are proposed for isolating cattle in transit in such a manner as to ensure a complete security against any chance of cattle within the Dominion becoming affected with disease. The adoption of those arrangements is proposed on the grounds that Her Majesty's Government would thus be enabled to continue the present system under which Canadian cattle are allowed to be landed without being subject to slaughter or quarantine under part 4 of the 5th schedule of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, and that at the same time an important improvement in the condition of the carrying trade in Canada would be effected.

This proposal—

That is the hon. gentleman's proposal.

Mr. MULOCK.

—has received the most careful consideration of the Lords of the Council, who have also had before them a suggestion submitted by Mr. Pope, through Sir John Rose, on April 21st, to the effect that, under certain conditions, the present restrictions on the introduction of cattle from the United States into Canada might be relieved.

Their Lordships observe, that both these proposals proceed on the view that no contagious disease of cattle exists in the western parts of the United States, and that there is no movement of cattle from east to west (except in the case of expensive animals for breeding), and that, therefore, if the proposed transit were allowed, there would be little or no danger of diseased cattle being brought into or moved through Canada.

I am, however, to point out to you, that the action which the Lords of the Council can take, with reference to the importation of animals into the United Kingdom is strictly limited by the terms of the Act of Parliament.

The general rule which applies to all foreign animals (which term by section 5 of the Act includes animals brought from any country out of the United Kingdom) is laid down in the 5th schedule of the Act. Special animals can only be landed at a foreign wharf defined for that purpose by an Order in Council, and are not to be moved alive out of the wharf.

The provisions under which Canadian cattle are at present exempted from slaughter or quarantine are contained in part 4 of the same schedule, which provides that if, and so long, as the Privy Council are satisfied with regard to any foreign country (that is, any country out of the United Kingdom) that the laws thereof relating to the importation and exportation of animals and to the prevention of the introduction or spreading of the disease, and the general sanitary conditions of the animals therein, are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of diseased animals, then, from time to time, the Privy Council by general or special order shall allow animals, or any special kind of animals, brought from that country to be landed without being subject to slaughter or quarantine.

By the Foreign Animals Order, as originally issued, animals from the United States and from the Dominion of Canada were admitted under the exceptional provision, but, in consequence after the discovery of pleuro-pneumonia in cattle from the United States, the Lords of the Council were reluctantly compelled to withdraw the exemption accorded to cattle from that country, and the same course would have been adopted with regard to Canadian cattle but for the prohibitory order passed by the Dominion Government, February 1st of this year.

I again remind the House that this was written in the light of the fact that there was a prohibitory order in Canada totally prohibiting importations of any cattle for any other purposes into Canada at that time. The communication goes on to say :

Application has been made to Her Majesty's Government by the United States Government for the restoration to the United States of the privilege to land their cattle under part 4, but under existing circumstances it has been found impossible to accede to this request, and the Lords of the Council have been unable to draw any distinction between different parts of the United States territory.

With reference, therefore, to the proposals now made on behalf of the Canadian Government, the Lords of the Council regret to have to inform you, that, if cattle from the United States are allowed to pass through Canada, they would not be justified under the Act of Parliament in continuing the exemption from slaughter at the port of landing, which has been hitherto extended to the Canadian cattle.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) G. L. PEEL.

Now, you will observe that the proposition made by the Canadian Government was rejected. What was the next step? My hon. friend here (Sir Hector Langevin) replied on the 5th day of May, 1879, as follows:—

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 2nd inst. (No. 61702), with regard to the proposals laid before the Lords of the Privy Council, one respecting the importation of United States cattle via Canadian ports, the other respecting the transit of United States cattle through a portion of Canada. I have to express my gratification at the careful consideration which they have received from their lordships, and I am emboldened by the desire which, it is apparent, is entertained by their lordships, to meet the wishes of Canada, if they can do so under the terms of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, to lay before their lordships some further representation, which I venture to hope may induce their lordships to reconsider their views upon one of these proposals. When I had submitted my memorandum of the 25th ult., I had become aware of their lordships' views against the importation of United States cattle via Canadian ports, and I was prepared for the decision upon that point, conveyed in your letter, and I propose to confine my present remarks to the suggestion that, subject to proper precautions, Canadian railway trains might be permitted to traverse a part of Canada loaded with United States cattle. I observe by your letter, and by part 4 of schedule 5 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, that the continuance of the privilege allowed to Canadian cattle depends upon the question whether, in the language of the schedule: "The laws thereof relating to the importation and exportation of animals, and of the suppression of disease and the general condition of animals therein, are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of diseased animals."

I am aware that unless I can show that the laws of Canada with regard to the transit of cattle are satisfied, I cannot hope to obtain any relaxation of the existing system, and I now venture to trouble their lordships in the hope that a more full knowledge of the circumstances connected with the trade, and of the freedom from danger with which it could be carried on, may induce their lordships to reconsider the subject, and may enable them to reach the conclusion that the suggested modifications will not deprive our Canadian laws of the character they are admitted to possess.

As I had the honour to observe in the memorandum submitted—a carefully considered system of isolation could be adopted with regard to the United States cattle in transit, among the details of such a system might be included the inspection of the animals by competent officers of the Canadian Government before the cars containing them were allowed to cross the frontier. If such inspection proved satisfactory, the Government officers might take charge of the train and proceed with it during its entire transit through Canada, in order to ensure the observance of all the prescribed rules.

And just at this point in this communication, I would emphasize that condition. Mr. Speaker. The Canadian Government represented that, as a term of this permission, the Canadian Government would send independent officers of their own to take charge of the cattle trains and see that all the regulations that the English Government required were lived up to. I emphasize that, because it was one of the points upon which the question turned, as you will see, if my memory serves me rightly, that the British Government in reply especially selected that one condition as one of the important terms of the treaty under which they were going to allow this traffic to be carried on. The communication goes on to say:

Each cattle car could be kept locked by the officer in charge, and, as foreign cattle are dutiable, they pass through in bond, and all the precautions provided by the Customs Department for the safe custody of goods through the country in bond would be adopted. The transit would only occupy a length of time varying from ten to forty hours. The trains are never stopped except for a few minutes at stations to ascertain if the line is clear. The cattle are always fed and watered in the cars, and arrangements for these precautions could be easily made, if they do not already exist, by which such feeding and watering could be effected without opening the doors.

There would be no necessity for cleaning out the cattle cars during the period of their transit, and such cleaning would be prevented.

Such precautions as these, under the circumstances as explained, would be considered by the Canadian Government sufficient to prevent the transmission of the disease to Canadian cattle, and I beg their lordships to believe that the Canadian Government are desirous of protecting their animals from infection much more because of the intrinsic importance of the subject within the country than on account of any privileges as to their importation, to which freedom from disease would entitle them. But it is precisely because the Canadian Government are satisfied that cattle may be carried in transit as proposed in my memorandum, without danger of contagion, that they have determined to prevent such transit if they can do so without interfering with the privileges their cattle already enjoy in English ports.

I would, therefore, respectfully ask their lordships to consider whether the prohibition of the importation of foreign cattle into Canada, with the sole exception of such importation for the purpose of transit, under proper provisions against infection, does not constitute such a law in that respect as in the end of the schedule already referred to "would afford a reasonable security against the importation from Canada of diseased animals."

If their lordships should become satisfied that such a law would be sufficient, the existing prohibition would be continued, after a further provision creating the only exception to its universality, namely, that cattle might pass from one point on the frontier to another, subject to such conditions as might be imposed upon such transit from time to time by Orders in Council, and an Order in Council would be immediately prepared describing the nature and the details of the process of isolation, and containing, in addition to the precautionary measures which the experience and knowledge of the facts would enable the Canadian Government to devise, such further conditions as their lordships might impose, and such Order would be submitted to their lordships and would be modified or amended in any respect according to their desire.

Have I not shown that my hon. friend on my left (Sir Hector Langevin) proposed to continue the total prohibition then in force, and there was to be no limit to the universality of the prohibition with the slight exception of the transit through Canada under those regulations. That is proposed here. The communication continues :

Under these circumstances I fail to see how any danger of infection to Canadian cattle could arise from permitting the mere transit of cattle, and it is only the infection of Canadian cattle which this country would have to fear, and no part of the cattle so passing through Canada could by any possibility be shipped from Canadian ports. And I would respectfully ask on these grounds a reconsideration by their lordships of the decision conveyed to me in your letter.

What was the answer of the British Government to that proposition? It is contained in the answer of the Privy Council, dated 9th May, 1879, as follows :—

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, containing the conditions upon which the Canadian Government would be prepared to insist in the event of their allowing the transit of animals by railway through Canada from the western to the eastern states of America, and requesting to be informed whether, if such transit were permitted on these terms, the Imperial Government would deem it necessary to make any change in the conditions under which the Canadian cattle are now admitted into the United Kingdom, and, in reply, I am to inform you that the Lords of the Council considered this fresh proposal and the details of the stringent precautions which it has proposed to adopt for the isolation of the cattle during transit under the personal supervision of a Government officer, and they have arrived at the conclusion that, so long as no diseases exist in the Dominion, and provided that the measures indicated in your letter are found sufficient to prevent the introduction of cattle from the United States into Canada, their lordships would not think it necessary to make any change in the existing regulations.

I have given the terms of the bargain, which show that there should be total prohibition of American cattle entering Canada except for the purpose of sending them from the western to the eastern states via Canada under conditions set forth, one of which was, that each train loaded with cattle was to be under the supervision of a Government officer who should see that the railway officers and others did their duty. I propose to prove a gross breach of that bargain. In 1881 there were admitted into Manitoba 2,310 head of cattle from the United States; 1882, 5,130; 1883, 1,480; 1884, for ranching purposes, 10,847; 1885, 2,810; 1886, 10,510; 1887,

Mr. MULOCK.

13,521, or in round figures a total of perhaps 50,000 head.

Mr. QUIMET. Where did you obtain those figures?

Mr. MULOCK. From the Trade and Navigation Returns. I read them from my place in the House in 1894, in the presence of the hon. gentleman and a great many of his colleagues. They appear in "Hansard;" they are uncontradicted and uncontradictable. I assert them to be correct, and the reports are to be found in the library. No body has ventured to challenge their correctness since that time, nor will they do so now. I come to another point. The introduction of cattle in the vicinity of 50,000 head into Canada from the western states was a distinct breach of the compact; but as if that was not sufficient, could any one understand a more gross breach of the spirit of the compact than the way in which the traffic was allowed to proceed? For several years the trade was allowed to go on, cattle were allowed to enter Canada without inspection and without quarantine, and it was not for several years after the traffic began the Government introduced the first element of protection in order to prevent diseased animals entering Canada. That is a broad and wide statement to make. If I cannot make that statement good I am assuming a very serious responsibility. I made that statement in the House in the year 1894; I made it in the country; I make it here in the House again, and I challenge any member of the Government, before this House and the country to show that I am not telling the truth. I have read the reports of speeches of gentlemen opposite, going through the country and drawing on their imaginations.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did you read your own.

Mr. MULOCK. I read yours. I take the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) and I bring him face to face with the statement I am going to make, and I ask him to make good his statements if he can. In 1884, the Government passed an Order in Council establishing quarantine in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Remember this unrestricted importation of cattle had been going on during these years that I have named. I ask the Minister of Agriculture to answer me this question: What precautions did the Government take to see that these cattle that were imported into Manitoba and the North-west Territories, during the years 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883 and 1884; I ask him to tell the House and the country, what precautions and regulations were adopted to ensure that these cattle had a clean bill of health before entering Canada. Let that point not be missed, because I will give him my evidence upon it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) will find in his department a collection of all the Orders in Council, and all the regulations applicable to this cattle trade, and he will find in connection with the Order in Council of 1884, the first Order in Council establishing any quarantine, the following explanatory memorandum :—

This Order contained the first restriction to the free importation of cattle from the United States into Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Before this date there was, as regards quarantine, untrammelled importation.

The official records in the hon. gentleman's own department state, that until the passage of the Order in Council of 1884, there was "untrammelled importation" of American cattle into Manitoba and the North-west Territories. In the face of the distinct agreement made by my hon. friend (Sir Hector Langevin) in 1879: That with the solitary exception of the transit of cattle through Canada under safeguards, there would be a total prohibition of the admission of American, or any cattle, into Canada—not into western Canada or eastern Canada, but Canada as a whole—in the face of that, what did the Government do? This disregard of the agreement gave an excuse to the English people who may have been clamouring for some sort of restriction such as this, and, when from time to time rumours reached them of the prevalence of pleuro-pneumonia in the western states, and when, as I showed in 1894, communication had reached the English Government through the press, referring to the prevalence of disease amongst cattle in the United States; the English Government commenced a correspondence with the Canadian Government, warning them of the risk they were running, and the danger to which they were exposing the Canadian cattle trade. That correspondence is on record here; that correspondence came from the custody of the Government; that correspondence warned the Government that a great industry was in danger. But the warning fell upon deaf ears. My hon. friend to my right (Sir Hector Langevin) was at the time Postmaster General, and for the sake of brevity of debate, I shall refer to him in that capacity. You remember, Mr. Speaker, that when my hon. friend (Sir Hector Langevin) made the proposition at that time, one of his terms was: That the trains were to be conducted through Canada under the custody and eye of a Government official to see that the regulations were lived up to. You will remember, Sir, that the answer from the English Government, dated 5th May, 1879, dwelt particularly upon that condition, and attached great importance to it, knowing as they did that paper regulations were of little value unless they were carried out. They selected that provision as one of the principal safeguards which moved them to make the concession in question. Now, Sir, how did the Canadian Government carry out that regulation? I would ask the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who is defending this transaction, to come to the assistance of the Minister of Agriculture now, for I know of nobody better fitted to do so. We saw his name recently mentioned in connection with that same portfolio of Agriculture. When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) went on strike, there were lots of gentlemen ready to take up the job, and only for the efficiency of the bolters' pickets, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) would have been sitting in the chair of the Minister of Agriculture, to-day, and would be trying to defend this act. However, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) looks forward, of course, to a possible bolt in the near future, and it is right he should win his spurs and qualify himself to succeed. He therefore, very properly, selects himself as the deputy on this occasion to assist the actual Minister of Agriculture. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) took part in this debate on the former occasion, and as he is thoroughly posted on all the facts as you can readily see, I will ask him to explain how he can justify the Government, for having ignored the stipulation that they would put Government officers in charge of these cattle trains. What sort of Government officers did the Canadian Government put in charge of the trains? Let me ask in the first place, what was the idea of requiring Government officers to take charge of these cattle trains? It was to see that the inspection took place at the point of entry; to see that the cattle were put in the cars; to see that the cars were properly constructed so as to prevent the droppings of American cattle falling on the track and perhaps coming in contact with our Canadian cattle; to see that the cattle trains were not allowed to stand on sidings in Canada alongside of cattle trains containing Canadian cattle; to see that the cattle cars were properly cleansed and disinfected after the cattle had left Canada and the cars unloaded; to see that before the cattle trains came back to Canada, lest the cars should carry Canadian cattle, these cattle cars were properly disinfected; to see, in fact, that all these paper regulations were lived up to from the time the train entered Canada with its cargo until it returned to the United States. And, Sir, whom was this guardian, this Government officer, to watch? He was to watch the trainmen; he was to watch the Government inspector; he was to watch every man in charge of the train from beginning to end, to see that every man did his duty until the possibility of danger had passed by, the American animals having left our boundaries either at the Suspension Bridge or at Rouse's Point. He was to see this possible danger safely out of this country, and to see that not one of the railway officials, or others, neglected to comply with these stipulations. Now, Sir, whom do you think the Government appointed to watch and guard over these men? They sent out blank appointments by the dozen to the railway company which was promoting this traffic, authorizing it to fill up those documents with the names of the trainmen themselves. The conductors were to watch themselves—men not in the pay of the Government, but the servants of the railways, whose negligence might endanger this traffic; the men whom the English Government would not trust, but required to be guarded and watched, and whom they specially mentioned in the letter by which they suspended the scheduling. The English Government attached supreme importance to the regulation providing for the watching of those trains. And yet, with that order staring them in the face, hon. gentlemen opposite systematically violated the stipulation by sending out these blank appointments and ignoring the spirit of the whole bargain; thus not only endangering this great industry, but characterizing their own conduct as a gross breach of faith—what would be had faith of the worst kind between hostile governments, but absolutely inexcusable as between Canada and the mother country. All the circumstances are such that I am unable to understand how the Canadian Government can justify such a gross breach of the agreement they entered into. This negligence on the part of the Government brought upon us all the disastrous consequences that followed, and gave the people of England a peg on which to hang their argument for scheduling our cattle, whether there was disease among them or not; and the scheduling is now conceded to be a permanent institution. Therefore, when the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) forgets the facts and makes the statements he does, it is my duty in the interests of truth to say exactly where this responsibility lies; and I have no hesitation whatever in asserting that it is not possible for any person to break down the statement of facts which I have presented to this House. Everything I have stated is founded on documents which have been before this country for a length of time, which were uncontradicted at the time they were read in this House, and which cannot be contradicted to-day. The bald fact stares us in the face that by breach of faith, by breach of contract, by negligence of the regulations, by bad faith, the Canadian Government have caused a loss of perhaps a penny a pound on every Canadian animal which we would otherwise be able to export alive to the United Kingdom. The loss of a penny a pound is the loss estimated by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture himself, and this means a loss of from $15 to $20 a head, according to the weight of the animal—a loss which could not be compensated for by the most efficient of all governments, let alone the most inefficient. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this question. I had simply intended to move an amendment to the resolution of my hon. friend

the Minister of Finance, applicable to the traffic question. We are told by the hon. Minister of Agriculture that an Order in Council was passed last Thursday permitting this traffic from the United States via St. John to take place. I am not now criticising that Order in Council; I am not expressing an opinion as to whether it was a wise thing to do or not. I am simply desirous of ascertaining whether the traffic under it is to be conducted in the lax way in which the former traffic was conducted, or whether precautions are to be adopted in this case that would not be open to the criticism that brought trouble upon us before. With that idea, I beg to move that the following be added to the motion:—

And copies of all other Orders in Council and departmental and other regulations applicable to the transit of cattle from the United States through Canada, and a statement showing what provision has been made for the transit of such cattle being carried out according to the requirements of such Order in Council and regulations; also a statement showing what numbers of American cattle, if any, have been shipped via St. John, under the terms of the Order in Council.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will accept the amendment. I am willing to bring down all proper papers.

Mr. SPROULE. With the permission of the House, I would like to say a few words on this question. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) started out with the statement that in order to fulfil the requirements of the agreement between Canada and England, which gave to Canadian cattle the freedom of the English market, all cattle coming into Canada must be quarantined for 90 days. Afterwards, in reading the correspondence which led up to the negotiations which were made, the hon. gentleman showed that the privilege was allowed of transporting through Canada cattle from the United States. He read a great deal that was apropos, and a great deal that was not relevant to the subject whatever. I have here the regulations which were submitted to the British Board of Agriculture, and which were accepted as satisfactory, and I would like to draw the attention of the House to them, because to my mind they contain in a crystallized form all that was agreed to between Canada and England with reference to this matter. They are contained in the Order in Council passed here, and are as follows:—

Section 15.—The transit of cattle and swine between the points mentioned in the next preceding paragraph, shall be subject to such regulations as the Minister of Agriculture shall prescribe, and in accordance with the arrangement which may be made between the said Minister and the Grand Trunk, the Great Western, and the Canada Southern railway companies, for the proper carrying out of the present Order, and the necessary measures to save the live stock of Canada from the dangers of contagion and infection.

Section 16.—Amongst other things, these arrangements of the Minister of Agriculture shall provide :—

And these were the arrangements submitted to the British Board of Agriculture and accepted as sufficient to secure the freedom of Canadian cattle from infection.

Mr. MULOCK. Would you just read anything you can showing that the English Government accepted them.

Mr. SPROULE. I am prepared to show that they were accepted exactly on these conditions.

(a) That an inspection of the said cattle and swine shall be made before they are admitted in transit,—

Not a quarantine of 90 days, but an inspection simply——permission for which transit shall only be given on a certificate or clean bill of health from the inspector,—he being a veterinary surgeon appointed by the said Minister.

A veterinary surgeon was to inspect these cattle, and a clean bill of health was to be given. I contend it was done.

(b) That each train carrying American cattle or swine, or both, from frontier to frontier in bond, shall be accompanied by one of the staff of guardians also to be appointed by the said Minister.

The hon. gentleman says the guardian appointed by the Government was the conductor of the train. Well, I do not see anything in the regulations to prevent a conductor who is properly qualified from seeing that the cattle are properly carried from one point to another, as well as any other person. The hon. gentleman forgot this fact, that every train was in bond and, therefore, had to be taken through, and could not be opened during transit, except at Lyn and Rouse's Point, where the cattle were taken off for feed and water and put on again under special regulations laid down and carried out. There was no necessity for that train being accompanied by a special person because it could not be thrown off on any siding, or stopped or opened.

That the cars and trucks employed for such traffic be specially and exclusively devoted for such purpose.

There has been no effort made to show that they were used for any other purpose.

Mr. MULOCK. I will correct the hon. gentleman. I must ask him to keep to the facts.

Mr. SPROULE. I am keeping to the facts, as I find them here, and in the reports of the officer who was in charge of that work at the frontier at Detroit.

Mr. MULOCK. Will you allow me to make a suggestion ?

Mr. SPROULE. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to interrupt me every minute. I asked his permission, while he was speaking, to interject a question, and the hon. gentleman quietly motioned me to keep quiet. I shall proceed with my remarks, and if I say anything which the hon. gentleman can successfully refute, he will have an opportunity of doing so.

That the cars and trucks employed for such traffic be especially and exclusively devoted to such purpose.

That no Canadian animals shall be carried at any time in the same train, in company with, nor in close proximity to American cattle or swine ; and that no car or truck employed in the transit of American cattle and swine shall be used to carry, at any time, Canadian animals.

It has never been proven that this regulation was violated.

That no unnecessary delay occur with any train engaged in the said transit passing through Canadian territory.

There was no contention that there was any unnecessary delay in the transit through Canada.

That due precautions be taken to retain in the cars or trucks, and disinfect, if need be, the droppings of cattle and swine thus carried in transit.

The hon. gentleman said that there is a regulation providing that some one must be along to see that the excretions or droppings from the cattle must be kept in those cars and disinfected. The regulations do not say so. They say :

That due precautions be taken to retain in the cars or trucks, and disinfect, if need be.

That meant in the event of animals dying, or being found infected with contagious disease. In such cases the cars and trucks should be disinfected before being used afterwards.

That no such cattle or swine, nor their carcasses, in case of death occurring (unless immediately buried under the directions of the proper guardian), nor parts thereof, nor articles having been employed about them, be permitted to remain in Canada, or to come in contact with any persons other than those engaged on the train or thing, whilst thus undergoing the said transit.

Was there any allegation that this was violated ? The hon. gentleman went on to show that there was to be some kind of an inspector, not mentioned in the Act at all, or in the Order in Council or anywhere else, who was to oversee every one, who was to travel with the train, and to overlook the veterinary surgeon and every one else. But there is no such provisions to be found anywhere.

Section 17.—Inasmuch as it is of absolute necessity, owing to the length of the trip on the Grand Trunk Railway, to provide for a place where American cattle and swine can be fed, watered and rested, it is ordered that the said resting place shall be established at the station of Lyn, in the province of Ontario, where a double, isolated inclosure shall be provided by the railway company, selected, established and fitted to the satisfaction of the Minister of Agriculture, before the said company is permitted to transport American cattle or swine over their line. The said inclosure, besides other requisites, shall be provided with a high board fence and a vacant space around the said board fence, the said outside space to be also fenced, in order to prevent any approach to the inner inclosure; the said inner inclosure shall be provided with a special siding, with two locked doors, for the admission of isolation, under key, of the cars or trucks carrying American cattle or swine in transit.

Section 18.—The two fenced inclosures mentioned in the next foregoing section, situated at the Grand Trunk Railway station at Lyn, in the province of Ontario, with all appurtenances therein, or things belonging thereto, are hereby declared to be infected places, in the meaning and for all purposes of the Animals Contagious Diseases Act.

Section 19.—The inclosures through which American cattle and swine enter Canada, in transit at Sarnia, on the Grand Trunk line, must be arranged, fitted and isolated, in like manner, to the satisfaction of the Minister of Agriculture, and the said inclosures, situated on the Grand Trunk Railway grounds on the frontier, near Sarnia station, in the province of Ontario, with everything thereto appertaining, are also declared to be an infected place.

These are the principal and practical regulations under which cattle were allowed to be carried in transit through the country. Afterwards it was found necessary, in the settlement of the North-west Territories, to bring cattle into that country; but it is also known that these cattle were being imported into Canada from five hundred to two thousand miles west of the line on the American side, where pleuro-pneumonia was ever known to exist, and, therefore, when the information was conveyed to the British Board of Agriculture, with full explanations, that Board did not object to allowing the free importation of these cattle into that country. But after it was found that the cattle might be shipped this way, then regulations were made by the Minister of Agriculture, establishing quarantine stations along that frontier, where cattle were detained for a length of time sufficient to satisfy the Minister of Agriculture that disease could not be imported through that channel. The reasons which hon. gentlemen put forward why the British Board of Agriculture raised that schedule were not the reasons given by themselves, or taken into account by them, so far as we know. Then the hon. gentleman says that these regulations were made in 1884. They were made in 1884, and from time to time, this information was communicated to the British Board of Agriculture, but they never raised any valid objections, they never raised any objection which was not satisfactorily explained afterwards, and the business was allowed to continue, as it had gone on heretofore, up to the time that the first infected animals were found in the "Huron" and "Monkseaton" in 1892. Upon examination of the two infected animals discovered, it was declared that these cattle were found to be diseased with pleuro-pneumonia, coming from Canada; and upon that ground alone our cattle were scheduled, and the hon. gentleman cannot successfully show the contrary. He said they only required an excuse. Well, they did not give that as an excuse, but they gave the examination of the cattle, which they believed to be infected with pleuro-pneumonia, as an excuse and acted upon that. If we be allowed to do, as the hon. gentleman has done, give a reason why the schedule was made, we would be amply justified, from what appeared in the press, and from what we know, in believing that the schedule was raised, and that we are shut out from the British market because of a desire to protect the British farmers. We know that the British farmers are pressing very hard for protection, which the British Government refuses to grant, and, to meet their wishes in another way, this schedule on Canadian cattle was imposed, and is equivalent to putting on a protective tariff. We have just ground for believing that that was very largely the reason rather than the pretense that infected animals had been found in those vessels. Afterwards, there were two more cases, in all, I believe, only six; but any one who understands the nature of that disease—whether he be a medical man or a veterinary surgeon—and examined the report made in these cases very closely, can come to but one conclusion, and that is that the data given were not absolutely correct, and that there are sufficient grounds for the belief that there was laxity in that examination which was not compatible with what might have been and ought to have been required of the veterinary surgeons of England, who are doing a great act of unkindness towards us if they did not find—as I contend they did not—absolute cases of pleuro-pneumonia. I believe, and firmly believe, that the embargo will not be raised. And why? Because the British agriculturists do not want our cattle to enter their country without being killed at the port at which they are landed. I believe that, for that reason, no matter what efforts we make, that species of protection which the British farmer enjoys will be continued whether we like it or not. I contend that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has not shown that it was owing to laxity in carrying out the regulations made as a result of the understanding come to between the Minister of Agriculture of Canada and the British Board of Agriculture that Canada was scheduled and we were prevented from sending Canadian cattle into Great Britain without being killed at the port of debarkation, as is at present the law.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to ask if the Minister of Agriculture will authorize the statement made by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). Has the Government information from Washington that Canadian cattle are allowed to be shipped at American ports? Will the Minister of Agriculture answer that question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am to speak in a few minutes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is easy to give the answer. If that information has been received the House could be informed of the fact in a word. The hon. member for East Grey says that they have that information but the hon. Minister of Agriculture has not made that statement, though he has given permission for American cattle to pass through the port of St. John, but no other port.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought every member of the House knew that.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That the Government had that permission from Washington?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Our Canadian cattle were being shipped from American ports long before this permission was given for the shipment of American cattle.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Have the Government authority from Washington to say so?

Mr. SPROULE. It has been done for a long time.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It would seem that this is the kind of reciprocity described by the hon. Minister of Agriculture the other day as "jug-handled" reciprocity. The Americans can ship through our ports, but our Government has no authority from Washington to say that we can ship from theirs.

An hon. MEMBER. Chestnut.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then I should think it would be very palatable to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives); he has had a good many chestnuts in his time. As to the contention of the hon. member for East Grey that the quarantine regulations were in force, I will read what the hon. member said in 1892 when discussing this question. The hon. gentleman has given his statement to-day; I will quote his statement when this subject was discussed on a previous occasion. I quote from "Hansard" of 1892, page 2038:

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the Minister, if he has considered the advisability of establishing a quarantine at Fort Macleod? In that part of the country, I am told, there are a great many cattle crossing the line, and the cattle trade at that centre is a great one at the present time. Great numbers of horses are brought in from the other side, and cattle are brought in in many places without any inspection whatever. I see from the Minister's return that the cattle are inspected, but I do not think that an ordinary inspection is sufficient to detect or prevent danger. The number of cattle in that locality is very large, and, if cattle infected with pleuro-pneumonia were brought in from the other side, as they may be at any time, it will cause great loss to the country.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman will go a little further, he will see that the answer was given that the quarantine regulations were being carried out.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then the hon. gentleman will say now that he was making very reckless statements at that time.

Mr. SPROULE. I made a statement based upon information published in a western paper, which turned out to be incorrect.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) did not base his statement upon information in an American paper; he based it upon the official returns of the department, and he has shown conclusively to the House and to the country that there was the laxity of which the hon. member for East Grey at one time complained. If the hon. member for East Grey has made statements which he finds to be incorrect, now would be a good time to amend those statements. Now, with reference to the publication of this quarantine Order in Council, which was passed last Thursday, and which was referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the Minister of Agriculture characterized in severe terms the newspapers that had published it. It appeared in the "Star" of Friday evening. I noticed it in the morning issue of both the "Mail and Empire" and the "Gazette," and these newspapers are not supposed to contain articles without the authority of the Government, though the Ministers reflect very severely on the reporters for having published this information.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not reflect upon them.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think there should be some information on this subject. I am glad the Minister of Agriculture is going to speak, and I hope that when he speaks he will say something that will settle the minds of the people upon this question. I would like to know if negotiations have been going on between this Government and the government at Washington to carry out this regulation and allow our cattle to be shipped from their ports as well as allowing their cattle to be shipped from ours. This is an important matter to the cattle dealers, and the earliest information should be given with regard to it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think that the statements which have been made by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down need be referred to at very great length. The hon. gentleman is evidently out of his element when he comes to discuss this question, since he does not seem to have inquired into any of the facts. He evidently rose to attempt a little humour at the expense of my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). But I think I need not say that any attempt of that kind will do the hon. member for East Grey no harm either in this House or in the country. The members of this House, as well as the farmers of Canada, who have watched the course of the hon. member for East Grey in connection with agricultural subjects know full well that that hon. gentleman has done good service to the agricultural interests, both as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and as member of this House. Any attempt to work off stale bits of humour on questions of this kind will be appreciated by the country no more than they have been appreciated by this House this afternoon. As to the attempt to show, or rather to insinuate, that the conduct of the reporters in connection with the publication of this information was to be condemned, I have only this to say: having made the statement which I did make, and having promised to investigate the matter, and that statement having been accepted by the hon. hon. leader of the Opposition, I think it would well have become hon. gentlemen on that side of the House not to refer to it again. I have no fault to find with the reporters in connection with this matter. It is their business to collect news, and to get it as best they can, and they must have got it in order to publish it in their correspondence. The debate on the motion of my hon. friend the Finance Minister has taken a range which, I am sure, no hon. member of the House supposed it would take. It is being made the occasion by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) to read his speech of a few years ago, a speech which, if I were not in this House, I would say was made for political effect. And if I were not in this House, I would say that that speech was repeated to-day for political effect rather than for the purpose of benefiting the Canadian live stock trade: and I shall show, by reference to opinions from other sources, that my opinion upon that subject is very well founded indeed. Now, an attack has been made this afternoon—or perhaps insinuated rather than made openly—that in passing this Order in Council the Government in some way removed the quarantine against the cattle of the United States when imported into Canada, the regulation requiring that they should be left 90 days in quarantine before they were allowed to come into this country. Certainly the gentleman who tries to present the question in that form on the floor of this House or elsewhere is either trying to mislead the House and the country or knows nothing at all about the subject. The fact is that in this Order in Council we are not interfering in any way with the quarantine regulations which have been enjoyed for some time, transit privileges of which the British Government and the British Board of Agriculture were perfectly aware, and as against the enjoyment of which by the American people the British Board of Agriculture have never entered a protest, and never said that they should be removed at all. The fact is that this is simply an extension of the transit trade at this particular point, in response to a strong invitation that the Government might help Canadian trade at this particular juncture, and under those circumstances, which would work no injury to the live stock industry of Canada, in other words, we are trying to build up a Canadian trade. It is our duty above every other duty to build up the trade of Canada, and if possible, to keep Canadian ships upon the ocean, plying between Canadian ports and the ports of the old land, in order, Sir, that Canada's trade may extend, and in order that our destiny as a great people should be fulfilled.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friends sneer. They always sneer when any attempt is made by this Government to develop Canadian trade or to extend it. Why, Sir, we have had even the financial leader of the Opposition sneering at a new member of the Government, namely, Sir Charles Tupper, and saying that he had brought discredit upon Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. "Hear, hear," my hon. friend says. I want to tell him that Sir Charles Tupper at that time was fighting the fight of Canada, and establishing and maintaining Canadian credit in the markets of Great Britain, while the man who faces me now was writing to the London "Economist" the most slanderous article that ever a Canadian wrote with regard to Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman, in the first place, states what is absolutely without foundation in fact, if he dares to say that I put one word of slander in that letter. I will read that letter and show it, when he has done.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I need only to repeat what I have said—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman alleges that I had used most slanderous language. I have no objection, if you rule that to be correct, because I shall know how to put myself right.

Mr. SPEAKER. The House knows, of course, that if an hon. member charges another with using slanderous language in this House, he is not in order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not say the hon. member for South Oxford used slanderous words in this House, it would be unparliamentary to do so, even if it were true, and I do not say it was true. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman did do this, and if the hon. gentleman is not ashamed of it, there are hon. gentlemen behind him who are ashamed of it, and there are people in this country who are ashamed of it. What the hon. gentleman did, Sir, was this, and although in the heat of debate a man's tongue may sometimes run away with his judgment, he sat down coolly in his study, after the fight of 1891, when he had been defeated in Canada, and when his fads had been rejected and spurned by the Canadian people, he sat down and deliberately wrote to the London "Economist" an attack on Canadian credit; he sat down and wrote that we were poverty-stricken; he sat down and wrote that the farmers were bled white; he sat down and warned British investors, in almost so many words, that if they had money invested in Canada, they had better look out for its safety. Sir, I am well within parliamentary privilege when I ask this House whether those statements with regard to Canada, were slanderous or not. I say that this was being written and sent abroad among the British people, among whom we desire to keep that credit which guarantees and ensures our future, at a time when Sir Charles Tupper, who has been attacked in this House by the hon. gentleman, was doing his very best in connection with this cattle question, and in connection with every other question, to show, what was the truth, that Canada today was the most prosperous self-governing colony of the British Crown; and that under the flag of Great Britain we were working out a destiny of which Great Britain would in the end be very proud indeed. So, Sir, I say that when we attempt to put Canadian ships upon the sea, or attempt to develop Canadian trade with all other countries in the world, we are met with discouragement from the leaders of the Opposition. But thank Heaven, though we have made mistakes on this great question, the heart of the Canadian people is with us, has been with us, and will be with us to the end. Now, Sir, what did we do? We found that we could establish successfully Canadian steamship lines, we found that from the port of St. John we could have a large trade with the old country, and in order to assist, not that steamship line alone, because this privilege is not confined to that steamship line, but in order to assist all other steamship lines that carry cattle, aye, Sir, and more, in order to reduce freight rates for the Canadian farmer—because, when the steamship lines are established, there must be greater competition, and greater competition must reduce the carrying price to the Canadian farmer—we inquired whether we could, without injury to the life of our Canadian herds, give them the privilege of carrying American cattle. We found by the reports of those best informed upon the subject that we could do it, and we did it; and in spite of all the carping of the hon. gentleman who seeks at this moment to procure political advantage, we will be defended in that action by the cattle traders of Canada, as well as by the tradesmen of Canada generally. Now, what is the fact? We have heard it said this afternoon, you have done this without getting any corresponding advantage from the American people. That shows how little these gentlemen know of the circumstances. For months, Sir, aye, last session, and before last session, we were enjoying this privilege at the hands of the American people, and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) last year discussed this very question of Canadian cattle being shipped in transit through the United States and sent through the American ports to Great Britain, and was answered upon that occasion by myself standing here where I now stand in the House. So that instead of our giving the American people an advantage without getting any advantage in return, for months we have been enjoying a similar advantage from the people of the United States, and have not given them any special advantage in return. But I repeat what I stated at the outset, that we did not do this to advance the interest of the people of the United States, but we did it to advance the interest of our Canadian trade, and in the end to reduce the freight rates at which our cattle could be shipped to the other shore. As to the regulations—as to what is being done—hon. gentlemen opposite want more particulars, they are most anxious to have minute details. I think the wording of the Order in Council gives fully and completely the position of the Government and the state of Canadian herds. What we say is this, that action must be taken without disadvantage to our Canadian herds, and that all these regulations and these restrictions were advised by the officers of our department, required for the protection of the health of Canadian herds, and these must be kept up and maintained, and when this is not done, it will be time for hon. gentlemen opposite to raise a question in this House in connection with carelessness in this matter. Then the question is raised, why do we discriminate against every other Canadian port in favour of St. John? I trust this is not the cropping out of the old policy of setting one point of Canada against another. I trust this is not the old policy of setting east against west, north against south, and province against province. We have no particular liking for St. John, or any other port; what we are anxious to do is to promote Canadian trade, and when any other port asks us for the same privilege we now extend to St. John, when that privilege can be granted without injuring the health of our Canadian herds, when it can be granted for the purpose of promoting Canadian trade, this Government will not consider whether it is St. John, Halifax, Montreal, or any other place, but will be prepared to deal with the question on its merits as every other question is dealt with by the Canadian Government. So much for the Order in Council. Just a word or two in regard to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). The House was scarcely edified by the repetition of the old statement the hon. gentleman made last year, and which the hon. gentleman sought to impress so strongly on the House this afternoon. I want to say this, that the hon. gentleman did not establish his case when he spoke about it in this House, the hon. gentleman never has established his case, and cannot possibly establish his case, for he charged that it was on account of carelessness in connection with the transport trade in cattle the British embargo was placed upon Canadian cattle. It is true the hon. gentleman strung together this statement and the other statement, but he lacked one element of truth all along, which he has never yet furnished, and I challenge him now to produce one tittle of evidence which shows that the British Government placed the embargo upon Canadian cattle on account of any carelessness in connection with quarantine. That is the point, and the hon. gentleman has missed it entirely. It is true the hon. gentleman has dealt with many points in connection with it. He has told the House that great carelessness existed, he has stated that on that account the embargo was imposed, but he forgot that that carelessness, which he has elaborated so often in the House and before the country, occurred eight years before the embargo was established, and that embargo was put on, as the hon. gentleman will find admitted in the statement of the British Board of Agriculture, because pleuro-pneumonia, they said, was found to exist in two cattle taken from a point two thousand miles from the point where carelessness was supposed to exist eight years before the embargo was levied. What is the object which the hon. gentleman has in view? Suppose carelessness had caused the embargo to be imposed, suppose the Government had been guilty of carelessness, was the position taken by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) one of which a Canadian should be proud, was it one that was in the best interests of the Canadian industry and Canadian cattle breeders? On the other hand, was it not calculated to injure beyond measure the Canadian cattle industry, and also give the British Government another reason for not removing that embargo, when their feeling at the time was against such action, the British Government desiring to afford protection to British cattle raisers against competition with the people of the Dominion of Canada? Was not the hon. gentleman's speech calculated to give them one reason more which they might urge for keeping up that embargo rather than removing it, which we hoped would prove the result of the efforts of Sir Charles Tupper in connection with this matter? I ask the hon. member to-day if he has found one leading stockman or one leading stock journal to congratulate him on the course he pursued on that occasion? And let me say the course he has pursued to-day is a course which may be characterized in the same language in which the attack made by him in 1892 or 1893 is characterized, as an attack made, perhaps not for the purpose, but having the effect of leaving upon the public mind the impression that we are relaxing our quarantine regulations, going back on our agreement in connection with this matter, an impression that will make it still more difficult than it is at present to secure the withdrawal of the embargo, and to remove even the faintest hope we now possess of having that embargo against Canada removed in the future. Just a word or two as to what people engaged in the cattle industry thought of the attacks of the hon. gentleman. He is perhaps aware that we have a Canadian Cattle-dealers' and Butchers' Journal, the editor of which watches the trade pretty closely, and knows whether the movements of politicians are in the direction of promoting the best interests of the Canadian cattle trade or not, and I commend the words of the editor of that paper to the hon. gentleman's serious consideration, when he comes to repeat his attacks respecting this question in the House. The article is headed "Mulock on the Rampage," and let it be remembered that this is not a partisan paper, but a journal of the trade. It is as follows:—

Mr. Mulock has again been indulging in his loquacity, and treating the members of the Federal Government to one of his harangues on the question of the Canadian cattle embargo, if indeed it may be called a treat.

He occupied the time of the House on Wednesday afternoon for nearly four hours with a bitter tirade against the Minister of Agriculture and the Deputy Minister, interspersing his speech with copious extracts from the regulations respecting the transportation of cattle in Canada. While pretending to try and benefit the Canadian cattle trade, he has done more harm to this industry by his meddlesome interference than if he had been specially retained for the purpose of advocating a continuance of the embargo. It is quite evident that Mr. Mulock has never paid any attention to the study of pleuro-pneumonia in cattle and how it is likely to be communicated from one animal to another. He has, however, studied the spirit of opposition for pure love of it, and he made the occasion one for indulging in that same to a most unpardonable extent. Nothing could be more calculated to injure the cattle trade of the Dominion, or to play in the hands of its opponents in Great Britain, than the speech of Mr. Mulock. Canadian cattle exporters have suffered recently from American competition, and just now, when there is a chance of their realizing good profits, owing to the short shipments of American cattle caused by western railroad strikes, it is doubly hard to think that a prominent Canadian M.P. should so ruthlessly rush in and try to stop the progress of this once promising industry.

I will leave the hon. member for North York in the hands of those most interested in the trade. Reverting again to the subject under discussion this afternoon, I can only say that while endeavouring to assist in extending the trade, it will be the bounden duty of this Government, as it will be its privilege, to see that while seeking the extension of that trade, which will be to the advantage of Canadian cattle business as well as to Canadian trade generally, the restrictions in the regulations shall not be relaxed to any extent—even the slightest—that will leave the herds of Canada open to any danger.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoken.

Mr. MULLOCK. I moved an amendment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I beg your pardon, you did not.

Mr. MULLOCK. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, I moved the amendment and handed it in.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, you did not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I explain?

Mr. MULLOCK. Excuse me, I have the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULLOCK. I am speaking to the point of order. I concluded my speech by stating that I moved that amendment, and I handed it in, and the Minister of Agriculture said he would accept it as an addition to the main motion. I pressed it then as an amendment, and I press it now as an amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. I was not in the Chair when this amendment was sent up; but I understood the Deputy Speaker to say that, as an amendment to be added to the main motion, Mr. Mulock proposed the following words:—

And of all other Orders in Council and departmental or other regulations applicable to the transit of cattle from the United States through Canada, and a statement showing what provision has been made for the transit of such cattle being carried out according to the requirements of such Orders in Council and regulations; also statement showing what numbers of American cattle, if any, have already been shipped via St. John under the terms of the Order in Council.

May I ask the Deputy Speaker if I am correct in that?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Yes, Mr. Speaker. I may also say that at the time I understood the Government were willing to accept that amendment and add it to the main motion; but I considered it as an amendment to the motion, and for that reason I allowed the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) to speak a second time.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Minister of Agriculture was going to answer the question I asked—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) has already spoken.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, I was just going to ask a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few remarks in reply to the speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague). In that speech he attempted to evade altogether the point raised, and properly raised, and well presented by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has challenged the correctness of the statement made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock), with regard to the responsibility of this Government for the unfortunate condition of our cattle trade in England. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague), with a great deal of power, and exhibition of earnestness, tried to turn the point by talking about other questions rather than the issue before the House. Now, the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) has clearly pointed out that the Government were responsible for the present condition of our cattle trade in England. The Minister of Agriculture said that it was eight years after the irregularities existed, if they exist at all, that our cattle were scheduled in England. What are the facts? One of their own veterinary officials at Port Huron, a veterinary surgeon who had been employed by this Government, over his own signature and on oath, declared that the irregularities did exist, and that cattle were permitted to go through Canada in transit for the United States in violation of the regulations. That man made the statement, that instead of a veterinary surgeon discharging the duties of inspector; in one case a butcher, and in another case a shoemaker was employed by the Government to inspect the cattle and pronounce them free from disease. When this question was before the House on a previous occasion, the Minister of Agriculture stated that the person who made this statement had to flee from Canada and was living in Detroit. But, this person swore to the statement, and if the Government are prepared to prove that it was untrue, why do they not extradite him and prosecute him for perjury, for it was upon his statement that our cattle were scheduled in England. Now, the Minister of Agriculture told us that the Government were bound to develop Canadian trade, particularly in the interest of the agriculturist, and that for that purpose they subsidized steamship lines. Well, Sir, perhaps he thinks the Government are developing Canadian trade on the Pacific coast. They subsidized a line of steamers to Australia, and they are bringing over Australian butter and Australian frozen mutton. Does the Minister think that he is developing the agricultural industries of Canada by doing that? It is stimulating Australian trade, maybe, but it certainly is bringing Australian agricultural products in competition with ours. That is the way he and his Government are helping the farmers of Canada. I presume that the line of steamers by which these American cattle are carried on the Atlantic, is a subsidized line, and I presume that by reason of that subsidy they are enabled to carry American cattle cheaper than are the unsubsidized American lines. And, so, the American farmers are having their cattle carried on Canadian subsidized steamers, and the Canadian farmers are putting their hands in their pockets to pay for this privilege for the American farmers. Is that encouraging Canadian trade?

Mr. HAZEN. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) allow me to make an explanation? I wish to explain to him that the line which has probably carried most of the cattle, or an equal portion of the cattle, from the port of St. John this year, and which, so far as I am aware through correspondence, is most interested in being able to carry American cattle, has not received a dollar of subsidy from this Government. I refer to the Donaldson line.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) missed another point. He says, that the scheduling of our cattle in England was not at all the result of any laxity on the part of the Dominion Government in carrying out the regulations as originally laid down by the English Government. But what are the facts? The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has proven that some 46,000 head of cattle were taken into Canada from the United States for ranching purposes, and in violation of the stipulated conditions upon which these cattle should be admitted. Does the Minister of Agriculture deny that? No, he dare not get up in his place and deny it. What was the result? One of the animals from Pilot Mound, in the North-west Territories, was taken to England and pronounced to be diseased with pleuro-pneumonia. That animal was taken from the very district into which American cattle were admitted contrary to the regulations, and when shipped to England, the English veterinary surgeons pronounced it diseased with pleuro-pneumonia, and the result was that our cattle were scheduled. Will the Minister of Agriculture deny that? He dare not, because the records prove it to be true. The steamer "Winnipeg" went to England with cattle from the North-west, and on that steamer was found an animal pronounced by the English veterinarians to be diseased, and on the strength of that report our cattle were scheduled. Now, Sir, I think that these are very cogent reasons why we are justified in saying, that the laxity of the Canadian Government in carrying out the stipulated terms of the Home Government, has resulted in the present condition of things. Had the Canadian Government carried out the conditions honestly and honourably, and not allowed them to be violated, there would have been no ground whatever upon which our cattle could have been scheduled, and the farmers of Canada would be enjoying the advantage in England, of getting for their cattle, one penny per pound, live weight, more than they do now. But they did not do it. In the next place, to show the liberality of the Government, they agreed with the English Government that a servant of this Dominion should accompany every trainload of cattle from the time it entered Canada until it left Canada, to see that all the stipulated conditions were literally and exactly fulfilled. The Government thought so little of the farming interest that they positively refused to pay the salary of an official of that kind, and they would not appoint one unless the railway companies would pay the whole cost. The railway companies felt that the rates at which they were carrying cattle were so closely cut that they could not afford to pay for a guard, and they refused to do so. The result was that through the parsimony of the Government no such official was appointed, and they issued blank certificates to the railway companies, so that the name of the conductor on each train could be filled in as the guard of the cattle. Whenever a train crossed from Detroit, whoever happened to be the conductor, his name was filled in the blank certificate as the guardian of the cattle on behalf of the Canadian Government, simply because the Government would not pay the salary of an attendant to accompany the train. That is a fact. The correspondence between the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway Companies will prove the statement I make to be true. The result was that step by step the indifference and neglect displayed by the Government brought about the condition of things we have to-day; and, notwithstanding the eloquence of the Minister of Agriculture and his attempt to escape the condemnation which his department and the Government of which he is a member deserve at the hands of the farmers of this country, I tell him that he will not and cannot escape. Hon. gentlemen opposite have got to understand that, and no eloquence and no bluster that the Minister of Agriculture can use to deceive and mislead the people will accomplish the object he has in view, as he will find out when he goes on the stump and attempts to explain this transaction. Our cattle trade is an exceedingly important one to the farmers of this country, and the advantages they enjoyed in Great Britain should have been preserved to them. And Sir Charles Tupper was in England—a man who has cost us personally $16,000 or $17,000 a year—

Mr. FOSTER. And cheap at that.

Mr. McMULLEN—to attend to that duty. But what did he ever do? The only thing he ever did was on one occasion. One morning, when a certain shipment of cattle arrived at Liverpool, he went there, and I do not know what he did—whether he felt the heat of their horns or their tails. At any rate, he got them unloaded and freed from the quarantine. And this single event has been trotted out on every occasion, season after season, to prove the valuable services rendered to this country by Sir Charles Tupper in protecting our cattle trade. But, Sir, we are living in an unfortunate time, the farmers of this country are suffering, and the responsibility lies at the door of this Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It has been well observed recently, Mr. Speaker, by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) that loyalty is the last refuge of a scoundrel. What my hon. friend meant by that was not that a loyal man is a scoundrel; very far from it. But of all the mean tricks that can be played, to profess loyalty which men do not feel is the meanest, save one, and that is to impeach the loyalty of better men than themselves. Now, Sir, I have a word or two to say touching the letter to which the hon. Minister of Agriculture has made reference. Sir, that hon. gentleman had the assurance to state that I had slandered my native country—that I had issued statements which were slanders in their effect. It is not my habit, Sir, to shrink from the consequences of any word or act of mine, and I am not going to do so now. I stand here to-day prepared to justify to the fullest every syllable, jot or tittle in my letter to the "Economist," of the 13th of February, 1892. But, first of all, let me state to the House why it was that I was compelled to write that letter. It had come within my knowledge that men receiving salaries from the taxes of the people of this country were making use of the positions they had in England to slander one-half, and that the better half, of the people of Canada. It was within my knowledge that the High Commissioner's office was a mint of slanders of the vilest kind—slanders against his own people and his own country—slanders against the loyalty of men who, as I say, were infinitely more loyal to the Empire than those men whose acts have within the last fortnight disgraced Canada as no other acts have ever done. And I am told by one of that nest of traitors—as one of their own colleagues described them—and what the hon. gentleman's own colleagues think of him, let the hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron), or the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) say—that I have slandered my country. The hon. member for West York has told us what he thinks about that hon. gentleman—and, by the bye, I have not heard that the hon. gentleman, with all his braggadocio, has taken any steps to vindicate his wounded honour, or to bring an action against the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), or the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), whoever it is. When he does this, it will be time enough for him to dare to talk to any man in this House of honour or truth or loyalty. Now, Sir, I will give the hon. gentleman and the House what I did say in my letter to the "Economist," and I will comment on it, sentence by sentence, so that there will be no mistake:

Sir, I have observed that there has been a steady attempt for some considerable length of time, in the communications published in the English press as coming from Canada, to misrepresent the actual economic condition of that country, and also the objects of the Liberal party in Canada in pressing for free trade with the United States.

So I say to-day.

As regards the first point, it is well known to you, and to your readers, that Canada has been engaged for the last thirteen years—

I might now say seventeen years——in the operation of trying to increase the collective wealth of the country by doubling or trebling its taxation.

Well, Sir, where is the slander there?

But it is not quite equally well known on your side of the Atlantic, that it has become painfully apparent, for some time back, to every one who has been at the pains to examine the evidence which has accumulated on the subject, that, even in that comparatively short space of time, this most ill-advised policy has resulted in a tremendous exodus of the very choicest portion of the population of Canada, and in a very grave depreciation in the selling values of farm lands and of town and village property throughout all the older sections of the Dominion, including Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

Which of these hon. gentlemen will charge that as a slander? Is it the hon. Minister of Finance, who represents a county which has lost 5,000 souls, including natural increase, if not more, within the period of ten years? I should like to know, Sir, who will stand up here and tell us that the selling value of farm lands has not depreciated. I should like to know who will stand up and tell us that the value of town and village property has not depreciated throughout this Dominion.

This has been accomplished, as usual in such cases, by an immense increase in the aggregate indebtedness of the Dominion, in the shape of large additions to its federal, provincial and municipal debts, and also to the mortgage debts incurred by private individuals and liabilities incurred for the construction of railroads—by far a greater part of all which obligations are held abroad.

Who is there to deny that statement? Not our public accounts; not our municipal accounts; not the evidence of our loan companies. Again, I ask, who is there to deny the statement?

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Minister of Agriculture has run away.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, we can spare him.

Briefly, in these thirteen years there has been a great displacement of wealth, caused mainly by artificial legislation, but, as regards the older provinces, absolutely no increase at all in the collective wealth of the community.

That is my opinion to-day. That is the opinion I have justified times without number, here, on the hustings, wherever those hon. gentlemen have dared to meet me.

Two or three cities, and perhaps a score of towns, have increased considerably, and a few hundred individuals, who have been privileged to tax their fellows for their private advantage, have grown rich by this system of legalized robbery; but the great mass of the population, notably the agricultural class, are distinctly poorer and less prosperous than they were twelve years ago.

I said that, and I maintain that. The great masses of the people are poorer, and a few hundred individuals have grown richer. We have grown a few score of millionaires, and we have impoverished many hundreds of thousands of excellent agriculturists.

Mr. FOSTER. That sounds familiar.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not think my hon. friend opposite me (Mr. Foster) would be quite such a—it would not be parliamentary to say what I was going to say—but would be quite so indiscreet as to talk of this as slander. If it be, most assuredly not a word has been said here which I have not said again and again on the floor of Parliament, as the hon. gentleman well knows.

Take the returns of the present census. New Brunswick, with an area of 30,000 square miles, inhabited by about sixty thousand families, has added just sixty-one souls to her population from 1881 to 1891.

That was not a slander, but an underestimate, because I am informed that New Brunswick added but thirty-six souls to her population during those ten years, from 1881 to 1891, and, so far, I am willing to submit to correction.

Nova Scotia, with a population of 440,000 souls in 1881, has done a little better, having gained some nine thousand nine hundred people in ten years, or rather less than one year's natural increase.

Is that a slander or is it the truth stated by our own census returns?

Ontario and Quebec, with unlimited quantities of unoccupied land, show an increase of perhaps 1 per cent per annum, being rather less than that of England, and that in despite of an alleged immigration of nearly 900,000 people.

Which of those facts does the hon. gentleman dispute? Do hon. gentlemen opposite—any of them—dispute the fact that, according to the Government records, we brought in nine hundred thousand people—I believe $86,000 is the exact figure? Do they dispute that the Government returns show that the increases of those two provinces are less than 1 per cent, or about 1 per cent per annum?

In one word, if the assertions and official statements of the present Government are to be relied on, and these nine hundred thousand immigrants did really come to Canada, as they assert, what, between immigrants who came to Canada and who have quitted it, chiefly for the United States, and the loss of its own natural increase, which has disappeared in the same direction, the Dominion has lost not less than one million and a half of people in the last ten years.

Well, I believe I grievously understated the facts. I believe the loss of the population was far in excess; but I put it barely at one and a half millions.

As to the amount of taxation, the agricultural class has been simply bled white.

Sir, no more unjust system of taxation, as regards agriculturists, was ever inflicted on any people as that which disgraces, and will disgrace, probably only for a few months longer, the statute-book of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. You have never been able to make the people believe it yet, to any great extent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have. If my hon. friend would look at the election returns of 1891, he would see that an overwhelming proportion of the agriculturists of Canada believed in and supported our policy. Where we were defeated was not in the agricultural districts. We were not defeated, in point of fact, at all, but gerrymandered out of our victory. We had a majority of the electorate, we had a huge majority of the agricultural electors. It was only in the cities and towns, where certain influences, well known to the hon. gentleman, could be brought to bear, that we suffered any defeat. I went on to say:

Over and above the taxes actually paid to the Dominion treasury, to be expended for so-called federal purposes, they have been mulcted during all these years, under the protective system, of at least an equal amount, which is either totally wasted or goes into the pockets of a very small number of protected manufacturers.

And so I say to-day. I say that I have proved it again and again. If there be such a thing as an honest and intelligent protectionist, every such protectionist will admit, that it is of necessity the case, that you cannot have a protective system without taking a huge sum out of the people's pockets beyond that which goes into the treasury.

The exact amount levied, or, to speak more accurately, pillaged, in this way, can hardly be estimated.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask my hon. friend if that word "pillaged" was interlarded by him into that part of the letter?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is part of the letter. I am not interlarding anything. You may depend upon it that I do not shrink from reading or justifying what I have written or said. On that point the hon. gentleman can, if he chooses, bear accurate testimony.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought it was too good a word for the hon. gentleman to have missed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The word represents accurately the effect of a protective system of taxation.

In fact, the Canadian tariff, which has been, in the most literal manner, dictated by the protected manufacturers,—

The hon. gentleman knows it, his predecessors know it, I can prove that while the men who wrote out this tariff were paid by the Government, they were paid more by the Manufacturers' Protective Association than they received from the Government.

—is so constructed that, for every single dollar paid into the treasury, three, four, five, and even ten dollars are taken out of the pockets of the consumer. Nay, in many instances, the tax is made absolutely prohibitive, so that the public are heavily taxed without any benefit to the revenue: e.g., the duty on sugar is now so arranged (for the advantage of half a dozen sugar refiners—

I do not see any of them here to-night. They are probably in Cape Breton.

—that the Canadian consumer is obliged to pay a tax of nearly two millions a year, of which only the most insignificant fraction finds its way into the public treasury.

I stand to that, and I have proved that. There is no possibility of denying it. That was the case until the recent modification by which a certain sum goes into the treasury, but the amount taken out of the public for the benefit of the protected manufacturers remains unchanged.

Taken altogether, it is well within the mark to say, that, while the present nominal amount of taxation of the Dominion is about thirty-one millions of dollars, the general actual taxation, i.e., the sum taken out of the pockets of the people for the benefit of the protected manufacturers, in addition to that paid into the treasury, is certainly not less, and is probably a good deal more, than sixty millions ($60,000,000).

I say it is. I do not go the extreme length, although I do not deny what my hon. friend from North Simcoe, and his friends, are in the habit of giving us as the amount taken out of the public, namely, $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 a year. But I content myself with a most conservative estimate of barely $60,000,000. Then I go on to say:

Such an amount of taxation levied for thirteen years is a very formidable burthen for a country like Canada to bear, and is undoubtedly one prime cause of the great loss of population, and of the immense depreciation in the values of town and farm property (with a few special localities excepted), which has been such a marked feature in the economic condition of Canada during the last ten years.

That, I believe to be the case. I believe that our most vicious and faulty system is more responsible than any other single cause—though there are other causes—for the condition in which we find ourselves to-day. And further, Sir—and this is probably what stings these hon. gentlemen, because it is even truer than the undoubted fact that I have quoted before:

It would be well if this were all, but, unfortunately, the economic results of the protective system adopted by Canada in 1879, grievous as they are, fade almost into insignificance compared with the moral and political pollution it has brought in its train.

And to that ten times more even than to my statement as to the economic facts I adhere to-day.

In this, as in many other cases, the indirect or secondary consequences of the fiscal system, misnamed protection, are even more pernicious than its direct ones. In the first place, by deluding the people into the idea that they can enrich themselves by increasing their taxation, the old, wholesome, natural repugnance to increased taxation and expenditure is wholly done away with, and the Government are encouraged to enter on a career of extravagant expenditure, which invariably involves, per se, a great amount of corruption in one form or other—as has been very notably the case in Canada.

As was proved up to the hilt in 1891 and succeeding sessions. Is there, Sir, one hon. gentleman who does not remember the McGreevy-Counolly investigation, is there one hon. gentleman who does not remember the terrible flood of scandal that disgraced the reputation of Canada throughout the world, and which culminated in this House but a few weeks before I penned this letter?

In the second place, by making it the direct personal interest of a considerable number of active business men, many of whom are wealthy, and all of whom have the control of large sums of money, to support a government which gives them a free hand to tax the rest of the community for their special benefit, you lay broad and deep the foundations of a colossal system of organized corruption, in the face of which honest government becomes an impossibility.

Is there one honest man in Canada who doubts the literal truth of that, is there one honest man who doubts it? Silence all.

In such a case bribery becomes a pure matter of business routine.

And so it does.

The Government gives the protected manufacturers power to tax the country for their own purposes, and the manufacturers, whenever called upon, assess themselves in whatever amounts the Government require, in order to enable it to carry the elections—

Cape Breton and elsewhere.

The thing is done openly and shamelessly by both parties to the transaction. Prior to the elections of 1882, of 1887, and of 1891, Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues deliberately called the protected manufacturers together, and demanded, and obtained, from them such sums as they deemed necessary for the purpose of debauching the electorate, pledging themselves, in return, not to alter the tariff to the detriment of the said contributor, which compact was faithfully carried out and impudently avowed.

And you know, Sir, that that was the exact state of the case.

The facts are too notorious to be denied; and it is to this deliberate conspiracy, on the part of the Government of Canada with the interested manufacturers, that the intolerable corruption which disgraces Canadian public life, is due.

I say that every letter, every jot, every tittle of what has been proved, and proved beyond the possibility of a contradiction on the floor of this House and elsewhere.

When the government of any country deliberately abdicates its highest functions in favour of a few selfish rings, and permits its Minister of Finance to become, in the most literal sense, the mere mouthpiece of the manufacturers' association, in return for the right to toll the proceeds of the robberies for political purposes, it is idle to expect anything from a government or a legislature elected by such means and under such auspices, except precisely the results with which every newspaper in England and the United States were ringing during a great part of the past year.

It is not merely the policy, but the fixed determination, of the Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada to overthrow this system at all hazards, and, after very full deliberation, they have come to the conclusion that the best, and probably the only really available method which presents itself for that purpose, lies in introducing a system of perfect continental free trade or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States.

Yes, and I say so still.

Mr. FOSTER. How about Mr. Snider?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What Snider?

Mr. FOSTER. Ask your leader.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to explain?

Mr. FOSTER. I mean the Mr. Snider who said that although he was a protectionist he took all sorts of grist at his mill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When my esteemed friend, Mr. Snider, comes here the hon. gentleman will find, I think, that his views harmonize admirably with the views expressed in this letter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. Then he has an admirable way of concealing them when he speaks to the electorate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps he has taken a lesson from the hon. gentleman.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To the best of my recollection, Mr. Speaker, though I am open to correction, I had got as far as this sentence when the House rose: "It is not merely the policy, but the fixed determination of the Liberal party of the Dominion of Canada to overthrow this system at all hazards," &c. Before recess I had been explaining to the House some of the circumstances which had caused this letter to be written, and, as I had got so far, I think that, even at the risk of inflicting a number of pearls of truth upon those who may not appreciate them, I must complete the document in question, with your kind permission. I went on to say, Sir,—and to this I beg the hon. gentleman's attention—

Theoretically, no doubt, free trade with all nations would be preferable; but, practically, and as a matter of fact, free trade with the United States is vastly more valuable to Canada than free trade with all the rest of the world would be with the United States left out. Moreover, there is a fair prospect of obtaining the one, and none at all, humanly speaking, of obtaining the other—at least, within any reasonable space of time.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you hang on to that still?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I most undoubtedly do. I hold that, as the hon. gentleman may learn when he studies his geography, Canada is a part of North America continent, and it is a North American nation. Consequently what I stated is the exact and literal truth. I went on to say:

Canada, no doubt, had very great opportunities in the past, which Canada very foolishly threw away, of securing for herself a fiscal system very nearly as purely free trade as that of Great Britain, and also a very low rate of taxation; but these have passed and cannot now be recovered.

Sir, I will not stop to enlarge upon that; it would take me back into what has become past history. But I do repeat that in my judgment and belief very few countries ever entered upon the career of national life with the extraordinary advantages Canada had in 1867; and very few indeed have made such exceedingly bad use of them. I proceeded then to say:

In these circumstances, the two-fold problem which to-day confronts Canadian statesmen worthy of the name, is how to restore a fair measure of material prosperity to the great mass of their countrymen, and check the tremendous exodus now going on of the very choicest heart of their people to the United States; and, what is even more urgent, how to put a stop to the colossal system of organized corruption which is making Canada a veritable bye-word among English-speaking nations for venality and mal-administration.

Sir, it was with no slight regret that I penned those words. But I think that you, Sir, were in the Chair in 1891, and your memory will carry you back to what occurred in this House and in the committee rooms of this House in that year. You will know, Sir, that in making that statement, grave as it is, I spoke the exact and literal truth.

Free trade or absolute reciprocity with the United States will undoubtedly do more than anything else which can be devised with any prospect of success to restore material prosperity, and to enable us to keep our own people in our own country—in fact, as I have said above, in our present condition it is the one practicable measure which will do so, while as to the second object, it is equally plain that absolute freedom of interchange with the United States means a deathblow to every corrupt ring in Canada and, at the same time, by reason of the fact that, while it will immensely increase the general wealth of people, it will, temporarily at any rate, diminish the revenue collected under the present system, it will enforce an amount of economy on the administration which will compel them to be honest, even if not so inclined, and will make it out of the question to comply with the outrageous demands for fresh bribes in the shape of unprofitable and utterly uncalled-for public works and additional provincial subsidies, which are of continual recurrence as matters now stand.

And I am in the judgment of the House whether I at all exaggerated the state of things that then prevailed. One thing I think ought to be clear to all intelligent Englishmen, and that is that it is utterly impossible that Canada can prosper under her present conditions.

Isolated, and in danger of being still more completely isolated, from trade and commerce with the entire continent to which she belongs geographically, losing her population at the rate of one million and a half in ten years (if the official statements of the present Government are to be relied on), and subject, at the same time, to a system of taxation and of organized political corruption such as you have happily been strangers to since the days of Walpole or Charles II.

Now, Sir, if these statements can be proved untrue, I will retract them at once, but until they are disproved, I claim the right to make them, every one of which, remember, I have made on the floor of Parliament time and again, before this letter was printed. I claim the right of making those statements when and where I please, and that right I mean to exercise. And here,

Sir, I proceeded to deal, to some extent, with this same question of loyalty:

The Liberal party of Canada, and, indeed, the great bulk of the people of the Dominion, wish well to the mother country, and it is very far from their desire to do anything which, in the long run, can injure her interests; but their duty in the premises is plain.

Sir, that may be disloyal, if so, I would like to know where the disloyalty comes in. Here I lay down what I believed to be the duty of all true Canadians:

As Canadians, they must consult the advantage of Canada first, and if it be—as it appears to them it is, beyond all possible controversy—for the best moral and material interests of Canada to form a commercial treaty which will ensure perfect free trade with the United States, you, on your side, must be content to allow them to try the experiment. It is, and always has been, my own very strong desire that this measure should be so conducted that it might ultimately result in removing all possible causes of conflict between the two great divisions of the British race, and end in bringing them together in a firm and durable alliance; and (given only a very moderate amount of prudent statesmanship on the part of the English Government) I see every reason to hope that that end may be accomplished; but, whether or no, I see still more clearly that some very radical change in the position of affairs in Canada must be brought about, and that very speedily, or else that the Canadian confederation must perish, rotten before it has had time to become even half ripe, as the result of the vice and folly with which its affairs have been administered.

I have not deemed it worth my while to dwell at length on the dishonest and dishonourable pretense advanced by the late Sir John A. Macdonald and his fellows, to the effect that their policy of corruption and extortion was prompted by their fervent desire to preserve the connection between Canada and the mother country.

In Canada such allegations are treated with the contempt they merit; and in England the fact that those who make them are the identical persons who, in 1879, deliberately turned their backs upon the fiscal system of Great Britain, and deliberately adopted the system in vogue in the United States—with full knowledge of the results which would inevitably follow—ought to be answer enough to any one who pretends to believe that loyalty to England is at the bottom of the system of protection in Canada or elsewhere.

But, in truth, the question between the two Canadian parties is in reality an economic one, and, in the long run, resolves itself into this—shall Canada be governed for the benefit of the people of Canada, or for the profit of a few hundred protected manufacturers, backed by a subsidized press and purchased majority in the legislature?

To talk of loyalty in such a connection is little short of political blasphemy, and I can only express my surprise that such a shallow subterfuge should have obtained even a momentary credence in the mind of any Englishman of even average intelligence.

I have the honour to remain,

Your obedient servant,

RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

Kingston, January 25, 1892.

Sir, as I stated before recess, my reason for writing that letter and publishing it in the "Economist," where I knew right well it would come under the eyes of many thoughtful and intelligent men, was not to slander my own country, but it was to defend the Liberal party and the Liberal policy from these slanders which, in a double stream, had been for many years systematically hurled against them. That was my object, and that object, I have reason to know, was attained. Sir, I am not going to take my notions of loyalty from gentlemen who forge Her Majesty's proclamation to the Indians. I have a better warrant than that. Sir, if the hon. gentleman wanted to know how these things impress intelligent Englishmen whose opinions are worth attention, he might consult my Lord Grey's pamphlet on the condition of the colonies, published within a few weeks after this letter of mine was published, and they will see how my production commended itself, or did not commend itself, to the opinion of an Englishman of weight and knowledge.

Mr. FOSTER. It was eminently successful.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, have you got Lord Grey's pamphlet?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, you had better get it, read it, and it will do you good.

Mr. FOSTER. You might tell us what it says.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My modesty prevents me from quoting it, but I have no doubt if the hon. gentleman is desirous of getting hold of it, he can find it, though I do not know whether it is in our library. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say this in conclusion. I want to give one word of warning to hon. gentlemen opposite. In my judgment, loyalty is a good deal like religion; those who feel the most usually speak the least about it. I remember perfectly well in my youth once hearing a very eminent merchant asked how it was that he was so successful in avoiding bad debts, and I recollect very well that the rule he gave was, that he never, by any chance, trusted any fellow for a dollar, without good security, who was in the habit of talking much of religion. Sir, these sneers at the loyalty of Her Majesty's Opposition are in exceedingly bad taste, and exceedingly to be deprecated. They are doubly a mistake at this particular moment. I beg to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they are the very height of impolicy, looking to the general interests of the Empire. Were it true that Her Majesty's Opposition, who, as I well believe, represent the larger half of the people of Canada to-day, were disloyal, what chance have you in Canada of maintaining a united front? But, Sir, they are very risky sneers for hon. gentlemen to indulge in. Now, I pass over their recent exploits, enough has been said on that subject. But I would ask hon. gentlemen, when they indulge in taunts against the loyalty of the Opposition, do they know any history at all—I do not speak of history in the large sense, I speak of the history of their own country. Do they know anything of Canadian history? Do they know anything of the history and antecedents of their most trusted leaders? Sir, who were their leaders, and what were their antecedents? Do they want me to review them to-day, or to state to the House all I know about the loyalty of the trusted leaders of the Conservative party? All I know about the loyalty of Sir John A. Macdonald, all I know about the loyalty of the late esteemed, and worthily esteemed, Sir George E. Cartier, all I know about the loyalty of Sir John Rose, of Sir Alexander Galt, of Sir John Abbott, of Sir D. L. Macpherson? Sir, gentlemen who live in glass houses had better not throw stones. Now, I do not want to stir up any ill-feeling.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I do not. I deprecate all this rubbish about the superior loyalty of one side or the other. I am not going to accuse hon. gentlemen opposite of being disloyal because they tax English goods double the amount they tax American goods; but I do say that it is a queer proof of their loyalty. I am not going to accuse them of being disloyal, although there are people who might say that that is a very disloyal thing to do. Sir, I will tell hon. gentlemen one little story. I do not tell many stories in this place, but I think my stories can be depended upon, and this one occurred within my own presence.

Mr. FOSTER. You told a lot in that letter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, Sir, I told a lot of good, historical truth in that letter. But this is a true story that I am going to tell you now. In my early days I used to hear a good deal about loyalty, and I am bound to say that I had my prejudices like other people. I remember, in particular, that I used to consider Mr. William Lyon Mackenzie as about the epitome of everything that was disloyal. I continued in that belief for a considerable time, until, one evening, I was assisting at a sitting of the old legislative assembly of the two provinces. Sir, I recollect at that time that my lamented and esteemed friend, Sir George E. Cartier, of whom I always desire to speak with the highest respect, had just returned from a visit to England where he had dined with Her Majesty at Windsor. Her Majesty had bestowed very high attention upon him, deservedly, I think. Her Majesty had invited him to sing a song, but I never heard that Her Majesty repeated the request.

But on that occasion, Sir George Cartier returned to his native land, brimful and running over with loyalty. I remember he took occasion, or perhaps it was William Lyon Mackenzie, rather to twit my excellent friend on the subject of the latter's reception. Sir George retorted, as he usually did, pretty sharply. After the passage of arms, William Lyon Mackenzie told Sir George Cartier that he might have dined with Her Majesty and might have sung songs to Her Majesty but that he had evidence that Her Majesty valued him twice as highly as Sir George, and thereupon he took from his desk an ancient yellow parchment—and this was a genuine proclamation given in the Queen's name, signed Victoria R., and addressed to all her loving subjects—offering a reward for their two heads, £1,000 for that of William Lyon Mackenzie and only £500 for that of George Etienne Cartier. From that time I made up my mind that it was perhaps wise not to talk too much about loyalty, and I suggest to hon. gentlemen opposite that while we will not be in the slightest degree unprepared if they choose to cross swords on this matter, and if they want an historical discussion beginning with the date of the conflagration of the Parliament buildings in Montreal and going down to the present time, we will be prepared to meet them, it is not for our dignity, for our honour or for the welfare of Canada that we should continue to indulge in this kind of useless and unprofitable recrimination, and I do not propose to pursue the subject further. As to the matter under discussion, from which I am bound to say this is a little digression, though not an unprovoked digression, for I am perfectly peaceable when I am let alone, as hon. gentlemen may discover, I do not accuse the High Commissioner—with whom I will settle scores when he comes up from Cape Breton, if he ever does come here—with being responsible for the scheduling of our cattle, but I cannot help feeling that the Government were sorely to blame for negligence in this matter. I am afraid my hon. friend proved only too conclusively that we have been playing fast and loose with the regulations. There can be no doubt that very grave injury was inflicted on the people in this matter and particularly on the agriculturists. It is a matter of very great moment to us to retain the control of the British market. We were the only people permitted to send our live cattle in there. We have lost that privilege. How much that loss may amount to per head I am not prepared to say, but my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) did not much overstep the loss when he placed it at a penny a pound depreciation in the value of our cattle, amounting to $15 or $20 for each fat ox.

Mr. MULOCK. It was the department's calculation, not mine.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whether we are able to repair that loss, I do not know, but I am afraid that the door having once been shut, bolted and barred against us it will require more than the strength of hon. gentlemen opposite to enable us to re-open it, because the British agriculturist is ever ready to take advantage of any opportunity to keep out our cattle. It is the duty of the Government under these circumstances to bestir themselves, and take every possible measure to obtain for us a market which to some extent may replace the one we have lost, and I hope and trust they will apply themselves to that task with all diligence.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

REPLY TO ADDRESSES TO HER MAJESTY AND PRINCESS BEATRICE.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to read a telegram sent in reply to the address of condolence passed the other night by this House to Her Majesty:

To His Excellency the Governor General.

London, 28th January, 1896.

Your Lordship's telegram of 26th January, forwarded to Her Majesty the Queen, received. I have Her Majesty's command to convey to the Dominion Parliament, on behalf of herself and Princess Beatrice, their appreciation of the kind message expressing sympathy in their sad bereavement.

(Sgd.) CHAMBERLAIN.

SUPPLY.

Mr. FOSTER moved:

That the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid I must object to this motion. It is contrary to all custom and all rule that we should proceed to consider the Estimates without having the Auditor General's Report before us. The public accounts are of no value to us, and I will strongly advise the Minister of Finance not to press his motion. Nothing can possibly be gained by doing so except to subject hon. members to an unnecessary and long-winded discussion. The hon. gentleman himself will see that without the Auditor General's Report there is no possibility of pursuing the discussion of the items. If the Public Accounts were prepared in their old form, this course might possibly be followed, even though then it would be very unusual to go on with scarcely twelve hours' notice, for the Estimates were only laid on the Table of the House late last night, and hon. members on this side of the House have not had an opportunity of considering them. I have not had time up to the present moment to look over them carefully, although I have a general idea of them; but the rights of other members besides the leaders must be considered. The chief reason why I object to this course being pursued is the absence of the Auditor General's Report, without which we are not in a position to proceed with the discussion. I hope the motion will not be pressed.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be willing to accede to the suggestion of my hon. friend if any fair objection had been taken, but I think he will agree that no such objection has been offered. I recollect that in previous years the House considered the Estimates the day after they were laid on the Table, and on one occasion without the Auditor General's Report having been presented.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In what year?

Mr. FOSTER. The year before last, I think. All I propose to take are the Civil Government Estimates, not including contingencies, and as regards those items the Auditor General's Report contains nothing more than may be found in the Estimates themselves. If contingencies were to be taken up or general appropriations for the public service there would be force in the hon. gentleman's contention; but as I only propose to take the Estimates indicated, his objection is not a strong one. I proposed last night to the hon. gentleman that we should transpose the order of business for to-day and Thursday, and I did so in order not to be met with the objection which the hon. gentleman has raised; and even now if the hon. gentleman will consent, we will go on with the private member's work, and I may then be allowed to make the motion at the end of the sitting to take Thursday for Government business. One or the other of these courses would be perfectly fair, and I do not mind which is taken.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All I said when the hon. gentleman spoke to me was that I would confer with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition on the subject, and let him know.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Does the hon. gentleman offer any objection to thus proceeding now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid from what my hon. friend besides me intimates—and they have rights as well as the leaders of the House—they object strenuously to the Estimates being proceeded with. I think the common sense of the House will see that we should have the Auditor General's Report in our hands before we are asked to go on with the Estimates. There can be no good reason for such overpowering hurry in proceeding with the Estimates without the Auditor General's Report being on hand, and it is not our fault that it has not been brought down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

We have already been twenty-six days in session.

Mr. MULOCK. You must make allowances for the strike.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have been here for 26 days and the House should not take up the Estimates without the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not proposed to take one hour from private members.

Mr. MULOCK. You have taken Thursday.

Mr. FOSTER. Private members have to-day.

Mr. MULOCK. It is a Government motion we have been discussing.

Mr. FOSTER. Really, there does not seem to be anything strong in the objection, that we should not take up, simply, the items for Civil Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have been in this House, at all events, as long as the Finance Minister, and I do not remember that we were ever asked to go into Supply before the Report of the Auditor General was in our hands.

Mr. FOSTER. I remember that was the case one session.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must say that I have no recollection whatever of that having occurred, and I wish the hon. Finance Minister would mention the session. We are establishing a precedent for ourselves in this matter here, and if we go into Supply now, it will be cited at a future occasion as an evidence that the Report of the Auditor General is not necessary to the members when discussing Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. The House has always that in its own hands.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no doubt the Government is anxious to get along, and we have no desire to prevent them getting along, but the country expects us to discharge our duty as members of the Opposition in this House; and if we are lax in the discharge of that duty the country will have the right to find fault. Surely, the Minister does not want us to go it blind in Supply without having before us the vouchers for last year's expenditure. It may be true that he will go into items that are voted from year to year, but nevertheless I object to the principle of proceeding without the Auditor's Report. I well remember on one occasion, when the hon. member for London (Sir John Carling) was Minister of Agriculture, we were in Supply, and the report of the Department of Agriculture not being down, we made the reasonable request that the items should be postponed until that was done. We sat all night and until 11 o'clock the next day, persisting in what we believed were our rights, and the next morning, when the late Sir John Macdonald came into the House, he admitted that the Opposition were clearly within their rights in resisting the passing of the items until the report was in our hands. The report of the Auditor General is an important book, and forms the basis of almost the entire of the criticisms on which the expenditure of the Government are based. Hon. gentlemen should have an opportunity of studying it so that they may know how to deal with that expenditure, in the best interests of the country. It will not expedite business, if the Minister of Finance is disposed to rush us into Committee of Supply without our being in possession of the necessary information.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to rush hon. gentlemen into business that they are not fully qualified to undertake. As to this forming a precedent, the House has that always in its own hands. I only ask, to take up the Civil Government estimates to-night, in order to expedite business. Surely, having been here a month, we should not interpose any obstacle to the transaction of business, unless it is absolutely necessary. We are all gentlemen who have business to do; our time is somewhat precious, and the country expects us to do its business here. As to the Report of the Auditor General not being down, it does not affect to any material degree the Civil Government Estimates for the permanent officers of the departments. The Public Accounts have been before hon. gentlemen for some weeks, and they give the salaries paid to these different permanent officers. The Estimates, I ask the House to go into do not at all include temporary help where per diem allowances are paid, at irregular periods, and the like of that. There are no contingencies involved, and all the information regarding these items is contained in the Public Accounts. If the House wishes to do business, it can do it, and at no disadvantage whatever. I made a proposition last night which had an element of fairness in it, namely: to transpose the Private Members day for the Government day, taking the two Government days as Thursday and Friday, instead of Tuesday and Friday. Hon. gentlemen did not appear willing to accede to that, but I think they cannot fairly object now to take up that part of the Estimates to which I have referred. I would impress upon them not to continue the objection against the motion. When we go into Supply, all proper information will be given that may be asked for, and business can be done without any detriment to the fullest discussion, even though the Auditor General's Report may not be down.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, the hon. the Finance Minister will see that we are not both ready to pull at the same time. We were here early; the hon. gentleman called us together early; we met on the 2nd of January. Many of us were denied the opportunity of making the first day of the year a holiday, as usual. The hon. gentleman brought us here, and he and some of his colleagues came to the conclusion that the Prime Minister was altogether incapable, and they kicked; and the business of the House was not proceeded with. The Speech of His Excellency was not answered. That was not our fault. The hon. gentleman was in no hurry. He was so little anxious to proceed, that after the Speech was delivered from the Throne on Thursday, we were adjourned until Tuesday of the next week, and if perhaps the adjournment had not taken place, the rumpus in the Cabinet would not have transpired. The hon. gentleman knows the rule: That Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands (and heads) to do; and the hon. gentleman and his colleagues got into trouble on that account. That is my hypothesis, but there may have been some other reason which the hon. gentleman is more familiar with than I am. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was also told last year that it was very important to give the Department of Audit the small increase of salaries which was asked for in order that the civil servants might have promotion in that department. It was pointed out, that officers in that department worked longer hours than in the other departments of the Government, that they worked gratuitously for a very much longer time each day than they were required to work elsewhere, and that they were not likely to continue that practice, if the hon. gentleman placed them, as he has practically placed them, and as the figures I gave last year shows he has placed them, in a position of inferiority as compared with other departments of the Civil Service. The consequence of the course taken by the hon. gentleman on that occasion is that the Auditor General's Report is not yet before Parliament. We have been in session now nearly a month, and that report is not yet in our hands.

Mr. FOSTER. Recollect that we met a great deal earlier this year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is true, but that is not our fault. We were not responsible for that. The hon. gentleman himself is responsible for that. He must remember that this is the sixth session of this Parliament, and that we were called together for a specific purpose, and that that purpose has not yet been brought under our attention. Now, the hon. gentleman asks us to deal with the Estimates, and the Estimates of what year? Of 1896-97. I suppose he requires further Estimates for this year; and one would think that these would have been ready, at all events, as soon as the general Estimates which he has laid before us.

Mr. FOSTER. They never are, as a matter of practice.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They ought to be. The hon. gentleman is more familiar with what he requires this year than with what he will require next year. Then, hon. members on this side of the House have told the hon. Minister that we require the Auditor General's Report in order that we may consider these Estimates with care. A great many suggestions occur to one in looking over the expenditure that would not occur when the simple Estimates are put before one; and I venture to say that if we were to take the course the hon. gentleman now suggests, there would be a very inadequate consideration of the appropriations for which the Government asks us. Now, I say it would not delay or interfere with the conduct of the business of the country if the hon. gentleman should allow his Estimates to stand over until the Auditor General's Report is in the hands of the members on this side of the House, and also in the hands of his friends; for I apprehend that hon. gentlemen on that side will be disposed to make this session a sort of emancipation day, and will undertake really the discharge of the duties that devolve upon them, instead of giving their minds a holiday, and entrusting the public business entirely to the Administration. That being so, what is the object of the hon. gentleman in pressing unduly for the consideration of these particular Estimates? It may be that when the Auditor General's Report is in our hands we shall be enabled to get through with these Estimates in a very short time. This has occurred to me, Sir, that last session, in fact for many sessions, these appropriations might have been very greatly diminished. I do not know how far the hon. Minister of Finance proposes to economise in the departments of the public service; but of this I am perfectly sure, that there is great room for economy; and, in my opinion, with the Auditor General's Report in our hands, we shall have an opportunity of considering and threshing out that question when we go into committee on the appropriations for next year. So I think the hon. Minister of Finance will not hasten the public business or facilitate the work of the session by prematurely pressing on the attention of the House the public appropriations, when the opportunities for considering them carefully are denied to us. I think he would do well not to press this subject upon us until the Auditor General's Report is in our hands.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Those who have taken part in the discussions on the Estimates during the past few years know well how essential to an intelligent discussion of those Estimates the possession of the Auditor General's Report is. I will venture to say that no man on this side of the House who has attempted a criticism of those Estimates has ever done so effectively without having had the Estimates for some time in his hands, and compared those Estimates with the expenditure of the previous year, as shown in the Auditor General's Report. The Minister of the Interior smiles, but he is at the head of a department in which he can appreciate my remarks, perhaps, better than he could anywhere else, because the Estimates and expenditure of that department are such as could only be properly criticised when the Auditor General's Report is in the hands of the members.

Mr. DALY. All that the Finance Minister proposes to discuss is the Civil Service Estimates.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not care whether he proposes to discuss the Civil Service or any other Estimates; the same argument will apply, though not perhaps to the same extent. You may enter upon the consideration of these Estimates if you like as you have a majority to do it; but both sides of the House will be so absolutely in the dark in dealing with them that you cannot get ahead, because information which members could get in advance from the Auditor General's Report they cannot get at all.

Mr. FOSTER. What would you get from the Auditor General's Report about Civil Government?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The expenditure in the departments, the promotions, and everything else.

Mr. FOSTER. I can give you the expenditures and the promotions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the correspondence which the Government have had with the Auditor General from time to time with respect to promotions, which always appears in his report. I appeal to hon. members if that has not been constantly in their minds, and constantly brought out. Personally, I may frankly say I did not come to Parliament this session with the expectation that I would be called upon to discuss Estimates at all. I came here because I did place some reliance upon the official statement made by the leader of the House last session. If one can understand the English language at all, that language imported plainly that the House was being called at an early day for an important and a specific purpose; and if there was underlying the language he used a real, bona fide intention to give effect to his promise, then I venture the assertion—and I appeal to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), who is looking so earnestly at me now—that if honest men, determined to carry out in fairness and fullness the pledge and promise they made last session, were at the helm now, this House would not have sat as long as it has sat without the Bill which we have been called to pass being in our hands. What did we come for? The hon. gentleman told us last year that he was going to call a session of this Parliament, not later than the 2nd of January, for the purpose of carrying out the remedial order, by submitting to this House legislation to carry that order into effect. We came here for that purpose; and I say it is trifling with this House to keep us in session nearly a whole month and then tell us that we are not going to take up the remedial legislation at all, but are, instead, going to have a month's play over the Estimates beginning with the Civil Service. I tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that, so far as my personal opinion is concerned, I was at one with the policy which my leader propounded during the recess, in different parts of Canada. I thought we would be met, when we came here, with a Remedial Bill, duly framed. Surely when the hon. gentleman, last year, saved his Government from dissolution by giving a specific and solemn promise that the House would be called at an early day for the purpose of considering this Remedial Bill, he was in earnest. Surely he and his colleagues should have had that Remedial Bill drafted before the House met, so that as soon as the Governor General's Speech had been answered, the very first piece of legislation which the House would be asked to take up would have been this important measure. We were prepared to meet it with the policy which the hon. leader of the Opposition laid down, subject, of course, to some extent, to the terms that Bill might contain. But if the Bill contained what we were led to believe it would contain, namely, the proposition embraced in the remedial order—the remedy which they proposed A, B, and C—then my hon. friend declared that he would tender instead his proposition that a commission should be appointed to take evidence on the facts before we legislated. Hon. gentlemen opposite scouted that proposition. My hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) met their refusal of that proposition with a counter one. He said, in answer to the plea that that meant delay; take a committee of the House composed of leading men on both sides, let them meet to-morrow morning, let them summon witnesses, and get hold of the real facts of this case, before we undertake to legislate. My hon. friend said: If you believe that a Royal Commission means delay, then take a committee of the House and let that committee investigate into and report upon the facts, and we will be prepared to draw our own conclusion. I am aware that a certain section of members in this House, notably my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) take the same ground as does the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan). They do not want an investigation into the facts at all. There are sufficient facts known for them. The one will vote against any Bill, and the other is prepared to introduce a Bill without investigation. That is not where the great mass of members stand here. They look upon this as the most important measure which has come before Parliament for many a day. They know it has features which are absent from all other legislation. They know that the measure, when carried, will be a measure which cannot be modified, amended or recalled. And this presses upon them the imperative necessity of having a thorough knowledge of the facts before they legislate at all; and the hon. gentleman stands here to-day telling us that he will not have a Royal Commission, and he will not have a committee of the House, and he will not bring down a Bill. In the face of his pledge given last session, that this session was to be called for that specific purpose, he now asks this House to indulge in the pantomime of going into the Civil Service Estimates and fritter away some days in getting some trifling information about them. Does he suppose that this session is to be wasted in that manner and that he is thus going to evade his promise? There are many members in this House—and I am one—who share the belief that such is his desire. There are many, and I am one, who share the belief that he wants to induce this House to go into a discussion of the Estimates and waste day after day and week after week until it is too late to bring down his Remedial Bill. He is determined to avoid any and every attempt to grapple with this great question. He will not have a commission, and he will not have a committee, and he will not give us the Bill; but, he says, in lieu of a committee or a commission or a Bill, let us indulge in a little Civil Service Estimate committee exercise. I ask if this is not trifling with the House. Is not this trifling with the people outside who expect him to keep the solemn promise he made. The mind of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) is settled as absolutely as is that of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). The hon. member for Muskoka says: I do not want any facts, I am prepared to oppose any interference. On the other hand, the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) says: I do not care if the leader of the Opposition has in his pocket a solemn pledge that Manitoba will legislate and legislate satisfactorily on this great question, by giving the Roman Catholic minority all they want, it will not suit me. I am bound to have this question carried in this Parliament, so that the legislation can never be undone. Well, Mr. Speaker, I warn that hon. gentleman that if that be his object, then, above every other consideration should be placed that of ascertaining accurately the facts on which you are going to legislate before you do legislate. While we might agree to vote for or against a commission or a committee or for or against a Bill, there cannot be, in the minds of business members of this House, any but one feeling, and that is, that in trying to force us into committee upon the Civil Service Estimates at this stage, we are playing a farce, we are masquerading before the people, who have been promised this Bill, as men who do not mean to carry it out, or indulge even in the excuse of considering it. Will the hon. gentleman tell me if that Bill has been agreed to by the Council yet?

Mr. FOSTER. You would like to know?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, and more than that, I have a right to know. I stand here, as a representative of the people, summoned by the hon. gentleman himself, to consider the Bill; I have been here nearly a month, and I have the right to ask him whether the Cabinet have yet agreed upon the provisions of the Bill. Can he tell this House when that Bill will probably be laid on the Table? The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), not many days ago, told us that we would have it in a few days.

Mr. DALY. So you will.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many days? What does the hon. gentleman mean by a few days? Is he in a position to tell us that we will have it down this week? Is he in a position to tell us that the details have been agreed to by the Council? Has the Bill been drafted? The hon. gentleman laughs.

Mr. DALY. We will make you laugh on the other side of the face when it comes down, too.

Mr. TARTE. Bring it down; let us have it.

Mr. DALY. You want a committee now?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman says he is going to make us laugh on the other side of the face. I do not know exactly what he means by that.

Mr. DALY. I am alluding to my hon. friend the member for L'Islet.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman prepared to accept the offer of the member for L'Islet?

Mr. DALY. I do not change my mind as often as he does.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) of the same opinion as his colleague (Mr. Costigan)? Does he endorse the language used by his colleague the other night that even if there was absolute certainty that Manitoba will legislate in favour of the minority as he would wish Manitoba to legislate, yet he will not let it?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is not my opinion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What did the hon. gentleman mean the other night when he said that even if the hon. leader of the Opposition had in his pocket a pledge from Mr. Greenway that he would legislate upon this question, he would not trust him?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Because he could kick it over in three months. There is one only way, he said, to legislate, and that is to legislate here and now. Is the hon. gentleman prepared with his Bill?

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the hon. gentleman will sit down I will tell him what I am prepared to do.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman got the Bill ready? Have the members of the Government agreed upon its provisions and when will this Parliament be treated with common respect and have the Bill submitted to it? Why, Sir, if it has taken twelve or eighteen months for these gentlemen to agree upon the Bill, is it to be thrown upon the House and are we to be asked to go into committee upon it the next day? Are we to have no time to consider the Bill? The idea is ridiculous. The hon. gentlemen instead of pressing us into committee would do better to adjourn the House and let them meet in council and try to settle the details of the Bill which, public rumour says, have not yet been agreed upon. I will not detain the House any longer inasmuch the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) says that he will enlighten us upon the details of the Bill and whether they have agreed upon it.

Mr. FOSTER. He did not say any such thing.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. leader of the House may have learned many things, but there is one thing he has yet to learn and that is that members on this side very much prefer to take the statement of his colleagues for what they think and what they intend to do, and what they have said, rather than his statement. The hon. gentleman has quite enough to do to speak for himself. I heard what the hon. Minister of Marine said quite as well as the leader of the House did.

Mr. FOSTER. What did he say?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have told you what he said. And, as the hon. gentleman has told us that if I would sit down he would give us the information, I will sit down and receive the information with great pleasure; and I hope that when the hon. gentleman speaks it will be to give us such information as will lead us to believe that this wretched Bill that they have been disputing over so long is so far advanced in preparation that we shall have reasonable grounds for believing that it will be in our hands within a few days.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has not surprised me at all, nor do I think he has surprised any one in this House who has been accustomed to listen to him address the House upon any important question. First, he says he came here never expecting to have to consider the question of Estimates at all; he came here to attend a special meeting of this Parliament called for a special purpose, called, as he says, after a solemn pledge given by the Government that this session was to be called for a special purpose not later than the 2nd of January. The country understood that that was a solemn pledge, and that pledge was to be kept, though the hon. gentleman and his friends did not believe it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Still, they have learned that there was no reason for their want of faith.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman not think that we have ample reason in the resignation of the seven bolters or seven traitors?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am not going to attempt to interpret the hon. gentleman's opinions or conclusions. But I want to give him information upon this point that he dealt with—that this session of Parliament was called for a special purpose after a special and solemn pledge that Parliament should meet not later than the 2nd of January. Now, is there anything inconsistent with the giving of that pledge in Parliament being assembled about the ordinary time of the year—for the session opened only a little earlier than usual—is there anything inconsistent with it in the Estimates and other business before Parliament, being taken up? The hon. gentleman's friends have stated that the calling of Parliament at this time for a sixth time was throwing upon the country an extraordinary expense. That would be correct if the hon. gentleman's views could be carried out and no business but the special business of remedial legislation taken up at this session, making it necessary that another session should be called to pass the supplies and do the other business of a regular session. In that case an additional expense would be thrown upon the country. But if the ordinary business of the country be carried on along with the remedial legislation which is promised under certain circumstances to be carried out, the country is put to no inconvenience and no additional expense. The hon. gentleman said that he would take his seat for the reason—and his friends laughed because his statement was contradicted by my hon. colleague here (Mr. Foster)—that I was to enlighten him as to the details of the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As to whether you had agreed upon the details of the Bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is not what I stated. The hon. gentleman was attempting to do what he often does, to put words into my mouth and to quote me as saying things that I did not say. I said that if he would sit down I would explain what I had said.

Now, he stated positively to-night that the other evening I declared that if the leader of the Opposition had a solemn pledge of the Manitoba government to grant separate schools and to give all that the Catholics required there, and even if I was satisfied that their wishes would be fully met, that would not satisfy me but that I must have remedial legislation forced through this House. The hon. gentleman did not quote me properly. I stated, and it is consistent with what I have said throughout, that there is only one way to settle this question. When I spoke on that occasion I was dealing with the proposal of a special commission as indicated some months ago and of not having recourse to this Parliament at all. I stated that if the school law of Manitoba was amended outside of or ignoring the judgment and the remedial order, as a matter of course it would not be worth anything if they changed their minds and wished to repeal the law. I hold that view yet. If the Manitoba legislature will, in response to the judgment and the remedial order give any relief by the amendment of the law, then they will be conforming to the judgment and the remedial order and that will be satisfactory. But, if they do not do that, any amendment they make in accordance with their own will simply, will be good only so long as they keep that amending law on the statute-book.

Mr. MULOCK. What is your opinion as to the remedial legislation here?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I want to refer to that. In certain newspapers on the Liberal side I have been referred to in connection with this matter. The "Globe," for instance, quoted—and quoted accurately—the unrevised "Hansard" report of my speech, which, however, I corrected as soon as I saw it. The hon. gentleman is correct in his quotation, but the report is not accurate, one word having been dropped. I will read the passage so as to set matters right:

If the leader of the Opposition had a guarantee in his pocket, and could produce it before this House, from the government of Manitoba, stating that in twenty-four hours from this time they would amend their law and re-establish separate schools, acquiescing in the remedial order, I say that would be no remedy,—

Mr. MULOCK. Go on—

—that they could kick it aside.—

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have read far enough to show the point I wished to make. What I did say was:

If the leader of the Opposition had a guarantee in his pocket, and could produce it before this House, from the government of Manitoba, stating that in twenty-four hours from this time they would amend their law and re-establish separate schools, not acquiescing in the remedial order, I say that would be no remedy.

The reporter left out the word "not," and I made the correction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Do we understand the hon. gentleman as contending that if the Manitoba government were to acquiesce in the order it would limit their authority to legislate in the future?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; that is the whole point I make. If they recognize the judgment and make an amendment in accordance with it, that would be binding and permanent and would be a recognition of the judgment—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And they could not alter their law afterwards?

Mr. COSTIGAN. They could, but the judgment would be standing in their face, and they would not alter it. They would have obeyed the judgment, but they could alter their law, of course. Why, the law in itself is not binding; capital punishment would be the only complete finality. You may obtain a judgment, and you may ignore it the next day.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? In what way would the Manitoba legislature manifest its acquiescence, by legislation, and in what way could it legislate on the lines of the remedial order and not be acquiescing in it? The distinction the hon. gentleman appears to make is that legislation there would be satisfactory if they acquiesced, but it would not be satisfactory, though on the very same lines, if they did not acquiesce. What is the meaning of acquiescing, as applied to legislation in Manitoba?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I suppose the hon. gentleman takes the ground that any action they would take would be acquiescing. Prominent gentlemen opposite indicate that one of the first acts they would perform if they came into power, would be to repeal this remedial order. Then, of course, in that case there would be no remedial order to obey. The judgment would have been ignored by this Parliament, and then you would be in the position I was picturing to myself, that if the legislature passed a law, it would not be in obedience to that judgment, or the remedial order, and it would not be binding. That is all I need say on this point.

Mr. MARTIN. How is it binding? Supposing the Manitoba legislature did pass a law, as you say, acquiescing in the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order, how is that binding on Manitoba? Could not they repeal it the next day.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is just as binding as the acknowledgment by any act of legislation.

Mr. MARTIN. Just as binding as if there were no remedial order, and no more so.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will not undertake to discuss the question in that manner with the hon. gentleman. My position has been very plain, and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg can understand it. The hon. gentleman who just sat down, and who put this question to me, knows himself what my position is after I made that statement as to what my opinion would be if any remedy were given outside of remedial legislation by this Parliament, by an amendment by the local legislature itself in obedience to a judgment and the remedial order. He knows it very well, because he interrupted me that night and said: then you do not want Manitoba to take action? I replied: the hon. gentleman knows, and this House knows, that we have repeatedly expressed our great desire that they should legislate themselves. What better proof do you want of the position I took upon that question? I have only this to add, that all those who feel interested in that measure, now that Manitoba has refused to act, and thrown the responsibility upon this Parliament, must feel greatly encouraged by the attitude of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). There can be no doubt as to the anxiety of the hon. gentleman to see that Bill brought down. He has shaken his fist at my hon. friend the leader of the House, and told him that he shall not escape the pledge made to Parliament to bring down that Bill. No, Sir, the hon. member for Queen's is here to see that that pledge is carried out in good faith, and that a remedial Bill is brought down. Well, I congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the new stand he has taken. It is one that will be well received in his own province. There is another thing about it that I see strange. The hon. gentleman says that this session was called expressly for the purpose of bringing forward that measure and dealing with it.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the announcement you made in July last.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I would sooner listen to the hon. gentleman while he was standing upon his feet. I say that the hon. gentleman has taken the ground that this session has been called expressly to pass that measure, and he is now hurling complaints against the Government because their Bill is not down and printed. He says, bring it down, you are delaying it, and you are not going to leave yourselves time enough to carry this Bill through this session. He then turns around, and in the same breath tells us that as soon as we get the Bill down he will take the ground that was taken by the leader of the Opposition, he will call for a committee to summon witnesses from the north and from the south, from the east and from the west. What for? To extend the time, to give us a better opportunity of carrying it through? Not at all, but to make delay. He charges us now that we are delaying it and losing time by not bringing down this measure, that it should have been laid on the Table at the opening of the session ; at the same time, however, he speaks of a commission of inquiry to bring evidence here. There is no consistency at all about the hon. gentleman's position. All I can say is that the hon. gentleman has no right to complain. The Bill, I think, will be introduced in good time.

Mr. MARTIN. When ? You "think" it will be down.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Well, my thinking is better than the predictions of some of the hon. gentlemen on that side. I say I think it will be introduced, and I believe it.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question ? Has the hon. gentleman to-night been elucidating the views of the Home Government, or only his own personal views ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Well, I think I will be content with stating that I am elucidating my own views. I tried to explain them to the hon. member for Queen's, and if I undertook to go further I would have, perhaps, the same difficulty, because, having explained it to him, perhaps it might not be intelligible to the hon. gentleman who first spoke.

Mr. SPROULE. Which one of them represents the views of the party ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. All this must seem strange to the outside world who have followed the course of both parties on this question, and who have followed the course of the Opposition, especially since last session, and especially during the by-elections that have taken place. There is no doubt that the people of Canada were led to understand that the Opposition were opposed to any measure of remedial legislation whatever. There was no doubt at all about that, and the Opposition took very strong grounds to persuade the people to that view. There was a little manoeuvring, and the party divided in two. From the very first the "Globe" and the English wing of the Liberal party took straight ground against remedial legislation, or any interference with provincial rights. But up to the time of the Verchères election and the Antigonish election, the Liberal party in Quebec did not take that ground at all. The Liberal party in Quebec held to the ground that remedial legislation was justified, was necessary, and in case of a refusal by Manitoba to legislate, they pledged their candidates in both these elections to support remedial legislation. That was the ground taken by the Liberal party in Quebec. They got bolder after these elections. When the election came on in North Ontario they found a candidate willing to come out and declare that he was against the policy of the Government generally, and against the policy of coercion, as he called it, or interference with the provincial rights of the province of Manitoba. We had then the Liberal party all through Quebec and Ontario declaring that there was only one way to settle that question, and that was through Mr. Laurier himself, and they promised that if he came into power he would exercise his influence with the provincial government to settle that matter, and that it could not possibly be settled otherwise. Well, the Conservatives have tried to get a settlement through the provincial legislature. The Conservative party have failed in that ; they have not been able to bring perhaps the same influence to bear on the Manitoba legislature and the provincial government that hon. gentlemen opposite could do. But we are dealing with a constitutional question, and if there is an influence between the Liberal party of Canada and the Liberal party of Manitoba of a nature that enabled them to remove that question from Dominion politics and settle it, then it was carrying politics too far if they could have settled it and did not settle it, when both parties agreed that it would be better to settle the question in the provincial legislature. Now it has come to this Parliament, and hon. gentlemen opposite, some of them at all events have shown it in their speeches, have changed their attitude upon it. It is not a question now of coercing Manitoba ; it is a question, why do you not come down with the Remedial Bill ? Hon. gentlemen opposite have not been such strong advocates of remedial legislation up to the present time that the country will be of opinion that they should take charge of it. The Bill will be brought down.

An hon. MEMBER. When ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Bill will be considered, and it will be carried, with the co-operation of many of our friends opposite who believe in doing justice to the minority. I really believe there is a pretty strong feeling among some of the hon. gentlemen who are so fond of interrupting me that it is a source of great disappointment to them, judging from what they have been howling through the country, describing the Conservative party as traitors to their pledges, to find that our pledges are going to be redeemed and kept, and that fact, I say, is disappointing a great many hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. TISDALE. No doubt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) in private life believes in saying what he pleases, but I am afraid his memory is defective, judged by the statements he has made to-night. He has stated that the leader of the House last session in the course of his statement said, first, that this was to be a special session for the purpose of carrying remedial legislation ; and in the second place, that a Bill would be brought in immediately on the assembling of the House. There is no evidence like written evidence, and hon. gentlemen opposite should not assume to make statements without refreshing their memories as to the facts or quoting the words uttered. I will read to the House the statement made by the leader last session, and I will leave it to hon. members to decide whether the assertions made by the hon. gentleman opposite are in harmony with the statement made by my leader. Mr. Foster said :

The reply of the Manitoba legislature to the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, and, after careful deliberation, has arrived at the following conclusion :—Though there may be differences of opinion as to the exact meaning of the reply in question, the Government believes that it may be interpreted as holding out some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba government and legislature ; and the Dominion Government is most unwilling to take any action which can be interpreted as forestalling or precluding such a desirable consummation. The Government has also considered the difficulties to be met with in preparing and perfecting legislation on so important and intricate a question during the last hours of the session. The Government has, therefore, decided not to ask Parliament to deal with remedial legislation during the present session. A communication will be sent immediately to the Manitoba government on the subject, with a view to ascertaining whether that government is disposed to make a settlement of the question which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province, without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament. A session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If by that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, the Dominion Government will be prepared at the next session of Parliament, to be called, as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council, and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895.

There is not a word there which can be held to convey any intimation that it was to be a special session or that remedial legislation while it was a most important question, would be brought down at the opening of the session. The hon. member for Queen's is unfair, and I regret to have to say that when he has an object to serve, as he often has outside of the discussion before the House, he works himself into a frenzy and seeks to cover up his meaning. I should like to ask him what the Remedial Bill has to do with the objection now under discussion ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will answer the hon. gentleman, if he will allow me.

Mr. TISDALE. I prefer to do my own talking, and I do not desire other words to be placed in my mouth than those which I utter, or a different construction placed on my words from that which they properly convey. The hon. gentleman opposite is fond of appealing to members of the House as business men. I do not like the hon. gentleman pretend to be an orator, but I endeavour to attend to the business of the House and endeavour to further it. The question before the House for discussion is that raised by the hon. member for South Oxford, who is the only man of financial capacity on the other side of the House, and the objection taken by him was that the Estimates should not be considered in the absence of the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Oxford did not speak on the motion—he was not in his place. The hon. gentleman spoke on a different motion during the afternoon.

Mr. TISDALE. I am not speaking of the afternoon. I am speaking of the motion before the House now, and whether we should go into Supply.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member for Oxford did not speak on this motion.

Mr. FOSTER. He spoke twice on it.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. member for Oxford contended that in all fairness—and there was a great deal in the point—the House should not be called upon to discuss the Estimates without having the Auditor General's Report before it. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) rose and said that what he had to complain of in regard to the proposal to go into Supply was, that the Government had not brought in remedial legislation ? That was not at all the question before the House. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I will not allow myself to be talked down by him, although he is an older member and a leader on his side of the House, while I am one of the rank and file of the Conservative party. But the hon. member too frequently lectures hon. members on this side of the House. I may say that I do not support interruptions made from my own side of the House, and at all events I do not think it tends to maintain a proper feeling in the House if hon. members, particularly leaders, are frequently interrupting hon. gentlemen who do not address or occupy the time of the House very frequently. There is something in the point made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as to whether it is fair to take up any part of the Estimates in the absence of the Auditor General's Report ; but the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) took another line of argument, and he said not a word on the issue before the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is not correct.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) raised altogether a new point, and a point which I submit was not pertinent to the question of whether or not it was proper to take up the Estimates now. Either the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) has put the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in the position of merely talking for the purpose of delaying the business of the House, or else he has taken up a question not relevant to the issue for the purpose of delay. Let me ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) did he speak simply because he did not want to consider the Estimates which is essentially the business part of our duties in Parliament. I think I remember hearing a very long speech from him the other night on this very remedial question, and I again ask, why did he bring it up again if not to delay business? Are the members of the Opposition going to follow their financial leader, and discuss the question as to whether we should take up the Estimates or not, or do they propose simply to make irrelevant speeches for the purpose of delay. If it means that we are not going to have any Estimates passed until the Remedial Bill is brought down, then, do not let the hon. member (Mr. Davies) put words into the mouth of the leader of the House, which "Hansard" shows that hon. gentleman never uttered, or never promised. I venture to say that outside of this House, not to speak of the members in this House, no one ever dreamt that Parliament was called together simply for that one purpose. I believe that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) himself, upon reflection, will agree with me, that it never entered into his mind that the House was called for one special purpose, and for that purpose alone. He knows very well that the Government would be derelict in its duty if it called Parliament without allowing Parliament to transact the financial business, a proceeding which would necessitate calling another session. The speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) was calculated to mislead the members of the House, and the people in the country, or else to delay the discussion of business; and from my standpoint—he knows better than I—I think I am justified in saying that he never touched the real question at issue at all.

Mr. MULOCK. I am somewhat surprised at the concluding portion of the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale). As an old parliamentarian he should recognize the impropriety of assigning to hon. members motives not warranted by the plain interpretation of their words. Sir, two objections have been offered to the motion to go into Supply; and both objections are good, although one goes to the root of the whole question. The first objection was that we could not advantageously discuss Supply in the absence of evidence as to the manner in which our previous vote has been expended. That is so manifest a proposition, that I am surprised the Finance Minister should ask the House to abrogate its functions, and proceed to deal with Supply for the future, without having first audited the expenditure of the Supply of the past year. The Minister of Finance says that all he proposes to ask is a vote for some fixed salaries. Well, Sir, I would ask, whether the voting of fixed salaries does not involve the consideration of other matters in connection with departmental expenditure? I should like to know, whether it is necessary to vote all these fixed salaries asked for. There are in each department, expenditures that may or may not be fixed, but the consideration of them is proper before we vote one dollar. The fact that the Government, with six months' notice that we were going to meet on the 2nd day of January, is not ready with their Bill a month after the meeting of Parliament, does give evidence of some extraordinary lack of administrative ability. But, Sir, apart from the objection which would be removed by the production of the Auditor General's Report, I take another ground. It is a cardinal principle that the House of Commons shall not vote Supply to any Administration that does not enjoy the confidence of the country. A Government that is existing by mere suffrance, and that protracts existence by manoeuvre, is not a proper Government in whose hands to place forty-one millions of dollars of the people's money. Let me ask, Sir, is there any evidence calculated to make us doubt, as to whether the present Government are the proper custodians of that vast sum of public money. In 1895, when this question became so critical, they, to evade its determination, evidently arrived at the conclusion of appealing to the country. The country was plunged into a campaign, and candidates of both political parties were put in nomination from ocean to ocean. Members of the Government were also put in nomination. Suddenly the Government changed front in the presence of the enemy. They came to the conclusion that they had lost the confidence of the country, but they feared to accept the verdict of the people and so they wobbled, and halted, and withdrew their forces from the campaign, and got behind Torres Vedras. They called Parliament together to deal with the Remedial Bill. The remedial order of March, 1895, shook the Government to its foundation. The then Minister of Justice, who had drawn the order, sent in his resignation. I believe it is pretended, that he did not send in his resignation, but, at all events, he went out on strike. He may have had a string to the resignation, and so he can technically say that he did not resign. But we are informed that powerful men brought their influence to bear upon the fighting ex-Minister of Justice, and, after a while, they succeeded in inducing him to go back to service. The Government, then, after acknowledging that they had lost the confidence of the country, called Parliament together to do the thing that the Minister of Justice thought they ought not to do, to pass a Remedial Bill. They told their followers that they intended to pass that Bill, if possible, and they called a caucus, and we have what occurred at that caucus, contained in an editorial of the Toronto "World." Last week, the Toronto "World" announced to the country that the Government called a caucus to deal with the Manitoba school question. Everybody knows, that if the Government is incapable of dealing with this question, the Government is dead; everybody knows that the Government cannot live one day unless they can redeem the pledges they have given to pass this legislation. And yet, we have it on the evidence of the Toronto "World"—which, I fancy, speaks correctly on this point, as I have no doubt it does on many others—that when this caucus took place, the Government asked its followers to agree upon a policy, but instead of agreeing, they disagreed, and it was found that they were wholly irreconcilable. The caucus failed to give assurance to the Government, that they would be safe in presenting that Bill to the House, and we have it on the same authority, that the Government adjourned that caucus, and pledged themselves that they would not commit the party to remedial legislation, until after a further conference with their supporters in this House. We have it, also on the evidence of that journal, that that further conference has never taken place from that time to this. Therefore, if that is evidence—and it has never been contradicted, and I doubt if it can be—we have it in evidence that the Conservative Government have not had the courage to confront their followers on this question, they have no right to speak for the Conservative party on this question. They have no right to say that they can control a majority of their followers in this House. On the contrary, they know that they dare not submit their scheme to this House and expect enough of their own followers to support it to enable them to put the measure on the statute-book. Therefore, I say that this Government are simply occupying the Treasury benches because they have failed to accomplish what they promised to do and what every one knows they cannot accomplish without the solid support of their own party. They have not the means or the backing in their own ranks to-day to enable them to make good their pledges to the country, and, therefore, there is ample evidence that they are not the proper custodians of $41,000,000 of public money. Again, there is further evidence. The House met last March and remained in session till July; and, because the Government failed to redeem their pledges to their own following, three Ministers went out on strike. Two of them were brought back, and if that had not been done, the Minister of Finance would not be occupying a Treasury seat to-day, and the Government would not have remained in power for the remainder of 1895. They had to bring them back in order to retain office for a few months. Is this a Government with a majority of the people's representatives at their back? Is this a stable Government, entitled to be entrusted with the public money?—adopting a shift, a device, for the sake of clinging to office, and shrinking from discharging the duty for which alone they are there? The Minister of Finance, when he stood up in the House in July last and read the document on the faith of which two of the striking members returned to office—one of them, knowing that he could not be depended upon, remaining without—even the hon. gentleman's own following refused to accept that statement. The statement that was read by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) to-day, failed to secure the confidence of a certain section of the Government's own following; and it was only after a little play that took place two days afterwards, when the then member for Jacques Cartier stood up in the House and asked the Minister of Finance if he was going to stick to his words—it was only then that their followers seemed to be satisfied. Here is the question which was put to the Minister of Finance on the 11th day of July:

Mr. GIROUARD. I wish to put the following question to the leader of the Government:—Will the negotiations to be entered into with Manitoba, relating to the schools, unless they bring an acceptable arrangement on the lines of the remedial order and the terms of the judgment of the Privy Council of the 29th January, 1895, preclude or postpone the introduction of the remedial legislation announced in your statement of Monday last?

Mr. FOSTER. My answer simply is, they will not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) made his declaration the next day.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes. However, there was evidence that in his own ranks the hon. Minister could not get a majority, could not get union, could not get agreement. They would not trust him, they would not take his word; they had to demand written pledges; and even his written pledge was not accepted until he was cross-examined on the floor of this House. Yet, with all these assurances, his party have reserved judgment up to this moment, and have allowed this Government, in a way, to hold on to office. So the Government met the House on the 2nd day of January, for what purpose? Now they pretend that they have met in an ordinary way, and, as a mere incident of this session, to deal with the Manitoba school question. Sir, that is not the verdict of the country; that is not the verdict of the press of Canada; and the country will be amazed now to learn that the Government are beginning gradually to put this question behind—gradually shoving it further away, with an evident desire to jostle it out of sight.

An hon. MEMBER. "Jolly."

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, to "jolly" it out of sight, and to "jolly" the party altogether until the life of Parliament expires. Is that the kind of Government we can say enjoys the confidence of the people? Is that constitutional Government? Is that the kind of Government which a party professing to have a monopoly of loyalty calls constitutional? Is that the kind of Government, Mr. Speaker, that should have control of the people's money? This Government, which worships the constitution, met the House on the 2nd January. By accident a gentleman in the public service, Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, happened to be in Canada. Reading in the public papers to-day, I find that Sir Charles Tupper has given an entirely different version of the circumstances that brought him to Canada. It was represented that he was here by accident—that the Premier had telegraphed him to come here to confer with him on certain public matters, not connected with the conspiracy to destroy the Premier. No doubt the Premier telegraphed for him, and I think it is equally certain that the Premier was advised to do so by gentlemen in whom he had the fullest confidence at that time; and when Sir Charles Tupper arrived here, he was amazed that there was any such conflict as afterwards broke out on the premises. But, speaking down at Cape Breton yesterday, Sir Charles Tupper said that he had come to Canada on the invitation of the Conservative party of Canada to take charge of this Government, and he was prepared to take charge of it. That is the statement of Sir Charles Tupper, which I place alongside of the contradictions given by the Administration.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman give us his authority for that statement? I read the papers to-night, and I read something entirely different from that.

Mr. MULOCK. It is in the Montreal "Herald" of to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I will leave it to the hon. gentlemen opposite and the Montreal "Herald" to settle. The Government met on the 2nd of January, 1896, to deal with this question. That was Thursday. Three days before that the public learned through the press that the Government did not propose to go on with the debate on the Address in the usual way, either that day or the next day, which has been the invariable custom ever since we have had a Parliament. I think—at all events, ever since I have been in Parliament. Never before can I recall an occasion when Parliament adjourned for a few days after the delivery of the Speech from the Throne, and before its consideration. Why did that adjournment take place? The country knows why. The adjournment took place because the Government had found unmistakable evidence that they had lost the control of the country. Montreal Centre had spoken; Jacques Cartier had spoken; West Huron had not then spoken. But the Government learned before the 2nd of January unmistakably that they were usurpers in office. Under constitutional construction and interpretation, they are usurpers. They had lost the confidence of the country, and determined to change front by a change of leaders. They met on the following Tuesday—at least the fragment left met. Seven had struck, seven had gone out from office. On what ground? Here I beg again to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance the view of the country—a view in which I entirely acquiesce. There is not a man outside a lunatic asylum in Canada to-day who accepts as correct the explanation read on the floor of this House by the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) and endorsed by the Minister of Finance. That explanation is contradicted by the language of the First Minister in the other House. The First Minister (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) gave us to understand, in the other House, that the resignation of these seven gentlemen was due to their desertion of his policy of coercion or remedial legislation. Subsequently six of them returned and gave their explanation of their return. They said that they had withdrawn because there was a vacant portfolio; they said that in order to enable the Government to fill that vacancy, they created seven others, making eight in all. In order to enable the First Minister to fill up the vacancy of one, these gentlemen established their pickets outside this chamber, in the lobbies; and the foremost of the strikers to prevent the First Minister accomplishing what he ought to accomplish was the Finance Minister himself. According to public opinion, it was he who stiffened the backs of the kickers from time to time and prevented their enrolling under the banner of the present Premier; and yet we are asked to believe that these gentlemen are to-day representing public opinion sufficiently to enable them to command a majority in this House. If there ever was a discreditable exhibition under the system of parliamentary institution, such an exhibition was given when we came here. This Government has done nothing to expedite business; it has been obstructing public business since we assembled here. We met here for business, but the members of the Cabinet, by their recalcitrant conduct in office, have obstructed public business. They have been true to their pledges, and I verily believe that they are not one whit further advanced to-day towards a solution than they were last July. They know full well that they cannot carry on the affairs of the country one hour after their true attitude on this question is made known. Under these circumstances, I repeat that the objection to grant supplies to Her Majesty, as represented by this administration, is a formidable objection. It is one that goes to the merits of the situation; and I maintain that if this House is true to itself, it will not allow the Government to proceed in this way until the Government shows that it has a working majority in this House.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat commenced his remarks by a little lecture to my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) upon the proprieties of debate. Everybody who knows the hon. gentleman from South Norfolk knows that he has just as keen and proper a sense of the proprieties of debate as any hon. gentleman in this House, and certainly more than the hon. gentleman from North York (Mr. Mulock), who undertook to lecture him. The remarks which that gentleman made were, in my opinion, unnecessary and gratuitously offensive, and will so be regarded by all who know both those hon. gentlemen. But there seems to be two objections taken to the motion of the hon. Finance Minister, that the House now go into Committee of Supply. The first is the objection that the Auditor General's Report has not been brought before the House, which was taken by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and fairly presented by him. There might fairly be two views taken of that question, but it seems to me, that, in view of the explanation of the hon. Minister of Finance, that only such items will be taken up upon which no additional light will be thrown by the Auditor General's Report and concerning which he was prepared to furnish all necessary information, the objection might have been withdrawn and we might have been allowed to go on with business instead of wasting our time in useless discussion. And if any items should be reached concerning which it was clear that the Auditor General's Report was necessary in order to a proper understanding of these items, then they might have been allowed to stand. I desire to take this other ground, and that is that we must not admit, for one instant, that the business of the House shall depend on the course of the Auditor General. The Auditor General, it must not be forgotten, is not an officer of the Government but of this Parliament, and if we admit that we must not, under any circumstances, go into Supply or proceed with the business of this House until his report is before us, we may at any time be subjected to most unnecessary delay in consequence of our officer's dilatoriness in submitting his report. The Auditor General might be unable, because of indisposition, to lay that report before the House as expeditiously as he ought, or he might not be disposed, for some reason of his own, proper or improper, to proceed with the work of preparing that report with all necessary despatch, and yet we are to be told that we might be delayed from week to week and month to month waiting for that report and not be allowed to vote the necessary supplies, even though the heads of the departments were able and willing to give all necessary explanations. I think that is a proposition which it is not in the interests of this House to admit, and which we ought not to-night to agree to. But there is another objection taken to our going into committee now. That is the objection taken by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)—if I have caught correctly the line of his argument after disassociating it from the mock heroics and the many extravagances of language and gesture in which the hon. gentleman indulged—that we ought not, under any circumstances whatever, during the present session of Parliament, vote the supplies, or do anything else except deal with the question of the Manitoba schools, and that another session of Parliament should be called this year for the purpose of voting the supplies. In the name of the Canadian taxpayer I protest against any proposition of that sort. Now that we are here, why should we not go on and do the ordinary business of the House? Why should we not vote the supplies? Why should it be necessary to call Parliament again for that purpose, and put the Canadian taxpayers to an expenditure of at least a half a million dollars which is entirely unnecessary and can be very well avoided by our going on with the business this session and which we can do just as well this session as at a future one. The hon. gentleman says that this session was called for a special purpose, but he cannot from the pages of "Hansard" maintain the statement. As was pointed out by my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), the language of the Finance Minister, when last year he gave the pledge that Parliament would be called not later than the 2nd January, did not indicate that it would be called for that special purpose at all, but showed clearly that it would be called at that time and that, when so called, among other business to be taken up would be this question of remedial legislation, provided the legislature of Manitoba had not in the meantime, dealt with the question. I further say that from the language of the Finance Minister can be drawn no fair inference that the sole purpose for which Parliament would be called together this session was to deal with the case of the Manitoba schools. In order to emphasize that view, let me read what he said on that occasion. He said:

A session of the present Parliament will be called together—

Mr. MARTIN. What date was that?

Mr. HAZEN. This is on the 5th of July, and I am quoting from page 3997 in Vol. II. of the "Hansard" of last year.

—a session of the present Parliament will be called together, to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next.

His language is general.

If by that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, the Dominion Government will be prepared, at the next session of Parliament, to be called, as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council, and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895.

I submit that there is not even an inference to be drawn from that that this was the special object for which Parliament would be called. And I would ask this House what good purpose can be served by delaying the business of the country and the work of this House until that remedial legislation comes down, the Government having given its assurance that it will carry out the pledge it made to the House and the country on the 8th July last. As I said before, speaking from the standpoint of a Canadian taxpayer, should this country be called upon to have another session this year, when Parliament can save half a million dollars to the taxpayers by having the work done at the present session? The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House, who poses as a great economist, should make some reply. There is hardly a small appropriation that comes before the House but the hon. gentleman criticises it, and complains of the extravagance of the Administration. What has he to say to the proposition that this House shall spend half a million dollars of the people's money in another and unnecessary session of Parliament, to do the work that could be done at this session. There is no answer to such proposition. Any one listening to the hon. gentleman, when he discussed everything but the question that was under the consideration of the House, could come to but one conclusion, and that is that the desire of the hon. gentleman, for some reason or other, is, as far as possible, to obstruct the business of Parliament. The hon. gentleman, towards the close of his remarks, said that it was not proper to vote supplies to this Government, because the Government did not enjoy the confidence of the country. On what does the hon. gentleman base such a statement? Since the last session of Parliament there have been a number of elections in this country, and two constituencies that formerly returned Conservatives have returned Liberals—Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier.

An hon. MEMBER. West Huron.

An hon. MEMBER. Charlevoix.

Mr. HAZEN. I will discuss every one of the by-elections. Is the fact I have given any reason for saying that this Government does not enjoy the confidence of the country.

An hon. MEMBER. Certainly.

Mr. HAZEN. Some hon. gentlemen have contended that the fact that two constituencies that formerly supported them have returned opponents of the Government is a reason why we should conclude that the Government does not enjoy the confidence of the country. If that argument is sound, all I can say is that the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie's Government should have resigned long before it did. Some hon. gentleman mentions Charlevoix. And what does Charlevoix prove? In 1891, a Liberal was returned in that constituency by a majority of about 300 votes. Yesterday a Liberal was returned by a majority of less than half that number. If that proves anything, it proves that there are more electors in Charlevoix who believe in the Conservative party and the Conservative policy than there were in 1891. Some hon. gentleman refers to certain elections in the province of Ontario. Surely he does not refer to the county of Cardwell, where the Liberal candidate did not even save his deposit. Surely he does not refer to North Ontario, where the Liberal candidate came within forty votes of losing his deposit. Surely the gentlemen opposite do not say that the result in West Huron, represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Cameron), who was introduced the other day, shows that the Government has lost the confidence of the country, when that hon. gentleman's majority is less than it was in 1891, though it is true that the county was since carried in a by-election by a gentleman who had the advantage of being a Minister of the Crown, and therefore had greater prestige.

Mr. MARTIN. If the hon. gentleman is pressing that argument, he had better refer to the election in Victoria, B.C.

Mr. HAZEN. I can readily understand that the election in Victoria is a sore point with the hon. member for Winnipeg. He travelled thousands of miles in order to take part in that election. He told the people of Victoria that this Government should be removed from office because of its attitude on the Manitoba school question. In a thoroughly Protestant constituency he made the fight along that line, and he had a number of circumstances in his favour. It was at the time of the ministerial crisis, and one of the reasons that cut down the majority of the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior) was the fact that telegrams were sent from Ottawa and spread broadcast throughout the city of Victoria, and throughout the whole constituency, that the Government had resigned, and that Mr. Laurier had been sent for. Everything helped the hon. gentleman. But his candidate was defeated. I think the hon. gentleman should hardly quote that constituency as an evidence that the Government has lost the confidence of the country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What about giving the Controller a seat in the Cabinet. The hon. gentleman has omitted that point.

Mr. HAZEN. The reasons that influenced the Government to give the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) a seat in the Cabinet are not known to me. But, from my own standpoint, I think it is only proper and right that the gentleman who fills the important position of head of the Inland Revenue Department should have a seat in the Cabinet in order to be able to deal there with the management of the department. And I think the hon. gentleman is one who will bring no discredit upon the office he has been called upon to fill. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House stated that the Conservative party were within the lines of Torres Vedras. I would remind the hon. gentleman of the axiom of natural philosophy that no two bodies can occupy the same space at the same time. According to the hon. gentleman's own leader, he and the other members of the Liberal party are within the lines of Torres Vedras.

An hon. MEMBER. We've got out of it.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. gentleman says they have got out of it. I defy mortal man who has listened to the speeches of the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)—who, to-night, one would think, was the greatest champion in the world of remedial legislation—to say what position they occupy. It is evident the hon. member for Queen's, until he is compelled to vote, does not intend to give us any idea of the position he will take. Both leader and followers are, as they have been for months, within the lines of Torres Vedras.

Mr. FLINT. It is somewhat amusing, Mr. Speaker, to hear hon. gentlemen opposite complaining of the expense to this country through the wasting of the time of Parliament in connection with the transaction of public business. Gentlemen who have supported an Administration that has done nothing since the 2nd day of January till this moment, but waste the time of Parliament and the resources of the country in attempting to settle their own differences, certainly ought to be the last ones to complain of any little time taken up by members of the Opposition in offering legitimate complaints as to the position in which the public business now stands. We find that after wasting a month in quarrels, recriminations, in opposing conspiracies and forming reconciliations, these hon. gentlemen have not even yet laid before the House the most important blue-book connected with the business of the country. We find that we are called upon to discuss Supply, involving over forty millions, without the Auditor General's Report to enable us to discuss those Estimates intelligently. I must say that a more impudent proposition, in my opinion, a more outrageous proposition, has not been brought before this Parliament by the present Government. The excuse given by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) is, I think, one of the most shallow that could possibly be imagined. His argument is that the Auditor General is not under the control of the Government, that he is an independent officer, and that in all his movements from the auditing of the accounts to the preparation of the volume, the Government is entirely helpless in relation to him. Only last session, an entirely opposite position was assumed by the Government and their supporters in this House, and when the complaint of the Auditor General was brought before the House as a matter with which we should deal, these hon. gentlemen took a precisely opposite ground, and they argued with great force and ability, from precedent, from practice and from example, that the Auditor General was an officer of the Government, that all his movements were under the control of the Government. But now we find that hon. gentlemen are attempting to excuse a delay, by laying the blame upon one of their own officers. The Government were well aware that the House would meet upon a certain day; the Auditor General, as a servant of the Government, no doubt, was acquainted with their desire, or should have been made acquainted with their desire, that the accounts audited by him should be in possession of Parliament at the earliest possible moment after its meeting, and yet a month has passed away and that work is not before us. I understood the Minister of Finance, the other day, in giving some reasons why his work was not before us, to lay the blame largely, if not entirely, on the printing bureau.

Mr. FOSTER. I said exactly the opposite.

Mr. FLINT. Then, of course, I misunderstood him. At any rate, I think hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have a right to contend that the Government should have taken every precaution to have the Auditor General's Report before the House ere this, or, if they found it impossible, owing to the pressure of business, or owing to their own neglect in providing him with sufficient clerical assistance, the least they could do would be to delay going into Committee of Supply until that volume was accessible to members. Now, Sir, I understood the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), in his observations in reply to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to take the strange ground that the financial leader of the Opposition having raised a certain objection to proceeding with Supply, namely, that we were not in possession of the Auditor General's Report, that alone should form the basis of objection, and that it was not open to any of his followers to take any new ground. Sir, it only needed the statement of such an objection to show its own absurdity. Every member of this House has a right, and it is his duty, to state such objections to the procedure of the Government as, in their opinion, would really facilitate public business. Hon. gentlemen are perfectly aware that any attempt to proceed with Supply without the Auditor General's Report before us, as well as other reports which should be before the House, would in no wise tend to hasten the business of Parliament. There could be nothing but delay. Almost every item would require to stand over until further information could be obtained. The voluntary statement by a supporter of the Government that the Finance Minister would be prepared to give all the information in his power in answer to any questions made in criticism of the items of Supply, is entirely beside the question, because the Finance Minister has no right to be in possession of facts to which every member of the House has not equal access. If there are facts in the Auditor General's Report which are in the possession of the Finance Minister, these facts should be equally accessible to members of this House who desire to criticise the proceedings of the Government during the past year in order to compare them with the Estimates laid before us. Another reason which might be given for not proceeding so hastily with Supply, in answer to the argument against the short delay which might be occasioned in waiting for the Auditor General's Report, is the fact that we have not yet had the committees of this House struck for the transaction of the business of the House. The House has been a month in session, and yet hon. gentlemen are not aware to which committees they are to be assigned, and public business which should have been assigned to committees of this House is consequently delayed. It is a perfectly legitimate argument of the hon. member for North York that the signs of the times show that the Administration has not the confidence of the country, and it was entirely idle for the hon. member for St. John to refer to the case of Cardwell and North Ontario. Although the Liberal Opposition to the Government was not supported in those elections, yet the Government was not supported either. Did the people of those fine counties rally to the support of the Government? Did they show by their votes that they had confidence in the Government? No, Sir, the result of those elections, if not favourable to the party to which I have the honour to belong, was certainly very unfavourable to the Government. They showed that in constituencies where the Government, on former occasions had a majority, they had forfeited the confidence of the people. Now, this Parliament meets as a moribund Parliament, as a Parliament which has lost the confidence of the country, as shown in the by-elections that have recently taken place. Parliament has not been called to consider the Estimates and to consider the finances, and these should really not be considered at all by this Parliament. If the wishes of the people were well understood, if the Government were to listen to the remonstrances of the people as evidenced by these elections, they would dissolve Parliament and take the sense of the people at once, and leave a new Parliament to deal with these questions of finance. I contend that the Opposition would be derelict in its duty, they would forfeit their right as honest critics of the Administration, if they did not protest in vigorous language against the indecency of forcing the Estimates upon the House in absence of the Auditor General's Report, especially in face of the fact that the committees have not yet been struck, in face of the fact that they themselves have been responsible for the long delay which has ensued since Parliament met. These complaints of delay come from gentlemen who spent three weeks of the valuable time of this House in attempting to reconcile their own differences. I think the spectacle is one which ought to make every Canadian blush, if he has any regard for the honour of his country. We now find an hon. gentleman contesting for a seat in this House under what, I think, every fair-minded man must consider false pretenses. From the very first announcement that Sir Charles Tupper was coming to this country until the present moment there has been a series of false pretenses presented to the people of this country. The first announcement made was that Sir Charles Tupper was coming to Canada at the request of this Government to confer with it on two important questions, the fast Atlantic steamship line, and the Pacific cable. Events which have taken place since have shown that these were false pretenses. Evidence is almost as plain as if it was written on the wall that the scheme which is being slowly elaborated was concocted before that gentleman left the old country for Canada. That is being made plain by Sir Charles Tupper's speeches on the stump in Cape Breton, and by observations made by hon. gentlemen opposite when they have the opportunity to address themselves to interviewers or their own constituents. Only the day before yesterday we saw in the public press a report of what was stated by an hon. Minister, and no doubt at a later date it may form the subject of discussion in this House. If there is any truth in the statement as published, it shows that the whole transaction was fully elaborated long before Sir Charles Tupper left the old country for Canada. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce met his supporters at the Continental Hotel, Sherbrooke. The report says :

Owing to the dissatisfaction expressed by many of those present, Mr. Ives gave a sort of explanation regarding his recent conduct in the House of Commons. He stated that he and his colleagues had resigned their portfolios because they were sure Sir Mackenzie Bowell did not possess the confidence of the whole Ministry, and because he could not have commanded the vote of the seven dissentients on the remedial order.

If that statement is correct it shows that other statements made by Ministers were not correct. The report continues :

They had again gone back into the Ministry because, with Sir Charles Tupper as Premier, they would unanimously support the remedial order.

It seems, then, that the whole object of this conspiracy, the whole cause of the trouble was a desire and determination on the part of the dissentient Ministers not to meet the House or go to the country with the present Premier as their leader, that they had no confidence in him, that another gentleman had their confidence, but he was not a Minister, but a servant of Canada, and it was resolved that he should oust the present Premier from his position. The report continues :

He added, that the remedial order would be brought down next Saturday, and that it would pass the House by a large majority. He also stated that he and Hon. Mr. Montague were the two hardest working men in the Cabinet, favouring the remedial order. Mr. Ives did not explain why he and his fellow Ministers had gone back under Sir Mackenzie Bowell, nor why they would support the remedial order under the present Premier, after having resigned because he (the Premier) could not command the whole Ministry. He added, that the closing of the present session would see a reconstruction of the Ministry, and that Hon. Chapleau and Angers would be members of the new Ministry, and Sir Charles Tupper Premier. This last matter, said the hon. gentleman, was decided and was settled before the seven Ministers resigned.

This shows that there are still further developments of this conspiracy to be revealed. It shows that a prominent Minister of the present Administration is responsible for the statement that two gentlemen not at present in Parliament are to come in as Ministers, that we are to have a new Premier, and that, of course, some of the present Ministers must go out of office. Who is the hon. gentleman who will leave the Ministry to make a place for the new Minister for Quebec? I certainly hope it will not be my genial friend the Postmaster General. I sincerely trust we will not lose his pleasant countenance as a member of the present Administration, although it may not last for a very long time. So the drama is to be opened up again. I hope the hon. gentlemen will not long delay the performance because the people of the Dominion having become accustomed to this opera bouffe performance would be somewhat disappointed if they knew it was not to be continued until the farce is completely played out. Under present circumstances and in view of the fact that the Administration is not yet complete.

that members of the Administration have still to go out and new members come in, and there is to be a new Premier and a new policy, it would be highly improper and unbecoming that the Ministry should ask Parliament to proceed with the Estimates. When Parliament is asked to consider the Estimates, let there be a Minister responsible for those Estimates and for the carrying out of the sums voted by Parliament. This House is not prepared to vote $20,000,000 or $40,000,000 to men, some of whose names are not yet known as members of the Administration. We want to know into whose hands we are going to place this large sum, and although we have not great confidence in hon. gentlemen opposite, yet we want some assurance as regards the constitution of the Ministry to be entrusted with this expenditure. We have already shown abundant reason why the Estimates should not be forced on the attention of the House under the present circumstances. One argument is as good as twenty if it be a sound one, and our objection is based on the absence of proper information before the House. It is no use for hon. gentlemen opposite to excuse their own delay and incompetence by seeking to throw the responsibility on the Auditor General. I believe when the facts come to light it will be found that the Auditor General was ready with his report, but for some reason not yet revealed the report has been purposely delayed for the purpose of obstructing public business.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the House, but I think I should give the reasons for the course which I am about to adopt. It is asking a little too much from the Opposition that the Estimates should be proceeded with before the Auditor General's Report has been brought down. Last year, and during the previous year, that report revealed that large amounts had been improperly expended. Last year a large sum of money appeared to have been expended for blackening shoes and pressing hats, and for wines, liquors and cigars. We do not know what has been going on during the past year and how the large sums voted by Parliament have been expended. It is an outrage on the House to ask us to proceed with the Estimates before the Auditor General's Report has been presented. Who is to blame for the delay? What business have the Government to call together 215 members a month before they are ready to proceed with the public business? What right have they to keep members kicking their heels around the House for a month at large expense to themselves and the country? Yet, hon. gentlemen opposite now come and, in piteous tones, ask the Opposition to allow them to discuss the Estimates before members know anything as to how last year's appropriations have been expended. I think it is asking too much of the country. When the House was called together on the 2nd of January, the Government ought to have been ready to proceed with the work, and if they had not their preparations made, they should not have called the House to meet until they were ready. After being here for a month, nearly, they tell us they want to go on with business now, but they ask us to take it for granted that they will spend the money properly. Well, from our knowledge of how they have spent the money in the past, it is asking us to take a good deal for granted. I have serious objections to the manner in which they have spent former appropriations. I believe that a Government that cannot run this country with less than forty-one million dollars a year, is not an economical Government, nor a Government that the people ought to trust. I am glad to see that there are evidences on all sides, and from all parts of the country, that this Government have lost the confidence of the people, and will soon be compelled to give place to their successors. Every single election that has taken place has been a black eye to the Government. They got one in Charlevoix, and they will get another in Cape Breton a few days hence. If they dared to open up the other constituencies they would find the same results awaiting them. Will they issue a writ for Pontiac; will they issue a writ for Mississquoi? Will they issue the writ for Soulanges? They will not, because they know very well that if they did, their policy would be condemned, and they would find that Liberals would be returned in these constituencies. Taking all these things into consideration, we should not be asked to discuss the Estimates until we know how the Government dealt with last year's supplies. Until we know that, I have, for my part, a decided objection to proceeding with any Estimates.

Mr. IVES. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to take any part in this debate, but I understand that the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), a few moments ago, favoured the House with an extract from a recent issue of the Montreal "Herald," purporting to give an account of some remarks that I was supposed to have made at a meeting of my friends in Sherbrooke, a few days ago. I have read the item in the Montreal "Herald," to which I have no doubt he has referred, and, excepting in the particular that it exhibits a wonderful imagination in one so young as the Sherbrooke correspondent of that paper, it has no other admirable characteristic. It certainly lacks one very essential element, and that is, truth. Whatever I said in Sherbrooke was confined to a few of my friends. It was said in the parlour of one of the hotels in Sherbrooke, and it was said in privacy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. After dinner.

Mr. IVES. No; it was not after dinner, and even in that case, my after dinner and before dinner statements are not so much tainted by my dinner, as are the hon. gentleman's sometimes. What I said was to a few intimate friends in strict privacy in the hotel parlour. There was no newspaper reporter there, and whatever the newspaper reported, was reported out of whole cloth, and from an exceedingly vivid and not very scrupulous imagination. There is not the slightest truth in the "Herald's" statement. I never made any such remarks, and no such remarks could have been repeated to a reporter as having been made by me. I said nothing that I would be afraid to say here on the floor of this House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What did you say?

Mr. IVES. Perhaps when I get ready to tell you I may gratify your curiosity.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) should not leave us in that sad position of uncertainty, as to what passed on that occasion. He said it all happened in an hotel parlour, that there was no reporter there, and I suppose the inference is that all reports of it that have got out may be somewhat tinged by a locality which is not conducive to certainty in the reporting of what has passed.

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman ought to know.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman does know, and I may say, that the Minister knows perfectly well. A locality in which private, or semi-private political meetings are generally held, in a tavern, is not the most favourable to exact reporting. But, we have had no denial of this report in the Montreal "Herald." The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) must have seen it, or must have had his attention called to it, and he has not denied it. Now, he tells us calmly and coolly, that he has no objection to stating here what he stated in the tavern parlour at Sherbrooke. He says he is not afraid to do so, but yet he does not do so. Is not that proof that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) dare not tell us what he said on that occasion? Perhaps he will not trust his own memory as to what happened then, any more than he would trust the reports of the newspaper correspondent. At all events, he is unable to tell us what did pass, after asserting that what was in the newspaper is not a proper report of the occurrence.

Perhaps the hon. gentleman's memory may be more trustworthy in regard to something else that he is reported to know about. Perhaps, it may be within his personal knowledge, whether he and all the other, or nearly all, or most of, the worthy members from the Eastern Townships, protested, and signed a protest against the elevation of Mr. Baker to the Senate, a promotion which was made under the gentleman whom he (Mr. Ives) at present recognizes as his leader? His memory may be clear on that point. He may also remember, whether or not he stated that, unless a certain Mr. Foster got that vacancy in the Senate, he would resign his seat in the House?

An hon. MEMBER. In the Ministry.

Mr. CASEY. It was reported he had said that. Perhaps he will deny it, as he is in a denying mood to-night. If he won't deny it, then he stands, or rather sits—because it appears he refuses to stand—in the position of a man who has had a most tremendous dose of humble pie to eat, and I must say, Mr. Speaker, he does not look as if the humble pie had agreed with him. But, he must remember this, that men who will kick, and bolt, and try to wreck governments, will find out, if they have not got the backing to support them in that obstreperous course, that they must eat dirt, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) must have eaten his peck of dirt.

Mr. IVES. That is not the worst of it, we have to listen to nonsense here.

Mr. CASEY. That is exactly the complaint made by the hon. the Minister of Finance, of the state of things existing in the Cabinet, before he came out. He said they did not hear sense there. He may have been referring to the hon. gentleman himself when he made that statement, as well as to the Premier.

I say the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has had to eat his peck of dirt and his humble pie, and, perhaps, a little bit of cheese with it; and he certainly feels very uncomfortable after his meal. He has not digested it yet, and I am afraid it may give him some internal complaint from which he may not soon recover. But let it be a lesson to him and to all kickers, not to kick when they have not the necessary influence to make their kick successful. The hon. gentleman threatened to go out if Mr. Baker was appointed; Mr. Baker was appointed and he did not go out. He threatened to resign if Mr. Foster was not appointed; Mr. Foster was not appointed, and he did not resign; but instead, he crawled back to his office and to the salary and emoluments connected with it. But can he say that he has crawled back to any influence, after the affront that has been put upon him? It cannot be said that he has. He finds himself sitting here unable to deny statements that impugn his dignity, unable to make any defence of himself, unable to do anything but sit there.

So much for the little interlude introduced by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. Minister of Finance, in proposing that you should leave the Chair, did produce something like argument, and it is with his remarks that I wish specially to deal. He tells us that it is not his fault that the Auditor General's Report is not down—that it is the Auditor's own fault. Well, Sir, I do not know that the hon. gentleman can expect us to take his ipse dixit in regard to that as being absolutely infallible. There may be reasons, which he has not chosen to explain to the House, which have delayed the Auditor in making his report. In fact, if I were to judge from the opinion entertained of the Minister of Finance by his leader, the Premier of Canada, I would not feel bound, as a member of this House, to accept all his statements as expressing his sincere convictions: for what did Sir Mackenzie Bowell say in the Senate, when he was dealing with the deliberate written statement of the Minister of Finance in regard to his reasons for leaving the Cabinet? He said:

I might naturally, I think, ask, if these reasons were the sincere convictions of the gentleman who wrote them, or of the others who acquiesced in the sentiments.

The Premier, under whom the hon. Minister is serving, after the humiliation of his going out and coming back, has put on record in the Senate "Hansard," that he did not unquestioningly accept the statements of the Minister of Finance as expressing his sincere convictions. And yet the hon. gentleman expects us to take everything he says in regard to the delay of the Auditor General's Report in its pure and literal signification!

The hon. gentleman went on to tell us that an exchange of days was proposed—that this day was to be given to private members, and next Thursday we were to go into Supply. Well, Sir, that might not be such a bad proposition, if the hon. gentleman had carried it out. But, instead of giving this day to private members, he began it with a motion of his own, which led to a lengthened and heated discussion, in which he and the Minister of Agriculture and other members on that side of the House took up fully their own share of the time; so that at the hour at which he proposed to go into Supply, about 9 o'clock, private members had not had a moment of to-day's time. There had not been a single chance for private members to bring anything on the paper before the House.

This is the kind of proposal the hon. gentleman is in the habit of making. He offers to trade one thing for another, but he does not give the thing for which he wants us to exchange something else. He expects us to take the mere offer of that which is not given, as equivalent to his carrying out the proposal he makes. We cannot do it. We did not expect him loyally to carry out the proposal he made, and we are not disappointed. Then, he argues that it is necessary to get on with the business of the country—with the votes for Civil Government. I do not know that there is any hurry in regard to this. Supplies for this purpose are voted up to the 1st of July next. We have been sitting here since the 2nd of January, wasting a lot of time in consequence of the hon. gentleman's own plots and conspiracies, and the disorganization incident to the breaking up of these plots; and now, all of a sudden, the hon. gentleman is anxious to get us to vote some money.

I would call his attention to the fact that, according to British constitutional practice, the redressing of grievances always comes before the granting of supplies. The hon. gentlemen opposite told us last year by an Order in Council, that there was a grievance which it was the duty of this House to redress. He told us in the last days of the last session that, although the Government were unable to remedy that grievance during that particular session, they would call an extra session, not later than the first Thursday of January, for the express purpose of remedying that grievance. The present Judge Girouard asked them whether they would be prepared with their measure at the opening of the next session, and would be prepared to go on with it immediately, in case Manitoba had not in the meantime done what was expected in regard to the minority in that province. The Minister of Finance himself said that they certainly would—that they would not delay one moment after the House met in order to have any further negotiation with Manitoba, but would go on immediately with legislation strictly on the lines of the remedial order.

On this promise they had their note renewed, as it were, for five months. During the five months they had some negotiations with Manitoba. They refused a proposal to have a royal commission to investigate the matter. They insisted that they knew all the facts, and were able to settle the matter without a royal commission. They called us together at an inconvenient time of the year for the express purpose of presenting this legislation and having it considered. And, Sir, here we are, on the 28th of this month, and not a word of that Remedial Bill yet.

We have statements confidently made by the Government organs in the province of Quebec, that this Bill has been revised by a sub-committee of council, has been presented to council, has been considered in council, was ready for presentation to the House, and would be presented to the House the moment the debate on the Address was finished. The debate on the Address is finished, the council met last Saturday, and we are told by the omniscient reporter who seems to know everything that goes on even behind closed doors, that at that meeting that Bill was not even considered. So that we are no nearer seeing that Bill before this House than we were in July last—not an inch nearer, according to appearance.

In the meantime the public feeling has been getting hotter in certain parts of the country, and the difficulties in the Conservative camp are becoming greater than they were. The longer this Bill is postponed, the greater these difficulties will be. The sooner it is brought down, the better it will be for the Government. If they had any consistent policy on the subject, we would have had the Bill by this; but I charge across the floor of the House—and I think I am justified by the existing condition of affairs—that the Government do not know what they are going to propose.

I charge the Government with trying to get the supplies before producing its Bill. I charge it with wanting to get all the money it can from this House before discovering to this House how weak it is. It wants to get supplies before its defeat, and I think I am perfectly justified in charging the Government with the expectation of defeat, when it exhibits such extreme cowardice. I do not say who is going to defeat it. I do not say that the Remedial Bill will be the more displeasing to the people of Quebec or to the people of Ontario; but, it is evident from the attitude of the Government, it is evident from their abject failure to take the House into their confidence, that they expect the Bill to be displeasing to the majority in this House, no matter how that majority be composed. They dare not bring it down, and they are trying to steal a march, and get money voted to which they have no right.

No administration in Great Britain ever dreamed, no administration in any constitutional country could dream, of asking for supplies until it had shown that it possessed the confidence of at least a majority in the House, whether it had or not the confidence of the majority in the country. As to their having the majority in this House, I shall not express an opinion, but we know the opinion of one of their supporters on that subject, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas), who does the editorial correspondence for "L'Événement" of Quebec. In his Ottawa letter a few days ago to that journal, he wrote this:

The job put up by the opponents of separate schools to make Sir Mackenzie Bowell disappear and replace him by a man not bound to his political programme, having failed, thanks to his own energy and the opportune intervention of the Governor General, those who do not wish the central power to intervene to make the constitution respected, begin to agitate anew, and prepare a new campaign against the remedial law. Messrs. MacLean (East York), Weldon and McNeill are at the head of the movement.

There is a statement by a prominent supporter of the Government, one, to some extent in their confidence, a gentleman well qualified to judge of the state of feeling on that side of the House. He says there is a strong movement against the Remedial Bill amongst the supporters of the Government itself, and that this movement has been growing from day to day. Can the Government, under those circumstances, ask us to presume that it has the confidence of the people or of the House? They cannot, until they present their Remedial Bill to the House and move its second reading.

I started out with the statement that the remedy of grievance must go before the granting of Supply. There is a grievance which the Government themselves say exists, which they claim the Privy Council have declared to exist, which they called this session to remedy, and the remedy for which they dare not lay before this House. And yet they ask us to vote supplies. Perhaps they expect that, in course of time, by wearing out the patience of the grumblers amongst themselves—by making arrangements to put one in the Senate, another in the Post Office and another somewhere else—they may succeed, in restoring harmony and obtaining support for their Bill. Is that constitutional conduct? Is it conduct on their part which is respectful to this House, and which will be approved by the country? I say that until they remedy the grievance which they themselves have declared to exist, which they have pledged their political existence to remedy, they are not in a position to ask us for money.

A great deal is made of their having staked their political existence on a Remedial Bill. They say that it is a great proof of their disinterestedness and adherence to principle. Well, if they are disinterested, if they are willing to adhere to principle, if they wish to do what they promised to do by their Order in Council of nearly a year ago, let them bring down a Bill to-morrow or the next day, drawn on the lines of that remedial order, and let them stand or fall by it. I do not believe yet that they will stand or fall by a Bill framed on the lines of that remedial order. When we see the Bill they bring down, we shall find it probably some sort of abortion which nobody will be willing to acknowledge the paternity of. They will be open to that suspicion until they produce the Bill. If they are willing to risk their political lives on it, let them go on and do so. Then we will believe in their sincerity; and when they have induced a majority of this House to vote for the second reading of that Bill, they will be in a position to ask for supplies. The report of the Auditor General not being down is an excellent ground for our refusing to go into Committee of Supply, but the reason I last mentioned is a still greater one, which renders it absolutely unconstitutional, unjustifiable and improper to ask this House to vote any money at present.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is past the hour now at which the leader of the House suggested, and suggested properly, that we should adjourn, but I just want to make one or two remarks on this subject. I think it is not necessary perhaps to convince the hon. Minister that he was taking an unwise step when he asked us to go into Supply, knowing that we had not the Auditor General's Report before us. I think, from the few observations that have been made, that he will have arrived at that conclusion himself. As he seems to have some little doubt as to its propriety himself, I just wish to remind him that in the promises which the Government put into the mouth of the Governor General in opening Parliament this year, was the promise that the accounts of the past year and Estimates of the ensuing year would be laid before us. They are coupled together, as they should be. The Government cannot fail to recognize that before asking for supplies to be extended to them during the coming year, they should lay before Parliament the accounts of what was done with the money which we voted last year, in order that we might ascertain whether we had good, capable and faithful stewards who had made a proper use of what we had entrusted to them. I call his attention also to this fact. He suggests simply that we go into the matter of Civil Government. He must see himself how difficult it would be to do that in anything like an intelligent way. One of those items is the Department of the Secretary of State—a very important department. We have no Secretary of State in the House. We have no one now at the head of that department; we have none to give us any information with regard to it. I ask whether, when the gentleman charged with the management of that department is a gentleman who, according to the estimate of the Tory party, according to the convictions of Ministers themselves,—by their actions if not by their words—is the only man who is able to lead and conduct the Government at all, we could properly proceed to vote the supplies for that department in his absence. He is not in the House. In that department is the important department of printing and stationery, about which a great deal of information is wanted and should be given. Then again, this important functionary, who is not in the House, and who seems to be the only man capable of leading the Conservative party or guiding the affairs of this country, according to the opinion of gentlemen opposite, as he is to be made Prime Minister, and is to be brought into this House, occupies also the office of High Commissioner; and it is necessary that we should have information of the expenditures upon that office. I think it is scarcely necessary to argue the point further, because the Government have already grasped the idea and feel that their motion to go into Supply involves them in a position which they should not have taken. But, while I am on my feet I would like to make a remark in answer to one or two gentlemen whose remarks seem to indicate that the Opposition are to blame because business has not progressed better in the House. We feel that that is rather adding unkindness to injury already done. Why, the Opposition have been here; they have been prepared to do business; they have obeyed the summons of the Government and have assembled at Ottawa. If there has been delay, what has caused the delay? We were called for the 2nd of January, and Parliament assembled on that day, and the Speech from the Throne was delivered. As soon as the Commons returned from the Senate Chamber, Mr. Foster moved:

That the Address with which His Excellency has been pleased to open the session, be taken into consideration on Tuesday next, the 7th inst. The leader of the House was the gentleman who, at the very outset, proposed an adjournment of five days. We on this side did not make the motion; we did not second it; but it was made and carried. Very well, the five days' adjournment took place, and on the 7th January we met again. What for? To consider the Address and proceed with business? No, but to have Sir Adolphe Caron, instead of Mr. Foster, rise and make the statement that:

Since the opening of Parliament, seven members of the Cabinet have tendered their resignations to the Prime Minister.

And among these was the hon. gentleman who had proposed that the Governor General's Speech should be taken into consideration on this day. Sir Adolphe Caron, as leader of the House, moved that when the House adjourn it stand adjourned until the 21st inst. And, if we did not have an adjournment of that length of time, it was owing to my leader and our friends on this side taking the constitutional ground that while willing to afford every reasonable facility to the Government in the difficulties in which they found themselves, the House should not adjourn for that length of time. I think I have said enough to show that, from very shame, gentlemen opposite should not say the delay in public business has been caused by members of the Opposition. It has been stated that different grounds have been taken by different gentlemen on this side. That is quite true. Other reasons have been urged, as they might fairly be urged. While the Minister's statement last year, as the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) contended, did not in so many words say that this was to be a special session to deal with the Manitoba school question, still that was the impression abroad in the country. And I think, looking at the circumstances surrounding the case, the country had a right to hold that opinion. Five regular sessions of this Parliament having been held, and five supplies having been voted to this Ministry, and the Ministry having been unable to deal with this question last session, it was natural to infer that this session was called specially for the purpose of dealing with this subject. And, had the Bill been prepared, it might, perhaps, have been disposed of inside the thirty days and at little cost to the country, so far as the indemnity to members is concerned. But the thirty days are already almost gone, wasted by the Ministry themselves. It was clearly their duty to have been better prepared. I do not say that they should proceed with their Bills in the exact order in which they are presented, but I notice that the first, and presumably the most important measure mentioned in the Speech from the Throne is on the subject of the Manitoba schools. The Finance Minister and other members of the Government must have known that the Auditor General's Report could not be ready for this session, and that Parliament could not properly go on with that business in the consideration of which that report is necessary, should have been prepared with some other measures, so that we might have gone on with some other business without waiting for the Auditor General's Report. If there is any measure which we have a right to expect to find prepared and waiting it is the one under discussion to-night. The subject was considered last year; the Government has had the matter before it for a long time. They gave a solemn pledge that they would prepare a measure, and surely we had a right to expect that it would be here and ready for consideration as soon as the Address was passed by this House. But the fact is that this measure is not prepared, and, apparently, the Government have no other Bills ready. In fact, the Government is not complete; if we may judge from what hon. gentlemen themselves say, it is without a head, and will not be ready to lead in legislation until a gentleman comes who, in the judgment of his colleagues, is able to conduct the business of the House. It seemed to me, Mr. Speaker, expedient to make these few remarks in order that the country might distinctly understand where the blame lies for the slow progress that has been made. I am not afraid that the people will fail to grasp the situation; but some gentlemen have been bold enough to take another position, and I thought that these few remarks were necessary.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman in the argument he has raised with regard to the delay in public business. His remarks and those of other hon. gentlemen opposite have, of course, convinced me of their industry and their ingenuity. I must say I have not been able to take very seriously the arguments they have used with reference to the delay on going into Supply. One thing seems to be quite evident, and that is that these hon. gentlemen do not want to go into Supply, and do not want to proceed with the business. And in order to carry out that intention, some half dozen reasons, each equally useless from a constitutional standpoint, have been urged with vehemence by the different gentlemen who have spoken. I do not propose to discuss these reasons. I rose simply for one purpose—to correct the misapprehension of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), which misapprehension seems to have been carried forward into the address of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) spoke of the adjournment moved by the leader of the House on the 7th of January as being a delay for which the Government was blameable. The hon. member for North York said that that was in pursuance of a conspiracy which, he alleged, was then forming against the Prime Minister, and that the arrangement was come to after the elections in Jacques Cartier and Montreal Centre. Well, Sir, I was sorry the leader of the Opposition was not present, because he could have informed his followers that he had agreed with the leader of the House that it was more convenient for members of both sides that there should be no business done between the 2nd and the 7th of January, so as to enable members who lived at a distance to spend their New Year's Day at home and come here ready to attend to business on the 7th. Therefore, so far as that reproach is made against the Government, it is shown by that explanation to be entirely unfounded, in fact. I must say that I was extremely pleased when I looked at the seat of the leader of the Opposition and saw it vacant, because I was sure he would never have allowed a statement of that sort to be made in his presence, even by a supporter, without correcting it. The hon. member for North York also stated that Sir Charles Tupper was reported in the Montreal "Herald" to have said in Sydney that he had left England at the request of the Conservative party to take the leadership.

Mr. MARTIN. It is stated also in the Toronto "Globe."

Mr. DICKEY. Well, I will leave the hon. gentleman to quote the Toronto "Globe." The member for North York referred to the Montreal "Herald." I have read the report in the Montreal "Herald," and I can find no such statement in it. The hon. member for North York made that statement because it would contradict statements made here and elsewhere by Sir Charles Tupper himself. I have looked over the reports in the paper the hon. gentleman referred to, and I can say that there is no such statement reported as being made by Sir Charles Tupper at all. The statement that is made by Sir Charles Tupper, to which, possibly the reference may have been made, is this :

Sir Charles Tupper said his present position did not justify that charge. He had been shown all the honours a man could wish to have, and had left a position of comfort and ease in London in answer to the unanimous request of the Conservative party.

Mr. DICKEY.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DICKEY. Yes, and that the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg says, is in the Toronto "Globe." Sir Charles Tupper left that position of ease and comfort in London on 15th January, at the unanimous request of the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada, from one end of it to the other, but he did not leave London for that purpose. He left his position in London, which he held in London. I will read it again, so that there may be no mistake :

Sir Charles said that he had left a position of comfort and ease in London in answer to the unanimous request of the Conservative party.

What position did Sir Charles Tupper hold in London? He held the position of High Commissioner, and no other position, and that position he resigned on the 15th day of January, and not before, when he was sworn in. I say Sir Charles Tupper was quite justified in saying that he left that position on the 15th day of January at the unanimous request of the Conservative party, from one end of Canada to the other. I rose simply for the purpose of saying that in the conduct of this discussion, which has been begun, it seems to me, for very insufficient reasons, the hon. gentlemen, in their wanderings to find arguments have been led, perhaps without intention, into distorting the facts, and in the case to which I have just directed attention, in doing absolute injustice to a man who is absent.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman from Brant (Mr. Paterson) has reminded me that last year we adopted the rule, as nearly as possible, not to continue our discussion after 11 o'clock. So far as I am concerned, I have no disposition to stay very much later than that during the present session, therefore, I would suggest that the House go into Supply, pass one item, and then we will adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Governor General's Secretary's Office.. $11,112 50
Resolution reported.

ADJOURNMENT—THE BUDGET.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House. I suppose my hon. friend knows that it is my intention to deliver the Budget Speech on Friday next.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like the hon. gentleman, if possible, to give us the last ten days' statement, and I would also like to know if the Supplementary Estimates for the current year will be ready to discuss in connection with the Budget?

MANITOBA SCHOOLS CASE—PAPERS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the House adjourns, I would like to ask the attention of the leader of the House to the papers relating to the Manitoba school case. I suppose, judging from the speech put into the mouth of His Excellency that the hon. gentleman has further correspondence than the papers of 1895 to bring down. I observe on looking over those papers of 1895, that there does not seem to me to be adequate reasons for some of the steps the Government have taken. I assume that the Government must have papers other than those which are contained in the blue-book that has been laid before the House. I would like the hon. gentleman to bring those papers down. The point, I may briefly state to the leader of the House, is this: That there are certain rights and privileges guaranteed to the minority. The Government are acting upon the assumption—which I am not questioning at all—that the local legislature, subject to the appeal here, have power to repeal or to injuriously affect the rights of that minority. Now, there is an appeal given to somebody or other, and, as I take it, from the reading of the statute, that appeal is given to the minority, speaking of them as if they were a community living separate and distinct from the majority altogether. Now, that being so, of course two or three individuals could not speak for the minority, because the hon. gentleman is proceeding upon the assumption that if the minority had acquiesced, or had approved, of the legislation, there would be no ground for appeal whatever. Now, when I look at this statement of the reason for appeal, I find that certain parties, some half dozen or more, are named in these papers:

* * * Louis Laventure, and Louis J. Collin, all of the province of Manitoba, in the Dominion of Canada, on behalf of themselves and of all other persons forming the Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in the province.

Now, I apprehend that the Government took some steps to ascertain whether that statement was an accurate statement or not, and whether those persons did represent the majority—I mean, the majority of the minority—because it is a community and not one or two individuals to whom this right of appeal is given; and I assume, when that statement is made, that the Government did obtain some evidence that the minority wished to have these rights and privileges restored which they had previously enjoyed, that steps were taken to ascertain that fact before the appeal was entertained at all. I wish to see those papers—that evidence. I desire that the Government should bring them down to the House and lay them upon the Table, so that we may have those papers before us to see that those proceedings have been regularly taken throughout.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand the point the hon. gentleman raises is, as to whether or not the minority have really appealed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. All the papers in possession of the Government in connection with this matter will be brought down.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 29th January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. LaRIVIERE presented first report of the select committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates, as follows:—

Your committee recommend that their quorum be reduced from eight members to five members.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved:

That the House concur in the first report of the select committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the number of members on that committee?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. About fourteen.

Mr. MULOCK. Five is a very small number.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It is the usual number—the number we have always had.

Motion agreed to.

ALIEN LABOUR.

Mr. TAYLOR moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 24) to prohibit the importation and immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada.

Mr. MULOCK. Explain.

Mr. TAYLOR. This Bill is a copy of a law now in force in the United States against Canada, and I think we should have reciprocity in this matter. For that purpose, I introduce the Bill, and I hope it will receive favourable consideration from both sides of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose this is the same Bill that was introduced last session, is it?

Mr. TAYLOR. Practically.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I do not know whether the hon. member is introducing this Bill merely to put himself on record on the question, or with the view of securing its passage by the House. I do not remember his ever having made any effort to press such a Bill as this to a conclusion. He gets up and introduces the Bill, and there lets it rest. It is his privilege to leave it in that shape if he likes; but I submit that the duty is cast upon him to show some bona fides in this matter by pressing the Bill, if opportunity is given. Perhaps it may be said that this Bill was introduced last session at too late a stage, and therefore had not an opportunity to go to a second reading. That was the fate of several Bills introduced by private members; I myself suffered in that respect. But while the hon. gentleman for several sessions has been very loud in clamouring for justice to Canadian workmen, I have never seen him adopt any serious measures to give practical effect to his views. So I submit that he should let us know now whether this is an annual farce, or whether it is only an attempt to secure a certain end.

Mr. DAVIN. I have no doubt that my hon. friend is perfectly sincere in bringing forward this Bill. I shall, however, have some important amendments to propose when we go into committee on this Bill; and if I thought my hon. friend were not likely to press this latter, I would introduce a Bill of my own.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) must know that last year, at the time this Bill was put on the paper, it was impossible for it to reach its second reading. Some thirty-six or thirty-seven other Bills were in the same position when the session closed. I do not think the hon. gentleman is very charitable in his remarks towards the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), because he must have known that every time this Bill has been before the House, the hon. member for Leeds has made a reasonable endeavour to have it become law. The first time it was introduced, it was allowed to stand over. I think by the strong advice of the late Sir John Macdonald, because important negotiations were taking place at the time between this Government and the Government of the United States. Since that time, the hon. member has twice introduced the Bill, but on each occasion he has been unable to reach the second reading before the session closed. I am quite sure he is not bringing forward this Bill merely for the purpose which the hon. member for North York intimates, but with the object, if possible, of crystallizing it into law, and benefiting the labouring men of Canada.

Mr. INGRAM. I quite concur in the remarks of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and I would suggest to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that instead of lecturing the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) as to his sincerity in the matter, he would accomplish more if he would use some of his time in trying to induce some of his own friends to support the Bill. I am glad that the hon. member for Leeds has introduced the Bill, and I think the time has arrived when Canadians should take a stand on this matter. We find, day after day, and year after year, that persons going from this country to the United States are debarred from getting employment there owing to the Alien Labour Law of that country, and the manner in which it is carried out; and I think some legislation of this kind should be placed on our statute-book, and that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House should use their best efforts to frame a law that will secure the object of this Bill.

Mr. GILLMOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what is going to become of this Bill. The object may be a very good one, but when we reflect that fourteen gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches have made it their policy to protect about 1 per cent of the people of this country, and leave 99 per cent to the tender mercies of the man who introduces this Bill, I think there is a poor prospect for these people getting redress. It appears to me that this sort of farce is about played out. If ninety-nine out of every hundred of the people of Canada want to be protected, the Government had better take hold of the matter and try to protect them; and the gentlemen who sit behind the Government ought to compel them to do it, or else not support them in protecting the minority.

Mr. MCKAY. I believe the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is perfectly sincere in introducing this Bill, and I believe that the members on this side of the House will give it their hearty support. If the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has any amendments which will make this Bill stronger or clearer or more workable, I hope those amendments will also receive the support of this House. The legislation of the United States in reference to Canadian workmen is becoming more clearly defined, and we should make ours equally clear.

Mr. CASEY. I should like to ask one or two questions with regard to this Bill. In the first place, it has been stated in the press, and generally understood throughout the country, that the hon. gentleman who introduces this Bill has secured the opening of negotiations between our Government and that of the United States with regard to making the Thousand Islands and other pleasure grounds of the St. Lawrence a sort of international park. It is understood that it was proposed to offer to American citizens the right of fishing in our waters as a "quid pro quo" for some relaxation of the alien labour law now in force in the United States. That is to say, if we allowed them to fish in Canadian waters, they would allow our workmen to cross the river to work. It has been reported from time to time that these negotiations were making some progress, but now, right in their midst, if these reports in the press be correct, we find the hon. gentleman introducing a retaliatory Bill, which could only have the effect, if adopted, of breaking up the negotiations which he is credited with having originated. I would like to have from the Government some statement as to whether any such negotiations have taken place, and I would like to have, from the hon member himself, a statement of how he reconciles his alleged intention with regard to such negotiations with the introduction of this retaliatory Bill. It would be proper for him to explain the benefits to Canada, as a whole, to be derived from those negotiations, if successful, and the greater benefits to be derived from the adoption of this Bill instead of the other plan. It is quite clear that the two policies of an international park and a retaliatory labour Bill cannot be carried out simultaneously.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I really scarcely think it is right to question the sincerity of the hon. member who introduced this Bill, when he has showed such anxiety in producing it year after year for the past ten years. He has got it up to a first reading, and I believe once to a second reading, but has never been able to impress on the Government the importance of taking it up as a Government measure. He has wonderful influence, we know, on the Government, then why does he not compel the Government to take up this Bill, if he is really sincere. I think if he would issue another proclamation, he could compel the Government to take up this Bill and have it enacted in the name of Her Glorious Majesty. Let the Government go on and pass this measure, if it is in the interests of the labouring men of this country. Anything in the interests of the labouring men will certainly receive the support of this side of the House. But the hon. gentleman, with all his sincerity and desire to help the labouring man, has been unable to get any further than the second reading of his Bill in the last ten years, and has only succeeded in getting it to the second reading once.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to say this to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, and to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that the second time I introduced this Bill, it was referred to a special committee, which was empowered to call witnesses and take evidence. And I would suggest to these hon. gentlemen to procure a copy of that evidence and read it before this Bill comes up for discussion on the second reading.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When was that?

Mr. TAYLOR. I thought the hon. gentleman was not very well informed. I would refer him to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), who was a member of the special committee which took the evidence.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The evidence is printed, and, I presume, it is possible for the hon. gentleman to give us the year.

Mr. TAYLOR. About two or three years ago; two years I think.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It was during the time of Sir John Macdonald, and he is gone five years.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, Sir; you will find it up in the distribution office. I would recommend the hon. gentleman to get a copy and read it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentleman is not well informed. He does not know the date.

An hon. MEMBER. 1890.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is six years ago. He has been working hard since on the evidence.

Mr. TAYLOR. It may be possible, if the hon. gentlemen opposite persist in obstructing progress, as they have done in the last two days, that this Bill will not be reached this session. It was due largely to the tactics they pursued last year that it was not reached. I hope they will facilitate work, so that we will be able to reach it and a number of others on the paper of pressing importance, before this House closes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

VALENTINE SHORTIS.

Mr. RIDER asked:

1. Was an Order in Council passed commuting the sentence of death made against Valentine Shortis into imprisonment for life? If so, when?
2. Did the Minister of Justice make a report to Council recommending that the sentence of death pronounced against V. Shortis be commuted into imprisonment for life? If so, what is the date of the report?

Mr. DICKEY. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that the answer to each of his questions is "no."

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES SCHOOL ORDINANCE.

Mr. DAVIN asked:

Whether the Premier is correctly reported when he said that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories explained his not having given his assent to the School Ordinance passed during the last session of the North-west assembly in the following words:—"That the ordinance had only been placed in his hands within a few minutes of the time when he was to prorogue the House, and that he had not time even to look at its contents to ascertain whether there were any clauses which might be considered ultra vires, or not strictly within the limits of their power, and that after consultation with the Premier, Mr. Haultain, and with his consent, he withheld his assent to the ordinance?"

(1.) Is Mr. Haultain's consent necessary before the Lieutenant-Governor can give his assent to an ordinance?

(2.) Has Mr. Haultain any authority to advise His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor as to whether he should or should not assent to an ordinance?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. As to the first part of the question, I desire to say that it is substantially true. The Premier, however, requested me to state that he may have used the words "a short time," instead of "a few minutes." As to the two other branches of the question, the reply is "no."

ALCOHOL OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURE.

Mr. RIDER asked :

Whether there has been admitted in Canada, free of duty, during the year 1895, any alcohol of American manufacture? If so, under what statute or regulation? For what purpose? How much, and by whom has it been imported?

Mr. WOOD. In answer to the hon. gentleman I desire to say that no alcohol of American manufacture was admitted free of duty during the year 1895.

THE TERM OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. RIDER asked :

What is the full constitutional term allotted to the Parliament of Canada?

What is the latest date, to which this, the seventh Dominion Parliament, will possess constitutional authority to act?

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to answer that question, as I think it is a matter of opinion upon a point of law.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS OF MAPLE SUGAR.

Mr. RIDER asked :

1. How much maple sugar has been exported from Canada between the 1st day of July and the 31st day of December, 1895, both days inclusive?

(a.) How much was exported to the United States, in pounds, and value?

(b.) How much to all other countries, including the British Empire, in pounds, and value?

2. How much maple sugar has there been imported into Canada during the same period? The countries from which it came, quantities in pounds, and value?

Mr. WOOD. In answer to this question I should explain that the figures below are incomplete, inasmuch as quarterly returns of exports have not been received in the department from Collingwood, Peterborough, Toronto, Quebec, Weymouth and Winnipeg for the quarter ending 31st December, 1895. These reports will be to hand in a few days. With the exception of those ports there has been exported from the Dominion of Canada, between the 1st day of July and the 31st of December, 1895, both days inclusive, 229,054 pounds of maple sugar. Of this, 223,804 pounds, of the value of $12,947, were exported to the United States; and 5,250 pounds, of the value of $475, were exported to other countries, including the British Empire. The maple sugar imported into Canada from the United States during that period was 169 pounds, of the value of $26.

MAGOG WHARF.

Mr. RIDER asked :

Whether the Government was aware, when paying $2,500 to Messrs. C. C. Smith & Co., on the 7th of August, 1895, for the old wharf on the shore of Lake Memphremagog, at Magog, that the land along the shore thereof controlling the wharf belonged entirely and exclusively to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that there was no public highway or street duly established insuring to the public an independent and free access thereto? If not, is the Government now aware that such is the case?

Mr. OUIMET. The corporation of the town of Magog, by a resolution dated the 18th April, 1895, which is on file in the department, has guaranteed access to the wharf by a travelled highway 50 feet in width.

POUND-NET LICENSES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Whether any persons or corporations in British Columbia are allowed to fish with pound-nets, and why these persons or corporations are exempted from regulations binding upon all other fishermen? Whether either of the members for Victoria (British Columbia) is interested in any such institution?

Mr. COSTIGAN. By Order in Council, 20th March, 1894, the issue of salmon pound-net licenses was authorized in the waters of Boundary Bay south of the mouth of Fraser River, to British subjects resident in British Columbia. The reason for the exception being made in this particular locality, was that complaints were made by British subjects that this class of fishing engines was being used by the United States citizens at Point Roberts, about nine miles south of the mouth of Fraser River, shutting the fish off in their run to that stream, and to the detriment of the fishing operations of British subjects, who were forbidden by law to use such nets. Pending some mutual international arrangement to prohibit the use of these traps, the Order in Council was adopted with a view to placing Canadian fishermen there, under the peculiar and exceptional circumstances, on a footing of equality with their neighbours in the matter of intercepting the run of salmon moving coastwise to the Fraser River. Meanwhile the United States authorities were approached as to joint action towards prohibiting such nets, and this point is included in the work of the International Fisheries Commission at present proceeding. The Government is not aware that either of the members of Victoria is interested in any such institution.

WRECK OF THE "SAN PEDRO."

Mr. MARTIN asked :

Whether the Government intend removing the "San Pedro" steamer from off the rocks near Victoria, British Columbia ; and if so, when ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Proceedings are under way for the removal of that wreck, and no unnecessary delay will take place.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CABINET.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I believe that this question was answered, but probably the hon. gentleman would like to have the answer formally on record. In the question as it appears in the Order paper it applies to the Minister of Agriculture. It should refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I will read it as it should have appeared :

Whether the Honourable the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated a few days ago that the Cabinet would be reorganized shortly with Sir C. Tupper as Premier, and with the addition of Messrs. Chapleau and Angers, or words to that effect ?

Mr. IVES. If the question should have been addressed to me, my answer is, no.

STEAMSHIP SUBSIDIES.

Mr. HAZEN asked :

1. Has the Government been informed by memorial or otherwise that a recent meeting of the board of trade of the maritime provinces, composed of the various boards of trade of the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, the following resolution was passed :—

"Whereas for years past after the navigation of the St. Lawrence has closed, through Canadian freight, carried on steamers subsidized by our Canadian Government, after mails have been landed at a through port, has been landed and shipped at a foreign port to the detriment of maritime province ports.

"Therefore Resolved, that this maritime board of trade memorialize the Dominion Government urging that in future subsidies be granted to steamers sailing between the port or ports in the United Kingdom and port or ports in Canada only.

"Also Resolved, that all affiliated boards of trade be requested to urge upon their representatives at Ottawa that they unite with other maritime province members in seeking to secure subsidies as will result in the through passage, mail and freight business being done through Canadian ports."

2. Is it the intention of the Government to discontinue the granting of subsidies to lines of steamers between Canada and Great Britain touching or terminating at ports in foreign countries ?

Mr. IVES. The answer to the first part of the question is, yes. As to the second part, I may say there has been no change since the policy of the Government was declared in the debate which took place when the Fast Line Subsidy Act was before the House.

RETURNS ORDERED BY THE HOUSE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

1. Is it true, as stated in the public press, that 43 returns ordered by this House during the session of 1894 have not yet been brought down ?

2. If not, what is the number ?

3. Is it true, as stated in the public press, that out of 106 returns ordered by this House only 42 have yet been brought down, leaving 64 returns not yet brought down ?

4. If not, what are the correct figures ?

Mr. OUMET. I am informed by the department that 139 returns were ordered by the House in 1894, and 105 were submitted.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then as to the next question ?

Mr. OUMET. That covers the whole.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are two separate years referred to.

LOBSTER FISHERY REGULATIONS.

Mr. BOWERS asked :

1. Can traps be set and lobsters fished for on the 31st day of December ?

2. If not, why not ?

3. Would the Department of Fisheries uphold their overseers in exacting penalties from fishermen who fished for lobsters on December 31st in any year ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Under the reading of the Order in Council traps may be so set and fished. The close season for lobsters in Nova Scotia, according to locality, is "between the 1st (15th) July and 31st December." Although the word "between" would, strictly speaking, permit of fishing on the 31st December, yet in the interest of the fishery the open season has generally been interpreted to begin on the 1st January. Penalties will not be imposed on parties fishing on the 31st December.

ROBERT ROGERS OF MANITOBA.

Mr. GRIEVE asked :

Has President Robert Rogers of the Conservative Association of the province of Manitoba paid the amount due from him to the Government for binding twine and reported unpaid last session ? If so, when paid ?

Mr. DICKEY. I beg to say that that question is irregular, as stating a fact. The Department of Justice has no dealings with the president of the Liberal-Conservative Association of the province of Manitoba. If the hon. gentleman will strike that out of his question, I can give him the information.

Mr. GRIEVE. Then I will ask the question in this manner :

Has Robert Rogers, of the province of Manitoba, paid the amount due from him to the Government for binding twine and reported unpaid last session ? If so, when paid ?

Mr. DICKEY. The amount of the invoice has been paid. There is an amount of about $65 still due for freight prepaid by the penitentiary, which the agent of the department has been instructed to collect.

INSPECTOR OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES FOR THREE RIVERS.

Mr. LEDUC asked :

Whether the Government have had communication by letter or otherwise with any member of this House, or other person, in relation to the appointment of an inspector of weights and measures for the division of Three Rivers ?

Mr. PRIOR. Yes.

GRINDING CORN FOR HUMAN FOOD.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

The names of the operators and location of mills in which corn was ground for human food during the year ending the 30th of June, 1895 ?

The number of bushels ground by each, and the gross amount of rebate made to each ?

The amount of rebate yet due, or claimed by each, and not paid, if any ?

Mr. WOOD. I shall have to ask the hon. gentleman to allow that to stand as a notice of motion for a return.

CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE.

Mr. FORBES asked :

Is the Controller of Inland Revenue a Cabinet Minister of full rank ? If so, what portfolio does he hold ?

Is he responsible to the Council for the administration of the Inland Revenue, or is he under the general instruction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce ?

Mr. FOSTER. I think that question was answered in large part yesterday. If my hon. friend wants more information I shall be glad to give it. The Controller of Inland Revenue is a Cabinet Minister of full rank. He is Controller of Inland Revenue. He is responsible to the Council, as are all other members of the Cabinet. With reference to the other part of the question, I must refer my hon. friend to the Act governing the matter.

Mr. DICKEY.

DAIRY STATIONS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to continue the supervision during 1896 (which, up to this time, has proved so successful) of any, or all, the experimental dairy stations now in operation in Prince Edward Island ?

Will the same supervision be extended to new experimental dairy stations during the current year ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Government will continue to give supervision to the cheese factories and creameries in Prince Edward Island through the service of a dairy expert, who will visit them from time to time, and be available for consultation by the farmers, or those who manage the factories for them. It is not the intention of the Government to continue to manage all the cheese factories and creameries in Prince Edward Island during 1896. Through the action of the Government since 1892, the business of manufacturing and marketing cheese and butter for export, is now so well established there that joint stock companies of farmers have gained sufficient knowledge to conduct it successfully at the several factories themselves. The Agricultural and Dairy Commissioner will be instructed to render all practicable assistance to those companies, particularly by advisory information on the marketing of the products for export. The Government may continue to manage a few of these small factories, and will take charge of two new factories, if put up by joint stock companies of farmers in suitable localities, on terms similar to those given to new factories in 1895.

REVISION OF THE VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. MONET asked :

What has been the cost of each revision of the voters' lists for the Dominion since the year 1885 and up to this date ?

2. Were certain lists for the county of Napierville, between 1885 and 1895, printed at the office of "La Minerve," or at some office other than the Government Printing Bureau ? If so, what amount was paid for printing the said lists ?

Mr. FOSTER. The second part of the question put by the hon. member can be answered readily. The voters' lists of Napierville were printed elsewhere than at the Government Printing Bureau. The revision of 1895 was printed by the St. Hyacinthe "Courrier," for which $465.26 were paid. The revision of 1891 was printed by "La Minerve," of Montreal, for which $45.91 were paid. This sum paid to "La Minerve" was for the names added, not for the whole list. For 1894-95 "La Presse," Montreal, was paid $42.78 for lists of names added and removed in Laprairie and Napierville. The first part of the question will involve making a long list, and if my hon. friend will make a notice of motion, the return will be brought down.

PRIVILEGE—COMMUNICATING AN ORDER IN COUNCIL TO NEWSPAPERS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume as a matter of privilege I may inquire of the Government whether they have discovered who is responsible for the breach of privilege which took place in communicating to the newspapers an Order in Council refused to us?

Mr. FOSTER. The Order in Council with reference to the cattle trade, about which my hon. friend spoke yesterday, and about which a question of privilege was raised, has this history: There was no order of the House for a production of papers. The paper was asked for by members of the House, and my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture stated in reply that he would bring it down. The Premier was not aware that the House had asked for it, and of course, did not see any order emanating from the House asking for it, and he gave it to the press after it had been signed by the Governor General. The error arose in that way. There was no desire, of course, to withhold any courtesy, or to make any breach of the privileges of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Does the hon. gentleman think it is merely an error on the part of the Premier, or anybody else, to communicate a state paper to the press before it is laid on the Table?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, my hon. friend will see quite easily that papers of just the same character and equal importance, are given out, after they have become orders and are signed by the Governor General, every week in the year. It is information which we ought not to withhold, and which cannot be withheld from the public, and consequently the practice has always prevailed of giving to the public these important items of information,—which are not in any sense state papers—just as soon as they are available. It was following that practice, and not knowing that the paper had been asked for in the House, and seeing no order for its production, that the paper was given to the press.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to ask, in this connection, whether the deep humiliation and grief which the Minister of Agriculture has expressed has assuaged.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is a question of privilege, and I submit I can speak to it. The leader of the House and my leader have both spoken to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. A question was asked from the Opposition side of the House, and the Minister has fully answered it. I cannot allow hon. members to enter into a discussion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have another question to ask. Has this humiliation and shame expressed by the Minister of Agriculture been assuaged by notice being called to the fact that the culprit was the Premier himself?

Mr. FOSTER. That subject would require a good deal of investigation, and the hon. member had better, I think, put a notice on the paper.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My presence here is evidence that I have survived it.

REPORT.

Auditor General's Report (First Section).—
(Mr. Foster).

CLAIMS UNDER THE McCARTHY ACT.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved for:

Return of: 1. All fees received by the Government under the provisions of the Act commonly known as the "McCarthy Act" from the several municipal corporations or from parties applying for licenses under that Act, in the electoral district of Provencher, in the province of Manitoba.

2. A list of unpaid claims and amount thereof in connection with the said Act in the same electoral district.

He said: In regard to this motion, I beg leave to state that under the provisions of the McCarthy Act, fees were collected from the several applicants for licenses in my district, and while those fees have been reimbursed in all other parts of the Dominion, and even in some parts of the province of Manitoba, I am informed that several hundreds of dollars which have been contributed to the fund under that Act have not been returned to the parties, and the municipalities of the towns of St. Boniface and Emerson are claimants for large amounts in each case. Besides, I am informed that officers who were acting under the provisions of that Act have not been fully paid for their services, whilst certain amounts which were deposited to the credit of that fund in one of the banks have been appropriated by the Government, and by leaving these claims unpaid, the Government have had the benefit of funds remaining in the hands of the banks, to be afterwards taken out on the order of the Government. I hope this statement will show the actual situation, and I trust proper steps will be taken by the Government so that these municipalities, respectively, shall be reimbursed the amounts to which they are entitled.

Motion agreed to.

THE CASE OF VALENTINE SHORTIS.

Mr. BERGERON moved for :

Copies of all petitions, applications, letters, &c., asking for a commutation of the sentence of death recorded against Valentine Shortis, into imprisonment for life, and of all letters and memorials asking that the law be allowed to take its course; also the report of Mr. Justice Mathieu, and the report of the Minister of Justice and any decision, order or warrant dealing with the said case.

He said : I rise to perform a very disagreeable duty. Under ordinary circumstances, complaints are made that mercy has not been extended to individuals. In the present instance, I intend to question why mercy was extended in the case of Valentine Shortis, who was condemned to be hanged on 3rd January. Although I am asking, by the present motion, for certain papers, which I hope will be brought down to the House for the information of the members and for the public at large, still, in order to reach the conclusion intended by my motion, it will not be out of place to state as shortly as possible what I know, personally, of the acts of Shortis in Valleyfield, and of himself. Every one knows, I suppose, that on the 1st March last year, the peaceable population of Valleyfield was startled by one of the most horrible murders even committed in this country. Two murders had been committed, and another man was supposed to be mortally wounded, and the perpetrator of those deeds was Valentine Shortis. The population of Valleyfield at the time felt very much inclined to take justice into their own hands. Wise counsels, however, prevailed, and, relying upon the administration of justice in this country, and they being law-abiding citizens, they did not follow the advice of one or two hot-headed persons, but they left the case in the hands of the officers of the law. Shortis was arrested. He was afterwards brought down to Beauharnois jail, and subsequently taken to Montreal. Before we come to the time he was brought back to stand his trial, I desire to show how the crime was committed. That illustrious individual, Shortis, from the time he put his foreign foot on our hospitable shores, had been in Valleyfield during a few months. He was looked upon as a very eccentric person; the people of the place were accustomed to note and characterize him as very original in his way. He had accepted a position in the Montreal Cotton mills, under Mr. Simpson, the present manager. He was never looked upon there as being in any sense a fool, as was put forward in the plea made later by lawyers for the defence. He had been employed for a few months as secretary to the manager. He left his position because he did not perform the work in hand, because he was not assiduous in his duty. Whenever he did work he did it well, as was proven under oath at the trial. But he would leave the office and go out to amuse himself or make calls, and not being assiduous to his duties the manager of the Montreal company discharged him from his employment. I mention this to show that Shortis knew all the ins and outs of the factory and how business was conducted there. He was the friend of the officers of the company and was consequently the friend of those whom he killed and wounded. They looked upon him in a friendly way, and this explains how it was that he was allowed into the office, although entry to strangers was absolutely forbidden. That night they were counting the money, amounting to about $30,000, which was to be paid out to the mill hands on the following day or so. Shortis knew there was a good deal of money spread out on the tables, and that it was being counted and put into envelopes, and he knew, that because of his acquaintance with the clerks, he would be allowed into the office. I wish to emphasize this, because it was said later on that Shortis was not looking after money, and that his parents being very wealthy—as was shown afterwards—used to keep him in money. This was denied under oath by the people of Valleyfield, who deposed that Shortis had hardly enough money to pay his board. He was sent from home, not as a fool, but on account of many acts of cruelty as proven by the story of his escapades in the testimony taken in Ireland. His mother, like many other mothers, sent him some money without the knowledge of his father, but this money was evidently sent so that he would not starve. It amounted to $30 or $40 a month, but it did not keep Shortis and he was always indebted to everybody. Shortis knew there was a good deal of money in the office of the factory this night. On two or three occasions previously, while passing in what is called the "bank" of the factories, he remarked to another young man, that it would be a very easy thing to rob the Montreal Cotton Co. on those nights they were counting the money. This was in evidence. On the night of the 1st of March he went to the office and knocked at the door. One of the clerks, I think John Loy, went to the door and seeing it was Shortis he admitted him, although he would not have allowed any one else to enter as it was against the rules. Mr. Simpson, the manager, was absent at the time, and had he been in Valleyfield, it is almost probable the rule would not have been broken by admitting Shortis, because Mr. Simpson had a very poor opinion of Shortis, and in fact they were far from being good friends. When Shortis entered there was a 32-calibre revolver on one of the desks. It was known that Shortis had a mania for firearms. In fact a few days before he went to a carnival at the Valleyfield rink, when young men and women were present, and carried a double-barrelled rifle which was loaded. Some one had to bring him out and force him to unload the weapon by discharging it on the lake. It was, therefore, known that he was familiar with firearms, and consequently, John Lowe, who was acting as first clerk that evening, said to him : Give me that revolver, Shortis ; I won't allow you to play with it. Mr. Lowe took out the cylinder and handed the revolver back to him. Shortis examined it, oiled it, and cleaned it up, and then put it back on the desk and promenaded around the office. Mr. Lowe, when he found that Shortis had finished with the revolver, again fixed in the loaded chambers and put it in the desk. Shortis again came to the desk, pulled out the drawer, and taking the revolver, aimed at Wilson who was standing near the door, and shot him, the bullet passing through his cheek. John Loy, who was working at the desk, thought it was an accident, and immediately went to telephone for a doctor. Wilson was bleeding freely and had fallen to the floor. Just as Loy went to the telephone, John Lowe had gone over to take Wilson in his arms and help him, but Shortis cried out : "Lowe, stand still ; don't move, or I will shoot you ;" and turning to John Loy who was reaching for the telephone, Shortis discharged the revolver at him, and Loy fell dead. While this was occurring Lowe and Leboeuf had time to gather up the money that was spread on the table, and they fled into the large vault, and closed the door. Shortis then found that he was left alone, the other two men being in the safe, and young Wilson having disappeared after being wounded. Following the track of the blood stains on the floor, Shortis traced Wilson to the private office of the manager. Wilson tried to hold the door against him, but Shortis being a strongly-built fellow six feet high, forced the door and catching Wilson tried to choke him with his hands. However, Wilson managed to escape. Just at that time Leboeuf, the watchman, came in with a lamp in his hand. He was a particular friend of Shortis, as was admitted by Shortis himself, because he remarked later on that the only regret he had was for having shot Leboeuf. Leboeuf seeing that there was something wrong, said : "What is the matter," as he entered the room, and Shortis said : "Hello, Maxime, how are you," and he immediately pointed the revolver at the poor fellow and shot him. Leboeuf fell on the floor, but Shortis seeing signs of life in him, and being afraid he would not die, went over to the telephone, pulled off the receiver, and going back to Leboeuf smashed his skull with it, so as to make sure of his victim. Then Shortis thought he had the whole thing to himself, and he went to the door of the vault. I am making those explanations to the House because it was said later, that Shortis was a fool and a plea of insanity was presented at the trial. As everybody knows, the jury in the case did not believe in the plea of insanity ; although unfortuately some people afterwards did believe in it. When Shortis went to the door of the vault he tried to open it, but failed. Lowe played a trick on him, and said he could not open the door because he was locked in. Shortis asked for the combination, and Lowe gave him the combination to lock the safe, so that he really locked Lowe and Leboeuf in the safe, and remained outside himself. He shot his revolver once or twice at the slit of the safe door, but of course the ball did not go through. He then tried to make Lowe and Leboeuf, who were in the vault, believe that he was setting fire to the mill. He burned some paper in a spittoon near the opening, so that the smoke would go in and make Leboeuf believe the place was on fire, and induce him to open the door to save his life. Not having received what he expected, a favourable answer from Lowe, and not having obtained by means of the burning paper in the spittoon, the opening of the vault, and seeing that he had lost young Wilson, he started again and followed the traces of blood until he reached the second floor of the building, where under a table he found Wilson. He thought Wilson was dead, because, of course, Wilson kept quiet, yet he shot at him there several times. Fortunately and providentially, the balls did not strike any vital part in Wilson's body, and he is alive to-day and in perfect health. Shortis then went back to the office, and Wilson went forward as far as the boiler-room and gave the alarm. Those in the boiler-room sent for Dr. Sutherland, and the doctor came down, accompanied by Delisle, the watchman, who was in another part of the building. When Shortis got back to the office, he found the body of Leboeuf ; and being evidently afraid that this would attract attention, he took off his braces, tied them around Leboeuf's body, dragged it to the stairway, and threw it down the stairway, so that it would be out of the way. This is about the way the crime was committed. Then Dr. Sutherland and Delisle came in, and Shortis put up his two hands, and said "I give myself up, I have lost the game," or something of that kind, and begged them to shoot him. He said : "I have done something very bad, and I deserve to be shot." They would not shoot him. Just then the secretary of the company, Mr. Smith, came in, and said, "We will not shoot you, but we will leave you in the hands of the law." He was then arrested, and brought down to Beauharnois for trial. I am speaking of this matter because I believe the proper administration of justice in the country is the fundamental basis of the whole structure of society. If we take away from the people the idea that our laws are good and justly administered, very little will remain to encourage them to be good and honest and reasonable citizens. When the time for the trial came on, a change of venue was asked by the lawyers for the defence, who contended that if Shortis were tried in Beauharnois, where the deed was committed, he would not be likely to receive justice. That application was made before Judge Belanger, and he refused to grant the change of venue. Consequently, the trial took place in Beauharnois. Before that there had been a commission sent to Ireland to make inquiries about Shortis and his previous life; and this man, whom people wanted to pass for an insane man, gave to his lawyers, like a very sensible fellow, full information as to all that had happened in Ireland which would explain what kind of a boy he had been at home, and what kind of a man he was altogether. He gave them full details. It was said afterwards at the trial that the father and mother had never heard of any of those things. I was present in the court when the report of that investigation was read, and it gave a very good idea of Shortis's general character. For instance, one thing that was stated was this. He was walking one day along the street, when he met a good old man, who said to him, "Good morning, Valentine, how are you this morning?" Shortis answered, "Good morning," and went on. He had a shillelah in his hand, and he had not gone five feet before he turned around and gave the old gentleman a blow. This was not reported to his parents, but he himself told it to his lawyer to show the kind of character he had in Ireland. In fact, the report of that commission did more to convince the jury that Shortis was not a fool, but a bad and cruel young man, than anything else that took place at the trial. The case came on. Shortis was defended by three of the best criminal lawyers in Montreal. The presiding judge, Judge Mathieu, was one of the best judges in the province of Quebec, a man who had been for many years Crown Attorney in his district before he became judge, and is held in high esteem by the bar. The trial went on. Twelve good, respectable jurymen were selected—not twelve of the unwashed, as Shortis called them afterwards in an interview with a reporter of the Montreal "Star." They were chosen, I believe, out of about 70 jurymen, and everything else was done to be as liberal as possible to the prisoner; for we all know that British law is as broad and as liberal as possible in that respect. Even the judge, as will be seen if these papers are brought down, seemed—I will not say to favour the prisoner, but to be very liberal towards him. Doctors were brought from every lunatic asylum in the country to give evidence, and they were paid, I am told, $50 per day each. They worked very hard and stated a great deal that was most plausible, and it was pretty hard to shake their testimony. I remember, for instance, that one question Mr. McMaster asked was, "Do you believe it was the act of a fool to hold at the end of his pistol, John Lowe and young Leboeuf, when suddenly he turned and shot John Loy who was at the telephone, so as not to give alarm?" "No," the doctors answered, "that was the work of a fool." All the doctors answered in the same way. The Crown prosecutor was taunted that he had not had Shortis examined by a doctor. The answer was that the Crown had sent a doctor, I believe, Dr. Villeneuve, one of the doctors in the asylum of St. Jean de Dieu, and Shortis refused to allow the doctor for the Crown to examine him. Consequently, he could not be examined by any of the doctors sent by the Crown. But the Crown acted, I think, in a very sensible way; they brought into the court people who had seen Shortis for a year or a year and a half, and asked them what they thought about him; and the evidence of those people convinced the jury that Shortis was not insane, but legally responsible for his acts, knowing perfectly as the law required, the difference between right and wrong. The verdict of the jury was that he was guilty in the first degree of the murder of John Loy, because at the commencement of the trial the lawyers for the defence asked the court to try Shortis on the one indictment for the murder of John Loy, and leave the other matters aside. This was granted by the judge, so that Shortis was only found guilty of the murder of John Loy. The judge charged the jury in a most impartial way; and, after the verdict was rendered, the judge congratulated the jury, thanking them for the long time they had spent on the trial, and saying that so far as he was concerned, their verdict was based upon the evidence. He then condemned Shortis to be hanged on the 3rd of January. Now, I need not say that it was a matter of general satisfaction to the people of Beauharnois that a verdict of guilty was rendered. It was the idea of everybody that Shortis was guilty, but there was something that troubled the public mind at the time, and it was this. There was no doubt that the father and the mother were doing everything in their power—and this was quite natural—to save their son from the scaffold. They had lots of money, they used to boast of it, and the people of Beauharnois were afraid that by means of their money something might happen to prevent the law following its course. I never believed that for a minute, and I used to tell everybody who spoke to me about it that I could not understand how mercy, under the circumstances, could be granted. I happened to be in Chicago when the verdict was rendered, and I then wrote to the Minister of Justice expressing my hope that the law would be allowed to follow its course. Later on, when I was in Montreal, learning what efforts were being made to obtain a commutation of sentence, I again wrote to the Minister of Justice to the same effect. I never believed for a moment that commutation would be granted. I have stated all that I know about this case. The papers I am asking for will give more information and explanation, I hope. There is no doubt, in my opinion—of course I may be wrong—that some one is guilty of having extended too much sympathy, and that consequently there has been a miscarriage of justice. Now, with regard to the question of insanity, I heard all the pleadings and the reading of the English and French authorities on that question, a great many of which were read during the trial. Of course, if it had been proved that the man was purely and simply insane, I have no doubt that the community would have inclined to the side of clemency. But in this case, my impression is that it was not a question of insanity. My impression is that this was only a pretext, and that it was purely and simply a question of sympathy which was extended, unduly I am afraid. We can all understand sympathy for the mother and father; but is there not ground also for sympathy with the relatives of the victims? Think for a moment of that poor young man, John Loy, the pride of his father and mother, a good young man—a better never breathed, not only in the district of Beauharnois, but anywhere else—a model in his town; and should we not extend sympathy to his parents, who have nearly been distracted since this shooting. Have we not ground also for extending sympathy to Madame Leboeuf, the widow of poor Maxime Leboeuf, who was also one of the best men living? It is worthy of note that the two victims—three, if I may include Wilson—were young men without reproach. Leboeuf was married and left a widow and some little children, who will grow up fatherless through the act of Shortis. If we are to extend sympathy, it seems to me we should extend it to these people. It seems to me we should extend it also to the family of poor Wilson, who lay for a month between life and death, and whose poor mother nearly lost her own life taking care of and nursing him. But, I say, sympathy was granted to Shortis. The pretext was taken that the plea of insanity was a good one, and we shall see, probably, when these papers are brought down, from the report of the judge or the Minister of Justice, or any decision or warrant dealing with the case, whether it was the plea of insanity on which was decided the commutation of his sentence. If it was, why was he sent to the penitentiary and not to a lunatic asylum? My impression is that there might be a flaw in the warrant or procedure. If the sentence of death was commuted because of insanity, he should have been sent to a lunatic asylum. But he was not. It was found out afterwards, perhaps, that according to law, even the Crown could not commute a sentence on the plea of insanity, because that plea has been brought before a jury and the jury had declared that the man was not insane, and was legally responsible for his acts. And probably having found that out afterwards, yet wishing to prevent his mounting the scaffold, he was purely and simply sent to penitentiary, where, according to reports from the officials, he is one of the best behaved prisoners ever sent there. Far from being insane, he is doing his work well, and is, in fact, a model in his ward. The danger I wish to point out is this. If mercy has been granted to Shortis for the reason I have mentioned, why should not every criminal condemned to be hanged hereafter address himself to the same authority and obtain the same treatment; and if he does not, the people will believe that he is not treated according to justice. I remember a case, which I believe the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will remember very well, that of old Chatelle, in the province of Ontario. He was an old French-Canadian from St. Hyacinthe. He was, I think, a fool of the first water. That is my impression, the crime he committed was so horrible. He committed this crime in Ontario, was accused and brought into court. He had no lawyer and no money and no friends. Still, the court did not even ask, as is generally done, a lawyer to defend him for nothing, which I have seen done in Montreal very often. He stood his trial without any lawyer to defend him; sixty witnesses, I believe, were examined, and his case went through in the one day. He was found guilty, and condemned to be hanged the very same night. Some people expressed doubts as to the legality of that condemnation. The rapidity with which the trial had gone and the fact that this man, by the answer he gave to the court, showed he was entirely a maniac, convinced them that he was wrongly convicted. I will not say that he was not responsible for his acts, but petitions and demands were sent in that he should not be executed, but that his sentence should be commuted, and these were refused. I believe that the ex-Minister of Justice did well to refuse them. I believe that Chatelle deserved to be hanged; but if Chatelle deserved to be hanged, under the circumstances, why did not Shortis deserve the same fate under similar circumstances? We might understand the influences which have prevailed in this case, but the people in the country do not, and that is why I say that this has done, I think, to the administration of justice in this country more harm than could have been imagined by those responsible. Now, there was a question the other day in the papers about arresting Shortis once more for the murder of Leboeuf. My impression is that the case of Shortis will be a bad precedent for a long while. I do not say that the Government did not—because I have not the papers—but it strikes me that if the Government had purely and simply advised the Governor General that the law should follow its course, there would have been no commutation of the sentence. That is my impression. Now, if there has been a commutation of sentence, we shall see the reasons why that commutation was made. But, in the meantime, we can say this: Suppose that the government of the province of Quebec—and it is not yet decided—should again arrest Shortis and again bring him to trial for the murder of Leboeuf. It may look small to speak of a question of money in this case, though I believe the Shortis trial must have cost the province $15,000 or $20,000. To try him again would impose upon the province a further expenditure of a like sum. And even if he were found guilty of murder in the case of Leboeuf, my opinion is that those who have commuted the sentence in this case, to be logical, to be consistent, would have to commute the second sentence of death into imprisonment for life. So, what is the use of a second trial? What I dread is that the administration of justice, at any rate in the district of Beauharnois, will be but inexpensive in future cases—that the people will carry it on themselves. It is a terrible thing to speak of, but my impression is that if another murder were committed in Valleyfield in the way this was committed, there would be no trial and no chance for a commutation of sentence—the murderer would be hanged to the first telephone pole. This is the danger, not only in Beauharnois, but everywhere else throughout the country. This danger is a terrible one, for, if the great mass of the people lose confidence in the administration of justice, how can you keep them within the law? They will take the law into their own hands; and if they do, what will you do with your code and your books of law? I have been informed that the other day a question was asked in this House by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as to the constitutionality of the act of His Excellency the Governor General. I shall not speak about that, for it will be useless to discuss it before the papers come down. Now, I may put this question before I finish these remarks: If anything wrong has been done, if no satisfactory explanation can be given why such a departure from the ordinary course of justice should have been made, would it not be possible for the whole procedure to be undone and matters put again in the same position as they were before? Now, we were told—I think I have seen it in the newspapers, though I am not quite sure—that some of the members of the Cabinet were opposed to the death penalty. I have no doubt that some of the members of the Government, and also members of this House are conscientiously opposed to capital punishment. Very well, Mr. Speaker, then the question of capital punishment may be a matter to be discussed in this House. Let a Bill on the subject be prepared and let the matter be decided after debate by the representatives of the people. If it then becomes law that capital punishment shall no longer be inflicted, we shall have the same law for all, for those in poor circumstances as for those in good circumstances. But, until that is done, the commutation of the sentence of death, except for just cause, is a gross miscarriage of justice. I have no words admissible in parliamentary debate strong enough to express my indignation at the conduct of this man since his reprieve. He has been telling all with whom he conversed how he acted during that trial, has been telling the sheriff of Beauharnois all that he did in Valleyfield, and has been saying that he knew from the first he would not be hanged, that certain parties were working for him; and has been saying, moreover, since being sent to the penitentiary, that he would not be there very long, and that again he would set foot upon the soil of Ireland. Well, if ever Shortis leaves the penitentiary he had better return to Ireland and not again set foot upon the soil of Canada. But I do not believe that Shortis will ever leave the penitentiary, except to ascend the scaffold, and I say that it rests with those who have charge of the administration of justice to make it clear to the people of the country that, at least, he will be kept where he is now for the remainder of his days. Now, Mr. Speaker, reserving to myself the right to speak again on this motion, I beg to move the resolution of which I have given notice.

Mr. DICKEY. I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman sincerely felt the sentiment he expressed at the beginning of his remarks—a sense of the serious responsibility under which he lay in bringing this matter before the House. I may say, Sir, on behalf of the Government, that no objection will be made to bringing down the papers which are asked for. All I wish to do now is to deprecate any discussion on the merits of the case until the information is before the House. The hon. gentleman has stated somewhat in detail the particulars attending the act of this young man, Shortis, and I am quite free to say that they are of such a character that they never seem to grow old. I can quite understand that the bare recital of these facts, which we have read, perhaps, over and over again, is quite sufficient to make every one within the sound of the hon. gentleman's voice thrill with horror at the crime that was committed. But, of course, as the hon. gentleman well observed, that is not the question at issue here, the crime having been practically undefended, as the hon. gentleman has said, so far as the facts were concerned. It may seem somewhat presumptuous in me, being somewhat young in the office which I now occupy, to offer some observations to the House, on the general subject of parliamentary inquiry into the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. I am not able, as a matter of fact, to treat the subject exhaustively, but I desire to make one or two observations upon the point. In the first place, I think that the House should not forget that the exercise of the prerogative of mercy is part of the administration of the criminal law. The functions which Council discharges in connection with crime in this country, are part of the machinery by which the country deals with crime, just as much as the functions of judge and jury, though of a somewhat different character. Therefore I trust that this House, in approaching this question, particularly since I am quite aware that strong feelings are aroused, will not forget that in discussing this question it is discussing the administration of a part of the criminal law of the country. I fancy that any hon. gentleman will quite realize that no more painful duty can be cast upon the members of Council than to decide the issue of the life or death of a fellow-man. It is, I need scarcely say, quite beyond the range of political considerations; it is a matter of conscience for every man upon his oath to settle. I am quite sure that every hon. member of this House will realize the very serious character of the responsibility that is thrown upon members of Council in that connection. Now, I do not wish the House to understand me for one moment as intimating that this House has no right to inquire into the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. I fully admit that, but I wish both sides of the House, as well as the hon. gentleman who made this motion, to join with me in maintaining the dignity of the administration of justice, even when it reaches a point upon which we feel strongly that injustice has been done. It is not incompetent for this House to discuss the proceedings of the courts, it is within our powers. We all know with what great care that power is exercised, and how extremely inexpedient it is that it should be frequently exercised; so that while I do not in the slightest degree pretend to deny to the House the constitutional right of investigating this subject, and of requiring the responsibility to be assumed by those constitutionally charged to assume it, I wish to say to the House that I do hope that in undertaking that investigation they will be most careful to do so in such a manner as not to injure the general course of the administration of justice, and to be sure that they have all the information at their hands. Now, I do not propose to do more than cite to the House, in support of what I have said, the opinions of Lord Macaulay and the opinion of Sir Robert Peel. They are both familiar to those hon. gentlemen who have read Todd, but it seems to me that they are very impressive. It is quite true that they were not speaking on an occasion exactly like this; they were speaking on an occasion where the English House of Commons was invited to interfere directly, or by resolution, in the administration of the prerogative of mercy. But their views are exactly pertinent now. Lord Macaulay said:

I have no hesitation in saying with regard to this power—the prerogative of mercy—that I would rather entrust it in the hands of the very worst ministry that ever held office, than allow it to be exercised under the direction of the very best House of Commons. * * * If you think the ministry do not exercise the prerogative of mercy where they ought, then, address the Crown to remove them.

He goes on in the same direction, deprecating the direct interference of the House of Commons. Sir Robert Peel also says on that occasion:

If anything could tend to strengthen my conviction of the impolicy of discussing a question of legal punishment like the one before us, in a popular assembly, the speech of the hon. colleague of the gentleman who brought forward this motion, would have that effect.

He goes on further to discuss the very bad effect of bringing questions of this sort before a popular assembly. I quote these opinions, not to question the jurisdiction of this House in the premises, but to show this House the grave responsibility which men of such high position as Lord Macaulay and Sir Robert Peel felt was assumed by the House when it took cognizance of a question like this; and I ask the House to reserve their judgment until the papers in this matter have been brought down. Every hon. gentleman who is connected with the administration of justice knows that the report of the judge who tried the case, is of critical importance in settling questions of this kind. No lawyer in the House would pretend to offer an opinion on this subject until he had the report of the judge who tried the case. There are other papers of immense importance in this case. I may say on behalf of the Government that there is not the slightest wish to evade any constitutional responsibility in this matter. When the papers come down the Government will be quite prepared to take all the constitutional responsibility that belongs to them in connection with this matter, and all I ask now is that the discussion shall not be precipitated, undertaking that the preparation of the answer to this return shall be forwarded with all possible speed so that we may get it soon before the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman whether it is the experience of the department that letters and petitions are received in favour of the execution. Is that a usual thing in the department?

Mr. DICKEY. No, I think it is not.

Mr. LAURIER. I quite agree with my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, that this is not a time nor an occasion to discuss the merits of the case of Valentine Shortis. Whether the sentence of the law should have been carried out or whether mercy should have been extended to him, is a question which, I agree with him altogether, cannot be debated at this time. I doubt if, under the circumstances which have attended this case, that question can be debated at any time; at all events, I am quite clear that this is not the time or the place. But there is another question which arises in regard to this case, and it is this: Have the Government of Canada, have the advisers of His Excellency, discharged the duty which is theirs to discharge, when they failed, as it is a matter of fact that they did fail, to advise His Excellency as to whether the sentence should be commuted or not. There is no man who, at this stage of the case, would feel at all disposed to pass an opinion as to whether the sentence should have been carried out. But the hon. gentleman who has just spoken knows, and the House also knows, that in this matter, the prerogative of mercy is now to be exercised in the same manner as it is exercised in England. It is no longer the prerogative of the Sovereign that may be exercised at his own discretion, according to the dictates of his judgment or his heart, but he must act upon the responsibility of his ministerial advisers. Sir, it is a matter of fact, the ministerial press have received the authoritative statement from the Government themselves, that in this matter they failed and refused to discharge a duty which they owed to His Excellency in advising him whether he should extend mercy or not. On 1st day January, the day before the sentence should have been executed at Beauharnois, the ministerial press published the following authoritative statement—I quote from the "Mail and Empire," of Toronto:—

Ottawa, January 1st (Special).—Regarding the announcement that the death sentence of Valentine Shortis has been commuted to imprisonment for life, the following statement, which is official and authoritative, has been given to your correspondent:—

It is understood that, after a number of meetings of the Council, at which the case of the prisoner Shortis was discussed, the Cabinet not having recommended any interference with the sentence of the court, His Excellency the Governor General made representations to the Home Government by cable, stating the facts, and received a reply to the effect that in such a case his duty would be to exercise his own judgment. His Excellency thereupon decided that, under the circumstances, the sentence should be commuted to imprisonment for life. The necessary steps have been taken to carry out the decision of His Excellency. There can be no doubt that a criminal lunatic asylum will be Shortis' future place of confinement.

It appears, however, that this course was not carried out, from what the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has stated to the House, but Shortis was sent to the penitentiary. The correspondence goes on to say—and it is to this point I specially wish to call the attention of the House—as follows:—

Mr. LAURIER.

From the above statement it is clear that Valentine Shortis escapes the gallows solely through the intervention of Lord Aberdeen on his behalf.

In this paragraph I consider we have the whole matter. The Government refused from first to last to shoulder the responsibility as to what should be done with the prisoner. The question had been raised as to his insanity and decided; it had been raised again before the Executive; the Executive failed, however, to assume the responsibility, they failed to advise the Governor General. His Excellency then asked for instructions in England; the instructions he received were that he was at liberty to exercise his own judgment in the matter. I agree with my hon. friend that this is not the time to discuss the propriety or impropriety of the decision that was arrived at; but this is the time to discuss the fact that the Government in this matter refrained from discharging an important duty they owed to the Sovereign as well as to this country. Why was not that advice given the representative of the Sovereign had a right to receive?

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman will find out when the papers come down.

Mr. LAURIER. I find that the Government have not discharged an important duty in this regard. We have been told that the advisers of His Excellency were divided, seven on one side and seven on the other.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where does the hon. gentleman find that statement?

Mr. LAURIER. I think it is in the correspondence here,—I may be wrong as to that. But I assume that the report of the Minister of Justice was against commuting the sentence. I assume that in this matter the Minister of Justice followed the precedent laid down and placed before this House in the matter of Louis Riel. The Governor General at that time was in a similar position. A petition had then been submitted for the commutation of Riel, and the Government came to the conclusion that as the fact of the insanity of Riel had been passed upon by the jury, the Government could not undertake to review the sentence of the jury. Let me recall the words that were spoken in the debate on that occasion by the then Minister of Justice. Sir John Thompson said:

I admit that, when a man has political delusions, there may be a connection between his delusions and his crimes, but that is a question to be submitted to the jury. In this case it was submitted to the jury, with the most liberal instructions by the judge, and the finding of that jury, sustained by judgments in appeal, was that he was undoubtedly the subject of political delusions, but that his conduct was not so connected with them as to lessen his culpability. I admit that a jury ought to be careful in such cases to ascertain that there is no connection between the delusion and the crime, but in this case the great patience exercised by the jury in sifting the fact, and the careful scrutiny this case received on appeal, show that the jury discharged their duties carefully and conscientiously.

In this matter no one will pretend that the jury in the Shortis case did not discharge their duty carefully and conscientiously, and I presume, though I have not seen the report of the Minister of Justice, which will come before us later on, this is admitted; and I have no doubt, following that precedent, the then Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) refused to allow the sentence to be commuted, and that he reported against commutation. I cannot conceive that he did otherwise, in view of the precedent laid down on the celebrated occasion to which I have referred. Something, therefore, must have taken place in Council, which we do not know, but the result of which was that the hon. gentleman's advice was not accepted and the Ministers refused to abide by his report; something occurred in Council, which I cannot understand, but we know as a fact that the advisers of His Excellency deliberately declined to discharge the duty they owed to His Excellency, and not only to him but to the people of Canada. That is the question we have to deal with at the present time, and I conceive the Government cannot escape responsibility of the charge that on this occasion they were guilty of gross dereliction of duty towards the Sovereign and towards the people.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will appeal to hon. gentlemen, notwithstanding the observations which have fallen from the leader of the Opposition, to follow the advice or suggestion of the Minister of Justice, not only as regards the question involved in the motion of the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), but also as regards the equally important question which the leader of the Opposition has touched upon. The hon. gentleman has been compelled to direct the attention of this House to that important phase of the subject by relying upon assumptions, and I will point out to him the difficulties in which the House will find itself placed in following up the subject he has opened this afternoon, when I confess to him my own embarrassment from not knowing at this precise moment how far I am at liberty to go in regard to the facts of the case until these papers are brought down and the records are before us, to revive my recollection of the action of Council and other matters, which the hon. leader of the Opposition considers to be important by referring to them so emphatically. Until this is done, I am utterly unable to discuss the subject as thoroughly as I hope to be able to do at a later period. I desire also to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the danger of dealing with so important a subject without full and proper information. For instance, before referring to his observations particularly, I would refer to the fact, that the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), in referring to the case of Shortis has travelled over ground and referred to facts of which we have no information whatever, and I doubt very much in regard to some of his statements whether any information can be given to this House to bear them out. For instance, there is a report mentioned by the hon. gentleman with respect to Shortis at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. When I left the Department of Justice no such report had been received, and I should like to know how the hon. member obtained information in regard to the conduct of this prisoner since he was sentenced.

Mr. BERGERON. I have seen it in the newspapers—I have seen it two or three times.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That shows the danger of discussing a subject of this importance on mere rumour or newspaper report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is a Government organ.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A Government organ, the hon. gentleman says, but the hon. the leader of the Opposition must find how unreliable that authority may be on an occasion of this kind, as he had to admit that the statement of the 2nd of January was shown not to be entirely correct, because it referred to the decision of His Excellency the Governor General in reference to sending this prisoner to the lunatic asylum instead of to the penitentiary. In that very correction we have what I should think ought to influence the House very much indeed. These two subjects are interesting, and the two subjects are reported. I have no doubt they will be thoroughly and fully discussed in this House, and that a proper spirit in reference to the discussion will prevail. I appeal to the House again, that it is better not to accept any of the features of the case at the present moment, for within a very reasonable time we may expect all of these papers, which, although important ones, are not very long.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). These petitions, of course, were to His Excellency the Governor General, "per se." They were referred to the Department of the Minister, and he reported. Was there any answer, or advice, given to His Excellency with reference to these petitions?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see, of course, that in my individual case, I am not able to give an answer at the present moment. I can tell the hon. gentleman really nothing just now, and I must go by the record that is produced. I have my own strong opinions on both of these subjects, and when the papers are here, I will be better able to ascertain how far the record will allow me to put my own opinions, as fully as I would like, before this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You could obtain leave.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but I think the papers which the Minister of Justice has consented, so far as he is concerned, should be brought before the House, would be all any hon. gentleman would require, to understand every important feature of the case. I do not propose to admit a theory which the leader of the Opposition has adopted, that there was, under any circumstances—even under the assumptions which he has made to-day—a failure on the part of the Executive, in regard to the responsibility.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When there is an application for mercy, certainly the Government must pass upon it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not the question the hon. gentleman raised; the hon. gentleman raised a question even more important than that. But, I would point out to-day, just briefly, a distinction that I propose later on, and on a fitting occasion, to elaborate. It is a distinction that I should think ought to be borne in mind in regard to the responsibility of the Executive here, in connection with this claim of prerogative of mercy. The hon. the leader of the Opposition will forgive me, I hope, if I correct his statement as to the practice in England. The practice in England in this case, has nothing to do with the Cabinet, or with the Executive, as such. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that it has now fallen on the Home Secretary, and that he is individually responsible.

Mr. LAURIER. It is part of his ministerial responsibility.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But he is individually responsible, and he, and he only, would be responsible to Parliament. That is, I think, beyond question; but it points to us, it seems to me, a distinction between the responsibility of the Executive as a rule, and their responsibility in these peculiar cases. If that be so in England, it is more remarkable in connection with the Government of this country, because, when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) was a member of the Government, he will remember that the Imperial Government "did not permit" the Government of this country to exercise any responsibility whatever upon this subject of prerogative. And, so much was this the case, that there are records in the department, and records in our own authorities here on parliamentary procedure and practice, showing that the Governor

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

General of the day made it a point, in his order, in a certain important case, that he had acted so, wholly regardless of the advice or opinion of the Executive. That decision was so extraordinary in the minds of the advisers of His Excellency that Mr. Blake, as Minister of Justice, took up the subject and proceeded to England. But, up to 1877 we have it beyond dispute, that the Governors General—before confederation, and afterwards—in regard to the exercise of this prerogative, acted upon their own individual responsibility. Now, in 1877, this mission of Mr. Blake's took place, and, to a large extent, it was satisfactory; but, nevertheless, he came back with an admitted anomaly, in regard to the difference that exists in this matter between a self-governing colony and the mother country. For instance, there is no question in Great Britain as to the responsibility for every act of the sovereign; but in Canada, I have pointed out one distinction that exists, and the distinction remains to this day. No lawyer in this House will deny that, notwithstanding the new instructions subsequent to Mr. Blake's mission, the Governor General is instructed again in terms, that in a matter concerning the prerogative of mercy, where Imperial interests are involved—for instance, in a case of treason or a crime of that character—he has there again to act upon his own individual judgment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Foreigners.

Mr. IVES. Not necessarily foreigners.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. According to all constitutional authorities in connection with the British Government, we know that that is an anomaly. It does not exist in England, and therefore we must in fairness, or for academic purposes, or any reason whatever, remember in this House, that we do not stand here as regards the Governor General in exactly the same position. The Government here do not stand in regard to the Governor General in exactly the same position as Her Majesty's Government in England in regard to the Queen. I admit that that is an anomaly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are you arguing in reference to cases where Imperial interests are involved?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but I do not now say that it applies in this case. I am only showing that there is a departure in Canada, from that rule of responsibility on the part of the Executive which obtained in the mother country. That brings one down to other features in connection with the latest instructions; and the interesting question which I think will be found to be involved in the Shortis case, when the papers are here, is whether these instructions have carried out fully the intention—of certainly Mr. Blake and the Government which he represented in 1877—or whether they require to be further amended. According to one view, there is still a case, outside of the case where Imperial interests are involved, in which the Governor General, under instructions from England, may act on his own individual judgment. If that be so, I will go with any hon. gentleman in this House for pressing in a proper manner upon the attention of the Imperial authorities that that distinction should be obliterated, and that the only case which should be considered as one from which this Government are free of responsibility, would be a case where these Imperial interests are directly involved. I mention this to-day, not for the purpose of discussing it, but in order to show that the question is not only of the importance that has been suggested, but that it is too great and too important, indeed, to be discussed in the absence of the records.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. ex-Minister of Justice has informed the House that where Imperial interests are concerned, as they would be in the case of the trial of a political offender who was a foreigner, the Imperial Government have reserved for themselves certain authority with respect to the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. Well, Sir, that is outside of this case, so that it is wholly unnecessary to consider it. What we have to consider is whether any such rule as the hon. gentleman has invoked applies to this case. The hon. gentleman has referred to a case in which he said the Governor had exercised the prerogative on his own authority. That was the case in which Lord Dufferin had exercised the prerogative alone. But in that case the offence was committed outside of our jurisdiction. It was committed in a territory foreign to this country at the time. The territory was not then embraced in Canada; it became a portion of Canada some time subsequently; and, when that offence was committed, it was an offence against the law of England, committed in a territory under the jurisdiction of England.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman say that in that case that was one of the reasons which induced the Governor General to act?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That was one of the considerations; and if the hon. gentleman will look at Lord Carnarvon's speech, where that matter was discussed, he will find that that fact is mentioned. Even if it were different it would be a matter of no consequence in this case. The point here is that the petitions asking for the commutation of this man's sentence were placed before His Excellency as the representative of Her Majesty, and these petitions were such as His Excellency could not act upon without the advice of his Ministers; and so his Ministers would be called upon to advise His Excellency on that subject. Now, what advice did these hon. gentlemen give to His Excellency in respect to the prayer of those petitions?

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman know of a case in which advice was given to His Excellency on a petition in a case of commutation?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why, Sir, the petitions are all referred by His Excellency to his Ministers for advice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would not the commutation state the facts, and then say, "His Excellency is pleased to grant," etc., according to the wording of the commutation?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That would be the mere formal language of the Secretary of State. Does the hon. gentleman say that the law would be allowed to take its course if the petition were not presented at all? I say that is not the rule. If it was the proceeding in this case, it was a most irregular proceeding, and is not the rule followed in the office of the Secretary of State for Home Affairs. The act must be on the part of the proper officer entrusted with the administration of the law. Take the case of Comin, who was convicted of a capital offence in Ireland. A petition was presented to George IV., and he directed that a commutation of the sentence should issue, without reference to his Ministers. The Duke of Wellington was Prime Minister, and Sir Robert Peel was Secretary of State for the Home Department. The latter was very indignant at what had taken place, and informed His Majesty that he could not act without the authority of his Ministers. The Lord Lieutenant was instructed that the law must take its course, and Comin was executed, notwithstanding the fact that the king undertook to exercise the prerogative of mercy on his behalf. I mention that as an instance showing that in all such matters the proceedings ought to be regular, and on the advice of responsible Ministers. That advice to His Excellency is not given by the Minister of Justice, but by the Council. The instructions to the Governor are to that effect, and the instructions in that particular would no doubt be followed. When the papers are brought down, we shall no doubt be better prepared to discuss this question; but there can be no doubt that whatever is done is done upon the responsibility of the Ministers, whether they act or whether they abstain from acting. If they informed His Excellency that they were unable to agree, or if they refused to advise him with respect to those petitions, then they abnegated their functions in forcing His Excellency to look elsewhere for the advice which he was constitutionally entitled to receive from them.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not find that the language of the motion—

Mr. O'BRIEN. My hon. friend will allow me one moment. If this discussion is to go on, let us understand it; but if it is to be dropped until the papers come down, it is as well that we should act on that understanding. If one speech is to be given, and then another, there will be no stopping the discussion. We should either drop it altogether or go on with it.

Mr. MULLOCK. I am not going to discuss the motion. I rose because the original motion was not full enough. I understand—if we can know anything from general information—that when the case went before Council no decision was arrived at, and no Order in Council was issued. Therefore, I would like to ascertain what became of the application, and what action, if any, the Council took; and I was going to ask, if my hon. friend has no objection, that the following should be added to the motion:—

Also for a statement showing whether any petition for the commutation of the death sentence were submitted to Council, and what decision, if any, was arrived at in regard thereto.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BRODEUR. Before this motion is carried, I would like to make a few observations, because I have on the Order paper a motion similar to the one which has been made by the hon. member for Beauharnois; but my motion goes a little further than his. The hon. member for Beauharnois has made a statement which has led the House to believe that this man Shortis got a very fair trial, and that the commutation of the sentence should not have been made. Well, I ask by my motion that the record and the evidence should also be brought down.

Mr. DICKEY. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would suggest that it would be better for him to make a separate motion for that; otherwise it would very much delay the return to this motion.

Mr. DAVIN. Would it not be better to act on the suggestion of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), because if we go on discussing the question, we shall all want to discuss it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BRODEUR. I think it would be proper also for the Government to declare to-day whether the statement that was published in the Government organs on the 2nd January was correct or not. For example, I see in the Montreal "Gazette" of that date a statement which is declared by that paper to be official. It is published as a despatch from Ottawa, and it reads as follows:—

The statement made in this correspondence last night, that the death sentence of Valentine Shortis had been commuted by His Excellency the Governor General to imprisonment for life, is officially confirmed to-day. It is understood that, after a number of meetings of Council, at which the case of the prisoner Shortis was discussed, and the Cabinet not having recommended any interference with the sentence of the court, His Excellency the Governor General made representations to the Home Government by cable, stating the facts, and having received a reply to the effect that in such a case his duty would be to exercise his own judgment, decided that, under the circumstances, the sentence should be commuted to imprisonment for life. The necessary steps have been taken to carry out the decision of His Excellency, and there can be no doubt that a criminal lunatic asylum will be Shortis' future place of confinement.

Now this statement is absolutely the same as the one published on the same day in the "Mail and Empire," and which was quoted by the leader of the Opposition. I do not see, therefore, why the Government should not tell us at once whether that statement is correct or not. It was published in the two Government organs in Toronto, and, I also think, in the "Citizen" of this city, and I should like to know if it is correct or not, as I think that will help us in the discussion which will take place later on this question.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When the warrant is brought down, it will give the hon. gentleman the information on that point.

Mr. BRODEUR. Then am I to understand that the statement is not accurate?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The leader of the Opposition said it is evidently incorrect, and I say so too, as regards the last part.

Mr. BRODEUR. The last part says that the sentence has been commuted to imprisonment for life, and no doubt necessary steps have been taken to carry out the decision of His Excellency, and there can be no doubt that a criminal lunatic asylum will be Shortis's future place of confinement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That part is obviously incorrect.

Mr. BRODEUR. Then I understand that the first part is correct?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think so. The imprisonment for life is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. BRODEUR. Then I do not understand why the Government should not be willing to-day to discuss the constitutional features, when, on the 2nd of January, they gave to their papers the official announcement I have just quoted. I think the Government should be willing to bring down the papers immediately and to give, at all events, an answer to that question, because if we are going to wait for the papers, we may be kept waiting months, perhaps two or three years, as has happened in some cases I brought and which concern my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron).

I think that it would have been only fair on the part of the Government to tell us to-day that that first part of the statement was correct or not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is perfectly evident that when the papers come down this House will discuss, probably at some length, the responsibility which attaches to the Government, the advisers of His Excellency, for the commutation of the sentence of Shortis. It is perfectly evident to both sides that that discussion will be very important and that we should have all the papers necessary to a proper discussion. The address has been already amended in certain directions by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), but there was an interjection into the debate by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) during a speech made by my hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), which leads me to believe that some of the papers are not called for, which it will be necessary for us to have. I did not quite catch the exact meaning of the hon. gentleman's interruption. What he led me to understand was that he doubted whether there ever had been a case in which the advisers of His Excellency had given their advice on such a question.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all. The hon. member for Bothwell was stating to the House that petitions were referred to the Council, and what answer we gave to the petitions for commutation. I asked the hon. gentleman whether he was aware of petitions ever having been presented to the Council for commutation and of an answer being given by the Privy Council?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am speaking from personal knowledge, and I know myself that this has been done.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is what I understood. I have no experience of it personally, but as a lawyer I never doubted that such was the almost universal practice.

Mr. HAGGART. I am not aware of it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is perfectly plain to my mind from the statement made by the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) informing the House that in certain particulars the official report which was read by the leader of the Opposition was not accurate. It is perfectly evident that these portions of that report which were not denied may be accepted approximately as correct, and it is now admitted, I think, that His Excellency cabled to the Colonial Secretary asking for advice in this matter. It seems to me that it will be essential to a proper discussion on this subject, that any cablegrams which His Excellency sent to the Home Office and any received in reply should be laid before the House along with the other papers. I therefore move to amend the Address by adding the following words:—

Also for any correspondence between His Excellency the Governor General and the Colonial Secretary, whether by cablegram or otherwise, on the same subject.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would suggest that in the original motion the word "report" should read "reports" by the judge, because there were two reports.

Mr. SCRIVER. Before that motion is submitted, I desire to say a word or two. With the general tone of the remarks of my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), I could find no fault. He certainly gave, so far as I know, not only a very vivid but a very accurate description of the events of this unfortunate case, but he did say something to which I must express my emphatic dissent. He led this House to suppose that the feeling of indignation is so great in the district which he and I have the honour in common to represent, that there would be great danger, on the recurrence of any similar event, of the people of that district taking the law into their own hands. I cannot allow such an imputation to rest upon what I know to be a law-abiding community. I do not think there is the slightest danger, under any circumstances, that the people of that district would be disposed to import and put into exercise the vile practices which prevail in another country under similar circumstances, and I express my emphatic dissent from the opinion to which my hon. friend has given utterance.

Mr. MULOCK. There appears to be some question—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has spoken already to the main motion.

Mr. MULOCK. But there is an amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. The amendment has been put and carried, and the question now is on the main motion as amended.

Main motion, as amended, agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the duty on agricultural implements should be removed.

He said: This motion is one of great importance to the North-west Territories and to Manitoba. Mr. Speaker, I fear that many hon. gentlemen in this House and out of it find it difficult to understand the discussions which sometimes arise in connection with the tariff. The average political mind seems equal to the task of understanding the politician who will vote for a protective tariff without any modification whatever, or the politician who says that he is opposed to protection and will vote against every form of protective tariff. But the man who says : I am in favour of protection and, under certain circumstances, protection may mean the abolition of all duties whatever, is not understood. For, what is the object of all protection ? The real object of all protection is not to protect the manufacturers, but to protect the country itself. If the main object of protection was to protect manufacturers without any consideration for the country at large, why that protection, by the very statement of the formula of it, is condemned as iniquitous. And so the protective tariff must be framed to so affect the industries of the country as to bring the greatest possible advantage to the country itself. Now, Sir, in this motion I declare in favour of removing the duties on agricultural implements going into the North-west Territories. And why do I do so ? For this reason : I hold, and all persons who thoroughly understand what a protective tariff should be, hold to these propositions—that under a protective tariff a duty should be imposed only when necessary to the healthy existence of the native industry affected ; and that when imposed, it should be no higher than is necessary for protection. Our object is not excluding as to the foreign article, but fostering as to the native article. The aim is not to absolutely deprive the local market of healthy competition from abroad. You do not aim at giving the local or home manufacturer an extravagant profit ; what you aim at is enabling him to carry on his manufacture free from designed and destructive competition from the outside manufacturers. And if you were to find that any industry was, in consequence of your tariff, making an excessive profit, that would be a time at once to interfere. And I hold that there is another time for interfering also, and that is when your tariff brings about a monopoly. The object to aim at is an equilibrium between the needs of the local industry and the interest of the community.

Mr. SCRIVER. Scientific protection.

Mr. DAVIN. Exactly. As my hon. friend says, scientific protection. Now, Mr. Speaker, this requires constant care and occasional readjustment. My friends of the Opposition might think that that is a peculiarity of a protective tariff law. Not at all. All social philosophers and thinkers on the subject of laws in all countries and at all times have laid down this general proposition—that all laws have the tendency to inure to the advantage of the rich rather than the poor. And, Sir, though here espousing the cause of the farmers of the North-west Territories and the farmers of Manitoba, I am in principle assailing a large number of interests, and, directly, one great interest, and therefore taking what must be an unpopular position for a politician. For, though the interest one assails is singular, the votes that interest will affect are many. It may be said, and is said, and might properly be said, for instance, by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), if he were to speak—and as I have again and again shown in this House and on a hundred platforms—the prices of agricultural implements have fallen in consequence of the National Policy. The prices of agricultural implements to-day are vastly lower than they were before the National Policy, and that reduction is, in the main, in consequence of the National Policy. But although that is so, and although that is a strong point to make in favour of the National Policy when discussing it generally, yet, when discussing one item, as we are here to-day, that fact does not estop us from contending, in regard to this item, that in order to reach the equilibrium between the interests of the community and the needs of the manufacturing industry, it may be a good thing either to get rid of the duty altogether or to lower the duty. My hon. friend, the ex-Controller of Customs, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), has declared that to take away the duty from agricultural implements would be to the advantage of Manitoba and the North-west, but it would be no advantage to Ontario. Now, Sir, in regard to the large agricultural implements, in regard to the implements, for instance, which the Massey-Harris Co. sell in the North-west Territories, the protection that is at present afforded is not required. And I will tell you why. It was stated within these very walls a few years ago by that company's leading man, that less protection than they have at the present moment—I think at that time he said 15 per cent—would be quite sufficient for them. Not only that, but my hon. friend the ex-Controller of Customs was wrong in supposing that this firm could not take their staples into the American market. At the present moment they declare that they are likely to go to Lockport. If they are likely to cross the line and to establish a manufactory there, it is clear that they do not fear those patents of which we sometimes hear. It is clear also that they feel confident that they could hold their own in the United States market. And as a matter of fact, as was more than once shown in this House by myself, and, I think, by my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), in foreign countries divided from us by vast stretches of sea, they hold their own against the world. Under those circumstances, the need for protection in their case does not exist, and all cause for protection disappears. Is it necessary, therefore, to retain that protection in order to foster that industry ? Clearly not. They can live elsewhere ; they themselves declare they can live in the United States against the competition that they would have here if this duty were taken away. Not only is it to be kept up then for the sake of the duty. Why, the duty is infinitesimal. To show that the North-west and Manitoba are the most interested in this matter, I may say that the importation from the United States into Manitoba of harvesters, self-binding and without binders, for the year ending June, 1895, amounted to 645, valued at $61,392. There were entered for home consumption, 685, valued at $65,392, and paying a duty of $13,078. There were only 151 imported into Ontario. Only a very small number came into the North-west Territories, but I cannot say what number, because they would be credited to Manitoba. Again, in regard to mowing machines, nearly seven and a half times as many came into Manitoba as came into Ontario.

Mr. DAVIN.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return of all Orders in Council and official correspondence, and all other documents, not already laid on the Table of this House, in reference to the Manitoba school question.—(Mr. La-Rivière.)

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. MULLOCK. Before Public Bills and Orders are called, I desire to mention a matter relating to the Militia Department. I have received a communication from two gentlemen connected with the Royal Military College Club, in which they mention to me that the Board of Visitors of the Royal Military College, which has been put into active operation in consequence of a discussion last year, had met at Kingston in October last, and drawn up a report, making certain recommendations, and these recommendations they desire to be acted upon at the earliest possible date. In the communication to me they intimate that possibly the report may not be made public during the present session, or, perhaps, during the present fiscal year, and they ask me to call the attention of the Government to the report, and express the hope that it will be laid upon the Table of the House at an early date, so that the House can consider the recommendation. In compliance with their request, I bring the matter now to the attention of the Government.

Mr. DICKEY. While I was at the head of the Militia Department I became cognizant of that report, and intended to lay it on the Table of the House. But I omitted to mention it to my successor in office, and no doubt he was not aware of it. My personal impression was that it should be laid upon the Table of the House at an early date; however, I have no authority from the Government for stating that. I will consult with the head of the department, and if he agrees with me, I will bring the report down, or ask my colleague to send it down. There are some recommendations in it to which I attach great weight, and with me it was only a question of time when those recommendations should be taken up.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND THE MAINLAND.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I ask your indulgence for one moment to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and of the Postmaster General, to the condition of the mail service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I want to know whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has yet given instructions to have the ice-boats put on in order to carry the mails for the winter service. During the past week, the winter boat, the "Stanley," was detained by ice at Picton for over five days, and during these five days there were no mails or passengers carried across at all. My correspondents in the Island write me that their only dependence is to have the ice-boats put into service at the earliest possible moment. I think, as a rule, the department, about the latter end of January, does give these instructions. As the steamer has been detained, to the very great inconvenience of the mercantile public, for five days at one stretch, and the possibilities are that she may be detained again for a similar time, the straits there being full of ice, I would earnestly ask the hon. gentleman's immediate attention to this, and ask him to give instructions to-morrow to his agent in Prince Edward Island to have the ice-boats put on in order to avoid a similar delay in the future.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am under the impression that the service has already commenced, but I will not state positively.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. CASEY. Before we proceed with the Orders, I wish to make a brief explanation. Some remarks I made the other day, in discussing the delay in the presentation of the Auditor General's Report, appear to have been taken to imply a censure on the officials of the Finance Department. The words I refer to are these :

The Auditor General has to work with materials sent to him by the Finance Department. He must get vouchers and all sorts of papers from that department before he can complete his report, correct proof, and sign it for printing. It is very much more likely, according to our experience, that the delay has arisen from the slackness of the Finance Department in furnishing the Auditor General with the necessary material, than from any slackness on his part.

I suppose it is hardly necessary for me to say that in these remarks I did not wish to imply any censure upon the officials of that department. The House probably understood them to imply, as I meant them to imply, a political censure upon the political head of that department, for his political conduct of the department. I may say that a letter has been placed in my hands from the Auditor General in which he states distinctly :

The report in this office has not been delayed by the Deputy Head of the Finance Department, or by any one under him.

I make this explanation publicly in order to remove any possible misapprehension that might exist on the subject.

LIABILITY IN CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. McLENNAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 4) respecting the liability of Her Majesty and public companies for labour used in the construction of public works. He said : Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention in proposing this legislation to place any unnecessary responsibility upon the Government, or upon the railway companies. My great desire is to place a law on the statute-book that will furnish some means whereby an honest and poor labouring man can get his day's pay when he has earned it, and prevent irresponsible sub-contractors and men who are really dishonest, depriving labouring men of their wages. In the first section of the Bill I have asked that the Government should be responsible to the amount of money held in their hands for the security of the completion of the work. I will deal with the question of security later on, and all I need say at present is that, after notice is sent and the Government is satisfied that the statement filed is correct, the Government can then pay the men who may have been left unpaid by such contractors. Section 2 is as follows :—

2. Her Majesty may demand that each contractor or sub-contractor shall, not later than the fifteenth day of each month, file in the office of the said Minister, a list showing the names, rate of wages, amounts paid and amounts due and unpaid for wages or labour done by any foreman, workman, labourer or team employed by him during the previous month, and attested upon the oath or statutory declaration of such contractor or sub-contractor, or his authorized agent.

I claim this is a protection to the Government. It is not necessary that the Government should ask such a statement from a contractor unless they have reason to suppose that an attempt is being made to defraud the men employed on the work. I can instance cases in which such a clause would have proved a protection to the Government. In the case of the Curran bridge, the Government took all possible steps to investigate the matter at the earliest possible moment. But, if such a provision as I now suggest had been in force, and such a Bill as the present had been on the statute-book, the Government could have called upon the contractor to furnish a full account under oath or statutory declaration, and if the return was not honestly made up, the Government could at once proceed against him criminally. I understand that the April estimate was not put in until June. There was no law in force to compel the contractor to file a statement in writing ; but under the present provision they would be obliged to file a statement in writing not later than 15th May for work done in April. This would have prevented any fraud or chance of fraud being perpetrated on the Government through estimates and pay sheets having been allowed to lie over from month to month, the Government, I repeat, not being in a position to demand that pay sheets should be filed within a certain specified period. The Government under this Bill would be amply secured for money paid out to the men. On letting a contract they demand 5 per cent deposit. This is put up on the estimate of the whole work, and is more than sufficient to pay any drawback held for wages, because the wages of the workmen form only a small percentage as compared with the other expenses in connection with the work. I draw attention to the fact that every class of the community other than the labouring men is protected in some such way as is here proposed. The manufacturers are protected, and their employees, through our present protective policy are given constant employment. Farmers are also protected, and mechanics are protected through the Mechanics' Lien Law, so that the only men left out are poor labouring men who are paid less for their work than any other class. If it is within the power of Parliament to legislate in this direction, I hope this Bill will pass, for it applies to men whose wives and children are dependent on the husband's daily wage, and every member of this House with a heart within him should make an effort to place a law on the statute-book which would assist in securing justice for these men. Further, the Government retain 10 per cent on every estimate made from month to month until the work is completed. This amounts to a large sum, and is more than sufficient to meet any claim that might be made against the Government. Again, the Government reserve to themselves the right to hold all machinery, horses and plant, that may be upon the work as security for the completion of the work, and, if the contractor is then indebted to the Government, they can sell the machinery, plant and horses for the purpose of securing themselves. Again, the Government grants subsidies to railways. I have had some experience with sub-contractors on railway works ; I have been connected with railway works, and I have seen poor men deprived of their honest day's pay. A company lets a contract. The contractor sub-lets, and, perhaps, the sub-contractor sub-lets again to some irresponsible individual, who goes to that section of the country and represents himself as a practical and competent man. Probably he is an adventurer, who, perhaps, does not own one dollar and possesses only limited experience; but he is ready to take the work at any price, with the idea that, if he cannot make money honestly, he will make it at all events. The work proceeds. At the end of the first month he is behind in his payments, and he finds that the prices he is receiving are not sufficient. He goes to his men and tells them that there is a mistake in the measurements. They have to work until 15th of the following month before they know anything about it. At all events, they accept his story and his assurance that the engineer has made a mistake, and that the estimate will be put all right next month. The men work on for another month. The sub-contractor keeps the money he receives, and on the next pay-day pockets the money for the next estimate, and leaves the place; or again, he tells a story that he cannot get his money, or that the measurements are not correct. Then the workmen go to the original contractor, or to the company, who say: We owe you nothing; we have let the contract and have paid the contractor every dollar coming to him, and we have nothing to do with you. In the end, these poor men are obliged to go without their money. My chief object in this Bill is to make the company responsible for the payment of the wages of the workmen employed upon their work. It often occurs, I regret to say, that the contractor, or sub-contractor who is directly responsible for the payment of the wages, invents some excuse in order to defraud the unfortunate men. Sometimes he resorts to peculiar expedients to excuse his fraudulent intents. He fires a bullet through his hat, or through his coat tails, and cuts up the satchel which was supposed to have contained the money, and when he meets his men he tells them an extraordinary story about his having been robbed. A dishonest person will sometimes make any kind of an excuse for the purpose of defrauding his employees. But, Mr. Speaker, I must say that there are very many respectable and competent sub-contractors who are a credit to the business they are engaged in. This Bill will have the effect of benefiting these respectable men, because it will prevent fraudulent and incompetent men from taking work at prices which they know to be ruinous. Honest sub-contractors will no longer have to compete with those irresponsible persons. Now, Sir, there is no reason why the company should not prevent all such conduct on the part of fraudulent sub-contractors. They have it in their power to safeguard the interests of the workmen, and it is the duty of the Parliament of Canada to compel them to exercise that power. If a company letting a contract, takes precaution to let the work to practical men, men known to be honest, and men of reputation, then the difficulties in connection with the payment of the workmen would be at once removed. But it often happens, that a company will let the work without taking any of these precautions, and in many cases they do not seem to care whether or not the labourers will be paid. There is another feature which enters into this matter of companies letting contracts on large works: and that is, that frequently the work is given out at prices which the company must know very well the contractor cannot afford to do it for. As I have already stated, Mr. Speaker, it is a very great hardship on men, who can least afford to lose their wages, that the present condition of things should be allowed to continue. There is no class of men in our community who are paid so poorly for their work as are the labouring men of Canada. That, Sir, is all the more reason why they should be protected by legislation such as I now propose. I will read to the House the last clause of this Bill. It says:

7. Any number of persons, having similar claims for wages or labour against any company, contractor, or sub-contractor, may consolidate their claims and institute a joint action for the recovery thereof.

Hon. gentlemen will, I think, readily understand my object in incorporating that clause in the Bill. There are many labouring men, who, owing to the small wages they receive, have not very much money coming to them. It amounts sometimes to perhaps $5 or $10, so that they cannot afford to engage a lawyer to fight for their just rights against a powerful and rich corporation. Therefore, it is in my opinion proper, that they should be allowed to unite in one action, in order that they might seek redress and receive justice in the courts of this country. Mr. Speaker, I submit this Bill to the House, trusting that it will meet with the approval of hon. gentlemen here. It is hardly necessary that I should say much more about it, because I know that every member of this House understands it thoroughly. There are, I believe, but few constituencies in the Dominion of Canada, which have not experienced in some degree, the injustice of these frauds being perpetrated on workmen. It is, I think, the duty of every member of this House, regardless of political considerations, to assist in placing upon the statute-books the provisions of this Bill. I confidently ask the support of hon. gentlemen for the measure. I believe that it is the feeling of this House that our labouring men, a most deserving class in the community, should not be badly treated, and imposed upon by those inclined to dishonesty. I believe that hon. gentlemen feel, that it is necessary, even at this late date, that legislation should be passed to protect the labouring classes. There is no part of the United States in which there has not been a law passed for the protection of the labouring men; and persons who take contracts are, in that country, obliged to give heavy bonds before they get any work. Let us not be behind in Canada in this respect. Let this Parliament take means to secure that our workingmen shall be protected.

Mr. KAULBACH. Mr. Speaker, I was fortunate enough to enter the House this moment while the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan) was speaking in advocacy of this Bill, and was much pleased with the remarks the hon. gentleman made. I feel that he is moving in the right direction, and that the measure which he proposes will meet the approval of the House. I am pleased also that he had been prompted by such excellent motives in promoting the Bill. We find that, from time to time, labourers are employed, not only upon railways, but upon other public works, either under the original contractor or under sub-contractors, who sometimes perpetrate frauds upon those poor men who have been giving their honest day's toil for an honest day's wage. I believe it is the duty of this House to protect those workingmen in every way possible. It appears to me, however, that the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan) is not wide enough in its scope, not sufficiently far reaching. It is entitled: "An Act respecting the liability of Her Majesty, and public companies for labour used in the construction of public works." Should not this measure take a wider range, and include labourers on any works for which a contract has been taken, or on any work on which a labourer is employed either by the original contractor or by sub-contractors? We find, that not at all times, works are subsidized by the Government, and we also find that there are works which are constructed without any subsidy at all; works such as electric roads. Whether or not they come under local legislation, I cannot say; but it does appear to me that such works might be embodied as a part and parcel of the Bill. It would then include those employed as labourers, whether they were on Government work or not and thereby protect them. It was not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to say anything on this Bill, but as I came into the House and heard the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan), I thought I might make a comment in favour of the principle of such legislation of so prudent and thoughtful a character. I feel satisfied that the House will look upon this Bill, so ably explained by the hon. member (Mr. McLennan), with such favour that Parliament will feel fully justified in passing it into law.

Mr. MCKAY. Mr. Speaker, the legislation introduced by the hon. member for

Mr. McLENNAN.

Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) is legislation in the right direction. It is in the interests of a large class of the population of this country, a class which up to the present time have had no protection in this direction. Anybody with any knowledge of public works, can recall instances where those workingmen,—who are, as has been stated, the least able to protect themselves,—have been swindled by contractors and by sub-contractors of public works on which they were engaged. We find, Sir, that it has been the custom lately, among those originating railways and other large public works, that a system has been brought into vogue whereby the original promoters of those schemes form themselves into what is called a construction company, and they themselves thus take the contract for completing the work. They use the bonuses and the subsidies, and then issue all the bonds that the scheme will stand. Frequently they let the contracts to what are called sub-contractors. They secure the very lowest possible prices, never thinking or caring whether they are taking the work at a price that will pay them or not. Those men start the work, and it has often been found, as has been stated by the hon. gentleman, that they had taken it at too low a price, and were not able to pay the workmen or the people from whom they got their supplies. In a great many cases the contractors or sub-contractors are not responsible men. Then, contractors from other countries come here, and after the work is done, they leave the country with many debts behind them. We had a case of this kind in the neighbourhood from which I come. It was shown very plainly before the Railway Committee of this House last session that a firm of contractors in Hamilton left the wages of their labouring men unpaid to the amount of $40,000 or $50,000. The work was done in winter, when there was a great many unemployed men who were anxious to get work, and who did not stop to inquire anything about the contractors, taking for granted that they would get their pay. After working for some time, they found that they were not getting paid, and they could not pay their store bills and other debts, and a great deal of suffering was caused. I know cases in which some of those workmen, in order to obtain money, actually sold their wages tickets at 50 cents on the dollar; and some of them are not yet paid. This legislation will prevent anything like that in the future. Other people are protected by the laws to a certain extent; mechanics who work on buildings are protected by the lien law of the province; but the ordinary labouring man, who is less able to protect himself and who is unable to enter into suits against large corporations, has not hitherto been protected by legislation. The introducer of the Bill has gone into the subject fully, so that there is little more for me to say except that I hope the House will see fit to pass the Bill.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, it is very pleasant to hear a matter discussed on the floor of this House occasionally on business rather than partisan grounds. When we find matters of this kind coming up, on which both sides of the House substantially agree, the query is suggested whether we might not be able to agree better about other classes of questions also if it were not for the names which divide us? Now, I think that this Bill of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) is one the principle of which all can approve, whatever criticism may be due to the details. I think it is highly proper that some security should be afforded for the labourer who works under a contractor or a sub-contractor.

I think the provisions of the second clause of the Bill are extremely useful. On one memorable occasion—an occasion so frequently referred to in the party press that it would hardly do to mention it in a friendly discussion like this—they would have prevented very serious frauds upon the revenue of the country. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay) has referred particularly to a case in which this measure would have been extremely useful. Last session a considerable share of the time of the Railway Committee was taken up with attempting to apply to a particular railway company the provisions which this Bill makes general. We inserted a clause in the amended charter of the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Co., to compel the payment of claims such as would be covered by this Bill. That clause has not had the effect, up to the present time, so far as I am informed, of securing the payment of those claims, though it may ultimately secure their payment. But if the Bill of the hon. member for Glengarry had been in force and had been applicable to that railway, it would have secured the payment of those claims. I am, therefore, very glad to see an effort of this kind made to secure a general provision applicable to all such cases, instead of our being left to apply the principle to each individual company that comes here asking for amendments to its charter.

When we charter a railway company, a telegraph company, a steamboat company, or any other company of that class, we should not forget that we are creating to some extent a monopoly in favour of that company. We are, in fact, making it a present of a most valuable franchise, and we have a distinct right to impose upon it certain stringent conditions under which it shall act towards the public; and undoubtedly one of the very first of these stringent conditions should be one providing that it will act in a fair and honest manner towards its employees.

In the case of contracts let directly by the Government, there has been, as a rule, I fancy, less difficulty in securing justice; because a considerable percentage is retained by the Government, out of which payments may be made and sometimes have been made, I believe, to the workmen, without any actual law requiring them to be made. But it is very well to have such a provision put in the shape of a permanent law. The difficulty of applying this principle seems to rest specially with the case of the sub-contractor. I had hoped that my hon. friend from Glengarry would have explained clause four, so as to make it a little more clear how the funds are to be provided, out of which claims against sub-contractors, as well as contractors, are to be satisfied.

This clause provides that every company incorporated by or receiving a cash subsidy from the Parliament of Canada, shall be liable for the payment of the wages, etc., due by any contractor or sub-contractor, provided that a notice stating the claim in detail for such wages shall have been served on the company within three months. But it does not provide for the retention by the company of a percentage from such contractor or sub-contractor sufficient to cover the claims of the workmen, and I think the clause requires to be made clearer in that respect. It strikes me that it would be fairer to provide that the company should not be liable for the debts of the contractor or sub-contractor, unless notice were served by the employee at the beginning of his engagement, on some officer of the company, that he would look to them for his pay in case the contractor or sub-contractor failed to pay him. Then the company would be in a position to hold back the money to meet the claim. It strikes me also that perhaps three months is a pretty long term to allow for the serving of a notice, as it would keep the transaction open for a very long time. It would keep the contractor from getting his money for three months after the work was completed, unless every transaction had been settled up in full before that time.

But those are more proper questions for a Committee of the Whole, or a committee on the Bill; and I would suggest that Bills of this class should properly be submitted to small special committees. I made that contention with regard to one of my own Bills, which passed its second reading a few days ago, and I think it is equally applicable to this. There is a numerous class of Bills on the Order paper, in which a good deal depends on the terms of each clause, and we are all aware that details of expression, and so on, cannot properly be considered at all in the Committee of the whole House, and cannot be as well considered in the large committees as in a small committee, specially appointed to take cognizance of the particular Bill. I would suggest, therefore, that the practice be adopted in this case, and continued in others, of submitting Bills of this kind to committees composed of seven members, subject, of course, to final passage through the Committee of the Whole afterwards, as in the case of any other Bill. We all know that the Railway Committee, the Private Bills Committee, and others of that class, are specially appointed for the consideration of private Bills. Their time is fully taken up with such business. Their numbers are too large for careful consideration of the details of a measure of this kind. I believe that in respect to the size of those committees, our whole system is wrong, but this is not the proper time to consider that point. But with regard to referring public Bills to these Private Bills Committees, I take this opportunity of entering a protest against the principle, and of urging that the British system should be adopted, of naming small committees for Bills of this kind. I have great pleasure in supporting the general principle of the Bill, and I hope to see it made as perfect as possible before it goes through the House.

Mr. SPROULE. My hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) certainly deserves the thanks of the labouring men of this country for the effort he is now making in their behalf to protect them from unscrupulous and dishonest contractors. There is scarcely a public work in our country that has not had, at some stage of its operations, experience of dishonest men taking the labour of the labouring men and giving them no return. When the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, we remember distinctly that a large number of Italians—men not very well able to earn their living in this country—were turned adrift at the Soo—I believe some three hundred of them—without a single dollar to pay their way either towards their homes or to protect them against the inclemency of the winter. They were brought by charity to Toronto, from Toronto they were passed on to Montreal, and what became of them very few know; but, at any rate, it is known to a great many that these men laboured very hard all summer, and at the end of the season were turned adrift by a dishonest contractor, without receiving a dollar of their wages. Had such a Bill as this been law then, these poor labourers would no doubt have been paid their wages. In the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and of the Grand Trunk the same thing occurred, and also in the building of the Northern Railway. In the case of almost every railway that we know anything of in our country—and Manitoba and the North-west Territories are no exceptions to the rule—this has happened, so that all over the country you can find instances where hundreds of labourers, after working hard for months were discharged without receiving a dollar of wages. The dishonest contractors got the money and cleared out, upon one excuse or another, and the poor labourers who did the actual work were left without a cent. If some means could be devised for the purpose of securing fully their rights, such means should be taken. I see no objection to this Bill becoming law, or to a Bill of this kind being introduced by a private member as well as by a member of the Government. It matters not who introduces the Bill so long as it becomes law. As my hon. friend from Glengarry has said, in private contracts we have the Mechanics' Lien Act, and in almost every other line we have some law to protect the labouring class. The only exception is public works. This Bill seems to me to be designed for a good purpose, and, so far as I can judge, it will accomplish that purpose in its present shape. There may be some imperfections, which members of this House will recognize, but these imperfections can be made right. I for one am heartily in accord with the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill, and shall be glad to give him any assistance I can.

Mr. FLINT. I join heartily in the expressions of approval of the principle of this measure which have already been given by hon. gentlemen on both sides. I agree with the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) that possibly this principle might be extended still further with advantage to the public and to the class of persons intended to be protected. Every hon. gentleman in the House is aware of instances in his own locality probably during the past twenty-five years when, for the want of some measure of this kind, great hardship was occasioned to many well-deserving, hard-working men. It is somewhat surprising that the Government of the day did not long ago take up this question and deal with it as a Government measure. Probably before this Bill has reached its final stages, the Government may see its way clear to assume the responsibility of the measure, and, assisted by the able technical staff at their command, to perfect its details that it may have greater force than, perhaps, it could have in its present shape, introduced by a private member. The principle of this measure has been adopted in Nova Scotia. I do not think there is a statute going the full length of this Bill, but there are powers given to the local administration, which they carry out in their contracts, and which are drafted in the contracts themselves. I am not aware of the precise terms in which these contracts are worded, yet the responsibility of the contractors to the men who do the actual labour is fully recognized and protected through the agency of the Government, when entering into these contracts. This principle has been found to work to the advantage, not only of the workingmen, but of the contractors themselves. Of course, there are cases which even a general law, giving power to the Government, in making contracts, to protect the labourers and others, does not yet reach, and I trust the day is not far distant when some public-spirited member will propose a measure which will go even further than this. We know that there are companies, from time to time, chartered by this Parliament to undertake public works, particularly the building of railways. Sometimes subsidies are promised verbally, or, perhaps a contract is entered into with the Government under which they are to have subsidies at some future stage of their work—probably when a certain portion of their work is completed. But these parties, before earning their subsidies at all, undertake obligations. And if they fail in carrying out their work, they earn no subsidy, and consequently there is no fund out of which the labourers can be paid. This Bill suggests means for the protection of the labouring men under such circumstances. I trust that the efforts of the hon. gentleman will be crowned with success. He is a practical man and has an extensive and intimate knowledge of how this protection may be afforded to the greatest advantage. From the somewhat cursory examination I have been able to make of the measure he proposes, I think that he has provided for almost every contingency. When the Bill reaches a select committee or the Committee of the whole House, any difficulties that may be brought forward can be provided for. I think that the gratitude of labouring men and those who are likely to be engaged upon public works of this kind ought to be, and will be, extended to the hon. gentleman for taking this matter in hand.

Mr. BAIN. I think there can be no question that the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) has attempted to crystallize into a law a feeling that a great many of us have entertained for some time, that there is a weak side to the present laws relating to labour on public works. This House has never been slow in granting charters of incorporation for various public enterprises and in giving to promoters very extensive privileges. Further, those who have had experience in this House know how slow the House is, having once given a charter with all its privileges to a company in connection with a public work, to encroach upon the rights so granted, if the company is making any reasonable attempt to proceed with the work in contemplation. But I think that the experience of localities in connection with certain of those public works recently indicates that there are strong grounds of complaint on account of the way in which many of these companies treat the labour engaged in the construction of their work. Municipalities have not been slow in aiding these enterprises, and it does seem too bad that, in addition to that, aid should be practically levied from the labourers who construct the work by paying them at the rate of 30 cents or 50 cents on the dollar of the limited amount they would receive even were their services paid for in full. Two public enterprises last session occupied a large share of attention of the Railway Committee, whose members had their attention particularly directed to the difficulties which the Bill now before us is intended to remedy. In one case, if I recollect aright, the company, after making contracts and executing a large amount of work, offered a settlement of something like 30 cents—not over 35 cents—in the dollar. In the case referred to by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay), the company carried on their work in a peculiar manner. A number of those who were incorporators of the railway company formed a construction company to take the contract from the railway company. This construction company in turn sub-let its contract to an American firm of contractors, who came here, like all other outside contractors, with an enormous reputation for wealth—they had money by millions; they were wealthy, experienced contractors, and were able to do the work without any difficulty. They took the contract at what the hon. Minister of Railways called starvation prices. Then they in turn, sub-let the work in sections to sub-contractors. And if the original prices were starvation prices, as they were called by the hon. gentleman who spoke whereof he knew, I ask what were the figures of the sub-contractors when they came to employ labour in the winter months when employment was not abundant and men and teams were wanting work? And what was the result of the enterprise? It was established before the Railway Committee that these railway millionaires, the contractors, instead of putting their own money into the work, borrowed the very first monthly payment from one of the local banks in the vicinity, giving their contract in security therefor. And when the second month's payment came due they were not able to pay the men in full, and only partial payment was made. In a short time they went into insolvency. What was the position of the unfortunate labourers and of those who had furnished material and supplies for this public work? The contractors had borrowed the money they had to pay for the work done, and whatever they had was in a foreign country and beyond the reach of the men who had put their labour into the work. When the facts were presented to the Railway Committee, the committee immediately did the only thing that was left for them to do—they simply provided that the company to whom the original charter had been granted, and which had come to this House asking for additional rights and privileges, must settle these claims before these additional rights and privileges could be granted to them. And I wish to say to this House that another session of Parliament has come and that company has not yet settled the claims of last season and consequently realized the benefits from the legislation they asked for here last session.

There is a rumour that, instead of coming back to this House for additional legislation, they have given notice of an application to the legislature at Toronto for certain privileges to enable them, by some means, to reach the object they have in view without coming within the range of legislation passed here last session. Sir, we have never been niggard in giving privileges to these companies, but I think the time has come to consider our policy, and if I am to be called a protectionist in giving my support to legislation of this kind, I am well content to submit to the charge, if this House will devise some means by which the workmen of this country will be protected against such schemes. I do not care whether the object is gained by the legislation which my hon. friend has introduced, or by amendments to the Railway Act. I am sure my hon. friend himself is not particular about the form of the legislation, or whether this particular Bill becomes a law of the land, provided that the object he has in view is accomplished, and that in future it be made more difficult for such schemes as this to be carried out whereby the labouring men of this country have been repeatedly defrauded. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps the simplest way to reach this matter would be to attach an amendment to the General Railway Act, or the Public Works Act, of the Dominion, providing that under these circumstances the roadway or public work should be charged with the lien, similar to that which mechanics now have upon work they have constructed, or upon which they have bestowed labour, as now provided in some of the provincial legislatures. I think the Minister of Railways should consider whether some simple measure of that kind could not be devised. I have heard it asserted on the floor of this House, but I cannot vouch for the correctness of the statement, that on the American side there is such a system in existence, by which contractors are prevented from thus defrauding labourers of their rights. Now, I have no wish to embarrass contractors or companies in constructing these great public works; in many cases they have serious difficulties to contend with. But our experience goes to show that in many cases such as I have referred to, there appears to be a systematic resort to a process by which the final loss shall fall upon the labourers, and upon those who furnish supplies for the construction of these works. I think it is about time that companies securing exclusive rights and privileges should understand that they are not to be allowed to reap the benefit of the labour that goes into the construction of those works, and quietly to enter into the fruit of those labours, while the men who did the work are deprived of the legitimate returns for their labour. I venture to say there is no class of men in this Dominion to-day who so hardly earn the money that is promised them, even when every cent is paid to them, as the men who labour on our railways and public works. When times are as hard as they are to-day, and when our business men, in many cases are going down, because they are not able to make both ends meet, it is discouraging in the extreme that, when they are struggling with their ordinary liability, they should be subjected to loss by a contractor who comes into the locality, heralded as having a pocket full of money, and who quietly goes into bankruptcy in six weeks or two months, leaving them with a lot of claims due to them by labourers and contractors, varying from one or two hundred dollars up to a thousand, and then to find that they cannot realize more than 30 or 40 per cent on the dollar. I think the time has come when legislation of some kind should be passed to put a stop to such a condition of things. I shall heartily support anything that will tend to put these men in a safe and equitable position, which will do them justice and do them nothing more.

Mr. RYCKMAN. I congratulate the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) on bringing forward this Bill. I consider it one of great importance. We have had some experience in regard to the difficulty of workmen getting their pay in some parts of our country, especially in the city of Hamilton. The workmen who labour upon these great public works, are often in positions of great danger; they work hard, both in wet and dry weather, and for wages that are usually very moderate, and then they have to run the risk of not getting paid. I think the workmen of this country will be grateful to the hon. member for Glengarry for introducing this Bill, and for one, I shall give it my support.

Mr. HAGGART. I am fully in accord with the objects the hon. gentleman has in view in introducing this Bill, and I have no doubt that he has done it with the best intention. However, let me draw the attention of the House to some of the difficulties in the way of legislating in the way he proposes. In the first place, he proposes to dispose of the money that is deposited with the Government as security for the completion of the work. That money is paid into the Consolidated Fund of Canada, it is not at the disposition of either this House or the Minister, and the question will arise whether we shall have power to dispose of that money in any other way than that provided by law. A clause would have to be drawn very carefully which would make it obligatory on the Government to dispose of this money in the manner proposed by the hon. member for Glengarry. My own opinion is that it will require a Message from His Excellency, and that legislation, such as is proposed, can only be introduced with the consent of the Government. I may be mistaken, and it may be possible for this House to dispose of that money by statute.

But after that legislation is passed, the difficulties will commence. At what time are we to return the deposit to the contractor? Suppose any person files a claim against the Government, that claim has to be considered. Who is to decide whether it is just or not? Is the Minister of Railways to constitute the court, or is the claimant to have a statutory right of action against the Government and bring a suit in the Exchequer Court? The hon. gentleman did not cite an instance where any men who have laboured on a public work in Canada, or any teamster, have not received their pay. The Minister of Railways and the Minister of Public Works always see to it that the men and teams employed are fully paid. The percentage that is detained from the contractors, as security that they shall complete the work, we always apply, if necessary, for the purpose of paying men and teams employed on the works. If that is not sufficient, I have tried by Order in Council to get the money which was deposited and paid into the Consolidated Fund of Canada, for the purpose of supplementing the sum required to pay the men fully, but I found I could not do it. Where there is a just claim from men labouring upon a public work, we have hitherto come to Parliament and got the money to pay them. This must always be done. I do not see how the legislation introduced by the hon. gentleman can compel the Crown to supplement their claims in this way. It must always be a matter of grace, to a certain extent. No hon. gentleman occupying the position of Minister of Railways or Minister of Public Works in Canada will fail to see that the men employed on public works are paid. I have no objection to the Bill passing its second stage, but I desire the hon. gentleman who has introduced it to consider these difficulties: the difficulty of disposing of sums which are in the Consolidated Fund; the difficulty of making the Minister of Railways a judge as to whether the claim is one which should be entertained or not; the difficulty of compelling the contractor to be without the money which he has deposited, on account of a claim which may be fallacious, when the contractor has a statutory right of action against the Crown. I think the hon. gentleman should consider whether he prefers to send the Bill to a special committee or have it considered by the Committee of the whole House, and the Government has no objection to either course being taken; but the hon. gentleman should consider the difficulties that may arise in connection with the working of the Bill, and should endeavour to reconstruct the first section. The fourth section says:

Every company incorporated by or receiving a cash subsidy from the Parliament of Canada, shall be liable for the payment of the wages or labour done by any foreman, workman, labourer or team employed by any contractor with the company, or by any sub-contractor, in the construction of the works of the company.

I think that is a correct principle. Whether we can apply it to companies that received their entity from this Parliament some time ago and obtained a constitutional right to their present charter, I am not at the present moment prepared to say, but a provision might be inserted in the Bill that it should apply to all corporations and companies which receive their entity from this Parliament subsequent to the present time. I merely mention these points to show the objections that will probably be raised in committee to the hon. gentleman's Bill, and, no doubt, he will consider them before the next stage is taken.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no hesitation in saying that the general principle embodied in this Bill has my very cordial support. I think the hon. gentleman's object is one which should receive the assent of nearly every hon. member. I am not considering the details of the Bill at the present moment, but only the principle, for its details can be worked out in committee. Referring to the objections which the Minister of Railways has raised, I can cite an instance where a public work was carried out under the direction of the Railway Department, where large contracts were let by the Government, and sublet by the Government contractor, and where enormous sums of money due to workmen and labourers were not paid. I refer to the Oxford and Cape Breton Railway, known as the short line. I remember, the sub-contractor was supposed by the people of the district to be a man beyond doubt capable of paying his men. He took the contract, employed men and horses, ran up bills at stores, built this public work for the Government, and in the end went off and did not pay a dollar to these men. Such a wrong existed that the Government came to Parliament and obtained a vote of public money for the payment of these men, and sent down ex-Judge Clark—and very grave fault was found by political opponents with respect to the way in which the business was carried out, and it was very near an election—who held court, sat all night long, settling in a perfunctory way, for it was impossible to do absolute justice, bills sent in, and paid the men by cheques on the public treasury. No opposition was offered in this House to the enormous sum required being voted and paid. Men who had worked all summer, with their boys and horses, found themselves penniless at the end of the season. It was such a gross outrage that the Government felt impelled to come to Parliament and ask for a vote. We voted the money and paid the men. No doubt, other cases might be cited by parliamentarians of greater experience than myself. I acknowledge that what the Minister of Railways has stated is entitled to some weight. There is difficulty, no doubt, in the way of carrying out this principle. I invite the attention of the House, in the first place, to the consideration of the principle itself. Is the House satisfied with the principle which the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) seeks to carry out, and is it considered a just one? What is the principle? The hon. gentleman states that, if on a Government work a contract is let and is sublet, and labourers, their sons and their horses do the actual work of construction, security should be taken by the Government to ensure the payment of wages due to the workmen. Is that right? Ought there to be any difficulty in accepting that principle? I think not.

Mr. HAGGART. That is not the principle of the Bill at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes. The Bill is entitled: "An Act respecting the liability of Her Majesty and Public Companies for labour used in the construction of public works." I was confining myself to the provisions relating to public works. The first section reads:

In case any contractor with Her Majesty, or any sub-contractor in the construction of any public work let under contract by Her Majesty, makes default in the payment of the wages or labour done by any foreman, workman, labourer or team employed on such work, providing a claim therefor is filed in the office of the Minister entering into such contract on behalf of Her Majesty, not later than three months after the same becomes due, and satisfactory proof thereof is furnished, Her Majesty shall become liable for the payment of such claim to the extent of the amount of all moneys or securities in the hands of Her Majesty for securing the performance of the contract at the time of the filing of the said claim.

I take it, that the main object the hon. gentleman has in view is to ensure to foremen, workmen and labourers payment of wages actually earned by them. As a means of securing that result, the hon. gentleman suggests that the Government should be liable to pay these sums, when the claim is proved to the satisfaction of the Minister, up to the amount of the deposit made with the Government for the purpose of carrying out the contract. The Minister says there are difficulties in the way of disposing of money held in this way. I do not see, at the present moment, that these difficulties are by any means insuperable. What is the fact? A contract is entered into for the construction of a public work. The proposed Bill declares that the proper performance of the work shall include payment by the contractor or sub-contractor of the wages of the workmen. Then it provides that, if these payments are not made by the contractor or sub-contractor, they shall be made out of security deposited with the Government. If Parliament passes that law, there will be no difficulty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It means a larger security.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I know it does. At present, contractors do not give security to the Government for the payment of workmen. The hon. gentleman proposes that the security they deposit with the Government for the performance of the work shall be held for the payment of wages. What is the difficulty about that? If they half do the work you hold this money in order that you may finish it, and if they fail to pay the workingman's wages, you hold the money in order that you may pay these wages. Therefore, I say the principle in itself seems to me to be sound, and I do not know but that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan) has struck upon one mode of carrying it out pretty effectively. No doubt the Bill will require some amendment in the committee, but I understand that we are addressing ourselves now to the principle of the Bill, and reserving to myself reasonable discretion in amending the details in committee, I desire for one, and I only speak in my own behalf, to express my cordial approval of the object, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan) has in view, and my belief that so far as I have read his Bill, I see no insuperable difficulties in carrying it out.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) has succeeded in giving the House an insight into the many difficulties which would follow from the passage of this Bill. As a rule, contracts are let by tender, and, with the tender, security for the due performance of the work is exacted. According to an old Order in Council which has been in force about fifteen years, the sum of five per cent is deposited on the gross amount of the contract. I may say at the outset, that, in my opinion, this amount of 5 per cent is, in most instances, quite insufficient, and especially so in view of the great competition existing now which enables us to get work done at very low prices. In my department, as a rule, works are tendered for at least 25 per cent, and even 50 per cent lower than the estimates of the engineer. I have already suggested that this deposit of 5 per cent was insufficient, but it is argued that if we increase the security, it will give to wealthy contractors a kind of monopoly in the business. A contract for $10,000 requires a deposit of 5 per cent, amounting to only $500, which is quite insufficient, and which I should like to see increased to 10 per cent at least. The result of this would be, of course, that poor contractors would not get the money to deposit, and so they would be unable to tender. It would perhaps be a good thing for contractors with experience and money, and I believe myself that the country would be the gainer in the long run? My experience is, that the man who takes a contract at a low price, is, per force, bound to try and get in the cheapest labour and material possible in order to secure any profit. Many difficulties arise from letting contracts at these low prices. There are contentions with the superintendent in charge, and contentions with the engineer, and in the end, notwithstanding the attention and care of the officers of the department, the Government often loses, at least in the quality of the work. The poor contractor will always find a way, while the superintendent's back is turned, to put in some bad piece of work. That security which we demand at present is for the performance of the work, and if the contractor fails in completing it, we draw on the 5 per cent to pay whatever difference the work will cost to the department, either by asking for new tenders, or by the department completing it under its own officers. Now, if we ask for a further security for the payment of the wages, it will decrease the number of tenders, and the result will be an increase in the cost of those public works. I do not say that this would be an unmixed evil. In England and in France, contractors for public works are chosen men, who are in a position to prove beyond all doubt, not only their pecuniary responsibility, but also their experience and their good reputation as contractors. If this system could obtain in Canada, it would certainly be a benefit to the country, and to those who are responsible for the administration of the Departments of Public Works and of Railways and Canals. But, let me ask: Is this according to the notions of the present day when cheapness is considered the great object to be achieved in this life? It certainly would not agree with the ideas I hear propounded here every day, and which are used as arguments against the present administration. When my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) says, that the Government should interfere between contractors and sub-contractors, I presume he has forgotten his cast-iron and enthusiastic advocacy of provincial autonomy. He knows very well that the law of every province regulates the relations between labourers and contractors. Suppose that my department does work in Prince Edward Island, are we to have a staff to keep the time of every man who works, and to report every day to the department how much wages are due to the labourer by the contractor or sub-contractor. If that were necessary, it would be much better to abandon the system of giving contracts, and to have the work done—except in very few cases, and then only when contractors of great responsibility were employed—it would be better, I say, to have the work done by day's labour under the control of the department. We would then have the machinery, and the 20 per cent or the 10 per cent at least, which is a reasonable profit for a contractor to expect on every work, would go to the benefit of the Government. Another inconvenience which would follow from the adoption of this principle, which after all may be considered a right one, is this: According to the ideas of this age, the Crown is considered as being on the same footing as every ordinary creditor. This Bill, by tending as it does to assimilate the Crown to the ordinary proprietor giving a contract for the building of a house, the Crown would stand in the very same position as the private proprietor does; but with this difference: that the ordinary proprietor, or business man, is always on the spot to follow the work, and the provincial law tells him that if he does not follow the work as it goes along, and if he does not see that the wages are paid, then he himself is responsible. That at least is the law in the province of Quebec. But in the administration of a public department, with works going on from the shores of the Atlantic to the shores of the Pacific, I think it would be a very great inconvenience, especially when we know that this liability is to last for three months. The labourer has three months after he has completed his work to file his claim in the department in order to secure on the part of the department the obligation to see that his wages are paid; and the department, to guard against this contingency, would have to delay every payment by three months. Although the principle of securing to the wage-earner the legitimate pay for his labour is correct, I see that the practical working of this Bill would be very inconvenient, and would probably accomplish another thing which the House must not lose sight of, that is, an increase in the cost of every public work that would be carried on under it.

Mr. LAURIER. But you said the tenders were too low.

Mr. OUIMET. I said that, and all the difficulties arise from that fact. Let me give the House an illustration of that. The other day the department invited tenders for a large work which we intend to have done on the Georgian Bay. The cost of the work was estimated by our chief engineer at $200,000. A tender was received for $144,000, while the tenders of what I would call experienced and responsible contractors ran all the way from $200,000 to $444,000. In the opinion of my chief engineer, the lowest tender would not have enough, not merely to make any profit, but to pay his men as the work went on. If that happened, the security for the performance of the work being so small, in the end we should have a lot of claims against the department for materials, which may be placed on the same footing as labour, and these claims would be before us for years. As a matter of fact, claims against the Department of Public Works never die. I have had to consider claims that existed even before hon. gentlemen opposite took charge of the public departments, and many of them have come from their own time. It is, I think, the greatest worry the Minister has—to go through masses of documents, with the result, as a rule, that he has to give the same answer as before, that the claim cannot be entertained.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there no remedy for that?

Mr. OUIMET. The only remedy would be to plead the statute of limitation, which in the opinion of the public should never be availed of by the Crown. So far as railways are concerned I have nothing to say; but before this Bill becomes law I think it should be considered by the departments themselves. If the hon. member for Glengarry will consult the Department of Justice and the Public Works Department, he may find some way of making his Bill acceptable. I may say that in every one of our contracts we take power to pay the wages of the labourers; but when we have not the money we cannot do it. When there is not enough money to complete the contract, we cannot draw on the security deposited with us. As the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) says, these funds go into the public Treasury, and they are only drawn upon to complete the contract.

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the discussion which has taken place on this Bill, I conclude, like other hon. gentlemen who have spoken, that legislation of this kind is necessary. The case of the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway, in which injustice was done to the labouring men employed in the construction of that railway, proves to me that all hon. gentlemen occupying seats in this House have a duty to perform in adopting legislation to meet cases of that kind. The hon. Minister of Public Works has suggested to the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill that it would be well to consult the Departments of Justice, Railways and Public Works, with the view of perfecting legislation to meet the difficulty. Now, when a railway is subsidized, it strikes me that before the subsidy is paid in ten-mile sections, it would be reasonable to suppose that the Railway Department would ascertain whether the wages of the labourers had been paid. It seems to me that would be a remedy, and it could be very easily carried out. The hon. Minister of Public Works suggests that moneyed contractors should be given the preference in the awarding of contracts. As one of those who represent the views of the labouring men of this country, though I know their views on that subject are somewhat opposed to that suggestion, I think, it is a very wise one indeed. I know of no case in which moneyed contractors have failed to pay their men. It is generally the speculating contractor, who want to obtain money by any means, whether honestly or dishonestly, that have trouble with their workmen. With respect to public works, it seems to me that every contract for the construction of a public building or a dock is subject to certain specifications, and a provision should be inserted in the specifications that all the wages owing to the labouring men employed on the work should be paid before the money is paid to the contractor. It strikes me there is another way of getting out of this difficulty. I do not think that the hon. member for Glengarry imagines for one moment that the legislation he is introducing can be carried through this House. The hon. gentleman is not a lawyer, and I do not know whether he has secured the services of a lawyer or not, in framing his Bill, but this we do know, that the hon. gentleman has had more experience in the building of public works than perhaps any other hon. gentleman in this House, and for that reason he has thought it his duty to propose this measure. I have heard of complaints, but I know that in the riding I have the honour to represent, we had public works going on last fall and the early part of last year, and there is not one labouring man employed on them, there is not any one in that district or locality who has furnished any material or anything else in connection with that public work but who has been paid every cent for his labour or material. In saying that, I wish to draw the line between honest and dishonest contractors, and I feel that any legislation of this kind will not be objected to by the honest contractor.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have listened attentively to the discussion, and am entirely in favour of the principle of the Bill. It would be a pity if, in an assembly of legal talent such as this is, a Bill could not be framed that would, to some extent at least, meet the difficulty which this Bill proposes to remove. I am glad to find the general opinion of the House is in favour of the measure. The objection raised by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) could be overcome, at least to some extent, if a special committee were named to revise the Bill. As has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, no doubt the extended experience of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) in public works has led him to bring this subject before the House, and for my part I shall be glad if we can frame a law to remedy the evil he seeks to remove. With regard to the remarks that fell from the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), I would not for a moment consent to our going back to the experience we have had of the system of day labour. We tried that on the Curran Bridge with the sad result that this House is too well aware of. And it would be very much to our discredit if we should return to that system. I believe in the system of public contracts, and I think if the Government would endeavour to hold sufficient money in their hands to pay the wages of the workingmen, a great deal of complaint would be avoided. As to the other portions of the Bill, I frankly confess that there are a good many difficulties in the way, but I do not think that in the committee there would be much difficulty in framing clauses that would meet these difficulties and prove advantageous to labourers. We know very well that last winter a case was brought before the Railway Committee, which has been referred to by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain), in which a number of men, who had done labouring work, were about to be clearly cheated out of their whole winter's labour. And if there ever was an act for which the Railway Committee deserves credit at the hands of the labourers, it was that act by which they amended the charter of the company in question so as to compel them to pay their labourers. I do hope that the efforts put forth by my hon. friend from Glengarry will not be in vain. He has introduced this Bill now for the second or third session. He has the sympathy of both sides, and there ought to be sufficient legal and business ability in this House to enable us to prepare a law which will meet the case.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The Bill which my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) has introduced unquestionably seems to meet the approval of the House. I do not see any insurmountable difficulties in the way. Perhaps in the working out of the details a good deal of careful consideration will have to be given by the officers and Ministers of the departments—Public Works and Railways especially—but I think that eventually a measure could be worked out which would be satisfactory. I do not agree with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) when he says that to make such a lien on the deposits would do away with the very object of the deposits. That difficulty could be easily overcome. If the ordinary security required is not sufficient—and I believe it is 5 per cent—let the Government require the deposit of an extra percentage to meet the lien of the labourers.

Mr. McLENNAN. There is 10 per cent on the monthly estimates retained by the Government until the completion of the work.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I do not care whether it is retained by taking it out of the monthly estimates or whether it is deposited at the beginning, so long as sufficient security is held by the Government to protect the workingmen. Of course there is a number of details that suggest themselves. I should think that a limit would have to be put upon the amount of wages for which the security would be held. If a man chooses to work five or six months without drawing wages, he should not be in a better position than a man who has only worked 30 days. Under any circumstances, the wage-earner ranking on the fund should not be allowed to rank beyond a certain number of days. I do not see anything very serious in the objection raised concerning the difficulties of ascertaining who are first entitled to the wages. On all public works there is generally a superintendent who could give information on that point, and who could tell whether the men were being badly or well treated. If they are badly treated, I suppose the department could manage in some way, as is done in the courts of law, for instance, by giving notice on the works that all claims which came in within thirty days would be entertained, and that claims furnished later would not. Then again it has been urged here to-day that claims might be made against this fund which were not just, and that the Government would have great difficulty in ascertaining what amount was due to each person. I do not think there should be a great deal of trouble about that, for the contractor who owns this reserve in the hands of the Government will certainly look over every claim to see if it is right. If he admits that it is right, that is the end of it; if he says it is wrong, it is for him to show what the amount ought to be. These are matters of detail, and I do not think that these details are of such a character that they cannot be adjusted; I do not think that the difficulties are so great as to forbid us adopting the measure with any necessary amendments. On the whole I am in favour of the Bill. The hon. Minister of Railways says he never knew of a person having suffered under the present system. There may be protection enough at present, but perhaps we may not always have a Minister of Railways who will take the same interest in the workingmen of the country that the present incumbent of the office does. So long as he is there, I think, for my part I would be quite willing to work for any body, confident that the hon. Minister would see that I got my pay if I gave value. For these reasons I simply say that I am in accord with the principle of the Bill, and I do not think that there are any difficulties of detail to prevent a measure being framed by the committee or the Department of Justice that would meet the case.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to add my voice to those of hon. members who have expressed their sympathy with the object of my hon. friend the promoter of this Bill. No doubt there is a great deal of force in the objections that have been urged by the hon. Minister of Railways and the hon. Minister of Public Works that there will be difficulty in arranging the details necessary to carry this measure into practical effect. But the evil to be overcome is so great and the objects of the Bill so just that the measure commends itself to the sympathy of hon. members on both sides of the House; and I do think it would be a reflection upon the business capacity of the members of the House to assume that it would be impossible to give effect to a measure of this kind. I was very much struck with an observation which fell from the lips of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, for it would seem from what he said that the Bill would incidentally have another and very valuable result, which, perhaps, was not in contemplation by my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) when he introduced this measure. It would seem that it will be necessary, in order to carry out the object of the Bill, to increase the deposit required of contractors on public works. From what the hon. Minister has said, it would appear that the increasing of the deposit would be a great protection to the public. There can be no doubt that one of the great difficulties that the Minister of Public Works has to encounter—and I suppose the same would apply to the hon. Minister of Railways—arises from the fact that men tender for contracts who are ignorant of the work they have to perform and are really incompetent as contractors, besides not having the means at their back to carry their contracts into effect, and who often tender at much lower figures than it would be possible to perform the work for. As the law stands, and in the present state of public opinion, it is exceedingly difficult for the Minister to avoid allowing such men to obtain a contract, even though he may know very well that thereby the public runs the risk of serious loss. I have known such cases to occur more than once; and, if the result of the Bill of the hon. gentleman is to make it more difficult for such contractors as these to get hold of contracts, I think a most valuable object will be secured and that this is a very strong argument in favour of the Bill introduced by my hon. friend.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This discussion is calculated to impress upon the mind of any listener, I think, the view that a sixth session is not a very good occasion to discuss a measure of this kind. It seems to me that it is of some importance to guard the public interest in matters of this kind as well as the interest of the private parties who are dealing with dishonest contractors. I have no doubt there is a great deal to be said in favour of the view expressed by the Minister of Public Works that the security required of contractors ought to be increased in the public interest. It seems to me that the hon. promoter of the Bill and some other gentlemen on that side who have discussed it have failed to distinguish between the amount placed in the possession of the Government as security for the proper performance of the work and the amount which may be due by the Government to the contractors for work actually done. I cannot see upon what ground the sum placed in the hands of the Government for the purpose of securing the proper performance of the work can, in the public interest, be devoted to any other purpose whatever than that for which it has been deposited with the Government. In preparing plans for a public work, in advertising for tenders, in letting the contracts and in placing parties on the work for the purpose of seeing that the work is properly performed, the Government incurs a good deal of expense in the public interest; and if you were to adopt the proposal in this Bill that the sum deposited with the Government shall, to the full extent, be subject to a lien for the purpose of protecting the labourers under the contractors, you wipe out the security of the Government altogether. Whatever loss or inconvenience the public might sustain in consequence of having let the work to parties who have failed would have to be borne entirely without compensation.

Mr. McNEILL. Will my hon. friend allow me to explain. I spoke with the understanding that additional security would be demanded for the purpose of meeting the requirements of this Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not what the Bill says. I am not objecting to the principle of the Bill—if it may be called the principle of the Bill—to provide some security for the payment of persons employed. You are to bear in mind that the charge must be a charge against what the company have earned, and not against what the company have deposited. What you propose, in fact, is a Bill which will make the Government the paymaster on behalf of the contractor, and on every public work in the country. I do not say that this is an improper thing, but let us not confuse things which are altogether different. That is what you propose to do, if you propose to do anything that is effective. We have first to consider the utility of the public work; we have to consider the public interest in the construction of the public work; we have to protect the public treasury against loss in that undertaking; and the deposit with the Government is made for the purpose of protecting the public treasury and the public against that loss. What the hon. gentleman proposes to do is to impose upon the Government the duty of becoming guarantors to the amount of money in their hands, for the payment of the parties. I say that cannot be. The amount of money on deposit belongs to the public for the purpose of a public security. What may be charged is what the parties have earned, which is a wholly different thing, and it is towards that that the Bill should point. Now, to make the Government responsible for the amount of money earned by the contractors, and to see that it is paid over to those who are sub-contractors or labourers upon the work, is what the hon. gentleman aims at by his Bill. I do not say that that cannot be accomplished. You impose additional duties upon the Government, you propose to increase the expense of the management of the department, or of the two departments, that may have work of this sort to let. That is to be borne in mind. I do not say that the object may not be of sufficient consequence to impose on the Government that duty and to prepare the necessary machinery for the performance of that duty. But my point is this, that the Bill in its present form will not accomplish that object; you have to change radically the form of the Bill. Now, is there a public evil of such a character as to necessitate this legislation? The Minister of Public Works says that, if you increase the amount on deposit, you will get a better class of tenderers, you will have less risk in securing the proper performance of the public work, and you will have less necessity for security. I suppose the hon. gentleman who has prepared this Bill has had a number of cases brought under his attention, and I think it would be of great consequence to show that there have been numerous practical evils of that kind which this Bill was intended to remedy, in order that there may be a sufficient ground for proceeding with the Bill. It seems to me that what should be done is to have the Bill read, to let it go to the Railway Committee, and to have a special committee, with the hon. gentleman upon it, to see that the Bill is properly devised and properly prepared, so as to accomplish that object. I also think that the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways, on behalf of the Government, ought to assume the responsibility of saying whether an additional expense and an additional duty, imposed upon the Government, are warranted by the evils which the hon. gentleman undertakes to correct.

Mr. DICKEY. There seems to be a pretty general consensus of opinion, so far as I have been able to judge from the discussion in favour of the object the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill, has in view, if I may distinguish the object of the Bill from the principle of the Bill. I think every one of us must feel great sympathy with what the hon. gentleman endeavours to accomplish by this Bill. I do not propose to discuss it from the point of view that has been taken by other hon. gentlemen, but simply to mention the position towards it taken by the department over which I have the honour to preside. I have to say that in my opinion the Bill as it is drawn will not effect the object the hon. gentleman desires to attain. I do not think it is impossible to draw a Bill that will attain that object, but I think that a committee of the whole House would be a very inconvenient place to discuss a Bill of this kind. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the Bill needs a radical reconstruction in order to make it effective, and I am speaking now from the standpoint of the hon. member for Glengarry. It may be found convenient to legislate in the direction of a statutory provision in every case; however, that will be for the committee to say. What I would propose to the hon. gentleman is that his Bill be read now a second time, and that it should then be referred to a select committee of members of the House. I would suggest the names of Messrs. McLennan, Haggart, Mills (Bothwell), Davies (P.E.I.), Tisdale, Flint, Masson, Northrup, and Sir Hector Langevin. In making that suggestion, which of course is subject to correction, I have kept the legal fraternity pretty well to the fore, putting on a couple of men who have had large practical experience, also, in dealing with contracts. I take it that this committee would consult with the department especially interested, and would also, perhaps, avail themselves of the advice of the Justice Department, and in that way I think the hon. gentleman's object would be better accomplished than by sending this Bill to a committee of the whole House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. McLennan moved:

That the Bill be referred to a select committee composed of Messrs. Haggart, Mills (Bothwell), Davies (P.E.I.), Flint, Masson, Northrup, Sir Hector Langevin, and the mover, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report from time to time.

Motion agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That a Message be ordered to be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, namely, Messieurs Amyot, Bergin, Bourassa, Charlton, Costigan, Davin, Grandbois, Innes, Kaulbach, Landerkin, LaRivière, Lépine, Maclean (York), McLean (King's), McMullen, Putnam, Rider, Somerville, Stevenson, Sutherland, Taylor, and Tisdale, will act as members on the part of the House on said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Mr. FOSTER.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That a select committee, composed of Sir Adolphe Caron and Messieurs Amyot, Cockburn, Davies, Davin, Edgar, Fraser, Laurier, McNeill, Mills (Bothwell), O'Brien, Rinfret, Scriver, Welton, and White (Shelburne), be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library; and that a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER, BART.

Mr. CASEY asked :

During what period or periods did Sir Charles Tupper hold office as Minister of Railways since his appointment, without salary, on the 30th May, 1883 ?

Mr. HAGGART. Sir Charles Tupper held office with salary since May, 1883, for a period of eleven months and twenty-four days.

BRAMPTON POSTMASTER.

Mr. FEATHERSTON asked :

Has any person been appointed postmaster at Brampton since the death of the late postmaster, M. M. Elliot ? If so, what is the person's name, and when was the appointment made ?

Mr. OUMET. On behalf of the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) I have to reply that Mr. W. B. McCullen was appointed temporarily on the 2nd May, 1890, and permanently on the 10th October, 1891. He resigned on the 9th May, 1894, and Mr. W. A. McCullen was appointed to succeed him on the 6th May, 1895.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. FEATHERSTON asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a competent practical man as live stock manager at the Experimental Farm, Ottawa ? If so, has any person been selected for the position, and what is his name ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Up to the present, Professor Robertson has performed the duties of agriculturist and dairy commissioner as well. He asked to be relieved of the duties of agriculturist on account of his time being fully occupied in promoting our dairy interests and in his successful efforts to aid our cheese and butter interests in the English markets. It was felt that these duties were so important and Professor Robertson so well fitted to perform them, that we felt that we should meet his request, and his resignation as agriculturist was therefore accepted. He was named "Canadian Dairy and Agricultural Commissioner." In consequence of this, the question of the appointment of a first-class practical man to take charge of the live stock and agricultural department is under consideration. The appointment has not yet been made, but we hope to be able to get a first-class man. I have received a great number of recommendations of a leading man in the stock industry.

FISHING LICENSES.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

Is there any regulation of the Fisheries Department prohibiting the fisheries overseers and inspectors from disclosing the names of the licensees who paid $10, or less, for their licenses ?

What are the names of the licensees for the district of Lennox, who, during the past two years, paid $10, or less, for their licenses, and how much was paid by each ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no special regulation in this particular connection, but the general instructions issued to all fishery officers contain the following paragraph :—

Fishery officers are strictly forbidden to communicate to newspaper reporters or to any person matters connected with their official correspondence or official duties, without the authority of the department.

PROPOSED PUBLIC BUILDING AT PICTON.

Mr. DAWSON asked :

1. Do the Government intend to erect a public building upon the land purchased from Mr. J. N. Carter, in the town of Picton ? 2. If not, or if the question of the site of the proposed public building has not been settled yet, why did the Government purchase the said land ? 3. Why is the question of the said site not settled yet ?

Mr. OUIMET. The answer to the first question : No ; another and more desirable site has been obtained. As to the second question, at the time the Cartier site was purchased the other property was not obtainable. As to the third, the question is under consideration with a view to a very early settlement.

GOVERNMENT RENTS AT PICTON.

Mr. DAWSON asked :

1. What amount of rent has been paid to the collector of revenue for the Department of Public Works since February, 1894, by each of the tenants of the buildings on the land purchased by the Government from Mr. J. N. Carter, as a site for the proposed public building in Picton; giving names of tenants or occupants, date of payment, and amount? 2. Are any of them in arrears? If so, their names and the amount of arrears of rent?

Mr. OUIMET. The Collector of Revenue for the Department of Public Works has as yet received no money on account of these rents. All of these rents are in arrears, the list to 1st November last being as follows:—

Alcorn & Young.....	$105 00
Richard Hubbs.....	105 00

	$504 00

Less reduction claimed by Mr. Hubbs of..... 13 50

Total..... $490 50

Some taxes paid by Mr. Carter are also to be deducted.

COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Have the ice-boats commenced crossing between Cape Traverse, Prince Edward Island, and Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick? If so, when? If not, why not? Are the mails now carried across by the boats?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Ice-boats commenced running Friday, 24th instant, three boats from Cape Traverse. On Saturday, six boats ran from Tormentine. On Sunday, 26th instant, three boats returned from Cape Traverse with twenty-six bags of mail. On Monday the boats left Cape Traverse, but had to return on account of lolly ice. On Tuesday there was no crossing from either side because of the north-west gale and drifting snow. The mails are now carried across by the boats as far as possible.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER, BART.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Is it a fact that Sir Charles Tupper, Secretary of State, is travelling in a private car through Cape Breton county during the election campaign at public expense?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know how Sir Charles Tupper is travelling. I loaned him my private car. I have no doubt he is travelling at his own expense.

Mr. OUIMET.

NAVIGATION OF ST. JOHN RIVER, N.B.

Mr. COLTER asked :

1. What sums were appropriated by Parliament for improving the navigation of the St. John River, New Brunswick, and its tributaries, during the years from 1887 to 1895, inclusive? 2. What amount of such appropriation was annually expended in such improvements on said river and its tributaries during the same period? 3. At what points and places on said river were these sums expended?

Mr. OUIMET. The answer to this question will cover several pages of foolscap. It is now being prepared. I would request the hon. gentleman to give notice of motion for a return, and the information will be ready when the motion is presented.

SHIPMENT OF CATTLE VIA UNITED STATES PORTS TO EUROPE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

Have any negotiations taken place between the Canadian Government and the Government of the United States with the view of obtaining permission for the shipment of Canadian cattle via United States ports to Europe, and if so, at what period were these negotiations carried on, and with what results?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that my officers tell me that there is no official record of such correspondence.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—THE MANITOBA SCHOOLS.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, a copy of further correspondence between the Governor of Canada and the government of the province of Manitoba, respecting the Manitoba school question.

Government House,
Ottawa, 30th January, 1896.

FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE EMPIRE.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call attention for a moment to the first resolution standing in my name on the Order paper. It has reference to a matter of very deep importance, upon which, I understand, a number of members on both sides of the House are desirous of expressing their views. I would suggest, with the concurrence of the House, that it should be made the first order of the day for an early day next week.

Mr. LAURIER. What day?

Mr. McNEILL. I would say Wednesday of next week.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection—it is a loyal resolution.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course you will give us one of your days for it.

Mr. FOSTER. I supposed the hon. gentleman would claim this as his own motion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I propose to speak upon it, and you will then know my views. I think it is of sufficient importance to give a Government day to it.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That the resolution standing in the name of Mr. McNeill, under date of January 17, be made the first order of the day, after questions are asked by members, for Wednesday next.

Motion agreed to.

PAPERS IN THE MANITOBA SCHOOL CASE.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to ask if the papers which the hon. gentleman has brought down lately with regard to negotiations with Manitoba are the whole of the correspondence, or if some more are to come ?

Mr. FOSTER. I think I may say they are all down.

RAILWAY PASSES TO MEMBERS.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 7) further to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.—(Mr. Mulock.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to find I can act in sympathy with my hon. friend from North York in regard to his Bill this year ; as I stated last year that I objected to his Bill as then introduced, but that I was willing to accept the principle of not granting mileage where expense had not been incurred by members coming to or returning from Parliament. I am glad, therefore, to be able to support the principle of the Bill this year. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman promoting the Bill as to the meaning of the words "attending or returning from having attended," in the first section of the Bill. I think that it should only prevent the use of a pass when coming down to attend the opening of Parliament, and on the final return after the close of Parliament, and that it should not be intended as a bar to the use of a pass during the session, when one has occasion to go home on business during the sittings of the House. The mileage granted to us is intended to cover merely the expense of coming down here to attend the opening, and the expense of going back after the session. If the mileage is to be set against the pass, I think it should only be as far as those expenses are concerned, and that a member should be allowed to use his pass at other times without forfeiting his mileage. If the hon. gentleman intends that to be the meaning of the clause, I think it should be so expressed, so that there may be no doubt about it.

Mr. MULOCK. In answer to my hon. friend from East Elgin, I may say that the present mileage is sufficient to cover four trips home and back during the session. I do not think that many people travel much oftener than that. The present mileage of 10 cents a mile will cover the four trips.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand this section has relation to travelling to Parliament and returning home from Parliament, but it has nothing to do with travelling in the interim. A member of Parliament may go backwards and forwards as often as he pleases, but he does not get mileage for it, nor is mileage to be deducted for it, it has nothing to do with mileage. The mileage that he receives is for coming to Parliament in the first instance, and for going home from Parliament when the session expires ; and this section only has relation to that.

Mr. CASEY. I want to get an explanation from the mover of the Bill as to what he means by it.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I mean just what the language says, attendance at Parliament. I think it is quite clear.

Section negatived : yeas 24, nays 81.

On the preamble,

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to say a few words on this Bill. Unquestionably there has been a strong agitation throughout the country with regard to members of Parliament travelling on passes. Now, I must say that so far as my own experience goes, members of Parliament are the poorest paid individuals in this Dominion. At the same time, to prevent any suspicion that we are at all actuated in the discharge of our duties by influence exercised by railway companies in granting them favours or in the way of legislation, I would be quite willing to give up the privilege of travelling on passes. I would much prefer to do that than to encourage a suspicion throughout the country that members of Parliament are influenced by receiving passes. Now, I must say that I have been a member of this House for some fourteen or fifteen years, I have been on the Railway Committee for that time, and I can honestly say, having followed the business of that committee throughout, that I do not think one single instance can be pointed to where members of Parliament waived their independence or declined to perform their duty in what they conceived to be the interests of their country or their constituency, because they had a pass. I think the general transactions of this House are conducted in a manner in committee which shows that hon. members are quite independent of any favours granted, but, at the same time, I hold there is a very strong feeling in the country in opposition to the pass system. For that reason, I would be quite willing, personally, to drop it, if only to allay any public suspicion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. An exceedingly sensible suggestion, to my mind, was made by the Minister of Public Works when this question was last under discussion, and it is worth our while, particularly as the Government say they are economical, to consider it. If I remember rightly the suggestion made by the Minister was (which I think is reasonable), that where this country has subsidized railways at very heavy cost to the public, those railway companies should be required to carry members of Parliament free. That is fair and just, and I, for one, will support such a proposition, if any hon. gentleman chooses to make it. Thereby, it would follow, that we would save the mileage, which amounts to a considerable amount, both for the Senate and the House of Commons. That must be understood distinctly, too. I do not propose to travel free and have mileage; but that is, I think, a rational solution of the difficulty, because it is not desirable or proper that railway companies should be granting favours to one or two members, or to one side of the House, and not the other. There are objections to that, and to railway companies making fish of one and fowl of another, because they may think that this man or that is a friend or opponent; but there is very strong reason in a country like Canada, where subsidies have been granted to the great railways of the country, to require that they should carry members of Parliament free.

Mr. OUIMET. I am afraid there is not enough life left in this Parliament to carry out the proposition suggested last year by me. It is one of the good things that we must leave to the next Parliament to deal with, and I am glad to know that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) unites with me on the suggestion I made.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You may not be here.

Mr. OUIMET. We will try to come back.

Mr. TARTE. You will try unsuccessfully.

Mr. OUIMET. Perhaps not; I think we will be pretty sure to come back. Next year, no doubt, this valuable suggestion will be acted upon by the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now is the accepted time.

Mr. CASEY. I am delighted to hear the Minister of Public Works say that he thinks this House is too moribund to consider the question of railway passes. No doubt, therefore, he will find it to be his duty to urge his leader to advise the Governor General that as this House is too far gone in the sere and yellow leaf to tackle the question of railway passes, he should dissolve the House immediately, as it is incapable of dealing with such questions as a Remedial Bill or Supplies.

Mr. OUIMET. Not before the thirty days are expired.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We can debate the question until the thirty days are up.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the committee is not responding to the sentiments of the House if it adopts the motion to vote out this preamble, and defeat the Bill. The Act which it proposes to amend is "An Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons of Canada," and it contains a provision for indemnifying members in respect of their attendance at Parliament. The sessional allowance of $1,000 is not a salary, it is only an indemnity. The sessional allowance for mileage is not an increase to the salary, it is a recoupment as an indemnity; it is a return of money we are supposed to expend in attending Parliament. When public opinion without this House describes the action of members of this House as it does, in language that is equivalent to a charge of obtaining money by fraud or by dishonest means out of the public treasury, because we take as an indemnity from Parliament, mileage money which we never pay out, the time has arrived for Parliament to respect its own dignity and remove any opportunity for so alluding to members of Parliament. The travelling allowance of 10 cents per mile is a trifle in itself. It enables a member four times in the session to attend at Ottawa and at home, but no matter what the allowance may be, I submit that our actions here should not enable the public to form a low estimate of the position of Parliament, and when public journals reflect on the integrity of hon. members, and assert, as they frequently do, when railway legislation comes before this House, that we are influenced, perhaps, sometimes they suggest it mildly, that we are unintentionally and unconsciously influenced, but, at other times, it is charged that members are directly influenced by reason of these gifts from railway companies, the time has arrived when we should respect the dignity of Parliament and remove the occasion for such criticisms. I regard it as unfortunate, therefore, that a majority of this committee should have adopted this course in order to defeat the present measure. It will be my duty, at a subsequent period, to enable the country to form a correct opinion as to the views of hon. gentlemen, to take the sense of the House at a time when the votes can be recorded, yea and nay, and thus show the attitude of every hon. member. I will illustrate. Take the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald). I did not observe how he voted in committee, and, therefore, I only cite his case for purpose of illustration, and the argument may not apply to him. The hon. member lives, perhaps, two thousand miles from here, and his mileage will amount to $400. The Canadian Pacific Railway, we will assume—I do not know whether it is so or not—may give him a return pass to and from Ottawa, and thereby the hon. gentleman saves $400, he receiving $400 from Parliament for railway fare, not one penny of which he pays out, with the exception of the charge for his sleeping-car fare. So he is practically subsidized to the extent of $400 yearly by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The same applies, in a greater or less degree, to all the members who happen to use these privileges, and I submit that the proposition offered is a fair and proper one, and is one that should commend itself to this committee, and certainly it is demanded by the sentiment of the country. We cannot, as honourable men, receive, from the public treasury, mileage for coming to this House when we do not pay it out, but are allowed to travel free by the generosity of the railway companies. Why are the railway companies generous to members of Parliament? Is it for any reason except one? Do they not give passes to members because they are members? Do they give passes indiscriminately, whether the individuals are members or not? What is the reason the companies present these passes to members of this House? The answer is manifest; I need not ask. Every hon. gentleman can answer for himself. The country understands it, and the country will answer it, and this is the last of this question either in the House or in the country.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to give some reason for the vote I gave in committee, a vote which I am quite prepared to repeat in this House and to be put on record. I do not take the same view as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) does, with regard to the indemnity. You may call it what you please, but it is not an indemnity. I wish to ask this committee: if any hon. gentleman comes here, and lives at the house of a friend, or a relation during the session, and pays no board; is he a thief and a scoundrel because he draws his indemnity of $1,000? Does the hon. gentleman from North York (Mr. Mulock) make an account of what he spends in travelling, out of his 10 cents per mile each way, and does he refund to the treasury of the country the balance which he does not pay a railway company. This is really not an indemnity; it is some compensation for the attendance of members in Parliament. Regarding it in that light, I do not consider that the question of expenses for travelling or for board, enters into the matter at all. I am quite prepared to vote for a resolution taking away all indemnity from members of this House. I am quite prepared to withdraw from them any compensation whatever, if the majority of the House would agree with me. I doubt the wisdom of such a course in a country as young as this, but I think there is a good deal to be said for it. I have great respect for public opinion outside of this House—no one has more; but, Sir, I will not allow public opinion that is not properly informed, to lead me against my better judgment, and to lead me into doing a thing which I would consider as throwing an aspersion upon myself and upon my fellow members. That is the position which I take in regard to this matter, and therefore, I voted as I did. That opinion I have long held. I hold it firmly and I am ready to avow it on the hustings. I am ready to be responsible for it before my constituents, and when my constituents think so little of me, as that I would be influenced by a matter of this kind, or that they would think I would be dishonest on account of such, I am quite willing they should leave me at home and get some one else to represent them.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to say a few words, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) made reference to my friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) and to myself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) was mistaken in the calculation he made, because the distance from here to where we live is not so great as he made out; but that is a mere detail and is of no importance. Let me say this, and I think the House will accept my statement: if I were conscious for one minute, that in accepting a pass from the Canadian Pacific or any other railway I would be influenced, I would not hold such a pass for a moment. I never asked for a pass, it is sent to me, and before I was a member of this House I always travelled on a pass, which was given to me at that time I suppose because I was editor of a paper. But, Mr. Chairman, whether it was given me as the editor of a paper or given me as a member of Parliament, if I were conscious for one moment that it influenced me, I most certainly would not use it. The idea of its influencing me never occurred to me. The idea it was given to influence me never occurred to me, and judging by the speeches that I hear in this House from members that I know travel on passes, because I see them produce them; it is palpable to me that these passes do not influence them. For instance, as I have been referred to myself, I may point out : in 1891, I had a Bill dealing with railway matters on the Order paper. Sir John Thompson was then leading the House, and after a struggle, he put it on the Government orders. I know that Bill was not regarded with favour either by the Canadian Pacific Railway or by the Grand Trunk Railway, but it did not matter a pin to me. I pressed it forward and had it put on Government Orders, but when it got to the Railway Committee, that committee in its wisdom practically slew my Bill. Now, my hon. friend from Essex has a Bill on the paper. If that Bill goes into committee, I will propose amendments that will place it in precisely the same position as my Bill of 1891. My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) also has a Bill on the paper, which goes over part of the ground my Bill went over. I asked my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) this year if he was going to press his Bill, because if he was not, I would have put a Bill on the Orders. Last session I proposed a resolution having reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Although I did not hear directly, or from any source that I would pay the least attention to ; and although I did not try to verify it by communicating with any person connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway ; yet, I heard indirectly that the motion was one that the Canadian Pacific Railway would regard with a great deal of dislike. Nevertheless, I discussed the matter here, and my motion was voted down. If I were conscious for one moment, that having a pass influences me, well, I would not have a pass, and I have no doubt that most hon. gentlemen hold the same opinion. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say this : Eight years ago when I came into this House, if that Bill of my hon. friend from York (Mr. Mulock) was brought forward, I think I would have been inclined to support it. But, since I have been eight years a member of Parliament, and to my bitter experience know well, what sacrifices are made by every member of Parliament who has any capacity or any power of making money of his time, I have changed my opinion. There are vast sacrifices, utterly unweighed by the constituencies and utterly unknown to the people, which are made by every member of this House. Take the Reform side of the House, and who does not know what the vast sacrifices a man who is no longer a member of this House, has made to the public ; I refer to the Hon. Mr. Blake. Who does not know what the sacrifices, the leader of the Opposition has made to the public ? Who does not know what the sacrifices hon. gentlemen of many talents on the Government side of the House, have made to the public ? The public do not weigh that. They think it is a great thing to be member of Parliament. They think in voting for you they are endowing you ; when the fact is, that instead of that, it very often turns out that being a member of Parliament is injurious to a man's business. Take my own case. I had to leave my business in order to come here, and after eight years, I can speak now with a frankness which I could not before. I made a great paper ; it is to-day independent of everything but newspaper income ; it is a great paying property, and I had to sell it because I could not carry it on and come here for four or five or six months a year. The sacrifice a member of Parliament makes is a terrible thing, and I only wish the constituencies could be made to understand it. If they did understand it, instead of regarding these passes in the way some of them do now, they would be apt to look on the matter in the way my hon. friend the Minister of Justice says he regards it. But, the fact is, Mr. Chairman, a larger question is raised and it is a question that will have to be faced. We are too timid ; we are afraid to meet the public upon it. As a fact, justice to the members of Parliament is justice to the country, and if there is any injustice done to members of Parliament in this matter, it is inimical to the interest of the country. For my part, if ever the larger question is raised here, I shall meet it in a very different way now—after an experience and observation of eight years—from the way I should have met it when I first entered Parliament. Eight years ago I would have been prepared to cut down the indemnity that is paid to members, so much do I dislike the idea of men having the least temptation to come here for any other purpose than to serve the public. But after a man has been a member of Parliament for a short time, he knows well that the only possible motive that can bring him here is the public spirit that urges him to love the perilous duty of doing good to his fellow-men.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to say just one word in explanation of the vote which I was compelled to give on this question. In the first place, I utterly disbelieve, and would repudiate in the strongest terms, the imputation that any member of this House was influenced at all in his course of conduct here by the receipt of a railway pass. I do not believe that for one moment ; but I do know that there is a very strong feeling out of doors, which tends in the direction of the belief that members of this House are so influenced, and I think it would be a most unhappy thing if we did anything here to give any countenance whatever to such a belief on the part of the public. I think, for the sake of the dignity of this House, it is most important that any such idea should be displaced from the public mind ; and it seems to me that the only way to do that is simply to say that we will not accept these railway passes. Since I have risen to refer to this matter, I will say that I was very much impressed by the view placed before the House by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. I have heard this matter discussed in many places and from many points of view, but I have never heard the case put so strongly as my hon. friend put it to-day. Still, notwithstanding the very strong argument he made in support of the railway pass, I do think that in the interest of this House, which in the larger sense is the interest of the public, it would be better if members of Parliament would simply make up their minds to refuse railway passes when they are offered. I must say that I think the public are very much astray in the view they take with regard to the indemnity which members of Parliament receive for their services or their expenses. It is thought, apparently, that when a member of Parliament receives $1,000 in the way of indemnity, he is receiving a very large sum of money—that he is being very handsomely recouped for his loss. Now, setting aside altogether the consideration of the loss, the enormous loss, which many members of Parliament incur by coming here and leaving their business, just look at the matter from the very lowest point of view, and consider the number of letters which a member of Parliament writes from one year's end to the other. Lay aside altogether the expenses that are incurred here, and compute the value of those letters at what they would cost if written by an ordinary solicitor—even by the most pettifogging solicitor you could find—and I think you would find that the whole of the $1,000 indemnity would be exhausted in payment for the letters alone. Without at all meaning to suggest an increase to the indemnity, I think it would be as well if members of Parliament would speak out a little more plainly and let their constituents understand that when they receive $1,000 in the way of indemnity, they are not being enriched to that extravagant degree that too many of our friends in the rural districts, at any rate, imagine.

Mr. INGRAM. It appears to me that the question for us to consider is whether or not the mileage we receive should be regarded as any portion of our indemnity. Now, to pursue the argument of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), based on his reference to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) drawing $400 for mileage. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he means to say that a member representing the city of Ottawa or the county of Russell, and residing here, should receive the same amount for indemnity as a member residing at a distance from the capital? If hon. gentlemen conclude that the mileage is simply for travelling expenses, then the fair way to deal with the matter would be this. Let the Act be so amended that at every new parliamentary term the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Speaker of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Commons, and the Clerk of the Senate, shall issue to each member a card that will be recognized on all the railway and steamship lines that are subsidized by this Parliament; and let them issue orders to these railway and steamship companies to recognize this card as an official authority given to the member of Parliament or the senator holding it the privilege of travelling free over their lines. If that were done, then you could wipe out the mileage; but in doing that you would do an injustice to gentlemen residing at a distance from the capital, who are obliged to neglect their business to a greater extent than those living at the capital or in its neighbourhood. Then it would naturally follow that the indemnity to each member of the House and to each senator would be rated according to the distance at which he lived from the capital. I have no doubt that the hon. member for North York has no desire to do an injustice to gentlemen residing at a distance; and if he would incorporate something of this kind in his Bill, I would be ready to support it. But I do not consider that the mileage we receive is intended simply to pay our travelling expenses. I regard it as a portion of the indemnity to those who reside a long distance from the capital.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As one of those who support the Bill, I do not think we are open to the imputation which the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) rather flung at us, that we wish to attach a stigma to hon. gentlemen who vote against the Bill. I, for one, have no such idea in my mind at all. It is a Bill on which we may honestly have differences of opinion. I intended, if I had time, to move a small amendment to the first section to provide that if a member travelled only a part of the distance on a pass, he should only lose the mileage for the portion that he so travelled. In this discussion, I think, we are missing the point of the matter before the House. We are discussing the propriety of receiving passes at all. That is not before the House. Some hon. gentlemen may think there is no harm in their accepting a pass; others may think differently. There is another view of the case which has not yet been presented. What is important is not what the member may feel on the subject so much as whether or not the public at large believe that the acceptance of a pass influences our judgment. We know that a very salutary rule, which has existed for a long time in the British Empire, is that no judge who is appointed to sit in judgment between two of his fellow-citizens shall receive a favour from either of those citizens, be it small or be it great. I suppose there could not be a greater insult offered to a British judge by a litigant than to tender him a favour of the smallest kind.

Mr. DICKEY. That is not in issue here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say it is not. The question of receiving passes is not in issue here, but the principle which leads the public British mind to believe that it is wrong for a litigant to offer a favour of any kind to a judge prevails, to some extent, in the mind of the public, who think that it is wrong for a railway company, seeking favours continuously from this Parliament, to offer even the smallest favour to any member who may be called upon to vote for or against the request of the company. That is the point. We must be, as a judge, above suspicion, and if it comes to the question as to whether it is right to receive passes or not, there are many points of view from which it may be regarded, and possibly those who urge that it is right may be justified in their view. With regard to the question raised, whether it is expedient or not to abolish indemnity, the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) said he was much impressed with the view of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey). It did not impress me in the slightest. I do not see what the question of indemnity has to do in this discussion at all. I am not at one with the hon. gentleman. I think you would do a great injustice, not only to the members, but to the country at large, if you provided that the indemnity should cease. You would exclude the very best class of men. Experience has shown that while you may get a Parliament in England, where there are many wealthy men able to give up their time to the public, in this country, where every man has to earn bread for his family by his own labour, it would be impossible to get men to come here and spend three months, at their own expense, without indemnity.

Mr. McNEILL. I understood the Minister of Justice to say that in a new country like this, he is not prepared to do away with the indemnity.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He said he was prepared to abolish the indemnity altogether.

Mr. McNEILL. He said so, speaking for himself, but in a new country like this he was not prepared to go so far.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We are not discussing whether members should be indemnified or not, or whether they should accept passes or not. Personally, I am strongly in favour of the proposition made last session by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), and endorsed to-day by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), of compelling every railway company in Canada which receives a subsidy from Parliament, to give passes over its line to the members of the House of Commons and Senate. But the one point we are invited to discuss, is whether, having received passes and having used these passes, we could fairly ask for the mileage indemnity as well. I do not propose to impute motives to anybody. Some think we are entitled to it, and others think we are not. I think not, and I vote in that sense, not because I wish to throw any obloquy on the motives on those who think otherwise, but because I think, honestly, that the Bill, to the extent to which I say it ought to have gone, is laying down a correct principle.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I do not desire to prolong the discussion on this very important question. I am very glad, indeed, to hear my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) declare that he is personally in favour of compelling all railways and steamship lines, subsidized by the Parliament of Canada, to grant passes to every member of Parliament on both sides of the House. I think that this will remove any suspicion from the public mind that members of Parliament would be biassed by receiving passes from these companies. I do not believe that any such opinion exists in any part of this Dominion, unless where it has been created by some parties interested in obtaining cheap popularity among the people. The indemnity granted to members of Parliament is $1,000, and a mileage of 10 cents per mile to those who attend Parliament during the whole session. If they do not attend during the whole session, $8 per day is deducted from that indemnity. Now, the mileage is just as much a part of the indemnity as the $1,000.

Mr. MULLOCK. Then why is it variable?

Mr. CAMERON. I think I shall explain to my hon. friend. The indemnity is supposed by some to be simply for the purpose of covering the expenses of members of Parliament during the session, but I am more inclined to put it on the basis that it is a small compensation for the loss of time to the majority of us through our attendance in Parliament. Those who are furthest distant from the seat of Parliament, unquestionably lose very much more than those who live at the seat of Parliament, or near it. The mileage is more intended to cover the loss of business incurred by those who live at a distance, in excess of that which is incurred by those who live nearer the capital. In Nova Scotia, the indemnity is $500 for the session, and 20 cents a mile. It was never supposed that 20 cents a mile was intended to cover the travelling expenses to and from the local legislature. That was not the intention there, and I am sure it was not the intention here. The object of paying 20 cents a mile additional indemnity to those who live at a distance was simply to cover the extra loss incurred by them on account of the distance at which they live from the seat of Parliament. What I would complain of is that the mileage allowed here is not sufficient to cover the additional loss which must be experienced by those who live far from this city. It is well known that those who live within a few hundred miles can go home to their business once a week, and thus keep a sharp supervision over it, which those who live at greater distances find it impossible to do. They must remain here from the beginning to the end of the session, unless compelled by some unfortunate circumstances to absent themselves, and then they are docked $8 per day. The point I desire to make is this, that the mileage is a part of the indemnity, and that it is not sufficient to compensate those who come from a distance, as compared with those who are nearer the capital. I do not think that any one will acquire very much fame in this Dominion by cheese-paring of this kind. To my mind, it looks very much like straining at a gnat. As far as the passes are concerned, my opinion is that very few companies who give passes to members of Parliament are asking for any favours from this Parliament; and even if they were, I think they are simply doing a duty which devolves upon them. Every railway company that is subsidized by this Parliament should give a pass to every member of Parliament on both sides of politics; and, if they were compelled to do that, no person would be suspected of being under any obligation to them.

Mr. CASEY. I regret that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has on this occasion raised the general question of the propriety of accepting passes. I understood him to limit the scope of his proposal, and the scope of his discussion to what was actually stated in the Bill. I do not wish, by the support I have given to the Bill as introduced by the hon. gentleman this session, to be understood as endorsing the idea that it is in any way improper for a member to take or use a pass. I stated in the discussion last year that I would support a Bill similar to the one he has introduced, and I have done so. But there is a difference between the Bill of last session and the present measure. The Bill of last year practically provided that a member should not use a pass under any circumstances, on pain of losing a large part of his indemnity as well as his mileage. But I do not wish to be understood as endorsing the hon. gentleman's remarks this session as to the impropriety of the use of passes by the members of this House.

Mr. MULOCK. I am perfectly aware that public life involves sacrifices, great and small, on the part of all members who devote their time to public affairs. This is a consideration to govern each person in determining whether he will or will not enter public life. I am not aware that, when a man comes to the decision to enter public life, he expects to be recouped in money for public services rendered for the benefit of the country. I believe that many men in Canada voluntarily, cheerfully and loyally make sacrifices of their time and strength—perhaps more than they can afford—because of their interest in the country. We constantly see citizens taking a deep interest in public charities, for instance, simply for the good of the cause involved. And so in this higher sphere, in this greatest and most important institution in Canada, corresponding sacrifices have to be made by all of us. These sacrifices are, no doubt, more onerous to some than to others. Nevertheless the fact that they are sacrifices is to be considered in connection with the nature of the work and the fact that the man making these sacrifices will, perhaps, receive the gratitude of the public, or at all events, will enjoy the consciousness or having served his country well. So that the question of sacrifices made, I submit, has nothing to do with the question involved in this Bill. My hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), I think, effectually disposed of the argument of the Minister of Justice. The hon. Minister suggested whether a gentleman would be warranted in accepting the indemnity of $1,000 if he did not expend the whole of it attending Parliament. The indemnity of $1,000 is given as a fixed sum, subject to certain limitations or deductions, which are set forth in the statute. One of the chief objections to the acceptance of a present in the way of a pass from a railway company by a member of Parliament is that the member is obliged from time to time to sit in judgment upon applications which affect financially the very giver of the present. My hon. friend from Queen's P.E.I., suggested, and very properly, the dictates of public opinion as to the conduct of judges. Are we not in the position of judges? The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) says that it is a rare thing for these companies to come here for favours. I do not know that we can call an application for legislation an application for a favour; we have no right to regard them as such. We have no right to grant favours in the ordinary sense of the term. We are here as trustees of the public treasury, trustees of certain powers which we, as representatives may exercise or not in our discretion. But this is not an arbitrary discretion to be exercised whimsically, but a discretion to be exercised, to the best of our judgment, for the welfare of the country; it is a matter of duty, not a matter of discretion how we shall treat these applications. And I submit, with all respect to the opinion of others, that it is unseemly for us to be sitting with gratuities in our pockets from the railway companies that are applying to this Parliament for legislation. Further, I emphasize again the opinion that we owe it to the public not to allow them to lower their opinion of Parliament or of the individual members of Parliament. I can pass with indifference such suggestions as fell from the lips of my hon. friend from Inverness. If any one attempts to remove an abuse, he is liable to such complimentary references as those with which my hon. friend favoured me. I accept these observations as a necessary incident of any legislation of this kind; but the fact that my hon. friend can view the legislation in the way indicated by his remarks causes me to attach very much less weight to any remark he may make. However, I trust that the personal element can be, to some extent, left out of consideration, and that we deal with this subject on its own merits. I may say that the hon. gentleman from Inverness is entirely in error if he supposes that this is not a live question. This proposal did not originate, so far as I know, with persons seeking cheap popularity, or a popularity of any other kind.

Mr. CAMERON. I mean in the country.

Mr. MULOCK. In the country or here. This is a question the feeling regarding which is widespread among the people, and the people have in various forms expressed opinions hostile to the present condition of affairs. The very sentiment that prevents men who occupy judicial positions accepting favours from those persons likely to come before them in the capacity of suitors applies, pro tanto, to the case under discussion, and is an additional objection to the system. So the Bill I have the privilege of introducing, I think, claims support on two good grounds—one that we are taking money from the public treasury by way of recoupment for expenses in travelling, which money we do not pay out, and the other that we are accepting favours from suitors to this Parliament for legislation—two sound objections, either one of which, I submit, ought to commend the Bill to the favourable consideration of this House.

Mr. TAYLOR. Just a word or two, Mr. Speaker, from my point of view as to why railway companies grant passes. I believe that railway companies grant passes to members of Parliament for business reasons, and, if I were president of a railway company in this country, I would adopt the course pursued by most of the railway companies in this respect. We know that members of Parliament, no matter whether they support the Government or whether they are in opposition, are compelled, in the interest of their constituencies and in the interest of the country, to visit the capital very often, even when the House is not in session. Take the case of a member of Parliament at Toronto or London. He probably has to visit the capital four, five or six times during the recess, usually coming down for the purpose of accompanying some deputation having business with the Government. If that member has a pass in his pocket over one line of railway, and there are two other lines of railway from that point to the capital, the member will go on the road by which he has free transport, and the deputation who pay their way, will accompany him. Now, to my mind that is the reason, and the only reason, why the railway companies of this country try to induce travel by their respective roads. I do not believe that a railway company ever offered a pass to any hon. member of this House for the purpose of influencing his vote in any way in favour of legislation that they may have before the House. Even if they did, we are here simply to see that proper laws safeguarding the interests of the people as well as those of the railway company, are passed by the House. We have no favours to give to railway companies, and the railway companies, in my opinion, give these passes purely from a business point of view. If I were president of a railway company, with a competing line, I would give a railway pass to every member of both the Dominion and provincial governments. The companies give passes to many others, they give them to newspaper men, simply because newspaper men are running over the road a good deal, accompanied by their friends, who pay their fares, and they will go on whichever line of railway that is taken by the gentleman whom they are accompanying. That is the way I have always viewed passes. I believe it is the common-sense way to view them, and that is why the railway companies give passes to members. A great deal of noise has been made in this House and in the country by persons who charge members of Parliament with being bribed by railway companies. I don't believe these charges amount to the snap of your finger in the country. These passes do not influence the hon. member who has raised this question in the House, nor any other hon. gentleman in the House, whether he has passes or not. That is my opinion, and it is my opinion that some of the railway companies will continue to issue passes to men in public life, and to other prominent men who do a great deal of travelling, in order to induce them to go over their lines and to bring with them their friends who pay fares.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I am sure my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) would not for a moment suspect that I meant, in my remarks, that any member of this House would endeavour to acquire a cheap popularity by any movement of this kind. But I do distinctly say that there are some persons in the country who are trying to agitate the people in regard to passes given by railway companies and steamship lines. Their object is manifest, they desire to gain some popularity by which they may obtain seats in Parliament. It is persons outside who, as a general thing, agitate questions of this kind, and the agitation gains strength in various constituencies to such an extent that even persons who are fixed in their positions as members of Parliament, such as my hon. friend for North York, are disturbed by it. But my impression is that it has very little effect in the country. I am also of the decided opinion that the generous people of this Dominion do not desire, or require, that any public man should make great sacrifices in their interest. I believe they are not only willing to indemnify their representatives for the time and expense which are entailed by their attendance in Parliament, but they are willing to compensate them fairly well. I go further, and say that the indemnity given to members of Parliament is not sufficient, even including the travelling expenses allowed them, to compensate them for their loss of time, and their services to the country. I am satisfied that if a large majority of this House were to grant a reasonable amount in addition to what we now receive, the common-sense people in the country would justify it. I have no hesitation in saying that I would be willing to defend, not only the existing indemnity, but to defend an additional indemnity as well; and I would go as far as my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, and say that unless the people whom I have the honour to represent here were willing to acquiesce in granting additional indemnity to members of Parliament, I for one would have no hesitation in making way for some other gentleman who would be willing to serve for the present compensation.

Committee rose.

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

Mr. CASEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) further to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I beg leave to call the attention of the House, in the first place, to the question of jurisdiction. That question was raised in connection with a Bill I had up the other day in regard to drainage across railways. It was maintained by the Government and others on that occasion, that the jurisdiction as to drainage on railway property, did, and should, inhere entirely in this Parliament, in spite of the strong contention, on the other hand, that that subject was especially under the care of the local legislature. In the present case I am sure the Government will not raise the question of jurisdiction, for this Bill proposes to regulate the conduct of railways which are under the control of the Dominion Parliament, some of which have been chartered by us, and whose methods of procedure, I think, we have undoubtedly a right to control. I maintain that in regard to property and matters of that kind, the railways of Canada should be under the control of the respective provinces. But I do think that when this Parliament has taken control of certain railways in the sense in which it has brought them under its own special jurisdiction, we have a right to prescribe how those railways shall carry on their business, and how they shall perform their duties towards the public, and towards their own employees.

This Bill relates to both these classes of duties; it concerns the conduct of railway companies towards their employees and towards the public who travel over those roads. I did not intend to bring it up at so early a period of the session. I have had a number of copies of the Bill printed for circulation amongst those specially interested, and I wished to get the opinion of railway men, both employers and employed, before I proposed the second reading of the Bill. But I was afraid that it might get smothered up, as happened last year, with other business, and that I would not have a chance of taking the sense of the House upon it at all. I am, therefore, going to ask the House to read it the second time to-day, and then to do as was done with the railway drainage Bill, refer it either to the Railway Committee, or to a select committee, who may thresh out the particulars of the proposed law. I desire an opportunity to lay before the committee in charge of the Bill the opinions of those interested, and have a full discussion of its various details, apart from any possible partisanship.

I hope that there will be no partisan feeling in connection with the discussion of the Bill, but that it will be discussed as was the Bill presented by the hon. member for Gengarry (Mr. McLennan), on sound, general, business principles, and that it will receive the support, at least for its second reading, of all those who wish to see something done in the direction indicated by the Bill.

Mr. HAGGART. I desire a full discussion of the principle of the Bill on the second reading, and I then propose to send it to the Railway Committee.

Mr. CASEY. I thank the hon. gentleman for his statement. Accordingly I will now describe, as briefly as possible, the principles involved in the Bill, and I will accept the hon. gentleman's proposal to send the Bill to the Railway Committee after it has received its second reading.

The general provisions of the Bill may be said to come under three heads. A number of the provisions look towards protecting employees and passengers in the operating of the road. Another set of provisions look towards securing a minimum fixed compensation for employees who are injured, or permanently disabled, in connection with the operating of the road, or for the families of those killed in the performance of their duties. The final clause relates more particularly to the duty of the company to maintain the road-bed and plant in first-class order.

I may say, in the first place, that when we grant a franchise to a railway company we are giving it something that is extremely valuable, we are making it a present of what is practically a monopoly of transportation along certain routes. I wish to lay down the general principle that we have a right to demand something in return for this franchise, that it is not to be regarded as a free gift to which a railway company has an absolute right, but rather as a concession, in return for which the public have a right to demand that the company shall take proper precautions for the safety of the public and their own servants.

Looking first at the clause respecting duties towards employees, I would say in general terms that no class in the country deserve more credit for their general good character, for the fortitude with which they endure severe and trying labour, and the skill which they have to exercise in many branches of their employment, than those who operate the railways of this country. From the newest hand in a railway yard, to the brakeman who risks his life on the top of a slippery freight car on a frosty night, and on up to the skilled engineer, the responsible conductor, and so through even higher grades of the service, these men must be of high quality, and possess careful training, in order to secure as well as they do the safety of the lives and property committed to their charge.

No doubt some hon. members have taken a ride in the cab of a locomotive, and any one who has done so will realize, in some degree, the necessity for a keen eye, a strong hand and level head on the part of men so employed. Everybody must realize who travels on a passenger train how entirely his life depends upon the capacity of the man who drives the train. But we do not always realize the fact that this man himself and others who ride with him on the engine are the very first to suffer in case of accident, that they are placing themselves in immediate danger of their lives.

The first provision of the Bill is intended to give special security to those who drive the locomotive, as well as the passengers of the train itself. It provides that all cars fitted with air-brakes shall have an automatic device, either in the hose coupling of the air-brake—that is in the rubber pipe connecting the air-brake under one car with that under the next—or the “train pipe” which passes under the floor of the car, which will warn the engineer when a coupling is broken, accidentally or otherwise.

That may not seem to the non-technical mind a very important matter. I am sorry to be able to recall an instance in the capital city of my own county where many lives and much property were sacrificed for the want of such a device as that to which I have referred. An excursion train coming from Port Stanley northward through St. Thomas attempted to stop in the usual manner at the station there; but when the engineer attempted to apply the air-brake, he found that the connection had been broken, and he was unable to control the speed of the train. It rushed through the station, struck a train on another railway which crossed the line, composed of oil cars, smashed the engine of the excursion train, setting fire to the wreck and causing a conflagration, involving heavy loss of life and tremendous destruction of property. If the provision contained in the first section of this Bill had been in force and carried out, the engineer would have been warned the moment the connection was broken, and he would have been able to prevent that accident.

The second clause provides that freight cars built for use in Canada shall be of a uniform height, prescribed by the Minister of Railways, and shall have certain attachments for the greater security of those who have to do with handling the freight. They are to have automatic extension running boards on top of the cars, making a safe pathway from one car to the other; they are to have a continuous rail alongside the running board for the brakemen to hold by; they are to have outside ladders conveniently placed for brakemen to climb on to the roof of the car, and iron rails on top of these ladders for the further convenience of those who climb them, perhaps in the dark, or perhaps in a storm, and who will find it a great convenience to have something to catch hold of when they go on top of the slippery roof of a car. All these attachments are to be subject to the approval of the Minister of Railways.

Clause 3 provides :

Every such car already built, which is the property of a Canadian railway for use in Canada, shall, within two years after the passing of this Act be fitted with the foregoing attachments.

Clauses 4 and 5 provide for penalties for a breach of these provisions. The 6th clause is very important, because it provides that the Minister of Railways shall proceed against any railway company, or car builder, handling, using or building such cars contrary to the provisions of this Act; on the information of any credible person. Without that provision, I am afraid nobody would intervene to see the law carried out, and I propose to make it the duty of the Minister of Railways. It might perhaps be left more properly to the Solicitor General, but that is a matter for further consideration.

Clause 7 provides :

7. When cars fitted with automatic couplings are made up in a train with cars not so fitted, the cars with automatic couplings shall be coupled together, and those not so fitted shall be coupled together, so that there shall be only one coupling in the train between cars with automatic couplings and those without them.

2. When cars fitted with air-brakes are made up in a train with cars not so fitted, the cars with air-brakes shall be placed next to the locomotive, and the air-brakes shall be coupled and used in braking such cars.

3. When flat cars are made up in a train with other cars, the flat cars shall be coupled together.

The reason of these provisions is, that a brakeman who has to attend to cars not automatically braked, will not be obliged to run over other cars to get to the one which he needs to brake. The provision in regard to flat cars ought to explain itself. It is a very inconvenient thing to get down from the roof of a box car, to a flat car, and then climb again to the roof of the next box car. If the box cars were all together it would be much safer and easier for the brakeman.

These details will, of course, be subject to discussion in committee; but I must say, in regard to all these provisions, that I have taken counsel with the best authorities on the subject that I am acquainted with, namely: with the Executive Board of the Railway Brotherhoods of Canada, through their representatives in this city, and also by direct communication with others of the committee. I introduced the Bill last year, after consultation with these gentlemen, and I have revised it this year after further consultation with them, so that so far as regards most of its details, it is now in a shape dictated by the practical knowledge and experience of those who are most interested, namely, the men who operate the trains.

Clause 8 of the Bill provides extra pay, pro rata, for any railway employee who is kept at work beyond ten hours, or whatever shorter period may be the regular stipulated time agreed upon by him and the company, for his daily duties. Clause 9 provides for a meal hour at a convenient time for yard men and others employed about the shunting yard.

Now we come to clause 10, which seems to me to contain some of the most important provisions of the Bill. This is the clause which provides for a fixed minimum compensation to those injured in the discharge of their duties, or to the relatives of those employees who have been killed. It provides:

10. Every employee of a railway company injured while in the discharge of his duty shall, for every day during which he is thereby unfitted for duty, be entitled to compensation from the railway company at the rate of not less than sixty per cent of the current rate of wages for men similarly employed by the company at the time the injury occurs, to be paid for not more than fifty-two weeks.

2. Every such employee permanently disabled while in the discharge of his duty, shall be entitled to compensation from the railway company to the amount of not less than three thousand dollars.

3. The legal representatives of every employee who is killed, or who dies from injuries received, while in the discharge of his duty, shall be entitled to compensation from the railway company to the amount of not less than three thousand dollars.

4. The foregoing provisions as to compensation and extra pay for overtime shall be without prejudice to any further damages which a court of law may adjudge to any such employee or his legal representatives as against any railway company, and shall not be capable of being renounced or given up by such employee by any agreement or contract with the railway company, for value or otherwise, or of being made void by any rules or regulations of the railway company.

The sum of $3,000 is mentioned in a tentative way and is subject to future discussion. The percentage of 60 per cent mentioned in the subsection is also, so to speak, a tentative one. It is what is allowed by railway benefit societies, and in other similar cases, and could be subject to change without affecting the principle involved. I understand that in the laws of some of the United States, this plan of fixed compensation is adopted. I am not in a position to say in what states that is the law, but I thoroughly approve of the principle. I maintain, that when an employee is injured or killed in the discharge of his duty on a railway, and when that death or injury is not the result of his own negligence, he is entitled to some fixed compensation from the company. Nearly all such accidents occur because of some defect in the plant, or road-bed, or cars, or locomotives; or through the negligence of some employee other than the one who is injured. I hold that in all such cases the company should be liable.

It may be said, that we should leave this to the courts to settle, but I say, that no employee of a railway company is able to fight that railway company in the courts. If it is left to the courts to settle between the two, the employee will always come out at the small end of the horn. A company can appeal the case from court to court, until it goes to the Privy Council if necessary, without seriously affecting its revenues, but the employee will be stranded at a very early stage of the litigation.

Subsection 6, of clause 10, provides:

6. The foregoing provisions as to compensation shall be void in the case of any employee whose injury, disablement or death is caused by his own negligence,—the burden of proof of such negligence being upon the railway company; but if such injury, disablement or death occurs in the handling or use of trains, locomotives, cars or appliances which are out of repair, or insufficient, or not in accordance with the provisions of this Act, or if the provisions of section eleven of this Act have not been complied with, the railway company shall not be allowed to plead contributory negligence on the part of the employee so injured, disabled or killed.

I think that section carries its own justification with it. If the company is not observing the law, or if its tracks or other equipment are not in good order, it should not be allowed to plead contributory negligence on the part of the employee.

Subsection 5 makes provision for the ascertainment of the permanent disability or unfitness for duty of the person claiming compensation. It says:

The certificate of two duly qualified disinterested physicians shall be sufficient to prove permanent disability; and the certificate of the attending physician shall be sufficient to prove unfitness for duty, for a period not exceeding ten weeks, after which time a monthly certificate of two disinterested physicians shall be required: Provided that, in any case, the certificate of a physician named by the company shall be sufficient.

Nearly all railway companies have a railway doctor—a physician appointed to attend their men, and I provide that his certificate shall be sufficient in any case. I have no doubt that, in most of these cases, the injury or disablement would be so plain and obvious that the railway's own physician would report it, and avoid the expense of calling others.

Now we come to another very important section—section 11, which is as follows:—

Every railway company shall at all times employ a sufficient number of telegraph operators, train men, section men, and other employees and workmen to safely carry on its business, and to keep its bridges, track, roadway, rolling stock and plant in good condition.

If it fails to do so, it shall be held responsible for all injury to life, person, or property in connection with its operations.

I submit that this section, which applies to passengers, employees, shippers, and everybody concerned, carries its own justification with it. If the railway allows its means of transportation to get into a bad state of repair, I think it should be distinctly held liable for all injury that may occur to life and property in connection with its operations.

I may be told that the provisions of this Act are rather severe on railway companies. I do not think they are, and I do not think the companies, if well advised, will maintain that they are. I have already pointed out what I believe to be the absolute right of the public, to insist on any conditions they please in connection with the granting of a railway franchise. I think that the conditions embodied in this Bill are reasonable, and that it would be to the advantage of the railway companies themselves to agree to them.

The railway companies are constantly put to expense by going into court to litigate matters connected with injury to life and property. Some companies seem to think it cheaper to risk the killing of an employee once in a while than to go to the necessary expense to make the operation of trains safe for those employed. I do not mean to say that they do that deliberately, by any means; but their general course of conduct is to allow things to go on in a way that is unnecessarily risky to the lives and limbs of those employed, until accidents occur, and then, instead of providing against such accidents in future, they pay damages, and go on in the old method. I do not think we can trust to the companies themselves to introduce the necessary improvements, unless we force them to do it.

Mr. CASEY.

When I compiled this Bill for presentation to the House, I took it for granted that my hon. friend from East York (Mr. MacLean) was going to introduce his Bill of last year, which provided for the placing of air-brakes and automatic couplings on all cars used in Canada. If I had not expected that, I would have put in the clauses of that Bill as part of this Bill. It will be possible to do that in the committee, and, after the Bill goes there, I will move their insertion, or leave my hon. friend from East York to do so if he thinks fit. I mention that to explain why I have provisions in this Bill of apparently less importance, without including those to which I have referred. Some of the provisions of this Bill would be unnecessary, and therefore void, when the provisions of the Bill of the hon. member for East York came into force; but the others are of permanent usefulness and necessity. Thanking the hon. Minister of Railways for agreeing to the second reading, I leave the matter in the hands of the House.

Mr. TISDALE. I think this Bill is of too much importance altogether not to be discussed somewhat as to its principles before it goes to the committee, because the details are what the committee has largely to deal with, while the House has to decide the principles of legislation of this kind. I do not think myself that this is a very opportune time, looking at the history of railways, not only in this country, but all over this continent, to increase their already heavy obligations, unless it is shown to be not only beneficial and desirable, but reasonable in every respect. I quite agree that from time to time it may be necessary by legislation to look after and improve the position of people who have dealings with railways, and it may be necessary, at times, by legislation to deal with the rolling stock, but I do not think that either of these matters should be enforced upon the railways by any legislature unless it is clearly made out that their equipment is imperfect and of a character that is essentially dangerous. I believe that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will agree that legislation against any particular class, forcing upon that class regulations, either as to the character of the implements or machinery it uses in a particular trade, or as to the wages or hours of labour agreed to between it and its employees, or as to compensation for injuries, embodies principles of such a far-reaching nature that all legislatures should move very slowly in adopting it. When I say that, I do not mean that there may not be particular cases when the interference of the legislature is necessary, but I think all hon. members of this House will agree that such cases should be clearly made out before we should be asked to exercise the potent power of the legislature along these particular lines. My own experience as a legislator, and as a lawyer before I came to Parliament, has taught me that the greatest danger of the present day in regard to legislation, is in having too much of it. Gentlemen outside of the House—because I never impute motives to members of the House, I do not believe in that, nor do I think, as a rule, that it is justified—gentlemen outside of the House, and interests outside of the House, often seek to promote their own selfish ends, or to serve some feeling they have in regard to corporations or individuals, by getting members of Parliament to introduce legislation in the legislatures of the different provinces or in the legislature of the Dominion. I am one of those who believe that we should legislate on lines applicable to the whole country, and be very careful not to make ourselves the instrument of any particular interests or individuals. Take the first clause of this Bill, which deals with automatic brakes, and which is largely in the interests of gentlemen who think they have the wisest and the best devices in the world, simply because they have patented them.

Mr. CASEY. It is not about automatic brakes at all.

Mr. TISDALE. The clause reads :

All cars fitted with air-brakes shall, within one year from the passing of this Act, be provided with an automatic device—

That is the same thing.

Mr. CASEY. No.

Mr. TISDALE. What I am objecting to is that we should pass a clause of this kind when we know that these devices are things which railway companies themselves have to be very careful about adopting. The history of railway advancement and improvement shows that the great railways have always kept in the front in adopting devices which are excellent and practicable : but I am within the mark in saying that out of all the air devices or brakes, or whatever you call them, standing in the Patent Office in the United States, not one out of a thousand has been accepted. But from the brains that inventors have put into that direction, some most excellent and great improvements have been discovered and used. Speaking with all deference, I do not think that we are competent judges in this matter, and we certainly ought to be very careful before compelling railways to use any particular devices. The railway companies themselves adopt improvements readily when they are satisfied that they are worth adopting. When the master mechanics, when the associations of master mechanics pass upon these improvements and declare them to be useful, safe and beneficial, the railway companies are only too ready to adopt them; and in assuming that we know better, we are assuming a superior knowledge in matters which these people have made the study of a lifetime. I think it would be very dangerous on our part to compel the railway companies to provide themselves with any particular devices which we may consider an improvement but which they have not seen fit to adopt, and, therefore, I think we should hesitate before passing this clause. We do not know how much it may mean to a railway company. We all know that the railways of this continent and of the old world as well, are just emerging from a period of the greatest financial struggle, mainly for existence. On the other side of the line, hundreds of them have passed into the hands of the receiver, so that while some of these devices may be useful, we should go very slow before compelling the railway companies by statute to adopt them. Take section two of the Bill. There are two sides to the question raised by that section. I am quite willing to do all that is possible and reasonable in requiring railway companies to adopt improvements which will accomplish objects of general benefit, especially as regards safety, but it requires some knowledge of the subject before you attempt to compel railway companies to adopt appliances which theoretically appear very fine, but which practically may not be workable. Subsection A of section two provides :

That the railways shall have automatic extension running boards, making a safe pathway from car to car.

That seems, theoretically, a very praiseworthy proposition, but before applying it we must consider, right at the threshold, the fact that no railway which amounts to anything in Canada is without through traffic connection with the American lines. You get, therefore, on the American roads cars with different arrangements and of different heights, over which we have no control, and the very device, which theoretically looks very wise, may become really a source of danger. Take the next subsection :

A continuous rail, at a uniform and convenient height, with sufficient and firm supports, along one side of each running board, the whole length of the car.

How can you make a continuous rail and how can you arrange a height which will suit cars in the United States, which have not that continuous rail and are of different heights ?

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to explain, the rail is only continuous for the length of one car.

Mr. TISDALE. I understand, and the next car will have no rail at all. The proper way to consider this is to put yourself in the place of the man whose life is in danger. On the next car there is no rail. If he gets used to a rail on his own cars, he will look for it on the other cars, and passing along on a dark night, especially in dangerous places—because any one who knows anything of the operations of trains knows that a brakeman is never sent out except when the safety of the train is at stake—he feels for the rail and not finding it is more liable to accident than if he knew the rail was not there. If we have power to legislate over our own railway lines, we have not the right to legislate over others. There is besides a difference of opinion among railway companies as to whether this railing is desirable or not, though if all of them could be compelled to adopt it, it would seem to be useful, because even if it made a man careless, he has something to grasp; but under the circumstances, it looks to me as if the attempt to force this on the railway companies would be more dangerous than to leave the thing as it is. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that I am not more interested in railways than he is, and I have had no more to do with railways since I have come to the House than probably he has. All I have had to do with railways have been in connection with a couple of small lines in my own county.

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." I merely mention that to show that I am not afraid to stand in this House or anywhere and advocate what I believe, whatever attempts may be made against me—because these views are unpopular among the people who cultivate, or, at least, attempt to cultivate, as sometimes happens, the popular side of a question. When gentlemen are on the stump, as the saying is, they may seek to make charges against others of doing thus and so for a railway. I never did "thus and so" for a railway or for anybody in connection with any legislation before this House, and I never said anything in a committee or in this chamber that I was not prepared to have brought to the light of day, or that I was afraid to justify. It cost me a good deal of time and money to get my experience of railways—money on the wrong side of the ledger, in connection with large railways built through my own part of the country. That is how I got my experience.

Mr. LAURIER. That is the best experience—the experience that costs money.

Mr. TISDALE. I believe the hon. gentleman is right, and one reason why it is the best experience is that it takes the conceit out of a man. My experience took a good deal of conceit out of me. I have had my experience, as the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) knows, for he undertook part of the labour and helped to put through the railway I speak of. I learned many things about railways. You may believe many things about railways, but your opinions will be a good deal changed when you come to have practical experience. They say a burnt child dreads the fire; I know that since my first experience I have not had so much to do with railway building.

Mr. TISDALE.

and I have had little or nothing to do with railway operation. So, reverting to the hon. gentleman's "hear, hear," I am prepared here or anywhere to vote or speak to defend the rights of railway companies, even though it may not be so popular as to take the other side. But I am equally prepared to speak and vote in favour of compelling them to recognize the rights of the people. So, coming back to the point under discussion—for this has been a digression—I would be quite prepared, if the railways showed a tendency to neglect the provisions necessary for the safety of their employes and of passengers, to favour any wise measure that would effect a remedy. But I do not believe in unduly burdening these companies, particularly at a time when it is hard for them to earn even their operating expenses. I am prepared to vote whatever is necessary, but I want hon. gentlemen who have proposals to make to the House on this subject to take the responsibility of preparing legislation which they can clearly show to be practical and not unduly burdensome upon the company. Now, as to the outside ladders, these are not considered as at all times of so much advantage as one might think. The great objection to them, according to the best information I have been able to get, is that, as a matter of experience, they are seldom used. Even where there is an outside ladder, the men usually prefer to go up the ladder at the end, as they do now. The practical test is the habit and practice of the men who use and become accustomed to these appliances, not the theoretical opinions of those who regard the subject from outside. It may be said that two ladders are better than one, or that a ladder on the outside is better than a ladder at the corner. But the experience of railway men is that if you provide the two ladders, only one is used. In regard to the——arched iron rails, extending from the top of each ladder to a sufficient and firm support, placed at the side of the running board, and so arranged as to assist a person climbing on to the roof by means of such ladders,

—the argument I advanced with regard to the other rail would apply equally to this. If these rails are provided in some cars and not in others their absence when they are absent may cause more accidents than their presence where they are present will prevent. Those who have watched the brakemen on freight cars must have wondered at the expertness they acquire. Moving about on a particular class of cars becomes second nature. The most dangerous thing you can do is to make a difference in the cars so that appliances that are present in one will be absent in another. No one can deny that braking on freight trains is a difficult and dangerous job. But men in foundries, in smelting works, in coal mines and other large undertakings have dangerous places, and must rely for their protection upon their own skill and knowledge in using the appliances of their trades. Any attempt to protect these men otherwise may actually increase their danger, and that is the great reason why a proposal of this kind should be considered very carefully from all points of view. Now, the hon. gentleman speaks of the position of cars in the train. Well, I dare say he knows from experience that passengers are apt to be impatient, often unreasonably impatient, when they are kept waiting. The Bill provides that all cars with automatic couplings shall be placed together in the train. No doubt the hon. gentleman knows how great may be the delay caused by the shunting necessary to place these cars together. To enforce such a law would cause, often, very serious loss of time. Whether it would increase the risk of danger or not, is a proposition that only practical railway men can solve. I do not see myself that there is very much to be gained in the case of freight trains. But in a mixed train there would be a great public inconvenience, because passengers would be so long detained while the cars were being coupled in the way proposed, that the convenience to the public of having a passenger car attached for making small journeys, would be practically rendered nil. There would be so much shunting where some cars are automatic and some are not, that it would be almost impossible to make up a train in any reasonable time. In many places where there are only a limited amount of sidings, as is the case at many points on our small railways, which, after all, are those most used by the public in rural districts, it would be almost impossible to do the shunting without such delay as would be destructive to traffic, and would be such a loss of time that the companies could hardly afford to submit to it. One of the results would probably be that they would decline to change traffic at these particular points, and they would be compelled to take it to larger centres where the shunting could be done by shunting engines in the yard, and by yardmen employed for that purpose. Now, coming to the larger questions of running overtime, and hours for meals, the hon. gentleman's proposition looks very nice in theory, but it seems to me it is going a very long distance. I think the history of our two great railways, because, practically, that is the bulk of our system, so far as my knowledge goes, furnishes the best criterion of the working of the present system. They have got along very well, and if you try to make a particular hour apply to everybody, you will create confusion. Any one who knows anything about handling traffic, and the management of yards, knows that the public want traffic handled as cheaply as possible. You will find it impossible to conduct all the business of a great railway according to clockwork.

You might as well say that a busy man in his office who has a typewriter, should be compelled to send the typewriter to lunch every day at a particular hour, although the typewriter himself might be willing to change the hour, and the interest of the employer would require it. Now, take one of these great railways where there are numerous yards and places of that sort, and which handles yearly traffic amounting to millions of tons, do you believe that this proposition could be made to work? Why, the employees of these great railways will tell you themselves that it would not work. They agree, mutually, upon the meal hours, for their mutual convenience and interest. Of course, it is well to have uniformity when that is possible, but the instant you try to make it compulsory, numerous difficulties will arise. Why, Sir, there are a great many more important things than these on a great railway in regard to which you might legislate, if you are going to have paternal legislation at all. Unless the hon. gentleman can show some evils existing at present, he ought not to seize upon a particular point like the hours for meals, and attempt to legislate upon it. Unless it can be clearly shown that there is actually a large grievance, or a misusage, and I do not think that the hon. gentleman has any evidence of such, there is no reason for this legislation. Then, as to overtime, does the hon. gentleman know what that might possibly mean? Every railway has a schedule, showing the hours that their employees may be called upon to work without extra pay, for they do not always have to work. I say that the present economy of the railways is beneficial to the public. I have been myself a railway man, I have employed thousands of men, and I think I know something about the business of conducting a railway. I say it is not in the interests of the employees themselves to attempt to put their employers under such conditions as may injure the business in which they are engaged, to say nothing of public convenience, which is a higher consideration than the interest of either the men or the companies. All of us know that economy in time, and in all these arrangements, is essential to carrying on the wonderful works that we require, and that the world requires at the present day. I am one of those who believe that the best possible law is to leave the employers and the employed, as far as possible, to agree amongst themselves. I do not think it is wise, or fair, in the interest of the workingmen, to encourage a belief that those who employ them are always trying to oppress them. I have many times visited the shops of great railway companies, I have ridden over their lines, and I have had to manage large business concerns where I have dealt with men in large numbers, and there is no trouble, and the men do not care what the law is. I have employed men in the state of Michigan, where they have all sorts of laws, and they have a great deal more trouble with the men in regard to strikes than we do. I object to being called upon to make sumptuary laws of this character, to be burdened with the responsibility of making regulations between employers and employed. I tell the hon. gentleman that there are not many larger questions, in my opinion, than some of those he has attempted to deal with in this Bill. He proposes to change the whole scope of our law in regard to compensation. He is going to make arbitrary rules to apply to all cases. That is not freedom, that is not justice, that is not British, that is not the principle of public liberty. The proper principle is to give compensation according to the injury, and let the measure be meted by a tribunal, whether a jury or a judge. In my opinion, the best tribunal is one composed of both. When you begin to make laws of that sort about damages, where are you going to stop? Probably I shall not remain long in this legislature, but others will come after me who will have the same responsibility that we have, and we should be very careful how we break through these rules of compensation which have been so long tried, and have become part of the best constitutional system of the world, and that is the British system. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, without having given very much study to this Bill, I have pointed out some of the serious objections that I see in it, and the hon. gentleman would do well to consider them before he attempts to interfere with matters of this sort in the summary manner that he proposes. He has put the burden upon us of either accepting or rejecting the several points of his Bill. Year after year the burden is put upon us by Bills of this description, and some other Bills that are on the paper, of legislating on matters that I think might as well have been left alone. I therefore repeat that I do not care whether the party is a legislator or a poor man, or a railway company, or an employee, I will stand in this House and vote for what I believe to be for the good of the country, and in the line justice demands.

Mr. DAVIN. After the exhaustive speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale), I will occupy the House only a minute or two. I wish to say that there are features of this Bill which seem to me to be very important, and there are other features that are certainly unreasonable, and when it goes before the committee I would suggest that subsections a, b, c and d, of clause 2, be omitted. They will only raise opposition on the part of the railway people, and I am informed on the very highest authority, speaking for the employees of railways, that they do not need those provisions, they would be useless. I observe that four clauses have been added to the Bill since last year, and under clause 10 there is a lot of matter with which I certainly could not agree. In regard to the remarks offered by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), I want to point out that there are certain advantages of legislating, or even attempting to legislate, in this direction. I am afraid, when this Bill goes before the Railway Committee, it will have as slim a chance of adoption, as my Bill had in 1891, although Sir John Thompson, then leading the House, said he would place my Bill, and he did so, on the Government Orders; and although my Bill went before the Railway Committee with the baptismal charm of the Government endorsement, nevertheless a member of the Government, who is not in this House now, rose and moved that further time be taken to consider the important features of the Bill. The striking feature in the tragical close of my Bill in the Railway Committee in 1891 was a speech by my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale), who made a speech very like that which he delivered to-day—I hope he does not carry that speech about with him as a railway formula for dealing with young legislators who come forward in Parliament with railway Bills. It will be asked, why is it that I have not brought forward a Bill since 1891? I will tell the House why. There are two reasons. The first is this: It is to be said to the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that the two features of the Bill which I consider of most importance to the North-west are being carried out by the company themselves. For instance, there was the ploughing of fire breaks. The company have been ploughing fire breaks along the line. Again, there was the question of automatic couplers, and they are putting those in the cars with all reasonable speed, and the company's officers have pointed out to me that that it is a result of my efforts in the direction of legislation. That is one reason why I have not introduced another Bill. Another reason is, that after my Bill had passed its second reading, and had been placed on the Government paper, and come before the Railway Committee—and I could hardly get in, a red herring could have hardly got in, there was such a crowd—I saw at once that all the members, Grit and Tory, Liberal and Conservative, were all dead against my Bill. When we got to a vote only four members voted with me, and Grits and Tories, Liberals and Conservatives voted against me. If I may make allusion to what took place to-day, there is that which throws into complete contempt all this talk about railway passes. It is not in railway passes that the power of great railway corporations come in. But I am afraid I am violating the rules of the House. Your frown, Mr. Speaker, is enough. None of the minor gods of Olympus felt more fear when Jove frowned and all Olympus shook, than I do when I see those august brows brought down. But I hold that there is good done by giving voice to the claims of a large class of the community, and by bringing forward legislation such as this, and although, as the Bill is now drawn, I could not support it in toto, and there are amendments which would have to be made, I will support its second reading, and if it goes to the Railway Committee, I will go to that committee and give my hon. friend who has charge of the Bill whatever little assistance I may be able to render. But I may tell him that he has something to fear more than a division in this House.

After Recess.

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) who has moved the Bill deserves some credit for introducing legislation on this matter. However, in reference to the details of the measure, as a practical railway man, I do not entirely agree with them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) started out by saying, he would not discuss the question of jurisdiction, and neither do I propose to discuss that question. He also said, that he hoped the discussion would be free from any partisanship, and that both sides of the House would consider the Bill on its merits. Now, Sir, I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) make that statement to this House, and I shall go back a few years ago, to the occasion when I had the privilege of moving a resolution in this House, calling the attention of the railway companies of this country, and the attention of the public men of this country, to the necessity of adopting safety appliances to protect the railway employees of Canada. Since that time, the Liberal newspapers supporting the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey), as well as a number of his political friends, have stated in my constituency, that while I moved that resolution in this House, yet it was simply a resolution of buncombe. They also said, that I had done nothing else in the matter since, and that now, it became the duty of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey), who did not represent a constituency in which railway employees resided, to perform the duty of introducing legislation on this question. It may perhaps surprise the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) to know, that some of the provisions of his present Bill were introduced into this House in the years 1887 and 1888. I am sorry the hon. gentleman who represents North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is not present in the House to-night, because if he were, I could prove that I, and another gentleman residing in the constituency in which I live, framed a Bill, with a view of having it discussed before this House through Mr. McCarthy. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say: it is unfair that these gentlemen should charge me with being neglectful of my duty in Parliament in regard to promoting measures favourable to the interests of the workmen of this country. I deny the charge and I state that on any question in this Parliament, involving the welfare of workmen, I have never been neglectful of my duty. I have always endeavoured to the best of my ability, to promote any legislation which would be in their interest. Before dealing with the Bill, Mr. Speaker, I also wish to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey), and the attention of this House, to the result which followed the moving of my resolution in 1891. Since then the Government, through the Minister of Railways and the Department of Railways and Canals, have placed upon the Government railways certain safety appliances, and have been testing them from time to time. And, Sir, one of the most important devices that could be brought into existence for the protection of railway employees, is now being tested on the Government railways. I refer to automatic couplers, and I know that some 12 or 14 of these are now being tested. I may mention also that in the city in which I live there has been an automatic coupler patented, and it has been sent the other day for the purpose of being tested. My hon. friend (Mr. Casey) starts out in section one of his Bill, to deal with a certain kind of tap for the purpose of making it safer to stop trains at all times. This tap is one that has been recently invented, I believe, and one which if adopted might serve a very good purpose. But, I understand there are gentlemen in Canada who have also patents in the same line, and it is a question with the railway companies of this country as to which patent they will adopt. That is all that prevents them from adopting it immediately. Clause 2 of the Bill says:

2. All box freight cars built in Canada, for use on Canadian railways, shall, after the passing of this Act, be of a uniform standard height, to be approved by the Minister of Railways and Canals, and shall be provided with the following attachments for the security of railway employees:—

(a.) Automatic extension running boards, making a safe pathway from car to car;

(b.) A continuous rail, at a uniform and convenient height, with sufficient and firm supports, along one side of each running board, the whole length of the car.

Well, Sir, any practical man in this country knows, that that is one of the things that is impossible; and why? It is because you will take furniture cars, you will take hay cars, you will take meat cars and you will take the ordinary freight cars on the train, and these cars will always be higher or lower, as the case may be. Therefore, there is not very much in that provision. Now, with regard to the continuous rail. The hon. member from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) drew the attention of the House to-night to the impracticability of having a continuous rail on the cars. Why, Sir, the object of this House, and the object of this legislation, should be for the purpose of doing away with the necessity of trainmen going on the top of the cars at all; and if automatic couplers and automatic air-brakes are placed on all trains, there would be no necessity whatever for adopting this section of the Bill. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey), I fancy, looked inquisitively at me when I said "hear, hear," to the remarks of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), but I may tell him that I disapprove of section 2 of his Bill and its subsections. Why do I disapprove of them? It is because the legislation proposed in section 2 and its subsections are behind the age. It does not meet the requirements of the present day. There is not the same necessity for this legislation that there was in the year 1887, when the Bill which I have referred to was first introduced. The cars in several of the states of the Union, and a great many of the cars in Canada, are at present fitted with patent couplers and automatic brakes. Therefore, you will see that the necessity for a brakeman getting on top of the cars is almost done away with, and it is our duty to legislate here so that it will not be necessary to have the men go on top of the cars. The hon. gentleman provides, that this change in the construction of the cars shall be made within a two years limit. If we adopted this provision it would simply mean that railway companies who are from time to time constructing their cars with the latest appliances, would be compelled to go to this enormous expense of putting on the extension running boards and the iron railing on top of the cars. My opinion is, that it would be useless to do so, because when men are running over cars, you must endeavour to place them in as little danger as possible. If often occurs, that men in passing over trains are thinking of other things in connection with the running of the train, when passing from one car to the other. After long practice they do not pay that strict attention to it that new men do. You do not want to have a railing on one car, and no railing on the next car, because if that were done you would increase the danger to the men instead of lessening it. It would be more dangerous to have a train with a number of cars fitted with a railing, and a number not fitted with a railing, than to have no railing at all. I shall not discuss the penalty clauses of the Bill, because I do not think that portion of the legislation will pass this House, nor as a practical railway man do I think, that it would be in the interest of the railway men to adopt it. Now, with respect to placing cars fitted with automatic air-brakes in front of the train in order to have engines fitted in the same way and handle these trains with greater ease; I may say that on some of the lines in this country, such as the Canada Southern, the Michigan Central, the Grand Trunk that runs through the district in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) and I reside, they do make a practice of placing these cars in the front of their trains in order to use the air upon them. Applying that rule to local trains is simply out of the question, for the reason that cars are taken off and others are put on at almost every station, and it would be impossible to do that without great loss of time. Again, we have a provision here that railway employees shall receive pay for overtime. I have no doubt that in some cases this would be a very good thing; but I understand that the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canada Southern Railway Companies all have certain agreements with their employees to pay them for overtime. Whether these agreements are carried out or not, I am not prepared to say. I am not aware what the practice is on the Intercolonial Railway. The next clause deals with the hours for meals for yardmen and other persons engaged in yard work. I have never heard of any particular dissatisfaction arising from those men not having regular meal hours. In some cases I believe they have them now. I have no particular objection to that part of the Bill; it may do good, and it can do no harm. The next clause deals with compensation to railway employees for injuries. I know that the law with regard to that does not work very satisfactorily at the present time. In the province of Ontario some years ago a Compensation for Injuries Act was passed, and certain railway companies were exempted from its provisions because of the existence of certain insurance societies in connection with those companies. I believe something might be done in that direction. If the Ontario Act does not apply to the railways in that province, then, I think, some legislation might be passed by this House that would cover them, and anything in that direction I would heartily support. The next clause deals with the matter of compensation to employees who are permanently disabled. In some cases very great hardships have been suffered by men who have received permanent injuries, and certain advantages have been taken of them, with the view of guarding the interests of the companies as against the claims of the employees. This Bill may do something to remove that evil. As regards contributory negligence, that is a very particular point, and I think something should be done in the direction proposed, because foremen in charge of certain works or officers in charge of trains may sometimes be negligent, even after they have been notified that the cars or works are unsafe or improperly attended to. Now, the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) raised a few objections. I agree with him in his objection to the continuous rail, because I think that device would do more harm than good, and cause more accidents than it would prevent. So far as running boards are concerned, the fact that American cars come into Canada with running boards of all kinds and of different heights, renders that proposal subject to the same objection as the continuous rail. With regard to outside ladders, I agree with the hon. gentleman who has proposed this Bill that they should be on every car. To save time, trainmen frequently require to go upon different portions of the train, and these ladders are much safer than the ladders on the ends of the cars. With regard to arched iron rails from the top of each ladder, I do not think there is much advantage in them, and I am not in favour of imposing that additional expense on the railway companies. I think the cars would be quite safe with the appliances I have already mentioned. This is all I have to say on the Bill at present. If it is referred to a committee, I shall be glad to discuss there the different sections in detail, and will then offer anything further I have to say on the Bill.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say in reference to the Bill before the House. As to whether or not this House has jurisdiction over this matter, I think there is no doubt that over every railway that has received incorporation from this House, we have jurisdiction in reference to the subjects mentioned in the Bill. As to its provisions, I may perhaps be speaking on technical subjects on which I have not sufficient knowledge to speak; but I am speaking from information which I have received from different railway companies, as well as in connection with the railway which I myself control. The first clause in the Bill provides that cars fitted with air-brakes must be provided with a certain device. There is no practical plan that I know of which has yet been introduced or which is known to any of the railway companies to meet this provision. The hon. gentleman has, perhaps, got hold of some person who has a patent device and is anxious to have it introduced on the different railways of the country. I may be misinformed, but I am told that a Mr. Deyell, who resides somewhere in the same neighbourhood as the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), has a patent device of this kind. All I can say with reference to that invention is that it has been submitted to the mechanical superintendents of the different railways throughout the country, and I have the report of the mechanical superintendent of the Grand Trunk Railway to the effect that it was not worth consideration, or that he did not intend to use it because it was practically useless. Why we should compel the railroads throughout the country to introduce a patent of this man—

Mr. CASEY. It does not compel you to introduce that patent at all.

Mr. HAGGART. Well, any patent. There is no device known to the railway companies that is of practical utility in that direction.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, there is.

Mr. HAGGART. Well, none known to the railway companies that I have consulted on the subject. It is possible that some invention in that direction may be devised which would be of practical use in connection with air-brakes. When it has been proved to be so, the railway companies themselves will introduce it and apply it to the different freight trains throughout the country. The second clause of the hon. gentleman's Bill, which has been so admirably discussed by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) and the other hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Ingram)—that is, with reference to box freight cars built in Canada being of uniform standard in height—what is the object of uniform standard in height? The hon. gentleman says it is for the purpose of applying automatic extension running boards, making a safe pathway from car to car. How is that possible? You would have to load the freight cars equally before you would have them of equal weight. One car may be more loaded than the other, so as to bear down three or four inches, and it would be impossible to apply this automatic extension. Besides, the coupling between the cars must have a certain extension. With that extension how are you to have the automatic board, so that an equal height may be maintained. Subsection 3 provides:

A continuous rail at a uniform and convenient height, with sufficient and firm supports along one side of each running board, the whole length of the car.

The objection to that has been very well taken by the hon. members for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) and Elgin (Mr. Ingram). When you go across the line, you will have cars without that continuous rail, so that instead of being a protection to the trainman, this provision will be the very reverse. On a dark night, passing along, he would have a hand-rail on one car, and then passing to the next car, on which there was no hand-rail, he would be more liable to accident. The plan, as I am informed, has been tried by four or five railways on the other side of the line—the South Shore, Michigan Central, and others—and they all have abandoned it as worse than useless. Clause c says:

Outside ladders, on opposite sides of the end of each car, projecting below the frame of the car, and with one step of the rung of the ladder below such frame, such ladders to be placed close to the end of the sides to which they are attached.

The hon. colleague of the hon. gentleman from Elgin thinks that this is a useful appliance. The railway companies whom I have consulted with reference to the hon.

gentleman's Bill, say that it would never be used. Some say that it might be used, but that the ladder, which is at present used, is sufficient for all purposes. Perhaps the most objectionable part of the Bill is the clause 8 :

Every railway employee, whether employed on trains or locomotives, or in or about the offices or stations of any railway company, and whether paid by the trip, day, mile, hour or otherwise, shall be entitled to extra pay for overtime, pro rata of his ordinary pay, for every hour or part of an hour beyond ten hours (or whatever less number of hours may be agreed upon between the company and such employee as the schedule time of his duties) during which he is delayed or kept on duty by accident, stress of weather, orders from his superior, or any other cause not arising from his own carelessness or neglect of duty.

All the railway companies throughout the country have a by-law providing for that. Are you going to introduce a law which will compel a railway company to pay a particular rate of wages to any individual in its employ? I think that clause is very objectionable. Then, section 9 provides :

Every yardman and other person employed about a station or shunting yard, or on a shunting engine, shall be allowed one hour for a meal between noon and two o'clock in the afternoon, and one hour between midnight and two o'clock in the morning.

It would be impossible to carry that out. It would have the effect of delaying the trains. The action must be continuous. Every railway company allows a certain time, an hour per day, for the parties to get the mid-day or midnight meal, but you could not compel them to fix it at a particular time, because it would stop all traffic on the railway at that particular hour of the day. Another clause provides for compensation to employees injured in the discharge of their duty. Well, if there is not contributory negligence on the part of the employee, he has his action against the company. The railway companies are liable; and for all other accidents there is an insurance fund provided by nearly all the companies, owned and subscribed by the men themselves, and in some cases the companies contribute a large sum. The Grand Trunk Railway contribute $10,000 a year towards this fund. This fund is managed and administered by the men themselves, and I think where there is contributory negligence, where the man himself contributes to the injury, the railway companies should not be called upon to pay beyond the amount provided by the sinking fund, to which the companies contribute a large amount to pay for damages. Another provision is :

The certificate of two duly qualified disinterested physicians shall be sufficient to prove permanent disability.

I do not understand that clearly. I do not know what would constitute a qualified physician. I suppose it means one who has passed and received a regular certificate.

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. CASEY. A judge trying the case would know, probably.

Mr. HAGGART. What would you call a disinterested physician? Then the provision goes on to declare :

And the certificate of the attending physician shall be sufficient to prove unfitness for duty.

Is that all that is required for the purpose of proof in the case—the certificate of two disinterested physicians? Would you not allow the right of examining these physicians in the court as to how they arrived at their decision? No, the certificate would be final. The hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, introduced his Bill with the best possible intentions. Some of the information which I have in reference to technical matters may be incorrect. We will have an opportunity, if the hon. gentleman sends his Bill to the Railway Committee, of having the opinion perhaps of experts, because the railway companies are generally represented upon that committee; and if there are any objections to the Bill, we will hear fully from them. I think the intentions of the hon. gentleman are the very best, and his Bill is worthy anyway of full consideration in committee, and I would suggest to him that, after the second reading, he refer it to the Railway Committee for full discussion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. CASEY moved :

That the Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways and Canals.

He said : In moving that motion, I wish to refer to one or two points that have come up since I first spoke. I should have preferred, as I have already said, to have had this Bill referred to a smaller committee of experts, where there would have been a better chance of examining into the merits of the Bill than there can be in the Railway Committee. But I must accept the hon. minister's suggestion as a means of getting this step in advance for the Bill.

I am afraid, however, from the appearance of the weather, from the remarks of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), and of the Minister of Railways himself, that the fears of my hon. friend from Assiniboia are going to be realized. I am afraid that this Bill is sent to the Railway Committee with the intention of being disposed of there in the most humane fashion possible. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) related, almost in tears, the fate of an infant which he himself had nourished for some time, and which was sent to that committee and very quietly strangled. He tells us that it was the very same gentleman who played the part of a baby strangler there, who made such a threatening speech with regard to this Bill this afternoon. I refer to the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale).

Then, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), although he allows the Bill to have a second reading, clearly indicates his own impression that it will not do at all. He has evidently been well coached by the counsel of the different railway companies whom, as he says, he has consulted. He has the railway side of the case down very fine. But he does not seem to have the other side of the case nearly so clear in his mind. Both my hon. friend from South Norfolk and the hon. Minister of Railways had a great deal to say about the views practical men take of these provisions—that no practical man would agree to this, and no practical man would favour the other, and so on.

But my hon. friend from Norfolk showed that he did not even understand the provision of the Bill he was objecting to—namely, the first clause—at the time he made that statement, and neither the hon. gentleman nor the Minister of Railways seem to have been aware that this Bill was compiled almost entirely by the advice of, and in consultation with, the Dominion Executive Board of the Railway Brotherhoods. I think that the men connected with this executive board ought to be quite as good practical authorities in this connection as the hon. Minister of Railways or the hon. member for Norfolk.

I do not pretend to possess any deep practical knowledge of railroading myself; and, for that reason I have listened with great attention and respect to the remarks of my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Ingram). That hon. gentleman has urged some points worthy of consideration, and, to one or two of these I should like to refer. The question of the continuous rails is one of the principal points he discussed, and the question of the making up of local trains was another. I must admit that, in regard to these two points the gentlemen who consulted with me in compiling the Bill were not united in opinion.

Some of them thought that to have a rail on some cars, when it could not be made compulsory on all would give rise to the difficulty my hon. friend from East Elgin pointed out—it might lead a man to expect what was not there. Others thought that only a few cars in a long train would be without the rail, and it would be safer for the man on the top of a train where the rail was partially provided; that it would be better to have some safety rather than uninterrupted risk along the whole train.

As to the making up of local trains, I think the point made by the hon. gentleman is worthy of consideration. I do not know that it would be possible to arrange, definitely, all the automatically-coupled cars together in making up a local or mixed train. I think it would be better, perhaps, to make an exception in that case. That was suggested to me, but I omitted to make the exception when drafting the Bill. But, so far as the clause affects through freight trains, say those made up at Windsor and going through to Montreal, I do not think that any difficulty will arise.

My hon. friend from East Elgin also attacked all the provisions under section 2 as being unpractical. I will not enter into a discussion of this clause in detail. It will be a question between the hon. gentleman's opinion and that of other railway experts before the committee and throughout the country. I am still of the opinion that my advisers were right in regard to these clauses, and that the hon. gentleman will probably find himself more or less mistaken—I will not say altogether mistaken—in the objections he has urged.

But he laid down one general proposition which requires notice—that we should aim at doing away with the necessity for such attachments to the cars as are provided for in this section. In this I quite agree with the hon. gentleman. Had he paid attention to what I said this afternoon he would have known that I stated to the House that I should have included the compulsory introduction of automatic couplings and air-brakes, if I had not expected that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) would again introduce the Bill he presented last session. I propose, before the Railway Committee, to move for the introduction of sections equivalent to those of the Bill I refer to. I quite agree with my hon. friend that it is our duty to do away, as far as possible, with the necessity for these appliances. But, until we have automatic couplings and air-brakes on all trains, the provisions of this Bill seem to be not only useful but necessary to the saving of life and limb.

Now, my hon. friend from East Elgin feels rather bitter about some attacks which have been made upon him, for not having done his duty by the workingmen, by the introduction of a Bill of this kind. I did not attack the hon. gentleman, nor am I trying to draw any such inference against him. I think my hon. friend should be glad of the opportunity to discuss this Bill, instead of grumbling at it being introduced, even though he has not had the good fortune to bring it before the House.

Mr. INGRAM. I ask leave to interrupt the hon. gentleman. I think he misunderstands me. While I complimented him upon introducing the Bill, I drew attention to the fact that his friends never miss an opportunity of accusing me of want of sincerity in anything I do on behalf of the workingmen, while, on the other hand, our friends are always ready to give the hon. gentleman credit for what he does.

Mr. CASEY. I must say that I found it rather difficult to hear the hon. gentleman, particularly at the beginning of his remarks. It is the newspapers and not me he accuses of being severe upon him. Of course, the newspaper can defend itself. But I do not understand that the newspaper charges him with insincerity in what he did for the workmen. I understood the charge to be that he did not do anything at all.

However, that is not the question I am discussing: I am not trying to draw that inference in anything I say to-night. But, Sir, both my hon. friend from South Norfolk and the hon. Minister of Railways have got on the wrong track about the provisions in section 1, regarding the automatic device in connection with the air-brake. My hon. friend from East Elgin has done the justice to the Bill and to myself, and to my advisers in this matter, not to fall into that error. The hon. Minister of Railways quite unnecessarily introduced the name of an inventor into the discussion, and even went so far as to state that this man's invention was reported no good by the Grand Trunk mechanical authorities.

Now I thought that was rather too bad of the hon. Minister of Railways. I do not think that it was any part of his duty to publish in this House and throughout the country, a declaration, whether true or not, that So-and-so's invention was no good. It was no part of my duty, on the other hand, to boom any particular device for the purpose indicated in the Bill; and I did not. But I may tell the hon. gentleman that there are several devices for carrying out what I aim at in this clause. The hon. gentleman says that he does not know of any of these devices having been tried, that no practical device is in existence. I may inform the hon. Minister that Mr. Deyell's device—since he has been named already, there is no reason why I should not mention his name—for this purpose and that of somebody else whose name I do not, at the moment, remember, have both been in successful operation on the Canada Atlantic for nearly a year, if not longer. They were also tried in the Canadian Pacific yard in Montreal some time ago, and, I understand, favourably reported upon.

And these are only two of numerous inventions for warning the engineer when anything goes wrong with the air-brakes. I may say for the hon. Minister's information, that the effect of one of these devices is to stop the train when anything is wrong; the effect of the other is to blow a whistle in the cab of the engine. There may be half a dozen other methods that I do not know about. We do not want to bind the railway companies down to any particular method, but, under the Bill, they must provide some method by which the engineer will be advised when the brakes will not work. My hon. friend from East Elgin will agree with me, and I understand that he did agree, that such an invention would be an exceedingly useful thing.

Now, the hon. Minister objects to the provision regarding the height of cars, because one might be loaded down a little more heavily than another. Well, I suppose that must have been one of his jokes, for he does like to have a joke, for I am sure that he could not have seriously argued that the slight difference in height, caused by a difference of degree of loading, would prevent cars, of uniform build, from presenting a practical even surface in height when they were put together in a train. But my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Ingram), as well as the Minister of Railways, does not think much of this idea of a standard height for a box freight car. Now, Sir, he knows as a railway man that practically throughout the States there is a standard height for all box freight cars; at least that is the practice, although it may not be enforced by law.

But a box freight car does not include a refrigerator car. The refrigerator cars, of course, and other cars of that sort, must be of particular heights, and they would be, as far as possible, kept together at one end of the train. They are always on through trains, and would be kept together. What I wish to provide is that the ordinary cars—which are known as box freight cars—in which you ship grain, in which you ship apples, cheese and articles of that sort, should be of the same height. I do not say that cattle cars should be of the same height, because that would be absurd; I do not say that meat cars should be of the same height, because it would be absurd; but I say the ordinary box freight cars—and this is a point that was specially suggested to me by the executive of the brotherhood as an amendment to my Bill as originally drawn; so that I am satisfied there is some practical basis for the suggestion.

Now, as to the automatic running board, I do not describe any special pattern for that either. I do not know which is the best, that will be a question, as the Minister says, for expert evidence, whether there is such a practical thing and such a workable device in existence. I have been informed that there are workable devices in existence, and that a slight difference in the height of the cars to which they apply, does not interfere with the operation of that automatic board. It does not go on sticking out until it meets something else, it only goes out a certain distance beyond the end of each car. It need not necessarily go to meet the running board of the next car, but it goes so near to the board on the next car, or so near to the end of the next car, if there be no extension board on that, that it is very easy to step from one to the other. On the outside ladder question, my hon. friend the unpractical Minister of Railways, does not agree with my friend the practical member for East Elgin, who is undoubtedly right. The outside ladder is the one most generally desired.

The overtime pay provision is the one which the Minister of Railways thinks the most objectionable to all. There again, Sir, he shows signs of his coaching by the railway lawyers. He thinks it is not right that we should prescribe what rate of wages any corporation should pay to its men. I do not ask you to prescribe that in this Bill. The provision of this Bill really is, that when a man is compelled to work one or more hours longer than the time he has agreed to work per day, he shall be paid pro rata of his ordinary wages for that extra time. I do not prescribe the rate, I only say it is to go on at the same rate per hour, if he is kept an hour or more beyond his regular time. Of course, I understand that some of the work on railways is done not by the day, or by the hour, but by the trip. I provide for that in a clause, as anybody can see by referring to the wording of it, but I need not go over it again at length. I take the trip as the unit of pay, and the day as the unit of pay, as the case may be. But when a man is kept over his scheduled time, whatever duty he is employed upon, he shall be paid pro rata for that extra work.

Now, I think, notwithstanding the elegant comparison of my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), of the case of a typewriter employed by the hour, I think railway men and others will agree with me that it is only fair a man should be paid extra for extra work. The Minister of Railways thinks that all railway companies provide for this already. Well, if so there can be no objection to the clause in the Bill. If there should be any railway companies in the future niggardly enough not to provide for such extra pay, this Bill will catch them. I do not know whether they all do it or not, but there is certainly no harm in putting in the principle and recognizing it as a proper one.

The proviso about compensation my hon. friend from East Elgin, I am glad to find, thinks might be rather a good thing, and says there is Ontario legislation providing for something of the kind. It is a remarkable fact that Ontario legislation is generally found to make very good provision for matters which affect the workmen, and I am happy to have testimony borne to that fact by my hon. friend from East Elgin, who was himself a member of that legislature before coming here. The Ontario legislature is very enlightened and progressive in these matters, and its legislation is good, and I am merely proposing, in this instance, to introduce something of the same kind.

Now, Sir, that we have jurisdiction in this matter is admitted by the Minister of Railways, he has no doubt about jurisdiction, so I need not argue that.

As to the propriety of making this fixed minimum compensation, I have something to say and an illustration to give. The law, as it stands at present, no doubt, does provide for the recovery of damages by an employee from a railway company, but in order to recover these damages, preliminaries must be entered into, and finally a law suit entered, and then a man claiming damages has to fight the company from court to court. Now, I do not pretend that any law whatever will secure that justice shall be done without an occasional resort to the courts, but I do pretend that the law can be so simplified that the matters which need to be proven in court shall be very few, that the matters on which an appeal can be taken from one court to another shall be very few; and that the chances of a rich company tiring out a poor suitor shall be greatly reduced. These are things I am trying to provide for by this Bill.

The provision for a minimum compensation practically amounts to this, that in order to have prima facie ground for compensation from a company, the person injured or the relatives of the person killed, need only prove the injury and base a claim upon that. The railway company will be able to plead contributory negligence if they can show that, at the time the accident occurred, their plant, cars and everything else were in good order, and that they had been observing the other provisions of this Act; otherwise, being in the wrong themselves, they could not plead contributory negligence against the claimant. That is a simplification of the law which I introduce in this Bill, and I think it amounts to a great deal.

Let me give you, Sir, an instance of what occurred in Montreal, in 1888, I think. The circumstances of the case were brought to my notice, in the first place, last year by a legal gentleman concerned in it, Mr. T. Cassie Hatton, and they have been refreshed since by reference to the authorities. Mr. Flynn, an employee of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was killed in the yard at Hochelaga by an accident caused by the negligence of a fellow employee. His widow sued for damages, and after going through a lot of preliminaries, she got the case to trial, and obtained a verdict of, I think, $5,000 from the jury. Then the company took the case up to the Court of Review for interpretation of judgment, as I believe the phrase is in the province of Quebec; that is, to declare the exact effect of the answers given by the jury in their verdict. The judgment being confirmed in favour of the widow, they went further, to the Court of Appeal, and asked for a new trial. The Court of Appeal refused a new trial. The company went from there to the Supreme Court at Ottawa, and that court granted a new trial.

So after the fourth step, the extremely expensive one of an appeal to the Supreme Court, the widow was obliged to go before the jury and prove over again her case from the beginning. She did so. A new trial was held. The jury gave a verdict for rather larger damages than the first time. In the meantime, in some of these proceedings, I do not know at what stage, it was decided that the company was liable when an employee was killed in the manner in question, and so this issue was really already decided, but the company went on fighting in the hope of tiring out the poor widow. They went back to the Court of Review, and the decision was again favourable to the widow. They went to the Court of Appeal again, but that court decided against the company. They went to the Supreme Court again, and this time the Supreme Court did not grant a new trial. Then they took the case across the sea, to the Privy Council; and the Privy Council finally confirmed the judgment of the first court, and the widow got her damages, and the railway company had to pay the costs.

I am sure before the course of litigation closed the costs must have been more than the original damages awarded. If that poor woman had not had liberal friends who assisted her with loans of money, if she had not had a most unselfish advocate in the person of her counsel, a man who took the case on charity to a large extent, she would never have got justice. Although the case was as clear as could be from the beginning, the company would have defeated her by the power of the purse, and she would never have received anything for the death of her husband. That is the kind of thing I wish to avoid by this provision for a minimum fixed compensation. I want to provide that something at least shall be paid by the railway company, whether you call it compensation, or a payment in the nature of penalty for the accident having occurred on the road, or of a contribution to insurance, I do not care. I want to provide that this minimum amount shall be paid without any elaborate litigation in any way, and without prejudice to the right of the claimant to secure further damages in a court of law if the law shows the party to be entitled thereto.

The Minister of Railways seems to think it is quite enough that the railway company should subscribe something to the benefit fund of the employees. I do not think it is. Those men run special risks on account of the nature of their calling, and they should not be taxed again in the shape of heavy insurance premiums to protect them against extra risks. This should be borne by the railway companies employing the men, and it should be borne in this form of a specific minimum fixed compensation in the case of every man hurt, disabled or killed.

As to doctors' certificates, I do not think there is any uncertainty or difficulty. The Minister of Railways does not know apparently what a "duly qualified and disinterested physician" may mean. A duly qualified physician under the law means a physician who possesses a degree and is registered according to the law of the province. I present him with that piece of information. As to a disinterested physician, I do not know what the phrase may mean in the dictionary sense of the term, but in the legal sense of the term it means a man who is not the doctor appointed by the railway company or employed by the man hurt. Two doctors duly qualified according to the law of the province and having no pecuniary interest in the case, I provide, shall give a certificate. Of course, as the Minister suggests, they will be liable to be called in court and questioned about the certificate. I intend to provide that this shall make a good prima facie case, and enable the plaintiff to sue for compensation. I may say that these provisions respecting doctors' certificates are practically the same as those used by the railway employees' benefit and insurance companies. I think that is practically all that need be said at this stage, and I hope to produce expert evidence before the Railway Committee on behalf of the Bill, as well as to hear the expert evidence which the Minister of Railways promises to produce against the Bill, and we will in the present slackness of private Bill legislation have a good opportunity of talking it over. And whatever may be the fate of the Bill we will elicit valuable information for the use of the House and the country, and this Bill in whole or in part, or some Bill to effect the same purpose, will, I trust, be pressed through this session.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to make a few observations which I think may be considered germane to the subject under discussion. The number of people who are destroyed at railway crossings in this country is horrible. I believe a great saving of life might be accomplished in this direction. It would be very easy to have some appliances introduced for opening and closing gates as trains come along the line. The train advancing would complete an electric circuit and set machinery to work to open the gate, and by having a bell ring before the gate began to move any person, with a team, coming near the railway crossing would have due warning of the closing of the gate. I believe if the Minister offered a reward for an invention of that kind, such mechanism could be secured with very little trouble and expense. No step that the Minister of Railways could take in connection with his department would be more popular in the country than measures to prevent, as far as possible, the loss of life and injury that occurs at railway crossings almost every month from one end of the season to the other.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know of any device, and if there were any means of doing it. I suppose it would have been discovered before this. I believe the railway companies would be glad to have self-acting, opening and shutting gates, on railway crossings, especially in the cities where it entails a very large expense to pay men to watch the gates. With reference to my observation about Mr. Deyell, I told the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey), that I had not the mechanical or technical knowledge necessary to discuss his Bill. I took the best possible means for getting information on the subject, and I wrote to the different railway companies in the country to give me their opinions upon the clauses of the Bill, which opinions I might use either in committee or in the House.

Mr. CASEY. Did you consult the railway organizations ?

Mr. HAGGART. No ; I was not aware that there were any railway organizations. The Grand Trunk Railway Company gave me the information with reference to Mr. Deyell. I am glad to hear from the hon. gentleman that we are misinformed on the subject, and that a gentleman has patented an invention of great utility. I am also glad to learn from him, that the Canadian Pacific Railway have adopted an invention, or that they have tried it and were working it very successfully.

Mr. CASEY. I did not say they had adopted it. I said it was tried in their yards and reported on as being successful.

Mr. HAGGART. Well, from the information I have received from that company, they tell me that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) has evidently been imposed upon by some one who has a patent, and that they had no information of any invention of practical utility. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) said I was poking fun at him when I spoke with regard to the different heights of the cars. As I have said, I was not speaking from my personal knowledge, but on information furnished me, and the information I have from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company reads as follows :—

It would not be practicable to carry out section 2 of the Bill, inasmuch as there is very considerable variance in the height of cars, especially between light and loaded cars, in which case the continuous running board, as it is described, would not be on the same level, and would prove to be rather a dangerous trap than safeguard.

The technical information which I have received from this company may be all bosh; it may be a joke played upon me, but it is the information I received, and I gave it to the House.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to make a personal explanation as to what I said a moment ago. I was not at all referring to railway crossings in cities or towns, for I assumed that the railway companies are forced to have people to look after these crossings, and no doubt they are put to very considerable expense in doing so. I was referring exclusively to crossings on country roads, where there is no provision of any kind for the safety of the public. My hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) knows that in the mother country the railway companies are not allowed to cross any public road on the level at all, and even the gate keepers have been done away with in the mother country. When I spoke, I was referring to country roads in Canada, and I did not at all assume that my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) knew of any such invention as that to which I referred. It was because I believed he knew of no such invention that I made the remark, for if I thought he knew of such an invention, and withheld it from the public, I would suppose he was acting criminally, and I did not suggest anything of the kind.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is one matter which the introducer of this Bill has not included, and which I think might very properly be incorporated in legislation of this kind. One of the greatest sources of danger to the public, and to railway employees, is the very long and unreasonable hours which men are sometimes compelled to work. Any legislation which would put it out of the power of railway companies, for the sake of saving money, or out of the power of the men for the sake of earning higher wages, to work these unreasonable hours, would be exceedingly advantageous. In England, the working of long hours by the men has constantly been a source of serious accidents. In fact, there has hardly been a serious railway accident in England, of late years, which has not been attributable to the fact that the employees were so overcome by long hours and want of sleep that they were unable properly to discharge their duties. Therefore, if we were to legislate in this direction, it would give greater protection to the lives, both of passengers and employees, and it is a subject which we ought seriously to consider. I think it might properly be embraced in this Bill if the mover (Mr. Casey) or the committee, would suggest a clause to that effect. Now, with regard to the height of cars. One can easily understand the difficulty which has been suggested, that there are a great number of cars of uneven height, and that if a brakeman supposed they were all of the same height, he would be very liable to danger in going from one car to the other. It is evident, however, that the more uniform the height of the cars on the whole, the greater the benefit to the brakeman. Any one who has seen freight cars passing constantly, as I see them at my place, cannot help feeling a degree of apprehension and pity for the men employed on these trains. Any measure that we could adopt to insure them greater safety, we certainly ought to adopt, even though, as has been suggested, the railway companies are not now in a condition to undertake any great improvement. In regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), I wish to say, that this is, perhaps, the only country in the world in which the public have no rights whatever, as against the railway companies. There is no country in the world where the public are exposed to such risk of life and limb as they are on our country roads. In my neighbourhood, there is a crossing which I never venture to go over without the greatest apprehension, and I never like to see any of my neighbours passing it, because, on account of the construction of the line, it is absolutely impossible for any one to know when the train is coming until the whistle is heard—often it is not sounded at all—and then it is too late to escape. This is a constant source of danger on our country roads, and it seems utterly impossible for the public to get redress. I would mention an instance in order to let the House understand how difficult it is to obtain any satisfaction in a case of this kind. There is a railway crossing in the village of Allandale, near Barrie, where trains not only crossed in the regular course of traffic, but where they are constantly backing and shunting over the road. Well, Sir, it was a struggle for years before the municipal corporation could get that railway company to put gates there, although there was not a single day that life was not in danger. We had to come to Ottawa, and there was the greatest possible trouble. A simple matter of that kind had to be referred to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council before the company could be forced to do that which, in any other country under the sun, pretending to be civilized, would not be tolerated for a single day. But, Sir, in Canada, in opposition to a railway company, I say that the public practically have no rights at all. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) read the House a lecture upon the exceeding impropriety of any member trying to legislate so as to get popular votes. Well, Sir, it would be a very improper thing for any one to do so, but I think we might retort and say: It is just as improper for a gentleman to make a speech in this House which I might, with equal justice, say was intended to propitiate the railway companies. If there is danger and impropriety in one case, there is equal danger and impropriety in the other. In this country, not only with regard to particular railways, but with regard to railway corporations generally, the power which they possess is not commensurate with the advantage they give us, and it is altogether out of accord with the system which prevails in other countries. As the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has said, even in Ireland, on a single line, where there is not half the traffic that there is on our railways, such a thing as an open crossing like those we have in Canada would not be tolerated, and no railway company would dream of exposing the public to the danger of such crossings. I do hope that the railway companies, which we are told are so poor at present that they cannot spend any money, will soon get a little richer, so that this Parliament or the legislatures of the different provinces may feel justified in adopting such measures as will compel them to pay more regard to the public safety than they do at present.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) finds fault with the Minister of Railways for consulting the railway companies while not consulting the labour organizations in regard to this legislation. Now, instead of its being the duty of the Minister to consult the labour organizations, I believe these organizations have men representing them here in Ottawa, and it would be their duty to go to the Minister and ask him what he proposed to do in regard to this measure. I think the Minister has been quite right in consulting the railway companies. Having some knowledge of the difficulties and hardships which the railway companies of this country have to contend with, I have a great deal of sympathy with them, and I tell the hon. gentleman that any man employed on any railway in this country, if he is faithful to his own interests as well as to the interests of the company, will do all in his power to promote their interests, and they will in return do all in their power to promote his interests. Some people run away with the idea that because a man is employed on a railway, he should not consider the interests of the company at all, in respect to such matters as safety appliances. It is remarkable how many miles of railway have been constructed in this country within the last few years. This is a young country, and our railway companies are under very heavy expenses and are not in a position perhaps to pay for many improvements on their rolling stock which they would like to have. I am happy to say, however, from the experience I have had, that the railway companies are just as eager to have these appliances placed on their rolling stock as their employees are. The railway companies, so far as I know, have always been willing to meet the wishes of their employees as far as possible, while reserving the right to some extent to decide as to the length of time it would take to effect the improvements desired. My hon. friend from West Elgin rather objects to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Railways in regard to the device he proposes to be used with air-brakes; but that is a small matter, indeed, looked at as a matter of legislation. It is only within the last few years that this device has been thought of at all, and it is intended chiefly for passenger trains. At the present time passenger trains have automatic air-brakes, and it is true that a device of this kind, if adopted, would prevent injury and loss of life to passengers. This is something that the railway companies themselves are willing to adopt without any legislation, if they can get the proper device. My hon. friend also finds fault with the remarks of the Minister of Railways with regard to the standard height of box cars. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that all the cars are of standard height, and that high and low cars are not mixed up together? It is not a fact that cars of similar height are always put together. They are placed indiscriminately in different parts of a train, so that men passing from one car to another will have to step down from one car and up to another; and the Minister was quite right in what he said in regard to that. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) speaks of some legislation being necessary to shorten the hours of labour for railway employees. I know that a very strong objection was raised a few years ago to certain railway companies because of the long hours they obliged their employees to work; but I am happy to say that now the Grand Trunk Railway and other companies have issued special orders that every employee, after having been employed a certain number of hours, shall have a certain rest before he can be called upon to resume his duties.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many hours?

Mr. INGRAM. Eight hours rest, I believe, is the rule on the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) After how many hours work are they entitled to rest?

Mr. INGRAM. I cannot state that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am only asking for information.

Mr. INGRAM. I will give the hon. gentleman an instance. Starting at the city where I live there are two divisions, one running to the Detroit River and one to the Niagara River. Some of the trains take three hours and a half to make the journey and others ten or twelve hours. After the train arrives at the end of the division the men are entitled to a certain number of hours rest, and when they make the return journey to their homes, they cannot take out a train again without having eight hours rest. So that the companies are providing for this matter themselves. The hon. member for Muskoka objects to open crossings, holding that there should be gates across the highways at all such crossings. I could understand such a proposition being made if this were the Imperial Parliament and this measure had reference to railways in the old country. But every one must know that in a thinly-settled country like Canada, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, it would be simply impossible to provide gates at all the railway crossings in the country. It is impracticable—it could not be done.

Mr. COCKBURN. Mr. Speaker, as there seems to be a somewhat general impression in the House that due care has not been exercised by some of our railways in protecting the lives of passengers and others, I think it but right that I should refer to the document which I hold in my hand. After I have read the figures given here, they may help those hon. gentlemen whose sympathies are so strong in this matter to come to the conclusion that the loss of human life on our railways has not been so great as they imagine. All losses must be considered relatively. I would call attention to the fact that we have invested in our railways a sum much larger than the whole national debt; and these railways have to be operated under conditions of marked disadvantage as compared with the conditions under which railways are operated in Europe. Now, I want to draw attention to the fact that the passengers carried last year numbered 13,987,580, or nearly fourteen millions, the freight carried was 21,500,000 tons, and the mileage run nearly forty-one million miles. Out of these fourteen million passengers, the colossal sum of murder perpetrated was the loss of nine lives. My hon. friend from North Bruce tells me that that is not the point to which he referred. I am coming to the point, but I think it is a fair point to make, that if we have carried fourteen million passengers over forty-one million miles, with the loss only of nine lives, very great care indeed must have been exercised by these railways in order to show such results. I know that my hon. friend has reference more particularly to the country neighbourhood.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That would give a distance, which each passenger rode of four miles.

Mr. COCKBURN. That may be. I am simply saying that fourteen million passengers were carried forty-one million miles, and it is just as easy to kill a man in four miles as in forty. A man is not killed all the way along. It is not like the case of the Opposition, whose life is being dragged out of them hour by hour, and who are screwing up their courage to meet their inevitable fate. It is a case of instantaneous death. My hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) is more interested in the country neighbourhoods. He comes from a district where the sound of the railway whistle is heard but rarely, and I can easily understand, in these circumstances, that alarm is felt by cattle and men at this extraordinary sound which now and then awakens them from their peaceful slumbers. Still, when I look into the facts in that connection, when I take the number of people, sober, drunk or otherwise, who, in walking along the railway track or lying on it, have met with the misfortune of their death, I find that altogether there were ninety-one.

Mr. McNEILL. How many were injured?

Mr. COCKBURN. My hon. friend will be delighted to hear that there were only fifty-eight. I am willing to charge all the consequences I can against the railway companies, but I do ask that they should get honest, fair play. We have been told to-day that they are a body of corruptionists who, by means of passes, are trying to ingratiate themselves in our favour, so that whenever they come to ask us for an extraordinary gift, we will be ready—bribed by a 10 cent fare or whatever it may be—to grant it. I ask you simply to deal fairly with the railway managers, and not to be carried away by the impression that they are running their roads at all risks and hazards. I say you may take the railway statistics of this country and compare them with those of any other country, and in no other country similarly situated will you find less destruction of life. We have reason to be proud indeed of what is being achieved by the railways of Canada, and I wish to give them credit and encouragement for what they have done, and I hope they will continue to improve in the future as they have in the past, mending, if possible, their ways so far as the killing or maiming of our friends may be concerned, on the highways or byways.

Mr. McDOWALL. I merely call the attention of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken to the fact that, according to the returns, the total number of killed was 211, and of injured 694.

Mr. COCKBURN. I thought my hon. friend was away back in the backwoods. He is quoting the returns of 1893, and the railway companies have so improved since in every respect, that whereas the slaughter then was comparatively colossal, they have been able within three years to reduce these hundreds down to so many tens.

Motion agreed to, and Bill referred to Committee on Railways and Canals.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, DRUGS AND AGRICULTURAL FERTILIZERS.

Mr. SPROULE moved second reading of Bill (No. 10) further to amend the Act respecting the adulteration of food, drugs and agricultural fertilizers. He said: In asking the House to allow this Bill to be read the second time, I wish to make a few remarks, because I presume the Bill is one not well understood by the House. I shall first draw attention to the fact that the large number of people who are engaged to-day in the manufacture of honey in Canada, have made it one of the important industries of the country. It is not like any other industry which requires a large expenditure to obtain a return; but by the able assistance of the industrious little bees which gather the honey from the flowers and other sources, stores of this food are laid up for human use and add considerably to the prosperity of the country. I have before me a return of the year 1891—the year the census was taken—showing the number of beehives in Canada and the amount of honey that was made. In that year there were in the Dominion 200,000 hives. Now, a fair average quantity of honey realized, where bees are properly attended to, would be about fifty pounds to the hive. That will give an idea of the returns which may be realized from these stores, upon which man has to make a very small outlay. If you take 200,000 hives and multiply them by fifty—and in a fair average year, with particular attention, bee-keepers may realize 100 pounds per hive—you have 10,000,000 pounds of honey produced in one year. At 8 cents per pound that amounts to $800,000; and the year 1891, I may say in passing, was not even a fair average year, for it was below the average for the production of honey. But it meant a return to the Canadian people of at least $800,000 from the operations of the bees and the bee-keepers, which we would not have enjoyed had it not been for that industry. In most lines of life in which the people are engaged, there is usually great attention given to their industry so as to protect and preserve it. Take, for instance, the seal life of Canada. A few years ago we had a good deal of talk about the preservation of the seal and what it cost the country for protection. I find that in six years we realized from that source only $1,256,497, and we thought it advisable to incur very large expense in order to settle the international dispute between Canada and the United States, and pay our share of the cost of the arbitration for the purpose of protecting this industry. But, during the same six years, upon the calculation I have made, according to the last census the amount realized from honey was $4,800,000, instead of $1,000,000. I only give these figures to show the importance of this industry to the people who are engaged in it and to the people of Canada at large. Then there are a very large number of people who are engaged in this industry and are asking for this legislation. And why do they ask for it? Because it has been found, as the result of many years experience that, as in other lines, there is a disposition to adulterate the product, so as to make it more cheaply. The effect of that adulteration is to reduce the reputation of our whole product in the market, so that it is not saleable at the figures which could be realized some years ago. Therefore the industry out of which we have been making so much and is capable of such expansion is rapidly being destroyed. The bee-keepers all over the country have recognized this, and year after year, as their associations have met, they have applied to Parliament for legislation to prevent the adulteration of honey. I may state, in passing, that there are several methods practiced in the adulteration of honey. One method is to take pure cane sugar syrup and mix with it a little pure honey, putting the mixture up in jars labelled "Pure Honey." Another is to take glucose and add liquid honey. Another method is to feed the bees with sugar, treacle, glucose or some other material of saccharine properties. The bees so fed will produce what is called honey, but what is really only a syrup which can be sold as honey. When I state to the House that a swarm of bees will store away from 50 to a 100 pounds of this material in a few days, and that when it is exposed in the market it can be sold at a much higher profit than can genuine honey, hon. gentlemen will understand the inducement there is for people to engage in this spurious manufacture. But the effect is to destroy their own trade; because, as it becomes known that this material is not honey in the proper sense of the term, but only an adulterated product, people will not buy it. To overcome this evil the bee-keepers have been asking that some legislation be enacted in this House or by this Parliament. To give you an idea of the feeling that exists, if the House will permit me, I will read what prominent bee-keepers and associations have said on this question:

The "Canadian Bee Journal," in reporting the annual meeting of the Ontario Bee-keepers' Association, held at Walkerton, says: "The convention asked the bee-keepers of Canada to unite as one man in crushing the hydra-headed monster, sugar-honey, before it is born. The weapon agreed upon for this purpose is an Act of Parliament by which he is to be threshed out of existence before he comes to life." The editor of "Gleanings in Bee Culture" says: "We believe the advocacy of the sugar-honey matter, in the first place, was unwise, and, therefore, opposed it with all our might." No one at the annual meeting of the North American Bee-keepers' Association, held at Washington, D.C., in 1893, endorsed producing sugar-honey. Thomas William Cowan, F.G.S., F.R.M.S., and editor of the "British Bee Journal," says in a letter to me, dated 3rd February, 1893: "I was pleased to find by your letter that the Ontario Bee-keepers' Association had taken up the matter of the so-called sugar-honey, and have decided to ask for legislation on the subject. I saw also that you had brought the matter before the Oxford Association, and was very glad to find that it has brought forward this desire to put a stop to the practice of feeding sugar to produce comb. I can only look upon such a proceeding as almost suicidal to the industry, and would do all in my power to prevent it."

Answering the question: If we feed sugar syrup to bees and send the product to the English markets, what effect would this course have upon the sale of Canadian honey in English markets? Mr. Cowan says: "It would not be long before your product would be shut out of our markets, and it would do you an injury that you would be years in getting over." Answering another question—Can bees make honey of sugar syrup?—"To this I unhesitatingly answer, 'No.' Sugar syrup stored in the combs by the bees remains sugar still. It is quite possible that a portion of the cane sugar in the syrup may be converted into grape sugar, but this does not make it honey. "In conclusion," he says, "I would urge you to leave no stone unturned to prevent this attempt to introduce adulteration, which, I think, would not fail to have most disastrous consequence of the industry of bee-keeping."

Mr. Secor, a bee-keeper of high standing, who judged the honey at the Chicago World's Fair, said, in his address at Washington, D.C., as president of the North American Bee-keepers' Association: "In my judgment, we cannot long prosper if we adopt methods which will put us on the defensive in every honey market in the world. Adulteration is the crying sin of the age. The people are becoming aroused upon the subject. We ourselves are trying to put a stop to it. It will not be sufficient to say that the improved article is to be sold for just what it is. If it is possible to produce it at a profit, it will not be long before every consumer will have heard of the trick, and conclude to make his own honey."

I. F. Moore, of Tiffin, Ohio, writes: "I can see no good results whatever from the discussion. Its principal use has been to give hints to would-be imitation honey-producers. The devil does not need any aid. Can we not profit by the experience of the dairy people in their fight with oleomargarine, &c.?"

N. P. Aspinwall, of Harrison, Minn., writes: "It would be the death knell of the bee-keeping interests of the country."

Allen Pringle, of Selby, Ont., writes: "I regard the proposed 'sugar-honey' as one of the worst forms of adulteration, worse because it emanates from producers themselves."

C. Theilmann, of Theilmanton, Minn., says: "Every experienced bee-keeper knows that sugar cannot be changed to honey by the bees. It is sugar first, and sugar last. I am afraid our industry has received a blow from which it will not recover for many years, by this sugar-honey swindle."

Thomas G. Newman, formerly editor of the "American Bee-keepers' Journal," writes: "The degradation brought upon the honey-producers by this sugar-honey abomination is almost unbearable; it cannot be right; it is a fraud upon the bees; it would compel the bee-keeper to be dishonest, and it would be a dishonourable and fraudulent trick played upon consumers. The instigators of this nefarious swindle have sown to the wind and are now reaping the whirlwind."

Thomas Pearson, of Lacolle, Quebec, wrote me: "I am glad to see that the Ontario Bee-keepers' Association have taken the matter in hand in regard to the sugar-honey fraud. I am in sympathy with you, and shall do all I can to help you."

Ira Reeves, of Carmi, Ill., writes: "It was put on exhibition at the drug store of Reeves & Co., and admired by everybody, and we could readily have sold every pound of it for 15 cents; but we did not; it was simply syrup without the taste of honey to it."

I will give you the names of a few of the associations that have asked for this legislation, to show you that there are a large number of people engaged in the industry who are anxious to see the Bill I have introduced made part of the law of the land:—The Farmers Institute, Elgin county, Ontario; The Dairyman's cheese meeting at Belmont, Ont.; the Ontario Bee-keepers' Association, Brant Bee-keepers' Association, Perth Bee-keepers' Association, Middlesex Bee-keepers' Association, Oxford Bee-keepers' Association, and Listowel Bee-keepers' Association. In fact I know of but two or three bee-keepers in Canada who object to this Bill. I quote these expressions of opinion in order to bring to the attention of the House the importance of this measure. I need not refer to the extent to which the export trade in honey would grow if it were developed under proper protection in Canada; it is enough to say that we are already exporting large quantities of honey to Great Britain and the United States. England offers us a great market for honey if we would take advantage of it by sending pure honey, such as can be produced in Canada. I have here a letter from the Statistical Department, which gives some information regarding the trade. It says:

We have not much to do with bees and honey in the Statistical Branch of the Department of Agriculture. The census returns for 1891 indicate that there were about 200,000 hives in the Dominion, 146,341 of them being in Ontario, which in this respect, as in so many others, is the banner province of the Dominion. At an average of 50 pounds to the hive of 5,000 bees, the production in Canada would be about ten (10) million pounds. Our trade returns show that we exported $264 worth in 1891 and imported $3,558 worth, chiefly from the United States. Our neighbours exported $83,325, of which $36,000 went to the United Kingdom. We certainly ought not to import honey, and I am glad to be able to say that the import is becoming less each year, having been $4,673 in 1890, and being but little over $2,000 in the last fiscal year, while the export has shown considerable increase, having been $1,700 in 1892, of which nearly $1,200 went to Great Britain.

The United Kingdom imports over 3½ million pounds of honey, valued at $250,000. About 1,300,000 pounds of this comes from Chili, or over one-third of the total import. Over one million pounds come from the Spanish and British West Indies.

Now, I give this simply to show the possible development of this trade in the country, and what it might be brought to if we had the proper protection which we ask for the Canadian bee-keepers of Canada. Now, some question the propriety of passing an Act similar to this. It is held that because an article is manufactured or produced which cannot be fairly claimed to be injurious to health, we should allow it to be purchased. Those who were in this House a few years ago when an Act was passed prohibiting the manufacture of oleomargarine, will remember that exactly the same arguments were advanced with regard to that. Nevertheless, the judgment of this House was that it was better for the country that we should not allow it to be produced, and we have an Act upon the statute-book for the purpose of prohibiting the manufacture of that article, and offering it for sale. Now, the bee-keepers ask for similar legislation in their interest. I think this Bill can be made to fit into chapter 107 of the Revised Statutes, in the Act intituled, "An Act respecting the Adulteration of Foods, Drugs and Agricultural Fertilizers." It can be made an amendment to that by a change in the wording of this Bill which is before you. I am sorry I have not had time to get it printed in a different and revised form, as compared with what it is in the Bill before the House. But I will read it so that it may be understood by those who take an interest in it. I am told that it can be easily added to the Adulteration of Foods Act as subsection a.:

The feeding to bees of sugar, glucose, or any other sweet substance other than such as bees gather from natural sources, with the intent that the same should be used by bees in the making of honey, or the exposing of any such substance with said intent, shall be deemed a wilful adulteration of honey within the meaning of this Act; and no honey made by bees in whole or in part from any such substances, and no imitation of honey, so-called, or other substitute for honey, shall be manufactured, or produced, or sold, or offered for sale, in Canada; provided that this Act shall not be interpreted or construed to prevent the giving of sugar in any form to bees to be consumed by them for food.

Now, I may say that at some seasons of the year when there is a scarcity of honey, it becomes necessary to feed bees to keep them alive, but when that is done it is used by them simply as food, and not stored away for honey. That is requisite and necessary, and could be done without in any way infringing upon the provisions of this Bill. Bees usually gather their honey in the summer; a scarcity of food generally takes place in the fall, or winter, or spring, and therefore the time that it is necessary to feed bees is not the time when they store away honey. But when sugar, or glucose, or syrup, or any other saccharine material, is fed to bees for the purpose of being converted into honey, it is spread out, and they take it up very readily and store it away in the cells, where it is manufactured into honey in large quantities in a very short time. Now, some may ask: How could this law be enforced? How could you secure a conviction in the event of a violation of the law? Well, that would be very easy. In Ontario we have a law to-day under which a party is appointed by the local government, who is called an inspector of foul brood of bees. He goes around from time to time to see if there is a foul brood and he has the legal authority to examine apiaries. When he goes there, if the production of honey has been carried on by this process, it is plain as anything can be, because the material is placed there for the purpose of consumption by the bees in such a way that he knows that they are producing honey by that means. Therefore, it is an easy matter to secure conviction under the Act. But we require to go further than that, and have an analysis of the honey made. It is equally easy to secure conviction, because he only requires to submit it to an analytic test by the chemist belonging to the department at Ottawa. I am told by Professor Macfarlane, the analyst here, that there is no difficulty whatever in detecting honey made by this means as distinguished from pure honey. One means used and the most delicate and surest is what is known as the polariscope test. It is one of those little instruments made like a tube, in which there is placed a small vial, or tube, containing liquid. If the light is allowed to pass in through a lens at one end and to pass through that liquid, the ray of light is changed to the right hand, if it is cane sugar or glucose, or other production of saccharine matter, produced from cane or beet, or other such source. But if it is honey, the ray of light is changed to the left, and is always on the negative side. It is changed to a certain to the left, and then it is known as standard honey. It is true you may use what is called the inverted sugar to feed bees or adulterate honey, and that would show a mirror test by the polariscope, but the change is so great, reaching as it does in adulterating honey or sugar-honey, as called, to about twenty to twenty-three degrees to the left, that it is at once evident that it is sugar instead of honey. Therefore, it is impossible to manufacture honey in this way in such a manner that it cannot be detected by the polariscope test. It is quite easy to determine whether this is adulteration within the meaning of the Act or not, and, therefore, it is easy to secure a conviction. In view of that fact, I do not see where any objection lies. I am told that some people object on one ground and some on another, that some object on the principle that we should not prevent any person manufacturing a commodity when it is not injurious to health. I have given reasons why I believe we should do so. The Act respecting the adulteration of food specifies two kinds of adulteration, for each of which there is a penalty attached. For a food adulterated with some article that is not injurious there is a certain penalty, but it is not so heavy as when the adulteration is with an article injurious to health. When that is the case it seems to me that there is no reason why we should not attach a penalty to the production of this article under discussion, because it is practically an adulteration within the meaning of the Act, the same as when food is adulterated with something that is not injurious to health. In consideration of the important industry that is being destroyed by unprincipled people who are manufacturing honey, some by one means and some by another, it is necessary that effective preventive measures should be adopted. I am told there are several manufactories where this product is made, that there are two in Montreal where honey is made without the aid of bees, and where the product is labelled pure honey. It is manufactured in some such way as I have indicated, and there seems to be an urgent necessity for this or some other such

Bill to prevent its manufacture. The bee-keepers of Canada believe that if this Bill became law it would be effective, and there might be no necessity of prosecuting parties for violation of the law, because people would refrain from violating it, just as they did from producing oleomargarine from the time we placed the law on the statute-book prohibiting its manufacture. We all know that before that time it was manufactured and sold, and it was claimed by many persons that as it was an article of food not injurious to health its production should be allowed and it should be allowed to be sold; but as it came into competition with butter its manufacture was stopped, and no complaints have since been heard of violations of the law, and if this Bill were passed and placed on the statute-book it would be a standing menace to those contemplating the production of adulterated or sugar-honey, and its manufacture would cease. In view of the great interest at stake, and the number of people interested, and the frequency with which they have knocked at the door of Parliament asking legislation, and especially in view of the amount of money invested, there being no less than $1,000,000 invested in this industry in Canada, it is important that this law should be passed. I ask this House to give the Bill its favourable consideration, and if possible, enact it, because I believe it will not only be a satisfaction to the bee-keepers of the Dominion, but it will be instrumental in preventing what is a fraud on the consuming public, and a manufacture that must ultimately destroy that important industry, if we do not come to the aid of those engaged in it by passing such a Bill as that now under consideration and without punishing those manufacturing sugar-honey and like products in future.

Mr. PRIOR. The House must have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) in regard to the honey industry in this country. I may say for myself that I was very much surprised indeed at the extent of this industry, it having, as the hon. gentleman said, about $1,000,000 of capital invested, and, being the means of bringing $800,000 per annum into the country. The Bill which the hon. gentleman has brought forward does not meet altogether with my approbation or the approbation, I think, of the Government, but as it is one that is brought forward with the intention of protecting an important industry, protecting men who wish to give honest honey to the consumer, the Government have no objection whatever to the Bill going to its second reading and being afterwards sent to the committee, where I hope fuller explanations perhaps may be given and such alterations made as will be more in consonance with the views of the Government on the subject than is the present Bill. There is no doubt we ought to do everything possible to assist honey-makers in getting an article on the market that will maintain the value of our honey, so that we can export it and meet the competition of foreign honey and have a good name in any market to which it may be sent. So far as I understood the hon. gentleman, the adulteration that is mentioned is not deleterious to health, it is an adulteration from sugar and glucose; but at the same time this adulteration makes a great difference in the market value of the product. I think my hon. friend has done his duty in introducing the Bill, and I shall be only too glad to assist him when the Bill is before the committee and when certain alterations will be proposed which may be thought necessary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am glad to hear the favourable remarks of the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue. I expected to have heard from the Department of Agriculture in respect to this matter. I am aware that it has been before the department—not before the present Minister—for several years. Representations have been made by the different bee-keepers throughout Ontario, and recognizing these facts that it is an important industry, that it is in the interest of the trade to be able to export honey which is recognized as a pure article, that it means a source of great revenue to Canada, those engaged in the legitimate trade of producing pure honey are very anxious that legislation should be passed to protect their interests. I quite recognize that there are difficulties in the way, as indicated by the remarks offered by the Controller of Inland Revenue, such as that so-called adulterated honey or sugar-syrup, under whatever name it may pass, is not apparently injurious to health, and, therefore, the Government probably would not be inclined to deal so severely with those manufacturers as with the manufacturers of an article put on the market that is injurious in its nature. However that may be, the honey industry is recognized as a very important one, and those interested in it have during several years been urging that some legislation be passed to maintain the good name of Canadian honey in the foreign market. That, so far as I can judge, is the only desire of those who are producing and shipping pure honey, and I had expected that the Department of Agriculture, through the Minister, would have stated the views which had been formed by the department on the question, as so many representations had been made by petition, letter and personally. I am in sympathy with the Bill, and any action that can be taken in the way of legislation to encourage this industry and maintain the quality of the honey now produced in Canada, which holds a very high position in the markets of the world.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman having referred to the Department of Agriculture in connection with the Bill now before the House, I may say that the Bill is one that hardly comes within the purview of the department. The Bill has reference, as the hon. gentleman knows, to the adulteration of a food product, and it is a matter within the control of the Department of Inland Revenue, where a technical staff is kept to make the investigations necessary in connection with that kind of work. So far, however, as the general question of assistance to the bee-keepers of Canada is concerned, that does come within the sphere of the Department of Agriculture; and I am very glad to be able to say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) that I trust we shall be able to meet the view which has been so often expressed—not so much in the House as in the agricultural journals of the country—and lend some assistance, in the way of making experiments in connection with the bee-keeping industry. There is no doubt, Sir, of the importance of that industry to Canada. The money that is made out of it is found money, because the money that is taken from the flora of the country would have been wasted had it not been collected by the bees, and consequently, there is no loss, but an actual gain of all the value that is produced by these insects in connection with their work. Hitherto we have not made any very special effort for the bee-keeping industry at the Experimental Farm. There was an apiary established some years ago, chiefly, I think, at my suggestion. I happened to be a member of the Bee-keepers' Association myself, and was in as practical sympathy as possible with the work, and at my representations, and those of other members of the House, the matter was undertaken by Professor Fletcher, and he is doing really good service. But, his other work has grown so much, that I hope to be able in a short time to tell the House, that I have taken a new man upon the staff for that special department; a man who I am sure will command the confidence of bee-keepers all over Canada. So far as the importance of the industry is concerned, it has not at all been magnified by the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). It exists in almost every province of the Dominion. In the province of Ontario, however, the great body of that industry is, but the experience of those who have made experiments in even the province of Manitoba, and in some parts of the Territories, is very favourable indeed. In parts of the province of Manitoba, bees winter first rate, with care, and the flora of that particular province is very rich in honey, though at first the contrary was supposed. So far as the Bill is concerned, I confess that as a member of the House, I have a great deal of sympathy with the object that the Bee-keepers' Association has in view; an object which is voiced by the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). It is true, I think, that there would be considerable difficulty in putting the Bill into force as it is at the present time, but I have no doubt, if the Bill is allowed to go into committee, that with suggestions from both sides of the House we will be able to make such a law as will be of actual benefit to the bee-keepers and will not be oppressive to trade in any way. I am sure my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is not wedded to any particular form of Bill, but that the object he wishes to serve is to help the bee-keeping industry. The hon. gentleman will see that it is a Bill regarding the adulteration of food product, and requires very careful consideration before it is passed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. CASEY. Before you pass to the Orders of the Day, I wish to call attention to a matter arising out of the answer given by the hon. Minister of Railways yesterday, and if you find it necessary, I shall conclude with a motion. The question and answer I refer to are as follows : —

Mr. PERRY asked :

Is it a fact that Sir Charles Tupper, Secretary of State, is travelling in a private car through Cape Breton county during the election campaign at public expense ?

Mr. HAGGART. I do not know how Sir Charles Tupper is travelling. I loaned him my private car. I have no doubt he is travelling at his own expense.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member, as I understand it, is proposing to bring up a reference to a former debate on a question for adjournment ?

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think an answer given by the Government is a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. Well, that is my ruling.

Mr. CASEY. I wish to submit a case for your ruling. Cannot a question and answer be quoted in any subsequent debate ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think so. Upon a motion to adjourn, a reference to a question and answer in the House, is not permissible. That is my reading.

Mr. CASEY. Very well then. I wish to refer to an alleged fact, stated in the press and commonly believed, and that is that Sir Charles Tupper—

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would ask him whether he would not think it better—

Mr. CASEY. Does the hon. gentleman rise to a point of order ?

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to ask the hon. gentleman a question, as one gentleman might ask another. I would remind the hon. gentleman that a day was fixed for the Budget, and it is not an easy thing to prepare for a Budget, and to come into the House, and have the half or whole of the afternoon taken up with other matters. I just suggest to my hon. friend whether he would not think it better to defer this matter to another day.

Mr. CASEY. If I had not thought this matter of sufficient importance to justify me in bringing it forward now, I should not have done so.

Mr. FOSTER. I never knew the like being done before.

Mr. CASEY. There need not necessarily be a debate on it. I wish to ask for some explanations, and to make a few references to the alleged facts of this case. It is stated in the public press that Sir Charles Tupper is travelling through Cape Breton county in a car which is not a private car, but an official car, a car belonging to the Minister of Railways as Minister of Railways, and for the use of that gentleman only in his capacity as Minister of Railways—a car, the property of the Government of Canada, in other words, for governmental service in Canada, and that he is travelling at the public expense on that car, in so far, at all events, that he pays nothing for the cost of hauling that car. I do not know whether the Government will have to pay the railways over which the car runs for haulage, or whether the railway companies will make a present of that amount to the candidate for Cape Breton county, the High Commissioner of Canada. The car is properly for the public service ; it should not be devoted to private use, it should still less be devoted to partisan use. I need not point out what an unfair advantage the Conservative candidate in Cape Breton possesses in having a car provided for him at the public expense, in which he can travel free over the railways, in which he can lodge at night, carry about the necessary refreshments, and get his boots blacked every morning without paying Chicago prices for the service. The man who is carried about in this fashion at the public expense is no small potatoes. The famous car "Jamaica" has been allowed to carry small potatoes on other occasions. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture will understand the allusion.

Mr. COCKBURN. Allow me to ask a question. As the hon. gentleman is introducing a new phrase, perhaps he will give us some explanation of its meaning.

Mr. CASEY. Certainly, I shall be happy to give the ordinary and figurative signification of those words. Small potatoes are an ordinary esculent grown in fields and gardens. I am told they are cultivated as far south-west as the neighbourhood of Dunnville. That is the agricultural small potato, and the literal meaning of the word. The phrase "small potatoes" in the figurative sense refers to people who are perhaps not quite as important as other people. There is a difference in the size of the natural potato ; there is a difference in the size of the political potato. I say that in both senses of the word the famous old "Jamaica" has been promoted from carrying small potatoes to carrying big potatoes. Now I hope the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) understands the meaning of that phrase.

The "Jamaica" is useful, I say, to the Government candidate in Cape Breton, as a means of locomotion, and as a portable boarding house. I believe it had been used for that purpose before. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture will explain whether he ever knew it to be used as a sea-side boarding-house, or practically for that purpose. It is alleged that he knows something of that kind ; but I am only speaking of that en passant.

The point to which I wish to call the attention of the House particularly, is the extremely unfair advantage given to Sir Charles Tupper by the use of a public car, at the public cost, to enable him all the better to defeat the candidate of the opposite party. He is using public funds and public property for partisan purposes. It is no new thing for him. In the election of 1891, when High Commissioner on full pay, he came to Canada, and drawing his pay and allowances as High Commissioner in London, he used the public official car on our railways; he used his time, which belonged to the public as High Commissioner in London; he used his influence, all of which the public hired him to use in their service as High Commissioner, for partisan purposes in Canada. He is repeating that course now. Although he is said to be not receiving his pay as High Commissioner, no doubt his allowances are going on as in 1883-4. I do not think this course of action should be allowed to go without protest, as it was in 1891. On that occasion the election came after the session and there was no opportunity to protest till it was over. But now, when the House is sitting, I cannot allow this unfair and improper use of public property and public funds to pass without entering my protest against it. In order to allow Ministers or other members to make any observations they please on the subject, I move the adjournment of the House.

Motion negatived.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply. He said: Mr. Speaker, the House will remember that the Budget speech was delivered last year at a rather late period, namely, on 3rd May, being so short a time before the expiry of the then current year that it was possible to detail the course of financial events of that year with pretty considerable accuracy, and to that extent the exposition for the present year will lose somewhat in interest to those who have followed the course of events as described in my last Budget speech. It will be remembered that last year at that date I estimated the revenue that would be derived at $33,800,000, arriving at that figure by estimating for a betterment in the period elapsing between 20th April and 30th June of that year over the corresponding period in the preceding year of $419,724. I remember that my hon. friend opposite took exception to and questioned the reliability of the estimate; but I am happy to inform him and the House that I was within the mark, and that the improvement which did accrue was greater than that I had estimated, and reached the sum of $597,851. This revenue was made up from Customs $17,640,466, being a diminution to the amount of $1,557,648 from the Customs receipts of the preceding year; Excise amounting to $7,805,732, a decrease of $575,356 from the preceding year, and miscellaneous receipts coming up to $8,531,930, or a diminution of $263,559 from the receipts of the preceding year, so far as that item is concerned. The whole falling off in the revenue of 1894-95, as compared with the preceding year, was therefore $2,396,563.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What date did the French Treaty come into operation?

Mr. FOSTER. About May, if I recollect rightly. The imports for home consumption for 1894-95 show a decrease of $7,841,472, and the exports have decreased $3,886,146. The decrease in exports, the produce of Canada, is $1,076,758, as compared with the previous year. There is, further, this fact to be noted, a similar fact to which has existed only once, I think, since confederation. It is that the exports from Canada last year exceeded its imports by $2,857,121; although the average of the excess of imports over exports from confederation up to the end of that year was $18,740,063. Whatever there may be in what is known as the "balance of trade," other circumstances being equal, the fact that there was last year an excess of exports over imports is a fact which is to be placed to the credit of Canada, and is so much gain to the general business interests. With reference to, in the first place, the customs duties, there was a reduction as compared with the preceding year, in a large proportion of the articles of import, a reduction which extended pretty generally over the whole range. The following statement will show the reduction in import duties as compared with 1893-94:—

The total decrease in the duty of excise as shown by these returns, amounts to $584,864. Looking at the per capita consumption of liquors of the various kinds, for which a table has been given from confederation down, we find that in 1894-95 the lowest consumption of most of these articles, per capita, was reached, the consumption of spirits being .666 gallons per head; of beer, 3.471 gallons per head; of wine, a very slight increase in consumption, amounting to .09 gallon per head, and of tobacco, a consumption of 2.163 pounds per head of the people. Whether that decrease arises from reasons of economy, or from change in the ideas of the people with reference to these articles, I am not here to say, probably both reasons have something to do with it.

In miscellaneous receipts there has been, as I said, a falling off of $263,559. But this is to be noted, and it is a fact worth noting, that although the receipts fell off that much in 1894-95, yet the receipts from these sources were greater in 1894-95 than in any other year since confederation, with the exception of 1893 and 1894.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Just pardon me. In the miscellaneous receipts, I suppose you include all not received from the four great sources of revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, they are really the earnings. The revenue from that source now in 1894-95, is one-fourth of the total revenue accrued, and one-half million dollars more, than double what these receipts reached in 1878-79. The average of these miscellaneous receipts from 1890 to 1895 was $8,583,107. The average of the five preceding years was $7,842,365. So that I may say generally that there has been a continuous and steady increase in these sources of revenue during the whole period. The total revenue received during the year is the smallest that has been received since 1885-86. The customs revenue is the smallest that has accrued since 1879-80—smaller by 6½ millions of dollars than it was in 1889-90, when the large diminution in duties made during the last five years commenced.

The per capita rate of customs collections from 1874 to 1878, including both years, was an average of $3.44 per head of the people. The rate in 1874-75 was $3.95 per head of the people. In 1894-95 it was $3.52 per head, that is, only 8 cents per head greater than the average of the period from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, and 43 cents less than the per capita customs taxation in 1874-75.

Taken in connection with that, and illustrating to a certain extent the difference that exists between the two Administrations in the collection of revenues as regards the incidence of taxation, this may be noted—that the excise revenue is now nearly twice what it was in 1879-80; that it has been exceeded only three times since that period—namely, in 1892, 1893, and 1894; that the excise revenue in 1877-78 was $1.19 per head of the people, and in 1894-95, $1.53 per head; that from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, it averaged $1.32 per head, while from 1891 to 1895 it averaged $1.59 per head, or 27 cents per head more than the average per capita from 1874 to 1878. As this excise taxation is to a large extent what may be called voluntary taxation, its higher rates and the larger amount accruing from it are to be considered together with the fact that the rate of customs taxation has been at the same time reduced as I have stated, attaining the low figure which it did in 1894-95. These two facts, taken into consideration together show the difference which I have stated marks the taxation as between the two Administrations.

In speaking of miscellaneous receipts, it might be interesting to the House to know in what the decline, small though it was, took place. The following are the items:—

Post Office.....	$ 16,551
Public works, including railways.	111,056
Casual	112,796
Premium, discount and exchange.	132,195
Dominion Lands.....	42,226

The gains in miscellaneous receipts were as follows:—

Interest on investments.....	$118,237
Patents	11,499
Fines and forfeitures.....	10,129
Penitentiaries	13,461
Fisheries	15,797

Coming now to the expenditure for 1894-95, it was estimated on the 3rd of May, last year, that the expenditure might be set at the sum of $38,300,000. In doing that I anticipated a decrease of $184,134 from the 20th of April of last year, as compared with the same period of the preceding year. But, by the exercise of strict supervision, that sum was made larger, amounting in the end to $352,108; so that the actual expenditure was brought down to $38,132,000, being about $170,000 below the estimate I made on the 3rd of May.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman unnecessarily; but as we have only had the Auditor General's Report in our hands for a day, perhaps the hon. gentleman could state from recollection whether the extra expenses of Parliament after the 1st of July are charged to last year or to this year?

Mr. FOSTER. Those after the 1st of July would be charged to the current year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There would be a difficulty, then. The indemnities, I suppose, would not be paid until after that time, so that, unless the hon. gentleman had drawn in advance, a good deal would be charged to this year instead of to last year.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not like to vouch that the indemnities were all left till the session was over.

The increase in expenditure for 1894-95 over the preceding year was, therefore, $546,979. This increase may be explained by the following observations. The charges on debt, which, of course, are fixed charges, and the increased subsidies to provinces, which are also fixed, amounted to $399,545, and there were extraordinary expenditures under militia, which properly should be called capital expenditures, but which were paid out of the consolidated fund. These three items together made up the whole increase in the expenditure of 1894-95 over that of 1893-94. The expenditure of last year, amounting to $38,132,000, was one of the largest expenditures we have had. We find, however, that for the last eight years the expenditures out of consolidated revenue fund have been remarkably steady. In 1887-88 the expenditure was $36,718,494. The average of the eight years from that time up to the end of last year was $36,908,862, or less than $200,000 greater than the expenditure of 1887-88. The facts that the charges on the debt have largely increased during that period, as the debt is much larger, that the subsidies to provinces have been increased by over $300,000 under the decennial arrangement, and that the amount laid up in sinking fund has increased each year, show to the House that the expenditures of the country during these eight years have been kept pretty nearly upon a steady basis of about $37,000,000 per year.

The expenditure in 1894-95 amounted to $38,132,005, and the revenue came up to $33,978,129, leaving a deficit of $4,153,875. Of course, in looking at that deficit, we must remember that $2,002,311 is accounted for by the amount which is laid up in the sinking fund—a provision, of course, against debt at the maturity of the loan. So that the real result of last year's operations, so far as the consolidated revenue expenditures are concerned, is that out of revenue we paid the ordinary expenses of the country and laid up $2,002,311 in the sinking fund against the debt, and that the deficit, but for this payment would have been only $2,151,564. The deficit then amounts to $4,153,875, which is less by about $350,000 than I anticipated on the 3rd of May last year. Adding to that the deficit in 1893-94, the two make up a total of $5,364,207. These are the deficits for the two years succeeding surpluses in the other three years of the parliamentary term. Against those two combined deficits of $5,364,207, we must recollect that last year the saving to the people in taxation, which was remitted, and which would otherwise have accrued upon sugar alone, amounted to $5,475,000, or a little more than the deficits of 1894-95 and 1893-94 added together. This means simply that if the Government had not relieved the people of that taxation on raw sugar, it would have gathered sufficient revenue to meet all the expenditures of the country and have left besides a slight surplus of one or two hundred thousand dollars in the Treasury.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Assuming the importations to have been the same.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. There is a margin left for considerably less importation, but the price of sugar is so low at present, and has been for a number of years, that the amount of added taxation which would have been placed upon it would not have acted very largely as a bar upon the consumption of sugar in this country.

It is very well, however, to take into account, when we are speaking of deficits, the five years period when hon. gentlemen were in power, and compare that with the five years period which has just closed, in order to refresh the mind of the House and the country as to the relative position of affairs. From 1890 to 1895, which was the period of the hard times and business depression we have passed through under the present Administration, there have been deficits of $5,364,207 and surpluses of $3,746,276, leaving a net deficit of $1,617,931. In the period from 1874 to 1879, there were deficits amounting to $6,426,958 and surpluses amounting to $935,644, leaving a net deficit of $5,491,314. And it is necessary for me to draw attention of hon. gentlemen this year again to the fact that although the net deficit in that period, under hon. gentlemen opposite, was five and a half million dollars, they remitted no taxation but laid on extra taxation; while in the period during which the net deficit, under the present Administration, amounted to one and a half million dollars, we relieved the people, in sugar taxation alone, of upwards of $19,000,000 of taxes.

Coming to capital expenditure, we find that 1894-95 compares with 1893-94 as follows:—

	1894-95.	1893-94.
Railways and Canals.....	$2,829,088	$3,612,913
Public Works.....	102,392	102,058
Dominion Lands.....	99,842	149,146
Total.....	$3,031,322	$3,864,117

Being a reduction in 1894-95 in expenditure on capital account of $832,795 as compared with 1893-94.

Railway subsidies paid amounted to $1,316,549 in 1894-95, as against $1,229,335 in the preceding year, so that the total capital expenditure, including railroad subsidies, was $4,341,871 in 1894-95 as compared with $5,094,002 in 1893-94. There was, therefore, a decrease in capital expenditure, including railway subsidies, of $752,131, and an increase in expenditure under the consolidated fund of $546,979, as I have before mentioned, so that in the total expenditure of the country, there was a net decrease of $205,152 compared with the preceding year.

Coming to the debt, we find that the net debt on the 30th June, 1894, was $246,183,029. When we add together the capital expenditure in 1894-95 of $4,341,871 and charges on the loan of $399,199—being mainly the discount on the loan—and the deficit of $4,153,875 and a small consolidated fund transfer—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is that consolidated fund transfer?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a mere matter of account, $94—the total amounts to $8,895,042. Taking the sinking fund, $2,002,311 and $833 refund, and subtracting that from the total, we have $6,891,897 as the net addition to the debt, making a net debt on the 30th June, 1895, of $253,074,927. The statement tabulated is as follows:—

DEBT.

Additional, 1894-95.

Capital Expenditure.....	$4,341,871
Charges, Loan Management.....	399,199
Deficit	4,153,875
Cons. Fund Transfer.....	94
Total.....	$ 8,895,042
Less—Sinking Fund.....	2,002,311
Refund	833
		$ 2,003,144
		6,891,897
Net Debt, 30th June, 1894.....	246,183,029
Net Debt, 30th June, 1895.....	$253,074,927

The increase then in debt for the period from 1890 to 1895, inclusive, is $15,544,885, or an average of $2,590,814 per year. We find that, during that period, we have spent on capital account the following sums:—On canals, $11,319,379; on the Intercolonial Railway and connecting roads, $4,918,781; on the Canadian Pacific Railway, $754,145, a total of $16,992,308, which more than offsets the addition to the debt. We have also paid in railway subsidies in these years $7,543,945. So that, in calculating the addition to the debt, and appraising it at its true value, the country must simply ask itself whether or not the deepening and widening and finishing of the canals, the expansion and completion of the Intercolonial Railway and its connected railways, and the railway subsidies which have been instrumental in increasing the railroad and consequently the commercial facilities of the country, are a sufficient offset. If they are, the addition to the debt is fully justified; and, in my opinion, it is fully justified. But the real standard by which to judge the increase of the debt is the amount of interest which is required each year to carry it. The following remarks may be of interest in that connection. The net interest on the debt in 1887-88 was $8,891,288. The average from that time to 1895, a period of eight years, was $8,784,452, which is $106,000 less than the amount paid in 1887-88, the reason, of course, being the lower rate of interest. In 1894-95 the interest paid was $9,330,247. The interest per capita of the people paid in 1887-88 was $1.90; in 1894-95 it was $1.83. So we see that the incidence of the interest charged upon the people was less heavy by 7 cents per head in 1894-95 than in 1887-88. Coming to the expenditure and revenue for 1895-96, the year is not sufficiently advanced, of course, to enable me to make estimates with certainty. No one can tell what may happen in the five months which are still to run, so far as commercial disturbances and the general course of trade are concerned. But, knowing what was expected and what has accrued up to the present time, and making an estimate as nearly as one can for the remaining period, I arrive at the following results:—The revenue, up to 20th January, 1895, was $18,080,197. The expenditure for the same period was $19,833,399. From the 20th January, 1895, to the 30th June, 1895, the revenue accrued amounted to $15,897,931. The expenditure in the same period was $18,298,605. For the present year, the revenue up to 20th January amounted to $19,560,174, a betterment of about $1,500,000. The comparative expenditure for the same period amounted to $19,302,244, a decrease of about $530,000. From the 20th January, 1896, to the 30th June, 1896, I estimate a revenue to accrue of $17,439,826. In order that this may be realized it will be necessary that the course of trade shall show progressive increase and development compared with the preceding portion of the year for which the revenue has actually accrued. If that estimate proves correct, there will be for the current year a revenue, in the gross, of about $37,000,000. Coming to the expenditure, I find that up to the 20th January, 1896, there has been an expenditure for the current year of $19,302,244, as I have stated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That differs from the statement the hon. gentleman was good enough to send me.

Mr. FOSTER. This is up to the 20th January.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The statement furnished me does not agree with the hon. gentleman's figures. There is a discrepancy for the same period of several hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. I am confident that the figure I have stated is correct.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope then that the hon. gentleman will send me an amended statement.

Mr. FOSTER. There may be some error in the figures.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The statement furnished me by the hon. gentleman, for which I am obliged to him, shows, up to the 20th January, 1896, an expenditure of $18,902,000. I can send the statement across to the hon. gentleman so that he may see.

Mr. FOSTER. I am satisfied that the statement I have is correct.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt. I am merely calling the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that there is a discrepancy.

Mr. FOSTER. The estimated expenditure from the 20th January, 1896, to the end of the fiscal year is $17,697,756. This, with the expenditure already accrued, will give a total expenditure in round numbers of $37,000,000. So that, on these estimates, the revenue and expenditure for the current year will about balance. There may be a little difference one way or the other, and, of course, the estimate, covering so long a period, may not be quite correct. But I think, on the whole, I am safe in saying that there will be no very great discrepancy between the revenue and expenditure for the current year 1895-96. That is to say, we have passed through the period of commercial depression, we have turned the corner of which I spoke last year, concerning my estimate of which, I fear, from the remarks that were made at that time, I did not inspire confidence in the minds of my hon. friends opposite. But events since that time and the course of business for the year thus far, have proven my forecast to be, in the main, entirely correct. I think we can say, then, that we have passed through the period of commercial depression; that times are better; that trade is picking up; and that from this period and for succeeding years we may consider that the time of deficits is over for the present administration, and that the time of surpluses is approaching again. I never expected to convince my hon. friend, who shakes his head. Even time can scarcely do that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I understand the hon. gentleman to say that in this calculation which he has submitted, and to which, of course, I do not expect him to pledge himself, he counts on an increase for the next five months?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I count on that, as I stated. In regard to capital expenditure for 1895-96 up to the present time, there has been an expenditure on railways and canals, public works, Dominion lands, and railway subsidies, $2,391,866; and from the 20th January to 30th June, the estimate for these services is $1,690,000. The expenditure on capital account up to the 20th January, is less by $225,651 than was expended on that period last year. Adding together what has been already expended, and the estimate for the succeeding months of the year, the capital expenditure will amount to about $4,100,000. If that estimate is carried out, as I think it will be, we shall have, taking away the sinking fund of $2,070,000, which will be about the same this year, an increase to the debt in the current year of about $2,000,000, in round numbers. With reference to the expenditure and revenues for 1896-97, we are too far removed from that period to make any estimate which can be at all reliable, and I shall not attempt it. With reference to the expenditures, hon. gentlemen have had the Estimates for this year laid before them, and will find that the expenditures total, as estimated for, $38,250,000 or thereabouts. The increases over the preceding year are, in some cases, quite large, and the larger ones I shall read to the House. Interest, sinking fund, premium and discounts, show an increase of $250,983, the total sum estimated for these purposes being in the neighbourhood of $13,000,000 in round numbers.

The Public Works estimate of last year was reduced to about $1,500,000. There is an increase of $247,270 in that. Indians show an increase of $80,263. The vote for Indians was also reduced last year, and the $80,000 of increase is chiefly, as I understand, for the establishment and maintenance of schools. The North-west Mounted Police show an increase of $30,000 in the vote. That $30,000 is to meet the expenses incurred by the establishment of a post on the Yukon river, from which, however, a considerable revenue is expected, which will go, I hope, far to meet the added cost of placing there a detachment of the Mounted Police, and of bringing the reign of law and order into force there, as it has so effectually been done in the other parts of the North-west Territories.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me for one instant? I did not observe that he made any statement as to whether he expected to bring down any supplemental Estimates for the service of the present year.

Mr. FOSTER. There will be a supplemental estimate, though not a large one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You know we ought to have that, if you can possibly give it.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, and we should have had more Supply the other night, but we did not get it. In Customs, the increase for the next year is $25,095; but when it is taken into account that last year the cut in the Estimates for Customs was about $50,000, the increase this year will not seem large. In the Post Office, we have an increased estimate of $240,780, which is a large increase. The demands for the opening up of new lines, and for greater frequency and greater thoroughness in the delivery and despatch of mails, are continually pressing upon the Post Office Department, and a large expenditure has necessarily to be made if we are to keep at all even with the requirements of the times, which we are bound to do. There is now a deficit of somewhere near $800,000 between the total receipts and the total expenditures of our post office service: and this, I fear, makes the time somewhat distant when, what otherwise might be fairly asked for, can be granted, that is, a reduction upon the rates of postage in this country. Considering the large extent of country, the sparseness of the population, and the great expense necessarily imposed for carrying letters and papers in our North-west and in other parts of the country, there is no doubt that the carriage of letters, newspapers and parcels in this country, is cheaper, for the population, than you would probably find it in any other country in the world.

In the Militia Estimates there has been an increase of $247,270 over last year's vote. For a number of years, only a portion of the active militia have been called out for drill each year, and this consequently left the whole force to be drilled only once in two years. It may have been that there was the same necessity in preceding years for drilling the whole force, as in this year; but recent events have brought the lesson a little closer and nearer home to us, and the Government has come to the decision that, for the present, and we hope for each year after this, the rural militia will all be called out for drill during each year. It is largely for this purpose that the increase of $247,270 has been made in the Estimates, although the appropriation also stands for better equipment and accoutrements, and clothing and the like of that, for the militia force. No part of this sum, however, is to be devoted to the arming of the militia with new rifles, or for whatever else may be considered necessary to be done in the way of equipment, and strengthening the defences of the country. For that purpose, a special credit will be asked for later, but the sum is too large to allow its being taken out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Now, we may be met by objectors of two or three classes to an increase of this vote for this purpose, at the present time. There is one class of people who believe, or affect to believe, that any more than an ordinary expenditure upon the militia force of Canada at the present time, might be interpreted to the disadvantage of Canada as regards its relations with the United States, as implying a hostile demonstration thereto. There is another class of people, and I believe a very small class, in this country, who do not think it worth while that the militia of this country should be put in that forward state of efficiency, as they may believe that it would not be the worst of calamities if, after all, this country were quietly and peaceably to merge itself with the country to the south of us. The Government, however, does not believe with either of these small classes of objectors in our country ; it does believe that at the present time, and under the present circumstances, increased efficiency is both necessary and prudent. We take this step, not with any feeling of hostility to any country under the sun, not with any wish for war or bloodshed, but with the highest and strongest hopes for the continuation of those blessings of peace in the future, which have been so long the lot of this country in its relations with the United States of America, and with other countries. But I think we cannot forget that here we have an heritage, the accumulated wealth of which is very large at present, and the accumulations of wealth of which in the future are almost illimitable : that we have a country and institutions which are worth the sternest and strongest defence that can be given to them, and that Government and Parliament would not be doing its duty to the great trust it has reposed in it if it refused or neglected to place into the hands of its citizenship means of defence and adequate means of resistance to any armed invasion were it unfortunately to come upon us. More than that, Mr. Speaker, by birth, by adoption, by the enjoyment of ample freedom, by the long possession of good government, the people of this country, whether French-speaking or English-speaking, all the people, I think, of this country have their convictions continually forming and strengthening in the line of what I may call the great centripetal forces which in this country, in Australasia, in all the dependencies and colonies of Great Britain are tending to marshal the outlying dependencies of the Empire around the common centre of power and life. And if Canada is to become, as it must become, one member, and a very important member, of that great unity, it is well that in addition to the other sacrifices we have made, the other moneys we have spent to make Canada a strong part of the Empire, who should also make proper provision for the equipment of our militia for the defence of our country, a provision which, while it is not open to the charge of extravagance, will certainly go so far as is reasonable to meet the demands of adequacy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you prepared to state how much ?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at present.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman should state to the House, on the occasion of his Budget speech, how much is required.

Mr. FOSTER. That will be stated before long.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Budget debate closes, I hope. We ought to know it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman certainly will know it, and the Government will take the House into its confidence in due time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The House should know it when the hon. gentleman is stating the expenditures of the country and the amount of the debt.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not at all follow. It has been the habit ever since this was a Parliament to bring down Supplementary Estimates, and the same will take place this year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And a very bad habit, too.

Mr. FOSTER. Passing away from this subject, I think I am justified, after the short review I have made of the finances of the past year, in saying that the trying period of 1890 and 1895 has passed. The returns for the last six months of the current year show an increase in imports of $2,500,000, of exports $500,000, making a betterment of $3,000,000 in the half-year. The increase of revenue, as I have stated, amounts to $1,500,000, and the savings of the people in 1895 as compared with 1894, show an increase of $10,500,000. I do not think I can enforce my view as to the fact of the improvement of trade in the country and the fact that we are passing out of the period of depression more effectively than by reading an extract which I cut from the report of the president of the Board of Trade of Toronto, one of the chief commercial metropolises of Canada. Its president, in his annual address to that board, made use of the following words :—

The year 1895 has been for the most part a year of quiet recovery from the depression of 1893-94. The restoration of trade has not been quick, but has gradually been getting better. Raw materials, which had fallen during 1894 to the lowest point known for many years, have risen considerably. Manufacturers in most branches of trade are fairly well occupied with orders, and the public returns indicate that the country is slowly, yet surely, getting over the long depression that for the last few years has overshadowed every commercial interest. What is particularly wanted now is confidence in the future of our country, and belief in its natural great resources, and determination to develop every legitimate industry to the fullest possible extent.

How has the country passed through this period from 1890-91 to 1894-95 ? It has been a period of world-wide commercial depression, a depression which has affected this country as it has other countries, but to my mind, in far less degree, and for certain very good reasons. We have come through this period with a trade $9,500,000 greater in exports and home consumption imports than that with which we entered it, with exports $17,000,000 larger than in 1890. We have come through with an increased debt of $16,000,000, a deficit of $1,600,000 net, while at the same time, as I have stated already, we have given a customs reduction on raw sugar alone amounting to over $19,000,000. Our savings in that period have increased from $221,000,000 to $267,000,000, an increase of $46,000,000, or 21 per cent, a notable and encouraging increase. We have come through that period as few other countries in the world have come, with increased railway traffic. The operated mileage has increased by 2,700 miles, the passengers carried by 1,100,000; freight carried shows an increase of 750,000 tons, whilst gross earnings—a notable fact—in 1894-95 were equal to what they were in 1890-91. We have come through with increased shipping returns. The tonnage of vessels coming in and out of our ports, not including coasting vessels, has increased in that period by 640,000 tons, and the coasting vessels by 2,700,000 tons. We have come through with our industries well maintained, with employment very general, and with an almost total lack of what you might call want and poverty in this country from one ocean to the other.

Have not our industries been well maintained? Let us take one of the most patent proofs that they have been, namely, the importation of raw materials, which form the basis for the work of our industries:

IMPORTS.—RAW MATERIALS.

Article.	1890.	1895.
Wool Lbs.	8,905,261	7,750,050
Cotton	36,635,187	56,924,286

Lumber, &c..... $	897,903	1,485,714
Raw sugar..... Lbs.	162,469,350	345,518,582

The lumber mentioned above is of foreign product, and is used in the making of furniture and cabinet work of all kinds.

Therefore, so far as the argument from the imports of raw material goes, my contention is justified that the industries of this country have been well maintained. Sir, I may go further and state that not only have these industries been well maintained, as is shown by the imports of raw material for the use in manufacturing, but there is another test, namely, the export of manufactured articles. The time has gone by when people can point the finger of scorn at the exports of the manufactures of Canada. Small they are, even yet, compared with some of our exports, but they are every year increasing, and to-day they form no inconsiderable amount of the general exports of the country. The export is as follows:—

Export of manufactured articles.....	$5,741,184	$7,768,875

Mr. FOSTER.

This shows an increase of 35 per cent. That is the second argument which goes to show that our industries have been well maintained in this period. We can go a little further, Sir, and we can point to the old industries which have been well kept up, and that is within the experience and observation of every man who sits around these boards. We can also point to the establishment of new industries; one lately in the city of Hamilton, at the foot of Lake Ontario, an industry for the smelting and manufacture of iron and of steel, and which to-day, after it has expended $400,000 on buildings and plant, has a capacity for making 200 tons of iron per day, and is now about to turn out one-half this quantity, and to turn it all out from Canadian ore, mined in this country, and handled in this country, by Canadian labour.

In British Columbia there has been a decided advance in mining work of all kinds, and a large and remunerative industry is already established there, the prospects for the enlargement of which are most excellent. And the time is not far distant when British Columbia, from the mountains on this side, to the Pacific Ocean, will be a busy hive of industry so far as the working of minerals and metals is concerned.

The pig iron which has been made in this country in the period from 1891 to 1895 is 193,000 tons, as against 137,000 tons manufactured in the preceding five years, which is a large and notable increase.

Passing from these to the agricultural interests of the country, it is not affirming too much, Sir, to say that from 1891 to 1895, these have shown a gradual, a continued, and a healthy advance. The home market has been constantly increasing. The increase in population itself from 1890 to 1895 has added to that home market. The increase of urban population which gathers in cities, and towns, and villages, and largely gathers there from the establishment in these places of industrial establishments of different kinds, has largely increased. And, Sir, every thousand of the urban population is so much of the healthiest and best increase to the markets of the farmers of this country, for it affords a market near to them for products which would not carry to foreign markets, many of which are perishable in their nature, and for which a home market is absolutely essential.

But, Sir, if the home market for agricultural products has increased in that time, so also has the foreign market, as shown by the exports of the country. Agricultural and animal products, taken together, were exported to the amount of, in 1890, $37,000,000, and in 1895, to the amount of $50,000,000, an increase in this period of $13,000,000, or of 35 per cent. Let me exemplify by the exports in certain articles, the increase in the agricultural exports of this country, comparing the year 1890 with the year 1895. The statement is as follows:—

EXPORTS.—AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Cheese	$ 9,372,212	$14,253,002
Bacon	607,495	3,546,107
Hams	23,584	260,502
Apples (green and dry).....	997,922	2,071,788
Wheat and flour.....	910,244	6,298,221
Horses	1,936,073	1,312,676
Sheep	1,274,347	1,624,587
Cattle	6,949,417	7,120,823
Total.....	$22,071,294	$36,487,801

Taking these items, they total in this way : $22,071,294 exported in 1890 ; $36,437,801 worth exported in 1895, an increase of 65 per cent.

There is a decrease in the value of horses exported in the latter period, but, considering the wonderful drop in the price of horses, and especially in that grade of horses which were so largely used on the street railways of large cities, before the substitution of electricity for horse-power ; it is a decrease which is not at all remarkable, and the decrease in the exports of that class of horses, has been met largely by an increase in the export of more profitable and valuable horses to the British market ; and the British market opens a chance for the extension of that trade in a good grade of horses, which is being taken advantage of, and which promises rich returns to the country.

But, Sir, not only has the farmers' market been increased by the home market from the accretion of population, and the foreign market by the extension of exports, but there is another point as well which must be taken into account. That is, the saving of market in this country for the farmer of this country, which was formerly exploited by the farmer of the United States. And the National Policy, by the reasonable protection given to agricultural and animal products, is to be credited for that gain of market to the farmer of this country. Let me give you some figures which will bear that out. In the year 1889-90, taking bacon hams, and shoulders, beef, mutton, pork and lard, there were imported for home consumption, 33,112,701 pounds. The duties were increased after that, and importations have steadily decreased, until in 1894-95, it reached the small amount of 6,335,842 pounds, or less than one-fifth of the preceding figures. In 1889-90 the value of these importations was $1,734,225. In 1894-95 that value had sunk to $401,638. In flour of wheat we imported, in 1889-90, 185,458 barrels. This has diminished, until 1894-95 sees an import of only 47,883 barrels. The following table shows the importations for each year :

IMPORTS OF MEAT ENTERED FOR HOME CONSUMPTION.

I think, therefore, that I have fairly made my statement good that the agricultural interests of this country have been continuously advancing in that period. Nor must we lose sight of this fact, that in those five years a very large extent of new territory has been opened up in the North-west for the production of grain and cattle and the products of cattle, which in 1894-95 reached a very large and very valuable total. It is calculated that in the province of Manitoba and in the North-west Territories the grain alone, reaped from fields which but a few years ago were almost unknown, amounted to close on 80 or 85 millions of bushels ; and this increase in that short time is but the earnest of a greater increase in the future. Once the basis of population and of production has been settled in that county, its accretions in the future will be larger and more rapid, and the increase of production will in ratio be greater. Better methods have also been followed in agricultural pursuits, and the establishment and introduction of these better methods is largely due to the increased governmental expenditure for the encouragement of agriculture in the North-west as well as in the other provinces of the Dominion. Experimental farms have been placed in different parts of the country ; and the information which has thus been disseminated by example and by the distribution of the results on those farms to the farming population in the different provinces has induced better methods of feeding, and has turned the attention of the farmers to more remunerative classes of products than those to which they had formerly devoted their attention.

In mining the same advance appears. In Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, in Quebec, in Ontario, in the North-west and Manitoba, and in British Columbia there has been an advance in mining operations, as regards both the precious metals and the useful metals, which has been noted and steady. One proof of this exists, aside from our observation and experience—that is, in the exports of the products of the mines. I find that in 1890 these amounted to $4,853,717 worth, and in 1895 to $6,983,227 worth, an increase of 43 per cent in that period of five years.

The business failures in the country have been reduced from $18,000,000 to $15,800,000 in the same period, the average amount of the failures per year during the period being $15,700,000 against $22,200,000 in the period from 1874 to 1878.

The banks and financial institutions of our country have been sound and steady and strong—so much so as to be matter of remark in other countries, which have pointed to the banking institutions and the currency system of Canada, and have noted the strength which their soundness has imparted to commercial life and business in this country during the period of depression which is now happily passing away.

It may be said also that the credit of Canada in the London market has remained unimpaired, and is to-day stronger than it was in 1890. Canada enjoys greater hope at home and greater prestige abroad.

Now, Sir, I desire for a few moments to speak with reference to an idea which is sedulously instilled into the minds of the people of the country, that the Liberal-Conservative party and policy have been responsible for an immense increase of taxation upon the people of this country. It is true that in 1879, when the National Policy was introduced at the command of the people, that command having been given by an immense majority at the polls, and when protection was adopted as the basis upon which the tariff was to be framed, the list of dutiable articles was enlarged, and the rate which was charged upon them was heightened. That was necessary. In proportion, however, as manufactories became established, and in proportion as the revenues of the country became buoyant, in the good times that followed, two things were done. Attention was had to the people of the country as the payers of the revenues of the country, and attention was also had to the reasonableness of the protection that ought to be given from year to year, as circumstances required, and I have this assertion to make : that notwithstanding what may be said as to the increase in the rate of taxation upon goods in 1879, notwithstanding all that may be said as to the high taxation which has prevailed from that time to this, any student of our tariff system, going to the records and studying them with a desire to get at the truth, will come to this conclusion, and cannot escape it ; that the Liberal-Conservative Government from 1880 to the present time has been sedulously careful of the interests of the people as far as taxation is concerned, and has upon the whole remitted an amount of taxation which cannot be credited to any Administration in similar times—certainly not in this country—and I doubt if it can be, in proportion to its population, in any other country in the world.

Now, Sir, I propose to make that good by facts and figures, so that the people, if they are told that they pay a certain tax on a certain line of goods, may know on what goods they have been relieved of taxation, and to what extent they have been relieved of taxation. In 1882, this Government found that tea and coffee were taxed, and taxed largely, and this was a taxation which no man could avoid who drank tea or coffee. It was a taxation upon articles which were not raised in this country, and consequently every cent of that taxation was paid directly by the people who consumed these articles. The same was true with reference to an article which goes into the manufacture of common articles used by the people everywhere—the article of tin. There was a duty upon that as well. In 1882 the Liberal-Conservative Government struck off entirely the duties upon tea, coffee and tin : and from that period until the present time there has thus been saved to the people on these articles alone the following amounts :

On tea	$11,034,039
On coffee.....	832,528
On tin.....	1,465,103
Total.....	$13,331,670

Every dollar of this amount has gone directly into the pockets of the great mass of the consumers in this country. In 1883 this Government struck off the duty upon bill stamps and the duty upon newspapers—upon bill stamps a tax that went into commercial transactions from the highest to the lowest, and upon newspapers a tax which was styled a tax on information for the people. Well, from 1883 up to date there have been saved to the people on bill stamps alone the sum of $3,267,388, on newspapers the sum of $613,864, or a total of $3,881,252 on these two items.

In 1887 an agitation was raised, which became successful, for taking the duty off anthracite coal, which was supposed, and which did bear heavily upon the western provinces. The duty of 50 cents per ton was taken off, and from that time up to 1895, inclusive, the amount of $6,044,355 was remitted to the consumers of anthracite coal. In 1890, besides other reductions in the tariff, there was a reduction of 10 per cent on common window glass, and 15 per cent on molasses, and on these two articles alone, articles of common consumption, there has been saved $521,755 to the people of this country.

In 1891 the duty on raw sugar was removed, and the duty on refined sugar was reduced, and from 1891 to 1895, inclusive, there was saved to the people, in the remission of taxation on raw and refined sugar, the sum of $19,851,995. And that saving was upon an article which goes into common and general consumption.

In 1894 a general reduction of the tariff was made all along the line.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought I should evoke one of these pleasant exclamations from my hon. friend, and I had hoped to provoke another from the leader of the Opposition. But perhaps he will favour me with it yet. For both these hon. gentlemen, not on one, but on many occasions, have taken upon themselves to inform the country that in 1894 the Minister of Finance came down with good intentions, proposed to reduce, considerably, the duties levied upon articles which entered into the consumption of the country, but that when he came before the House, the manufacturers scared him off, he ran his pencil through the reductions, and next to nothing was done at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Less than nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says less than nothing. His statement is just as extreme as usual. In that general reduction in 1894, it is estimated that $1,500,000 taxation was taken off the people. Now, if you add these amounts together, you will find that we have taken from the people an amount of taxation of $45,131,027.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. The sincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite, who profess very great desire to take away the burdens of the people, is evinced to-day by the laugh and the sneer with which they greet the statement that we have taken $45,000,000 in taxation from the people of this country, from 1882 to the present.

The following table will show at a glance the savings made, as I have stated :—

SAVING in Taxation caused by transferring Tea, Coffee, Anthracite Coal, Tin, Raw Sugar, Bill Stamps, from the Dutiable to the Free List, the carrying of Newspapers free from office of publication and by reducing the Duty on Tea and Coffee not imported direct, and on Molasses, Refined Sugar and Window Glass.

The customs revenue accrued in 1895 amounted to $17,887,267, which, per head of population, was $3.52. In 1875, hon. gentlemen opposite charged the people of this country, by their customs taxation, $3.95 per head. The average, as I said before, from 1874 to 1878, under hon. gentlemen opposite, was $3.44 per head, and as I have said to-day, the amount of customs taxation per head in 1894-95 was brought down to $3.52. Well, all this time the free goods of the country have been continually increased. Articles have been taken from the dutiable list and placed upon the free list until this comparison is afforded, that whereas in 1874, $47,000,000 worth of free goods were entered, and whereas, in 1879, under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, the free list had fallen to $23,000,000, a decrease of $24,000,000, we find that from 1880 to 1895 there was an increase of $26,500,000 in the free list. Sir, the fact is made perfectly clear by this one assertion, that in 1874, 38 per cent of the imports for home consumption were free, that in 1879 this had fallen to 30 per cent, whereas, in 1895, 42 per cent of the imports for home consumption were free.

Now I come to ask, and I am nearly at the conclusion of my speech, whether I was right or not—

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. FOSTER. An hon. gentleman to your left says "no" before I had finished the question. That is the way hon. gentlemen opposite judge with reference to the affairs of the country. They wish no argument, they listen to none. They have their preconceived opinions—and poor opinions the electors of Canada have told them they were, at four or five different elections. They need no argument, they require no information. But I want to ask the hon. leader of the Opposition, and my hon. friend opposite me (Sir Richard Cartwright)—the latter of whom said that in 1894 the reductions in the tariff were less than nothing, while the former declared that they were next to nothing—I want to ask them whether or not it is possible for them to revise their opinion. At least I now propose to put before the House statements which will place the matter clearly in the eyes of the country, so that the people may judge whether hon. gentlemen opposite or I have made the correct statement. I propose to submit a list of the articles on which reductions have been made, showing the extent of the reduction on each article, and this list extends over the whole range of imported goods. It is as follows:—

This list includes all the articles on which reductions have been made, and shows that there was an important and significant reduction. And hon. gentlemen must take into account this fact—that this reduction in tariff was made at a time when reduction of the tariff was accompanied with the greatest difficulties. It was made at a time when prices were lowering in the United States, in Belgium and in every great manufacturing country; not only when prices were lowering as quoted in the regular markets, but when hard times had made it necessary for manufacturers to sell, if they could get cash, even if they had to sell at cost or less than cost. Many and many a case occurred in which manufactured goods were held as collateral by the banks, and the manufacturers being unable to meet their obligations, the banks sold the collateral security for whatever they could get, in order to turn it into cash. It was in this period of depression, this period of strong competition, this period of slaughter prices, that we undertook the revision of the tariff. Taking all these things into consideration, the remarkable cut that was made in the tariff on these articles, going to the very verge of the extreme, shows that a great advantage was afforded to consumers in the remission of taxation and the consequent cheapening. I think I have disposed of the statement made by these two hon. gentlemen, that, though I proposed a reduction of the tariff, I did not carry it out. Now, Mr. Speaker, one further subject, one that may pertinently be discussed at this the last session of the term of the present Parliament, and it is this:—From 1878, when the people, by a large majority, gave their verdict for the change in the fiscal policy of this country, the Liberal-Conservative party and the Liberal-Conservative policy have dominated in this country and have moulded the administrations. Upon these seventeen years, the Liberal-Conservative policy is written. That record is before the country, upon that record they are quite willing to be judged. But, Sir, the Liberal-Conservative party wish to be judged upon their whole record, and not upon any particular part of it, administrative or otherwise, that any hon. gentleman may choose to pick out to suit his convenience. I do not fear, neither does the Liberal-Conservative party, that if that record is fairly and adequately looked at, the people of the country at the coming elections will not be exactly of the same mind that they were in 1878, in 1882, in 1887, and in 1891, and that they will not be in favour of the continuation of a reasonable policy of protection for this country. Sir, what has been the record of these seventeen years? A vigorous public policy has been carried on in this country in favour of improved facilities for internal communication, which have been pressed upon this Parliament, which have been acceded to by this Parliament, and which have been carried out in the country. The record of the Liberal-Conservative party embraces the building and completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway and of the many miles of railway, aided by subsidies more or less liberal, which have been spread over the country, in addition to our great trunk lines of railway. Not only, Sir, have these railroads been projected and built as a part of the Liberal-Conservative policy, and against the steady opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite, but in reference to the canals, and some parts of the canal system, the same fact appears. A vigorous public policy in connection with the canal system of this country, is within the record of the Liberal-Conservative party. Not only have they widened and deepened the old canals until they are now within two years of completion to a fourteen foot depth, from the great lakes to the city of Montreal, but they have taken that other step, of making this country entirely independent, so far as water communication on the great lakes is concerned, of any other people, and have built the great Sault Canal, a channel of communication which opens to us the remotest of the great lakes, without asking permission of any other people in the world. With regard to our railways and our canals, there has been a vigorous policy pursued; so there has been with reference to lines of communication external to this country. In regard to our steamship lines of communication, whenever our policy has been brought before this country, it has been met either with sneers, or with active opposition by hon. gentlemen opposite. Take the line to the West Indies and to South America, which, seven or eight years ago, was projected in this House, which received the assent of Parliament, and which was carried into execution. Every one knows with what opposition it was met by the leader of hon. gentlemen opposite, and by his party. What has taken place? Why, Sir, with reference to the West Indian trade, whereas, in 1887, our total trade was but $4,000,000, in 1895 our total trade with the West Indies amounts to $8,500,000, an increase of about 112 per cent in our trade with those islands in those few years. And to-day, Sir, the West Indies, in its aggregate of trade, takes the third place in the list of countries with which Canada is carrying on business. Every one knows the opposition which was met by the proposal to subsidize a line of steamers from the western coast to China and Japan, but it was carried out. It had in it that good feature, that sterling feature, of co-operation with the British government in the matter, and that line has been carried out successfully, trade has increased; and the average of the trade, during the last five years, with China and Japan, amounted to $2,800,000, whereas it was but a beggarly average of $623,000 from 1874-5 to 1879, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. Take, also, the line of communication with Australasia, a line which was put on some five years ago, a line which encountered the strongest opposition from hon. gentlemen opposite, but a line which has been successfully put in operation, and is to-day uniting the Australasian colonies and Canada hand in hand in mutual support of the service; and it is also doing this great thing, giving a successful and progressive increase of trade. But, Sir, out of it there has come something more valuable than this co-operation and communication; there came, as the natural result, an inter-colonial conference of delegates from the great colonies of Great Britain, held here in Ottawa two or three years ago; and as a result of their deliberations, as a result of their resolutions, as a result of the persistent and prudent way in which these have been brought to the attention of the British government, we have to-day something that should be noted and is remarkable—the British government itself proposing to ask the British taxpayer to put his hand into his pocket to the extent of £75,000 yearly, for ten years, to co-operate with Canada and Australia in building up a great line of steam communication from Sydney and Melbourne, in the far Pacific Ocean, across this continent, and over the Atlantic to Liverpool and the ports of Great Britain. But, Sir, in addition to that, the great scheme of a trans-Pacific cable has been discussed, has been presented to the British government, and has so far claimed the attention of the British government that the Colonial Secretary has asked for delegates from the Australasian colonies and from Canada, to meet in London to talk over the possibilities and prospects of achieving that great line of swift communication between Australasia, Canada and Great Britain. So, Sir, I say that in regard to steam communication, we have had a vigorous and consistent policy, and a policy which has not only succeeded in a business point of view, but it has, I contend, still more succeeded in awakening interest and sympathy in other colonies and in Great Britain, and which is drawing closer and closer together, on lines of mutually helpful enterprise, all the colonies, and Great Britain co-operating as one. In addition to this we have this year subsidized a most successful winter service between St. John and Liverpool, and have in contemplation the establishment of a direct ss. service between Canada and France.

Sir, I need not make an extended argument with reference to the establishment, and maintenance, and expansion of the industrial life of this country. That that industrial life has been established, and has expanded, we have proofs on every side.

Every one who has experience dating back to 1878, and who compares that period with 1895, knows the advance that Canada has made in her industrial life. I will not press that argument a single step further. I merely wish to call your attention to the result of ten years, as shown by the census of the Dominion of Canada :

That does not take in the increase that took place between 1879 and 1881, nor does it take in the increase that took place between 1891 and 1895, which is nearly a half decennial period. These figures may be laughed at by hon. gentlemen opposite. They are in the habit of taking part of the census that suits them and declaring it must be relied on, and then of taking another part which does not suit them and declaring it cannot be relied on. The same Government was in power when the censuses were taken, and if one part is reliable the other part we must suppose to be equally reliable. Hon. gentlemen are prone to make a point of looking over the census and finding some small knitting works, entered as a manufacturing industry to declare that no reliance can be placed on the enumeration. The whole argument is taken away when hon. gentlemen examine that portion of the census which groups industrial establishments with reference to their output. Five classes are given with respective output, viz., those under $2,000, those from $2,000 to $12,000, from $12,000 to $25,000, from $25,000 to $50,000, and those over $50,000. From an investigation of these five classes it will appear that the per cent of total output of the first class is exactly what it was in 1881, whilst the increase in the fifth or largest class is 14 per cent greater than that of the smallest class for the decennial period of 1881 and 1891. Alongside of that, put the other fact that the same system of enumerating establishments which was followed in the census of 1881 and 1871, was adopted in the census of 1891, the taking of the census in each case having been pursued upon the same plan. But if we are not to continue the same policy, I wish to ask myself and to ask this House the question, why should we change? Is there any reason why we should change? Is there any reason in the record of the past seventeen years why the fiscal policy of this country, which has resulted in such improvement and advance, should be changed for some other? No. Is there any reason to be found in the bases which have been laid down from time to time by hon. gentlemen opposite as tariff and trade lines on which they think this country should mould its policy and carry on its administration? Hon. gentlemen opposite are men of many political faiths so far as tariff is concerned, but they are men of no steady convictions so far as those same faiths are concerned. Hon. gentlemen opposite have put before this country during the last five years, several plans, several bases of operation. They have had Commercial Union, they have had Unrestricted Reciprocity, they have had Free trade as it was in England—all of these have been advocated and strongly advocated by my hon. friend who sits opposite me (Mr. Laurier), and by my hon. friend who leads the financial section of that side of the House, in so many strong, sturdy and plain English words; and if there was any doubt in regard to the position of the last mentioned gentlemen, he cleared away that doubt two days ago when he took occasion to reiterate his position by reading a letter written in 1891.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In 1892.

Mr. FOSTER. The political belief he held then, he reiterated as held by him now. One of his beliefs is this, that free trade with the United States is of greater moment to this country than free trade with all the rest of the world, with the United States left out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and no man knows better than my hon. friend that free trade with the United States of America is impossible without discriminating against the rest of the world, and he himself has stated it again and again. Everybody knows that the temper of the United States even under Democratic rule was far removed from free trade, and under Republican rule is still further removed from free trade. My hon. friend as the coming financier of a possible new government, if hon. gentlemen opposite should get into power, is determined, taking his last confession, to give to this country unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, though it involves discrimination against the mother country and every other country. I take that as the latest confession of the political faith of the hon. gentleman who is to be Finance Minister, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has stated, and who will rule and dominate the tariff policy of hon. gentlemen opposite if they got into power within the natural term of his life.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Instead of the Manufacturers' Association, as is the case with you.

Mr. FOSTER. I will use that statement before the country as a lesson which the people may ponder over in connection with the political faith, the political action and electoral action took place in 1891. Is there any reason why we should change our line of reasonable protection in order to adopt any of those facile political faiths which have been confessed from time to time by hon. gentlemen opposite? Is there any reason for a change to be found in the general circumstances of the world to-day? If in 1878 the people of this country thought that a reasonable protection was necessary to give them the vantage ground in competing with the world and building up and establishing industrial life in this country, is it any less necessary to-day? Is the competition less keen to-day than it was in 1878? Are the tariff lines of the various countries of the world lower to-day than in 1878? Is the tendency of the commercial countries of the world changed in the direction of freer trade and lower duties? No, Sir. They have changed and are changing in the direction of greater stringency and more prohibitive tariffs, and circumstances, if they have changed from 1878 to this time, are stronger to-day in the direction of making Canada keep, for the sake of her trade and business interests, to the line of reasonable protection, instead of taking the line of free trade or of partial free trade. Why, to-day, after the Democratic administration had lowered the duties to a small extent, but so far away from free trade that they enjoy a tariff with an average of 42 per cent on dutiable articles for home consumption in that country, when they had given Canada some little better footing in their market by lowering to some extent duties on agricultural products, what to-day has happened? A Republican majority in the House of Representatives has sent to the Senate a Bill which proposes to raise the rate of taxation on all those articles, and to raise them so as to be prohibitive as regards the introduction of the products of Canada into the United States. Is that a reason why we should change our line of policy? If in 1878 there was reason for the adoption of this policy, in 1895 there is greater reason that this policy should be continued, and we should hold to it in Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You say you have abandoned it. You claim you have taken off $6,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. No one is so foolish as to think that is an abandonment of the principle of protection. When the hon. gentleman goes to the country and wages political warfare against this party and the Government the last thing he will say is that we have abandoned protection. The first assertion and the only assertion he will make is, that we are hide bound protectionists, and that therefore we should be put out of office. But there is a line which I think it is possible, and I believe it is right that the statesmanship of this country as well as of Great Britain and other colonies of the Empire should consider and ponder carefully and well, and that is whether it is not possible for statesmanship in the colonies and Great Britain to bring about between the colonies as amongst themselves and between the colonies and Great Britain concurred action which will be conducive to the commercial interests of both, and which will result in greater power and strength. I read an article but a little time ago in the "Nineteenth Century Review," in which the general question which is agitating many thoughtful minds at the present day was raised and discussed, as to whether the Empire would be able to feed itself in the event of a war against Great Britain which would cut off her supplies from hostile nations. Feed itself! Why, Sir, if statesmanship is not able, practically to solve that question, statesmanship must find it impossible to solve any of the great questions, which from time to time present themselves for consideration. The Empire able to feed itself! Yes. This article showed that 100,000,000 bushels of wheat were necessary to England, other than what the colonies afforded her at the present time, in order to feed the people of the Empire there. One hundred millions bushels of wheat! Why, fifty thousand Canadian farmers with 100 acres each, in wheat, and raising twenty bushels to the acre, would produce the 100,000,000 of bushels of wheat needed by Great Britain. And, what is fifty thousand farmers cultivating five millions of acres, compared with the English farmers wanting employment and the numbers of millions of acres of good wheat land in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, which has not yet been scratched by the plough. Meats to the value of one hundred and forty millions of dollars would need to be supplied by the colonies, to make up for Great Britain's deficiency, supplied now from foreign countries. Well, cattle, and horses, and pigs in illimitable quantity could be raised in this country. And as to butter and cheese; fifty thousand farmers owning each fifty cows, amounting to 2,500,000 in numbers, would supply butter and cheese going far to meet the demands of Great Britain for such supplies. And, with the vast lands of the North-west, that is not an estimate which cannot be reached, if adequate means were taken to bring it about. So, Sir, I might go on to amplify this. The sugar which is necessary for the consumption of Great Britain could be supplied by the West Indies, and by the East Indies, with the cultivation of the cane lands which are now going out of use, and which by its diminution is impoverishing the planters and the labourers of the West Indies. That industry might again have its period of flourishing and its reward of remunerative production were concurrent action taken in Britain and the Islands. So, all the way through. It is a problem which only requires time and good statesmanship to solve. And, as I said before, it is for Canada, for Australia, for the other colonies of Great Britain and for Great Britain herself to ponder seriously and carefully; to consider whether or not, an arrangement cannot be come to which will make the Empire and its dependencies sufficient within themselves to feed the Empire, and by doing that add to the volume of business, and to a mutually remunerative production. And, Sir, the statesmanship which could formulate some such policy of mutually beneficial trade would achieve an end infinitely higher and more wide-reaching. It would evolve from the dark foreground of the not distant future, a national life of singular strength and beauty, in which Canadian Britain, and Australasian Britain, the Britain of Asia and Africa and of the Isles of the Sea, would group themselves in grand imperial unity; the old enriching the new, and the new imparting fresh strength to the old.—through whose world-wide realm the blood of a common commerce should mingle with the blood of a common patriotism, whose power would compel peace, and whose millions of happy people would march in the van of the fullest freedom and the highest civilization.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, in the course of the almost pathetic appeal for another lease of place, if not of power—for, to do the hon. gentleman justice, I think he, and his friends, too, fully realize that they are mere tools and agents of other and more formidable combinations behind them—slaves of the ring if not slaves of the lamp—I say that in the course of the almost pathetic appeal with which the hon. gentleman closed his speech, he put one question which I shall endeavour to answer. The hon. gentleman asked, almost with tears in his voice and his eyes: "Why make a change? Why turn us out? We are very comfortable as we are—can't you leave us alone?" Sir, there appears to me to be three reasons why a change is desirable, and I will briefly state them. First of all, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that every single, solitary promise which was made by hon. gentlemen opposite, or rather by their predecessors, to the people of Canada in 1878, has been utterly and signally falsified; in the second place, every prediction which was made by myself, by Mr. Mackenzie and by our colleagues on this side of the House in 1878, as to the inevitable results of turning our backs on an honest, wholesome revenue policy, and adopting the worn-out rags of the American system known as protection, has been fulfilled to the letter; and, in the third place, Sir, the fact of the matter is this, that the conduct and doings of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, notably since this House met this session, have contributed in an extreme degree to create such a profound distrust in the minds of the people at large—indeed, in the minds of their own supporters—that the general conviction is that any change must be for the better.

Now, Sir, with respect to the hon. gentleman's speech itself. To do the hon. gentleman justice, I am not disposed to criticise his speech too harshly. The hon. gentleman was skating over the thinnest of thin ice, and he knew it. This was not an occasion for a paean of exultation by any means. This was an occasion, Mr. Speaker, for exposing as little of his flank as possible to the enemy; and looking at the case he had, I am inclined to think, that the hon. gentleman, on the whole, conducted his retreat—for it amounted to that, although it was not to the lines of Torres Vedras or to any other place of strength—

Mr. FOSTER. No, they are occupied.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He conducted his retreat, Sir, with a reasonable amount of strategic skill. Sir, I remember once upon a time hearing an eminent professor of legerdemain—not of finance—declare that he never thought that he had mastered a card trick properly until he could play it so well as to cheat himself; and, listening to my hon. friend I began to think that he had repeated sundry of his sophistries so often that he had at last come to believe some of them himself. I may remind the hon. gentleman that one of the severest penalties which according to Holy Writ can be inflicted on any people is that they may suffer a strong delusion that they may believe a lie; and one might suppose that upon him and also upon some of his supporters that ultimate penalty—or perhaps I should say that penultimate—the ultimate will come later—has been inflicted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that there are more serious matters to deal with on this occasion. There is no doubt whatever that we are standing in Canada to-day at the parting of the ways; there is no doubt whatever that both political parties require to gird themselves for a very grave struggle indeed; and there is no doubt whatever—and there the hon. gentleman is right—that success on this side will be attended, not with revolution, but with a very substantial measure of reform, in which as a matter of course important interests, very important interests, will be considerably affected. Sir, to my mind the position of Canada to-day is of a very precarious character indeed. Although I have a great deal more faith in the resources of Canada than the hon. gentleman gives me credit for, I do not believe that we can continue for many years longer to stand the enormous drain in men and money to which we have been subjected for the past sixteen or seventeen years. Sir, the nearest analogy which I can find to the present position of Canada must be looked for on the other side of the sea; it must be looked for in the case of Ireland. I may recall to the hon. gentleman's mind, and to the minds of the other members of this House generally, a certain very remarkable statement made by an eminent Irish historian as to the effect on Ireland in the last century—and for that matter, up to the present hour—of the process of depletion of her best and bravest, very closely analogous indeed to that which has been going on for the past seventeen years in Canada. I shall make no apology whatever to the hon. gentleman for imitating his example, even if I have stated this before. Mr. Lecky was speaking of the effect of an exodus from Ireland, not one iota more important or greater in proportion than that which we have seen from Canada for many and many a year past. Speaking of the number of men who, having quitted Ireland, had distinguished themselves in other countries, he said:

These examples might easily be increased, but they are quite sufficient to show how large a proportion of the energy and ability of Ireland was employed in foreign lands, and how ruinous must have been the consequences at home. If, as there appears much reason to believe, there is such a thing as hereditary transmission of moral and intellectual qualities, the removal from a nation of tens of thousands of the ablest and most energetic of its citizens must inevitably, by a mere physical law, result in the degradation of the race. Nor is it necessary to fall back on any speculations of disputed science. In every community there exists a small minority of men whose abilities, high purpose, and energy of will, mark them out as in some degree leaders of men. These take the first steps in every public enterprise, counteract by their example the vicious elements of the population, set the current and form the standard of public opinion, and infuse a healthy moral vigour into their nation. In Ireland for three or four generations such men were steadily weeded out. Can we wonder that the standard of public spirit should have declined?

But not only were the healthiest elements driven away: corrupting influences of the most powerful kind infected those who remained.

Sir, strike out "Ireland" and put in "Canada," and you have a very true description of what has been going on here for the last seventeen years, and of one of the causes why we demand a change.

Then there is another analogy to Ireland which hon. gentlemen would do well to note. Sir, what, by unanimous consent of every historian worthy of the name—whether he be of English or Irish descent—was the most potent cause of all of Ireland's woes during the last two centuries? Sir, a ten times greater curse to Ireland, a ten times greater source of evil to Ireland, than even Cromwell's sword or Strongbow's, either, was that vile system of protection which, for the sake of propitiating a small number of English manufacturers, stamped out ruthlessly and crushed every attempt which the people of Ireland made to raise themselves in the scale of nations and humanity. Protection in former days was the curse of Ireland as it is to-day the curse of Canada. Now, I say to the hon. gentleman this, if he and his colleagues knew anything about political economy, they would know—it is a fact which cannot be gainsaid or disputed—that of all countries in the world at this moment, you could not, if you tried, select one more utterly unfit to try the experiment of protection in than this same Canada of ours. The reasons are very plain. They are physical and geographical reasons, which no man who looks at the map and who understands the nature and situation of Canada, can, for one moment, dispute. What is our position? Why, we occupy a portion of the northern half of the north temperate zone, stretching from sea to sea, inhabited by four or five communities, separated from each other by large tracts of barren territory, which can only be crossed at great expense to those who send goods from the one to the other. Take my own province of Ontario, take the province of Manitoba and the province of Quebec—what is our geographical position? Sir, we stand with our backs to the north pole, and I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman intends to open negotiations for trade relations with the Esquimaux, although they would be quite as profitable as some of those he has undertaken. If we choose to set our faces westward—although, as regards our friends in British Columbia, there might be some hope—we must send every ounce of goods to our friends westward over three thousand miles of railway and then seven thousand miles of sea. If we turn our eyes eastward, we find we have to send our goods perhaps twelve hundred miles to the sea, and then three thousand miles to meet the competition of every nation under the sun. If we want to trade with each other, we find ourselves separated by long tracts of country which we cannot colonize, or, at any rate, have failed to colonize up to the present. Under these circumstances, as every one knows, I am speaking the simple truth to-day when I say that the markets to the south of us, if we could get them, are worth to us all the rest of the markets of the world.

Now, I do not know what new discoveries may be made, nor does the hon. gentleman, but this I do know, that unless some new and startling discoveries in science are made, it is scarcely possible for Canada to hope to become a great manufacturing country, at any rate in the sense of being able to export any great quantity of her manufactures. I was not astonished, but amused, to hear the hon. gentleman, before dinner, launch into an eulogium of the extent to which the manufactures of Canada had grown during the past eight or ten years. Now, Sir, I have here a statement to which I call the attention of the hon. gentleman, contained in his own last Trade and Navigation Returns, of the total manufactured goods exported from Canada, and I want the attention of the House to this, too. Sir, the total amount of manufactured goods exported was correctly given by the hon. gentleman for the year 1895 at $7,768,000. The House will remember that he boasted that that showed a large increase over the exportations of the year 1894 or 1893. Sir, I have been at the trouble of analysing these exports, and what do I find? We exported manufactured goods, $7,768,000, and the first item was household goods of settlers, $1,000,000. These are included among our exports of $7,700,000. I give him all the credit of that. That, Sir, is due to the National Policy—far be it from me to dispute it. I find for the second item, wooden goods, $1,300,000. Does the hon. gentleman, will any hon. gentleman, deliberately rise and tell me, or the country, or the citizens of Ottawa—will the hon. gentleman tell the lumber kings of this region that the exportation of wooden goods from a country like Canada, with such natural facilities as it possesses, is due to its National Policy? Sir, I find another item in our exports, sole and upper leather, $1,270,000. I do not think that exportation is due to the National Policy at all. I know it existed in very large proportions previous to the National Policy. But I find another item of a rather curious character. I find that among our manufactured goods we exported, is included $325,000 of whisky. Here is a curious fact? The hon. gentleman gives an exportation of 116,000 gallons of whisky valued at $325,000. How did he or his friends who compile these books, get that value? That is a value of $2.50 for each gallon of whisky. Did he collect duty on it before it went out of this country?

Mr. FOSTER. It must be good whisky.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to see the hon. gentleman knows that much, but when did he hear before that it cost $3 a gallon to manufacture whisky? You exported 116,000 gallons of whisky, costing, unless my memory is at fault, perhaps $30,000 or $40,000 to make, and you put it down in your exports at a figure of $325,000. Well, it appears to me that that class of statement will bear a little explanation. But I have another thing to point out. I grant the hon. gentleman did increase our exports of cotton. They amounted to $546,000. I grant he did increase our export of agricultural implements—my hon. friend from Huron may take a note of it—to $663,000, on all of which, I presume, a huge drawback was given for the purpose of enabling these manufacturers to sell their implements to the inhabitants of Argentine or elsewhere, and at our expense—because that is what it amounts to—enable these people to obtain a cheaper agricultural implement than our farmers can, and thus more efficiently compete with our farmers. Musical instruments, $300,000. The long and short of the matter is that if you strike out this prodigiously high figure for whisky and the sole and upper leather and the wooden goods and household goods for settlers, you will find they account for $4,000,000 out of the $7,000,000. I will make the hon. gentleman a present of the sole and upper leather, but this follows, at any rate. We exported, in 1878, $4,127,000 worth, and there were no household goods among them.

Now, as I say, we strike out whisky and household effects, and the wooden wares, and the result is this, that from 1878 to 1895, we have not increased our total volume of exports one whit.

Mr. FOSTER. Strike off another million and you will have a decrease.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would be well entitled to, so far as any effect can be credited to the National Policy in the way of increasing exports. I would just like the hon. gentleman—and I will give him the floor now if he chooses—to point out to us how the National Policy—and it is for the credit of the National Policy that he took all the benefit of this increase of two or three millions—contributed to increase our exportation of wooden goods? It may, possibly, in the matter of whisky. There I bow to the hon. gentleman's superior knowledge. But, Sir, even if I gave him the benefit of the wooden-wares, the result would be that in 1878 we were exporting $1 per head, while in 1895 we were exporting $1.25 per head. So, the practical result of this is that, for the sake of increasing our exports 25 cents per head, we have been charged some $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 extra taxation. By the by, it may interest my hon. friends from the maritime provinces to know that in 1878 we sold ships to the value of $1,250,000, while in 1895 we sold ships to the amount of $172,000.

There is no doubt that there are in Canada a very fair proportion of what I call natural industries, industries which can thrive and would thrive, if only the Government would condescend to let them alone. Such industries are always beneficial, always useful, in a country; but, as for these pampered exotics on which the hon. gentleman has been expending the money of the people of Canada for so many years, either they prove utterly useless or they cost us a prodigious sum and give us an extremely small amount of benefit in return. Our policy is to let manufacturers of all classes have fair play. We desire to render justice to all, but to grant special privileges to none. That is the policy of the Liberal party. And I will add, for the information of the hon. gentleman, that I hold, and always have held, that his present tariff is most unjust to a great many classes of manufacturers. There is not a man in Canada who deals in iron in any shape who is not grossly oppressed by the hon. gentleman's tariff. The agricultural implement men are grossly oppressed by it; the stove men are greatly oppressed by it; those who manufacture tubes and other ware of that kind are grossly oppressed by it. The hon. gentleman and his friends inflict upon these classes of men a tax of 40, or 50, or 60, aye, in some cases, as high as 70 per cent upon certain portions of the raw material they use. What justice is there in that; what reason is there in that; what wisdom is there in that? But for the sake of pampering one or two establishments away down in Nova Scotia, these men, who employ ten hands for one that these Nova Scotia industries can employ in the iron industries, are put to extreme hardship and inconvenience. I repeat, Sir, the present tariff is grossly unjust to many manufacturers, and none would benefit more than these men would from a return to a natural, reasonable and healthy system.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would point out cases in which a tax of 70 per cent was levied.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have pointed it out again and again. There are several qualities of iron used by the agricultural implement makers on which—not, perhaps, by the way he calculates his duties, but in actual tax measured by the cost of the goods to the manufacturer—the protection is fully 70 or 80 per cent. No doubt, my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Paterson, Brant) will supply the details. I know I have given them more than once in other speeches on the subject. The hon. gentleman and his friends have attempted, time and again, to impress upon the people of Canada the idea that the Liberal party are the enemies of the manufacturers. Sir, I deny the accusation of the hon. gentleman: I hurl it back in his teeth. The manufacturers of the country, all of them that are worth their salt, prospered more under the tariff of 1878 than they have prospered under the extremely extortionate tariff that has been in force since. I know, every one knows, that, under our present conditions, a considerable customs tariff must still be exacted for the purpose of revenue. Sir, I have never gainsaid that; I have never denied it; I do not deny it now, nor will I allow the hon. gentleman to pretend that I entertain or have ever entertained any other opinion. But, as the hon. gentleman appears to be in glorious ignorance as to what the policy of the Liberal party is—we shift our base so often that he, this consistent, steadfast man and his consistent colleagues find it difficult to know where we stand—that I will take the liberty to read to him the policy of the Liberal party on the question of the tariff:

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but on the requirements of the public service:

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property.

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few:

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain—

—and let the hon. gentleman note it—

In these and in many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing justice to any class—

—manufacturing or other——will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people;

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government.

That it should be so adjusted as to make free or to bear as lightly as possible upon the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes; but they say that such changes must be based only on the principle of protection.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

—as was shown in Verchères, Antigonish, Jacques Cartier, Montreal Centre, West Huron and Charlevoix. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows, if he never knew before, what the platform of the Reform party is on the question of tariff reform. Let him lay it to heart and profit by it. To-night I propose to deal partly with the estimates and deficits, partly with the assertion made, though very gingerly, by the hon. gentleman, but still loudly made by his followers, that the tariff favours Great Britain; and also with the impudent assertion—and a most impudent assertion it is—that they have promoted general prosperity by their precious tariff. There are a great many other fallacies in the hon. gentleman's speech which I must defer for future consideration. I do not propose, at the moment, to follow him through the vast mass of figures in which he took refuge. And this for two reasons: first, I have learned to require that the hon. gentleman's figures should be verified before I accept them too implicitly, and, second, it seems to me that many of the figures do not bear out the deductions he drew from them. But, Sir, we will take the first. And here I pause for one moment to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the rather curious assertion he made, as it appears to me, as to the effect of some of his tariff changes. Sir, the people of Canada for a long time have been asking for relief from this tariff, the people of Canada for a long time have been asking that more practical economy should be introduced into the management of our public affairs. We have the hon. gentleman's answer in his estimates, we have the hon. gentleman's answer in his speech. His estimates show that, without taking into account a good many items that I alluded to, and without counting supplementaries, he wants $38,500,000, or thereabouts, for the service of next year. He went on to state—and I took his words down, though I am open to correction—that in his last revision of the tariff, he had reduced the taxation to the extent of a million and a half; and he went on, as the House will remember, with a very long list of so-called reductions, to which, when I get his speech, I will pay a little more particular attention. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the true effect and value of the hon. gentleman's reductions in the tariff. In 1895 we imported dutiable goods to the value of $58,557,000, on which we charged the public $17,887,000. Sir, if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to subdivide, he will find that the average of taxation, under his reduced tariff, mind you, amounted to 30·30 per cent. Now, we will go back to 1893, when they had an unregenerate and unreduced tariff. In that year the importation of dutiable goods amounted to $69,837,000, and on this we paid $21,161,000; so that the effect of an unregenerate and unreduced tariff was to charge the public on the dutiable goods they consumed, 30·3 per cent, while the reduced tariff gives 30·6 per cent. Sir, the hon. gentleman will find that this calculation, at any rate, will not require revision, and I commend it to the attention of his followers who are shouting about a reduction of a million and a half that the hon. gentleman has made. Now, I will not at present go into the hon. gentleman's statement as to the amount that he saved, or the amount of extra revenue to be got on this year's transactions, for this reason: the ten days' statement which he was good enough to give me, appears to be incorrect. In that ten days' statement, however, I observe three matters which go to show that the saving of a million in the expenditure was wholly imaginary. For instance, in it about $400,000 less interest was charged, up to the present date, than up to the corresponding date in 1895, although, as every one knows, our bill for interest is larger this year than it was last. Also, we spent $100,000 less for militia. This certainly is not going to be a permanent reduction. We spent $300,000 less for public works, which likewise is not a permanent reduction, as he very well knows. Sir, I am bound to say that, looking at the estimates which he submitted in 1895-96, it looks to me like a mere sham attempt at economy. He brought down estimates for 1895-96 amounting to $36,900,000. Well, if that was a permanent reduction, I would give him credit for it; but to-day we find estimates brought down amounting to $38,300,000, not taking into account any possible supplementary estimates, not taking into account any of those large sums which we may be called to pay if the hon. gentleman's glowing visions of subsidies to Australian lines, and subsidies to Australian cables, and subsidies to lines across the Atlantic for other purposes, take form and substance. Sir, adding the statutory liabilities for which the hon. gentleman has made provision, allowing for a very moderate amount of contingencies, and for the increased sum of interest which we will have to pay when we take into account various items that he has alluded to, although but gingerly, to-night, it is pretty clear that the people of Canada are now committed to an annual expenditure of very little short of $40,000,000 yearly, if at all short—$38,300,-

000 the hon. gentleman owns up to. And here let me say that I do not at all approve of part of his system of book-keeping by which a number of items are put to capital account that, in my judgment, ought to go to income. Sir, the hon. gentleman guesses that if he does better in the succeeding five and a half months than he has done in the preceding six and a half months, he may come out square. Well, I think we will sit here long enough to test those guesses, and therefore I do not propose to waste more time on them at present. But this is clear: After two heavy deficits, the best he can do is to express a dubious hope that per-adventure he may make both ends meet. Well, we will see. As to 1896-97, so far as I could hear, he hardly ventured a guess at all. He has added $1,300,000 to the estimated expenditure for 1895-96, and I did not hear him say how he expected that $1,300,000 to be made up. More additional income, I suppose; more guessing, and no provision. He tells us that he hopes for $37,000,000 of receipts for this year. Perhaps he may get it, perhaps he may not. But he comes down to us at the same time and he asks for $38,300,000, and for the other contingent liabilities I have alluded to, which amount to probably a million and a half more, the hon. gentleman makes no provision at all, he does not pretend to make a provision. Now, if we do no better in 1896-97 than we are doing in 1895-96, there is a deficit looming ahead for us, on his own showing. For my own part, I do not hesitate to tell him that I consider a yearly expenditure of $40,000,000, or $38,300,000, altogether too large for the present resources of Canada. I say it is a disgrace and a shame to the Government that have been entrusted with our affairs, that they come down to us and ask for an expenditure of $38,300,000 a year for federal purposes. Sir, the thing is utterly unjustifiable. I do not wholly blame the hon. gentleman for it, but the plain truth is this, that we cut our clothes some years ago on far too large a pattern. To-day Canada is one of the most overgoverned countries on the face of the earth. Canada requires at this present moment a most unduly large proportion of her citizens for the purpose of serving in her various Parliaments; and it would be a happy day for Canada if they were reduced to about one half their present number. The fact of the matter is that hon. gentlemen opposite have been discounting the future at a most tremendous rate, and now the bills have come back, and there are no assets wherewith to meet them. Sir, there is very little use on the part of hon. gentlemen whining over this matter. They ought to try and meet it, and the way to meet it is to reduce our present establishment, the way to meet it is to reduce your present extravagant mode of government, and to reduce your extravagant ideas. By the way, what were we told, aye, and told by a member of this Government, though he is not here now? We were told—the hon. gentleman knows it well—that we could build the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it would not cost us a penny. Why? Because, by the 1st of January, 1890, there would be $58,300,000 in cash, or securities, better than cash, quoth Sir Charles, in our treasury, ready to pay for the whole Canadian Pacific Railway, from the proceeds of land sales in the North-west. Sir, the hon. gentleman told us that he thought we would have in the North-west something like 85,000,000 bushels of grain of various kinds. What a paltry picayune set they are! Why, Sir, it is full ten years ago since Sir Charles Tupper promised us 640,000,000 bushels of wheat, and are we to be put off with a miserable 85,500,000 bushels, and half of them oats? Give us our good old Sir Charles. And, by the way, he has never been done justice to, because I was lately looking up his statement, and what he did tell us was that if he were a true prophet, we would have 3,000 million bushels, because, he said, the wheat belt was five times as large as the quantity that he named, and would produce the higher number of bushels. And all the hundred thousand iron workers—I cannot see them, I suppose they are still in the dim and distant future.

Speaking seriously on this matter, the plain truth is this: Everything we have done for a great many years has been based on the assumption that in 1895 we might reasonably expect—I am not going to say the expectation was wholly unreasonable at the time—to have 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 people in Canada, instead of the 5,000,000 we find here to-day. But we must to-day look these things in the face. We have not got ten millions or twelve millions, we have barely got five millions, and, accordingly, we must prepare ourselves to deal with the exigencies of the situation, not on the basis of a population of ten millions as likely to come to us in any reasonable space of time, but on the basis of a population of five millions. Here I come to another assertion very frequently made—I observe it has not been so frequently made to-night by the hon. gentleman—by the hon. gentleman's friends and supporters throughout the country. Sir, those gentlemen are fond of telling us that theirs is a purely loyal and British policy, and that their tariff favours England. Why, Sir, the thing is absurd on the face of it. If the tariff means anything and can do anything, what it means and what it can do is to keep manufactured goods out of Canada. Who are the chief producers of manufactured goods? England. Who are the manufacturers who can sell cheaply? Why, the manufacturers of England, and nobody else. But let us analyse the matter a little. Let us first analyse it with respect to the statement that we have grown so rapidly within the last period of seventeen years. I will take our imports And this point is worthy of the attention of our friends, because I know an idea has gone abroad that there has been a large proportionate increase. In 1868 our gross imports amounted to the value of $72,000,000; in 1878—and mind, I am taking our very worst year—they amounted to $91,199,000. Consequently, from 1868 to 1878, a period of ten years, our imports had increased $19,000,000. Sir, that is an increase of 27 per cent, or an increase amounting to 2 7-10 per annum during those ten years.

Mr. FOSTER. Some new provinces were added during that time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very possibly: that does not alter the situation. The new provinces, allow me to inform the hon. gentleman, did not add very materially to our importations. In 1895 our total imports were $105,000,000, being an increase of $24,000,000 in seventeen years, or 27 per cent. So that the total increase in the one period was at the rate of 2 7-10 per cent per annum, and in the other 1 6-10 per cent, a remarkable proof of the exceedingly rapid growth under hon. gentlemen opposite. As I said, I took 1878, which was the most unfavourable year. I had a right to take 1874 or 1875, or an average of the four or five years, were I to follow the fashion of the hon. gentleman. I will now take the grand totals of exports and imports and apply the same test. In 1868 the exports and imports were of the value of $131,027,000; in 1878 the value was $172,405,000; an increase of $41,500,000, being at the rate for the ten years of 30 per cent, or 3 per cent per annum for each of those ten years. In 1895 the total value of exports and imports was $224,420,000, an increase of $52,000,000 in seventeen years, equal to 30 per cent, or less than 2 per cent per annum. So while the increase under a protective policy was 1 3/4 per cent during a period of 17 years, the increase under a revenue tariff was 3 per cent, very nearly double; or to put it in other words, our rate of growth was 100 per cent greater under a revenue than under a protective tariff. We will now try the hon. gentleman's favourite per capita plan, and I will take the average from 1874 to 1878. The average during those five years was $195,000,000, or $51.25 per head of the population. Taking the hon. gentleman's own customs returns, the amount in 1895 was $44.25 per head, or $7 per head less compared with the average from 1874 to 1878. But that it was claimed showed great prosperity. I turn now to another subject, and I am afraid the hon. gentlemen's loyal hearts will sink into their boots when it is brought to their notice—I call attention to the increase in trade with Great Britain. Take the imports. We imported from Great Britain in 1874, goods to the value of $63,076,000; in 1895, we imported goods to the value of $31,131,000, considerably less than half. In 1878, our very worst year, we find the imports from Great Britain were of the value of $37,431,000, with a population of barely 1,000,000 as against $31,000,000 in 1895, with a population of 5,000,000. That is the way hon. gentlemen opposite have developed and extended our trade with Great Britain. We may sell Great Britain more goods, we buy from Great Britain a great deal less.

But we have increases in certain directions. In 1878 our imports from the United States were of the value of $48,631,000, and in 1895 of the value of $54,630,000. So if we diminished our imports from Great Britain we increased our imports, though not quite to the same extent, from the United States.

There are several deductions which I make the hon. Minister of Finance a present of. First, I point out, and I have proved it, that, having reference to our population per capita there has been absolutely no growth in our general trade, but the reverse. In the next place, I point out to him that there has been a most enormous reduction in our imports of British goods. Taking it per capita, it amounts to this, that in 1878 we imported from Great Britain, goods to the value of very nearly $10 per head, not quite; and in 1895 our imports were of the value of $6 per head. If you go back to 1874 we imported goods to the value of $17 per head from Great Britain, as against $6 in 1895, from the same country. I have pointed out the increase in imports from the United States, and I pointed out the other night, and I repeat the statement for the information of the hon. gentleman, that not only has an enormous reduction in goods imported from Great Britain occurred, but, as a matter of fact, the taxation we levy on British goods is nearly 100 per cent, on the average, greater than taxation on American goods. I trust we shall hear no more for some time of the extent to which the tariff fosters trade with Great Britain.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman do me the favour to mention the amounts of imports from Great Britain in 1873, and also in 1870 or 1878?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes. In 1873 the value of the imports was $68,000,000; in 1878, $37,000,000, and last year, $31,000,000. Now, Sir, I have gone at some length into this matter, and for good reason. I have found extraordinary ignorance among a great many supporters of hon. gentlemen to the effect of the present tariff, and a very remarkable illustration was brought to my notice recently.

Sir, a gentleman who has been long in the service of the Conservative party, but who has now deserted them for the Patrons, came to a friend of mine to obtain some information and pointers. In the course of the conversation, it turned out that this gentleman who was a local luminary of distinction, and had taken the stump even for

hon. gentlemen opposite, was under the impression—and very much astonished he was to be informed of the contrary—that all British goods were admitted into Canada free of duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a literal fact, and I no longer wondered after hearing that, that the hon. gentlemen opposite had been able to yet retain some measure of confidence on the part of a certain number of their supporters.

Mr. COCHRANE. That man must have been reading the Grit newspapers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I asked him the question, and like a great many other honest Conservatives, I found that his habit was never to look at a Grit newspaper, and never to go to a meeting where any Grit speaker had a chance of addressing the audience. Consequently, he remained in that blissful ignorance as to the dealings with British goods of that most loyal Government opposite. He was, I believe, a true sample of a very great number of the supporters of my hon. friend opposite.

Now, Sir, I shall not,—because I do not want to trespass to-night too long upon the patience of the House—I shall not at this moment go into the minute analysis which I had intended, of certain statements made by the Secretary of State recently, with respect to the condition of the country in 1878, and its present prosperity. I shall reserve that for a little. But, I want to call the attention of the House to this, and I want to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this. Hon. gentlemen may say what they please, hon. gentlemen may take up what position they like as to the census, but one thing at least they do know, and that is this: that the census shows, as no other document ever did, that all over Canada to-day, the rate of increase has fallen to something less than half of that which prevails in other countries similarly situated. That has occurred, under what circumstances? It has occurred in a country which every man knows is able to support in peace and prosperity, fifty millions, or perhaps one hundred millions of people. It has occurred in a country, which as everybody knows, contains huge tracts of territory up to the present moment absolutely untouched by the plough. Sir, I think I may well ask, how comes it; if these hon. gentlemen opposite have produced an era of universal and unexampled prosperity as the Finance Minister has frequently stated; how comes it to pass, if everything is as we desire it to be, that of every seven immigrants who come to this country, six desert us and take up their abode in another land. How comes it to pass, I ask, that it is the case to-day, that over a whole province you find that the population is absolutely at a standstill. How comes it to pass, that over innumerable districts in the province of Ontario—not to speak of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—the rural population are diminishing and decreasing day by day. I would like to hear my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) endorse the statement which was made by the Finance Minister recently, as to the unexampled prosperity of the city of Toronto at present, and if he will not, perhaps I may afford a little light on that subject by and by. Sir, I will just put this one question to the Finance Minister, a question at least as pertinent as that with which he concluded his remarks. I ask: If, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, and as I say, and have said over and over again; if the resources of Canada are great; if the soil of Canada is good taken as a whole; if Canada contains within its bounds ample room, and space, and verge, to maintain, perhaps, one hundred millions of people in peace and prosperity; if the climate is good and the people are intelligent, why is it that these things come about? Sir, I say the answer is clear. If the soil is good, and the people are good, and the climate is good, Canada must be afflicted with an unexampled bad government, and an unexampled bad policy, to produce this result. The reason is this: Is it because the people of Canada have been for years and years running after financial and economical will-o-the-wisps, and it is because they deserted the dictates of common sense and reasonable political economy, that they find themselves in the position in which they are to-day. There is, Sir, ground for believing, that the people of Canada, as a whole, are alive to the situation, and before I conclude the remarks I intend to make on this occasion, I believe I shall be able to prove to hon. gentlemen opposite that they have even better reason than I have already given for entertaining that opinion. Now, Sir, I propose to imitate the English precedent. I have always felt it was treating the Finance Minister with a sort of disrespect, not to wait until I had his speech fully reported and in my hand, before I proceeded to deal with the great mass of figures which it contains. Therefore, I propose to move the adjournment of the debate, and when I get the hon. gentleman's figures, then I propose to deal with them. I think I shall be able, if not to show him, at least to show a good number of those who sit behind him, that whatever else his figures did or did not prove, they certainly did not prove the conclusions he drew from them.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be convenient at this time to settle the question as to procedure. We have heretofore been in the habit of going on with the debate on the Budget de die in diem. Last year when I made the proposal there was an objection for a day or two, and then we went on from day to day. I suppose hon. gentlemen have no disinclination to proceed with this debate consecutively until it is concluded?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not yet surely. Why, we have not a single Bill forward yet, and then, there is my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who has a motion of supreme importance which cannot be dispensed with.

Mr. FOSTER. That is already arranged for Wednesday. If we cannot agree on it now, I shall give notice in the regular course that we do go on de die in diem.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman takes me a little by surprise with this proposal. I have no objection to confer with him at a later period, but I cannot agree to it at this moment.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, DRUGS, ETC.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 10) further to amend the Act respecting the Adulteration of Food, Drugs and Agricultural Fertilizers.—(Mr. Sproule).

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not had an opportunity of looking over this Bill, but I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that it had better be referred to one of our committees, such as the Banking and Commerce Committee. We pass Bills here sometimes without knowing much about them, although they affect matters of commerce, and should be carefully looked into.

Mr. FOSTER. It will have to be reprinted, and there will be time to look over it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Justice might look over the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Justice has looked over this.

Mr. INNES. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) should be adopted; and the provision of this Bill with reference to honey might very well be referred to the Dominion analyst. I am not an expert in matters of this kind, but I know that there is quite a difference of opinion with regard to the nature of honey produced from sugar. I have in my hand a pamphlet written by the Rev. W. F. Clarke, who has made a life-long study of bee-keeping, in which he strongly opposes this Bill. I believe that this Bill originated with the Bee-keepers' Association. At the same time, it has met with strong opposition, not only from the Rev. Mr. Clarke, but from others as well; and for the information of the House, I will read a few extracts from letters that were published by him on this subject in the "Mail" newspaper last year. He says:

ABSURD LEGISLATION.

The Anti-Sugar Honey Bill.

Abortive attempts have been made during the past two sessions of the Dominion Parliament to pass a Bill prohibiting the manufacture of honey from sugar-syrup. Recent researches in the science of chemistry have proved that the nectar of flowers and the saccharine quality of a pure commercial sugar, such as that known in the market as the best granulated, are one and the same. The best granulated sugar has been largely fed of late years to bees not sufficiently provided with honey stores for winter, and it has been accidentally discovered that this quality of sugar is converted by the bees into a honey which cannot be distinguished by experts from the best grades of floral honey. No sooner was this discovery made public than a hue and a cry arose among ignorant, unscientific, narrow-minded bee-keepers against what they alleged to be threatened adulteration of honey. The parties who have been at work to promote the passage of this Bill declare that they are "determined to prevent adulteration." It would be well for them to show first wherein the alleged adulteration consists. Chemistry asserts that there is none. It affirms that the nectar of flowers and the saccharine quality of pure commercial sugar are one and the same. So little is known by the community in general of the nature of bees and honey that it is not strange the House of Commons should have passed the Bill in question last session, when it was found to be lobbied by the bee-keepers. It was, however, thrown out by the Senate. Unfortunately, our Parliaments have too often passed Acts in the interest of monopolists and combines rather than for the good of the general public. The anti-sugar honey bill is one of this class.

Then he states, in succinct form, the objections to the passing of this Bill, and I think that the Government should pause before giving it their assent. Certainly because it may seriously interfere with an industry which is steadily growing throughout the country, and which the Government, I understand, have concluded to encourage and foster still more. He sums up his objections to the passage of this Bill as follows:—

1. Because the proposed Bill interferes improperly with the liberty of the subject. It is outside of the proper function of legislation, which is supposed to give freedom of action to every citizen within such limits as are consistent with the rights of others, and the general good.
2. The manufacture of honey from a pure article of commercial sugar is a legitimate business with which a legislature has no right to interfere. There is no fraud about it, and no adulteration. It is not proposed to sell sugar-honey as white clover, linden, or any other kind of honey. Those who favour it are perfectly willing to have it conspicuously labelled and sold as "sugar-honey." Will any man who pretends to know anything about political economy assert that there is any wrong here to be prohibited by law?
3. The fact pointed out by me, in my first article, that bees have the function of transmitting indigestible cane sugar into digestible grape sugar, is a strong argument against the Bill. Her is a great possible good to humanity, which this Bill seeks to forbid. I showed that in the belief of many physiologists, indigestion, kidney trouble, diabetes, and even Bright's disease, were traceable to the vast consumption of an indigestible and poisonous kind of sugar. Is it not in the interest of the human family that an injurious article of food should be changed into a kind that is wholesome?

4. Another objection to the Bill is that it is unnecessary, and all needless legislation is an impertinence and a nuisance. Even granted that sugar-honey is an inferior, second rate kind of honey; so is buckwheat, but it is not proposed to have an anti-buckwheat honey Bill. I find some people think I spoke too disparagingly of buckwheat honey in my first communication. All right, I am not asking a Bill to make its production and consumption illegal. I do not think much of Limberger cheese, but I am not seeking a law to prohibit its manufacture and use. Honey is able to take care of itself in the world of trade and commerce. Dealers and customers can discriminate its various grades.

I think that before the Government allow a Bill like this to pass, they ought at least to get the opinion of their own analyst with respect to the merits of the two kinds of honey, and it seems to me it would be very foolish to pass a Bill of this kind without having particular knowledge on the subject, even though it has been advocated by a few bee-keepers, because I am satisfied it would do an injury to an industry we are all inclined to encourage. The communication of the Rev. Mr. Clarke, a gentleman who has made a life study of the business, ought to have due weight, and the Bill should be allowed to stand over until next session.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to say a word or two with regard to that communication from the Rev. Mr. Clarke. It might be assumed that so far as Mr. Clarke's knowledge went, it was absolutely correct, and that he took the trouble to ascertain that the statements he makes are perfectly well founded. Well, he has made the statement that this Bill was hurried through this House last year and thrown out by the Senate. I need hardly tell the House that this is absolutely incorrect, and that it must stamp the whole communication as likely to be equally unreliable.

Mr. INNES. That was a mistake.

Mr. SPROULE. If the whole communication is filled with such mistakes, one can easily understand what little value there is to be attached to it. With regard to his statement that it is impossible to tell the difference between this so-called sugar-honey and pure honey, I have the authority of the Government analyst for saying that there is no trouble whatever in distinguishing by chemical analysis the difference between honey made in this way and pure honey. And as one who knows something about chemistry and has given a little attention to the subject, I fully agree in the statement that there is no difficulty whatever in telling the difference. There are several other statements in this communication which I might refute, but it is not my intention to take them up one by one, although they are equally as unreliable as the one I have referred to. As regards the Rev. Mr. Clarke being an expert in bee-keeping, no doubt he is, but twice during the last few years the foul brood inspector of Ontario was compelled to go into this gentleman's yard and burn his bees because they were not kept in proper condition. It seems to me that this ought to stamp him as not being an expert of a very high order.

Mr. INNES. It does not say anything against his contention here.

Mr. SPROULE. It indicates that he is not an apiarist of as high order as he ought to have been or this would not have happened. As regards his statement concerning cane-sugar being converted into digestible grape sugar by the bees, every medical man knows that it is not a fact that cane-sugar is indigestible. The fluids of the stomach and the saliva mix with it and cause it to digest as rapidly as most other kinds of food taken into the stomach. As regards the opposition to the Bill, it comes from, I believe, only three men in Canada. One of them is Mr. Clarke and the other two I could name, if necessary, but it is not necessary to do so to-night. The unanimity of opinion is such that I have only heard of three bee-keepers in Canada who oppose the passage of this Bill. All the rest, as far as I am informed, are in its favour. They think it does not go as far as they desire; but this draft is submitted on the advice and consent of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) as one that would be acceptable and answer the purpose. I am quite sure that when the Bill is reprinted, and this House goes over it carefully, they will be satisfied that there is nothing objectionable in it, but that it is a valuable measure for the purposes intended.

Mr. INNES. I think the Government should pay as much deference to the opinions of those opposed to the Bill as those in its favour. If the Government are not themselves able to determine regarding the merits of the Bill—whether this kind of honey should be inderdicted or not—they ought to get the opinion of some competent person, and hold over the Bill until that opinion is obtained. Some expert should be consulted with regard to the matter. The bee-keepers themselves being divided in opinion, who is to judge which opinion is right?

Mr. SPROULE. The great weight of opinion appears to be on the one side. We have adopted the same principle in other matters. We punish the adulteration of food in the same way. When the adulteration is not injurious to health, we inflict a lighter penalty than when it is injurious, and this Bill is exactly on the same lines.

Mr. INNES. This particular kind of honey has not been proved injurious to health. That is simply your assertion.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not contending that it is. I am contending that it is an adulteration.

Mr. INNES. I do not think so. It is simply the conversion of one kind of food into another kind, which has not yet been proved to be deleterious to humanity.

Mr. CASEY. If I had not thought that the principle of the Bill was not fully established by the second reading, I should have said something before with regard to it. I am quite satisfied that we did right in prohibiting the manufacture of oleomargarine, and I am quite satisfied that we would do equally right in prohibiting the manufacture of imitation honey. The question is not whether it is wholesome, but whether you are going to pay the price of honey for some preparation of sugar. But, Sir, there is another and possibly a larger question. I believe we ought to have and could have, a very large export trade in honey. But I am satisfied that the exportation of any considerable quantities of these imitations of honey would prevent the growth of this trade in honey. It was as much to protect the export trade as to prevent fraud upon the domestic consumer that we prevented the making of oleomargarine.

Mr. SPROULE. And filled cheese.

Mr. CASEY. And the same is true of imitation cheese, as my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) remarks. I do not see how an honest bee-keeper can object to this Bill. I do not know who they are who are said to object to it; but it does seem to me that if one could know who objected to a Bill to prevent the adulteration of honey or the manufacture of imitation honey, it would be a warning to one to buy his honey elsewhere. I do not wish to attack anybody, and I do not know who they are who raise this objection, but these are my opinions.

Mr. INNES. I would have objected on the second reading, Mr. Chairman, but I was not in the House at the time. I understood from the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that he would not bring up the Bill without letting me know. I was absent in Montreal when the Bill was read a second time, or I would have objected then.

Mr. McNEILL. It cannot attach great weight to the objections that have been urged against this measure. I have heard with great surprise the statement read by my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Innes) that it was impossible to distinguish between this bogus and the genuine honey. I think if the statement given by my hon. friend—I do not refer to his own statement but to that of some other person which he read—were true and that chemistry could not detect any difference, I should be inclined to say, so much the worse for chemistry. I am quite sure that every one who is in the habit of using honey knows that there is a great deal of difference in the value and flavour of natural honey. Some kinds of honey are worth more than others and some are better than others, the flavour being finer. Therefore the statement that honey made from sugar cannot be distinguished from other honey would lead to this, that all honey must be of the same flavour, which, we know, is not the case. What has been said by my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey) is a very important consideration—that if we allow bogus honey to be manufactured in this country, we shall bring all our honey into disfavour. I hold that we ought to guard very jealously the reputation of all our natural products—I mean that class of products that we succeed in raising on our farms. This honey industry has already become important and is capable of very great expansion. But it needs the same protection we have endeavoured to give other similar industries, that of preventing the substitution of the bogus for the real article. I would really hope that my hon. friend (Mr. Innes) would withdraw his objection to this measure. I have not heard a single argument that, in my opinion, ought to cause this committee to do other than pass this Bill. It seems to me, from every point of view, a most valuable measure, and one that we ought to place upon the statute-book as quickly as possible.

Mr. INNES. The hon. gentleman's argument with reference to the fact that chemistry is unable to distinguish between this sugar-honey and the other seems to me a very strange one. I am just as anxious as the hon. gentleman is to keep down any product that is of a bogus character. But the mere fact that there is a difference in flavour does not indicate, necessarily, any difference in the essential qualities of the two articles. You have a number of different flavours of honey, according to the kind of flower from which it is extracted. But the question is this:—It has not been determined yet that this kind of honey is of a deleterious character, that it is not equally as wholesome as the other kinds of honey. That being so, I think the Government should hesitate before passing this Bill, for this legislation is of a sumptuary character. This kind of honey has been purchased for years and this is the only time that any objection has been raised.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend will see that this is not a question as to whether this product is deleterious or not. My hon. friend who has charge of the Bill has stated so distinctly that the statement on which the hon. gentleman bases his objection that chemistry cannot distinguish between these two products—has been disproved, that there is really nothing left in the objection that I can see.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that, as the amendment, which has been given in writing, has not really been before the House, the committee should rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, and that, in the meantime, the Bill be reprinted as it is proposed to amend it. Then the House will be seized of the amendment. As it is now, only those gathered around the table can understand the scope of the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. I am quite satisfied that that should be done. I had not expected that the Bill would come up or I would have had it reprinted and distributed.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Landerkin) asked :

How many Senators were appointed from the 4th of January to the 15th of January, both days inclusive, in the year 1896 ?

What is the name and post office address of each of them ?

How many other appointments were made to the public service during the same period ?

How many portfolios were vacant in the Cabinet when said appointments were made ?

Mr. FOSTER. 1. Three senators. 2. Hon. Michael Adams, Newcastle, N.B. ; Hon. J. C. Aikins, Toronto, Ont. ; Hon. Geo. B. Baker, Sweetburg, P.Q. 3. Twenty-eight appointments and six Ministers pro tem. 4. Five.

GOVERNMENT CHEESE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked :

1. What number of cheese have the Government in store at the present time ?
2. Why were the said cheeses not disposed of as manufactured ?
3. Why were they shipped to Montreal to be stored or otherwise disposed of ? Have they been sold ? If so, to whom, and price realized ?
4. If disposed of to Hudson Bros., why has this firm handled the entire product turned out under Government supervision ?

Mr. FOSTER. There are about eight hundred cheese in store in Prince Edward Island, under the control of the Dairy Commissioner as trustee for the patrons of the dairy stations. Some of these are in store to meet the local trade on Prince Edward Island in the winter, and some, because they were not made or not cured, until navigation to Montreal closed in November. The risk of injury by frost renders it unsafe to ship cheese from Prince Edward Island until April. There are one hundred and twenty-four cheese at the dairy school at Kingston, Ont., and about sixty at Montreal and at the dairy school at St. Hyacinthe, Que. These will be sold as soon as they are cured and ready to ship. Cheese were shipped from Prince Edward Island to Montreal during the summer, because that route gave the cheapest and best facilities for marketing the cheese, storing them and shipping them to Great Britain. These cheese have been sold to Messrs. Hodgson Bros., Montreal, on terms which are to be kept private until the cheese are disposed of by them. Messrs. Hodgson Bros. have bought the cheese from the dairy stations in Prince Edward Island for the past three years, because they offered and paid higher prices than could be obtained from any other Canadian firm.

VOLUNTEERS OF 1837-38.

Mr. BOSTON asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to make any grant of money or land to the volunteers who served during the rebellion of 1837-38 ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not.

THE SHORTIS CASE.

Mr. YEO (for Mr. Rider) asked :

1. Whether the sentence of death pronounced on Valentine Shortis has been commuted into that of imprisonment for life, and when was the commutation made ?
2. Did the Minister of Justice make a recommendation to Council in the Shortis case ?
3. Was such recommendation in favour of the law taking its course, or what was the nature of the recommendation ?
4. Did the Council fail to deal with such recommendation ?

5. What was the nature of the memorandum made by the Department of Justice or the Government to His Excellency ?

Mr. DICKEY. The Address of this House to His Excellency will bring down all the information in reply to these questions that can be submitted to the House, and as they will be down very shortly I think it would be better it should not be answered in the fragmentary way, as is here suggested.

Mr. LAURIER. This week ?

Mr. DICKEY. I think so. In a couple of days, I hope.

RETURNS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Lauderkin) asked :

Is it true, as stated in the public press, that out of 106 returns ordered by this House in the session of 1895, only 42 have yet been brought down, leaving 64 returns not yet brought down ? If not, what are the correct figures ?

Mr. OUIMET. The number of returns voted by the House during session of 1895 was 107 ; and of these 77 were submitted, leaving 30 as yet unanswered.

COLLECTORSHIP OF STANSTEAD.

Mr. YEO (for Mr. Rider) asked :

Is the port of Stanstead, in the county of Stanstead, without a collector, and when did the vacancy occur ? What was the salary paid to the late collector ? Has the late collector been superannuated ? When, and at what yearly amount ? Is the Government aware that the continuance of such vacancy is causing serious inconvenience to business and anxiety to many of its friends ? Have there been any applications for the position, and how many ? Is it the intention of the Government to fill the vacancy at once ?

Mr. WOOD. The duties of the collector of customs at Stanstead are fulfilled by an acting collector. The collectorship became vacant on the superannuation of the late collector on 12th July, 1895. The late collector's salary was at the rate of $1,150 per annum, and his superannuation allowance is at the rate of $805 per annum. The Government is not aware that serious inconvenience is caused to business owing to the duties of the office being attended to by an acting collector, and no anxiety has been expressed. The acting collector has applied for the appointment. The question of an appointment is receiving consideration.

THEODORE BOUCHARD, OF QUEBEC.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Tarte) asked :

Whether there is a person named Théodore Bouchard in the employment of the Customs Department, or the collector of customs, at Quebec ? Are the Government aware that he went down and worked at the election which has just taken place, in the interest of the candidate Cimon, and that he declared that the Government would shut their eyes to the acts of smugglers who voted for the candidate Cimon ?

Do the Government know that Théodore Bouchard has been several times convicted of smuggling ?

Mr. WOOD. The answer to each of the three questions of the hon. member is, no.

PASPEBIAC HARBOUR OF REFUGE.

Mr. JONCAS asked :

Whether petitions have been presented to the Government asking for the construction of a harbour of refuge at Paspébiac, in the county of Bonaventure ?

If so, by whom were the said petitions signed ?

Mr. OUIMET. Two petitions have been received by the department, one in February, 1882, through Mr. Beauchesne, then M.P., signed by Rev. Cyprien Larrivée, Messrs. Charles Robin & Co., LeBoutillier Bros., the mayor and councillors of Paspébiac, and 184 others, asking for the construction of a public wharf at Paspébiac. Another petition was transmitted by Mr. Georges Romeril, agent for Messrs. Charles Robin & Co., on the 1st June, 1891, asking that necessary works be constructed at Paspébiac to make it a harbour of refuge. This petition was signed by Messrs. LeBoutillier Bros., Georges Romeril, Rev. Mr. Larrivée, and 113 others. Letters were subsequently received to the same effect from Mr. Romeril, on the 8th January, 28th November, and 26th December, 1894, and from Messrs. Robin, Colas & Co., on the 28th March, 1894.

FISHERY LAW AND ALIEN LABOUR LAW—NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CASEY asked :

1. What negotiations have taken place between the Government of Canada and that of the United States, in regard to the proposal of a reciprocal relaxation of the Canadian fishery laws and the United States alien labour law, in the Thousand Islands, or elsewhere on the St. Lawrence ?

2. Who was appointed to represent Canada in these negotiations, and what is the present state of the negotiations ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No negotiations have taken place between the Government of Canada and that of the United States, in regard to the proposal of a reciprocal relaxation of the Canadian fishery laws and the United States alien labour law in the Thousand Islands, or elsewhere on the St. Lawrence.

PURCHASE OF PADLOCKS FOR THE MAIL SACKS.

Mr. GUAY (Translation) (for Mr. Tarte) asked :

Whether the Post Office Department has purchased padlocks of a new pattern for the mail sacks ? If so, from whom were they purchased, and what was the amount paid ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) The amounts paid are as follows : October, 1894, $825 ; June, 1895, $700 ; July, 1895, $770 ; August, 1895, $1,330 ; November, 1895, $700 ; December, 1895, $1,401.40 ; total, $5,726.40. Those padlocks were manufactured by Mr. George Low, of Ottawa, from October, 1894 to December, 1895, and the sums of money just mentioned were paid.

PURCHASE OF PADLOCKS FOR THE MAIL SACKS WITHIN THE LAST SIX MONTHS.

Mr. GUAY (Translation) (for Mr. Tarte) asked :

Whether the Government have, within the last six months, renewed the padlocks used for fastening the mail sacks ? If so, from whom were the new padlocks purchased, and what was the outlay caused by the change ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) In reply to the question put by the hon. gentleman, I may say that the Government, of late, have changed the copper padlocks for steel padlocks. The reason why the change was made is that the latter are looked upon as less expensive and better adapted to the mail service. Within the last six months, fifty-two of these padlocks were renewed by the department, and the work was done by the manufacturer at his own expense, from a contract entered into with him.

REPAIRS TO THE WHARF AT ST. LAURENT.

Mr. GUAY (Translation) (for Mr. Tarte) asked :

What was the price, per hundred, paid for the deals used in repairing the wharf at St. Laurent last summer ? Where were they purchased ; what is the name of the seller, and how much was paid for carriage ?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) The materials used for these repairs were deals 12 feet long by 3 inches thick and 9 inches wide, at the cost of 20 cents each. Those deals were purchased from Ovide Philion, of St. Laurent, Island of Orleans. There was nothing paid for carriage.

EXTENSION OF THE WHARF AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. GUAY (Translation) (for Mr. Tarte) asked :

Whether, since last session, the Government called for tenders for the work of extending the wharf at Rimouski, and the making of a basin at that place ?

Are the works estimated at $100,000 ?

What are the names of the parties tendering, and the amounts of their several tenders ?

Have contracts been signed, and if so, what are the names of the contractors ?

Who prepared the plans and specifications ?

When are the works to be commenced ; when are they to be completed, and what sums have been voted by Parliament for the said works ?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) The Government, since last session, have called for tenders for certain public works at Rimouski. No contract has yet been signed. I cannot now give the names of the parties tendering, which cannot be made known until the contract has been let. The plans and specifications have been prepared by the engineer-in-chief of the Department of Public Works and the works are estimated at over $100,000.

SCAB IN SHEEP.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Whether the Government is taking steps to guard against the introduction of scab from the United States into the flocks of the North-west Territories ?

2. Whether the quarantine of sixty days will be imposed upon all importations of sheep from the United States into the North-west Territories ?

3. Whether quarantine grounds for the keeping of bands quarantined, will be set apart at suitable points along the international boundary ?

4. Whether the course suggested is not necessary to secure the British market for our North-west sheep ranchers ?

Mr. FOSTER. 1. The Government has been and is taking, it believes, all necessary steps to guard the North-west Territories from sheep scab. 2. A quarantine of 60 days is unnecessary against sheep scab. All sheep affected with it are prohibited from entering. 3. The Government has properly isolated and well guarded grounds at all the important trails between Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains. 4. It is believed the measures taken are ample for the protection of the North-west, but Prof. McEachren, in accordance with instructions from the department is taking the matter up afresh with a view to a still more perfect system if such be found possible.

DUTY ON AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

On the Order,

Mr. DAVIN :

That, in the opinion of this House, the duty on agricultural implements should be removed.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, six o'clock arrived the other day when I was proposing this motion. I had argued that from a strictly protective standpoint the course suggested by the motion should be taken. I find, Sir, that one of the public prints—in fact, one of the two greatest papers in Canada, a paper which certainly, for some years now, has been singularly fair—the Toronto "Globe"—commenting on the position I took up, seemed to think that I was in the gall of politico-economic ignorance and in the bonds of trade iniquity. But if we could have the names of the writers of the anonymous articles that appear in the public journals appended to those articles, we should be able to appraise the value that should be attached to the politico-economic judgments of the writers. Nothing is easier than to state dogmatically that a speaker or a writer on those subjects is mistaken. I may say here that connected with every tariff, whether such an one as exists in England, or, above all, such an one as exists in the United States or in Canada, in nearly every item propositions will be involved that it will require the greatest care and the greatest mental astuteness to properly judge. In regard to this very subject of implements, we have had from a man of undoubted honour in this House, a member of the Reform party, the assurance that implements are sent into Canada by McCormack invoiced at $80. If that be the case, we may fairly assume that the 645 binders sent into Manitoba, which are appraised for duty at $95 each, were amongst the number that were invoiced at $80. If that be so, it is one of the instances which undoubtedly do occur in the incidence of a tariff where the manufacturing exporter to the country where there is a protective tariff pays the duty. In this case McCormack would pay $15 of the $19 duty on each of those 645 binders. I have no doubt whatever that there are cases where the duty is paid by the manufacturing exporter, and of course there are other cases in which the proposition would be simply absurd. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated my main reason for putting this motion on the paper. It is that, owing to circumstances which we need not enter into detail, we in the North-west Territories are now shut up entirely to the Massey-Harris Company. I may say for that company that its manager in the North-west Territories and the men subordinate to him are as a rule kind and considerate in their treatment of the farmers. There have been complaints to the contrary, but only individual complaints. But what is generally complained of is this, that the Massey-Harris Company now have a monopoly of the Territories ; and, although as a fact, as I am assured on good authority, they are selling binders as cheap as they are sold in Dakota, certainly as cheap, nevertheless it is an unpleasant thing to have a monopoly like that in existence. What we feel is that if we had competitors with the Massey-Harris Company in the Territories, even supposing the farmer would not get his implements at lower prices, better terms could be made than are made to-day. It is necessary that the legislature should exercise a strict surveillance over the transactions of this and every other company of the kind ; and, as I told the House the other day, we have passed an ordinance in the North-west Territories forbidding the farmer to mortgage his growing crop. That will be a protection to him. It is probably to be regretted that any of our citizens, especially any man occupying the responsible position of a farmer, should need this kind of paternal protection; but as a matter of fact, our farmers do need it, and I was very glad to see such legislation passed. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have brought this matter before the House; I have pressed it upon the attention of the Finance Minister; he has brought down his Budget, and nothing this year is done. I hope that next year my hon. friend may see his way to do in regard to these implements what he did in regard to other articles two years ago—revise the tariff, and consider whether the duties on them may not now be taken away or reduced. We had a vote on this a few years ago, and the House on division voted, not practically but literally, against my motion; and as there are some other motions of mine on the paper and no practical result can be gained by pressing this matter further, I shall not press the motion.

Motion dropped.

GRADING WHEAT.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

That a committee consisting of Hon. Mr. Prior, Messrs. McDonald (Assiniboia), Boyd, Martin, Sproule, McMullen and the mover be appointed to inquire into the present system of grading wheat in Manitoba and the North-west, and especially as to the frauds whereby, it is alleged, the farmers are cheated of what they are justly entitled to for their wheat. The committee to have power to send for persons and papers, and report from time to time.

He said: The motion that I have on the paper is one of the most important, in my opinion, that can be brought before the attention of the Government and the House. In making it, I quite feel that I ought to be in a position to put my finger on this and that case of fraud or presumable fraud; I feel that I ought to be able to give this and that case where fraud was alleged to have taken place; but I am not in that position, and for this reason, that it is almost impossible, without such an inquiry as I suggest here, to arrive at instances of the kind. But that there is a great grievance to be got rid of with regard to the grading of wheat, no man who lives in the Territories can have the least doubt. I will give you an instance of what has come before me. A farmer goes and sells his wheat in one town: it is considered to be of a certain grade, and he is offered a certain price for it. He hears later that in a neighbouring town, the same wheat is sold as of a higher grade. He goes there the following day, and for the same wheat he gets a better price—so much better as to make a difference of some 10 or 12 cents a bushel. Some farmers have told me that they have come into a given town and had the wheat rated as No. 2 or No. 1, as the case might be, and the following day they brought again the same kind of wheat, and the persons who rated it the previous day laughed at them, and said they would give nothing like the grade that was given yesterday, although the wheat was exactly the same, and there was no change in price. I consider there is a radical breach of the ground principle that we should rest on in grading wheat, in the fact that the buyers of wheat have something to say in it. I hold that the buyers of wheat should have nothing whatever to say in finding the grade, and two or three years ago a letter was published from Sir William VanHorne, who ought to be an authority, in which he said that it was wrong in principle that the buyer should have anything to do with the grading of wheat. I ask the Government to give me a committee in this matter. If we have a committee, I shall be able to show, by witnesses, that a very great grievance does exist. I know that there is the greatest possible discontent in the North-west Territories: I know that there is a strong feeling among the farmers that they are being swindled systematically in this matter. I may tell you that I have it on very good authority, whose name I am not permitted to give, but an authority that leaves no doubt whatever in my mind, that the farmers are being squeezed and injured, that they are being, to use the strong language of my authority, robbed. I have brought the grievance now before the House and the Government. The outcry with regard to it is so strong that I do not think that this House or Government can leave this matter any longer in its present position.

Mr. PRIOR. I have listened with interest to what the hon. gentleman has said on this question. The question is one, I am sorry to say, with which I am but imperfectly acquainted, having only just taken charge of the department, and having, so far, found it impossible to look thoroughly into this matter. No doubt, however, my hon. predecessor, the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood), will give to the House the benefit of his experience. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has stated that frauds are being committed on the farmers. All I can say is that, so far as I know, no such frauds as the hon. gentleman complains of have been reported to the Government. I can promise the hon. gentleman, however, that I will look thoroughly into the question, and if I find that any frauds are being perpetrated, I will see that such legislation be brought down as will prevent their recurrence.

Mr. WOOD. I may just say that my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has touched upon a question which has excited the widest controversy. The interests involved in his motion, simple as it may appear, are very widespread and diverse. The interests of the farmer have, of course, to be considered, and also the interests of the different boards of trade throughout the country. In fact, having regard to our export trade and to the importance of the commodity itself, we are bound to consider this question from a national and commercial standpoint. Now, so far as my experience went—and we had a good deal of discussion of this matter when I was at the head of the department now presided over by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat—the opinions among farmers in the North-west vary to a considerable extent. I may say to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that after he has gone into the subject as fully as I know he will—for it is a question that bears very closely upon the interests of those whom he so ably represents in this House—he will find that the farmers are not united on the subject of grading wheat. The illustration that he gave of a farmer selling a load of wheat at one town at a certain price as graded by the buyer, and finding afterwards that in a neighbouring town the wheat would be so graded as to bring another price, is, I must confess, to me scarcely comprehensible. The standard is fixed every year by the grain standard board at Winnipeg. The farmers are more largely represented upon that grain board than upon any other grain board in America. One of the first things I did when I took charge of the Department of Inland Revenue and had time to look into this question, was to enlarge the representation of farmers on the board, at the instance of Mr. Braithwaite, of Portage la Prairie, a gentleman who largely represents the interests of the Patrons and the farmers in that section. In other respects, the board was enlarged by the addition of farmers from various parts of Manitoba and the North-west; so that, so far as the particular interests represented by my hon. friend from Assiniboia are concerned, there can be no doubt that the action of the department in the past three years has been in the direction of enlarging the representation of that class upon the grain board. But the trouble that has arisen, I submit, is due not so much to the grading of the wheat as it is to the practice which prevails in the elevators in Port Arthur known as the mixing of grain. That is a very wide subject, and one which I should be quite willing to discuss with any gentleman when we have certain papers before the House, but which is entirely apart from the motion now before the House; and therefore I shall not go into it on this occasion, unless it is necessary. The frauds which the hon. gentleman seeks to remedy by this motion are something of which, as I stated before, we have no knowledge, the department has no knowledge. The practice between buyers and sellers cannot be regulated by any law passed by this Parliament beyond the simple grain standard which is made in September of every year by the board which meets in Winnipeg. If a farmer goes to a buyer, or a buyer to a farmer, with a view to the purchase and sale of wheat, there is one standard which is before them both, and the purchase can be made only in accordance with the standard which is before them. If that standard is not before them, it should be before them. If a buyer says to a farmer: I will not grade your wheat No. 1 hard because this wheat does not come up to that standard—it is for the farmer to say: It does come up to the standard, and if you will not take it as No. 1 hard, you cannot have it at all. It is a matter of bargain and sale, so far as concerns the case presented to-day by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia. If the hon. gentleman could present any case to this House or to me showing that the farmers of the North-west are actually defrauded under the present system, I am sure I should be glad to co-operate with my hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue in perfecting the machinery of the department so as to overcome the difficulty. The department and the Government surely have no interest in protecting the buyer or in protecting anyone, as against the interest of the other party to a bargain. The farmers especially are a class who ought to receive at least equal protection with others; but when you come down to a point of bargain and sale, no legislation can protect the farmer from being overreached.

Mr. MARTIN. I notice a very great difference between the utterance of the present Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior) and the gentleman who has just vacated that office (Mr. Wood). I understood the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue to promise my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that he would bring into this House legislation to cure the evils depicted and put an end to the frauds—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MARTIN. So I understood the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, I think I have fairly good ears, and I understood the hon. gentleman to state that very clearly. I understood him to say that he would be very glad, if these frauds were pointed out to him, to bring legislation into this House to cure the evil—

Mr. PRIOR. If there are frauds.

Mr. MARTIN. There are frauds; I do not think there can be any possible doubt about that. There always will be frauds, I fancy—

Mr. PRIOR. No, no.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not ask the hon. gentleman to take my word for it, but I think he might pay some attention to the declaration of his hon. supporter from West Assiniboia. I think it must be within the knowledge of every member of this House that purchasers of wheat, like purchasers of every other article, will take advantage of every opportunity—and no doubt they have had considerable opportunity in this wheat trade—to buy at a lower grade and a lower price than is just, and that I think may fairly be denominated fraud. But the hon. gentleman who has just left the office of Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Wood) has pointed out that this is an evil which it is almost impossible to cure by means of legislation. Parliament can provide what the grade shall be and take means to prevent frauds by the Government inspectors, but, as the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood) has pointed out, it would be a very uphill job indeed to make an Act of Parliament to prevent frauds of the kind referred to by the hon. member for West Assiniboia. The real remedy for evils of that kind is competition; and I think that at most points in Manitoba and the North-west we have very keen competition in the wheat business. For that very reason, I doubt, for my own part, that the frauds are very extensive. To my mind the real difficulty with regard to the question of wheat grading, as to which the hon. gentleman has moved for a committee, has not been touched upon either by himself or by either of the members of the Government who have spoken upon the question. On the basis of my present information, I am opposed to the present system of grading, which is what I understand, the hon. gentleman wishes to inquire into. I am opposed to the present system because the grading is done from year to year. I think the law is very much against the interests of the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west. It would be much preferable, in my opinion—and I should be glad to join the hon. member from Assiniboia in bringing before the attention of the House and the country evidence to that effect—that there should be one grade, an absolute grade, which should not vary from year to year. I shall endeavour, Mr. Speaker, briefly to show the House why I think that it would be in the interest of the farmer. Under the present Canadian system, the grades are, as explained by the Controller of Customs, made each year by a board which meets in Winnipeg, upon which board the farmers of the country are only slightly represented; I say slightly, because their number is very small, indeed, compared with the number of the opposite party, if I may so call them, the wheat buyers, who are represented upon that board. That board meets each year, generally in September, and settles the grade for that year. Now, Sir, I cannot understand why that should be necessary. It seems to me that we might adopt a law similar to the law that is in force in the United States, in the state of Minnesota, at any rate, where the circumstances are similar to our circumstances, where the wheat to be dealt with is the same kind of wheat that we grow in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. There they have an invariable grade for wheat, and I may say, a grade considerably less severe in its provisions, than the grades laid down by our Act of Parliament, and adopted year after year by the board at Winnipeg. Now, Sir, I will explain the reason why I think that these grades should be invariable, and the same argument applies to the sale of every natural product. Our market for the wheat of the North-west, is the foreign market; that, at any rate, is the place where the price is fixed. We grow in that country as fine a sample of wheat as is grown in any part of the world; in fact, with the exception of wheat grown in the American territory immediately adjoining our territory, there is not in any part of the world any wheat which can compare in value, for the purposes of making flour, with the wheat grown in Manitoba and the Territories. It is therefore of the utmost importance to that country that it should establish for itself a name in the markets of the old country, and the only way in which that name can, in my opinion, be firmly established, is by having an invariable grade, so that when a buyer in Liverpool buys Manitoba No. 1 hard, he knows, no matter what the season is, that he gets the same kind of wheat. The difficulty with the present system is that No. 1 Manitoba hard this year is a very different article indeed from No. 1 Manitoba hard last year, and different from what it may be next year. The only reason that I can see why the changes are made, is in the interest of the wheat buyer; I cannot see any possible advantage in varying the grade, except in the interest of the wheat buyer. The grades are made according to the quality of the crop as it is grown each year in that country. The grades are not made until the character of the crop is ascertained, and they are made from samples which are collected from all over Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Now, would it not be far better to have one grade Manitoba No. 1 hard, which should not vary from year to year, but which should get a name and a place for itself upon the Liverpool market, so that a buyer in Liverpool buying No. 1 Manitoba hard upon the certificate of the Government inspector at Fort William, or Winnipeg, or wherever else it might be graded, would know positively that that grade would have to correspond with certain definitions laid down in the Act of Parliament. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is my view of the question, and I believe also that it is the view of the great majority of the farmers of Manitoba and the Territories. I believe it is the view of those gentlemen who have acted from time to time upon the board as the farmers' re-representatives, when it met in Winnipeg. I have never yet heard a valid reason given in the interest of the farmers why the grade should vary year after year, although I have heard most cogent and logical reasons given for this variation, from the standpoint of the wheat purchaser. We have to remember, Mr. Speaker, that wheat is purchased in Manitoba and the Territories for a number of different purposes. It is purchased very largely, indeed, by the Ogilvie Company and the Lake of the Woods Company, the two large milling companies in that country, for the purpose of manufacturing into flour, either in Manitoba where they both have large mills, or in Keewatin, where the Lake of the Woods Company have a mill, or in Montreal where the Ogilvie Company have a mill. These two institutions have at different seasons entire control of the price of wheat in Manitoba and the Territories, and it does make a most material difference to these people what the particular grades may be in a particular year. Then we have also the ordinary wheat buyers who buy Manitoba wheat for two purposes, either to be shipped to Ontario, where it is largely used for the purpose of making a better class of flour than Ontario wheat alone, without mixture with Manitoba wheat, will make; and for the second purpose, of shipping it to the old country markets. The interests of these buyers for these different purposes, change from time to time with the condition of the wheat market, and they dominate almost entirely and control the board which meets in Winnipeg. With the representatives of the eastern millers who are sent up there, they come there understanding thoroughly the situation in that year, understanding the quantity of the crop that is likely to be produced in the country, understanding the quality of the crop as it is likely to turn out, understanding the state of the markets in the old country, understanding the state of the markets in the province of Ontario; and putting all these things together, they are enabled to judge what kinds of grades will be most to their interest. But so far as the farmer is concerned, the only kind of grade that can be in his interest is a grade which shall not vary from year to year, but which shall enable him to obtain that permanent place in the minds of the buyers in the old country which the product he raises in that province and in those Territories, should enable him to obtain. We hear much of the efforts that the Government are making with regard to butter and cheese; we have heard it said time and again in the House, how important it is with regard to these two articles, and also with regard to the articles of apples, and in fact everything that is sent to the old country, that the article itself shall come to have a permanent value, to have a permanent name, so that a buyer in the old country buying Canadian cheese of a certain brand, will know positively that he gets a certain article. So in regard to butter, and apples, and more than all other articles, because the amount of export is so very large and the product is of such vast importance to that particular portion of Canada of which I am speaking, it is of the utmost importance indeed with regard to wheat that the grade should be permanent and become well known to buyers. It is also important from the fact that the state of Minnesota, in which Duluth is situate, which is the great competing point for hard wheat with our country, has established a different rule, and a person buying wheat in Duluth, on Government certificate, knows that no matter what the yield may be or how much frost may have affected the crop in that particular year, when he buys No. 1 hard he obtains the particular article, an article that does not vary but each year contains so many pounds of hard wheat and a certain proportion of soft wheat with it. It is not so in Manitoba. If the frost is more prevalent in one year than in another, there is an inferior grade of hard wheat. The grade was very good last year and in 1894 and in 1893 when there was scarcely any frost, during which years the wheat was graded up so that our No. 1 hard was a very fine article; but in the years previous, when frost did serious damage, the grade of No. 1 hard was depressed. All these changes militate against the interests of the farmers, and while I am not prepared to use the word fraud with respect to these transactions, because I suppose it is fair for wheat buyers to take advantage of the laws of the country, so long as they are the laws, these varying grades of wheat, changing from year to year, enable the wheat buyers, with their superior knowledge of the conditions of the trade, to take an unfair advantage of the farmers. I understand the desire of the hon gentleman (Mr. Davin) who moved the motion is to elicit such information as to enable this House to legislate in the interests of the farmers. I am satisfied that so far as the interests of the farmers are concerned, the grades of wheat should be made permanent, not only as regards No. 1, but as regards No. 2 and No. 3, or any other grades that are considered desirable in the country. The hon. Controller of Customs has referred to the custom of mixing wheat, and I should like very much if the hon gentleman (Mr. Davin) will include in his motion the right to inquire into that subject, because it is one that touches most closely the matters to which I have referred, and it is one on which as the hon. gentleman has very properly stated, there has been a great deal of discussion and a wide difference of opinion, and I might add a great many changes on the part of the Government so far as regards its attitude on this particular question. In fact the Government has changed its position so much on this question that I am not at the present moment aware as to what the law is as regards the mixing of wheat. The hon. gentleman did not explain what is meant by the mixing of wheat. I will explain what it is. We are troubled very much in our province with smut, due largely to fault of the farmers themselves, because so far as my experience goes, I find, that where the farmers are careful with respect to their seed and obtain a proper change of seed from time to time, and are careful to have the seed properly pickled in blue vitriol, the chances of having smut in the crop are very small. But unfortunately many farmers do not take this precaution, and every year in that country we have a considerable portion of wheat with smut in it. It has been the practice for several years to send this smutted wheat to Fort William, where there is a hospital for wheat, where the smut is taken away, leaving it clear, and in the opinion of a great many people as sound as if the smut had not been in it. It has been the habit of the Government to allow a certain proportion of scoured wheat to be mixed with regular hard wheat. That is all wrong. If it be true that wheat after it has been scoured is as good as other wheat, then it is not to the disadvantage of the farmer who grows this wheat or to the wheat buyer who purchases it. Let there be, however, a grade, or if you please various grades, including wheat which has been subjected to that treatment, because if it be true that wheat is as good after it has been scoured as wheat that has not undergone that process when bought by millers and others, very well; but I am quite satisfied that it is not so good. The smut being in the wheat, it is utterly impossible even by the most improved methods to utterly eradicate the smut, and so when buyers mix it with other wheat the effect must be to lower the grade. If wheat which is in all respects No. 1 hard, weighing a certain number of pounds to the bushel, and in other respects being fully up to the standard, and if a certain proportion, however small, of scoured wheat is added, it must have the effect of depressing the whole grade, and fails to fulfill the requirement as regards the farmers, which is a permanent standard. The object of the farmers should be to have wheat of qualities which deserve to have a permanent reputation in the markets of the old world, and therefore both things are wrong; varying grades of hard wheat, which take from the value of the Government inspector's certificate, the shipments to the old country not being of the same standard in any particular year; and the other fact, of mixing scoured wheat with regular standard wheat. Both these changes are in the interests of the grain buyer and not the grain producer. I therefore ask the hon. member for Assinibola (Mr. Davin) whether he objects to adding to his motion these words, "and also as to the mixing of scoured wheat with the regular grades of wheat." If the hon. gentleman does not object, I move an amendment in these terms.

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is labouring under a misapprehension if he believes that the law allows scoured wheat to be mixed with No. 1 hard, because it does not.

Mr. MARTIN. It does not now, but I understood it did so at one time.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that it did so now, and therefore, if so, he was wrong.

Mr. MARTIN. It still can be mixed with No. 2 and No. 3 hard, and that is just as objectionable.

Mr. WOOD. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to object to the scoured wheat being put on the market and sold.

Mr. MARTIN. No, no. What I object to is: I say, let us have a separate grade for that, "Scoured No. 1," "Scoured No. 2," or "Scoured No. 3," but keep it away from the regular grades of hard wheat.

Mr. SPROULE. There may be some force in that contention, but the difficulty is, that if you have so many grades of wheat, people are much more liable to misunderstand them in making a comparison so as to know what grade their wheat belongs to. Last fall, when the representatives of the different boards of trade, and the grain-buyers, and the farmers, sat as a board to fix the standard, it was decided that scoured wheat might be mixed with No. 1 hard, and sold in that condition. On the other hand, it was contended that this mixed wheat could not be No. 1 hard, which should be wheat of the finest quality, that had come to its full development and perfect purity. It was held that No. 1 hard should have nothing mixed with it that could in any way deteriorate the quality of the flour. Any one who has had anything to do with wheat, or flour, or grain, knows that scoured wheat cannot be divested from all the smut. Even if you go to the extent of washing it, you cannot make it as perfect as is fully developed and pure wheat, which never had any smut.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a good reason for not mixing it.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) is correct in that, and for that very reason it was contended that it was a mistake to mix it. I confess that I am inclined to agree with that opinion. I think it was a mistake to mix it, because No. 1 hard is always supposed to be a pure wheat, and free from everything that could, in any degree, deteriorate it in quality, or the flour from which it is made. There might be some reason for establishing a grade of wheat known as scoured wheat, and I think there are some grounds why it would be wise to make such a grade. But, a great many think it would be unwise to do so, and perhaps, therefore, it is better to mix it with a second or third quality, than to mix it with the first quality. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) contends that the grade should be permanent, and not changed from year to year. At first sight that appears to be a reasonable proposition, but the hon. gentleman must remember that one year, as compared with another, will yield a poorer sample of wheat. In a given year, the first quality may turn out more flour of the finest kind and may be a harder sample of wheat than would be the same grade of wheat another year, so that the hon. gentleman will understand how difficult it is to make a permanent grade which will be applicable to a series of years. That fact is known to every miller. Some years, in Ontario, the wheat is so soft that you cannot grind it and turn out a really good quality of flour, unless you mix with it a very large proportion of Manitoba wheat. In drier seasons, the wheat is a great deal harder, and is therefore of an entirely different quality, and will turn out a better flour. Now, if you made a grade of wheat for a year when the quality is of the very best, that grade may be much ahead of the very best in the succeeding year. For that reason, it seems to me to be desirable that the standard should be fixed from year to year. I know of no means by which we can reach a standard that would be equally applicable one year to the other. The very purest and finest quality one year would be up to a certain standard, but perhaps the best wheat of the succeeding year or the year after would be below that standard. If you had wheat of the very best quality every year it would no doubt be desirable to have a permanent standard, but, under present circumstances, I think it would be practically impossible. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) says that at Duluth they have a permanent standard. It is true they have a state standard there, but it is equally true that a large percentage of the wheat is not bought on that standard at all. There are two classes of wheat-buyers at Duluth. There are the men who have their elevators, and who control the wheat in connection with the state standard or under state law; and then there are men with private elevators who buy wheat upon their own authority. There you have a difficulty again. One class try to keep within the bounds of the law, according to the state standard, and these men mix the different grades the same as they do in Canada, and mix them, perhaps, to a much greater extent, but the law there compels them when they mix a percentage of No. 1 hard and No. 2 hard, or any other grades, and it becomes a new sample, they are obliged to make known the percentage of each quality mixed, and they have to sell it by certificate stating that it contains, say, the actual per cent of No. 2 hard and No. 1 hard, or any other grades.

Mr. WOOD. That holds true of the public elevators in Duluth, but, mind you, a large quantity of the wheat is sold through the private elevators, exactly as it is in Port Arthur.

Mr. SPROULE. That is what I say. The elevators that are controlled by the state law do that, but, on the other hand, the larger proportion of the wheat is handled by private elevator companies, who make the law to suit themselves, and who do not come up to the state standard. Therefore, you are more at the mercy of them than you are at the mercy of the grain-buyers who buy the wheat under the state standard, and dispose of it under said standard. I can understand why the farmers of Manitoba have a grievance, but, as the late Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Wood) said, the grievance is, unfortunately, of such a nature that it is very difficult to legislate so as to protect the farmer against his enemy, the grain-buyer, because the avarice of human nature is such that every man who buys grain endeavours to buy it at as low a price as possible. A buyer may have in his office different qualities of grain, according to the fixed standard, which he can show the samples to any farmer who comes to sell his grain and tell him that his wheat is not up to the standard. The farmer may exercise his judgment as well as the buyer, and say: Oh, my grain is up to the standard No. 1 or No. 2, as the case may be, and I will not accept any lower price than the market value of that standard, and he can take it away if he likes. On the other hand, in some cases he is at the mercy of the buyer, where, for instance, there may be only one or two buyers in a locality, and perhaps one buyer's elevator is filled, and the other's is not, hence, he can purchase at his own figures. Again, the buyer may persuade the farmer that his grade of wheat is worse than the standard when, as a matter of fact, the best of the farmer's wheat may be fully up to the standard. The trouble, unfortunately, is that some farmers clean their wheat very badly, while others clean it well. The very same kind of wheat when it is properly cleaned may be graded as No. 1 hard, but if it is improperly cleaned, it may be graded lower. Sometimes, two men on adjoining farms bring in their wheat, and one who may have cleaned his wheat well gets the highest grade, while the neighbouring farmer who fails to clean his wheat, may only get a grade lower. The difficulty is, in many instances, attributable to the fact that one farmer takes better care of his wheat, and has it cleaned, than does the other. If it were possible for this House to enact any law which would secure in every case to the farmer his rights, and the fullest return for his wheat, I am sure the House would be glad to pass it. I do not see how any law which may be passed by this House, can, under such circumstances, protect the farmer from sometimes getting a lower price than he is entitled to. In addition to that, I notice that in Ontario, when we buy No. 1 hard, or No. 2 hard, we sometimes get a much better quality of No. 2 wheat at one time, than we do at another. It is sometimes much better cleaned, and when you grind it you can turn out a better quality of flour. Therefore, with all these gradings of wheat, and with the law regulating grading, there is no absolute security against imposition by those who handle wheat. Our millers in Ontario who buy wheat find that, from time to time, they may get a carload of wheat graded No. 1 hard, in one week, which is much superior to a consignment in another week, which is also graded No. 1 hard. You may buy both according to standard, and according to the sample you have with you, but you will find that the wheat represented or sold to you as the same grade of wheat, is not exactly the same quality in each case. Now, if any standard of grades could be made which would always secure the absolute quality of the wheat, it would be very desirable for us to adopt that standard, but I do not believe we have reached that perfection either in our grading or standard, or judgment, which would entitle us to believe that we can accomplish that. Therefore, I think no law will be likely to much improve the situation in the direction that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) aims at. If it could be done, it is desirable that it should be done. I for one can see no objection to the committee, because if we can get any additional light on the subject, which will enable us better to determine this very troublesome and vexed question, the sooner we can do it the better for all concerned. It may establish the impression among the farmers that they are getting what they are entitled to, and if we do nothing more than satisfy them that justice is being done to them, it will be a step in the right direction—in the direction of grading wheat to the different standards. I believe there is one defect in the grading of wheat at the present time. While it would be unwise to have too large a number of standards, I think we should have a larger number than we have at present; and then the law ought to be absolute and stringent—I am not sure that it is so now—with regard to the mixing of the different grades. When different grades of wheat are mixed, the certificate accompanying that wheat should honestly represent the percentage of each grade in the mixture. If this was done, a buyer in any part of Ontario or in any other part of the world can look up the values of the different standards and calculate in a few minutes exactly what the value of that wheat ought to be, so that he is not likely to be cheated or imposed upon when he buys it. At the present I do not think the law requires the certificate to represent the percentage of each quality of wheat in a carload, and therefore a person buying is likely to be imposed upon.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, if I may now speak to the amendment that is in your hands, I can assure hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this debate that, notwithstanding all they have urged, among the farmers, the millers, the buyers and all classes interested in this question, there is a very large divergence of opinion. If hon. gentlemen conversed with those men who have given the subject earnest thought for some years, they might have reason to change their views even on the subject of grading. There are two kinds of mixing involved in this whole question—the mixing of scoured wheat, and the more important question—one on which the discussion has taken place to-day—whether, owing to the fact that for No. 1 Manitoba hard the standard was so low that No. 2 could be graded up to it. The farmers contended, and with a good deal of justice, that if the standard of No. 1 Manitoba hard was fixed, as it ought to be, according to the best growth of every year, the buyer could not buy a quantity of No. 2 or an inferior quality and get it graded up to No. 1 standard. Let me briefly state what the practice was which gave rise to so much adverse criticism of the inspector and the buyers. Standard No. 1 was placed low to meet the views of some parties who made representations similar to those set forth to-day by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). Manitoba No. 1 hard was put at 60 pounds to the bushel, when, as a matter of fact, that particular year's growth, that is, last year's, weighed 64 pounds to the bushel. Not a single bushel of wheat was grown in Manitoba last year that would not weigh that. Three or four years ago the practice was to grade that, not at 64 pounds to the bushel, which would allow of a certain quantity of red Fyfe being mixed with it; but to put it down to 59 or 60 pounds. What was the result? The buyer, who the hon. member for Winnipeg says, cheats the farmer or gets the better of him, and who is the special object of the hon. gentleman's adverse criticism to-day, purchased, say, a cargo of No. 2 and a quantity of No. 1 hard, buying the latter at 60 pounds to the bushel, when as a matter of fact, it would weigh 63 or 64 pounds. What did he do? He took a quantity of No. 2 and mixed it with a quantity of No. 1, bringing the whole up to the existing standard of No. 1 Manitoba hard. The result was that the farmer was unquestionably deprived of some of the profits which he should have received from his labour. In consequence of that, the standard board, which met at Winnipeg last year, placed the standard of Manitoba No. 1 hard at 64 pounds to the bushel, based upon the actual results of the crop of that year. I confess, Sir, that that action at that time commended itself to my approval, because at the same time it was decided that there should be no mixing of wheat in No. 1 hard. So that this year, if the Manitoba farmer produces a crop of Manitoba hard, he sells it for what it is, the best of Manitoba's growth, and it goes forth to the markets of the world like Caesar's wife, above suspicion. That was my great object, when I was at the head of the department, and I believe that view met with the approval of the best minds that had given any attention to this subject. That is one branch of the case that has not been at all touched upon to-day. There are other branches of this discussion which I might go into; but I wish to refer more particularly to the question which the hon. member for Winnipeg raised, that is, the mixing of smutty wheat. The great trouble with many people is that they do not know what smutty wheat is. They either have not taken the pains to study the question, or they talk about what they are not as well informed upon as they ought to be. The smut ball, I am informed, is nothing more nor less than a sterilized, dwarfed grain of wheat, which, taken between the finger and the thumb, crumbles to an impalpable powder. When a portion of this wheat becomes mixed with good wheat, that powder gets into the crevices of the wheat grain and into the pollen at the end of the grain, and certainly discolours it; but I contend—and it is the view of every man to whom I have ever spoken on the subject, that when that wheat is cleaned and the discolouration is removed, it is just as sound as it ever was before. It has been claimed that this smutty wheat affects the quality of the flour ground from it. On that subject there is a great difference of opinion among millers. When I had the honour of being in Winnipeg a gentleman, a member of the deputation from the board of trade of Portage la Prairie, whom I had the pleasure of meeting, and with whom I discussed this subject, was the partner of the hon. member for Winnipeg, who urged upon me the necessity of not prohibiting the sale of smutty wheat, because the farmers of Manitoba must find a market for such damaged grain; and he was right, because they have found a market for it for years, and no one opposes its sale and use. Some years ago this smutty wheat was brought down to Ontario, and the Ontario millers used to clean it themselves. Machinery for that purpose, perhaps the most perfect in the world, now exists in Port Arthur. It is just as perfect as the machinery used at Duluth; so that this wheat is cleaned at Port Arthur, and does not come uncleaned into the province of Ontario. It is cleaned at Duluth and scoured at Duluth to a far greater extent than exists at Port Arthur. If we had undertaken, during the last season, to stop the practice of scouring wheat, we would have caused an immense loss to many of the poor farmers of Manitoba, whose crop was smutty, and who had nothing else to rely upon, whilst their neighbours across the line, in Dakota, found a ready market for their smutty wheat.

Mr. SPROULE. You would not stop that, but stop the practice of mixing scoured wheat with No. 1 hard.

Mr. WOOD. If you admit that the mere presence of a quantity of smut balls in a cargo does not destroy the character of the wheat, nor prevent it producing a quality of flour that can be used—

Mr. SPROULE. I do not admit it at all.

Mr. WOOD. I will give you the best authority that will convince you that, in the case I put, the wheat is not actually injured in the slightest degree. The whole subject is one that has been very carefully thought out by the department. Everything done has been done in the interests of the class most largely affected, and that is the farmers, and I would here point out that when the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) says that the farmers representation on the Corn Exchange is nothing in comparison with that of the buyer, he is wrong.

Mr. MARTIN. There are more grain men on the boards of trade than farmers.

Mr. WOOD. Are there? Let the hon. gentleman name the farmers, and he will find that there are more farmers than grain buyers. I say that the representation of the farmers on the Standards, a board which selects the standard to remain in operation for the year, is larger in number than the grain buyers. What the hon. gentleman evidently meant was that the farmers were outnumbered by the grain buyers and representatives from the Millers' Exchanges in Ontario and the boards of trade. I simply wish to correct him where he is wrong. The machinery has been in operation for some years, and I am sure my hon. friend the new Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior) will give the whole subject even better attention than I have given it, and that the matter will receive, as it has in the past, the earnest attention of the Government, with the aim and object of not alone benefiting one class over another, but of seeing that Manitoba's grain crop is sent out to the world to the best advantage. I believe that we grow in Manitoba the best wheat in the world. I believe we grow a better class of red wheat there, strange as it may appear, than is grown in the neighbouring state of Minnesota. Now, at Minnesota they have a very low grade for their No. 1, but that has been a subject of great complaint on the part of western farmers. It was one of the complaints brought out by what was known as the Populist Movement two years ago. They complained that the standard was too low, and justly so, because if you place standard No. 1 Manitoba hard too low you cannot prevent mixing. The inspector at Port Arthur has the standard simply before him as the wheat goes into the elevator. He has to see whether the character of the wheat will grade No. 1 hard according to that standard. This year he has to see that it weighs sixty-four pounds to the bushel and contains the necessary quantity of red Fyfe wheat.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not rise to discuss the technical matter which has been so fully discussed by hon. gentlemen on both sides and which has been so clearly explained by my hon. friend who has just sat down. I think sufficient has transpired to bear me out in this, that the department, under the control of my hon. friend the new Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood) has made very careful and thorough investigation into the whole subject. He made that investigation on the ground, in the North-west Territories and Manitoba, where the information is more readily obtainable than at a distance. He has also stated some of the difficulties which arise in the grading of wheat. Both he and my hon. friend who now has charge of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior), have declared that attention will still be given to this matter and that, if any further improvements can be made, they will be made, especially with reference to frauds alleged to be practised against the farmers. They have stated that if any information is given in that connection, the clue will be followed out and every endeavour made to prevent the recurrence of such frauds. I think this statement should be sufficient to induce the hon. gentleman who moved this motion to allow it to drop. There are some objections towards the granting of a committee. In the first place, a committee of this House is a long way off from the seat of operations. It would have to be entirely dependent for information upon what it could obtain in the way of written reports and oral evidence. The oral evidence would have to be brought from the North-west and Manitoba, and the distance and expense would make it necessary that a comparatively small number of witnesses be summoned before the committee. At the expense, therefore, of a great deal of money only partial information could be obtained. Of course the expense should not be a bar if corresponding benefit were sufficient compensation; but I think it will occur to my hon. friend that with the work which the department has already done, supplemented by the promise that it will follow the matter up still further, follow it up in the territory itself where the information will be close at hand and be more generally obtainable over a larger area, and where the investigation will probably be more effective than that of a special committee in this House, he might leave the matter in the hands of the department. This is particularly a part of departmental policy and administration, and it is a question how far this would carry us if these questions of departmental administration were to be handed over to committees of the House. It seems to me that the proper way is for the department to make its investigations, determine upon its methods of grading and the like, and then take the responsibility before the House. With these few considerations which may be taken into account, I would ask my hon. friend whether he would not think it better to leave this subject in the hands of the Government and department rather than press for a committee.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not expect that my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) will take any advice from me, but it seems to me that his motion is one which he ought to press and which ought to be adopted. This is not the first time he has had this subject before the House. It has come up repeatedly year by year.

Mr. WOOD. That is the first time it has come up in this shape. Last year the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) found fault with the salary paid the inspector at Port Arthur. I then assured him that the matter was receiving departmental attention, and that it was my intention to bring in an Act to alter that. We did bring in such an Act and we also took power—although the Prince Arthur and all other elevators are private ones—to have our officers go in and examine the books. Any discussion which then took place was upon that matter. This is the first time in my experience the question has come before the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Certainly, my hon. friend must remember as well as I do,—and I remember it very distinctly—that the subject of grading wheat has come before the House repeatedly, year after year. I do not remember the form of motion upon which the subject came before us last year, but I remember that the subject was debated and almost in the same manner as it has been to-day. If I remember well the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), who was then Minister of Inland Revenue, brought the matter before the attention of the House upon more than one occasion,—certainly upon one occasion. So I am quite within the mark when I say that this matter does not receive attention in Parliament for the first time to-day. For several years it has engaged the attention of business men all over the country. It cannot be disputed that the present regulations are not satisfactory to a very large number of people. I do not know whether they should be amended or not, but, undoubtedly, there is great difference of opinion among those interested in this trade at the present time. I think the hon. Commissioner would do well to allow my hon. friend from West Assinibola to have his committee and investigate the question. The only serious objection raised by the hon. Commissioner is that of expense. The hon. gentleman knows very well that the expenditure would be small; and, even if the expense were considerable, the question is of such vast importance that the country can well afford the expense. Undoubtedly witnesses would have to be brought from great distances; but I think most valuable information could be had from men living in this city or within comparatively short distance from it. The representatives of the trade in Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa should be heard, because some of the largest mills are located in those cities and some of the largest buyers have their headquarters there. For instance, Mr. Ogilvie's chief establishment is in Montreal. The Lake of the Woods Company also has its headquarters and its manager's office in that city. In Ottawa there are large firms engaged in this trade. The testimony of these men would be as important as that of men coming from the West. If we had this committee, we could have the opinions of both buyers and sellers of wheat, and, by that means, I think we should have the best means of arriving at a solution of this vexed question which has been so much discussed for so many years past. For my part, I shall support the motion for the appointment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIN. I have listened with much interest to the speeches that have been made by both sides in this debate. It is quite evident that the question I have brought before the House is one that demands our most serious consideration and the most serious consideration of the Government. A point was brought forward by my hon. friend the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood) which was referred to also by my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). As stated by my hon. friend the Controller of Customs, if you had a year when the No. 1 hard averaged 64 pounds, and, in that year, it was graded 59 or 60 pounds, the farmer would be overreached; and when there was a fixed grade and you had a yield of wheat that gave an average of 63 or 64 pounds for No. 1 hard, the farmer, as a matter of fact, was overreached. That subject has been discussed out west, and this idea was suggested as the best solution—that you should have a definite standard, and that, when you had a yield that exceeded that, the farmer should be paid extra for the wheat. Now, Sir, I am in this difficult position in regard to this matter. When these farmers came to me and complained bitterly of the present grading of wheat and the grading of wheat last year, they behaved as men frequently do who are not accustomed to do any business other than that by which they make their living—they told their story, but when I asked for samples of the wheat they were not forthcoming. Consequently, at first, I paid no attention whatever to the complaints. But the reason that I afterwards paid attention to the complaint and the reason that I have brought them to the attention of the House is that they became so general. Wherever I went I found these complaints, and I found farmers asseverating that they had had the very same wheat rated differently at places forty miles apart, so that sometimes they went considerable distances out of their way to sell their wheat rather than take it to the town that, having regard to the distance, they would naturally patronize. I quite feel the importance of this motion and the necessity there is for meeting this sense of grievance that obtains—a sense of grievance which, even if it were only such—if it were founded on nothing—it is necessary it should be met. But I feel my difficulty, that, if the committee were appointed, I ought to be in a position to hand to the chairman whoever he might be a list of witnesses who might be sent for and examined. But I am not in a position to do that. And it is not my fault that I am not in a position to do that, because, although so many complaints came to me, not a single one of those who made complaints could furnish a sample of the grain. There is another point in connection with this matter that I hope will be taken up by the Government, a point that the farmers of the North-west feel keenly. No. 1 hard is graded "Manitoba." Well, Sir, it is asserted by my constituents at Moose Jaw and around Regina—and I just give this as one of the circumstances that ought to be taken into account—that they produce a better grade of wheat than is produced in Manitoba, and they say that they suffer because they have to come under the Manitoba grading. In this and in other matters we feel that the shadow of Manitoba is over us, whereas, in population, we shall very soon be far more important than Manitoba, and, geographically and in the potentialities of varied interests we are far more important than Manitoba to-day. So that the relative position of Manitoba and the North-west Territories is a part of the question that will have to be considered. Mr. Speaker, having the assurance of the Government that they will inquire into the matter, and that they will seek to meet any grievances that exist, I will not press the motion. But I will say this, that next year, if these complaints are still made, I will myself, if spared—

An hon. MEMBER. Spared by the people.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I need not say by the people, the people will do the decent thing in my regard; I will say, if spared by Heaven, I will myself take pains, if these complaints are made, to individualize cases.

Let me say to my hon. friend who presides over the department, who has come to it so recently, but which, I am sure, he will manage with great energy and with satisfaction to the country, and with distinction to himself, that if he does what he says will be done, why, there will be no necessity for my bringing this motion before the House; but unless it be so dealt with, I shall certainly have to bring it before the House, and press it to a division next time.

Amendment (Mr. Martin) negatived.

Motion negatived on division.

BOUNTY FRAUDS.

Mr. BOWERS moved for :

Copy of all correspondence and petitions concerning bounty frauds in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, from the year 1890 to the present date, and of all correspondence between the Marine and Fisheries Department and its officers, and the parties accused of such frauds, and all others concerned.

He said : Mr. Speaker, In moving for this order, I desire to call the attention of the House, and of the Government to several cases of alleged bounty frauds, which took place in the county of Digby, and to the very unfair and harsh manner in which I consider they have been treated. A great many cases, I may say hundreds, if not thousands, have been brought to the notice of the department, in which thousands of dollars have been at stake, but in none of these, as far as I can ascertain, have the parties been prosecuted and persecuted as vigorously and as harshly as those alleged cases in the county which I have the honour to represent. In 1891 several parties made application to the fishery officer at Sandy Cove for bounty blanks, stating that they had fished the requisite number of days, and had caught sufficient fish to be entitled to bounty. It seems that previous to their making application, the fishery overseer or officer, Mr. Robert Bishop, had sent word to some of these men to come and fill out their blanks, and told them that they had a perfect right to the bounty, as the fish were deep-sea fish, and there were no regulations to the contrary. Now, through the connivance of the fishery officer, these men were led to believe that they were within their rights in making their applications, as he was intimately acquainted with each one of them, and was thoroughly cognizant of their manner and mode of fishing, of the fish caught, and of the time spent in fishing. They therefore went before him and filed their claims, he taking their depositions and placing the kind of fish and amount on their blanks, and forwarding said claims to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or to his superior officer. Now, I want the House to understand that I do not desire to impugn the motives of Mr. Bishop, or to cast the least reflection upon him, as I believe he was thoroughly conscientious in doing what he did, and in giving them the information that led them to make their claims, as was shown by he himself putting in a claim, and making a demand for bounty under similar circumstances. Later on, we will come to the judge's ruling in his case, Queen vs. Bishop. The facts were these : These men fished a trap or weir for some months in St. Mary's Bay, during the season of 1891, and caught a sufficient amount of deep-sea fish, mackerel, to warrant them in claiming a bounty. They also caught an amount of line fish, besides, but, as there were sufficient fish caught in weir, they, in filing their claims, said nothing about the line fish caught, and which omission probably cost them all this trouble. There was nothing in the regulations or Orders in Council of the department up to this time that would show they were wrong, and I have no doubt but that bounties had been paid to owners or fishers of traps previous to that time, and probably were paid to some that year, besides the accused. However, in the fall of 1891, somewhere between August and October, or about the time the parties were filing their claims, the Department of Fisheries ruled that bounties should not be given on fish caught in traps or weirs. At least, I have been so informed by an officer of the department, since my arrival this year at Ottawa. But such order or ruling I have never seen posted in any fishing place or village in the county, although the counsel for defendants acknowledged before the Exchequer Court in Halifax that decided the cases, that the same was posted at Sandy Cove. This the defendants, by private letter to me, deny, saying that they had no intention of defrauding the Government, and were not cognizant of so doing. About two or three years after these men had received their bounties, the Government commenced actions against them. How ? By first acquainting them that they had done wrong and were not entitled to bounty, stating reasons, &c., and asking them to return the money that they had mistakenly taken, and which, as honest men, they would only have been too glad to do. No, if my information is correct, the first intimation that they had of wrong-doing, was in the shape of writs served upon each one of them for fraud and perjury, by the sheriff of the county, and with it an enormous bill of costs. They were startled and well they might be, considering that they were poor fishermen, and the amount was beyond what they were able to pay. They wrote to me about it last season, just before this House closed. It was my last day here, and although I had a good deal of work to do for myself, I laid it aside and endeavoured to get the matter settled with the department before I went home. First, I went to the Fisheries Department, and obtained all the information I could. They sent me to the Department of Justice; they could do nothing, but sent me back to the Department of Fisheries again, and they, in turn, to the Minister of Justice. Back and forth that hot summer day, I travelled, trying to arrange the affair so that the suit might be withdrawn and to save further costs. Finally, the Department of Justice informed me that the papers in these cases had gone to the Crown prosecutor at Halifax, and they would make inquiries and see what could be done. Nothing was done, however, towards clearing the defendants. At that time, I told them that the accused would repay to the Government all the moneys that the Government claimed they had been defrauded out of.

The charges made by the department against these men were, as near as I can ascertain :

1. That they did not fish the time.
2. That they did not catch a sufficient quantity of fish.
3. That they had no boat, and if so, that she was not long enough.
4. That they did not fish in St. Mary's Bay or elsewhere. Whether these were the charges against only part of the accused or the whole of them I am hardly prepared to say, having had no personal talk with them, as my facts have been learned by correspondence. On these charges, they were accused, and those charges can be and were disproved in the county court at Digby on similar cases. In the Exchequer Court, at Halifax, the judgment was given on the grounds that the fish were caught in traps or weirs, and, therefore, were not deep-sea fish. How the judge could say that they were not deep-sea fish is a puzzle.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The question was deep-sea fishing ?

Mr. BOWERS. Quite so. I am not up in the law points. I will now read you some letters from the parties accused, and, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that the facts stated and the tenor of the letters are about the same. I fully expected to receive letters and affidavits of each one before this, but I am sorry to say that they have not yet come to hand. It takes some time for a letter to be sent and an answer received from that part of our Dominion. This letter is from Samuel Gidney :

Sandy Cove, Digby County, N.S.,
January 6, 1896.

E. C. Bowers, M.P., Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—In 1891 we set a fish-trap for the purpose of catching fish, and for which right we had to pay to the Government $40 per year. In November, Robert Bishop, of Sandy Cove, who was appointed commissioner to fill out fishing claims, sent us word to come and fill out ours, which we did, believing we were entitled to the same. In 1895, we were served with a writ from Exchequer Court for obtaining bounties fraudulently and falsely, saying that we had not caught amount of fish, boats were not the lawful length, and did not fish sufficient time.

As regards the fish, we caught double the amount; our boats were considerable longer than required length, and we fished from 10th April to 1st November. This was acknowledged in court. They claim that there was no bounty on traps that year. Why did not the Government instruct their commissioner in regard to traps, if such was the case? I believe Bishop did it, thinking that he was doing right, as he had no orders to do otherwise. Why did not the Government make a demand on us for the amount of bounty ($7), which we would willingly have repaid back, had we known that we were not entitled to it, and not served with a writ and run us into cost which we are not able to pay? Please bring our case before the House and state the matter to them, as we were ignorant in the affair, and, if any one is to blame, it was the Government official. I trust the Government and the House will consider us, as poor fishermen, and that we did not designedly do wrong, and will not exact the cost. We are willing to pay back the bounty claim.

Yours respectfully,

SAMUEL GIDNEY.

I received another letter yesterday. It is as follows:—

Mink Cove, Jan. 27th, 1896.

Hon. E. C. Bowers, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—When I last wrote you, I gave you all the particulars in the matter of the fishing bounties in connection with ourselves. Ingram Saunders will send you the newspaper which has Judge Savary's decision on the case of Bishop. You will see that he decided that we fishermen made the application in good faith, as we were instructed by Robert Bishop, who was acting as commissioner for the Government. He told us we were entitled to bounties on fish caught in the trap. As we were compelled to pay $40 yearly (license) for setting our trap, it was a small sum ($7) to receive for a bounty. Had the Government notified us we were not entitled to it, we would have refunded it. I wrote to the Minister of Fisheries. He answered me, he would give the matter due consideration.

Hoping this will be satisfactory and the Government will relieve us of the costs,

I am yours truly,

SAMUEL GIDNEY.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that the writs were not served until 1895, or over three years after the claims had been paid. This man is willing to repay the money back, and would have done so before costs had been added, if he had been told that he had done wrong. The next letter is from J. E. Morehouse :

Sandy Cove, 27th January, 1896.

Hon. E. C. Bowers, M.P.

Dear Sir,—I am informed by Samuel Gidney, that you wanted each of us that are concerned in the bounty affair, to write you how we obtained it, and what on. I met the officer on the street. He asked me if I was going to apply for a bounty. I asked him if there was a bounty on mackerel, and he said, yes, on all deep-sea fish; if I caught 2,500 pounds, I was entitled to it. So I got him to fill out the blank for 2,600 pounds of mackerel, caught in St. Mary's Bay, and he sent it. I was engaged in fishing over three months; my boat was larger than the law required. I made it in good faith, believing I was entitled to a bounty.

Yours respectfully,

J. E. MOREHOUSE.

The tenor of this letter is, you will observe, the same as my contention, i.e. that they were induced to put in their claim by the Government official. I will also read two letters from Mrs. Holmes Saunders, wife of one of the accused and mother of the boy by whom one of the defendants was innocently placed in a wrong position before the Government and his fellow-men. The first letter is as follows:—

Sandy Cove, 16th December, 1895.

Mr. Bowers.

Dear Sir,—I suppose you think strange of me writing on such an important matter as I am about to mention, concerning the fishing bounty affair. First, I will state my reason for writing on this question, as my husband is very poorly with heart disease. He has to keep perfectly quiet, and so is not able to do any business. I suppose you have heard that judgment has gone against the parties, on the point that there was no bounties on weirs and seines for 1891. The admissions made by the parties to Harris was allowed, that the quantity of fish caught was sufficient, and time, and length of boat was all right. 1st. The charge they was taken up on was that they did not fish the time. 2nd. They did not catch the quantity of fish. 3rd. They had no boat, and, if they had, she was not long enough. 4th. They did not fish in St. Mary's Bay or elsewhere. So on these charges we put in our offset, hoping to win. Now I will explain to you how my husband was drawn into this matter. My son was fifteen years of age, and at that time, of course, he did all he could in the fishing business. That season he fished the time and caught the quantity and had the boat. He tended his father's share of the weir and seine, besides line-fishing. So Bishop met the boy and told him he was entitled to a bounty. So he went with Bishop, and he filled the blank out for him and told him to sign it. He only specified 2,800 pounds of mackerel, but did not mention the line-fishing. He also put his father in as owner of the boat. That was all right; he was owner. The boat was engaged the season through by different parties, so she was entitled to a bounty. The father knew nothing of the affair until the cheque came for one dollar for the boat. So, you see, his father has to stand the cost for both, as the boy is under age, and God only knows what I am to do. I have a daughter nearly blind, and it takes every cent I can get hold of to get along with. I have not one cent I can call my own. It will ruin us if we have to pay it: it will turn us out of doors. So I thought I would mention it to you, and see if you would state this matter to the Minister of Fisheries, and get the cost taken off. We would willingly pay back the four dollars, if we can get clear of the cost. We never was notified to pay back the bounty until there was papers served by the sheriff, with about $50 and cost at that time. So we thought our case was so clear we would win for sure on the charge made against them. They did not say anything about not being bounties on weirs and seines. Bishop said there was, and the fishermen did not know any better, or they would not of done it. I think

Mr. BOWERS.

Bishop thought the fishermen was entitled to the bounties. He said the law was not repealed until 1893. I think we would of won if our case had been made plain to the judge. We engaged Harris to handle the case through other lawyers, but they did not go to Halifax to state the case to the judge. So he reserved judgment until he went back to Ottawa, and we have heard he gave his decision against us. Harris says the cost will be $50 each. Do you think it would be any use for me to state this affair to the Minister of Fisheries, with sworn statement? The blank at the Fishery Department will show that my husband never made any application for the bounty. The boy, through Bishop's advice, made the application, and the father has to suffer for the ignorance of Bishop. And if you think it necessary for me to state the matter to the Minister of Fisheries, please head me a copy how to address, if you think it will have any weight on the case. Hoping to get an answer soon as possible from you, as my husband does not know that judgment has gone against him. We dare not let him know it, on account of his health. If you will be kind enough to attend to this at once, please address letter to

MRS. MARY SAUNDERS.

Sandy Cove.

I have another letter here which I received yesterday and which I will read to the House. It is as follows:—

Sandy Cove, 27th January, 1896.

E. C. Bowers, M.P.

Dear Sir,—I am informed, through Samuel Gidney, that you wanted a plain statement of those fishing bounties. So he thought it would be advisable to make a personal statement, as each one knows their own case, how they obtained their bounties. As you are aware, I have already stated to you how my husband and son obtained theirs. So I thought it would be advisable for me to say again how it was done, in case you have not the letter with you that you received from me in December last. 1st. Bishop met my son (fifteen years of age) on the street, and tells him to call at his office, and he would give him a bounty schedule. So my son went, and Bishop filled the schedule out and told him to sign his name to it. It would have been all right if he had put the line fish in he caught in the Bay of Fundy; he caught the fish, and fished the time required. He also had the boat. Bishop also put his father in as owner of the boat. That was right; he was owner. The boat fished the season through, and was entitled to a $1 bounty. His father made no application for a bounty, nor did he know anything of the affair until the cheque came for $1 bounty. Concerning Bishop's affair, I will send you the judge's decision, and you can pick out of it what you like. I enclose you the letter from William Smith, Deputy Minister, Marine and Fisheries, in answer to my letter to him.

I remain, respectfully yours,

(Sgd.) MRS. HOLMES SAUNDERS.

In these letters of Mrs. Saunders, you will again see, Mr. Speaker, how they were led astray by the Government official, who, as I before observed, seemed to think that he was only doing his duty to the fishermen. This Harris, spoken of in the letter, informed them that if they would give him $5 each that he would get them clear, as he had a brother in the firm of Gillies & Harris, of Annapolis, and that by their influence with the Government, he would guarantee that they might consider the question as settled, and that they would never hear of it again. Poor, innocent man, he may have thought so. If so he not only deluded himself, but them also, as I will give the late hon. Minister of Justice this credit, by saying that I do not think he would swerve from what he considered to be the ends of justice by any improper means brought to bear by such parties as are referred to in this letter. And, I really think that the Minister thought he was doing right, and that the cases were flagrant abuses of the Bounty Act, and that frauds had been designedly committed. But I am convinced that when all the facts of the case have been brought to his notice, he will be one of the first to ask for mercy from the present incumbent of the office of Minister of Justice. Right here I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this man who had promised to look after their case, did not go to Halifax to attend the Exchequer Court. The firm of Gillies & Harris did not attend, and the only one who represented the accused was the firm of Harris & Henry, of Halifax, who did not understand the facts of the case at all. The accused did not know anything about what time it would be tried, and, even if they had known, it would have been almost impossible for them to have found means to pay their way there and back. I believe if they had been there themselves, there would have been just as good a chance of a verdict being rendered in their favour as was the case in the suits brought before Judge Savary. I am not versed in legal points enough to know why they were not tried in Digby instead of in Halifax, without it was on account of those that were tried in Digby, the verdict did not suit the Government, and they thought the probabilities would be better for a verdict if tried in the Exchequer Court. I will also call the attention of the House to a case at Digby last spring, tried before Judge Holdsworth, and his decision, dated January 26th, 1895, reads as follows:—

FISHING BOUNTY DISPUTE.

Captain J. Snow was before Judge Holdsworth, last Saturday, on alleged charge of perjury in connection with a declaration made in 1893 for a bounty claim of the schooner "James Farnham." The complaint was laid by Inspector Kinney, of Yarmouth. James W. Cossaboom was the principal witness. It appears that Cossaboom, who was at the time a fishery officer for the county, was interested in a weir at St. Mary's Bay, and hired the schooner from Snow, and she was used to attend the weir from 21st July to 24th August, 1893, when she returned to Digby, where she lay until 3rd October, when she sailed for Grand Manan, entering again at Digby, 10th November. The Crown claimed that the thirty-four days attendance at the weir would not count in the time to entitle the schooner to bounty ; also that, in any case, including the attendance on weir, she was employed only seventy-two days, instead of three months. The judge, however, dismissed the complaint, finding that there was no evidence on which to hold the accused.

You will see here, Mr. Speaker, that although the time was not even long enough, he thought there was not evidence enough to convict of perjury, although a great deal worse in all its bearings than the cases before us. Now, I wish to call the attention of the House more particularly to the judgment given in the county court by Judge Savary—Queen vs. Robert Bishop. This Bishop was the fishery officer before whom the parties accused filed their claims for bounty, and was similarly situated in every respect to the defendants for whom I am pleading, and was the means of all the trouble which ensued. If the court could clear him with so small a fine at first, and afterwards declare him not guilty, how in the name of justice could these poor men be found guilty. I would like to call the special attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to this judgment of Judge Savary's, the report of which reads as follows:—

THE QUEEN VS. ROBERT BISHOP.

This case, which was tried in the County Judge's Criminal Court, has excited a great interest throughout the county, and we herewith publish Judge Savary's résumé of the particulars :

"At the trial of this cause I held, as I held in all other and similar cases tried before me the same week, that there was not the slightest ground for imputing to the defendant the making of any false pretense in reference to the number or quality of the fish caught, and for which the bounty was claimed. The defendant, according to the form of the application for the bounty used at that day, represented that he had taken 3,200 pounds of 'sea fish' in St. Mary's Bay, and so he did. He did not say he caught them in the deep sea ; the form did not require him to say how he caught them, whether in weirs, or by the usual methods employed in the open sea ; he was not required to state anything whatever on that point, and it is due to him as well as to the others, to say that I have no doubt every one of them honestly believed that they were entitled to a bounty on fish caught, independently of the question how they were caught, either in weirs or otherwise. I believe that to have been the very general opinion of fishermen throughout the county. In this case, however, the boat for which the $1 bounty was claimed, was not of the length she was represented to be. This, I considered, was the result rather of a reprehensible carelessness than of any deliberate design to defraud, especially as the money was not claimed or received by the defendant for himself, but for another person's benefit, and immediately paid over to that person ; a circumstance which goes far to negative any 'animus furandi.' The Department of Fisheries, moreover, did not pay the $1 on receipt of the claim, but objected to do so, and communicated that objection to the defendant, on the ground of the informality of the claim and declaration. It was inadvertently sent to the defendant some time later by an officer in the department, who overlooked the fact that payment of it had been refused. I had made up my mind previous to the day to which I had adjourned the further consideration of the case, to convict the defendant as guilty from this technical point of view—undue carelessness and haste in overstating the size of the boat—but reserving the point raised that the $1 was not paid as the immediate result of this alleged false pretense; and, in the event of the court above, on argument of the point, affirming my decision to sentence him to twenty-four hours' imprisonment, as my only alternative, but, as I thought that a small pecuniary penalty would be a more appropriate punishment, instead of pronouncing judgment on the day fixed, I on that day further remanded him to another day on his own recognizance in the sum of $25. He did not appear on that day; I, therefore, ordered the recognizance to be estreated, and he paid over the money, and I certainly thought, in view of my thoroughly expressed opinions that the ends of justice had been sufficiently served by such a disposition of the case, that it would have been allowed to end there. I am sure that in the case of an indictment, no reasonable attorney general would hesitate, in deference to such strong opinion of the court, to enter a nolle prosequi. But I am, notwithstanding, pressingly moved on behalf of the Government for a more definite decision. Perhaps, as the case has been made the subject of a discussion in Parliament, in which some members have made statements showing themselves to be very much misinformed as to the real facts, public policy requires a more definite decision. Under the circumstances above detailed, and at this late date, instead of a conviction, with grave legal doubts and a point reserved, it would, in my opinion, be out of the question to do otherwise than give the defendant the full benefit of those doubts.

"I therefore find the defendant, Robert Bishop, not guilty.

"A. W. SAVARY.

"Digby, 14th August, 1895."

I will leave all remarks on this judgment to the seconder of my motion, who is much more able to review it than myself; but I will say, in concluding this statement, that if these were all the cases of fraud that had been committed, I would not ask for mercy. But when we hear the late Minister of Fisheries stating from his place in the House, that gigantic frauds had been perpetrated, and that in one case he was just in time to save \$5,000 from being misappropriated; and when we ascertain from the blue-books of the department that in Digby, Yarmouth, Queen's and Shelburne counties for six years the percentage of claims disallowed was only $\frac{5}{8}$ of 1 per cent, and that they amounted in Gloucester for the same space of time to 18 per cent, in Gaspé to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, in Cape Breton to 5 per cent, and in Victoria, N.S., to 3 per cent, we come to the conclusion that the sword of justice should not fall on Digby alone. Why, in 1891 in Gloucester county the claims rejected were 41 per cent; and still we cannot find that any were fined or imprisoned. While in 1893, and for years previous vessels were only paid \$1.50 per registered tonnage, since that period, and with the same expenditure of money nearly \$3 per ton has been paid to vessel owners and crews, showing that gross and gigantic frauds, as the Minister observed, must have been committed in former years of distribution.

In closing, I would not have the Minister or the Government think, for one moment, that I would palliate wrongs or frauds as committed against the Bounty Act. On the contrary, I would uphold them in trying in all lawful ways to save such moneys for the use of those only to whom it should go. But in the cases of these parties for whom I am pleading, I believe that if wrong was done by them it was not done intentionally; and what was done was done with the connivance and cognizance of the Government officials. Therefore, I would ask the Government to take into consideration and to ascertain whether the cause of justice will not be fully served by remitting the costs in the above suits of Gidney, Eldridge, Saunders, Morehouse and any others as defendants in similar cases, and to simply ask for a refund of the money which the parties accused and convicted claim was obtained with fraudulent intent. If not, great distress and ruin will be caused, and the innocent will suffer in consequence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Bowers) called my attention to the motion which he had on the Order paper, and asked me if I would second it. After going into the facts with him, I said I would do so most cheerfully; and I think my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), if he looks into the matter closely, will see that the application made by my hon. friend is a reasonable one. Personally, I would be sorry to use any word which would in any sense or way weaken the Department of Marine and Fisheries in its efforts to prevent or punish fraud in connection with the distribution of the fishery bounty. I should also be sorry indeed to countenance any such word being used by anybody else. I know the difficulties which the hon. gentleman has to contend with, and so far as I am personally concerned, I shall be ready on all occasions, not only not to weaken his hands, but to do what I can to strengthen them. I know that he has from time to time to act in a way which at first sight may look oppressive; and I know that a great deal of difficulty is experienced by the department from time to time in discriminating between cases where there has been fraudulent intention on the part of the parties, and other cases where there has been a misadventure or a miscarriage of justice by inadvertence. The case my hon. friend presents to-day is simply a case of inadvertence, not of wrong-doing. The charge of fraud was tried by Judge Savary, the county court judge, a year or two ago, and has been satisfactorily and finally disposed of. The department were not entirely satisfied with the ruling of the learned judge. Of course, they accepted his judgment in the case, fraud or no fraud, and it ended so far as the question of criminal prosecution was concerned. I have no fault to find with the department in that respect. Having ruled that ordinary weir fish are not deep sea fish within the meaning of the Act, the parties who had had these moneys paid them under a wrong impression, should refund, when called upon. I want to call attention to what was done. It did seem to me that the department, having at first thought that there was fraud and collusion between this officer and the parties who received the money and having prosecuted these people for these supposed frauds, and the people having been discharged by the judge, then the question having come up as to the civil liability of the parties to refund the moneys they had received, it did seem to me—and I submit it to the hon. gentleman as a question of justice—that the criminal part of the case having been entirely disposed of and the question being reduced down simply to one of civil liability to refund the money, the first duty of the departmental officers was to demand the refund of the money. I want to call the attention of my hon. friend to the facts stated by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) and emphatically asserted, time and again, that no demand or notice was made upon any of these parties for the refund of the money. There having been no fraud in the matter—the charge of fraud having been finally disposed of by Judge Savary—and there having been no notice or demand made upon the parties, the next step taken was an action filed in the Exchequer Court. If the hon. gentleman's officials were simply taking an action for the purpose of determining a legal point, there could be no objection, but even then I respectfully submit that the legal point could be ascertained by bringing a test action against one of the parties. But instead of a test action being brought, five or six of these poor people, who had received $4 or $5 in 1891, had actions brought against them. There was no dispute about the facts, and a case was agreed upon. I examined the record in the Exchequer Court. There was a case agreed upon, the facts were all admitted, and the only point was whether or not, within the meaning of the regulations, weired fish are entitled to the bounties payable under the statute. I obtained from the department a copy of the regulations passed in 1891, on which the judge passed, and, of course, it is not for me to question his judgment, nor am I personally disposed to differ with him. The instructions read as follows:—

Claimants for fish bounty, to be entitled thereto, must be engaged in deep sea fishing.

That is the only material part of the instructions. Those instructions were not made into an Order in Council until 21st of November, 1891. They were mere instructions issued by the department, and they were ratified on the 21st of November, 1891, by Order in Council; but before the Order in Council had passed, the officer of the department sent for these men in Digby and told them they were entitled, on his construction of his instructions from Ottawa, to receive the bounty. Acting, therefore, on the advice and at the suggestion of the officer appointed for the purpose, they signed the necessary blanks which he filled up. The judge of the Exchequer Court determined that fish caught in weirs are not entitled to the bounty. The officer in 1891 thought that they were. By strict law, these parties, having caught fish in weirs, were not entitled to the bounty, and ought to pay it back. They state that they were always ready to pay it back, but instead of having been notified to pay, writs were issued against them in the Exchequer Court, and they have been put to considerable expense. As there was no demand for repayment, and as there was no refusal on their part to repay, it seems to me wholly unjustifiable that they should be put to this large amount of costs. I understand my hon. friend's application now is that these poor people should not be ruined by these costs. I cordially join in his motion and support his application. It would certainly be a cruel imposition if these people were obliged to pay costs in addition to the refund.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Before you left the Chair, at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) discussed the motion for papers in connection with frauds on the fishing bounties. I do not intend to say much on the subject, as there is no intention of opposing the motion, and the papers will be brought down. Any discussion that is deemed necessary can take place then. But as the hon. member for Queen's stated—and I think I understood the same from the hon. member who moved the resolution—that the object was to make an appeal that the costs in the case he referred to might be refunded—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Might not be exacted—

Mr. COSTIGAN. Of course, the hon. gentleman will not expect me to give a positive answer to that proposition. In the first place, these cases arose some time ago, and I am not acquainted with the details of all the suits. The first suit was for fraud, and that was not sustained. Immediately afterwards, civil proceedings were taken to recover the amounts that were paid to these parties, and those suits involved considerable cost, although there was no defence put in, I believe. If that be the position taken by the hon. gentleman who moved for the papers, I am prepared to say that I will look into the matter, and will consult the Department of Justice. I am prepared now to say this also—that I was very strongly impressed with the point made that after criminal proceeding had failed, from whatever cause, and it was decided to take civil proceedings to recover the moneys, a demand should have been made for the moneys, which might have made the expense of the civil proceedings unnecessary. I shall be quite willing to look into the matter from that point of view. I would like the hon. gentleman and the House to understand that, in these, and all similar cases, the Government stands in a difficult position, in an unpleasant position. Last year we had the same point discussed for two hours, and hon. members then took very strong ground against the Government for non-enforcement of the law, and for not prosecuting vigorously, cases of fraud wherever they occurred. It was said, in fact, that there was a want of vigour in the department in following up and punishing the parties guilty of these frauds. We know that while there is a general feeling that the Government should administer the law as Parliament intended it, yet, when any party has offended or is proceeded against, he can always find some sympathy, and can have that sympathy expressed in this House in the form of a request for leniency. I do not say that this is a case where an appeal of that kind is made. But I mention it to show that it is exceedingly difficult to enforce the law in such a manner as to avoid fault-finding. I am quite sure that when they spoke last year, the gentlemen who have brought forward this resolution complained that there was a want of vigour, and cited cases like the present, and implied that my predecessor had shown a good deal of vigour in proceeding against those who had committed fraud, but that his efforts were neutralized or paralyzed by the interference of local members, who felt bound to represent the views of the parties affected. The same argument might apply here—no doubt the hon. gentleman is representing the views of his constituents who are particularly affected. I do not wish, however, to deal with the matter in that sense. I say frankly that there may be something in the statement made by these hon. gentlemen that this expense might have been avoided if a demand for the money had been made. I will look into the matter carefully.

Mr. DICKEY. I have not been long enough in the Department of Justice to have any personal knowledge of this matter whatever, but I understood the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution to state that the Department of Justice had acquiesced in Judge Savary's judgment in the Bishop case, that the evidence of fraud was not sufficient. I am informed by the permanent officers of the department that that statement is not quite correct; that the officers of the department did not, in any sense, acquiesce in that judgment. I do not wish to discuss the judgment, but simply to save the department from an implied admission which might be claimed if I allowed the statement to go without comment.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The prosecution against Bishop was against the officer of the department, and not against one of the fishermen.

Mr. DICKEY. That is what struck the department.

Mr. BOWERS. I feel thankful that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has agreed to look into this matter carefully. As I stated, in moving the resolution, I would be the last to ask the hon. Minister or the Government to be lenient to parties who had offended, knowing that they were guilty of a fraudulent act. But these men were told by the Government officer that they were doing right. He asked them to bring their cases before him, and they made the affidavit before him. Knowing the circumstances and he being intimately acquainted with them, and he also applying, at the same time, and having a share in the weir or trap, it is clear that no fraud was intended by these fishermen, and Judge Savary decided that no fraud had been established. I am sure that if the hon. Minister will look into the matter he will relieve them of the costs of the suit and be convinced that no fraud was intended.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I wish to call attention, specially, to the statement made by my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Bowers) that before the civil actions were taken, he had personally called at the Department of Justice and had assured the department that these people were willing to repay the bounty if the department thought it had been illegally taken. We have the hon. gentleman's personal statement, and that I would wish the hon. Minister to bear that in mind.

Motion agreed to.

MODUS VIVENDI, TREATY OF 1888.

Mr. LAURIER moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the American authorities with regard to the withdrawal of the 'Modus Vivendi' under the Treaty of 1888.

He said: It has been stated in the press that the Government had taken steps towards having the modus vivendi under the treaty of 1888, set aside. I do not know whether there is any correspondence on the subject, and this statement in the press is my own reason for making this motion. The Government can say whether there is any such correspondence.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no objection to bringing down the papers. The hon. gentleman will find there is very little correspondence.

Mr. LAURIER. Has anything been done ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There has been no material change in the policy of the Government in regard to that question.

Motion agreed to.

CONTROLLERS AS PRIVY COUNCILLORS.

Mr. LAURIER moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council and correspondence relating to the appointment of the Honourable E. G. Prior, and of the Honourable John F. Wood, to the Privy Council of Canada.

And if the House will permit, I would like to add the following amendment :—

Also, copies of the commission or instrument appointing them to the Privy Council, and appointing them also to the respective offices which they now hold in the Administration.

He said : I desire by this motion to call attention to a very important matter, that is to say, the status which is occupied by the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue in the Government of Canada. In my humble judgment the position of both these hon. gentlemen as members of the Cabinet, is not only anomalous, but is not warranted by the statute of the country, and moreover is a direct infringement of the principles of responsible government as they are now well understood. It is a mere truism to say that under the system of responsible government such as it has been developed, all the members of the Cabinet are not only a unit, they must be a unit, but at the same time they are directly responsible both to the Crown and to Parliament. This is a point which, it seems to me, need not be supported by authorities, but in view of the anomalous position which has been taken by the Government, perhaps it would not be amiss for me to draw the attention of the House to the doctrine of standard authorities on the subject. I quote from Todd, page 3 of the last edition :

It is the distinguishing feature of parliamentary government that it requires the powers belonging to the Crown to be exercised through ministers, who are held responsible for the manner in which they are used, who are expected to be members of the two Houses of Parliament, the proceedings of which they must be able generally to guide, and who are considered entitled to hold their offices only while they possess the confidence of Parliament, and more especially of the House of Commons.

I cite from the same authority, page 384 :

For it must be observed, of all the royal prerogatives, that they are held in trust for the benefit of the whole nation, and must be exercised in conformity with the constitutional maxim which requires that every act of the royal authority should be performed by the advice of councillors who are responsible to parliament and to the law of the land. This responsibility is now acknowledged to be thorough and complete ; and, as no public act of the sovereign is valid which is not performed under the advice of some responsible minister, so, on the other hand, for every exercise of the royal authority, ministers must be prepared to account to parliament, justifying the same, if need be, at their own peril.

“ The limits,” says May, “ within which parliament, or either House, may constitutionally exercise a control over the executive government, have been defined by usage upon principles consistent with a true distribution of powers in a free state and limited monarchy. Parliament has no direct control over any single department of the state. It may order the production of papers for its information ; it may investigate the conduct of public officers, and may pronounce its opinion upon the manner in which every function of government has been, or ought to be, discharged ; but it cannot convey its orders or directions to the meanest executive officer in relation to the performance of his duty. Its power over the executive is exercised indirectly, but not the less effectively, through the responsible ministers of the Crown. These ministers regulate the duties of every department of the state, and are responsible for their proper performance to parliament, as well as the Crown.”

I have made these quotations to illustrate the doctrine with which I set out at first, that the business of government is carried on through the instrumentality of Ministers who are directly responsible to the Crown and directly responsible to Parliament also ; who are responsible for their acts to Parliament and who are amenable immediately to the jurisdiction of Parliament. Now, it so happens that the two gentlemen who preside over two of the most important departments of the Government, the Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue, are also members of the Cabinet, and are at the same time subordinate officers of a Minister. They are not responsible to the Crown, not responsible to Parliament, but responsible to another Minister, to one of their own colleagues, as advisers of the Crown. This, it seems to me, is a singular anomaly, it is a violation of the principles of responsible government. Suppose, for instance, that the administration of the Department of Customs were not satisfactory to Parliament ; at the present time Parliament has no means of making the holder of the office amenable to its jurisdiction, because the holder of the office is not responsible to Parliament, but somebody else is responsible for him : the Minister of Trade and Commerce is responsible for the actions of the Controller of Customs. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is responsible for the administration of the Controller of Inland Revenue. So those hon. gentlemen are not in any proper sense, and they could not be in any proper sense, members of the Cabinet; they could not be advisers of the Crown, because they have no responsibility to the people, no responsibility to the Crown itself, but they are responsible to the hon. gentleman who is responsible both to the Crown and to Parliament for their administration. And therefore, under the circumstances, it seems to me that it is, to say the least, a very singular anomaly, to see those hon. gentlemen members of the Cabinet, because, I contend, by the very nature of their office they are debarred from being members of the Cabinet. Perhaps it may be said they might be members of the Privy Council. There is a question as to that. Members of the Privy Council need not be members of the two Houses of Parliament; members of the Privy Council are at present honorary advisers of the Crown, and under our system we have several members of the Privy Council without any portfolios. But I contend that in this case, when an hon. gentleman who holds an office under the Administration, but who is at the same time not responsible directly either to the Crown or to the people, but is directly responsible to another officer, to a Minister, who is himself responsible to the Crown and to Parliament, is debarred by the very nature of responsible government from holding a position as an adviser of the Crown and forming part of the Cabinet. He may be part of the Administration—I do not contend that he may not be; but to be a member of the Cabinet and a member of the Administration are two different matters. I now proceed to show by the debate that took place when the office was created, and by the statute itself, that it never was the intention of Parliament when the offices were created that those holding them should be members of the Cabinet, but the reverse was contemplated. When the Bill was introduced in 1887, it was introduced and carried through Parliament by Sir John Macdonald. Speaking of the establishment of the portfolio of Trade and Commerce, he said:

This will add a Minister to the present list. On the other hand, we consider that the two departments of Customs and Inland Revenue are administrative only. They are not suggestive, but administrative, and, after the policy of the Government with respect either to Inland Revenue or Customs is settled, the Ministers at the head of these departments will see that the law is carried out. It is proposed, therefore, that, when the reorganization has commenced, the Minister at the head of Customs and the Minister at the head of Inland Revenue will not necessarily be Cabinet Ministers. They will be political heads, but they need not necessarily, as a matter of practice, be members of the Cabinet.

Nothing can be clearer than the language of the Prime Minister of that day, that those officers were to be simply what they are in England, under secretaries, to conduct the administration of affairs under the political head, but it was never contemplated, even for a moment, that they should hold office as members of the Cabinet. That language, emphatic as it was, in the mouth of the Prime Minister, was made more emphatic by the language of the statute itself. The legislation to which the Prime Minister then adverted is to be found in chap. 10 and 11. Chap. 10 recites:

There shall be a department called the Department of Trade and Commerce, over which the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the time being, appointed by commission under the Great Seal, shall preside, and the Minister shall have the management and direction of the department, holding office during pleasure; and the Minister of Trade and Commerce shall be a member of the Privy Council of Canada, with a salary of $7,000 per annum.

Chap. 11, "An Act respecting the Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue," at section 3 provides:

The Governor in Council may appoint an officer who is to be called the Controller of Customs, and an officer who is to be called the Controller of Inland Revenue, who shall hold office at pleasure, and shall be under the general instructions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or of the Minister of Finance, as the Council may direct.

So here it is laid down very plainly that the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue are simply parliamentary heads to be here as subordinates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but responsible to him directly, not responsible to Parliament or responsible to the Crown. It is a matter of history that this Act, which was passed in 1887, was left in abeyance for several years, and was not put into practical effect until two or three years ago; and when it was put into effect it was put into effect in the manner provided by the Act, that is to say, those two gentlemen, the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue, while they were taken into the Administration, were not taken into the Cabinet. They were not made Cabinet Ministers, they were not made members of the Privy Council, they did not hold the rank of advisers of the Crown, and for the obvious reason, and for the well known reason that being debarred by their office from having direct responsibility themselves, it was of course felt that they should not hold positions as Cabinet Ministers. A departure took place. When did it take place? A few weeks ago. On what occasion? On the occasion of the election of the Controller of Inland Revenue. I say the election, not the appointment of the hon. gentleman, the Controller of Inland Revenue, but if I am correctly informed, when the Government was organized in December, when the present Controller of Customs was transferred from Inland Revenue to Customs, and when the present Controller of Inland Revenue was appointed, but were appointed in the same manner as occupants of those offices had been appointed before, that is to say, the hon. gentleman who occupied the position of Controller of Inland Revenue was transferred to the position of Controller of Customs with the same rank, the same rank in the Administration, but not in the Cabinet; and the present Controller of Inland Revenue was admitted in the ranks of the Administration, but not in the Cabinet. The hon. gentleman had left for Victoria to seek re-election, having simply the position which his predecessor had held, that is to say, that of Controller of Customs, a member of the Administration, but not of the Cabinet. But when the hon. gentleman went to the electors he had been preceded by the news that he was a full-fledged Cabinet Minister. But when he came to Victoria the matter was ventilated by the electors, and then it was found out that he was not a Cabinet Minister, but simply a parliamentary head, without any voice in the Cabinet; and it is now a matter of history that Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney wired to the Prime Minister informing him that there was a misunderstanding as to the rank held by the new Controller of Inland Revenue in the Administration. Well, Sir, there should be no misunderstanding as to that matter. The people of Victoria knew right well, if they knew anything of the law, that the new Controller of Inland Revenue simply had a position in the Administration, but had no position in the Cabinet. Then, Sir, it was simply for an electoral expediency and for no other purpose, that the hon. gentleman was taken into the Cabinet; and, of course, one of the Controllers being taken into the Cabinet, the other had to be taken in also. Then it was that, when the election was at its thickest, on the 27th December, Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, at that time Minister of Justice, wired to Mr. Prior as follows:—

Hon. E. G. Prior, Victoria.

His Excellency informed me, last night, that he had signed the Minute of Council sanctioning your appointment as member of the Cabinet and Privy Councillor.

As far as my information goes, that was the occasion when the appointment took place, and took place as a matter of political expediency, so as to give more influence to the Controller of Inland Revenue with the electorate of Victoria, and so obtain votes in that city. We all know that the election was close. I do not know what effect it had, nor is that the question at the present time, but the question is a grave one which I submit for the consideration of the House. I do not intend to press the matter at the present moment, because we have not all the papers, but I do not believe that the papers which are to be brought down, can at all alter the facts which I have stated, namely, that the position held by the Controller of Inland Revenue, and by the Controller of Customs, in the Cabinet, is altogether antagonistic, not only to the principles of parliamentary government, but also antagonistic to the letter of the statute which has created both of those offices.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why the papers called for by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) should not be brought down. I fully agree with the hon. gentleman when he stated that before discussing this question further, it might be better to wait until the papers are on the Table of this House, and if he had thought of that in the beginning of his speech I think it might possibly have been better. I also agree with the hon. gentlemen, that the language of Sir John Macdonald, when he introduced the Bill to the House, is absolutely clear, and it is so clear that it seems to me impossible that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) should draw any deduction from it than an endorsement of the course which the present Government has followed in calling these two hon. gentlemen to the Privy Council. The late Sir John Macdonald, in explaining the measure, said that of necessity the hon. gentlemen might not be Cabinet Ministers, and that these hon. gentlemen in acting as members of the Administration, but not as members of the Cabinet, would be in a position to be later on taken into the Cabinet. It seems to me that what the present Government has done in this matter is exactly in accord with the announcement then made by the great leader of the Conservative party. Now as to the responsibility to the country, and as to the responsibility to the Crown. The hon. gentlemen who are members of the Privy Council and Cabinet Ministers, are responsible for the advice which they give to the Crown. There cannot be a question as to that. True it is, that recommendations connected with the administration of their departments are transmitted through the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but the responsibility still exists in all its entirety, and these gentlemen who are members of the Privy Council have their responsibility as well as any other advisers of the Crown. I do not see that there can be any question as to the position taken by the Government in calling these hon. gentlemen to the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has talked a good deal about history, and he has picked out his history from the columns of newspapers, and read to the House what newspapers said as to the manner in which these hon. gentlemen have been called to the Cabinet. Well, I believe that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) on reflecting over the matter, will think as I do, that this newspaper history is not altogether that sort of constitutional history which Parliament would like to have laid before it. All I can say to the hon. gentleman is, that when the papers are brought down, if the hon.

gentleman then questions the policy of the Government, he must find other reasons than those which he submitted to the House. He must rely upon some other argument, than the manner in which the Bill was introduced by Sir John Macdonald, because I believe that what the then Premier advised has been carried out. I cannot see how the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) could find in the extracts from "Hansard" which he has read, any reason to prove that the Government should not have taken the course they have taken in this matter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, the whole proceeding in connection with the appointment of these hon. gentlemen to seats in the Cabinet, as well as to the position of Privy Councillors, is, I think, most unusual. There can be no doubt whatever, that when it was proposed to create two subordinate departments of the Government—which the Prime Minister (Sir John Macdonald) who introduced the Bill said, that they were departments that were administrative only, and were not suggestive departments—he assumed that those who presided over the departments were not required in the Privy Council, and that there was nothing connected with their departments that made their consultation on subjects of public policy a matter of importance; and so the proposal was that these two administrative officers who were to become Ministers of the Crown, but not members of the Cabinet, were to hold subordinate offices in the Government, and were to be placed under the control, either of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now, it is not the usual practice under the English parliamentary system, to make one Minister of the Crown subordinate to another. Each Minister of the Crown is independent. Each Minister of the Crown stands upon a footing of equality, and his vote in the Cabinet counts for as much as the vote of any other member of the Cabinet. But, Sir, that is not the position either of the Controller of Customs or of the Controller of Inland Revenue. Let me call your attention, and the attention of the House, to the words of the statute by which these two offices are created. The first section provides:

The Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue, respectively, shall, from and after the coming into force of this Act, or so much thereof as relates to either the said departments, in accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained, be under the control and supervision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or the Minister of Finance, as the Governor in Council from time to time directs.

That is the position of subordinate members of the Administration. That is the position naturally assigned in law to those who are to be members of the Government, but who are to have nothing to do with the shaping of the policy of the Government—who are, even in the discharge of their duties, subordinate to and responsible to a Minister who is responsible to the Crown and Parliament. The position legally assigned to those hon. gentlemen makes neither of them responsible to the Crown or to Parliament for the general policy of their departments. For the administrative acts of their departments they are responsible; but for the general policy of their departments the Minister of Trade and Commerce, under whose supervision they are placed, is the responsible Minister, and their position, being one of inferiority and subordination, is one as Cabinet Ministers, hitherto unknown to the law of our constitution or to that of the Imperial government of which ours is a transcript. It is further provided here:

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

The Governor in Council may appoint an officer who shall be called the Controller of Customs, and an officer who shall be called the Controller of Inland Revenue, each of whom shall hold office during pleasure, and shall, under the general instructions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or of the Minister of Finance, as the Governor in Council directs, be the parliamentary head of the said departments respectively.

Wherever, by any Act, any duty is assigned to, or any power is conferred upon, the Minister of Customs, or the Minister of Inland Revenue, such duty shall be performed, or such power shall be exercised, by the Controller of Customs or the Controller of Inland Revenue, respectively; but any duty or power assigned to the Controller of Customs or the Controller of Inland Revenue shall be performed, or exercised, subject to the supervision and control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or of the Minister of Finance, as the Governor in Council directs.

Now, Sir, it is perfectly clear from the provisions of this statute that these two officers were to be Ministers, but not Cabinet Ministers. They were to stand outside of the Cabinet. They were to be responsible for the actual discharge of the duties of their departments; but in the public policy of the Cabinet, in its general direction, in anything that concerned the policy of the various departments, the one Minister who was responsible, both for the acts of the Controller of Customs and for those of the Controller of Inland Revenue, was either the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Finance, as the Government placed these subjects under the one or under the other. That position is one altogether out of keeping with seats in the Cabinet—altogether out of keeping with the position to which these hon. gentlemen have been raised by the political necessities of the Administration. It is true that in England, sometimes an outside Minister, one who is not a Cabinet Minister, may be a Privy Councillor. He may have acquired that honorary distinction before he ever entered the government or parliament at all. We know that that rank is usually conferred on the governors sent to the various colonies, and on ambassadors sent abroad; and if a governor or an ambassador, on his return, should become a member of the administration, even a junior member, without having a seat in the Cabinet, although he has the rank of a Privy Councillor he does not become a member of the Cabinet. He is outside of the Cabinet, and he only differs from other outside members of the Cabinet in this, that while others may prepare a memorandum for council which has to be submitted through some Minister who has a seat in the Cabinet, he may appear in person before the Council, and may explain what he desires to have done, although he can take no part in its deliberations as a member of the administration. Now, Sir, there is but one way known to the law of the constitution, I believe, of making an officer a member of the Privy Council—I am not now speaking of the Cabinet; that is, by his appearing personally before the representative of the Crown and being sworn in of the Privy Council—being sworn to keep the secrets of Her Majesty and to advise her truly, and subscribing to the Privy Council roll. Now, what do these hon. gentlemen say? The late Minister of Justice, in a communication by telegraph to the present Controller of Inland Revenue, said this:

His Excellency informed me, last night (that is, on the 27th December), that he had signed the Minute of Council approving of your appointment as a member of the Cabinet and of the Privy Council.

Now, I would like to know whether that is true. I would like to know by what authority an appointment was made in that way. I would like to know how Mr. Prior became a member of the Privy Council without taking the oath or subscribing the roll. It is a novel proceeding—one which, I venture to say, is wholly unknown to the law; and if that is the way in which Mr. Prior has been made a member of the Privy Council, I will venture to say that in law he is not a member yet. Now, the hon. gentleman has a good deal to explain in the proceedings that have been taken in connection with this matter. I venture to say that the appointment of these hon. members, holding these two offices as members of the Privy Council, is a rather unusual proceeding. I do not say that it is unconstitutional. I admit that the Crown may make any member of this House, or even Mr. Audette down stairs, if it thinks proper, a member of the Privy Council. There is no doubt about that. But to make him a member of the Cabinet in virtue of his holding the office of Controller of Customs or that of Controller of Inland Revenue, when the law intends that he shall not be such, is a most extraordinary proceeding. Now, Sir, I venture to say that you will not find in the whole history of England an instance in which any one holding an office of under-secretary or any one of the subordinate offices as an assistant to a Minister, has been raised to the position of a Cabinet Minister. There is not a single instance of the kind; and yet two gentlemen who have seats in this House, who are subordinates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, have been made members of the Cabinet—have been put upon a footing of equality with the man under whom they are to serve and who is responsible to Parliament and to the Crown for all they do. I say that is an unusual proceeding, and the hon. gentleman will have to submit very unusual papers to the consideration of this House to justify what has been done. Sir, our constitution in a large degree consists of understandings, and if you undertake to trample these under foot, what becomes of your constitution? It is not in writing. It is not a hard and fast instrument; it is not a mechanical contrivance like the American constitution. It is a vital organism. It is intended to grow and develop, but there is no propriety in undertaking to raise men, holding subordinate and, in a large degree, irresponsible offices in the Administration, to the position of Cabinet Ministers. This is contrary to the understanding, it is contrary to what the law contemplates, as shown by the very words of the statute, and I trust that the House will be prepared to give an intelligent and independent consideration to this question when it has all the papers before it.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not propose to discuss at any length, until the papers come down, the very interesting question which has been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think after all, that, so far as the present material at our service is concerned, there is very much difference between hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves with regard to the constitutional principles underlying this case. There is not much room for difference. The only point of difference that I see is that the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) seems to hold that the position of the office of Controller is a disqualification for a seat in the Cabinet. He admits that the Queen may call to Her Privy Council any member of this House she chooses, without portfolio. The hon. gentleman, in the government of which he was once a member, himself tendered that advice to the Crown on more than one occasion, and had members of this House in the Cabinet without any responsibility to Parliament for administration, so that we are not very far apart, in practice or in theory, in regard to this matter. I could not, and that is the only question to which I intend to allude, altogether follow the leader of the Opposition in his argument. His argument, if I understood it correctly, was that this appointment of Controllers to the Cabinet was wrong, because Parliament had no control over it, that another officer—their superior officer,—was responsible to Parliament, and that therefore these men had no place in the Cabinet. I am quite unable to follow that because the position of these gentlemen, the Controllers, in the Cabinet does not in any way affect their responsibility to Parliament. The House is seized of full control over the administration and policy of the Department of Trade and Commerce. The presence of the Controllers in the Cabinet, or their absence from the Cabinet, does not affect in any way the responsibility of the Minister to the House. The responsibility for the policy and the administration of that department is exactly as it was before these gentlemen became sworn of the Privy Council. It is quite clear to the House that Sir John Macdonald, when he introduced that Bill, introduced it avowedly as a tentative measure. He introduced it as an experiment, he did not negative the right of appointing these gentlemen, the Controllers, to the Cabinet. He said that they were not necessarily Cabinet officers. Experience has shown along what lines that development is likely to take, so that I do not see any radical inconsistency between the position assumed by the Government to-day and the position of Sir John Macdonald when he introduced that Bill. I am quite sure the leader of the Opposition will not find any objection to the personnel of the two Controllers, or their right to sit in the Cabinet, so far as regards their ability and standing in the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How were they appointed ?

Mr. DICKEY. I am coming to that presently. If the hon. gentleman will look at Sir John Macdonald's speech, he will see that one of the results which Sir John Macdonald hoped from that Bill was that it would train young parliamentary hands into expert Cabinet Ministers, and I am quite sure that, in the case of our hon. friend the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood), that end has been thoroughly attained.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). By promotion to other offices.

Mr. DICKEY. With regard to the Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior), I beg to say that I see nothing improper whatever in the Minister of Justice of that day, (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) or the Prime Minister (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), for the matter of that, telegraphing what was the fact to any person in Victoria or elsewhere. The question whether the inquiry was made of the Governor or not is quite another question, but when the inquiry was made the answer evidently was as to the fact. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) knows far better than I do that the practice with regard to members of the Privy Council is to appoint them by Order in Council, and they are sworn sometimes at a subsequent day, sometimes at a date a good deal subsequent, but he must not imagine for that reason that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) is not now a member of the Privy Council and a member of the Cabinet.

Mr. DICKEY.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then he was appointed after his election ?

Mr. DICKEY. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the position of Controller of Inland Revenue is quite straight and legal in that respect. I cannot follow the hon. member for Bothwell altogether in his reading of precedents, but I have no desire to prolong the discussion to-night. I wish merely to clear up the position of the Controller of Inland Revenue, and to meet the main objection made by the leader of the Opposition as to the responsibility of these gentlemen to the House and not to the Cabinet.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to add but a few words to the discussion which has taken place with reference to the appointment of the two Controllers to the Cabinet. When the proposal was made to the House some years ago and its then leader (Sir John Macdonald) asked the House to agree to a Bill, he gave the House to understand very clearly that these gentlemen were not to become members of the Cabinet. My hon. friend and leader read a quotation from Sir John Macdonald's speech on that occasion. I myself wish he had gone on with a few sentences further, because Sir John Macdonald on that occasion, made very clear, so that no one could misunderstand it, what the proposition was.

Mr. DICKEY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. Minister of Justice assents. He not only made it clear what the proposition was, but he made it pretty clear that it was not desirable that these gentlemen, whom we appointed Controllers, should be members of the Cabinet. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. I will read the language of the late Sir John Macdonald to show which is right :

It is of considerable importance that the number of Cabinet Ministers should not be increased, that is to say, that every member holding a political office in Parliament should not, ex necessitate, be a member of the Cabinet.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Ex-necessitate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, he says he was against the necessity, or desirability either, of the two Controllers holding positions in the Cabinet.

Mr. DICKEY. I quite conceive that that was Sir John Macdonald's scheme at the time, but nothing that he said goes against the constitutionality of the appointment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But you have not changed the law to suit the change.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What I contend was that Parliament was induced to assent to the Bill creating a new Minister—the Minister of Trade and Commerce—on the distinct understanding that the two gentlemen who were to be Controllers of the Inland Revenue and Customs Department were not to have seats in the Cabinet. I recall the attention of the House to the sentence I read :

It is of considerable importance that the number of Cabinet Ministers should not be increased, that is to say, that every member holding a political office in Parliament should not, ex-necesse, be a member of the Cabinet.

Why ?

That would overload a Cabinet, and in that regard would not promote promptness of action ; but, by this system, young members of Parliament, comparatively young members, who have taken prominent positions in Parliament, can obtain entrance into public life, and commence official training by holding these offices, and, after certain probation, if they assert themselves before Parliament, they will, very naturally, be promoted and become Cabinet Ministers.

So they were to act as under-secretaries as in England. They were to undergo a certain training and if they qualified themselves, they were to be held for promotion to the head of a department, and a seat in the Cabinet. He goes on to say :

The proposed proposal is, that when these Acts come into force, the Minister of Customs and Minister of Inland Revenue shall be members of the Government, and, on appointment, they must seek re-election, and they will have a salary, as it is proposed, of $5,000 a year. They will go out with the Government, and they will be political personages as much as if they were members of the Cabinet. It is believed that the expense will be diminished after the new Act relating to the Customs and Excise goes into force. It is proposed that the permanent officer under the political head will hold the position of chief clerk,—

And so on.

These two departments, the Department of Customs and the Department of Excise, which are the departments furnishing the chief portion of the revenue of the country, will be under the control and supervision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who will be the head of the whole of these two departments, will deal with matter of trade and commerce, and will have the supervision of these two branches.

Almost the exact language the hon. gentleman used was afterwards embodied in the statute. These officers were appointed merely as administrative officers, to take their orders from the Minister of Trade and Commerce who was to have the forming of the policy which it was to be their duty to carry out. And Parliament, I believe, would not have agreed to the Bill as then proposed unless it had had the guarantee of the Prime Minister himself that these were to be subordinate administrative officers, and not charged with the duties or responsibilities, or endowed with the powers of Cabinet Ministers. If the hon. gentleman shelters himself behind the absence of negative language in the statute, he is clearly violating the spirit and intention of the Act, and the promise and intention of the Prime Minister when he introduced it.

Motion agreed to.

BEER LICENSE IN NEEPAWA, MAN.

Mr. MARTIN moved :

Copies of all correspondence with regard to the granting of a license to manufacture and sell beer in the town of Neepawa, in Manitoba. Also, copies of all petitions from residents of said town protesting against said license.

He said : In the town of Neepawa they have had in force for some time what is known as the Manitoba Local Option Act, under which municipalities are authorized to adopt, practically, a prohibitory law with regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors. While it is true that that Act has been declared unconstitutional by one of our judges in Manitoba, that does not alter the particular grievance which I have to refer to. While, under provincial laws, no intoxicating liquors are allowed to be sold, it is felt to be a great grievance that the Dominion Government should allow, within these municipalities, a brewing license or other license under which the local law is practically annulled. It is felt to be a particular grievance in Neepawa, where for a long time no licenses have been issued under local law, that recently a brewery has been started in the town, operating under Dominion laws, and under a Dominion license. Under that license this brewery has been enabled to sell its product, beer, in violation of the local law, or, at any rate, in antagonism to the local law which, up to that time had been in force and had been acted upon by the municipality. I do not desire to express any opinion as to the wisdom or otherwise of these local prohibitory laws, but it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that where a law of that kind has been enacted, and the people have been allowed to place themselves in a position to have no intoxicating liquors sold within their municipality, it is a very unfortunate thing, and a very unfair thing, to those people that an outside power like the Dominion Government should practically set aside the wishes of the people in this indirect way by licensing a brewery. I understand that very strong representations have been made to the Government, practically by the unanimous voice of the people in the town, protesting against this license being allowed there. I desire to have the information asked for in the motion with the view, if necessary, to again alluding to the matter.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no objection to the papers coming down. I am sorry that the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood), who, at the time this license was issued, was Controller of Inland Revenue, is not in his seat at the moment. But, I suppose it is better to wait until the papers are brought down before any discussion is entered upon.

Motion agreed to.

BREAKWATER AT TIGNISH.

Mr. PERRY moved for :

Copy of the report of the engineer appointed to examine and report on the state of the breakwater at Tignish, Prince Edward Island, during the year 1895.

He said: In making this motion I desire to make a few remarks. Tignish harbour is a harbour of refuge for the fishermen. It is a place where a large trade in fishing is carried on and has been for a number of years, as far back as I can remember. Under the Liberal Administration a vote of money was obtained in order to build the breakwater, and the building of that breakwater much improved navigation. The fishing boats of Tignish are of a smaller size, by a good deal, than the boats that come across from the county of Gloucester, from Shippegan and Pockmouche. These boats are large boats, and as a general rule draw about five feet of water. Just at the inner part of the breakwater there is a bar of tough mud, or marsh mud, and these boats are not able to go over that bar, therefore they must keep outside of it. Our small boats are drawn across this bar inside, and in the morning when they want to go out to try and catch mackerel—because every hon. member who is acquainted with mackerel fishing knows that it is done in the morning and evening—these small boats find that harbour filled up with large boats from the other side, and they cannot get out until two or three o'clock in the afternoon, or whatever hour of the day these large boats are prepared to go out. I have lived in the vicinity of Tignish harbour, and I know that thousands of dollars are lost to our fishermen yearly because these small fishing smacks are not able to get out. A few years ago I endeavoured to persuade the late representative of the county of Gloucester to assist me, as he was a supporter of the Government, in trying to induce the Government to help me to get a grant to improve the navigation of this harbour, and get a dredge sent there to dredge this bar, in order that these large boats might get over it and move into the bay and make room for the small boats to get out. Why, Sir, I have gone there myself, on days when these boats were lying there, and the harbour was so full that I could have driven a horse and wagon right across the harbour over the tops of these boats. I could not put my hand, I may say, between these boats they were so close together; therefore, it would be impossible for the small boats to get out. But the representatives of the county of Gloucester have not thought proper to assist me, and I am sorry for it. I have seen no less than a hundred of these large boats come across from the county of Gloucester to fish on the banks, and whenever a storm arises, they have to look for shelter in Tignish

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

breakwater or in Tignish harbour. When they come there they monopolize the whole harbour, the fishermen of Tignish are not able to get out, and when they are not able to get out, the loss which they suffer can hardly be estimated. Now, Sir, I drew to this subject the attention of the Minister of Public Works—I am very sorry he is not in his place—a few days ago, and asked him if he was aware of the condition of the breakwater at Tignish, and he said he was. He said his engineer had made an examination and a report. He said, also, that he was aware that the breakwater was in a very dilapidated condition, and was liable to be carried away any day, either by ice or storm. I asked him if the department had taken any steps towards securing the breakwater, and he said no, and the reason was, he said, because the Government had no money at their disposal. They were prepared to let a breakwater costing $15,000 go adrift the same as they allowed the wharf to do at West Point a few years ago. An Order in Council could not be passed placing $3,000 or $4,000 or $5,000 at the disposal of the Minister of Public Works to enable him to save the breakwater at Tignish, which has cost $15,000. Sir, what is the reason? The simple reason is this, that the breakwater at Tignish is in a constituency represented by a Liberal. Why, Sir, some men have said to me time and again: "Why don't you support the Government? You will never get a grant for the Tignish breakwater unless you do." Sir, this feeling is confirmed by the action of the present Minister of Public Works. In 1894 he promised me that he would send his engineer to inspect the breakwater and make a report. He did not do so. He says that last year he did send an engineer there. Well, I would like to know who the engineer is that he sent there. I would like to find out the date he was there. I would like to know the reason why that engineer was not instructed to notify me that he was coming. I know that some hot-headed Tories of Tignish were invited to accompany him, but I was not invited. The idea was to make me as unpopular as possible. But, Sir, the Minister of Public Works and the Government at his back, need not think that by doing wrong and injustice to the people of Tignish, they will compel the people to return a Tory in my place. There is no danger of that. We are mostly French in Tignish, recollect I am a Frenchman myself, and I am proud of it. If this Government wait until a member is sent from Tignish to support a Tory Government, while the people are suffering this injustice, this unpatriotic treatment at the hands of the Government that they have been receiving for the last seventeen years, they will wait until there is hair growing on their teeth. The Minister said, "Yes; but we have no money at our command." The hon. gentleman has not even thought proper to place a sum in the Estimates to repair Tignish breakwater. The only amount in the Estimates under this head is $6,000 for general repairs of breakwaters, with the exception of two special sums, one for Souris, $37,500, which is much needed, and it is fortunate for those people they are represented by two supporters of the Government; and another amount for Kier's Shore. In regard to Souris, let me tell the House that at the next general elections there will be only one representative in this House for that district owing to the gerrymander of the present Government, and, therefore, I suppose only one half the amount will be available. In regard to the latter grant, the locality is my own county, and I feel obliged to the Minister to having shown interest in the eastern part of my constituency so that repairs will be made to the breakwater there. But I should like to know the reason why repairs have not been carried out at Tignish. I was born and brought up in the locality, I have property interests there and I have been connected with the fisheries, and if a Government officer had been sent to the district I should have been glad to have driven him to the location of the breakwater and have given him full information. At the present time I intend to confine my remarks to Tignish. There are other harbours in Prince County which deserve attention, and that might call for remarks to show how neglected they have been by the present Government, how unpatriotic this Government has been to Prince County. It has been represented since 1873 by Liberals with the exception of two occasions when it was represented by a Liberal and Conservative, but even then the Conservatives had not sufficient interest to obtain a vote for a breakwater or wharf in the county. I ask the Minister of Public Works as follows:—

Mr. PERRY asked :

Has the Department of Public Works caused a survey to be made of the breakwater at Tignish, Prince Edward Island, during the season of 1895, as promised by the Minister of Public Works in the sessions of 1894 and 1895; and, if so, has a report been made?

Mr. OUMET. An examination of the breakwater at Tignish, P.E.I., was made during the session of 1895, and a report has been submitted.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Is the Department of Public Works aware of the fact that the Tignish Breakwater, Prince Edward Island, is in a dilapidated condition and liable to be carried away at any moment by storm, &c.? Has the department taken steps for the immediate repair of said breakwater?

Mr. OUMET. The department is aware of the fact that the breakwater at Tignish, P.E.I., is in need of repair. The department has not taken steps for immediate repairs to the breakwater, owing to lack of funds.

Suppose the whole breakwater was about to be swept away, has not the Government power to pass an Order in Council to raise $4,000 or $5,000 for repairs? The Government are liable to violate the constitution when they please. They can appoint men to the Cabinet who had no right to hold such positions. They can humbug the people for four or five weeks by announcing public measures in the Speech from the Throne and refusing to bring them down. They can hold back elections in certain constituencies when it suits them to do so, and when the reverse is the case they can have an election within nine days. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite will argue that they have not power to expend $3,000 or $4,000 to save a public work from destruction. I suppose when the proposal of the Minister of Public Works came before the Cabinet they were quarreling among themselves, for it was about the time that the "kick" took place. I advise the Minister of Public Works not to wait until these Estimates are passed before he orders repairs to the Tignish breakwater. Perhaps these Estimates will never be passed—I am a little doubtful whether they ever will be. If we are to judge the future by the past we must remember that there is a "to-morrow" still, and these Estimates may never be carried into force. However, I would advise the Minister to make preparations to put the breakwater in order, and let him not take action because of the statements made by the Liberal member for the county, but let him act from a sense of justice, economy, patriotism, and a desire to help the fishermen, who are called upon to expose their lives in the Gulf of St. Lawrence to earn a living. These fishermen consume more dutiable goods per head than even the Minister of Public Works himself, except champagne, which, we are now told, is very cheap. I regret the hon. member for Gloucester is not present to aid me in this motion, as no less than a hundred large boats cross the Straits and seek to enter Tignish Harbour. This, however, is difficult to accomplish for lack of dredging, which would not cost more than about $200. Last summer some boats came to the entrance of the breakwater during a storm on a Saturday night, but they could not get in. It was nip and go that the craft was not smashed, and the crew lost. How would the Minister of Public Works console himself if he were the means of losing these lives? Could he restore them? I presume there were three or four married men in that boat, and how was he going to support these widows and orphans? What reparation could he make to prepare these souls to go before their maker in the next world—and they were not so well prepared may be as, perhaps, the Minister is at all times. The hon. Minister of Public Works says he had no money on his hands for this work. Why, I thought he controlled most of the revenue of this country, and that his department spent more money than any other department in Canada. He must think that I am a child, and that he can play with this House, and with the people of Prince Edward Island, when he tells me that he has no funds in his hands. Who can believe a statement of that kind? Does it look honest, or reasonable, or manly? Now, I would advise the Minister of Public Works to send as early as possible next spring a dredge down to dredge the bar at Tignish. The fishermen of Tignish have a charge against his department for losing several thousands of dollars because they could not go out of harbour on account of its being closed. There is another thing I would wish to ask, the Minister of Railways this time. I know he is very fond of myself, and very apt to do as I tell him, and I am quite sure he will not refuse the small request that I am going to make. Last year he was very liberal in offering to build branch railways in Prince Edward Island. He was going to give us a hundred miles of railway at an estimated cost of $1,100,000, and I hope and trust his mind tends in that direction yet. I am going to ask him now to build a branch railway from Tignish station to the breakwater. He cannot point to any harbour on Prince Edward Island where there is no railway, except this very harbour of Tignish. At Alberton, Summerside, Charlottetown and Souris, there are branch lines for the shipping. I can tell the hon. gentleman that there is a large traffic from Tignish station down to the shipping. The produce, especially fish, must be shipped by rail, and it takes a great deal of hardship to haul fish from the shore down to Tignish station.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How far is that?

Mr. PERRY. About two miles. The land is level and there are no bridges to be built, except a small one across Tignish river, which won't cost very much. That branch will pay just as well as any other part of the railway system, and the people are expecting it. It would facilitate trade very much, and the merchants there would be willing to pay freight for the haul. I know one gentleman who keeps four spans of horses to haul the freight in spring and fall, through the muddy roads, where the horses are not able to carry half a load. All that trouble might be obviated by having a small railway from the station to the breakwater. Perhaps the Minister may say that the people have not asked for it, but I can tell him that they are having a meeting at Tignish to-night, which no doubt will be a large one, for the purpose of getting up a petition to ask the Government to agree to a small grant so as to build this short line. I would not doubt but that the Minister would do that, seeing we are on the eve of an election, and that his friend, the Conservative candidate who is opposed to me there, might possibly have a chance of occupying a seat in this House instead of myself. At all events, the refusal of the Minister will not have the effect of keeping me out. I think he will find me here once more to talk about Tignish, Miminegash, Pockmouche, and all those other places down there where the people are not treated well by this Government. The Minister of Public Works says this is a small matter, and, that being the case, I don't think I need say any more about it.

Mr. OUIMET. I have no objection to bring down the papers asked for by the hon. gentleman. I believe they will show to his satisfaction that the promises I made last session have been fully carried out. I sent an engineer to examine the breakwater at Tignish, and to inquire also as to the advisability of having some dredging done. The report of the engineer has been sent to the department, and as to what shall be done, or as to what amount shall be placed in the Estimates, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Perry) shall see when the supplementary Estimates are brought down. I am sorry the hon. gentleman should have taken me at a disadvantage by complaining generally that his county has not been well treated, because when the papers are brought down, the hon. gentleman will see that his county has been just as well treated, and I think better treated than any other county in Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman is certainly wrong in complaining that I have any grudge against him, or that I wish to be the instrument of preventing him coming back to this House next Parliament. As I have already suggested, I would say for the general information of the House, that if my department were going to undertake all the works that are necessary on these—I won't say unimportant harbours—not only along the coast of Prince Edward Island, but also New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, the sum of $3,000,000 at least would be required. My hon. friend, I hope, will help me in getting the money as soon as the finances of the country justify us in asking for this large expenditure. We are doing everything we can in our department to keep up these numerous works in the county of Prince and in the other counties of the lower provinces, and I am sure that the hon. gentleman, if he said everything he believed, would say that we are doing our duty towards his county, as well as towards every other county, however it may be represented in this House.

Mr. PERRY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that is very poor satisfaction. The hon. Minister of Public Works says he hopes that I will help him to get the money. So I will, if he will only show me how. But before the money is got, according to his statement, the breakwater may be carried away.

Mr. OUIMET. Oh, no, the breakwater will give the hon. gentleman every chance to complain against the Government. It will remain there.

Mr. PERRY. All I want is that the Tignish breakwater be repaired and put in condition to serve the people who require it, and that this bar be dredged. These people have as good a right to use that harbour as anybody else, and in order to afford them the accommodation they require in their fishing operations the breakwater ought to be repaired and repaired in good time; and that bar ought to be dredged as early in the spring as possible. The large boats do not come across until some time in July or August, just about the time our mackerel fishing begins. Every one who knows anything about that fishery knows that those engaged in it fish in small boats; and when the large boats come, they monopolize the harbour so completely that the small boats cannot get out. The result is that these small boats lose hundreds and perhaps thousands of dollars in the season, because they have to go out at the break of day and return at 9 or 10 o'clock, in order that the fish may not be spoiled by the heat of the day, and they go out again in the evening. Is it any wonder that I speak on their behalf, and assure the Minister of Public Works that this work is needed? I am not asking it merely for the sake of talking. I know I do not talk very well, and I do not talk to please the Minister of Public Works. I talk because I believe this to be a matter of necessity; and if these works are not looked after immediately, I contend that the people are badly used and that the Government are neglectful of their duty. The people of Tignish pay their taxes, and perhaps a little more than their full share. They are citizens of Canada, and if the Government are going to neglect us in this way, we might as well break up the union between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion. The hon. Minister says his engineer was there. When was he there. I would like to know? He has not stated that. I do not know whether he knows himself. I hope the engineer was there, though I did not see him. However, I hope the Minister will be as good as his promise. He is not always so. But I do hope that he will be in this case, if not for the sake of the people of Tignish, whom I represent, for the sake of saving the property belonging to the Government of which he is the Minister of Public Works.

CENTRAL EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. McMILLAN moved for:

Statement of the total expenditure in connection with the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa, up to the 1st day of January, 1896:—The price paid for the land. The total cost of buildings, and labour in making permanent improvements, and the total cost of other labour on the farm. The amounts paid for manure and fertilizers. The amount paid for live stock. The total amount paid for machinery and implements. The amount paid for harness. The value of live stock on the farm, 1st January, 1896. The total revenue from sales of live stock, butter, cheese and produce of the farm, to 1st January, 1896.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before the experimental farm was established the Minister of Agriculture of that day stated that $300,000 would be required to complete the buildings and equipment of all the experimental stations, including that at Ottawa, and that $30,000 or $40,000 a year would be all that would be required to keep them up. Now, I see that $70,000 was voted last year as the annual expenditure on the experimental farms. I see that there is an increase of $5,000 this year which brings the expenditure up to $75,000. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) is not in his seat, but I understand that the Government is going to take a new departure with respect to stocking those farms. The department of live stock has not been attended to as it should since the Experimental Farm was established. We hear a great deal about the great benefit of our butter and cheese factories, but in order to be thoroughly successful in these industries, we must have the foundation of a good herd of cows. I hold that this is one of the duties which the experimental stations ought to undertake. They ought to show the farmers how to establish a good herd of cows, as this is the root of success in all our dairy operations. We were told some years ago that they were going to keep on the Experimental Farm here forty head of cattle on forty acres of land, but that experiment has evidently fallen through for we hear nothing now about it. We all know, as farmers, that the success of farming to-day depends upon being able to raise the greatest quantity at the smallest cost upon a given quantity of land. The greater the quantity that can be raised on a given quantity of land and the smaller the cost is the test of practical farming. Our Experimental Farm has not been successful in this respect. In this age of keen competition, when we have to come in contact with the different nations in the markets of Great Britain, it is the country which can succeed the best in raising produce at the least cost and best quality which will control the market. The foundation of both the butter and cheese industry consists in the building up of a thoroughly profitable herd of cows which will produce, at a very cheap rate, good milk for ten or eleven months of the year. That is the first thing to which the Government should pay attention, and I do not think it requires any special line of husbandry in order to do that. Our travelling dairies have been of great benefit to our farmers by showing them how to produce better butter and cheese, but the foundation has not been laid. The Government have not by means of their Experimental Farm and stations, shown our farmers how they can raise a good herd of dairy animals, and it is this which really lies at the foundation of their success. I presume, that the Government intend going in for herds of costly cattle, composed of thoroughbred animals. But that is a branch of industry which has been carried to the highest perfection, in the province of Ontario, by private individuals, so that the Government need not undertake it. What we want the Government to show us is how we can get a thoroughly good herd of cattle in the shortest time, bred upon the farm, which will give the best results.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The information will be brought down which the hon. gentleman requires, but I must express my regret that my hon. colleague the Minister of Agriculture was not in his place, as he no doubt would have taken a great deal of interest in the hon. gentleman's remarks and entered thoroughly into the discussion of the subject. As the hon. gentleman has said, however, the discussion will be gone into later on, and then my hon. colleague will be able to give it his attention.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Secretary of State for the Colonies concerning the Atlantic Fast Service and the proposed Pacific Cable.—(Mr. Laurier.)

Return of the receipts and expenditures in detail chargeable to the Consolidated Fund from the 1st day of July, 1895, to the 1st day of February, 1896, and comparative statements from the 1st day of July, 1894, to the 1st day of February, 1895.—(Mr. Laurier, for Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return showing the names of the operators and location of mills in which corn was ground for human food during the year ending 30th June, 1895. The number of bushels ground by each, and the gross amount of rebate made to each, and the amount of rebate yet due or claimed by each and not paid, if any.—(Mr. McMullen.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I beg to move the adjournment of the House, and in doing so I wish to tell my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, that from this out it will be necessary for us to sit later than we have done so far. The Budget discussion, of course, will take some days, and there is important legislation which must be brought down, and in order that there may not be any misunderstanding, I desire to say that from this out we will have to sit later than we have done so far.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not exactly know what my hon. friend means. It was understood some days ago that the House would sit until about eleven o'clock. Do I understand that the Government intend to have later sittings?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN.

Mr. LAURIER. Until what hour?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman. I am only expressing to the House what the leader of the House desired me to express; but he did not state the hour to which we would sit. But it is the intention of the Government to have later sittings than we have had so far.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) After the Bill is brought down I suppose.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Bill will be brought down soon enough for the hon. gentleman.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

INSOLVENCY.

Mr. MARTIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 51) respecting insolvency. He said: I wish to offer a few explanations to the House as to the nature of the Bill I desire to introduce. The House will remember that in 1894, the different boards of trade, principally the boards of Montreal and Toronto, spent much time and money in considering this question of bankruptcy, and in co-operating with other boards of trade in Canada, I understand, a Bill was drawn and sent to the Government for consideration. The Government, I understand, adopted practically the whole of the Bill, departing from it, it is true, in some respects. In the Speech from the Throne in 1894, we were informed that a measure affecting bankruptcy and insolvency would be introduced during the session. In pursuance of that promise a Bill was introduced in the Senate. It was discussed more or less in that chamber, and was referred to a committee. The Toronto Board of Trade, and also, I think, the Montreal Board of Trade, sent here representatives, legal gentlemen, to watch the progress of the Bill, before the committee of the Senate. Other persons also took an interest in the Bill, persons representing the trading community, and there was a great deal of time spent in perfecting the Bill in the committee in the Senate. Towards the end of the session the Bill was finally passed in the Senate, and introduced in this House. But it never got further in this House than the first reading, no discussion of it took place, and it was allowed to die at that point. It is a fair inference from the conduct of the Government in the matter that they intended from the beginning not to proceed further than merely introduce the bill in the Senate and give an opportunity for discussion, although the Government deliberately informed the House and the country through the Speech from the Throne that it was their intention to deal with this most important question, and I think that representatives of the boards of trade were assured most positively that it was the intention of the Government to press that matter to a conclusion. Relying upon that promise, those boards of trade have spent considerable money, and members of the different boards have devoted a large amount of time to help the Government to prepare a perfect insolvency measure. The following year, 1895, His Excellency the Governor General again announced to Parliament that it was the intention to ask Parliament to legislate on this important question of insolvency. Again a pretense was made of doing something in respect to the matter. The Bill, as amended during the previous session, was introduced in the Senate by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the Premier, and considerable discussion again took place in the Upper House. Again the matter was referred to a committee of the Senate, and that committee held a great many sittings and spent much time in considering the details of the measure. Again the boards of trade, relying upon the renewed assurance of the Government that this was not a mere pretense, but that it was the actual intention of the Government to proceed with this legislation, sent legal gentlemen to represent the views of the respective boards. Deputations came from Montreal and Toronto, and perhaps other cities, to represent to the Government their views upon the question; and in spite of the inglorious failure of the Government at the previous session to carry out their promise, the business men appeared to believe the very strong assurances which were given to them in 1895, that a measure would be put through. However, in 1895, the Bill did not get so far even as it did in 1894; because after it had gone to the committee of the Senate, it was tied up there, and never reached the House of Commons. Now, Mr. Speaker, I fancy that no member of this House will dispute the proposition: that the question of bankruptcy is considered most important by those classes in the community which a measure of that kind would affect, notably the trading classes of the country. I see that Mr. Stapleton Caldecott, the retiring President of the Board of Trade of Toronto, in his recent address made allusion to this matter. I shall trespass upon the time of the House long enough to read an extract from his address, because I think it fairly represents the views of business men with regard to this question. He used the following language:—

DOMINION BANKRUPTCY ACT.

Through a judicial decision which showed that, under the Ontario Act for the equitable distribution of insolvent debtors' estates, it was possible for a debtor to assign a portion only of his estate, a deputation waited upon the hon. Attorney General to point out the mischief that might thus be caused, and it is gratifying to know that immediately Sir Oliver Mowat's attention was called to the point, he promised to make the needful amendment, which has since been carried into effect, and is now working very satisfactorily. But though the Ontario Act for the equitable distribution of insolvent debtors' estates is much better than nothing, it is far from meeting the wants of the commercial community. What is required, and what this board has been incessantly calling for year by year, since 1882, is an equitable Dominion Bankruptcy Act for the whole confederation of Canada, which, while giving the creditors the full control of an estate that is evidently insolvent, will prevent fraudulent preferences, punish reckless selling, compel proper book-keeping, and yet give a discharge to the man who has honestly given up his estate to his creditors, and not been guilty of either reckless selling, fraudulent buying, or extravagant living. Such a Bill as this was drafted by a united committee of the boards of trade of Canada, and brought before the notice of the late lamented Sir John Thompson, who promised to give this important subject his early attention, but, unfortunately for Canada, the angel of death cruelly and suddenly snatched him away from what promised to be a long career of usefulness. The present Premier, however, consented to take up the matter, but it is to be regretted that, so far, though a Bill has been prepared that largely fills the wants of the trading community, this much-needed legislation has not been presented to the notice of the House of Commons.

Meantime, the need of a sound bankruptcy Bill is deeply felt. The passing of such a Bill will greatly advance that interprovincial trade which every patriotic Canadian desires to promote, will reduce to a minimum fraudulent and reckless trading, and will powerfully help forward the commercial progress of the country. May I not ask how much longer shall the commerce of the country call before this needed Bill shall become the law of the land?

I am satisfied, Sir, that these remarks of Mr. Caldecott, the retiring President of the Toronto Board of Trade, represent fairly well the views of the business portion of the community. I have ventured as a private member to introduce into this House an insolvency measure founded upon the Bill to which Mr. Caldecott refers and which was drawn up by a committee of the boards of trade of Canada, and upon which the Government founded their Bill of 1894, which was followed by a similar Bill in 1895. The first matter of importance which this Bill deals with, is the applicability of the Act. Of course this question of insolvency, especially when we get into details, is one upon which there is great divergence of opinion, and a divergence of opinion even amongst the commercial classes who are in favour of the principle of the Bill. The Government measure which was introduced last session confined the operations of the Bill to traders; to those persons who made a living by buying and selling merchandise and manufacturers. I understand that in committee the operation of the Bill was extended to the farming and other producing classes. I may be wrong as to that, but, at any rate, this Bill which I now present to this House for consideration, does apply to the two classes, namely, the trading class who earn their living by buying and selling merchandise and manufacturing, and also, all those who earn their living by growing or producing the natural products of the soil. In this latter class would be included farmers, miners, lumbermen, and other persons who cannot be said to manufacture their goods, but who produce them from the soil. Section 4 deals with the circumstances under which a person may become insolvent. These are such as have shown themselves, from long experience in the working out of previous Insolvent Acts, and in the working out of the equitable distribution Acts of the various provinces, to be such as to warrant the placing of a man, a firm, or a company, in insolvency. At this stage of the Bill, it would probably be premature to discuss minutely the different circumstances under which a man can be made insolvent, but I fancy that the section, as it appears in this Bill, governs all the cases which are proper to be included in a section of that character. The next clause provides that when any of these events referred to in section 4 occur, any creditor of a person whom it is proposed to place in insolvency, with a claim above a certain amount, may apply to a judge, and, upon proof of his case, the judge makes an insolvency order. In the Government Bill, this order was called a receiving order, but, as the plan of the present Bill differs considerably from that of the Government Bill so far as the effect of this order is concerned, I have thought it better to change the name, and call it an insolvency order. The creditor making the application, is entitled, under the provisions of this clause, to name, in his application, the official liquidator whom he desires to be appointed for the estate in question. It will be seen when I get further on in the Bill, that it provides for the appointment in particular places of a number of persons qualified to act as official liquidators; and the creditor is allowed to choose such one of the official liquidators in a particular place whom he wishes to act for the estate.

In some cases it is provided that an insolvency order may be made without any notice whatever to the debtor. In other cases, such as that where the application is made on the ground of the general inability of the debtor to meet his indebtedness as it falls due, it is provided that notice shall be served on the debtor before the insolvency is made. By section 11 it is provided that where an insolvency order is made without notice to the debtor, he may, within five days after being served with the order, apply to the court to annul it. In the case where notice is required to be given to him, he has the privilege on the return of the notice of showing that it is not a proper case for an insolvency order to be made. These sections are carefully worked out, and give to a debtor every reasonable opportunity of bringing his case before the court, and preventing a particular creditor using the provisions of the Act in a harsh and unfair manner. At the same time, they give to the creditor the opportunity and right of placing a debtor who is really insolvent into insolvency without any unnecessary delay.

Section 16 provides that the effect of an insolvency order shall be to stay all other actions. This, of course, is usual in an insolvency Bill. It is quite proper that when this particular means of disposing of man's estate is resorted to, the other means provided by law of bringing an action and getting a judgment and execution shall be stayed.

The next matter which the Bill deals with is one of very great importance, and one which I fancy is, after all, the crucial test of the efficiency of an insolvency law; that is, the question of the appointment of official liquidators. No doubt the principal reason why previous insolvency Acts in Canada have not been satisfactory has been that the official assignees who were appointed and who acted under those Acts, took advantage of the opportunities given them, and converted to their own use the estates of insolvent debtors which were placed in their charge; and I fancy that is one of the principal reasons which have prevented the Parliament of Canada, since the repeal of the last insolvency Act, again venturing upon that subject of legislation. It became a crying disgrace to the administration of the insolvency laws that so many estates were absorbed by the assignees into whose hands they came. This Bill proposes to deal with that question by providing that the boards of trade in each city whose population exceeds 20,000 may appoint an official liquidator, and in each city whose population exceeds 50,000, the board of trade shall have the privilege of appointing an additional official liquidator for every 50,000 people. It is complained that in the operation of previous insolvency Acts political motives interfered with the appointment of proper men to the position of official assignee—that men were appointed more for their political services than on account of any qualifications they possessed for the position. The object of section 17 is to place in the hands of those organizations in the country which peculiarly represent the commercial portion of the community, namely, the boards of trade, the appointment of official liquidators. Section 18, however, also confers upon the Governor General in Council the power of appointing official liquidators. The appointments made by the Governor General in Council are to be confined to particular localities; that is to say, Canada is to be divided into districts, and the Governor General in Council is to appoint one or more official liquidators for each district, and an official liquidator appointed in that way is not to have power to act beyond his district. An official liquidator appointed by a board of trade is to have power to act in any place within the province in which the city whose board of trade made the appointment is situated. In the case of the city of Winnipeg it is provided that liquidators appointed by the board of trade in that city shall have the right of acting also for the North-west Territories. The reason for that apparent exception is that there is no city in the North-west Territories which, under the provisions of this Bill, would be entitled to appoint an official liquidator; and it is well known that the city of Winnipeg is the wholesale centre, not only for the province of Manitoba, but also for the North-west Territories. As a matter of fact, at present the official assignee appointed by the government of Manitoba practically does all the work for the Territories as well as for the province of Manitoba. I may say that in the city of Winnipeg the deepest interest has been taken in the question of the character of the official assignee. We have been fortunate in Manitoba for many years past in having practically but one official assignee, under the provisions of the local Act providing for assignments for the benefit of creditors. It is true, there are one or two assignees appointed for outside districts. But, so far as the great bulk of business is concerned, the official assignee residing in Winnipeg, Mr. S. A. D. Bertrand, practically does all the work; and when it was announced in 1894 that the Government intended to deal with this question of insolvency, it was with very considerable alarm that the Board of Trade of Winnipeg contemplated this change. If, however, provisions such as I have referred to, and which are contained in sections 17 and 18 of the Act, were allowed to become law, and the boards of trade of the different important cities in Canada were allowed to make appointments of official liquidators, then the creditors would have a choice. If the Government, by any accident, should appoint a good man as official assignee, no doubt in this particular district he would have lots of work to do. You will understand that in this Bill there are no voluntary assignments, that a man can only get into insolvency on the application of a creditor, and that creditor has the privilege, under the Bill, of selecting from among several persons, who are qualified to act, the one whom he desires to be the assignee of that particular estate. So, for the purpose of illustration, taking the case of Manitoba and the North-west, if the Government appointed unsatisfactory persons as official liquidators in any portion of that territory, the commercial community would have the power, under this Act, of selecting the gentleman appointed by the Winnipeg Board of Trade, no matter in what part of Winnipeg or the North-west Territories the insolvency might take place; and experience has shown that the gentleman to whom I have referred, Mr. Bertrand, is able, with the experience he has had and the staff he has collected round him, to manage the estates of insolvent debtors all through the North-west. I may say that his record is an excellent one, and it would be with very great regret indeed that the commercial community in that part of Canada would regard any change in the law by which the work would be taken out of the hands of this gentleman. It is provided in my Bill that the boards of trade may change their appointment, that is to say, they may dismiss the person first appointed and appoint another person at any time after one year has elapsed from the appointment. Of course, in the case of appointments made by the Governor General, a change may be made at any time.

Section 27 provides that an insolvent, as soon as the insolvency order is made, shall prepare and sign a complete statement of his affairs, showing in every way of what his estate consists, showing also his liabilities, and also his opinion as to what has been the cause of his insolvency.

Then the next step the Act provides for is the calling of the first meeting of creditors; and the object of that first meeting is to decide finally who shall be the assignee or liquidator of the estate. In this regard, the Bill which I offer differs radically from that proposed by the Government, because it is provided by the Government measure that there should be an officer, to be called the official receiver—one in each district—and that all assignments, or rather, all receiving orders, as they are called in that Act, should provide for the estate being handed over to an official receiver. And it is provided that the official receiver should not, in any case, become the final liquidator of the estate. He is to be a mere official for the purpose of taking charge of the estate from the date of the insolvency order to the first meeting of creditors. Now, there are very strong objections to a provision of that kind. The expense rendered necessary by this official receiver taking charge of the estate, putting a man in charge, carrying on the business possibly for the time being, taking stock, providing for all these matters, would be a very great expense indeed. The reason the Government were induced to adopt a provision of that kind was that it had been found, in the operation of the older Acts, that the official assignee, who was appointed in the first place, spent his whole energy between his appointment and the first meeting of creditors in lobbying amongst the creditors in order to secure his appointment as permanent assignee. It was, therefore, thought advisable that the official receiver should be debarred from becoming the final liquidator, and should have no interest whatever in anything except taking care of the insolvent's estate during this period, which must be, in every case, from two to three weeks. I think it might fairly be said that in a majority of cases it would be a period of three weeks. However, I think it would be found that the difference between this insolvency Bill and the old Acts in the manner of placing the man into insolvency would get over any objection to the first assignee working for his appointment the second time. Under the old Act the debtor could make a voluntary assignment, and he would really have the choice of his official assignee. Under this Bill the debtor has no choice, has nothing whatever to say as to who the official assignee shall be. That is the choice of the creditors, so that I have ventured, in drawing this Bill, to depart from the arrangement provided in the Government measure, and to allow the official liquidator chosen by the creditor who makes the application, to become the final liquidator, if the creditors so express their desire at their first meeting. The advantage of that course is, I think, abundantly clear, because all these expenses which the official receiver would be obliged to incur, under the Government proposition, are largely done away with, since it is quite clear that if you have an official receiver appointed first, and who remains in charge of the estate for three weeks or longer, many of the expenses which he incurs and which have to be paid to him, will again be incurred by the creditors' assignee when he is appointed. So that if you can, without getting into difficulties of a worse nature, allow the first appointed assignee or liquidator to become the final liquidator, you save a very considerable amount of expense, and I think I may venture to say that the provision which appears, I think for the first time, in this Bill allowing the boards of trade to appoint official liquidators is another reason why it is advisable to allow the first liquidator to become the final liquidator under the provisions of this Bill; because, if the official liquidator, appointed by the board of trade of the city which does the wholesale business of the locality in which the debtor lived at the time of his insolvency, be chosen, the chances are that that gentleman will be quite acceptable to the creditors when they meet, and, in nine cases out of ten, I venture to say, the first appointed liquidator will become, by vote of the creditors, the final creditors' liquidator. If that can be done, a very great objection to the Government's proposed measure will be done away with. Section 33 provides for the appointment of inspectors not exceeding five in number. Section 35 provides for the examination of the insolvent at the instance of the creditor or of the inspectors, and section 36 provides for the examination of any person whatever, including the wife of the insolvent, who may be shown to the court to be likely to give important information with regard to the affairs of the insolvent. Now, these two sections are very valuable, no doubt. The debtor may be able to withhold the information, but this provides for the examination of other persons, including the wife of the debtor, who may be shown to be the possessor of important information. These provisions emphasize the advantage of a Dominion insolvency Act over the Acts which are in force in the different provinces for the distribution of insolvents' estates. It is found so much easier, under a general Act, to make general provisions of this kind effective. Mr. Caldecott emphasizes the importance of this. He admits that, so far as it goes, the Ontario Act for the distribution of assets is valuable; still, in this and other respects, a Dominion insolvency Act would be of very much greater value to the commercial community.

Section 38 deals with the important matter of discharge. That is a matter that the local legislature cannot deal with. It has been decided by the Imperial Privy Council that those enactments of the local legislatures which provide for the equitable distribution of insolvent estates among the creditors pro rata rather than by the old system of allowing one creditor to get judgment and thereby establish a preference lien on the estate of the insolvent are intra vires, in the absence of a general Dominion insolvency law. But none of the local legislatures have ever attempted to make provision for the discharge—that is the legal discharge—from the claims of creditors of an insolvent; for it has been admitted, and it is perfectly clear under the British North America Act, that that is a matter coming exclusively within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. I think it is a matter of very great importance indeed to a young and growing community like Canada that there should be provisions for the discharge of all honest debtors. It is no advantage to the creditors of an insolvent, it is no advantage to the commercial community, that a man who has been unfortunate in business, even if from his own fault, if it is an honest fault, and who cannot pay his debts in full, should be refused a discharge except upon payment in full. When a man has been engaged in a very large business and his liabilities represent a large amount, it is quite hopeless for him ever to dream of being able, even with the greatest industry, to pay all his debts. It is surely a great advantage to the community to allow an honest man, a man of ability, who, perhaps, through circumstances over which he has no control whatever has become liable for large amounts, to obtain a discharge from those liabilities enabling him to start again in the business world, probably in much better shape to successfully engage in business than he was before, by reason of this very experience. Since 1879 in Canada there has been no means whatever by which the unfortunate debtor could be relieved from these claims except through the voluntary action of his creditors. I may say that, so far as the commercial community is concerned, they have manifested a desire to relieve their unfortunate debtors where they have been satisfied that the debtor had been honest in incurring his liabilities. But it has often occurred that, while a man has been able to obtain his discharge from his commercial creditors, yet, during the course of his business, he has become involved with other persons who were not in general commercial trade, as in the purchase of real estate or other property, and has assumed, on account of those purchases, very large liabilities. Many a man, since the repeal of the Insolvency Act in 1879, has been weighted down for life by liabilities of this kind. I do not think there has been a better illustration of that than in the real estate booms that have taken place in different parts of the Dominion. I may refer particularly to the cases of the city of Winnipeg and the city of Toronto, where, during a limited time, real estate rose rapidly in value, and speculative persons were induced to assume enormous liabilities not thinking at the time that they were liabilities. But the inevitable reaction came and real estate values fell, and these unfortunate persons, without any fault except an undue speculative spirit, found themselves loaded with mortgages and covenants for amounts which it would take them a thousand years to pay, even if they earned very considerable salaries.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask the hon. gentleman why his Bill does not apply to all classes?

Mr. MARTIN. I have already explained that this Bill applies practically to every one. It does not apply to professional classes, but it applies to traders, and to all those persons who make their living by producing anything from the soil, including farmers, or miners, or lumbermen who produce saw-logs, and classes of that kind. It does not apply to the professional classes, and in that regard, no doubt, it does involuntarily a certain amount of injustice to those classes. It does not allow a man to go into insolvency of his own accord; he must be put into insolvency by his creditors.

Mr. MULOCK. Why don't you apply it to professional classes?

Mr. MARTIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are many reasons why it should not apply to professional classes. But as I said when I was discussing that section, I do not think that this is the time to go fully into that matter. I may say that personally I am very strongly of the opinion that it should apply to every one of the trading classes, after having heard the arguments that were offered before the Senate committee last session, I think that it would be justifiable to extend it to all those persons who are practically in trade, because it seems to me that a farmer, so far as insolvency purposes are concerned, is practically in trade, and, therefore, is a producer; and so is a miner. They are dealers, in a sense. They do not obtain their livelihood simply by the exercise of their brains, without applying them to natural objects. A lawyer, for instance, or a doctor, has nothing whatever to do with any natural object; all he has to do is to consider in his own mind the cases that are laid before him; and so with dentists and other professional men. But a man who deals in something, is admitted by all to be a trader, a person to whom an insolvency Act may be applied, that is to say, a man who buys and sells merchandise at a profit as a means of making a living. It seems to me there is no distinction between that class and the classes who do not deal in merchandise, but who, with the help of the soil, produce a crop of wheat, or a crop of corn, or a crop of fruit, that is, persons who, by delving in the earth's surface, convert the natural constituents of the earth into valuable products, or persons who make saw-logs out of trees—all these persons are actually engaged in what may be called trade. However, as I say, that is a matter upon which there may be a great difference of opinion, but it seems to me it is not a matter which should decide the question of whether there should or should not be an insolvency Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. Does your Bill provide machinery for giving discharges?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. On what principle would you relieve one man from liability and not another?

Mr. MARTIN. Of course, as I say, there is apparently an injustice done to the lawyer who has become involved in speculation, who has loaded himself up with mortgages and assumed liabilities; but in all matters of legislation, it is quite impossible to be thoroughly fair, and to be thoroughly consistent. No matter what the law is, there always will be persons who do not receive the same benefit from it as other persons; there always will be opportunities of pointing out how the law works unfairly.

Now, one of the objections to the Insolvent Act we had in force before, was the fact that discharges were too easily obtained, that the provisions of the Act allowed men to go purposely into insolvency, to start out in business with the intention of becoming insolvent, and by the easy provisions of that Act, to obtain a discharge, and relieve themselves of their liabilities, having the money in their pockets which they had made out of their transactions, and then launch forth into business again. So far as this provision is concerned, I follow the Government measure, and in these respects the Bill surrounds the discharge with many precautions which, I fancy, will obviate objections of that kind. In the first place, it is provided that a man may obtain his discharge under a deed of composition and discharge, provided the deed is signed by creditors representing three-fourths in value of his liabilities, and a majority in number of those whose claims exceed $100 in amount. Even in that case the discharge is not obtained at once, because it is provided that after a deed of composition and discharge, duly executed by the proper number of creditors, both in number and value, it is necessary to call a meeting of creditors, so that any one person who is opposed to the discharge, may attend that meeting and examine the insolvent fully as to his business operations, as to his estates, and to his manner of trading, and in that way bring the facts before the attention of those persons even who have signed the discharge, and after that, it is necessary for the insolvent to apply to the court to confirm this discharge. In making his application to the court, there is read to the judge a report of this meeting, and any resolutions that the creditors may have passed with regard to the action of the insolvent. It is then left open for any man, even though he has signed the deed of composition and discharge, to oppose his discharge before the judge. It is also provided that no deed shall be valid unless it provides for a payment in cash of all costs and charges connected with the insolvent, all privileged claims—I shall explain later what constitutes privileged claims; and it must also provide for the payment within one year of at least one half of all claims. This provision takes away from dishonest persons many of the inducements that formerly existed for going into business with the express intention of becoming an insolvent.

Then, Sir, section 45 sets out a number of cases with regard to the action of the insolvent in which the court, if it is shown that any of these irregularities have occurred, may refuse to confirm the deed. Then by section 46, there is another provision for an insolvent to obtain a discharge. After the expiration of a year from the date of insolvency, he may appeal to the court for a discharge, without the consent of any of his creditors. That application is only to be made after due notice to all the creditors, and any of the creditors may appear before the judge and oppose the discharge.

In section 49 there is a very valuable provision by which the court is not bound to give an absolute discharge, but, in view of all the circumstances shown to the court, they may grant a discharge on terms, either of payment of so much money, or of the application by the insolvent of a portion of his future earnings for the benefit of his creditors, or the discharge is to be granted under certain circumstances: in this way, the court is given ample jurisdiction to punish with the refusal of discharge any evidence of fraud, reckless trading, extravagant living, or any other circumstance which would justify the court in refusing the privilege granted by the Act in the direction of the discharge of a debtor.

Section 57 is copied from the Government Act, and is, to my mind, a very valuable section indeed. It provides that in cases under the local laws, since the repeal of the last general Insolvency Act, a man who has made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors may apply to the court constituted by this Act for a discharge. If that section should become law, it would greatly relieve the large number of persons to whom I have referred who, during the past seventeen or eighteen years have encountered business difficulties, given up all their property to their creditors, have acted in every way as honourable and straightforward men, but, on account of the neglect of this Parliament to deal with the question of bankruptcy and insolvency, there have been no means for those debtors obtaining a discharge from their liabilities. This section, I say, gives an opportunity to all such persons to make application, upon notice given to their creditors, and if, in the opinion of the judge, the debtor has practically complied with the conditions which would entitle him to a discharge under the provisions of this Act, if he had been adjudged insolvent under it, the judge may make an order releasing him from the liabilities included in the assignment he made under the local law.

Section 61 deals with the question of privileged claims. The privileged claims provided for are (1) liquidator's charges; (2) arrears of salaries of employees or workmen or servants in the employ of the insolvent, not more than one month prior to the date of the insolvency, covering not more than three months' arrears or salary or wages. The last privileged claim is rent.

Section 63 contains the necessary provision to be found in all Insolvent Acts, that where a creditor has security he must file his security on preferring his claim, and deduct from the amount of the claim the value of the security. The assignee then has the privilege either of accepting the creditors' proposition and taking the amount of his claim after the value of the security has been reduced from it, or of taking over the security at the value placed upon it.

Section 67 provides for the doing away with liens obtained under judgment. Under the various local laws, creditors may obtain judgments and executions and get a preferential lien for their debt. This section provides that where an insolvency order is made, all those liens should be done away with. Where liens exist at the time of the coming into force of the Act, they are not to be interfered with. Section 68 deals very fully with fraudulent acts of the insolvent. One of the most important functions of an Insolvency Act is to guard against fraud on the part of the insolvent; and this section provides that any conveyance made voluntarily without consideration, or any conveyance made fraudulently, with a view to giving a creditor preference over other creditors, or for the purpose of placing beyond the reach of the creditors any portion of the property of the insolvent, are to be deemed fraudulent and void against the assignee. It also provides that the payment and transfer of property, even if legitimately made, within thirty days before insolvency, is to be considered null and void, and, in case of payment, the money is to be refunded, and in case of transfer, the property is to be deeded back.

Section 76 deals with the very important question of the responsibility of the liquidator in the case of leases having been entered into by the insolvent. Under the ordinary law, the assignee, for the benefit of the creditors, represents the debtor, and he is bound by all the obligations which are binding upon the debtor. It has been found in cases where covenants have been entered into in leases, that this is a very onerous law, and this Bill makes provision by which the official liquidator is enabled to relieve himself of the onerous provisions by taking certain action.

Section 83 gives a liquidator power to disclaim any property which comes to him from the insolvent, loaded with liabilities more than it is worth, and it enables the liquidator to abandon all claim to his property, and in that way to relieve the estate from liabilities which, except for a provision of this kind, would attach to it. Section 89 provides the procedure to be adopted in those cases where claims sent in by creditors are not admitted by the liquidator. If the creditor sends in a claim, and the liquidator is not prepared to admit the justice of it, he is obliged to give notice to the creditor, and then, unless the creditor within a time limited by the section, brings an action against the liquidator and proceeds to establish his claim in a court of law, it is barred.

Section 92 provides that in all cases of unclaimed dividends the money is to be paid over to the Minister of Finance. This is in pursuance of the policy adopted by this Parliament some time ago, by which all unclaimed dividends and unclaimed bank deposits are, after the expiration of a certain time, appropriated by the Government of Canada to its own use. Section 95 contains a very salutary provision giving the creditor the right, in case the liquidator refuses to pursue a claim belonging to the estate of the debtor, to take up that claim and pursue it on his own account. In case the debtor is possessed of an asset which the liquidator is not prepared to spend any money in attempting to collect, this section gives to any creditor the right to apply to the liquidator to collect this claim on his own account, and if he fails in the collection of the claim, of course he is obliged to pay all the costs himself. On the other hand, in case he succeeds in the collection of the claim, after paying all his costs, the proceeds are to be applied, first, in payment of that creditor's claim in full, and then, if there be a surplus, he is obliged to pay that over to the liquidator for the general benefit of creditors.

Section 93 contains provisions for the administration, in a somewhat cheaper manner, of small estates where the value does not exceed $2,000. It provides that in cases of this kind, some of the provisions which are more or less expensive as laid down by the Act may be done away with.

Section 97 contains very explicit provisions intended to guard the interests of the estate. These provisions compel the liquidator to deposit all moneys received by him on behalf of the estate in some chartered bank, and they also provide that this money cannot be paid out, except on the joint cheque of the liquidator and one of the inspectors.

Section 102 deals with the important question of the remuneration of the liquidator. The provision adopted by this Act is that the liquidator is to be remunerated in an amount to be determined by the creditors. If the liquidator is not satisfied with the amount allowed him by the creditors, he is given the opportunity of applying to the courts to have the amount increased. I think, Mr. Speaker, a provision of this kind is much more fair and equitable than some of the provisions which we have had in previous insolvency Acts, by which the liquidator was entitled to a percentage of the money handled by him in the management of an estate. Payment by percentage in a case of that kind is not a very fair way of gauging the value of the liquidator's services, because it may often happen that an estate may be very large, so far as the amount of money is involved, and yet take very little time and the exercise of very little ability on the part of the liquidator to manage it. On the other hand, a small estate, where the amount in question is much smaller, may require very much more time and responsibility on the part of the liquidator. Therefore, it seems very reasonable and very fair that the creditors, at a meeting held for the purpose, should decide what they think is fair to the liquidator, giving him as a protection to any unfair action on the part of the creditors an opportunity to apply to the court to have this amount increased. Section 104 provides that, after an estate is completely wound up, the liquidator must apply to the court for his discharge. A provision of that kind gives any creditor who is dissatisfied with the manner in which the liquidator has managed the estate, an opportunity of making his complaint to a judge and having effect given to it.

Section 104 deals with the question of offences and penalties, and here also is a phase in which the advantages of a general Dominion insolvency law comes out very strongly, as compared with the local laws which the different provinces have been forced to pass since 1879, on account of the neglect of this Parliament to deal with this important question. Of course, the most effective means of stopping fraud in connection with trade and commerce is the application of the criminal law, and it is quite clear that none of the provinces have any jurisdiction in the matter. The provisions which are contained in section 105, make the ordinary offences which we find occur in connection with fraudulent bankruptcy, fraudulent and reckless trading, misdemeanours punishable by imprisonment, and also other offences punishable by fines or penalties. This is one of the great advantages which a Dominion Act would confer upon the commercial public.

Section 122 deals with the question of appeals. In certain matters it is provided that the decision of the original court is to be final, but in most matters of importance it is provided that there shall be an appeal from the original court (which is the county court in most of the provinces) to the highest court of appeal for the province. In the province of Quebec to the court of appeal there, in the province of Ontario to the court of appeal, in the province of Manitoba to the Court of Queen's Bench, and in the other provinces to the Supreme Court of the province. Now, I notice that in the Government Bill there was no further appeal provided for, once you got to the highest court of appeal in the particular province in which the insolvent lived. I cannot agree with that proposition, and so I have inserted a clause giving an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. If there is any justification for the expenditure of the large sum of money which the Supreme Court of Canada costs each year, it appears to me that it should be availed of as a final court of appeal for the important cases of commercial law which are bound to arise in the administration of an insolvency Act. It seems to me that we would fail to take full advantage of the establishment of the Supreme Court here in

Mr. MARTIN.

Ottawa if we did not allow it to become the final arbiter in these important cases which in the past have always arisen in the administration of insolvency laws; and no matter how fully an insolvency Act may appear to cover all the cases likely to arise, our past experience shows that there is always a large amount of litigation resulting from its operation. So it appears to me that the Government's proposition to allow cases to go only to the highest court of appeal in the province is defective. It is most important, if bankruptcy legislation is to be final, that the course of judicial decision should be uniform. If the provision of the Government Bill were allowed to stand, cases would be decided one way in one province and another way in another province. The only way to get over a difficulty of that kind, it appears to me, is to take advantage of the court which this Parliament has established, and in all cases of importance to allow an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Of course, there are at present limitations as to what cases can be appealed to the Supreme Court; and this Act provides that the same limitations shall apply in matters of insolvency as in other matters. Section 132 and the following sections to the end of the Act deal with the application of the Act to incorporate companies. It is intended that the Insolvency Act shall supersede, in the case of certain companies, the present Winding-up Act. It is, however, provided that the Insolvency Act shall not apply to the following classes of companies: first, incorporated banks; second, savings banks; third, insurance companies; fourth, loan companies; fifth, building societies; sixth, railway companies; seventh, telegraph and telephone companies; and eighth, municipal schools and other public corporations. As to these the Winding-up Act is to apply where it applies now, and where it does not apply now the ordinary rules of the courts of the country are to apply. But all other companies, including all trading companies, incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of buying and selling merchandise, and companies incorporated for the purpose of carrying on farming, mining or lumbering operations, are to come within the scope of this Act. That being so, it becomes necessary to have a number of provisions for the settlement of the question of the right or liability of contributories, and matters of that kind which arise from the peculiar constitution of an incorporated company.

These provisions show the object of the Act. I think it will be seen from them that this Act meets the definition laid down in Mr. Caldecott's speech as to what an insolvency Act should be. He says:

What is required, and what this board has been incessantly calling for year by year since 1882, is an equitable Dominion Bankruptcy Act for the whole confederation of Canada, which, while giving the creditors the full control of an estate that is evidently insolvent, will prevent fraudulent preferences, punish reckless selling, compel proper book-keeping, and yet give a discharge to the man who has honestly given up his estate to his creditors, and not been guilty of either reckless selling, fraudulent buying, or extravagant living.

Now, I think that the House, on examination of the clauses of this Bill in detail, will find that it does comply with that definition laid down by the late president of the Toronto Board of Trade, in his final address to that body a few weeks ago. Under these circumstances, in spite of the fact that the Government have been negligent of their duty and have deceived the commercial public in 1894 and in 1895, with the most express promises that legislation on this subject would be placed on the statute-book. I hope that this Parliament will take advantage of the fact that the Government apparently have no legislation which they desire to bring down and pass at this session of the House, and will place upon the statute-book a measure which will meet the case of that very considerable number of the community who have fallen into business difficulties largely on account of the unfortunate policy in trade matters which this Government have induced Parliament to adopt for the last 17 or 18 years. After having done so much harm to the commerce of Canada. I think that the least this Parliament could do in its dying hours would be to offer this small measure of retribution to the commercial community by placing on the statute-book this Act, improved as no doubt it would be after full discussion in the Committee of the Whole by those members of the House who take an interest in matters of this kind.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I know it is not very usual, on the first reading of a Bill, to enter into a very full discussion of its merits; but I think the mover of the Bill was obliged to do so to-day in order to bring the very important subject of insolvency legislation before Parliament at all. When I take up the Order paper and see what little opportunity there would be of reaching the second reading of this Bill, I am not surprised at my hon. friend seeking this opportunity to explain it, because a little further down on the Order paper to-day I see a motion by the Government proposing to take Thursday away from private members' legislation at this early period of the session. If we look at the state of the Order paper, if we look at the number of Bills down for second reading, I think that by the time this Bill is printed—if the Government propose to take away Thursdays—it will be utterly impossible to reach it this session. I think that it is time the House took into consideration this important consideration. The Senate has been considering the question of insolvency for several years, and I do not see why this House which is more in touch with the people than the other House and has more opportunities of understanding the wants and the desires of the whole commercial community, should not discuss this question to some extent. Bankruptcy legislation, of course, has a double object. One is to provide for the equitable distribution of the assets of debtors, but concurrently with that is the object of providing for the discharge of honest insolvent debtors; and, in my judgment, the one object is quite as important as the other. I should like to see this Bill become law, if it only provided an efficient means for the discharge of honest insolvent debtors. We had in Canada a complete bankruptcy or insolvency law in force from 1864 to 1880; and I think that the repeal of that law was brought about chiefly by the strong objection to the expense of carrying it out, more particularly in the province of Quebec. In that province a great many instances were shown of estates thrown into insolvency and eaten up by the costs of lawyers and official assignees, and that happened while, at the same time, they had upon their statute-book provincial legislation, which, they claimed, provided for very fair and very equitable distribution of the estates of all insolvents. Now, since then, the province of Ontario has also placed upon the statute-book, legislation for the equitable distribution of the estates of insolvents and the prevention of preferential transfers. Since 1884 we have had a very fair condition of law in the province of Ontario. But, and possibly that might be an answer to a portion of this Bill, Parliament might consider that it would not be wise to place another set of machinery in operation, which, they might think, would increase the cost of distribution of assets; but this Bill contains another principle which Parliament ought not to overlook. That is the giving of a discharge or a release or a settlement or composition to the honest trader who has done his best to make a living, who has given up all he possesses to his creditors, and who, under very stringent provisions, has laid before the court of his creditors absolute proof of his honesty. Now, this country, since 1880, has been without any such provision of law.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is very bad.

Mr. EDGAR. It is very bad. A man to-day can get a discharge from his creditors, I admit. But how can he do it? Only by getting a discharge from every one of his creditors. The whole of his creditors have to sign a release before he can be relieved. Is that fair? I do not think it is. How does it work out? Every business man knows perfectly well how it works out. A man gets into difficulties; he goes round and shows his creditors how much he can pay,—50 cents or so in the dollar. He proposes to pay that. The consent of ninety-nine out of a hundred is of no use to him. He has got to get them all; and among the creditors there is nearly always some man who puts the pistol at his head, and says: I will never sign that, unless I am some way arranged, so that I shall receive a hundred cents in the dollar. The insolvent is black-mailed, and the other creditors, if he consents to this, are defrauded out of that much money, which should have been divided among them, and the commercial morality of the country is very much injured. How much better it would be to provide squarely and honestly, as is provided in all civilized countries, that when the debtor gives up all that he has to his creditors and when he pays, if you choose, a certain percentage in the dollar, and, if you choose, when he gets the consent of a certain percentage of his creditors, and submits to examination under oath as to all his affairs, he shall then, after due notice and caution, be entitled to get his discharge. How many men are there in this country to-day who are doing business in their wives' names or in the name of some relative? That is neither honest nor satisfactory. And how many are driven out of the country altogether because they are paralyzed and rendered unable to exercise their energy and industry and create wealth in this country, through some creditor refusing to sign a discharge. A few years ago, I had the honour of bringing this matter before the House in the shape of a Bill providing that a discharge should be given to honest debtors. That Bill passed its second reading and was referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I am sorry, however, to say that it was opposed in that committee by the boards of trade of Toronto and Montreal, who sent their representatives down here to insist that no consideration whatever be shown to traders, unless coupled with it there was a provision for the compulsory forcing of traders into bankruptcy and distribution of their assets. Since then I have not had as much sympathy for the wholesale men who are pressing for bankruptcy legislation. I have rather come to the conclusion that they desire such legislation in order to crush out retail merchants throughout the country, in order to put the screws on them, from time to time, and get preferences, so that they might deal more rigorously and promptly with those debtors. Now, Sir, I read to the House a letter which I had received at that time. With the permission of the House I will read a few words of it now. The writer says:

I do pray to the God of heaven to prosper your efforts. By a life of almost incessant toil I earned and saved $40,000. I put the whole into a woollen mill. The market fell for that particular line, and I had to give up all, and I lost every dollar and honestly relinquished everything. And yet I have no relief. I hope and pray that your measure may succeed.

And I hope that, if time afforded this session for the full consideration of this measure, Parliament may see its way to carry through this much-needed legislation.

Mr. EDGAR.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not intend to spend any time in going into the details of this Bill. Ordinarily, the courtesy is extended to any hon. gentleman who moves for leave to introduce a Bill on this important subject, to do so without discussion. But I propose to occupy the time of the House for a very few minutes while I call attention to a very few considerations which I think are adverse to the adoption of such a Bill. Under ordinary circumstances, I should think it almost hopeless for a private member to carry such a measure as this through Parliament, under present circumstances, I think it quite impossible. A Bill on this subject was introduced in the Senate two years ago, and was by that body referred to a committee. After a great deal of evidence had been taken, the Bill was carried through the Senate, and sent to this House. Last year, the Bill was introduced in the Senate, and got as far as the second reading, but so great was the opposition manifested in the Senate, that it was practically withdrawn by the Government because, even with all the support of the Government, they did not see the slightest prospect of carrying the Bill through the Senate. Now, as a matter of fact, at whose instance was the Bill introduced? The only class in the community that I know of who sought to force this Bill upon the attention of Parliament was that of the wholesale merchants. It is alleged that the bankers also gave their support to the Bill, but those who examine the evidence taken before the Senate committee will find that that is not so, that the bankers only appeared upon the scene after the Bill was introduced and for the purpose of giving such evidence as would lead to the bankers' interests being protected in case the Bill was passed. There were no petitions, so far as I can gather—and if I am wrong I wish to be corrected—and I do not think there are any this session, from the great consuming classes of the community, the working class, the middle class of merchants and traders, farmers, mechanics and the others who may be largely affected by the introduction of this measure. We must remember that, in 1875, in a period of very great commercial depression, strong influences were brought to bear to induce the Government to pass an Insolvency Bill. An Insolvency Bill was passed in that year, and remained in force until 1880. And I will venture to say that its repeal was received with general approval. The Act of 1875 was a good Act, that is, it was well drawn, and, if the circumstances had warranted it, that Act would have carried out the intention of the draughtsmen most effectually. But the difficulties in the way of such a measure in a scattered community such as Canada, which were unforeseen at the time the Bill was passed, were found to be insuperable; and, after remaining five years on the statute-book, the Act, to the relief of the community generally, was repealed. We are passing through another period of commercial depression, and similar influences are brought to bear to induce us to re-enact this measure. I admit that there is a good deal of force in the argument presented by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) with respect to the discharge which an honest trader who has got into difficulties ought to receive. No doubt a great many cases can be cited of men, who, without any wrong-doing on their part, and carrying on their business with the best of intentions, honestly and properly, are caught in difficulties from which they cannot extricate themselves without the intervention of an Act of Parliament. But I do not think that these instances are numerous enough, or that this evil is widespread enough to induce this Parliament to give its sanction to a Bill of this kind, accompanied as it is by essential faults which have been proven to be weaknesses in previous Bills. In the United States they have no insolvency law. Once or twice during the past century they attempted legislation of this kind. I think that on two occasions a bankruptcy law was adopted, tentatively, and remained in operation a very short time. They are to-day discussing the desirability of introducing two Bills, one to re-enact a general bankruptcy law for the whole United States, and the other to confer upon the different states the power to pass such a law. But those measures have not been introduced yet; and, vast and complex as are the commercial relations of the different states of the union, and strong as one would imagine the commercial interests demanding a Bill of that kind, they have found that they get along much better without it. Then, if we come to Great Britain, which is the instance always cited in support of an insolvency law, we know that, while it has been in force for many years, they are continually amending it, and it gives rise to very great difficulties in practical working. We must recollect, also, that that is a compact country, with a comparatively small area, and that the people are a commercial people. It is comparatively easy to carry out the bankruptcy law there. But in this country, with our enormous area and diversified interests, it would be next to impossible to carry it out. Nor must we forget that in Great Britain these bankruptcy laws were introduced to mitigate the horrible hardships resulting from the system of imprisonment for debt. It is not many years since even an honest debtor was liable to be incarcerated in a debtor's prison and die there—rot there, as they used to say—because he was not able to pay his debts. This abuse has been done away with. In modern times, in all the provinces of the Dominion, the policy of imprisoning people in order to compel them to pay their debts has been entirely abolished; and, to-day, I do not think there is a law in any of the provinces of the Dominion which tolerates the imprisonment of a man in a common prison because he is not able to pay his debt. Why should we introduce this bankruptcy law? In the province of Ontario, we have a law for the distribution of the assets of insolvent debtors. A year or two ago—I think when this agitation for the introduction of an insolvency Act here was initiated, the constitutionality of this Ontario Act was questioned. That question was carried to the Privy Council, and was set at rest by that tribunal. We know that the law of Ontario has been declared to be intra vires, and we know, from those capable of judging, that in its practical operations it works very well. In the province of Quebec a similar law has been in existence for years; and those competent to speak say that it works even better than the law adopted in Ontario. So, in the two great provinces of the Dominion where the commercial life is strongest, they have legislated in the direction of removing most of the evils which had arisen, and that legislation works very well. And what is the result? In New Brunswick they have adopted the Act, and in Nova Scotia, the Act was introduced and carried through the lower House, and was only lost by an accident in the upper House, the legislative council, at the close of the session. I believe it is to be introduced this session, and, no doubt, before the present session of the local legislature closes, we shall have a similar Act passed in that province. The consequence will be that in the four great provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, we shall have, practically, one law in force for the equitable distribution of the assets of insolvent debtors. So there will be very little practical evil to meet. If this Bill is to be discussed, there are other points to be considered. In the province of Manitoba, I think I am correct in saying, the local legislature, under the special circumstances of the country, exempted property to the extent of $1,000 or $1,500. Well, Sir, that law would be indefensible in other provinces, absolutely indefensible. If you introduce this insolvency law here, it will have the effect of repealing the law which the people of Manitoba thought was defensible and necessary in their own interest. And so you may go on from point to point and prove that the circumstances of Canadian life do not necessitate the introduction of this law. We point back to the few years when a similar law was in operation, and we say, judging from the experience of the past, that we are not justified in again introducing the turmoil and the misery, and the heart-burning, that was consequent upon carrying out the bankruptcy law of this country between 1870 and 1875. I did intend to discuss some of the leading features of the hon. gentleman's Bill, where I thought they were defective, but more time has already been taken up, perhaps, than the House expected, although the importance of the subject fully justified it; and, as my hon. friend has remarked, this is about the only occasion when, judging from the Order paper, we will have an opportunity of speaking upon it at all. But, holding the views that I do upon the subject, I thought I would trespass upon the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I expressed myself adverse to the introduction of the Bill at all—though of course, as a matter of courtesy, I am prepared to vote with the hon. gentleman for the first reading.

Mr. MULOCK. I cannot quite agree with my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) as to there being no necessity for an insolvent Bill. It is true there is local legislation providing for the equitable distribution of an insolvent's assets. But there is another principle involving insolvency, and involving legislation in this House, and that is the relief of honest debtors. That feature is certainly entitled to consideration, and an equitable and just measure that will relieve from burdens persons who have been honestly unfortunate, I think ought to commend itself to the House. When I put the question to my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) whether his Bill proposed to extend this relief to all classes, he mentioned a few classes which were not to be entitled to the benefit. Well, it then amounts to class legislation, which is always vicious and to be deprecated. Now, I submit that a question of this kind is one of sufficient importance to be entitled to the judgment of the Government. It is one that very intimately affects the state of trade and commerce in the country, and an unwise Act would be productive of more harm than good. The Act of 1864, which was in force for a period of fifteen or sixteen years, was abused, and it practically destroyed the whole value of commercial contracts. Men engaged in trade, men who could avail themselves of the provisions of the old Insolvency Act, were able to dictate terms to their creditors. The machinery of that Act was absolutely defective, and it became at last an Act to whitewash debtors, to destroy the value of commercial contracts, and to deprive creditors of their debtors' assets. That was about the working of the Insolvency Act of 1874. It ultimately became a mere instrument in the hands of official assignees to enable them to become agents for the insolvents, and to procure discharges from liabilities. The effect of that law, as administered, was to render property unsafe, and to interfere seriously with honest trading. But it was repealed, and not a bit too soon. Now, I do not know that the measure promised will be superior to the old Act, but I do submit that the question is sufficiently important and has been sufficiently before the public, to be entitled to be dealt with by the Government. It is idle for an individual member of the Opposition, or any private member of this House, to attempt to pass through this House a measure of the importance of an insolvency Act. At the same time, each member of this House has his rights, and I am not for a moment seeking to deprive my hon. friend from Winnipeg of his just rights to make this motion. Now, I would ask the Minister of Finance if the Government have no opinion upon this question. They have been petitioned as a Government, boards of trade in commercial centres have presented petitions to this Government for years, deputations have come down, views have been presented. Well, is the Government not without an opinion upon this question? The Minister of Finance is here—is the Government without any opinion as to whether the best interests of this country demand an insolvent Act? Certainly this is a question upon which the Government should speak. There is no excuse for their not speaking, unless, of course, they profess that on this, as on many other occasions, they cannot arrive at any kind of a conclusion. However, if they cannot arrive at a conclusion on an important question like this, then they admit their incapacity to deal with a live and important public question of the day. The trade, public opinion, has demanded legislation. Now, Sir, I am not in favour myself of imperfect legislation being put upon the statute-book. The old Act enabled traders alone to obtain discharges, and great bodies of the people, the farming community, for example, the non-trading community, men who did not technically buy and sell, and therefore were not entitled to the benefit of the law, got no discharge. Is it proposed to re-enact this measure, even to a small extent? Equality is equity, and if an unfortunate debtor, being a trader, being a manufacturer of lumber, or whatever else may be suggested is entitled to be discharged from the payment of his full liability, the same principle should apply to any other person who honestly fails. It is now fifteen years since there has been a mode by which unfortunate debtors could get discharges, and it is idle to contend that there have not been numerous failures, and that there is not to-day a large number of worthy citizens unable to carry on business in their own name because of liabilities that they cannot become relieved of. Whilst it may not be a wise thing for all time to say that our statute-book shall always have upon it an Act relieving people from their liabilities, it is in all civilized countries regarded, at all events, as proper that there shall be occasionally, as it were, courts of oyer and terminer to relieve debtors from liabilities. Even if it were only a temporary relief, if we were to pass an Act that would be operative for a brief period, allowing the unfortunate debtors that are now in our land to obtain discharges, it would be a meritorious Act. But if the Act is going to be a half measure, a class measure, making fish of one and flesh of another, then it is an Act that I for one cannot approve of. Therefore, I would impress again upon the Government that it is their bounden duty to move in the direction of placing upon the statute-book an Act which, at all events, in respect of the past, will afford a proper court whereby unfortunate but honest men may again become free, and be enabled to proceed and earn a living in our land. To-day what do we see? Many persons trading in surreptitious ways, in the name of wife or friend, adopting colourable means whereby to carry on business without being hampered with liabilities which they are unable to discharge. The present state of affairs is a hardship. I will admit that in many cases creditors are generous, and discharge their debtors if they are satisfied that their debtors have been honest and only unfortunate. But all creditors are not able to arrive at the same conclusion, and the result is that, scattered throughout the whole of this country to-day, from ocean to ocean, are numerous persons whom it would be an advantage to the country to set on their feet again, to make them free men, and again give them a chance to acquire property and become useful citizens. They are marking time, they are standing still, because, though willing and able, they are prevented by their misfortunes from again entering upon business. This is the feature which has always commended itself to legislators. Sir John Macdonald, speaking on this subject, in Parliament, if I remember rightly, expressed himself as unfavourable to a continuous statute to relieve people from liabilities. To do so perhaps encourages laxity in trading, and in some ways affords opportunities for immoral trading. If we place on our statute-books an Act that is to be permanent or apparently for all time, whereby men may be relieved of liabilities for less than the full amount, we may be affording a premium to people to avoid payment and therefore to abate their energies or become less careful and energetic in the management of business. But that is quite a different matter from passing an Act which would be retroactive and relieve those who are now suffering. To that extent, if I recollect, the attitude taken by the late Premier, was that it was the duty of Parliament from time to time to pass measures, temporary in duration, which would have the effect of relieving the class to which I have referred, and to that extent I differ from the hon. member for Queen's and favour a Bill of that kind. At the same time the Bill of the hon. member for Winnipeg, if its length is to be at all measured by the time occupied by the hon. member in briefly skimming over and explaining it, is a measure which must be cumbersome and lengthy and one that it will not be possible to pass through this House this session; and therefore I will renew my preliminary point, that this is a question upon which the country to-day is entitled to obtain the opinion of this Government, if they have an opinion; and if their opinion is favourable towards a relieving Act, then it is their duty, on this occasion in this Parliament, to introduce and press to a conclusion such a measure.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I desire to say that the commercial opinion in the city from which I come is in favour of an insolvency law. Business men think we should have a uniform law for the distribution of assets and to secure the discharge of insolvent debtors. Some of us know, or at least we think we know, why these great questions which concern our commercial interests have been neglected. A class of questions which turn on the constitution, or are at all events of a constitutional character, have the main portion of the time and threaten to occupy too much of the time of the House. The commercial community is in favour of more time being given to commercial questions, rather than the time of the House being taken up with constitutional issues; and I must say in behalf of the business community of Toronto, and I believe of all Ontario, and I think I can also speak for the business men of Montreal, that more attention should be given to problems of this character, and I trust that if the Government are not ready this session to go with an Insolvency Bill, they will come forward next session with such a measure as will secure these two points, namely, an equitable distribution of assets—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That you have already.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). It is not uniform. I mean a Bill which will secure the uniform distribution of assets, and also give a discharge to insolvent debtors who have surrendered all they possess for the benefit of their creditors.

Mr. SPROULE. I would not attempt to say a word at the present time except for the fact that probably this is the only opportunity during the present session when this subject will be reached, and also for the fact that at different times some years ago in this House I opposed the passage of an insolvency law. My opinions have undergone considerable change during the past years. I have seen many cases of absolute hardship, where men, by misfortune, have lost all they had in the shape of finances, and although they had many years of useful labour before them, and were comparatively young, yet, owing to the unfortunate fact that they could not get a discharge, they were unable to again start in business. The result was that several of them were obliged to leave and go to enrich another country, while others were compelled to remain at home and attempt to do business in the name of a relative or in some other way, but under circumstances that made it almost impossible for them to succeed or re-establish themselves in the commercial community. One reason why I have always opposed an insolvency law is on the principle enunciated by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), where it only applies to one class of the community, the trading class. I have always held that an insolvency law, to be satisfactory, should apply to all classes, otherwise it is class legislation. If it is good for the trader it is equally good for the farmer. I do not see that it should be impossible to introduce a Bill and crystallize it into law—I refer to a Bill which will apply to every class of the community.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he is in favour of compulsorily applying such a Bill to farmers?

Mr. SPROULE. The law should be one that would apply to all classes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And be compulsory?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think a law should be passed that would be of such a character as to compel any one to take advantage of it; but if a man has given up everything to pay his debts he should have an opportunity, whether he be a trader or farmer, to start anew in life. In view of the fact that an insolvency Bill is demanded by the boards of trade, the commercial fraternity and others, I think the Government should be prepared to take up the question. I do not think it can be taken up at this late stage of the present Parliament, for it would be almost impossible to do so successfully; but an expression of opinion by this House would do much to induce this Government or any other government who might follow it to take up the question of insolvency and carry a measure through Parliament. I think we should have such a law. If we do not obtain an insolvency law, we should have some means by which traders could secure discharges from the liabilities that hang over them and be enabled to start life anew.

Mr. DAVIN. In the North-west Territories there is a general opinion in favour of legislation of this kind, and I would add my voice to the expressions of opinion by those who have preceded me in urging the Government to take this matter up. It is quite impossible for a private member to pass a Bill of this magnitude through the House, and especially this session, but there is not the least doubt that there is great need of legislation of this kind in the Territories.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I probably would be lacking in my duty to my constituents if I did not say a few words on this occasion, and it must be in the same line as the three or four last speakers. So far as Toronto is concerned, we want an insolvent Act for several purposes: (1) to prevent preferences by traders; (2) to secure an equal distribution of assets; (3) to secure the discharge of insolvent debtors. Those who have been unfortunate in business, from no fault of their own, are fairly entitled to their discharge. It is true, as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has said, that some of the difficulties which have presented themselves to our merchants are beginning to be disposed of by the provincial authorities. In some of the provinces, the law differs to such an extent, that it is almost impossible that a merchant residing in Toronto or Montreal could obtain any satisfaction out of an estate, in either the east or the west. These matters are being somewhat harmonized by the legislation of the provinces, but at the same time there is a very strong and general feeling in all large business centres, that the matter ought to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament, and that a law should be passed by Parliament which would provide for the equitable distribution of assets and the discharge of all debtors who are fairly and reasonably entitled to their discharge.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Speaker, I have not been here during every word of this discussion, but I think I have heard the most of it, and I have not yet heard any explanation from any member of the Government, or from the Government side of the House, as to why the Bill which was brought in the session before last and passed through the Senate, had not been proceeded with by the Government. If it was deemed important that such expense, time and skill, should have been devoted to that measure, I really cannot understand why it was not pressed to a conclusion in this branch of Parliament and dealt with as other Government measures are. It is a demand from almost all the business centres of the Dominion, that a measure dealing with insolvency, upon a large and comprehensive basis, should be brought before Parliament and if possible enacted into law. It seems almost too much to expect that the Bill introduced by the hon. member from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) could be passed this session; but from the elaborate and careful explanation he has given us of its provisions, it appears to me to be very similar in all its essential features to the Government Bill of the session before last. That Bill having received full discussion in the Senate and passed that branch of Parliament, it appears to me it might be possible, with the aid and concurrence of the Government, that this measure, with such amendments as the good sense of Parliament might see fit to place in it, might become law at the close of this session. There are, of course, questions in regard to the application of the provisions of this Bill which could be discussed more intelligently and more properly if it should reach a committee of the whole House, or a special committee; such as the question, as to whether the Bill should apply to farmers as well as to traders, or, as to what classes of the population the Bill should apply. My own preference would be that the Bill should not apply to the farming or professional classes, except in so far as the persons included in these classes are also traders. The Bill might possibly be (unless very carefully guarded) made use of improperly, and to the prejudice of the credit and the financial interests of the professional and the farming classes; because their transactions in the way of trade are comparatively small, and they are not supposed to be so amenable to meeting their liabilities promptly on the hour, as are the trading classes. In any future discussion of this Bill, this clause will, no doubt, be carefully considered by members having the various points in view in connection with these matters. The principle of the Bill, I think, should receive the sanction of this House, and I sincerely hope the Government will lend its aid to enacting a comprehensive measure of insolvency before the close of this session.

Mr. CRAIG. There are no doubt a great many objections to an insolvency Act. Those who were in business at the time the other Act was in force experienced some of these objections, and one reason why I speak on this question, is, because I had a little experience of this matter myself. I found that one objection to the Insolvent Act which was in force some years ago, was this: that a great many men who obtained credit, took advantage of this Bill in order to compromise and settle with their creditors, and in many cases got off very easily. It was found, that if they got into debt they thought the easiest way to get out of it was to make an assignment and get rid of their debts in that way. There were great objections to the Bill on the part of many wholesale men at that time, and whether or not these objections can be overcome in a new Bill, I am not prepared to say. Then, another very strong objection was this: that after the debtor had made an assignment to the official assignee, the official assignee generally kept the whole estate and the creditor got nothing at all. I know that was my experience in some cases, and personally speaking, from my own point of view, I would be in favour of having no insolvent Act at all. But, I wish to say this: I do business at present with wholesale men in Montreal and Toronto, and I know that they want an insolvent Bill, and some of them want it very much. They give this reason: they say, that while there are good laws in some of the provinces, yet these laws vary a good deal; and in some other provinces the law is not good at all, because men obtain preferences and the estate is not equitably divided. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the law of the different provinces to say if that is the case, but that was stated to me. Now, if a law could be framed by which an estate could be divided speedily and cheaply so that the creditors would really get what they ought to get out of the estate, I would be in favour of such a law. But, I think it will be admitted by all who have thought on this subject, that it is very difficult to frame such a law. It is difficult in the first place to frame a law which will not be taken advantage of by men who get into debt and do not want to pay their debts. That is a very unfortunate state of affairs, and I think that those who know something of the operation of the old Insolvent Act, know that the law did bring about such a condition of things. If a way can be found in which an estate can be divided cheaply, so that the creditors could realize to the fullest extent possible, it would be a most desirable thing. The hon. member (Mr. Flint) who last spoke, stated that the Government have not said anything about this Bill, and a great deal of objection was urged by the promoter of the Bill against the Government because they did not carry through this House, the insolvent Bill which was introduced in the Senate and discussed there. Well, I have no doubt at all the Government felt, that if the sentiment of the country was in favour of an insolvent Bill of that kind, or, if the Government thought a Bill could be framed which would meet the wants of the people of this country, they would have great pleasure in carrying through such a Bill. I believe the reason why the former insolvent Bill was not carried through this House was this: In framing that Bill it was found impossible to meet the wishes of those who are interested. The wholesale men, the manufacturers, the retail men, and the farmers, all had conflicting interests, and it was impossible to frame a Bill which would meet their views. I hope that some day a Bill may be framed, by somebody who has studied the question and given it a great deal of care and attention, and by which Bill estates may be cheaply and speedily wound up. I will be glad to support a Bill of that kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, as we have departed from the usual custom of confining the discussion on the principles of the Bill until the second reading, I will just say a word on this subject. So far as our law in Ontario is concerned, which makes provision for the equal distribution of the estate of a person who is embarrassed financially, or is insolvent, I think we have a law there, which is likely to work more satisfactorily than any bankruptcy law it is possible for this House to enact. There is very great difficulty in dealing with the subject of traders and non-traders, and there are, I think, serious practical difficulties when you undertake to put non-traders upon the same footing as traders. I think our former Insolvency Act confined its provisions to traders. This was one difficulty which made the Act extremely unpopular. It is no uncommon thing for retail dealers in the country to get non-traders to become accommodation endorsers for them. They go into bankruptcy, and while they are discharged under a Bankruptcy Act, the unfortunate accommodation endorser who is a non-trader, is obliged to pay the last farthing, although he can collect nothing as against his principal. That is a mischievous principle, and if we were to have an Act on the subject at all, it would be necessary to confine the discharge of traders from obligations incurred to traders. Obligations to non-traders ought to stand on precisely the same footing as those of non-traders. If you can do anything to put a stop to or to discourage the practice of men engaged in commercial affairs seeking the aid of the credit of non-traders, you ought to do it. The provisions of the law ought not to be such as to draw non-traders into the meshes of misfortunes and accidents attendant on those engaged in trade. But, Sir, looking at the provisions of our statute for the equal distribution of the assets of persons who may become insolvent, it seems to me that we have there gone as far as it is necessary to go; and no serious inconvenience has resulted from the operation of that law. It was largely on account of the provisions of the old common law which were recognized in the province of Ontario that a Bankruptcy Act was adopted here. Then, there are the difficulties mentioned by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island. Probably you will supersede the provisions which were made in the Homestead Act with reference to the North-west Territories and Manitoba by undertaking to legislate on this subject, and that is a matter of very serious consideration. If all the provinces were to adopt a liberal homestead law, which would place the home of a trader beyond the reach of the accidents that are attendant upon commercial life, it seems to me it would be a very great advantage. If that were done, I do not think we would ever hear a demand for a Bankruptcy Act. When we consider the trials that have been made here before, the failures that have attended the efforts put forth to secure a workable Act, how soon these Acts become unpopular, and how soon it becomes necessary to remove them from the statute-book in order to satisfy public opinion, I do not think we ought to be in a hurry to make a further trial. Taking that view, while I am not going to oppose the first reading of the measure introduced by my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), I have no notion whatever of committing myself to a declaration in favour of an Insolvency Act passed by this Parliament. I am rather disposed to leave the subject of the distribution of the assets of insolvent persons under the local law of the province to those who are administering that law, than to undertake to deal with the subject here at all.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I am not at all surprised that the Insolvency Bill has not been pressed very strongly by the Government upon this House, in view of the fact that the greatest legal intellects of the United Kingdom have for years been attempting, unsuccessfully, to grapple with this problem of insolvency. I am not at all surprised, I say, that we have ourselves been a little reticent in proceeding further with this matter. I recollect very well that when I was in England a great deal of interest was expressed by members of the legal profession in the Insolvency Bill which was then in course of preparation by one of the greatest of English lawyers, Lord Westbury. It was hoped that his wonderfully acute and massive intellect would succeed, perhaps, in overcoming the enormous difficulties that confronted him. But the result proved that even he was unable to frame a measure which commanded the approval of the public after it had been subjected to the test of experience. Under these circumstances, as I believe, the insolvency law in England to-day is not satisfactory, and I am not at all surprised to find, on the part of my hon. friend who has just addressed the House, and other hon. gentlemen of legal experience, a reluctance to commit this House to an approval of any insolvency measure which is likely for some time to come to be presented to this chamber.

Mr. MACDOWALL. Mr. Speaker, I would just say a few words before the discussion closes, merely to express my adhesion to the principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I do not think the argument that has just been adduced to show that there are difficulties to be met, is any argument against the principle of such a measure. There will, no doubt, be many difficulties to be met, but these may be got over. We cannot expect that the first Insolvency Act will be perfect; but it may be amended and improved, while the principle remains. The principle of such a measure, as I understand it, is that if an honest trader, through circumstances over which he has no control, gets into debt, he may get a clearance and be given a start again. I also think the principle should be as widely applied as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has indicated. I think it should not be class legislation at all. There might be some difficulty in regard to homesteads, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has said; the Act might conflict with the local laws of the provinces or the Territories; but I should think that difficulty might be got over. At any rate, I desire to express my adhesion to the principle of the Bill.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to say only a word or two further on this matter, and I would not do that had not the Bill been made the subject of a general discussion, owing to the possibility of its not being reached again this session. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) made the bold statement that the laws for the equitable distribution of assets in the various provinces were working well. I desire to take very strong exception to that statement, because I do not believe that in the opinion of the commercial community, in the different provinces, these laws, imperfect as they are in the nature of things, are at all satisfactory, even so far as the distribution of assets is concerned—that is, in the provinces where they exist at all. In some provinces, I understand—Nova Scotia, for example—there is no law for the equitable distribution of assets, there is only the old law by which the creditor who steps in first gets the money. So that I am satisfied that the statement that these laws are working well would be controverted by the commercial community, for two reasons. First, that it is not true that they do work well in the individual provinces; and second, that it would be a great advantage indeed to have a uniform commercial law in matters of this kind instead of having conflicting laws in the different provinces. Another point raised by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), which I omitted to allude to, and which, it is possible, the Bill does not cover, is that it would be necessary to practically repeal the homestead exemption laws if we put in force an Insolvency Act. I would not be prepared to agree to that, and I would ask, when this measure comes into committee of the whole House, to have an amendment adopted by which all homestead exemption laws, passed by the various provinces, should be respected, and that an insolvency order should only convey to the official liquidator such property as is not exempt, under local laws, from seizure under execution. I am not myself personally in favour of the extent to which the legislature of Manitoba has gone in the direction of exempting property from execution. I think that they have gone a great deal too far in that province, but at the same time I believe that that is a matter entirely pertaining to the local legislatures, and I think it would be eminently proper for this House, in passing a measure with regard to insolvency, to only take from the debtor such property as now can be reached, under the various provincial laws, by judgment and execution. My hon. friend who spoke a moment ago suggested that if there were more liberal homestead laws in the other provinces, something similar to those in Manitoba, that would do away largely with the demand for an Insolvency Act. Now, that is shown not to be the case by the fact that in Manitoba, where they have the most liberal homestead exemption law of any province in the Dominion, an insolvency law is strongly desired in the commercial community, as represented by the boards of trade in the different towns, especially in the city of Winnipeg. The hon. gentleman also thought that it would not be advisable to hurry in dealing with this question of insolvency. Well, if we should be so precipitate as to pass an Insolvency Act this session, I do not think any one could urge against the Parliament of Canada that it had been in a hurry to legislate upon this question, because it is now seventeen years since the last Insolvency Act was repealed. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) defended the Government in their failure to proceed with an Insolvency Act in 1894 and 1895. His excuses might apply to a refusal on the part of the Government to take up the question of insolvency, but I cannot see how he can possibly excuse the actual conduct of the Government. The Government announced that they were going to pass an Insolvency Act. They did that after they had been urged by deputations from all the boards of trade in Canada to take up that subject. The boards of trade in Canada had joined together and prepared what they thought was a good and fair Insolvency Act. They did that at very considerable expense to themselves. They came down to Ottawa and interviewed the Premier and laid before him this Act, asking him to have it made law. The Premier promised that he would pass an Insolvency Act. In pursuance of that promise, the Speech from the Throne in 1894 contained a declaration that a Bankruptcy Act would be passed that session. A bankruptcy Act was introduced. Again the commercial community were encouraged to spend a large amount of time and a considerable amount of money in laying before the committee of the Senate their views upon the Bill as introduced by the Government. Again they were distinctly promised by Sir John Thompson, at that time First Minister, that the measure would be put through. It was not put through. The apparently reasonable excuse was offered for not putting it through that a large amount of time would be taken in discussing the revision of the tariff, but it was promised that the Bill would be put through the following session. In 1895 we again had a declaration from the Governor General that this insolvency measure would be placed on the statute-books. Again delegations came from the boards of trade and legal gentlemen were sent here at large expense; and again the Premier, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, promised most definitely that that law would be introduced in the Senate, would come into this House, and after discussion become law. It was brought into the Senate but never came into this House. There was plenty of time to pass it. The Government were not so pressed with business, because, for a considerable time during the session of 1895, we witnessed the spectacle here of the House adjourning from day to day, while waiting for the Government to make up their minds as to what they would do in connection with the Manitoba school question. That would have been a most opportune time for the Government to have redeemed the pledge which they had time and time again given to the commercial community. It would have been an excellent opportunity to redeem their promise, but they failed to do so. I cannot see that any inherent difficulties, such as those given by the hon. member for Bruce, are any excuse whatever for this very unsatisfactory progress and this very unsatisfactory treatment by the Government of the important bodies coming to them and this House, under the most explicit promises, with regard to this question. Under these circumstances, I am satisfied that the commercial bodies hold the Government responsible. The address from which I read to-day from Mr. Caldecott, the late President of the Board of Trade of Toronto, outlines that very clearly. It expresses briefly and without equivocation the great disappointment of the Toronto Board of Trade, no doubt joined in by the boards of trade of other important centres, at the failure of the Government to redeem its promises in this behalf. I therefore feel impelled to bring the question before the House in this way, not entirely with the expectation that the measure may become law, but for the purpose of pointing out how important the question is, for the purpose of giving the commercial bodies of the country the opportunity of bringing some pressure to bear upon those members of the House upon whom they can have influence, with the view of urging the Government to redeem its pledge in this respect. We have plenty of time before the 25th of April to put upon the statute-books a well considered measure, and I am satisfied that the objections put forward by the hon. gentleman from East Durham (Mr. Craig) as to the working of the old Insolvency Act are completely met by the provisions that are to be found in this Act. I claim no credit of course for that, because its provisions are copied from the Government Bill which was drawn after the model of the Bill, prepared at so much trouble and expense by the joint committee of the Boards of Trade of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That Government Orders have precedence on Thursdays, after questions, during the remainder of the session.

Mr. LAURIER. Does the hon. gentleman intend to press this motion ?

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to press the motion. We have now been in session about one month—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sixteen days.

Mr. FOSTER. The House was called for the 2nd of January, and it is now the 4th of February. So, according to my calculation, we have been in session a little over a month. It is not very early, therefore, to ask the House to give the additional day for the Government work. I am moved to do that with all the greater confidence, because hon. gentlemen have repeatedly stated that, Parliament having been called largely for the purpose of dealing with a certain Government measure, therefore the House ought to devote itself particularly to that. What the Government proposes to do is to ask the House to pass the Estimates and to discuss and pass the Bill which will be brought down within a few days; and there is probably none too much time to do that between now and the time when the House will have passed through its term of life. The private legislation is not very large, nor will it probably be very heavy. I have no doubt, for instance, that my hon. friend who introduced his Bill this afternoon has not the least idea of pressing that Bill to a conclusion. It will serve its purpose—has, I suppose, partly served its purpose—but there is no supposition in the House on either side that that measure will engage very much of the attention of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Why ?

Mr. FOSTER. For the reasons which hon. gentlemen on my hon. friend's own side have stated in their speeches.

Mr. LAURIER. Answer for the other side.

Mr. FOSTER. And taking the arguments of my hon. friend into account, for a very good reason on the line of their strong assertions that in a Parliament at this stage of its existence it would be highly unwise that very important measures of this kind should be pressed and legislated upon. Taking all these things into consideration, I do not think I am unreasonable in asking the House to devote one day more to Government business.

Mr. MULOCK. You have nothing on the Order paper.

Mr. FOSTER. We have quite sufficient on the Order paper.

Mr. LAURIER. In regard to what the hon. gentleman has said, I do not wish to enter into a controversy. The hon. gentleman will perhaps agree to defer the consideration of this proposal until the Bill he has referred to has been brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend is quite unreasonable. We have the Budget debate standing upon the Order paper, a debate which usually takes a fortnight of our time, and which, probably, in this last session of a Parliament will take no less. The House is anxious and eager to engage in that debate, which is always one of the most important debates of the session. Gentlemen opposite, no doubt, wish to air their new theories of tariff and trade so as to offer an explanation to the country to which they soon hope to go; and they will find on this side of the House members quite willing to defend the policy of the Government and make good the Government's case. I do not think we ought to prevent hon. gentlemen on either side from engaging in this debate. Then we have the Estimates before the House, and we have that 'vade mecum,' the Auditor General's Report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Only in part. Where is the other part?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend ought to be perfectly satisfied with the volume before him, seeing that it is so large.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. LAURIER. I would have hoped that the hon. gentleman would accept the very reasonable proposition which I made to him before dinner, that the consideration of this motion should be deferred until such time as the Government has brought down the measure which they have announced in the Speech from the Throne, as, above all, the one measure for which this session has been called. And I must say I do not even yet despair of convincing the hon. gentleman that the motion he has made is altogether unprecedented. The hon. gentleman stated before six o'clock that we had now arrived at a period of the session when such a motion as this was always made and granted. I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that point. I will prove that, according to the records of this House, not a single precedent can be quoted for presenting a motion of this kind at this stage of the session. The House has always been ready, in so far as my memory goes, when the session has proceeded for a certain length of time, and when the business has reached a certain point, to grant to the Government one of its days in order to expedite the business which the Government has in charge. Sir, I shall be able to show the hon. gentleman that the motion he now makes is at once unprecedented, uncalled for, unjustified and unfair. First, let me show the hon. gentleman that his motion is unprecedented. I can show him that, as a rule, within the last eleven years, at all events, such a motion as this has not been made before the 35th or 36th day of the session, and quite ordinarily not before the session has lasted 40 days or more.

Session of Parliament met	Motion to take Thursdays made	After session had lasted
1885—20th January ..	10th Mar.	More than 40 days.
1886—21st February ..	26th Apr.	do 50 do
1887—13th April.....	17th May.	do 30 do

And last session was the first in which the hon. Minister of Finance was leader of the House. So that out of the eleven years, the motion to take Thursday was made twice after the lapse of thirty days. On three different occasions it was made after an interval of fifty days and on five different occasions it was made after the session had lasted more than forty days: so that as a rule this motion never was made until forty days had elapsed, and the session had lasted for that length of time. Now, Sir, how is it this year? The House met this year on 2nd January, and we are to-day in the 4th February, this is the 30th day of the session. But surely the hon. gentleman does not take into consideration the peculiar circumstances of this session. The House met on 2nd January, it is true, but the House met only to adjourn until the 7th January. On the 7th January the House met again, the members were here, but the hon. gentleman cannot have forgotten that for eight days more the members of this House could not transact any business. The hon. gentleman surely has not forgotten that for eight days more the members were kept dancing attendance upon the hon. gentlemen until such time as they were able to patch up, in the best way they could, their differences, their troubles, their squabbles and their quarrels. In point of fact, the business of the session only commenced on the 16th January, when the debate on the Address began. Up to that time nothing could be done, not a member could do anything at all towards discharging the duties for which we were called together. Therefore, I say, and the hon. gentleman cannot gainsay the assertion, that this House has been in session for only eighteen days, and not one day more. It was only on the 16th January that the members of this House addressed themselves to the business for which they were called here, and it is after only eighteen days of work that the hon. gentleman asks to take away one day from us. Sir, is there any reason for it? I say the delay has been unprecedented, and this motion is unprecedented. I say more, I say it is uncalled for by the business of the Government. Why, Sir, what is the business of the Government to-day? Look at the Order paper. It is an absolute blank so far as the business of the Government is concerned. There is only one notice of motion of a very trivial character, one to replace the bonds of the Montreal Turnpike Trust with other bonds. That is all we have before the House to-day, with the exception of the consideration of the Budget. Now, we have been called for a special purpose upon this occasion. We have been called to pass important legislation, the session was called especially to deal with the Manitoba school question. That Bill we have long been waiting for, and we have not got it yet. We have other measures which were announced in the Speech from the Throne, several important measures. There is one with regard to arming the militia and with regard to the defences of the country. What have we got with regard to that? Not one single word so far. We have another important measure which was announced, one with regard to increasing the representation of the North-west Territories; but we have nothing at all before us with respect to it so far. The hon. gentleman is unable to find in the records of this House that a motion to take the first day from us has ever been made unless the Order paper was crowded with the business of the Government, and with the projects they had in hand, with measures which were intended to be submitted to the consideration of the House. Why, Sir, while the Order paper, in so far as the business of the Government is concerned, is absolutely blank, while there are before us none of the measures which we were told we should be called upon to consider, on the other hand, the paper is crowded with most important business of private members. On the Order paper, to be taken into consideration during the three days only that we have at our disposal, there are some of the most important measures which will come up for discussion during the present session. There are no less than twenty-one Bills in all, on the Order paper ready for the second reading, and five more to be introduced to-morrow. Among those Bills which are already set down for a second reading, there are some of the most important that can be taken up this session, or any session. There is, for instance, a Bill to secure the independence of Parliament, a most important measure it is, and the present condition of the country and of Parliament itself shows that it requires our earnest attention. There is also a Bill which has been often before us, but which has never been taken into such consideration as it should have received, a Bill relating to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of trade. I believe there is no more important measure than this one. There is also a Bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act, a most important one indeed. There is a Bill, the urgency of which is evident, a Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Rider) for facilitating voting by employees at election of members of the House of Commons. We are on the eve of an election, and this Act will come in most appropriate in order to facilitate the voting by employees of large companies. There is also a Bill, which was introduced a few days ago by my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), with regard to the representation of the North-west Territories. All these Bills are of the greatest importance. According to the rule of the House, we have only one day, Thursday, to devote to these Bills. There are twenty-one of them on the list, and the hon. gentleman proposes at this stage to take the only day upon which we can take these measures into consideration. Suppose his motion is carried, what time would be left in which to take these Bills into consideration? Only Wednesday, that is all. Why, Sir, it is a mere farce, it is an attempt to gag the members of the House, to prevent them from promoting the measures which they deem essential to the interests of the country. But that is not all, there are on the paper no less than thirty-two notices of motion, some of them of the greatest importance. The first now on the Order paper is one which, I am sure, ought to receive the consideration of the hon. Minister himself, that is to say:

That in the opinion of this House, the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, sacramental and mechanical purposes, should be prohibited by law.

Now, this is a motion which must interest every member; and there are several other motions of the same character, every one of which is of the greatest importance. Therefore, I submit to the hon. gentleman that if he wants to be fair to the members of this House, he should not proceed with the motion which he has now in hand. I speak very seriously upon this question. The hon. gentleman is not in a position to-day to press such a motion upon the House. If this had been an ordinary session, if we had been able to proceed with the business of the country from the moment we were called here, perhaps, there might be some justification for this motion. But when two weeks of the session were consumed by causes for which the members of the House are not responsible, were consumed by delays for which the Government are alone responsible, I say it is most unfair to the members of the House, at this stage of the session, to take away from them one of the days to which they are entitled to enable them to discharge the business and the duties which were entrusted to them by their constituents. I appeal to the hon. gentleman, I appeal to his sense of fairness, I appeal to the hon. gentlemen who sit behind him, and I submit to them that if the members of this House are to have an opportunity of discharging the duties which they feel it incumbent upon them to discharge, the Government should not at this stage press the motion which is before us. Sir, I do not know whether my appeal to the hon. gentleman will be heeded, but if the appeal which I now make to him fails to enlist his sympathies, the only thing that I shall have to do will be to leave the decision of this question to the sense of justice which, I am sure, must preside upon both sides of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I have listened very carefully to my hon. friend who has detailed the reasons why he thinks the Government is not justified in asking for an additional day at this stage of the business of the session. I have listened to the hon. gentleman trying to find, if I could, whether or not there were really strong reasons why the motion of the Government should not be pressed, and I must say, after having listened very attentively, that I fail to see the strength of the hon. gentleman's position. I do not wish, neither does the Government wish, to ask the House for any unfair privilege. The only object the Government has, the only object I have is to see that the business for which we have been called this session is as rapidly as possible performed, and it is with this object in view and this object alone we have submitted the motion, and wish to press it on the attention of the House. Now, what are the reasons submitted by my hon. friend? He has read a detailed statement of the number of days which have elapsed in ordinary sessions, and in most cases his examples proved that a longer time has elapsed between the opening of the session and the asking for the extra Government day. But my hon. friend must remember that this is, to a certain extent, an extraordinary session, and he must recollect that the very same methods of procedure which possibly might have been followed during an ordinary session are difficult to be followed this session. In the first place, no one more strongly than the hon. gentleman himself holds the opinion, so I understand, that the time of this Parliament will expire on or about the middle of April. That means then, that within that period, whatever business the Government has to do must be done, and he has himself stated that the Government has called this session specially for a piece of business which is grave in its character, and one which will evoke a great deal of discussion, and occupy a large portion of the time of the House. That is very true, although I must disclaim the idea, or any such interpretation of the statement made by the Government, that this session has been called for the special purpose of passing the legislation in question, and for no other purpose. From no statement the Government has made, can it be fairly argued that this is a special session, or that it is called simply for the one object. The very arguments the hon. gentleman has addressed to the House have been most cogent reasons why the House should grant the Government Thursdays, so that the necessary business of the Government, which is now waiting to be done, should be got out of the way, as far as possible before the most important piece of legislation to come down shall be laid before the House. We have other duties to perform than the discussion of the remedial measure. The country's services must be carried on, and the Estimates are before the House, and it is the intention of the Government to press these Estimates upon the House, and with the Budget speech in front of them it is impossible to press them. The discussion of the Budget is not altogether a Government proceeding, it is a discussion in which the House has the greatest interest, and it is a discussion, which, as I have stated before dinner, takes ten days or two or three weeks, generally, to conclude. I submit it is in the interests of the speedy and proper conduct of the House, of the larger business of the House, which has to come before it, that we should endeavour to expedite the business of the Budget, and make fair progress with the Estimates, so that there may be more time for the House to discuss the important legislation which is to come down afterwards. There is another reason to which I think it is perfectly fair for me to call the attention of the House. Not one hon. gentleman opposite, but many hon. members, not only in this House, but outside it, have, by implication and by actual assertion set forth to the House and the country this idea, that it was the policy of the Opposition not to allow the Government to proceed with any business this session except the business of remedial legislation. That has been avowed, not by one member, but by several members of the House. It has been urged as the dominating policy of the Opposition during this session of Parliament. That is another reason why, paying the importance the Government does to the passage of the ordinary Estimates for the services of the country, why those Estimates should be put in a position to be pressed and to be judged on their merits by the House. Another point the hon. gentleman forgot to mention. When he read the list of days showing the time that elapsed between the opening of the House and taking of an extra day by the Government, on every one of these occasions, nearly, on many of them, most certainly, and if my memory does not fail me, on nearly all, the debate on the Budget proceeded from day to day, this extra day being thus taken by the consent of the House, while I am asking that it be taken by a formal motion. I will say this to my hon. friend, if he will agree, as in former years, to go on with the debate on the Budget 'de die in diem,' keeping one day for the work of the House,

I will postpone the motion, in the meantime, and we will go on with the Budget debate as in other years. That is a proposition which should strike my hon. friend as a perfectly fair one, but the Government would be wanting in their duty to themselves and to the country, seeing the peculiar situation of affairs, if it did not press with all its vigour and all its force for the expediting the public business under its control, and which it proposes to carry out. If the hon. gentleman opposite will accept this alternative proposition I make, and agree to the Government going on with the Budget debate 'de die in diem,' I will withhold this motion for the present. I yet hope the hon. gentleman will agree to my proposition, and if not, the Government, in duty to itself, and to the country, must press the motion to a vote.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Government, for some years, has practically disregarded the rules of this House. The rules are based on public experience and are framed with a view to public convenience. The hon. gentleman has said that on former occasions we have proceeded from day to day with the consideration of the Budget until the discussion on that subject was concluded. That is so. But what has been the effect of that? It has been that all the business in the hands of private members has been sent to the wall, the result has been that practically the whole session has been devoted to the business of the Government, and little or no time left to the transaction of business in the hands of private members. That was the case last year, the year before, and the year previous to that; in fact, every year in which the practice to which the hon. gentleman has referred has been pursued in this House, the business in the hands of private members has suffered in consequence. The hon. gentleman has been here but a very few days transacting public business. Parliament was formally called and met, and then we adjourned for several days. When we met again there was a Government crisis on hand, the Finance Minister and six of his colleagues having retired from the Government, and there was no public business of any kind transacted, and the House adjourned from day to day at the instance of the Administration, because they were not prepared to go on with public business. Not only has the business in the hands of the Government been delayed in consequence of the proceedings of members of the Administration, but the business in the hands of private members has been equally delayed, and the result has been that nearly a month of the session has been wasted. The hon. gentleman now asks at this early period of the session, because, as my hon. friend has pointed out, we have been in session, practically, but a fortnight, to take one of the three days that the rules of Parliament have placed at the disposal of private members. Why have the rules been so framed, and why have three days out of five been placed at the disposal of the private members of this House? It is because experience has indicated that as a fair distribution of time, between the Government and the private members of this House. The proposal of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is practically to set at defiance the rules of Parliament. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has declared that this was a moribund Parliament, and that the business which Government had marked out for itself, was business that ought to be undertaken after the elections, and not before. That observation, of course, does not apply to a great portion of the business in the hands of private members; business which is for the furtherance of the interests of various undertakings and various organizations. It is the business of the Government and of Parliament to exercise proper oversight on these, but those are not matters affecting the general policy of the Government. They stand in a wholly different position from the measures of the Government, and in a Parliament like this, it is rather the private members who ought to encroach upon the time of the Government, and not that the Government should attempt to encroach upon the time of private members. There is another rule which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has forgotten. He has called this session, with the concurrence of his colleagues, and at the instance, I suppose, of the Prime Minister, for the purpose of dealing mainly with one special question; indeed, I may say, wholly for that purpose; because I can affirm, without any fear of successful contradiction, that the session would not have been called if it had not been that that measure required to be dealt with. If the Government had agreed upon their policy last year, we should not have had to meet now. There is the well settled constitutional rule: that the redress of grievances should precede the granting of supplies. The leader of the House, and his colleagues, say: there is a grievance, a wrong has been done, and the great trust committed to this Parliament should be exercised for the purpose of redressing that wrong, and restoring to certain parties rights and privileges that were taken from them. That is the subject with which the hon. gentleman proposes to deal, and that is the grievance which he says, it is the duty of Parliament to redress. But, the Government, without submitting any measure upon the subject, and without giving the House the slightest idea of what the policy of the Government is, asks us to vote the supplies. Sir, let us look at the facts. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) went to the country in various constituencies; in Cardwell, in North Ontario, in West Huron, in Montreal Centre, in Jacques Cartier, and what has been the result? The hon. gentleman is asking this House to place at the disposal of a Government, that, in so far as they have appealed to the country, has been declared not to possess the confidence of the people. Under these circumstances, the course of the Government is an extraordinary one. It is one which, as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has shown, is not justified by precedent. Heretofore, in the history of this country, the business of Parliament had always made a very considerable degree of progress before the Government undertook to take away any portion of the time at the disposal of the members. I say then, that, giving to the Government the time of private members for the discussion of the Budget; time which ought to be employed for the promotion of business in the hands of the private members, is a matter of very great consequences. Now, Mr. Speaker, I suppose the Government intend to propose a measure dealing with the subject of the issue of the writs. I have called their attention to the importance of such a measure, and so far they have presented no Bill to the House. Why is it that there is no measure on the subject? The last Parliament was dissolved on the 3rd of February, and the writs were made returnable on the 25th April, a period of eighty-six days having intervened. Is there any warrant for that in point of law? Not at all. The law in force in all the older provinces in this Dominion says, that not more than fifty days shall elapse between the dissolution of Parliament and the return of the writs for the constitution of a new Parliament. In 1891, there were 36 days taken, beyond the time the law allows. Then in British Columbia and Manitoba, both of which had the English law extended to them within a comparatively recent period, the English law of to-day is in force in those two provinces, and it provides, that not more than 35 days shall elapse between the dissolution of one Parliament and the return of the writs electing another. And yet, 86 days elapsed after the dissolution of the Parliament of 1891. Now, Sir, if the Government can disregard the law to the extent of 51 days, they can disregard the law apart from supply to the extent of 51 years, and we might have them refusing to call Parliament at all, if by any means they could carry on the affairs of the country, without any regard to the law of the country whatever. It is important that this Parliament shall not see its end, and that dissolution shall not take place, until it is declared within what time all those writs shall be made returnable. A measure on this subject is a measure that belongs to the Administration, and a measure which they should introduce. The law should be made uniform by them, and taking the most extreme time limit, namely 50 days, they disregarded it in the last election to the extent of 36 days. That is a condition of things that should not be tolerated. It strikes at the very foundation of our system of Government, and we have a right to say to the Government: Propose to us redress of those grievances of which we complain; grievances that are patent to every person. You must consider the subject before you undertake to ask from this Parliament the appropriation of revenue required for the maintenance of the Government of this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Government are deliberately taking advantage of their own wrong-doing. Now, I do not want to revive the extremely unpleasant discussion we had respecting the conduct of the hon. the leader of the House, and six of his colleagues, some time ago.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, don't mind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not mind, if necessary, but I am not going to do it unnecessarily. I will call the attention of the House to this: Here, these gentlemen come to us, and they demand of us that we should give up our undoubted right, because for fifteen mortal days they were quarrelling among themselves, because for fifteen mortal days they could not agree, and because for fifteen mortal days they were telling their present chief that he was an incompetent and an imbecile. Now they have got together under him again, now they are satisfied he is good enough for them, at any rate—and I am perfectly sure he is, and I believe too good for them, in my humble opinion. But, Sir, the point is this—and neither the hon. gentleman or his colleagues, nor any man on that side of the House, has answered it, nor can they answer it—the waste of time was not ours, the waste of time was not because of any act of ours; but the waste of time, in point of fact, was largely shortened by our action. Why, Sir, did not the present Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) come down and ask us to adjourn, not to the 16th, but to the 21st? And was it not at our instance that those five days were saved? The least the hon. gentleman can do is to give us those five days which we saved to him and the country. Instead of that, in the most unreasonable possible fashion, he proposes to take one of our pitiful three days. Now, Sir, what is the practical result if we pass this motion? The practical result is—and he knows it as well as I do—that to all intents and purposes you render it utterly impossible to have a single Bill properly discussed. To all intents and purposes, our power for legislation will be utterly put an end to; and our power for obtaining the opinion of the House on those important questions which have been alluded to will also be utterly put an end to. Now, that is as unreasonable a proposition as could be advanced. There is no answer to the statement made by my hon.

friend that to all intents and purposes we are not at the 31st day, but at the 18th day of the session, and it is the Government's fault that we are at the 18th day. More than that, everybody who has the slightest regard for English law, English precedent or English custom knows that it is of the very essence of the meeting of Parliament that grievances should be discussed before Supply is granted. He knows that that is the foundation of parliamentary law and usage; and it is our bounden duty to see that those grievances are discussed before a Supply is granted—and he may be right sure that those grievances will be discussed before a Supply is granted. I say that the Government has no business at all, under the circumstances, to have a sixth session. I say—and the hon. gentleman knows it, and the House and the country know it—that this Parliament does not represent to-day two-thirds of the existing electorate of Canada. I say that not more than 60 per cent of the existing electorate are represented by these 211 or 214 gentlemen. Under such circumstances, it is monstrous for the hon. gentleman to attempt to oppress and dragoon Parliament in this fashion. The province of Manitoba would be perfectly justified in disregarding constitutionally the action of this House, because this House has ceased since the census of 1891 to represent the province of Manitoba, or the province of New Brunswick, or the province of Nova Scotia, as they constitutionally ought to be represented. The law and the custom of England require that when there is any material alteration in the representation, at the earliest convenient time, the people should be appealed to and a proper representation obtained; and if that be the case in the Parliament of England, which is not a federal Parliament, it is ten times more the case in the Parliament of Canada, which is composed of representatives of seven different provinces. On that ground alone, there is no sort of reason for the position the hon. gentleman has taken. If the hon. gentleman really does desire to expedite the business of the country, he will not press this motion at present. He can gain nothing by it except a very unseemly and unnecessary wrangle, in which both parties will tire themselves out to little purpose. We shall probably go on debating and disputing, debating and disputing, this thing and that thing; and so far from gaining his additional day, he will find himself in a position to lose several days which he would otherwise have got. It would have been a personal convenience to me to have gone on to-night. I would like very much to do so. I do not want to be caged and bottled up for another week, as I have my respects to pay to the hon. gentleman opposite, and I would prefer doing so at once. But I am willing to waive all my own personal feelings in that respect when a great principle is at stake. I repeat that the hon. gentleman is doing a thing for which neither he nor his colleagues can find a just precedent. No instance can be cited in which, after a Government had deliberately wasted one-half of the preceding month, they had, within sixteen or seventeen days after the beginning of the debate on the Address—which is the true commencement of parliamentary work—come down and said to the Opposition: From this time forth, you, though having had no opportunity whatever of pressing your Bills, shall be practically deprived of all chance of obtaining a discussion on any of them. Because it is as well that my hon. friends should understand that if the debate on the Budget or Supply goes on while these Bills are on the Order paper, they cannot bring them up before the House goes into Supply, as our rules prevent that. They have only this one day in which to do it, and the hon. gentleman proposes to take that away from us. The proposition appears to me to be as unreasonable and untimely as one can conceive.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I think the country, and certainly the Government, desires hon. gentlemen opposite to come out from behind the lines of Torres Vedras.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, give us a chance.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We want to give you a chance. The Government days are the occasions when, if you have any policy, you will dare to come out with it; and the Government throw down the challenge to discuss immediately and as quickly as possible the actual business for which this Parliament was summoned.

An hon. MEMBER. Remedial legislation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Remedial legislation, of course, as the leader of the Government has stated. But the whole afternoon has savoured of obstruction. It would not perhaps be within the rules of order to do as I think I could do if I were permitted—give very good evidence of the extraordinary tactics adopted on the motion for leave to introduce a Bill—the discussion of that Bill to go on clause by clause without probably more than two or three members listening to the discussion. But I pass that by. I take the speeches of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) on this very motion as a proof positive that hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish the Government to get on with any business this session, whether Supply or legislation. For what has the hon. member for South Oxford argued? At one moment he says that this is a moribund Parliament—that this House no longer represents Manitoba, New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, and therefore it has no right to legislate; while in the next breath he says that if the Government take this day from private members most important legislation will be shelved, and hon. members will not be able to press forward important Bills they have in hand. The hon. gentleman's position is transparent; his motives are obvious. The hon. gentleman's tactics are poor indeed when in ten minutes he had to argue in that manner. Then, he is surely too old a parliamentarian to press seriously an argument which he borrowed from an equally experienced parliamentarian, the hon. member for Bothwell—in their desperation they had to make use of it—that the grievances of Her Majesty's subjects could not be properly ventilated unless this day were retained for private members. When are these grievances to be properly heard? On Government days, when the Government proposes that the House go into Supply. That is the proper occasion for any member to bring forward any grievances that exist in this country. The hon. leader of the Government has told the House that the Government wish to press on the necessary supplies, and they will, of course, in due course bring forward also the grievance for which this session was called.

Mr. LAURIER. And then we will grant this motion at once.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman wishes to take charge of the House. The Government propose to do Government business in the usual order. They propose to obtain the necessary supplies and press forward the necessary legislation. But, forsooth, they are almost threatened to-night by the leader of the Opposition, who says that we must reverse that procedure and bring in all our legislation before supplies are granted. If he were in charge of this House, and had its confidence, that would settle the matter, but I think the Government will be perfectly justified in doing their best to press forward the ordinary supplies which ought to be voted, and go on, as soon as possible, with the remedial legislation. But what if obstruction obtain? What if hon. gentlemen opposite propose to go on as they have been going, what will happen? Time will be consumed, and important legislation, even remedial legislation, postponed, and dangerously postponed. The Opposition would like to make this side of the House responsible for that, because, as they say, if the majority had submitted to its dictation, then the Bill for remedial legislation would have been considered, but since the majority did not reverse the order of procedure, they will prevent them doing any business whatever. I should think very little of the Government, if, in a matter of this kind, they yielded one jot of the unanimous offer which the leader of the Government has made this evening. He has proposed to do what the House has always done, what the House, as a rule, has done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Bothwell contradicts. I do not wish to have a controversy on that small point, and I simply say that the usual course to follow is to get through with the business before the House, which stands in the way of everything, and must be disposed of. If the Government possesses the confidence of the House, this question of Supply and the Budget must be moved out of the way before any Government business can possibly be considered or dealt with. There are no people more ready to point out to the country the weak and imbecile position of the Conservative party in this House than the Opposition, if they can get the slightest ground for it, and they would not hesitate to do so if the Government were to withdraw now from the stand they have taken. I have pointed to what has occurred to-day, and I think the House and the country will observe the significance of the discussion. Perhaps a more extraordinary course has not been followed during any session of this Parliament than has been taken suddenly on the eve of a Budget debate, or on the day when the Budget debate was supposed to be continued. I trust that the Government will adhere to the position it has taken.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I respectfully submit that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has attempted, not only, to use a vulgar expression, to bulldoze the Opposition, but to bulldoze the Government. He seems to be afraid that some amicable and reasonable settlement may be reached, and he rises in his place, not so much to discuss the question, as to threaten the Government and the Opposition, and to tell us what he would do if he were leading the Government, and how he would not yield one jot or tittle. It is a very undignified position to take. In a matter of this kind, practical and sensible men can come to a practical and sensible conclusion, and there should be no occasion for threats. The hon. gentleman surely must have forgotten himself when he referred to the very interesting debate which took place this afternoon as a debate which was started and continued for the purpose of obstruction. Does the hon. gentleman know that sitting behind him to-night are seven members who took an intelligent part in that debate?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How long did they speak?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where are the hon. members for West York (Mr. Maclean), East Grey (Mr. Sproule), East Durham (Mr. Craig), North Bruce (Mr. McNeil), West Assinibola (Mr. Davin), Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth)?

Mr. FOSTER. The whole of them did not consume more than thirty minutes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Every one of them took a part in the debate, and an interesting part. Some of them spoke very shortly and some at length, but many hon. gentlemen on this side spoke just as shortly as they did. The hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill had, necessarily, to speak at some length.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have already intervened to prevent an hon. member referring to a former debate, and I have to do so again. Surely we are not going back to discuss a question that was discussed the whole afternoon?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not catch that you called the hon. gentleman to order when he referred to it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I took the hint from Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is gracious enough to make his apologies for having broken the rule of the House, and I join him in his apologies. The leader of the House has told us that this has been an extraordinary session. I used somewhat similar language the other night, and I was called very severely to question for having used it. I shall not refer to that debate again, Sir, but the hon. gentleman—I think I can refer to his language—said that this was an extraordinary session, and he referred to the fact that the Government were shortly to bring down to the House the Manitoba coercion or remedial Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He did not use the word "coercion" but the word "remedial." It is all the same, call it by what name you please, I fancy it has the same meaning. The hon. gentleman, after admitting that this was an extraordinary session, presumably called for a special purpose, which was shortly to be fulfilled, so far as the Government could fulfil their part of bringing the Bill down, then said that the object of the Government was to see that the business for which we are assembled would be speedily performed. That is capital. But if we are met for the purpose of discussing and passing a Remedial Bill, how are we to do that unless the Bill is brought down? We are here ready and willing to perform that work. I made a proposition to the hon. gentleman the other night to bring down his Bill instantly. One hon. gentleman wanted to have the question referred to a committee in such a way that it might be examined into by that committee, and passed unanimously by the House, if possible. The hon. leader of the House would not accept that suggestion. We submit that to attempt to take up the day of private members before the Bill which we are called to consider is brought down, is an avowed attempt to deprive all private members of their rights to propose and carry legislation. If this House yields to the demand which the hon. gentleman makes, by giving up its private day and entering upon the discussion of Supply from day to day, the result must be to postpone the introduction of the Remedial Bill many days, if not weeks.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. FOSTER. Not one single hour.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the result must be, perforce, either to prevent discussion in the complete manner in which such a Bill ought to be discussed or to prevent its being passed at all. The Bill cannot be passed without being fully discussed. The hon. gentleman knows that there has not been a Bill introduced into this House for years which will probably give rise to more lengthy discussion than the one he says he is about to introduce. Why should it not? The hon. gentleman himself was not able to bring it down last session owing to its complicated character. He took weeks and months to prepare it. A Bill which has taken so many months to prepare must, necessarily, provoke a very great deal of discussion. It is a Bill which strikes strongly at principles which many hon. gentlemen believe should be preserved. That is a Bill unique in its character. It is a Bill which will have effects more extraordinary than any other ever passed by this Parliament, in the regard that it can never afterwards be amended, altered or repealed. It is a Bill, therefore, which must be gone over section by section, line by line, and I think the hon. gentleman heard the hon. leader of the Opposition say to him that, if he brought down that Bill and showed, by bringing it down, a readiness to go on with the work for which the session was called, the hon. gentleman was prepared to favourably consider his proposition to give up one of the private members' days.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. friend cheers that statement, and, therefore, the House will take it as an offer made by him across the floor. What objection can the hon. leader of the House have to that? If he accepts it, I have no more to say; I shall resume my seat. If he does not accept that or does not give any indication of his willingness to accept it, I shall go on to show that there are other reasons which should preclude him from having a vote of the House in favour of the proposition he has made to-night. The hon. gentleman who last spoke said that the consideration of grievances must precede Supply. He acknowledged that as a proper parliamentary rule, and he said we were preventing the discussion of grievances because we were preventing a motion for Supply being made.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all. I said that on Government days these grievances could be brought up on going into Supply. By having another day for the Government, more opportunities would be had for bringing these grievances before the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The answer has already been given. I do not wish to go over these points again and again. But the hon. gentleman will see that on the Order paper there are twenty or thirty notices of motion relating to the removal of grievances.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am sure the hon. gentleman will allow me a moment. I referred to the statements made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). They said it was a well-understood parliamentary practice that the consideration and redress of grievances should always precede Supply; and I said that, under the ordinary parliamentary practice, to add to the number of Government days would add to the opportunities for ventilating such grievances as are usually brought forward on motion to go into Supply. I think I am quite safe in that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The common sense of the hon. gentleman, as an old parliamentarian, will show him that the Order paper is filled with notices of motion relating to specified grievances, and the hon. gentleman knows that no grievance of which a notice of motion has been given can be made the subject-matter of speech or motion on going into Supply, and so he is choking off the whole House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say that is the result of the adoption of this course. Surely that is not open to question. If we had passed the Budget debate and the ordinary motion to go into Supply had been moved, there is not a member of the House who could bring before the House any of the grievances set out in this Order paper.

Mr. FOSTER. And on that paper all the grievances are to be found, 'of course.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not say that. But I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to some of the grievances to be found here. There is one, at any rate, the need of calling attention to which the hon. gentleman will not challenge, for I have heard him dilate for four hours on this, which he said was greater than any political grievance existing under the constitution. All others, Sir, were mere figments, mere make-believes; we were to sacrifice our party allegiance and everything else to carry out what he then advocated as the prohibitory law—the prohibition of the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquor. The hon. gentleman may forget these things for they occurred before his official days. But we have not forgotten them. Though he has not retracted, he has said that he made that four hours' speech in a moment of weakness.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman would not suggest that a motion in favour of prohibition was pertinent on going into Supply?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the former statements of the leader of the House are to be accepted, it would be a most admirable motion on going into Supply, and it should be adopted before we go into Supply if his argument on that point was good. We have here the motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), which I do not know that anybody in the House can understand. It is a sort of omnium gatherum. It seems to be intended to air all the grievances of the North-west Territories.

That it is necessary—

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman is not going to anticipate the discussion on this motion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly not, Mr. Speaker; but I am going to point out to the House, with your permission, the importance of some of these notices of motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is going a long distance in the direction of expressing an opinion with regard to the notice of motion placed on the Order paper by the hon. member for West Assiniboia.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If you rule, Mr. Speaker, of course I must not express an opinion upon it. But I desire to show, without expressing an opinion, what this resolution is:

That it is necessary to (1) the prosperity and progress of the North-west Territories, important to the stability and progress of the Dominion, and of great moment to the Empire, that the North-west Territories shall be treated on a different footing from that of heretofore; (2) That the self-respect of the people of the North-west, not less than the material interests of those vast territories, demands that the Territories shall not be treated on a plane of inferiority; (3) That the climate, soil and conditions generally of the North-west are different from those of other parts of Canada, and a policy specially adapted to its needs and resources is called for in order that the settlers shall be rendered prosperous and immigration policies be made effective.

The hon. gentleman, no doubt, has an important policy underlying these words, affecting that part of the Dominion whose soil, climate and conditions are different from those of the rest of the Dominion. And I would rather gather from the concluding part of it—though I would not express an opinion—that he is not in accord with the immigration policy which the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) supports in this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Or the state of the weather.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As to the hon. gentleman's position with regard to the state of the weather, I am not informed. Then we have a motion which may or may not be made, but from the earnestness with which it has been discussed year after year it seems to be considered of great importance by the hon. member in whose name it stands, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) relating to the towing of sawlogs across the great lakes. Then we have a number of motions which may not be considered extraordinary, and then we come to the proposition to purchase branch lines of the Intercolonial Railway—not all, but one of the branch lines.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a grievance.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Grievance! I should think so, if it were carried out. This will give rise to the discussion of the great question raised by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) whether these branch lines are to be bought out or not. Then we have the proposal from the hon. member for West Assiniboia that we should give away the Government property in and about Moose Jaw at any figure it will bring in order that it may be taxed by the people out there. That I assume to be an important motion, from the tenor of it. Then we have a proposition relating to a bonus upon butter. That is an important one, I will admit. I do not want to make light of that, because it is an important motion in itself. Then you have one to aid in the establishment of creameries and cheese factories, and from the importance which we attach to these manufactories in the eastern part of the Dominion, I can well concede that that is a subject which we would like to have discussed. I would not impute to the hon. gentleman that he puts these motions on for the mere purpose of having them appear in his name, and that he would move them, and then ask liberty to withdraw the motions as soon as he had made his speech, because that would impute to the hon. gentleman a desire to make political capital only. I will concede to him that he has higher and better motives than that. Then we have the motion in the name of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) relating to Imperial duties to be levied for Imperial defences. Well, there is no member of the House who would at the present time make light of a serious resolution of that kind. I know my hon. friend is altogether in earnest about that, for he has time and again spoken incidentally of it in this House. For one, I will be exceedingly interested to hear his deliverance upon it, and to see if he has any well-formulated scheme which will commend itself to the statesmen of the Empire as calculated to carry out the object which he seems to have in view. I wonder if that is to be shelved also. Then we have the question of protection embodied in the resolution of the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), in which the whole principle of protection is to be brought up by a motion with reference to the development of Canadian tobacco. Well, Sir, my hon. friend smiles, but I have no doubt that his resolution will cause a good deal of discussion, and will be looked forward to with a great deal of interest. Passing by a great many others, which are of more or less importance, and which would perhaps not give rise to much discussion. I come to the motion of my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), one of the most important on the whole paper, a resolution in favour of preferential trade.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not want any introduction.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will undertake to say that he is going to vote to-night in favour of a Government motion the effect of which will be to relegate that to limbo. I am pointing out to the hon. gentleman that if we give up at this early stage, the time that is allotted to that portion of the business of the House which the rules of the House have accorded to hon. members like himself and myself, for the purpose of airing our political views upon Imperial or Dominion questions, we are simply putting it out of our power to move these questions at all. But I need not go through the list, I do not propose to weary the House by going through the list. In addition to these notices of motion, some of them on inter-provincial subjects, some of them on Dominion, and some of them on Imperial, you have a large number of public returns and orders many of which I will venture to say are almost as important as any of the Bills which the Government will bring down, barring the Manitoba Remedial Bill. I look upon that as the most important Bill of the session, as the Bill for which the session was primarily called, and I look upon that as the Bill which we ought to tackle at once, as soon as the Government can agree upon its terms and bring it down. But we have, in addition to that, a number of important Bills here which ought not to be overlooked. We have a Bill respecting the adulteration of food and agricultural fertilizers, by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). We have an Act respecting interest by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), which will provoke very lengthy discussions, if he expects to carry it in this House. I know that a great many gentlemen are opposed to its principle, and I believe there are a good many supporting it; but it will not be a party question, it will be a question upon which members will divide outside of party lines altogether. But if this day is given up, that Bill, along with others, will be slaughtered, there will be a regular slaughter of these innocents. Then we have the Bill to secure the independence of Parliament, preventing members from accepting office for 12 months after they have ceased to be members. My hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) shakes his head, whether at me or at the Bill I do not know; but he will have an opportunity of discussing the Bill. I do not object to that. The object is, I believe, to prevent a member from accepting office in the gift of the Government having emoluments attached to it, for 12 months after he ceases to be a member of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that include senatorships?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will not express an opinion upon the Bill without hearing it, but it does affect all offices of emolument, at any rate outside senatorships, possibly it may include them.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It will affect members of Parliament.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And prevent them from accepting offices for 12 months after they have ceased to be members.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will confine himself to the motion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, I will not trespass upon the rules of the House by discussing the principle of the Bill. I was induced to go so far as I did by the interruption of the hon. member for Inverness, who intimated that I had not properly described the Bill. Now, there are other Bills the importance of which I beg leave to point out. There is a Bill relating to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of trade. Some seven years ago a Bill of this kind was passed in this House, but which became a nullity because of an amendment made to it in the Senate by adding the word "unduly," and it has remained a nullity ever since upon the statute-book. It is proposed that that Bill should be amended so as to make it effective, and I want to see in what direction. I remember well, when that Bill was proposed some years ago, the interest that was taken in it by almost every member of the House, being one of the most important Bills that had come before us for many years, affecting the mercantile community, and the commercial interests of the community all through Canada. That Bill is going to be slaughtered, if this day is given up, along with others. I think the hon. member who has introduced that Bill, the hon. member for East Grey, should at least rise up in protest against this motion, and argue in favour of the proposition which the leader of the Opposition made to the Government. Now, I won't weary the House by going through these Bills. I have shown that there are a large number of important Bills which can only come up either on Wednesday night, under our rules, or on Thursday, the day specially set apart for their consideration by the rules of the House. The hon. gentleman seeks to take that away, and it simply means that not one of these Bills can be considered during this session of Parliament. While hon. gentlemen are taking a course which avowedly will prevent the discussion of any public Bills proposed by members on either side of the House, they tell us that this is an ordinary session, called together for ordinary purposes. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly plain to my mind that if this is an ordinary session called for ordinary purposes, it is unfair and unjust to pass any resolution the effect of which will be to throttle public Bills and orders proposed by private members. If it is not an ordinary session, if it is, as the leader of the House has said, an extraordinary session, called for a particular purpose, the passage of the Remedial Bill, then the Opposition simply ask that the Bill be brought down, that we may see its terms; and the leader of the Opposition pledges himself that when it is brought before the House for discussion, he will, for one, willingly surrender Thursdays to the Government in order that speedy progress may be made with the Bill. Well, Sir, that being the case, I think, notwithstanding, the dire threats which the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has made, that the leader of the House will do well to listen to the proposition of the leader of the Opposition, which ought not to engage the attention of the House for another five minutes. The hon. gentleman, of course, has it in his power to prevent progress being made. He may obstinately refuse—a thing which I have never seen done by the leader of the House before, on a motion of this kind—to consider any alternative proposition. I think the alternative proposition is a very reasonable one, and one that should commend itself to members on both sides of the House, and with that view I have spoken in its favour.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman has excelled himself this evening. He is the windmill of the Opposition: but the machine has been thoroughly oiled and the breeze that set him going has been a blizzard. The hon. gentleman appeared this evening to support his leader, and the relative position between leader and lieutenant, the admirable balance we have had, is instructive and picturesque. The leader of the House—I mean the leader of the Opposition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Slightly previous.

Mr. DAVIN. Hon. gentlemen lay flattering unction to their souls from even a slip of that kind. I do not think much consolation can be drawn by hon. gentlemen opposite from the news received from the lower provinces. The election will put in one of these chairs a man who is a terror to the hon. gentleman. The leader of the Opposition did not appear this evening in as favourable a light as usual. His speech contained its own refutation. If he had made out a strong case I do not know but that I would have, might have, been inclined to stand with him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman voted against his own motion.

Mr. DAVIN. I will come to that, and the hon. gentleman will have mighty little comfort when I come to it. The leader of the Opposition declared in the speech that is fresh in the memory of the House that it would not be unreasonable to make the proposition that the leader of the Government makes if the House had sat continuously from 2nd January. But, he said, it was utterly unreasonable because we had lost two weeks. Therefore, all this contest and all this warmth is about two days, two Thursdays, and to-night's action, to-night's conduct is a disgrace to Parliament, a disgrace to the Opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not understand that the hon. member for Assiniboia has applied that term to any hon. member.

Mr. DAVIN. I am in perfect order. I say the leader of the Opposition did not appear in as favourable a position as he usually does when he was making his arguments to-night. But we come then from the principal actor—I do not know whether I am parliamentary or not, but I aim at being picturesque—and while perhaps what I intend to say might not have been parliamentary, I will make my remarks parliamentary. At a fair in the old country you have an actor and you have the jack pudding, and in criticising the performance you have to pass from the actor to the jack pudding. I have said that the leader of the Opposition did not appear in as favourable an attitude as that in which he usually appears. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) appeared in a more discreditable attitude than he is accustomed to appear in this House, and that is saying a great deal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. There is nothing out of order in that.

Mr. MULOCK. I rise to a point of order. I submit that it is unparliamentary for an hon. gentleman to say that an hon. member of this House appeared in a more discreditable manner.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to refer to the hon. member for Queen's attitude as discreditable. That is certainly unparliamentary.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIN. Less creditable.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. DAVIN. Less creditable. The hon. member for Winnipeg does not seem to be aware of this, that if I adopted—

Mr. MULOCK. Order. There has been a ruling given by you, Mr. Speaker, and I submit that the hon. gentleman cannot continue the debate, but must submit to your ruling and withdraw the expression.

Mr. DAVIN. If I used the word discreditable, I withdraw it. I meant to say, less creditable. We had from the hon. member for Queen's—I do not know whether he occupied half an hour or three-quarters of an hour—a flagrant manifestation of obstructive tactics.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MARTIN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has charged the hon. member for Queen's with having been guilty of obstructive tactics—flagrant, obstructive tactics. I submit that that is a reflection on the hon. gentleman, which is not justified by the rules of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member should withdraw that word.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it the phrase obstructive tactics I have to withdraw?

Mr. SPEAKER. If the reference to the hon. member for Queen's was that he had adopted obstructive tactics, then, I think, the hon. gentleman should withdraw the expression.

Mr. DAVIN. Of course I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker. But I must say that I have heard in the Imperial Parliament—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. There is nothing disorderly in this. I say I have heard in the Imperial Parliament language just as strong used by the leaders of debate in that Parliament. But I will say this, and I hope I will be in order, that the hon. gentleman manifested here to-night conduct wholly inconsistent with the desire that should be in his bosom to facilitate the business of this House. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) said something about my proposing a motion and then not dividing the House on it, and the hon. member for Queen's made a similar reference, and that in face of the fact that not a man of them has had the courage to divide the House, if I remember rightly, this session. The leader of the Opposition last night did not dare to divide the House. The hon. member for Winnipeg has not dared to divide the House. What, I ask, is the difference between the conduct of an hon. member who knows his motion will be voted down and does not wish to put the House to the trouble of dividing, and that of going through the mockery, through the cowardly mockery we have seen on that side of the House?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order again. I take exception to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) charging this side of the House with having been guilty of "cowardly mockery." I object to that language as unparliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not understand that the hon. member (Mr. Davin) has applied the phrase "cowardly mockery" to members of this House.

Mr. FOSTER. He applied it to their tactics.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) can himself explain as to whether he desires to attribute it to members of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I will explain. Now, I have a vice-chancellor of a university and a mathematician opposite me, and I have some learned gentlemen opposite, and some who are not learned, and I shall ask their attention while I point out how impossible it is that that phrase could apply to any gentleman on that side. I said that they went through a "cowardly mockery."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Who are they?

Mr. DAVIN. I did not say they were guilty of "cowardly mockery." I spoke of a thing. I spoke of their action as "cowardly mockery." Mr. Speaker, you will at once see the distinction. Now, Sir—

Mr. LAURIER. We wish to know if the Speaker has seen the distinction before the hon. member proceeds.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, well, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) sees it, because I know he has a metaphysical mind.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, but you addressed yourself to the Speaker, and we want the ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, while the Speaker is resolving that intricate problem I shall go on—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the House will aid me in endeavouring to maintain order. I read in "Denison's Decisions" the following:—

The word "cowardly" is not to be used.

It was applied in that instance in this way:

Major Dickson characterized the attack made upon that gentleman (Mr. Churchward) as "wanton and cowardly."

Mr. OSBORNE rose to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. and gallant member will, no doubt, withdraw that word.

I hope the hon. member (Mr. Davin) will withdraw that expression.

Mr. DAVIN. I will withdraw it, Mr. Speaker. Now, Sir, to pass from cowardice to courage. The hon. gentlemen opposite have been, not facilitating business here this evening, and I think they have had another motive—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take care.

Mr. DAVIN. I think they have had another motive.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, if you are not rational creatures to whom one can attribute a motive, I do not know how to deal with you. I will have to deal with you as the herd of Circe, instead of as members of Parliament, if you cannot have a motive applied to you. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to transgress the rules of this House as my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) did, and I will not refer to past debates; but I will say this, that a deep impression was made upon this House by the financial statement of the Finance Minister, and we had expected to-day that the continuation of the refutation of that speech would be given us. But the fact is, that so badly did the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) get on the other evening, that he was afraid to proceed to-night, and his friends have thrown a buffer between him and his subject, in consequence of the failure of which I spoke.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Hear, hear: that is the general impression.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, if that is their motive for delaying business, it is a rational one, and I commend the prudence of hon. gentlemen opposite for having given way to it. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me speak more seriously.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Speak to the question.

Mr. DAVIN. I have been speaking to the question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But you were out of order.

Mr. DAVIN. Once or twice. Mr. Speaker, out of mere kindness to my hon. friend (Mr. Landerkin), I like to keep his aberrations sometimes in countenance. Let me seriously speak of what has taken place here to-night. It is a thing we ought to deprecate in this House, that men of the standing of these hon. gentlemen opposite, should take such a course as they have taken this evening. What will the people throughout the country think of the House?

An hon. MEMBER. Don't bother about that.

Mr. DAVIN. What opinion will the people of the country form of this House, when they find hon. gentlemen opposite starting on a course that may result in this Parliament failing to pass the Estimates, and thus the country have the expense thrown on it of having two sessions of Parliament within one year? And, Sir, if such a policy should succeed, then the country will know at whose door to lay the blame, and they will know how to regard the conduct of my hon. friend (Mr. Davies); and the people in the lower provinces, in his constituency will know how to regard conduct far more serious, and far more offensive, if I may say so, against what should be the rules of Parliament, and against what should be the standard of the conduct of a man who aspires to so high a position as my hon. friend aspires to.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) was scarcely successful in his attempt to aim at being picturesque. He sought to be picturesque, and can we fancy what he would be if he had not aimed so high. Had that not been his high ideal of decorum, and of proper parliamentary demeanour, what would his condition have been had he not thought he was in perfect order? If he did not think he was in perfect order, what an exhibition he might have made of himself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) entertained this House, but he certainly did not add any to the information respecting the subject under discussion. Sir, I have come to regard the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) as a wild-eyed son of destiny, who must be allowed his full swing in this House whether in order or out of order. I shall not follow such a lead, but shall try to bring this debate back to the proper channel. Let me dispose of the professed generous and magnanimous offer, as it is called by the member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), which the Minister of Finance has made. The motion of the Minister of Finance is that he shall take Thursdays, one of the only three days left to members, and he proposes that if, instead of that motion we will consent to give him all the three days, less one, he will waive the motion. If we will allow the Government to proceed 'de die in diem,' excepting one day, he will then not ask to have the Budget debate proceed for part of that time. That is his proposition. Now, I challenge the Finance Minister or any other member of this House to tell me of a case when during the Budget debate a motion has been made to take away one of the days of private members. The Budget debate, as a rule, continues to a particular stage of the session before it is allowed to go on de die in diem; but when has the motion been made to proceed with the debate de die in diem at a time when the session was but in its infancy? There are important measures before this House in the hands of private members. I am interested in the promotion of one which I do not wish to see shelved. I think it is one of far-reaching importance. I do not wish to argue it now; but there are conditions in this House at present which call for a further application of the principle of the Independence of Parliament Act. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) suggested that if we did not allow this motion to pass, we might be charged with preventing the consideration of remedial legislation. How can we be charged with obstructing remedial legislation when it is not before the House? In fact, the Government, up to this moment, I presume, have not the slightest idea whether they will introduce that Bill or not. The country has not any confidence in them. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) points to Cape Breton, as if one swallow made a summer—as if one instance proved a general. I could point out, on the contrary, the conclusion to be drawn from the procession, beginning in Nova Scotia, and going through Antigonish, Verchères, Jacques Cartier, Charlevoix, Montreal Centre, Cardwell, West Huron; and if East Assiniboia had been opened, we would have had that too; and even the fallen majority in Victoria told its tale. All these results prove unmistakably that the country has no confidence in the assertions of this Government in regard to any matter claiming public attention. The Government are evidently seeking to escape the necessity of introducing remedial legislation. They have wobbled on it ever since it was first before the country. For five years they have fenced with the question, professing to be deeply interested in it, and at the same time adopting tactics calculated to prevent their ever being obliged to show their sincerity. Last March they declared their intention of going to the country on the question. Then they wobbled, and called Parliament together to pass the measure. Parliament met to consider it, and in the presence of Parliament they halted and stood still. They went on strike in July last, some of them, on this question. The country doubted their sincerity, and they had to give a written pledge to this House. The House took them at their word, and allowed them to remain in office until the 2nd of January, when they were expected to proceed with the business. The House met on the 2nd of January, and was there ever such an exhibition of wobbling? They actually went out of plumb, and they did not wobble back for a couple of weeks. At last they again took shelter on the Treasury benches, having been for the moment reprieved by their supporters; and from the day they got their reprieve to this moment they have made no progress with their Remedial Bill. They say the House is obstructing the measure which they refuse to advance. They have it locked up in the Council Chamber, and we know nothing about it except what dribbles out through the press from time to time. Who has any confidence in the position of the Government at the present moment? Here is the House in its second month, with not more than a couple of months more to live, and the Government not ready to tell the House what their position on this matter is; and then, in the face of their own inaction, they say the Opposition is obstructing them. Is it the fault of the Opposition that the Government do not bring this measure forward? What is the initial cause of delay in the progress of this measure? It cannot be charged that it is this House when the measure is not before this House. So that evidently the real object of the Government is to shelve the measure—to exhaust the time of the House in getting the Supply Bill through, and then do as they have done again and again with their measures which remain unfinished till the end of the session—allow it to be killed because of the state of public business. Either that, or they propose to introduce the measure in question at so late a period that it will be incapable of receiving proper criticism. If there ever was a measure, so far as one can judge of its character, that ought to be carefully considered, and to be before the country for the longest possible time before it becomes law, it is the measure we have heard so much about. Members of Parliament are entitled to the benefit of the country's advice; but they cannot have the benefit of that advice on this measure if it is kept locked up in the Council Chamber until the dying days of this Parliament. Every circumstance connected with this matter points either to the bad faith of the Government in seeking to shelve it, or their inability to accomplish the main object for which this session was called. The hon. Minister of Finance says that this House was called together for the discharge of general business. If it was, then I claim that private members have their rights; and private members' days are their right until the Government have put themselves in a proper position to take away from them those days. On the Order paper to-day there does not stand a single Government order, whilst in the hands of private members, as has been pointed out, there are dozens and dozens of important measures. Sir, there have been many vacancies in this House during the past year; what caused them? There are many gentlemen occupying seats here who wish they were not occupying seats—why? The Parliament of Canada has been degraded by the practices that have existed. The Parliament of Canada has been degraded in the minds of the people by taking away members of this House to places of emolument during the term of their office. I conceive that no greater blow could be struck at the independence of Parliament than by allowing the idea to permeate the minds of members of this House that they can, by abnegating their judgment and their responsibility to their constituents and giving a blind support to the Government, establish a claim to an appointment to some place of emolument. No greater blow could be struck at the independence of Parliament than the practice that produces such results. Sir, is a place in Parliament to be considered but the stepping-stone to office? How many members of this House have already gone to their rewards, and how many more are sitting here seeking for rewards? How long is this practice to continue? Why it is being recognized in the country that the highest aim of men seeking parliamentary position is not to represent their country but to prostitute their positions in order that they may obtain offices of emolument under the Government. I submit that that is a crying evil which strikes at the foundation of representative government. Last year I introduced a measure calculated to deal with this question, and I hoped this session to be able, if not to advance it to a final stage, to make some progress. I did hope that public opinion would have made some impression on hon. gentlemen opposite, and that I would have been able to secure an opportunity, at least, of placing that measure upon the statute-book.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). Why not get the local legislators of Ontario to adopt such an Act?

Mr. MULOCK. I am not a member of that legislature and I am not here to defend it; but when the evil exists in this House, it is for this House to redress it. I submit that it exists here in an intense form at this moment. Why, I see before me now hon. gentlemen who are office seekers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MULOCK. Is that in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. MULOCK. Then, I shall take it back.

Mr. FERGUSON. Try and be decent.

Mr. MULOCK. I will try and be decent. I say that the first duty of this House is to see that we do nothing calculated to impair our judgment, warp our minds, or interfere in the slightest degree with our capability to represent public opinion. If there is a practice in force here to-day of offering inducements to hon. members which are calculated to wean them from their loyalty to the people, we cannot too soon address ourselves to the correction of such an abuse. Being of the opinion that the evil exists in an intense form, I submit that if the Government insists on taking Thursdays from us, they will make it impossible or exceedingly difficult to press to a final conclusion a statute upon our books which will do away with this very serious wrong. There are many other important measures upon the Order paper which ought to receive our consideration, and I trust that the Government will not turn a deaf ear to our reasonable requests. They pretend to be super-sensitive about the rights of minorities in Manitoba. Has the minority in this House no right? Have we no claim to consideration? Surely the Government which is extending its protecting wing to the minority in another section will at least look at home and have some regard for the minority in this House.

Mr. FERGUSON. Are you against the consideration being given to minorities in the country?

Mr. MULOCK. I believe in justice being done. When I see the measure I will give my opinion as to whether it is a proper measure or not; when I see it I will decide after discussion. The hon. Finance Minister says that this has been an extraordinary session. Nobody will controvert that statement. There has never been such a session probably since the Long Parliament of England. I am not aware of a Parliament having ever existed before which practically usurped office. This Parliament has existed five years. It has voted five years' supplies. The legislation of this Parliament extends until the 1st July, 1896. It entered upon its duties the 29th day of April, 1891. It has thus existed the five years assigned to it by the Confederation Act, so far as the voting of supplies is concerned. Technically you may say it can violate the constitution and vote supplies to enable the Government to remain in office fifteen months after Parliament has ceased. Sir, it is an extraordinary spectacle, an amazing spectacle. There was never any such Parliament in the history of Canada, when we had old parliamentarians, who had respect for the law. Sir John Macdonald, for example, and others. Did they ever propose that Parliament could survive the five years and vote supplies, to enable the Government to sit in defiance of the country's wishes and cling to office for fifteen months after they have ceased to enjoy the confidence of the country. It is an extraordinary spectacle following that other extraordinary spectacle which we witnessed four weeks ago, and which was furnished us by seven members of the Cabinet. I am sure that that was a unique event in the history of representative institutions, and I doubt if it will be repeated. And now we have a Government, which everybody knows cannot command a majority in this House to vote remedial legislation. We have a Government which we know will be abandoned by twenty, thirty or forty of its own followers.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). How do you know?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We have that Government sheltering themselves behind their desks and refusing to bring down the measure which they called us together specially to discuss. That is another extraordinary spectacle—that of a Government with a majority on other matters and a large defection from its own ranks on this one question.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). How do you know?

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman himself say he will support it on that question?

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). I will.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman will probably change his mind before long. He knows full well that a very large number of hon. gentlemen opposite intend to vote against the measure.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). How do you know?

Mr. MULOCK. We have heard them stand up in the House and make the assertion.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). How many?

Mr. MULOCK. I have not kept count, but there is an increasing number I understand, and we will see the total when the vote is counted. At present there is the bald fact before us that a large number of the Government's supporters are abandoning it in this particular matter. Under these circumstances the country will recognize that the Government are shirking their duty in respect of this matter as they have done for the last five years, and are seeking to put the Bill in a position which will enable them and their followers, who refuse to follow them in this transaction, to escape or, to use the vulgar expression, to take to the woods. I would again remind the Finance Minister that if he means to make a bona fide offer, he had better make one that is not so unreasonable. He asks to take Thursdays and he tells us that if we will not consent he will take Thursdays and Wednesdays as well. He tells us that if we will allow the debate on the Budget to go on from day to day, he will not ask to take one of the days. What sort of offer is that? The hon. gentleman says that has been the practice. I would remind him that that practice was only adopted when the Budget began at the commencement of the session, not, as in this case when the Government had, by their methods prevented public business being done for a couple of weeks.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a shifting of the ground.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman knows that it was through his own action that the progress of the public business was hindered. He was the chief striker; he was the one who established the picket, and the public business was delayed for two weeks through his conduct. If the public press is to be believed, when the Premier was trying to re-organize his Cabinet, the hon. gentleman stood there in room

16 and harangued the members and prevented the Cabinet being re-formed. Talk about obstruction. The Finance Minister led the strike which prevented the reorganization of the Cabinet. He stood as a picket would stand in a labour strike, preventing men returning to their allegiance, and preventing the progress of business, preventing the Premier doing his duty in the service of the country. Why, Sir, I shall never forget while memory lasts, the appearance of the Premier on the floor of this House immediately after our adjournment, when, in the presence of a hundred members, and standing not three feet from where I stand at this moment, he said: "For twelve months they have been trying to assassinate me." Since the Finance Minister chooses to seek escape, let me read him an opinion from a public journal upon his conduct. This is from the "Evening Star," of Toronto.—

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Give us the Bobcaygeon "News."

Mr. MULOCK. I know the hon. gentleman does not like to hear it, but let him have patience.

The shadow of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the assassinated, will fall upon every caucus and secret council of the party for years. Faith, the sense of security, reliance upon each other are gone for a generation. Tricks and treasons will be suspected where they do not exist, and will exist where they are not suspected. Haunted by the wraith of a strangled leader, the party house will permit no repose to the red-handed. Peaceful sleep will be impossible, and waking ease out of the question. The sighing of the wind will be ominous; the bellying curtain at the open window will suggest a hidden bravo, the word of a man will be held worthless and his oath of small value. Before eating, every dish will be tested for poison with the finger-ring of Machiavelli; before sleeping, every couch will be probed with daggers, as in the palace of Henry VIII. Sir Charles Tupper is not the man to lay the ghost. It cannot be done in his generation, nor by one who was accessory before the fact. What is to be done to rethroner faith and to re-establish confidence? Shall the men who introduce treachery at the hearthstone be made heads of the house or sent into exile? Can they be exalted without treachery becoming the whole habit of the ambitious?

The attempt to assassinate Sir Mackenzie Bowell was made by his own colleagues, by men who accepted office under him, and pledged themselves as hon. members to be true and loyal. These are the men who assassinated Sir Mackenzie Bowell. And the last scene of the tragedy will be enacted in a short time, when, no doubt, he will be deposed from his high office. They may succeed in this conspiracy—

Mr. FOSTER. Order, order.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has no right to charge conspiracy.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, Mr. Speaker, it may be a painful subject to the hon. gentleman. But the country has already described his action. The facts are known outside this House, and, however the hon. gentleman's actions are described here, the people understand that but for what he has done we should have been discharging our public business regularly since coming here, and the hon. Minister would, perhaps, have been justified in making the motion. But, as we have been prevented from prosecuting public business by means of their wrong-doing, I protest against that wrong-doing being made the reason for depriving us of our rights. Mr. Speaker, the country will not endorse the coercion the Government is trying to bring to bear upon the House. They may practice or attempt to practice coercion on the minority in this House, and they may fail. But there is a day of retribution coming and we shall have an opportunity of appealing to a tribunal higher than this, to the whole people of Canada. And, when that appeal takes place, I warrant that the Government that has been untrue to themselves, untrue to the country, will be placed where it should be placed—in contemptible oblivion.

Mr. LAVERGNE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House, it is a matter of sincere regret to me that, owing to my inability to speak the language of the majority, I am precluded, in an extempore speech, from the advantage of using that language, but I shall avail myself of the privilege of using my own vernacular language. Allow me to state, at the outset, Sir, that I resent the charge of obstruction laid against members on this side of the House, and I venture to say that, on the contrary, the progress of the debate is being every day obstructed by the tactics resorted to by the Government. I do not intend, Sir, to indulge in any lengthy remarks, but I think it may not be out of place to take a retrospective view of the situation and to go as far back as the beginning of the session, the better to understand the cause of the delays experienced in the expediting the business of this House during the session. What was it, I ask, Sir, that prevented us from approaching the great question which was to be introduced this session? Was it not the Government themselves? This is, to a certain extent, an extraordinary session. Parliament has not been summoned for the transaction of ordinary business; it has not been called together to vote supplies in order to enable the Government to mismanage public affairs and remain in office fifteen months after Parliament has ceased. No, Sir; Parliament has been summoned for the purpose of dealing with a great question, which has been in suspense for over five years. Sir, it was truly an extraordinary spectacle we witnessed at the opening of the session. Hardly had two days elapsed from the opening of Parliament, after the Government had agreed as to their policy, one of the main planks of which was the redress of the grievances of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, when we witnessed the amazing spectacle which was furnished to us by seven members of the Cabinet throwing up their portfolios and abandoning their leader in such a way as I shall refrain from qualifying here, as I do not wish to depart from the rules of parliamentary language and etiquette. The outcome of all this was that, upon the very opening of the House, a whole week of the session was wasted, owing to the adjournment of the House. After the House had resumed its labours, one of the hon. Ministers stood up on the floor of the House and told us in so many plain words that he and six of his colleagues had retired from the Government because the leader of the Government was an incompetent and an imbecile, unfit to be at the head of affairs in this country, and that he would have to give way to another gentleman, better qualified to fill the position. Now, what spectacle did we witness, a few days later? The House adjourned from day to day, at the instance of the Administration, and we were told that Sir Mackenzie Bowell was making superhuman efforts to reconstruct the Cabinet. Then, the bolters or the strikers, as they are called in common parlance, came back to the fold, and their leader read to the House a statement which, from what had transpired, was at variance with the facts. They came down and asked the House to believe that the reason they left, was not because the Premier was too weak a man, too incompetent a leader, but because the vacancy created in the Cabinet by the retirement of Mr. Angers had not been filled. Thus, we have lost two weeks and wasted a precious time which could have been devoted to the transaction of public business. I say, Sir, that after having prevented us from prosecuting public business for a couple of weeks, it ill becomes them to charge us with resorting to obstructive tactics. Obstructionists, indeed! Why, Sir, these hon. gentlemen, from the very beginning of the session, have kept wasting the time of the House and it is through their action that the progress of public business was hindered. We have now before us a Government which, up to the present time, have not dared to bring down their measure for which they called us together, and they propose, at this stage, to take away one of the days of private members, without being able to justify such a demand. Talk of obstruction! We are no obstructionists. Who kept the debate on the Address dragging on for days? Was it not the hon. gentlemen on your right, Sir? Did not the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) detain the House for three long hours on that occasion? He spoke at greater length than any other member of the House or of the Government, even those among the latter who resumed their positions in the Cabinet. It cannot, therefore, be charged that the members on this side of the House had resorted to obstructive tactics and hindered thereby the progress of the public business. Now, Mr. Speaker, what do we ask? We simply ask the Government to bring down the measure they have declared themselves ready to introduce this session. As you are aware, Sir, that in 1890, a law was passed by the Manitoba legislature, affecting the rights of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education. Petitions were sent both to Parliament and to the Government. The Catholic hierarchy called upon the Catholics throughout the length and breadth of the land to sign petitions asking for the redress of the grievances and wrongs perpetrated on the minority of that province. What has become of all those petitions which were largely signed throughout the Catholic parishes? They were thrown into the waste basket. The very same thing occurred in 1894. Numerous petitions asking for the disallowance of the statutes passed by the North-west legislature, and which were very largely signed, met with the same fate. Where have they gone to? To the waste basket. We have kept intimating to the Government to state their policy. We have intimated to them to intervene in favour of the Catholic minority. But the Government decided to refer the matter to the courts. The proceedings in those cases were initiated in the Court of the Queen's Bench in Manitoba, and the matter came on appeal before the Supreme Court, and finally, it was carried up in appeal before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England. And recollect, Sir, that all these proceedings were gone through in order to decide a question which was as clear as noonday. The Government kept the matter in litigation for years, merely to find out whether they had the right to intervene. But, strange to say, no sooner had the courts decided that the Government was vested with such power, the latter declined exercising the same. What did the Government do? They appealed to the Supreme Court and submitted questions for the opinion of that tribunal, whether the Government had the power to interfere, within the meaning of section 93 of the British North America Act. It was no use resorting to the courts, to find that out, for everybody knew that there is, in such a case, a corrective jurisdiction, vested in Parliament by the constitution of the country. The hon. leader of the Opposition has over and over again made a statement to the same effect. He stated that the question to be solved was not a question of law, but simply a question of facts; and that as soon as the facts should have been ascertained, then the powers of interference would be exercised by the Government. It is merely a political question, and not a question of law to be decided by the courts. For years past, we have been ready to deal with that question. For years past, we have been ready to consider and to discuss remedial legislation. But the Government, all this time, had not pluck enough to bring down their Bill. We have always had our misgivings about the good faith of the Government in the matter; we always had our doubts about the sincerity of the pledges made by the Ministers, and such a doubt I have myself given expression to in the columns of the newspaper which I control, in the district where I reside. I say that the time chosen by the Government to introduce such a legislation, in the dying days of a moribund Parliament, is not the proper time, especially when several constituencies have no representatives in the House. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen say that the Opposition is obstructing them; but, I ask, can the hon. gentlemen expect any favours at our hands? Is the Government of the day reconstructed in such a way as to entitle them to the least favour? Have all the vacancies in this House been filled up? Why is it that several constituencies have no representatives here now? The reason is that the Government are afraid of facing the people of this country. No, Mr. Speaker, we are by no means open to the charge of obstruction, when we claim that the Government have no right to take away one of the days upon which private members can take into consideration and discuss the measures before the House. There are enough Bills on the Orders of the Day to take up all our time. With the exception of the school legislation, there are to be found several Bills far more important than the Government measures. We have been called together to deal with the Manitoba school question, but the Government seem in no hurry to address themselves to the task. We say to the Government: Bring down your Remedial Bill and we are ready to go on with the business of the session. The hon. the Finance Minister has been telling the House: Let us endeavour to expedite the business of the Budget, and make fair progress with the Estimates, so that there may be more time for the House to discuss the remedial legislation. I answer that we do not want the Government to come with a measure of that importance in the dying days of the session. We want all the time necessary for the House to consider and discuss that legislation. We are quite in our right when we say to the Government: You have called us together for a certain specific purpose, and five weeks have elapsed without any progress having been made. You are to blame for such a state of things. Two weeks have been wasted, and wasted merely through your fault. At any rate, very little business has been transacted during the last two weeks. When we ask the Government to proceed with the legislation which they have called us together to consider, are we blocking the public business? We do not want to make any obstruction; we only ask the Government to bring down the promised legislation. Certain newspapers charge us with being opposed to remedial legislation. Well, Sir, we ask the Government to come down with the measure as soon as possible. It must be ready now, from what I hear; since they have been keeping it in the drawer of their bureau for over a year. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has spoken to-day about the windmills of the Opposition. I do not think the hon. gentleman has said anything calculated to throw much light on the subject; while he has been forced to withdraw every expression he used; he spoke for twenty minutes, and I should like to know whether the question has advanced one jot in consequence? The same remark applies to several of his friends on the other side of the House. The members on your left, Sir, have refrained from indulging, so far, in idle talk, from a desire to promote the public business, and, after all, I do not think we have made any fair progress. Now the Government want favours at our hands. They ask us to go on with the business of the Budget, and help them to get the Supply Bill through. When the Budget debate is through, and the supplies are voted, then Parliament will be prorogued, and where shall the school law stand? Mr. Speaker, we want the Government to carry out their pledges concerning their school law. We are ready, I say it again, to discuss it. Three years ago, as I just said, the leader of the Opposition stated that it was unnecessary to appeal to the Privy Council, that the question was one of fact, and whether Parliament was vested with the powers of interference with a view to redress grievances, whether it was proper for Parliament to intervene, was, he said, merely a political question. The Government declined to entertain the suggestion offered to the effect that a commission be appointed to investigate the case; then let them bring down their law, and we will judge it on its merits, and whether justice is meted out by it to the Manitoba minority. That is the only way we intend to obstruct public business. We are ready to do right, but let them give us a chance, and bring forward their famous law. We may disagree on the action to be taken; but we are in favour of a measure which will remedy the grievances of the Manitoba minority. Therefore, I say, the Government are not warranted in asking us to vote the supplies before they have brought down their measure. A Government who do not command the confidence of one-third of the existing electorate of Canada, who against all parliamentary usages and precedents, called a sixth session, and who are every day devising new schemes to remain in power; who wants us to vote supplies to enable them to remain in office fifteen months after Parliament has expired,—such a Government warrants us in suspecting their sincerity, and asking whether they are not bent upon playing another of their nasty tricks upon Parliament. Had they been sincere, why should they not have introduced their measure last session, after the Privy Council had given their decision? But the hon. gentlemen, it appears, had taken a wrong step; they had taken the Manitoba government by the throat; and they found out that in order to patch up matters, they must practice conciliation, and approach the province in a friendly spirit. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Government intend keeping us here transacting other business, for three or four weeks, when they will bring down their measure, without allowing us time enough to consider and discuss it. Should there be found in this House some members who decline to accept the law as submitted to the House, they will not fail to scatter broadcast throughout the province of Quebec that, if the law was not passed, it was owing to the Liberals obstructing the measure. Mr. Speaker, such is not my way of thinking, and I challenge the Government to bring down forthwith their measure, and there will no longer be any obstruction; on the contrary, we shall lend them a helping hand to facilitate the business of this House. We have not only to deal with the Supply Bill, but also with the Remedial Bill. That is what we ask, and we are quite willing to help the Government on the lines I have mentioned. But, I say it again, I am under the impression that the Government do not intend to carry out their pledges and that is the reason why they want to go on with the business of the Budget. The Government, who do not want to use their powers of interference in dealing with the Manitoba school question, bring up before the House all sorts of measures in order to escape introducing their remedial law. Let them bring down their measure, and we shall be ready to make all reasonable concessions. It is not my intention to review all the Bills now before the House, in order to show their importance and why it is necessary we should discuss them. But, Sir, I speak from my own experience, when I say that no member of this House can expect to get a Bill through and have it put upon the statute-book, if it be not supported by the Government. I have occupied a seat in this House for nine sessions at least, and I never yet succeeded in getting a Bill through the House, without having the support of the Government. We wish to avail ourselves of our privileges as members of this House. We wish to avail ourselves of the advantages secured to us by the rules of the House, and that is the reason why we want the Government to bring down their legislation on the Manitoba school question. That is all we ask for.

When the Government decide to bring down their famous Bill respecting the Manitoba school trouble, we will give way and will be ready to make concessions; we will even give up our privileges as members of this House, in order to give the Government all the time they need to take into consideration and discuss the contemplated legislation. But until then, we shall abide by our rights, and I think we are perfectly justified in so doing.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I would surely have taken no part in this debate, had not the hon. leader of the House made some statements in connection with the position of the members on this side of the House with respect to the question now under consideration. The hon. the Minister of Finance stated here that he wished to proceed with the business of the House, but that we wanted to a certain extent to prevent him from doing so, because we did not want the remedial legislation so much promised by the hon. gentlemen opposite, to be brought down. I may say that, for my part, Mr. Speaker, not only am I willing to have a Remedial Bill brought up, but introduced as soon as possible, and not indefinitely postponed, as the Government are trying to do. It is plain they are waiting to bring up their Bill till the dying days of the session, when Parliament will have passed through its term of life. Then, for want of time, it could not be passed, and there would be no settlement of the Manitoba school question. There is one thing plain, the hon. leader of the House does not want any remedial legislation to be brought up before the Estimates are discussed.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) Would my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him in order to ask him a question? As I understand the hon. gentleman, he stated that the hon. the Minister of Finance had declared that he did not wish the Remedial Bill to be brought up before this House until the Estimates had been voted.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) This is what I understood. I understood the hon. the Minister of Finance to be quite anxious to proceed with the discussion of the Budget before the Remedial Bill was brought up.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) I ask the hon. gentleman if I understood him correctly when he stated before this House that the hon. the Minister of Finance had declared he did not wish to bring up the Remedial Bill until the Estimates had been voted? Did I correctly understand the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) The best proof, Mr. Speaker, that such is the intention of the Government is that by the motion now before the House, one additional day is asked by the Government, so as to compel us to discuss the Estimates before the Remedial Bill is brought up. Why should not the Government bring up that Bill immediately? Have they gone so far as to do such an act of cowardice when there is a question of meting out justice to the Manitoba Catholics? Why have not the Government yet brought up this legislation?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I rise to ask the hon. gentleman if I am correct in understanding him to state that the Minister of Finance, the leader of the House, had stated that he did not wish remedial legislation to be brought down and submitted to the House until the Estimates had been voted? I ask the hon. gentleman whether I understood him correctly, and this is a question to which, I think, I am entitled to receive an answer.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) What I stated was that the Government intended to discuss the Estimates before bringing up the Remedial Bill, whereas we have been specially called together to deal with the Manitoba school question.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) I ask again the hon. gentleman whether I was right when I understood him to say what the hon. leader of this House had never stated, namely, that the latter was anxious not to bring up the Remedial Bill before Parliament until the Estimates had been voted? I say the hon. gentleman has thereby made a statement which is not based on facts.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) By his motion, the hon. the Minister of Finance wishes to compel the House to discuss the Estimate.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) But he did not state the Bill would not be brought up until the Estimates were voted.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) The promises of the Ministers we know quite well. They are trying to have us believe that the Government will soon bring up their Bill. Why not bring it up immediately? We know what the ministerial promises are worth. To show the House what these promises are worth, I have only to read the "Minerve," the mouthpiece of the Postmaster General, owned and subsidized by him in the city of Montreal, and to compare the promises made by that paper during the elections in Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier with the present events. During the elections in Jacques Cartier and Montreal Centre the hon. Postmaster General delivered speeches which his mouthpiece hastened to reproduce and comment. Every one knows that it was stated in "La Minerve" of the 12th December last that the Bill was already framed, and that before a month it would be brought down in the House. We are now on the 4th of February, and the Bill is not yet brought up. More than that: the Government are not even agreed on this legislation, and this is why they wish to force the discussion of questions that are entirely foreign to it, in order that they may reach the end of the session.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman does not answer?

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) And then they will try and prevent the Bill from being carried out.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) But the answer?

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) The answer, here it is: We find it in "La Minerve," the organ of the hon. gentleman which had promised us, during the Jacques Cartier election, that we would have this Bill before the 12th of January. Well, the hon. gentleman has not yet redeemed his promise. If there is any one doing any obstruction in this House, the guilty parties are the members of the Government, and more particularly the hon. Postmaster General. Why, indeed, does he not compel those who deserted the Government and afterwards came back to the fold to bring up this Remedial Bill? But I find in the "Minerve," that well inspired paper, that on the 23rd of December last, in the presence of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, of the hon. Postmaster General, a statement was made by the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) to the effect that the Bill would not only be brought up, but also passed in the month of January, 1896. The month of January is over and the Bill is not yet introduced. We have been called together here for an extraordinary session, in order to pass that Bill. In the month of April last, during the contest in Verchères, the hon. the Minister of Public Works in a burst of enthusiasm, under the promptings of those generous feelings he is sometimes wont to yield, called God to witness that during the session about to open in April last, a remedial law would be brought down. The month of April elapsed, the month of July came on and the solemn pledge was not redeemed; and instead of introducing their legislation, the Government contented themselves with making an official statement to the effect that at a session of the present Parliament to be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January, 1896, the Government would be prepared to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as would remedy the grievances of the minority. Then, Sir, during the electoral contest in Montreal Centre and in Jacques Cartier, the Catholic and French Canadian Ministers just mentioned, came down and made an appeal to the religious prejudices of the Catholics of the province of Quebec, asking them to vote in favour of their candidate, and assuring them that they would rely upon their word that the Bill was already framed. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Bill was already framed on the 12th of December last, as stated, why is it that it was not introduced at the very outset of the session? Is the blame to be laid on the Opposition? Why, the "Minerve" daily states in its columns that if the Bill has not yet been brought down, the leader of the Opposition is to blame for it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) Where do you find such a statement in that paper?

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) I think the article the hon. gentleman wants me to read is rather lengthy, but, since he wishes so, I am going to read it. It appeared in the issue of "La Minerve" of the 23rd December, 1895, under the heading:

MR. LAURIER CONFESSES HIS IMPOTENCY.

I do not say that I can settle the school question, but I am going to try, at least,"—such was the artless statement made on Saturday last, at St. Laurent, by the Hon. Mr. Laurier, before a large meeting of electors of the county of Jacques Cartier. We attended the meeting, and never before did we see such a disappointed crowd.

In fact, I may say that the parish of St. Laurent proved quite a disappointment to the hon. gentleman. That parish where the hon. gentleman believed he would roll up a majority of five hundred votes, gave him only seventy-five votes.

That statement came down upon the meeting like a shower-bath. Everybody was astounded, dumbfounded. Friends and foes alike looked at each other in mute astonishment, some of them were bewildered. The Liberals were thunderstruck. And, forsooth, there was reason for it. For a full half hour, we listened to that gentleman, gesticulating, charging the Conservative chieftains with having betrayed the national and religious cause through their inaction, their dilatory means, their dread of losing office. By the means of deceitful arguments—and garbled statements he had succeeded in pointing out the course the Government should have taken. Prejudices, said he, must by no means be aroused; the conscientious convictions of the majority had to be respected; caution was necessary in order to find out the rights and wrongs existing on both sides; Protestant opinion had to be gradually brought to make its "mea culpa" and to restore to the minority their constitutional rights. In short, after the judgment of the Imperial Privy Council had been rendered, the remedial order in council should not have been passed on to Manitoba, but a commission appointed to investigate the matter. It is rather late now, he added, to resort to the latter means; it is perhaps too late; such is the reason why I do not tell you that I can settle the question, but, at least, I will try. After which everybody was mum.

The Hon. Mr. Ouimet, who was most emphatic in his utterances, cried out almost in the same breath:

Mr. Laurier has just stated that he did not know whether he could settle the question of the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, but, anyhow, he would try his hand. Well, now, gentlemen, a Protestant, an Orangeman, the leader of the Government, Sir Mackenzie Bowell has stated that, for his part, should the Manitoba authorities decline to deal with the question, he was ready, in January next, to make a settlement of the question that would prove satisfactory to the minority.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) Is that all what he said?

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) In case the Manitoba authorities did not make a satisfactory settlement of the question, the hon. Minister of Public Works pledged his word that the rights and privileges of the Manitoba minority would be restored, as early as the month of January last. Such was the statement made by a Minister of the Crown, before the electors, while no step has yet been taken in that direction. Two Ministers of the Crown came down to the county of Jacques Cartier and publicly stated that the rights which the Catholic minority had been deprived of, would be restored to them. That the great wrong inflicted upon them was to be redressed by that great enemy of Catholics, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, to quote the words of the Minister. Now, January is over, February is just begun, and yet the promised settlement has not been made, the grievances of the minority have not been redressed, and the Government who had pledged their word to deal with the question at the beginning of January, 1896, declare by their action, in contradiction to their statements made in Jacques Cartier County, that they are not ready to bring down their remedial legislation. The Government have not yet dared to bring forward their oft promised legislation. Why so? The explanation is to be found in the course followed by the men who left the Cabinet, the bolters, as stated by my hon. friend the member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne). Now, the bolters likely enough came back to the fold, with the understanding that the Bill, which was stated to have been framed long ago, should be altered and modified before being brought down to the House. Such was probably the price exacted by the bolters for their coming back to the Government. What is the reason why the Bill has not yet been introduced? It is because certain Ministers have insisted upon the Bill being altered: it is because they have insisted upon more important concessions being made than those promised by the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General. It is those very concessions that are now being taken into consideration by the Ministers in question, by the very men who gave so many solemn pledges to the country. What a ridiculous position do they not occupy now in the eyes of the country! The remedial order of March, 1895, contained three pledges: (1) a pledge to restore to the Catholic minority the rights they had been deprived of by the law of 1890; (2) a pledge to relieve the minority from contributing to the support of public schools; (3) a pledge to give them their share of the public grants. Such are the three solemn pledges which the Government were bound to carry out in the Bill which was to be framed on the lines of the Order in Council of March, 1895. Can the hon. the Postmaster General tell us whether the remedial legislation which is about to be brought down, will be carried out on the lines of the Order in Council of March, 1895? Shall the Manitoba Catholics have their rights restored to them? Shall the bishops control education as they did formerly? Shall Catholics have the full control of their schools? No, he cannot tell us that, for he knows quite well that the legislation he is now considering is not consistent with the Order in Council of March, 1895. What do we read to-night in the newspaper "The Mail." We read that the hon. gentlemen opposite decline to give to the House communication of some very important papers. They decline to give to this House the very same papers upon which the Remedial Bill ought to be grounded. They decline to let us know the general provisions of that Bill and the Conservative papers of Ontario are working the public opinion to cause it to accept a legislation that cannot be satisfactory. They intend, Mr. Speaker, to bring up a mutilated Bill. They evidently intend not to restore to the Manitoba Catholics the rights they were deprived of by the legislation of 1890. They decline to redeem the promises made to the voters of Jacques Cartier and Montreal Centre. Under such circumstances, is it not fair to ask the House that the Government should carry out their pledges? Is it not fair to inquire from the Postmaster General where is his Remedial Bill? Is it not fair to tell that Minister and his colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet): You have promised that a Remedial Bill would be passed in January, why do you not redeem your pledge I say once more, Mr. Speaker: Under such circumstances is it not fair to claim now from the Government the carrying out of their promises, to require from them that they bring up forthwith their Remedial Bill? Instead of carrying out their promises, the leader of the House is manoeuvring to have the House proceed with the discussion of the Estimates without their bringing down this famous remedial measure. They evidently intend to wait till the latter part of the session—for the discussion of the Estimates may be quite lengthy—it may possibly last three weeks at least—and after that protracted debate, we will have reached the month of March without having had any legislation on the Manitoba school question. Possibly, they will then go into some other matters of debate. They may likely consider the question of preferential trade between Great Britain and her colonies, the fast steamship line, the laying of a submarine Pacific cable, all matters which largely concern the electoral funds of the Conservative party for the next election and which have surely nothing to do with the Catholic schools of Manitoba. They would also have the House to discuss other matters and the Remedial Bill will be left standing, if ever they dare to bring it up. I therefore say that under these circumstances, we are entitled to ask that this Bill be immediately introduced. We do not wish it to be said by the Government on the 25th April next, when this Parliament will cease to exist, that we have not been able to pass that Bill, that we had not time enough to pass it on account of the Opposition making obstruction. On these several grounds, I will heartily support the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition. We have been sitting here over a month. We allowed the Government to take several days that were intended for private Bills, in order to expedite the debate on the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. I think the members of this House have actually had but one Thursday at their disposal for the introduction of private Bills. Many important Bills are on the Orders of the Day requiring our consideration. Here is one, for instance, that has for its object to enable employees to vote on polling day. Before long, voters will be called upon to give their votes, it is therefore urgent to give employees every possible chance in this respect. This Bill of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Rider) is worthy of every consideration on our part. Are the Government afraid that the workingmen should not vote for them? Do they believe it to be advantageous to restrict the votes of the working classes? If one takes as a test the late election in Montreal Centre, they may as well oppose so fair a Bill as that of the member for Stanstead. The Government wish, therefore, to oppose the introduction of this Bill which is so very important for the workingmen. I also find on the Orders of the Day many other Bills which are required by the people of this country. If there is any obstruction in this House, Mr. Speaker, it comes from the Government. I therefore say before closing my remarks, that it is only justice to oppose the motion of the hon. the Minister of Finance, and I hope that after conferring with his friends, he will consent to withdraw it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The question now before the House is of such paramount importance, affecting as it does to a high degree, our rights as members of this House, that I deem it my duty to offer a few remarks. In the eyes of the members who have not a thorough insight into the schemes and devices of the Government and their friends, the motion moved by the leader of the House may, at first sight, appear quite innocuous; but, in the eyes of those among us who are somewhat familiar with the proceedings the Cabinet is wont to resort to in dealing with the public business of the country, it is quite obvious, as before stated by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), and the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne), that in trying to take away an extra day from us, the Government aim at duly expediting the business of the Budget, and getting the Supply Bill through as quick as possible, and later on proroguing the House, for no other purpose than depriving us of the advantage of thoroughly debating the Remedial Bill, supposing it happens that they introduce it; or else, should it happen that they do not bring it down, to enable them to tell the country they lacked the necessary time to do so, in which case, they might have enough brass to charge the Opposition with having obstructed the measure. Therefore, I deem it of the utmost importance, in the interest of all the members of this House who are anxious to have the debate honestly and fairly conducted, that the contemplated measure be introduced without delay, and before the Budget debate is closed and the supplies voted. If, after five weeks, so little business has been transacted, the hon. gentleman cannot possibly throw on us the blame of the delay. Whose fault is it, I ask, if the Government measures, if the Budget has not yet been discussed? Was not that state of things brought about by the odious course pursued by at least one-half of the State Ministers? Is the Opposition to blame if the Premier had to use every exertion during a whole week to bring back to the Government kitchen the stray cats that had deserted it on the 3rd January last? Is the Opposition to be found fault with if the Prime Minister and one of his colleagues had to hire the services of detectives and experts from the United States, to find out which of their colleagues had written anonymous letters to the Governor General, accusing one of them. Does the Opposition deserve blame if the members of the Conservative party, and even of the Cabinet, have wrangled and disputed for a whole week as to whether it was right and proper for them to swap horses previous to crossing the stream and being swallowed up by the wave of popular indignation, at the next general elections? Is the Opposition to bear all the blame of the Government not having yet brought down the bill for the taking into consideration of which we have been called together here? The Government have stated no reason why it is justified in coming here and asking us to give them the only day upon which we can take into consideration the measures promoted by private members, and as everybody knows, the measures on the Orders of the Day are important ones and fully deserving of our attentive consideration. Parliament has been called for a certain definite purpose. And if we go back, one moment, to what occurred last session, when the ministerial crisis was on hand, and three

Mr. CHOQUETTE.

Ministers of the Government had to throw up their portfolios, because they could get no positive pledges from their colleagues as to the Manitoba school question and the redress of the grievances of their co-religionists, it will be seen that on the eighth of July last, the hon. leader of the House stated here that at a session of Parliament to be called together to meet not later than January, if by that time the Manitoba government had failed to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, such remedial legislation would be introduced as would afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority. At the outset of the present session, the Government pledged themselves to the same effect, as shown by the following extract from the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne:

We thank Your Excellency for the intimation that immediately after the prorogation of Parliament Your Excellency's Government communicated through the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba with the government of that province, in order to ascertain upon what lines the local authorities of Manitoba would be prepared to promote amendments of the Acts respecting education in schools in that province, and whether any arrangement was possible with the Manitoba government which would render action by the federal parliament in this connection necessary. We receive with a deep sense of its importance Your Excellency's statement that you regret to say that the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor have declined to entertain favourably these suggestions, thereby rendering it necessary for Your Excellency's Government, in pursuance of its declared policy, to introduce legislation in regard to this subject. We also thank Your Excellency for the information that the papers will be laid before us.

We are happy to be informed by Your Excellency that the representations of Your Government and the suggestions of the Ottawa conference respecting steamship communication have resulted in an announcement by the Imperial authorities of their willingness to grant a substantial subvention towards the Atlantic portion of the scheme.

Now, if, on the 8th of July last, the Government could state that a measure would be introduced in connection with the Manitoba school question; if, again, on the 2nd of January, they pledged themselves again by the words placed in His Excellency's mouth, then I say that measure ought now to be already framed and introduced. In fact, I think, the Bill was already framed and had been endorsed by the bishops and of the religious authorities who have a special right to be consulted on the matter; but it was later on referred to the bishops for their approbation by a venerable missionary. I contend the Government should bring down their Bill now, without delay. If they failed so far to do so, the reason is that certain members of the Government opposed it, under the pretense they had not considered it previous to its being submitted to the hierarchy. That is the reason why the measure was indefinitely shelved and why we are still kept waiting for it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) We are waiting for the commission.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I am satisfied there are many people, including the hon. the Postmaster General, who are anxious to have that commission appointed. A great many people who hastily perhaps passed judgment on the commission would be ready now to accept it, or a committee of the House who would report without delay and within such a period, at any rate, as would enable the Government to introduce their measure at the earliest practical moment. The hon. Postmaster General himself, if he would unbosom himself to the House, could tell us that he is ready to accept such a commission as would investigate all the facts of the case. I would be quite willing to support the Government should they adopt my suggestion; and I am also ready to vote in favour of a Bill that would give back to the minority the privileges they are entitled to and which the Government pledged themselves to restore to them by the Order in Council of March, 1895. As often stated by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, we do not want to make political capital out of the school question. Let the hon. Postmaster General and the Government make a statement here to-night, that from now till next Thursday, they will bring down their measure, and I will vote in favour of the motion against my own party. Let the Government appoint a commission to investigate the facts and report without further delay during this session, with a view to satisfying the Protestants that the Manitoba public schools are really Protestant in character, and that the grievances complained of by the Catholics are well founded, and I am ready to support the hon. gentleman and vote in favour of such a Bill as will remove the grievances and remedy such a deplorable state of things. Would the hon. Postmaster General tell us when such a Bill will be brought down and what are its main provisions? Should the hon. gentleman vouchsafe an answer to my question, I am ready to vote in favour of the motion moved by the leader of the House. The hon. Postmaster General seems to be amused at my question: the agreeable smile he usually wears, lights up again his countenance to-night, but while these hon. gentlemen are exchanging smiles, whenever tired of making grimaces, lo! our poor co-religionists out in Manitoba are in dire distress and their grievances are unredressed! I will go still further, Sir. It is within our recollection that, during last session, a certain number of Conservative members came near bolting out. They only consented to come back to the fold after a pledge had been given them to the effect that a Remedial Bill would be introduced at the beginning of the present session. Has any of these gentlemen, I wonder, risen in their seats to condemn the Government for delaying so long to introduce their Bill? There are among them some editors of renown, such as my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Joncas), who stated, not very long ago, in his paper, that not only was the Bill such as would afford full satisfaction to the minority in Manitoba, but that after having been taken into consideration by the Cabinet, and printed, it had been found acceptable to the hierarchy. But when the crisis broke out, it leaked out that the bolters who had smashed the Cabinet, were dead against the Bill, as they thought it was too strong in meting out justice to the Catholic minority; and that is the reason they sent in their resignations, as they declined to shoulder the responsibility of the Bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have now a proof of the amount of good faith of these hon. gentlemen. If, as stated, the law is ready cut and dried at their hands, why has it not yet been introduced; and we all know that the hon. Prime Minister has stated that he would bring it down, even at the risk of being defeated in the House. Did not the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Clarke Wallace) state that his speech of the 12th of July last, had not been disapproved of by the Premier?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) My hon. friend does not pretend, I think, to make statements at variance with the facts. I tell my hon. friend that his statement is absolutely groundless.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The hon. Postmaster General says that my statement is groundless, but he does not know the facts. Can he deny that on behalf of the Prime Minister?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) Yes; I deny it on behalf of the Premier.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Well, the "Moniteur de Lévis," the organ of Senator Landry and of an important section of the Conservative party, is my authority for the statement that the Controller of Customs had declared in Toronto he had submitted to the Premier his speech of the 12th July, in which he criticized the Remedial Bill, and he made bold to say that the Bill would never be introduced. The "Moniteur de Lévis" said at the time that such a statement, coming from the Controller of Customs, called forth a written denial from the Prime Minister. Now, this article has been brought to the notice of the hon. Premier and the hon. Postmaster General two months ago. I now put the question to the hon. gentleman: How is it that when such a statement has been made by a paper, the editor of which is a particular friend of his, he got appointed to the Senate, he comes out so late with a denial to-day, on behalf of his leader, the Prime Minister? I shall hold the statement as true, so long as it is not denied by the hon. Premier himself. I am quite willing, however, to accept the Postmaster General's denial for all it is worth.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) The statement was denied by the ex-Controller of Customs as well as by the Prime Minister.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) May I ask the Postmaster General to state the place and the very words, or the paper containing the Premier's denial?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) The Prime Minister denied it in the Senate. The ex-Controller of Customs denied it here, in the House; and you need but refer to the "Hansard," where his statement is on record.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Can the hon. gentleman give me the exact date?

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) The hon. gentleman is going a little too far.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The statement is important enough for us to inquire as to its exact date.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) The "onus probandi" lies upon the hon. gentleman who made the statement.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The hon. Postmaster General will allow me to tell him he alters his mind quite frequently on that question. As to the hon. member for Chicoutimi, it is still within our recollection how, last summer, he roundly abused the Government, and asked the Liberal party to support him.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) You may take my word for it, I shall never join hands with the Liberals.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Now, Mr. Speaker, it is very strange that the Government should stick to the motion before the House. They may take it for granted that we will not yield one inch of ground; and I, for one, have made up my mind not to vote one single item of the Supply Bill, not to let pass one single Government measure, until the Remedial Bill has been brought down. I do not know what decision my hon. friends on this side of the House have come to on the matter, but my constituents would certainly resent my voting the supplies asked by the Government before they gave us a substantial proof of their good faith and fair dealing in connection with the pledges given to the House and reiterated in the Speech from the Throne with regard to the Manitoba school question, and the redress of the grievances of the minority. The Conservative papers, subsidized by the Government, and, among others, a certain paper well known to the Postmaster General, in which an Orange Senator holds large interests, the "Minerve," edited in the city of Montreal, had the following statement in its issue of the 12th December last, to wit: that the Remedial Bill would be introduced in January, through the great energy displayed by the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Public Works. Not only did the "Minerve" state that the law would be introduced; it further added that it would be voted. It is quite transparent to what an extent the organ in question fooled its readers. I must tell the Government that we are not ready to yield and that, should we be forced to have recourse, not to obstruction tactics, but to speaking as long as required to obtain from the Government the introduction of the promised measure, before giving them the necessary money to carry on the public affairs, we will do it. We are often charged with not being very earnest. On the hustings and in the salaried press of the Government, our opponents contend that we are not favourable to the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba being restored to them, that we are only asking for a commission or suggesting a committee of inquiry of the House because we wish the question to be put off till after the elections, so as not to be compelled to deal with it should the Liberal party come into power after the next electoral contest. We wish to prove our sincerity and the want of sincerity of the Government. It is a very simple thing, after all. We say to the Government: Bring up your Bill if you have any which might be efficient, we will have faith in your sincerity and we will support it. But the hon. gentlemen opposite do not intend to introduce a really efficient Bill and one which would do justice to the minority in Manitoba. It is impossible that men who despise and detest each other could agree upon a measure that could be acceptable to the Catholic minority in Manitoba and even to the right-thinking Protestants of the country. Before voting the Estimates, we tell the Ministers: If you are willing to fulfil your promises and grant a legislation that will be approved by the competent authorities, then bring it before the House and your Estimates will be voted. We will then allow you the necessary money to carry on the public affairs. We want to have the Bill, not only to consider it, but also to submit to the clergy and bishops, as well as to the representatives of the Catholic minority in Manitoba. The hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Public Works have not all to themselves the right to confer with these authorities. We are as good Catholics as they are and as is the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), who is getting just now much excited. We want a complete and efficient Bill, no matter whether it be the work of the Cabinet, a commission or a committee of this House. We are willing to vote for a Remedial Bill grounded on the Order in Council of the 21st March last, if it gives full and complete satisfaction to the Manitoba Catholics. I make that statement on behalf of the voters of my county, but I do not want a law that could not be carried out and would only be used to throw dust into the eyes of the clergy and the bishops. Such a Bill would not meet the approval of my electors. We say to the Government: Why not introduce such a law now? Why not fulfil your promises, now that the time has come to do it? You have deceived the electorate. You have deceived the country and this House by these promises which you are now unwilling to fulfil, and you would still like to try and continue these same tactics. We wish to know wherein we stand before voting the Estimates, before giving the hon. gentlemen opposite the money required to dissolve Parliament and go on with the elections without giving justice to whom justice is due. We are not going to be fooled in this way. We are not going to give them any money, and even though we might have to talk it over till the 25th April next, at midnight, we will do it in order to prevent you from getting the Estimates before having made known your legislation with respect to the Manitoba schools. Now, Mr. Speaker, reference was made, a moment ago, to a victory in Cape Breton, but it was not such a signal victory as the Conservative party had hoped for. We all know that the hon. gentlemen opposite were claiming at the start a majority of at least 2,000, and when the future Prime Minister was made aware that the Liberal party intended to test the strength of the Government, that majority went down to 1,500 and then to 1,000. The hon. gentlemen are now satisfied with 700. After all, the Government have only kept their ground, after expending large sums of money and hypocritically promising once more to the bishops that a Remedial Bill would be introduced, immediately after the election. Such a victory is rather one for us, for, in the first place, we have held our own, and then we will avail ourselves of it to denounce the Government in stronger words than ever, if they do not introduce the promised legislation. But the hon. gentlemen are easily consoled. After the wounds received by them in Jacques Cartier, Montreal Centre, Cardwell and Charlevoix, they have found out a little plaster to apply in their victory in Cape Breton, and they are satisfied. The votes given in these by-elections enable us to speak in the strain we are speaking to-night. Let them be happy, for these electors have shown that they have no more faith than we have ourselves in the fulfilment of the promises of the Government. The Conservative papers will no doubt make the best against us of the fact that we are unwilling to grant the request made to-night by the Government. They will say to-morrow that the Liberals wish to delay the introduction of the Remedial Bill. But the obstruction we are making—if it can be called such—shows the contrary, and proves that we are summoning the Government to introduce as soon as possible their Remedial Bill, in order that we may have time to consider it and the opportunity of discussing it with people outside of this House who are ignorant of the question. We have the greatest interest in doing this.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) And the commission?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The commission is the best mode for the efficient settlement of this momentous question. We know that competent religious authorities, such as the late Bishop Langevin and His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau, have stated that any Catholic may take the means which are dictated to him by his conscience in order to efficiently settle a religious question. We contend that, for every good Catholic, who has earnestly at heart that the Manitoba schools be efficiently restored to the Catholics, there is no other practical mode than a commission or an arbitration between interested parties. On the other hand, we state that should the Government bring up a Bill likely to receive the sanction and approval of the interested parties, and including all the conditions that a committee of this House or a commission could insert into it, and should this Bill be put forthwith before this House so that we might thoroughly discuss it, we are willing to give a loyal support to the Government—for my part, I am—and help them to have it passed. But we are not willing to give up the right to say, in our conscience, what means we deem the best to settle this great question. It is not because the Conservative papers will ridicule such a commission, which the Postmaster General would be anxious now to accept, that we should acknowledge that we are wrong—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) No, no.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) And I might add that a distinguished bishop would be anxious now to accept it as the only efficient mode. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to further protract this debate. I think the position we are taking is quite justifiable. Our only purpose, at the present moment, is to compel the Government to introduce this so long promised Bill, so that we might discuss it and have it passed before the end of the present Parliament.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The statement that was made by the leader of the Opposition at the commencement of the debate should have been sufficient to let the Finance Minister see that the position he took, perhaps somewhat hastily, was not tenable in its nature. The Finance Minister stated that the House had been in session for over a month, and that it was not an unusual thing that at the end of a month the Government should ask to take one of the days devoted to private members. It was clearly pointed out to him that the House had not been in session for actual work for anything like that length of time. I have been in the House for 24 years, and according to my remembrance I have never known a motion like this put upon the paper when the gentleman who was leading the House intended that it should go into effect for the first time on the week in which he put it on the paper. I think I am correct in saying that in every case it has been put on as a sort of warning, and that on the week after the one in which it was put on, the Government would take possession of the day for Government business. But the Minister of Finance has departed from that rule. He put a notice on the paper, and, listening to no protest, he has taken the ground that he is determined to take, beginning this week, one of the days of private members. We have been discussing the question and there has been no reply made, no reply can be made to the position we have taken. The argument of the Opposition has been simply unanswerable. An hon. gentleman opposite ventured to ask what the country would say in reference to this matter. Well, I do not know what that hon. gentleman's constituents may say in reference to his action in the matter, a gentleman who himself has a Bill among the public Bills and orders, which, if the Minister's motion prevails, will be slaughtered, a gentleman who has notices on the paper that he considers very important, and which, if the Minister's motion prevails, he probably will never reach; I do not know what that hon. gentleman's constituents may say with reference to his conduct in this matter, but I think the people of this country will say that the Opposition, in taking the stand they have taken to-night, maintaining the rights of the people and the rights of the people's representatives in Parliament, are doing their duty, and only their duty. Sir, the hon. gentleman should not have brought this debate upon the House. It brings to our remembrance what have been the causes of the delay in legislation during this session. If the Opposition was in any way to blame for the public business not being further advanced, then there might be some force in the objections raised by them now. But the country knows more upon that subject than it does upon many others, because the Conservative as well as the Liberal press have given to them an accurate idea of what it was that blocked the passage of legislation in this chamber. They have learned through the instrumentality of their own organs that it has not been due to the Opposition, but it has been due in a large part, primarily, I may say, to the hon. gentleman himself who this night attempts to force through a measure calculated to abridge the rights and the privileges of the private members of this House. Sir, it was not the Opposition who summoned Parliament on 2nd January, and who immediately adjourned it for about a week; it was not they who, when Parliament met again, went on strike, and destroyed the efficiency of the ministry, and who prevented the reorganization of that ministry by sending out pickets to prevent other men joining it. That cannot be laid at the door of the Opposition, and the country understands it. And the country knows that those gentlemen, after having delayed business in that way, having taken the stand they did, reprobated by every public man, every man that desires the welfare of the country—those gentlemen now come before this House, and undertake to deprive the private members of the rights and privileges that are theirs to bring forward measures that are in the public interest. Sir, I said there was one gentleman on the opposite side who had been willing to efface himself, if I might so speak, a gentleman with motions on the paper, that, I suppose, he considers important, that have to do with the well being of the North-west Territories which he believes to be labouring under grievances, a gentleman who has a public Bill that would come up on this day that the Government mean to take—I say there has been one gentleman found on the Government side of the House who has so far effaced himself as to be willing to speak in favour of a proposition that will take away his rights as a private member of this House. But, Sir, to the credit of the other members, none of them have ventured to take such a humiliating position as that. Possibly they may do it by their votes, but I scarcely think they are prepared to do that. At any rate, as an independent member of the House, although I have not a public Bill upon the notice paper, I recognize the necessity of considering many of those Bills that have been placed there by other gentlemen. I recognize their right to introduce these Bills to the House, I recognize the fact that when they placed these Bills there, they expected to get ordinary parliamentary usage, and that they would have an opportunity to reach them. The Government have allowed these members to put those notices upon the paper, and by carrying this motion, they would preclude them from bringing those notices before the House. Being on the Order paper they cannot be moved in amendment to going into Supply, there is no other time, there is no other occasion, on which they can be brought up. The Government are taking Thursday, and yet a gentleman has ventured to ask, what will the country think of the Opposition? Sir, I will tell him what they will think. They will think the Opposition are the only representatives in Parliament, unless gentlemen on the other side come to their assistance, who stand up for the rights of the people, and the rights of the people's representatives. That is what they will think, and they can come to no other conclusion. Why, Sir, out of the nineteen Bills that stand upon the Notice paper, to be dealt with, no less than eleven are proposed by hon. gentlemen on the other side, and yet the Government expects that they will get the eleven gentlemen who have introduced those Bills, in their party allegiance, to efface their own rights, and vote in favour of a proposition that takes away the only opportunity they have to bring these important questions up for discussion before the House. Well, if they choose to take that position, they are at liberty to do so. Some have taken it by speech; others will be called upon, perhaps, to take it by voting. But so far as the Opposition are concerned, I think they are standing on their rights, they are standing for the defence of the rights and privileges of the people, and the people's representatives in Parliament. They are protesting against the passage of a measure that, so far as I can remember—I speak subject to correction—in my nearly twenty-four years' experience in this House, I have never seen brought forward and pushed through at this early stage of the session, a motion to take away one of the days belonging to private members. As I said before, I believe in every case where a notice of this kind has been put upon the paper, it has not been seriously intended to apply to the day that is mentioned in the week on which it is found upon the paper, but it is put there as a sort of warning that the Government were in earnest, and that in the week after, it would be prepared to move in that direction. Yet the leader of the Opposition has gone back over the record and has shown that for many years back no such motion has been introduced at such an early period of the session. What makes it more difficult to understand, and what makes this action utterly indefensible on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite is the further fact that when a motion of this character has been moved in previous sessions, it has been when the order paper was crowded with Government orders. But at the present time there is nothing except the ordinary orders, that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply and also into Committee of Ways and Means. The Bill which this Parliament was especially summoned to consider, and which, as a speaker has told us, was declared by the Minister of Public Works and by the Postmaster General as a measure that would become law early in January, is not to-day before Parliament. Yet, with no Government Bills on the paper, the Finance Minister who was the prime cause of blocking business for days, if not weeks, pleads urgency and seeks to take away members' privileges. And this is done without arguments being presented by hon. gentlemen opposite. So this night has been spent in discussing this question by Liberal members, who have sought to point out how this would be an interference with the rights and privileges of members. In doing so they have taken a perfectly incontrovertible position, and yet the Finance Minister still adheres to the motion he has proposed. I feel that members of the Opposition in taking the ground they have taken on this question have been simply discharging a duty incumbent upon them, and I feel confident that they have been advancing public interests, and that they will be prepared to go before the people and defend their conduct against the attempt made by the Minister of Finance to take away from them their rights and privileges.

Mr. FOSTER. We have had to-night a very interesting debate, and after having had a little conversation with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, I now propose, with the consent of the House, to change the motion to read as follows:

That Government orders have precedence on Thursdays after questions during the debate on the motion to go into Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

2. The total number landed at Vancouver and elsewhere during past twelve months?
3. How many paid the duty?
4. How many were shipped east in bond?

The so-called bond or manifest, is cancelled upon certificate of the customs officer at the port upon which manifested that they have been forwarded out of the country under customs supervision, or have paid the duty in order to remain in Canada.

IMPORTATION OF SUGAR.

Mr. DAWSON asked :

1. Total number pounds of sugar, above No. 16 D.S. in colour, entered for home consumption, from 1st January to 3rd May, 1895, and the duty paid thereon ?

2. Total number pounds of sugar, not above No. 16 D.S., entered for home consumption during same period, and the duty (if any) paid thereon ?

6. Total number pounds of sugar, not above No. 16 D.S., entered for home consumption during the same period, and the duty paid thereon ?

Mr. WOOD. The answers are as follows, except in regard to queries No. 5 and 6, in which the total given are exclusive of the business of the port of Quebec and the port of Peterborough, returns for which have not yet been received for the quarter ending 31st December, 1895 :—1. The total quantity of sugar above No. 16 D.S. in colour, entered for home consumption, from 1st January to 3rd May, 1895, was 4,822,967 pounds, and the duty paid thereon was $30,866.99. 2. The total quantity of sugar not above No. 16 D.S. entered for home consumption during the above period, was 153,877,328 pounds, on which there was no duty collected. 3. The total quantity of sugar above No. 16 D.S. entered for home consumption from the 3rd day of May to and inclusive of 30th June last, was 930,910 pounds, and the duty paid was $10,612.37. 4. The total quantity of sugar not above No. 16 D.S. entered for home consumption during the same period, was 93,717,498 pounds, and the duty paid thereon was $468,587.49.

THE FISHING BOUNTY.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked :

1. What are the reasons which prevented the payment of the fishing bounty to the schooner "Pioneer" for the year 1892? Upon what officer or employee's report was this bounty refused?

2. What are the reasons which prevented the payment of the fishing bounty to the schooner "Gleaner" for the year 1893? Upon what officer or employee's report was this bounty refused?

3. What are the reasons which prevented the payment of the fishing bounty to the schooner "P. Fortin" for the year 1894? Upon what officer or employee's report was this bounty refused?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. (a.) Because claim is irregular, as claimants swore on 6th October, 1892, that they had fished to the 3rd November. (b.) Not considered sufficiently proved that the vessel was entitled to the bounty. Dr. Wakeman having stated that no one fishes from a schooner at Esquimaux Point or Charles Island. 2. Because according to the sworn statement of the owner and crew the vessel was not engaged in fishing the time required by law. 3. Because of information that the vessel was not engaged in fishing the legal time. Facts obtained from the collector of customs and fishery officer, George Gaudin.

TRANSIT OF AMERICAN CATTLE THROUGH CANADA.

On the question,

Mr. CASEY :

1. Is the Honourable Minister of Agriculture aware that a copy of an Order in Council concerning the shipping of United States cattle from a Canadian port was published in some of the morning newspapers of Friday, 24th January ?

2. Did he say on the afternoon of the same day, in answer to a question across the floor of the House, that he would produce that Order in Council to the House on Monday, 27th ult. ?

3. Is the Honourable Minister correctly reported in the official debates of Tuesday, 28th ult., as follows :—

"Mr. MONTAGUE. In answer to the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), I may say that he has read correctly the conversation which took place across the House, between the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and myself on Friday last. The position which I took then was the correct one under the circumstances. At that time the Order in Council had been passed by Council but was not signed by the Governor General, and, as the hon. gentleman quite well knows, I had no business to give any information to this House as to the facts which had been brought before Council, and upon which a decision had taken place, but which decision had not been communicated to His Excellency, and approved and signed by him. As to the facts having been given to the newspapers, I may say that I was myself astounded. As the reporters in the gallery who asked me the question upon Friday will bear me out, I refused to give them any information whatever, and I confess that the resentment of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), as against this fact being given to the newspapers, was joined in most heartily by myself. I have no explanation to offer to the House, except simply to say, that I knew nothing whatever in regard to it, and I was astonished, and pained, and humiliated, when I found that it was done.

* * * I wish, Sir, to repeat and emphasize that so far as I am concerned, the communication was not given to the public press by me, nor do I believe it was given to the public press by any of my officers, and I desire to express my humiliation that it was not given to this House before it was given to the press.

4. Has the Honourable Minister since heard that the said Order in Council was given to the press by the Premier, and when did he hear it?

5. Has he since heard that said Order in Council was communicated to and approved and signed by His Excellency before it was given to the press, and when did he hear it?

6. Are the statements referred to in the last two questions correct?

7. If so, how did it happen that he knew nothing whatever about such dealing with an Order in Council specially concerning his own department?

8. Does he still think the course he took then was the correct one under the circumstances, in not producing the Order in the House when asked for?

9. Does he still feel that the resentment of the honourable gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) because the Order was given to the press, is joined in most heartily by himself?

10. Is he still astounded, and pained, and humiliated, that the said Order in Council was not given to this House before it was given to the press?

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to point out that the second and third paragraphs of this question are in violation of parliamentary rules, as they refer directly to past debates in this House this session. The second paragraph refers directly to a debate which took place on a motion to adjourn on the 24th of January. The third paragraph quotes verbatim from "Hansard" a statement made in a discussion which was informally commenced, but which was put in order by a motion for the production of papers on the 28th of January. The rule is clearly laid down, and will be found in the ninth edition of May, at page 356:

It is irregular to refer to past debates of the same session, either in a question or answer.

So that these two paragraphs in this question must, in my opinion, be struck out.

Mr. CASEY. May I ask for information, on the question of order, is it not in order to ask if a member is correctly reported?

Mr. SPEAKER. I have already stated that it is irregular and out of order to refer in a question to a past debate.

Mr. FOSTER. Those two paragraphs being excised, I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow the rest of the question to remain over. I suppose it is not important, and had better be answered by the Minister himself.

Mr. CASEY. Does the hon. gentleman expect that the Minister will be in his place again this session?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, before the end of the session.

MAIL CONTRACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. McMULLEN asked:

1. Who holds, or held, the contract for carrying the mails between Spence's Bridge and Kamloops, British Columbia?

2. What route is, or was, followed, and what offices are, or were, supplied under such contract between Spence's Bridge and Kamloops?

3. For how many months in each year is the mail carried between Ashcroft and Lillooet, British Columbia, by way of the Marble Canyon?

4. What is paid for the said service?

5. Was the contract for such service awarded to the British Columbia Express Company after public tenders had been asked for, and if so, what other tenders were received, and amount of each?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. John Clark as contractor for the Kamloops and Spence's Bridge service. 2. The offices en route are Rockford, Quilchena, Nicola Lake, Coutlee, Lower Nicola and Campbell Creek. 3. For eight months each year between 1st April and 30th November. 4. This service is under a contract which includes several routes between Ashcroft station and Barkerville, and as the contract rate is a bulk sum of $24,000 per annum it is impossible to say definitely what is paid for the service in question. 5. Tenders were not asked for this contract as the prior contract of the British Columbia Express Company was renewed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MARTIN. Before the Orders of the Day are read, I would like to say that some few days ago, in the course of my remarks, I stated that when the question of the disqualification of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte) was before this House because of his connection with certain public contracts, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) had voted with the Government. I have been informed since that I was incorrect in that statement—that, on the contrary, the hon. gentleman had voted against the Government on that question. I wish therefore to correct the erroneous statement I made at that time.

BRITISH CONNECTION AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

Mr. McNEILL moved:

That, in view of the threatening aspect of foreign affairs, this House desires to assure Her Majesty's Government and the people of the United Kingdom of its unalterable loyalty and devotion to the British Throne and constitution, and of its conviction that, should occasion ar-happily arise, in no other part of the Empire than the Dominion of Canada would more substantial sacrifices attest the determination of Her Majesty's subjects to maintain unimpaired the integrity and inviolate the honour of Her Majesty's Empire; and this House reiterates the oft-expressed desire of the people of Canada to maintain the most friendly relations with their kinsmen of the United States.

He said: There is, Mr. Speaker, an obvious objection that may be urged against the resolution which has just been read. It may be said that it is superfluous, that it is unnecessary to assure the Government and the people of the United Kingdom of what they are already very well aware. I do not doubt, for my own part, that it is well understood in the United Kingdom that the people of Canada are devotedly attached to the Throne, and devotedly attached to the constitution under which they live, and under which they enjoy such an ample measure of freedom, and so many inestimable benefits. But we have not to regard only the view that may be held of this resolution in the mother country, we have also to consider how it may be viewed in foreign countries, and it would seem that in some foreign countries very curious ideas prevail concerning the political aspirations of the people of Canada. If we may judge from statements made by public men on public occasions, and by articles which have appeared in the newspaper press, the idea seems to prevail in the United States, among a certain section of the people, that the people of Canada are only desirous of seizing the first favourable opportunity to transfer their allegiance from the Crown of England to the republic of the United States, and that the hauling down of the Union Jack and the substitution in its place of the Stars and Stripes on every flagstaff in Canada, and on every Canadian mast-head and peak that sails the sea, would be hailed with paeans of joy by the people of Canada. Now, Sir, to the members of this House, the representatives of the people of Canada, that view seems to be simply amazing. It seems to be simply amazing to the representatives of the people of Canada that the sentiments of Canada should be so entirely misapprehended by a section of the people who live in such close proximity to her. Why, Sir, as you know very well, from Halifax to Vancouver, there is not one single constituency in which, if the policy of annexation were advocated upon the hustings, the result would not be a hopeless and overwhelming defeat of the candidate who had the audacity to make that policy a plank in his platform. If there be one question more than another upon which the rank and file of the people of Canada are solid, it is this question of annexation to the United States. Sir, it is the earnest wish of every Canadian to maintain the most friendly relations with the great people who divide this continent with us, whom we regard as our kindred, and in whose magnificent achievements on behalf of civilization it is not too much to say that every Canadian has almost a personal pride. But while we admire the great qualities of our kinsmen of the neighbouring republic, we have no desire whatsoever to enter into political partnership with them. We very much prefer our constitution to theirs, we very much prefer British connection to connection with the United States. We claim the right of a free people to choose between our own mother country and the American republic. We only ask our good friends to the south to leave us alone, and to allow us to work out our own destiny in the way which seems to us best. We have made our choice, and our choice is with our mother country, and if necessity should, unfortunately, arise, the people of Canada will do what men may do to preserve for themselves and for those who come after them what they hold to be their most precious political inheritance—their birthright as British subjects. I think, Sir, that it is very much better that there should be no misunderstanding with regard to this matter, and therefore I have endeavoured, in very simple and plain language, to state what the simple truth in regard to it really is. For misapprehensions in regard to matters of this kind have before now given rise to very grave consequences. The people of Canada are determined to maintain the position which this Dominion holds as an integral part of the British Empire, and they are perfectly well satisfied that a united British Empire is well able to take care of itself. Sir, we are for peace first of all, for honourable peace, but if we are assailed, we believe that we shall not prove altogether unworthily of the stock from which we come, and we know that at our back will be all the resources of an Empire whose resources are practically inexhaustible, more especially as regards the number of fighting men that can be, in case of emergency, placed in line. Those who know anything of the Sikh war, those who know anything of the losses that were sustained by the British forces at Chilianwalla, and on many another battlefield of which Lord Gough could tell only too well, and those who know anything of the extraordinary military prowess of the Ghoorkas and the many other tribes of hardy hillmen of India (among the most warlike races in the world), and those who recollect with what promptitude and enthusiasm our eastern troops responded to the call of Lord Beaconsfield when he summoned them to Malta some twenty years ago, will understand to what I refer. I repeat that the resources of this Empire, so far as the number of fighting men is concerned, are practically inexhaustible, and we are not altogether destitute of the financial strength which would be necessary to prosecute a great war to its conclusion. But, Sir, we do not want war. And we do not expect we are going to have war. And least of all do we want war, and least of all do we expect to have war with our own kith and kin. There has been an extraordinary development of the sentiment of kinship, if I may so express it, among the British peoples during the last ten or fifteen years. So that in the Empire to-day, even more than ever before, a war with the United States would be regarded as a horrible and unnatural fratricidal strife. We have been surprised and pained by the recent explosion of ill-feeling towards this country and towards the mother country in the United States of America. But we refuse to believe that that explosion of ill-feeling adequately expresses the sentiments of those who are most competent to speak for the people of the United States. And, furthermore, we believe and hope as we believe, that it does not even express the sentiments of so large a section of that people as at one time we supposed. But, Sir, it would be an act of simple folly; it would be an act of culpable negligence on the part of any reasonable people not to recognize and take note of the patent fact that there is a disreputable and rowdy section of the American people who may some day cause us trouble; and it is absolutely necessary that any sober-minded people should take means to meet that trouble if unfortunately it should arise in the future. Therefore, I have been much gratified, as I am sure the country has been much gratified, to find that we have been called upon to make provision for the better defence of Canada. Not that I wish to assume or suggest that this provision for better defence arises altogether because of anything that may have happened on our southern border. For, Mr. Speaker, unhappily we know that these symptoms, these proofs of hostility have not been confined to the section of the people of the United States to which I have referred. Unfortunately, these proofs of unfriendliness seem to come from the four corners of the world; and, as my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) said in that magnificent speech with which he delighted this chamber a few days ago, it would seem as though the very magnitude and wealth and prosperity and happiness of our Empire had engendered envy and cupidity where least we expected to find them. And it would seem to-day as if trouble and trial, and even danger, were closing down over those famous islands "set in the silver sea," that we all hold so dear. For, Sir, there have suddenly loomed up the most threatening thunder clouds of war that have darkened the political horizon of England for many and many a long year. And, Sir, how has England, our own England, borne herself in the midst of the menace and danger which compass her about? Why, Sir, she has borne herself like the mighty mother of heroes that she is—the great heart but beat fuller and prouder in the hour of danger.

Sir, the spectacle of England's majestic composure and unflinching self-reliance in the presence of the undisguised and the altogether unexpected hostility of so many of the great powers of the world has sent a thrill of admiration and of pride through the pulses of every loyal subject of the Queen. And, Sir, I venture to say that England's conduct of to-day will not be found wanting even though "in far off summers that we shall not see," it be weighed in the balance against some of those splendid incidents that are set like precious jewels in the history of mankind. Mr. Speaker, we wish the people of England and of Ireland and of Scotland to know that the people of Canada are no mere fair-weather friends. We want our kinsmen in Australasia, some of whom we welcomed here so recently, to know that we are with them in this issue heart and hand; and we want the whole world to know that, come what may, in whatever part of the Empire they may happen to reside, the British people are one people, animated by one spirit and determined to stand together as one man in defence of their common rights and in the maintenance of their common interests. Sir, we desire peace before all. We regard war with horror. But we are prepared to accept it with all its consequences, come from what quarter it may, if it be necessary to do so in order to defend the honour and integrity of our own Empire.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I rise with pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to second and to say a few words in support of the resolution my hon. friend has just proposed. Speaking personally, I might say that, had I had the pleasure of seeing the resolution before it was put upon the Order paper, I would have suggested the elimination of some of the more formal phrases which appear in it. It appears to me that this is not an ordinary resolution, and should not be treated in an ordinary way. It is a resolution asking the representatives of the Canadian people to pledge Canada to a substantial sacrifice, if necessary, to maintain the integrity of the Empire; and personally I would have been glad, when we were asked in Parliament assembled to pledge ourselves to a solemn resolution of the kind, that all mere formal expressions which are used in passing formal resolutions year after year, should be entirely eliminated, and that the resolution should be as simple as befits the gravity of the situation, as, I think, it could be made with the elimination of a few words. However, I do not rise to criticise, but to support, and that I do most cordially, after the sympathetic criticism of the phraseology of the resolution. Great Britain has passed through troublous times lately which have called for her latent strength. If isolated—whether splendidly or dangerously, I won't debate—she has, in Mr. Chamberlain's words:

Stood sure in the strength of her own resources, in the firm resolution of her people, without respect to party, and in the abundant loyalty of her children from one end of the Empire to the other.

Sir, we often notice that Mr. Punch hits off in a cartoon the better view, and voices better the higher wishes of the people of England, than, perhaps, can be done in a column of the "Times," and those who have followed "Punch" lately have noticed that in describing the situation of affairs there, he pictured Britannia standing on the shores of the sea-girt isle, stern, solemn and alone, looking over the troubled waters and exclaiming :

Come the three corners of the world in arms
And we shall shock them : naught shall make us rue,

If England to herself do rest but true.

In these words there is a whole volume written. Sir, since Shakespeare wrote these words, there has arisen a greater Britain in the world. There is the great Canadian Dominion, the Australasian Empire, I was going to call it, the colony at the Cape, and the great dependency of India. From each and all of these have come home words of cheer and comfort to the motherland. The hearts of her children have gone out to the great, lone, isolated mother, and we to-day but do our duty when we pledge ourselves solemnly in Parliament, that if the occasion arises we are prepared to make material sacrifices for the integrity of the Empire. At present, Sir, the continent of Europe may be said to be a great armed camp. The nations there face each other with armies literally numbered by millions, and we are told that the Empire of Great Britain is counted amongst them, on account of the few men she could put into the field from a military standpoint, as a second or third-rate power. But, Sir, when the American interests of Great Britain were threatened in the now celebrated Venezuelan Message of the President of the United States, there went up from the English people a cry of surprise, a cry, almost, of horror, that such a threat or menace should have come from her own kin. When her interests in the Cape were menaced by the German autocrat there went up from her a shout of defiance; and the response which she gave in fitting out a flying squadron, in accession and addition to her ordinary navy, was the best answer which she could give, and was an assurance to her colonies and to the world at large that if she was only a third-rate continental power, she was to-day, and would continue to be what she was in days of yore, at least, mistress of the seas. As part of this great Empire, Canada, more than other part, is open to attack. With thousands of miles of coterminous frontier, and divided from the United States only by an invisible line, with many international questions existing calculated to cause bitterness and strife, it becomes doubly our duty so to comport ourselves that we will lessen and not increase Great Britain's difficulties. The recent troubles have accentuated our determination to remain part and parcel of the Empire. The splendid dream of an Imperial federation, which my hon. friend has sometimes presented to the House, has never yet presented itself in such a practical shape to the people of Great Britain, or to the people of the colonies, as to have claimed their allegiance. The sentiment which underlies that scheme is such as to have commanded their sympathy, not only in the British Isles, but in every colony of the British Empire. We desire to unite more closely and firmly the different parts of the Empire. We may not have at present, and so far as I can see, there is not at present any logical scheme ready; but in the lumbering and blundering way in which Old John Bull goes on, and is going on, I have no doubt that we will succeed, and that events themselves will evolve some scheme by which the Empire will be more closely united together.

Sir, the resolution which we are asked to pass, the national pledge which we are asked to give here, as representatives of the people, is a small step, perhaps, but it is one step, at least, in that direction. The resolution reiterates our desire to maintain the most friendly relations with our kinsmen of the United States. I believe that desire, Sir, to be universal in Canada. Commercially and socially, our relations are intertwined and united, and are becoming yearly more so. We look across the frontier, the invisible line, at the greatest republic the world has ever seen, and we see that great republic grappling with some of the greatest problems that ever a people have had to face. We see them grappling with the great problem of how to cement and unite forty-two commonwealths into one great republic welded into a harmonious whole, which, while guaranteeing state rights and individual liberty, will not be inconsistent with national power and greatness. We see them trying to solve the mighty problem how to assimilate and to make worthy citizens of the myriads of foreigners who have for the past fifty years found an asylum within her borders. We see her trying to solve the problem of what to do with the eight millions of coloured people who, released from slavery, are now her citizens. In these and other attempted solutions of mighty problems, we wish her God-speed. But I re-echo the statement made by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, that while we have every sympathy with them, and while we wish them well, we do not desire to take any part in the solution of those problems from a political standpoint. Largely speaking the same language, largely drawing inspiration from the same sources, and worshipping at the same altars, I believe in the sentiment expressed the other day by a senator of the United States that, after all, blood is thicker than water, and that the man or the nation who precipitates a war and all its horrors between these two great English-speaking nations, would be committing a crime against humanity.

As for Canada, we have our own problems to solve, our own difficulties to meet, and we propose to solve them and to meet them as part of the Empire, and under the protection of the Empire's flag. Now, Sir, Canada can assist Great Britain in two ways. We can assist her with means and with money, and, perhaps, compared with the amount of means and money which Great Britain requires for her defences, our contribution would be only a drop in the bucket, but at any rate, the feeling with which that contribution would be made, would make up, possibly, for the amount. But above all, we can assist her in the cultivation of the kindest feelings between us and the great republic lying to the south of us. An alliance between Great Britain and the United States would be the guarantee of the world's peace, no nation and no combination of nations is strong enough to withstand a union between the greatest Empire in the world and the greatest republic in the world. I re-echo the words lately spoken at Bristol by the Right Hon. J. A. Balfour, when he said :

He felt that England and the United States should work together, each in its own sphere, to promote and extend the Anglo-Saxon ideas of liberty. If, he declared, Great Britain was in alliance with the United States, she could fulfill the duties Providence had entrusted to her, and need not fear a foreign foe or international divisions.

These, Mr. Speaker, are noble words, and they have found a worthy echo during the late troubles from many of the most distinguished statesmen, orators and speakers of the United States. That the two great nations may grow in harmony and goodwill to each other is our earnest hope, and every Canadian who helps forward such a blessed consummation, makes a substantial and national offering to the Empire.

Mr. COCKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great pleasure to the eloquent addresses on the resolution before the House, and it is a source of unalloyed pleasure to find that there is one platform at least on which both parties in Canada unite, and sink for the time the bitterness of party politics. Out of evil good often comes, and the menace of troubles hanging over the British Empire of late has stimulated the sentiment of loyalty to the mother country and strengthened still more the ties that unite us to the Empire and to our brother colonists. It has practically within the last few weeks consummated the union of federated Australia, and but a few days ago New South Wales voted $50,000 annually for three years to subsidize the Canadian-Australian line by which the ties that bind us to our brethren in Australia may be continued and drawn still more closely. At the same time we find here in our Dominion a desire, which has been even strengthened by recent events, to connect ourselves with our brother colonists by new fast steamship lines and also by the Pacific cable. In South Africa, which has her own problems of pressing moment to solve and has to deal with questions that we dealt with perhaps two generations ago, the pulse beats in unison with the pulse of the Canadian and Australian colonies. While we have had wars and rumours of wars to excite us, it has been to me a source of honest pride to find that the Canadian press has risen fully to the occasion, and that while our neighbours to the south may have indulged in language which I think was unsuited to the circumstances, our Canadian press has conducted itself in a way that was in every sense becoming of the gravity of the occasion. There has been a full sense of the gravity of the situation, and men have knitted their lips tightly and their cheeks have perhaps blanched, but not through craven fear but through stern realization of the gravity of the duties which were being imposed on them, and which with God's help they intended to fulfil. But though we have, so to speak, taken our lives in our hands, we have never been wavering or halting in our allegiance to the motherland. We have not sat down and weighed the consequences materially and otherwise, and said that under certain circumstances we would be prepared to join the powerful nation of 70,000,000 to the south. Such a course seems never to have entered the Canadian mind, and I feel proud to-day in this public manner to draw attention to the fact, which does honour to the whole of the Dominion. I regret deeply that while England and Canada now entertain the most kindly feeling towards the United States, the same kindly feeling has not been universally reciprocated. They are no doubt peoples whose national roots go down deep into the same past as our own ; we draw from the fountain of the same literature ; we have the same science, the same arts, the same language ; we worship, as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has eloquently said, at the same altars ; our institutions are to a great extent similar, and it would become us, one would think, to rise to the conception of a higher patriotism. We have the domestic patriotism of the Scotchman for Scotland, of the Englishman for England, of the Irishman for Ireland, and the Canadian for Canada, and we have an Imperial patriotism for the Imperial Empire ; and I trust that as time goes by, as the years roll on, that feeling which now separates the United States from us will become less and less intense, and they will at length appreciate the fact that we glory in their success and in their progress, just as a grandfather may glory in the progress of his grandson. But I fear perhaps the bitterness, I might almost say, were it parliamentary, the political animosity, the bitter animosity of political life here, the aspersions cast on political parties, and both sides are equally guilty of the same fault, the fact that our politics assume so severe and stern and partisan a character has led many people in the United States to believe that we are not one people, one Dominion, that we are not satisfied with our condition, that we are ready to open our arms and welcome them. And it was this same opinion that in the Fenian raid, as we know, brought many a man over to Canada with the expectation that when he landed in our country, instead of being received at the bayonet point, he would be welcomed to our homes and regarded as a friend. I trust we will endeavour to conduct our debates in such a way that when reported they will cease to give foreign nations the opinion that we are divided. For we are not divided. We have our differences politically, we have our party differences in regard to the tariff, and these differences seem to be growing less and less, new light is coming in on our friends opposite and they are enlarging to some extent their views and coming more and more over to ours, and no doubt with the advance of years they will come nearer and nearer to the common platform, and then we shall be happy to receive them into our midst. I am glad too that the hon. member for North Bruce has so strongly declared that we desire no war with the United States. It would indeed be a horrible monstrosity to contemplate. But the feeling of unkindness, to use no stronger term, does exist largely in the United States, and we found during the recent troubles that there were, I think, but two Governors of the states which did not profess allegiance to the mad declaration of the Monroe doctrine promulgated by the President. Six large vessels of war, to cost $24,000,000, were at once ordered; other ships of war were also ordered, and 25 torpedo vessels were to sweep the ocean. Every pinchback politician was ready to back up the President, and the voice of the rabble with their asinine bray could not be drowned in the discussion, and everything was done to support the wretched caricature of the Monroe doctrine. I trust when this resolution of Parliament becomes known it will be felt that we have here once for all determined at all hazards to throw in our lot with the mother country, that we have no desire to change our allegiance politically, or commercially even, that we desire to live peaceably on this northern part of the American continent, and that we intend as British subjects to live and as British subjects to die.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I desire also to say a word or two on this subject. I am not myself in the habit of advocating loud professions of loyalty, nor do I believe to any very great extent in those loud professions of loyalty. But there is a time for all things, and I am of opinion that now is a very proper time indeed for some such expression as my hon. friend the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) proposes to place on our Journals. Sir, I do not mean to say there is at the present moment danger of war with the United States, but I do mean to say that under very slightly different conditions there might have been real danger in such a message as was recently delivered by President Cleveland had it been received in England in the same tone and temper as that in which it was conceived. And, Sir, therefore, I agree with several of the speakers who have preceded me, in highly commending the temper in which the press and the people of Canada, as a whole, received that threat, for it amounted to no less than a threat in the way in which it was delivered. I hope, as the member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) has said, that we will hear the last of these idle and foolish aspersions, thrown by one political party in this country, on the loyalty of the other. I trust that will be the case. It will tend to harmony, although on this side of the House we are not in the slightest degree disposed to hesitate at entering into a comparison of loyalty if that be the desire of hon. gentlemen. Now, Sir, on the present occasion, I beg to say that I speak for myself alone, and that it would be most unfair to hold any other person on this side of the House, or anywhere else, responsible for anything that I have to say on this question. For my part, I have not hesitated to say elsewhere, and I do not hesitate to repeat here, that to a very great extent, the choice for Canada lies between these two alternatives. As Canada is placed between England and the United States, Canada will either have to be a hostage for the good behaviour of England to the United States, or Canada will have to be a bond of union between those two countries. Which is the more honourable distinction? Which is the one more likely to promote our self-respect; which is the one more likely to promote the real welfare of Canada, I leave without hesitation for the people of Canada to decide. It is perfectly true, as my hon. friend (Mr. Cockburn) said, that out of evil (often) comes good, and I believe on the present occasion, very great good, indeed—although it may sound a paradox—is likely to arise from President Cleveland's message, in the first place, and from the somewhat petulant defiance of the German Emperor, in the second. Sir, that last message, if it has done nothing else, has shown England where she stood, and while I feel that there may be truth in the statement made by the Finance Minister on the one side, and in the statement made by myself on the other, I propose to treat my hon.

friend (Mr. Foster) to a compromise, and we shall say in future, not that England stands in a state of splendid isolation, or of dangerous isolation, but that England stands in a state of splendid but dangerous isolation. I believe that would pretty nearly define the actual state of the case. But whatever may be the truth as to that, there is no doubt either as to this, that the spirit and pluck with which that haughty message was received has extorted unwilling admiration even from those who formerly were most disposed to disparage England, and has shown as few other things could have shown, the great vitality and resource which the British Empire undoubtedly possesses. Sir, I agree with the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) beside me, that the mode in which that message was received has filled all Englishmen, whether they be in Canada, or Australia, or the Cape, or in England itself, with just and honest pride. And, Sir, it has gone very far to justify the old-time boast, that England is still, in spite of all that has come and gone, the mistress of the seas. It is not by any means an insignificant exact fact at this present moment, that among other things that display of strength and power called forth, was (although, perhaps, an unwilling) very decided appreciation and admiration on the part of our neighbours to the south of us; and that even from those who were most disposed in former times to cast ridicule on the pretensions of England. As for Mr. Cleveland's message, I say, and I believe, and if we could get at his inmost sentiments we would find that he now also believes that the tone and temper of his message was most unfortunate, and very greatly to be regretted by all. But, Sir, while that is true, the results which straightway followed on that message have tended a very great deal, after all said and done, to pave the way for a better understanding and more permanent peace between the two countries. For, if there be one thing more certain than another, it is this, that that same message, and the results of that same message, brought infinitely greater ruin in American homes than it did in English homes. The United States now know two things which I doubt whether they understood thoroughly before. They know, in the first place, to what an extraordinary and close extent, the interests of England and the United States are intertwined in a thousand ways. And they know further, what they did not fully understand before, the tremendous cost to them, as well, perhaps, the tremendous cost to us, which would be entailed in a war with England. Why, Sir, the mere name and sound of war (if Mr. Depew is an authority, as I believe he is) cost the United States, in a week, one thousand millions of dollars in depreciation of their securities, and I have strong reason to believe that Mr. Depew did not exaggerate one particle the mischief that had been done. Sir, among others, I had my attention lately called to three very remarkable testimonies to the present position of affairs from three Americans, of more or less note. First of all, I observe that the American commander-in-chief, General Miles, had the manliness and the courage, in a public place to tell his hearers that whatever else the United States might be able to do, or might not be able to do, they were at present utterly defenceless in the face of even a second-rate naval power, as regards the defences of their sea-coast. At the same time, Mr. Depew, who is a man well known and highly esteemed in most portions of the United States, pointed out with equal force, that it was a most unfortunate extension of the Monroe doctrine, if the United States were going to make themselves the protectors of every little petty despot in the southern hemisphere, and hold themselves responsible for every act of oppression or injustice he might commit on the subjects of any European power. And Mr. Depew took occasion, and with reason, to warn his hearers, that no good result could come from such exorbitant pretensions. Sir, I might give, if I pleased, many and many a testimony from the better and more thoughtful writers of the United States, all going to show that the sensible portion of the United States—whatever the jingo element among them might think—have at last woke up as they have never awakened before, to the tremendous consequences which would most undoubtedly follow a collision, should such a collision unhappily ever occur between the two great Anglo-Saxon nations. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word or two as to our share in Canada in this matter. There has been enough in this thing to make us reflect, although the war scare so-called lasted but a few days. It would not have been any light matter if we found ourselves suddenly dragged into war, and we might have been dragged into war, by reason of a quarrel over a few acres of bog in South America, with which we had no sort of concern. Sir, what I claim for Canada, what I have always claimed for Canada, and what I think, on calm consideration, all true Canadians will claim for Canada, is this: We do not claim a sole voice, of course, but I think that we have a right to claim co-equal voice in all things appertaining to affairs in North America; and, after recent events, I am not sure I should not say, in South America, too. That is a claim which I have advanced here, which I have advanced in England, which I have advanced on the platform, and which I propose to maintain. I claim it not as a favour, but as a right. Let me say to this House that rights and duties are strictly coterminous. Every man who has a right, has a duty to perform, and every man who has a duty to perform has a consequent right. Now, Sir, it is five and twenty years since

Great Britain, to all intents and purposes, devolved upon the people of Canada the responsibility and the duty not only of maintaining peace and good order in the northern half of North America, but of defending it against all comers. Five and twenty years ago England withdrew all her garrisons from British North America, with the single exception of the naval station at Halifax, which hardly counts in the scale; I think it is the only place to-day in British North America where Great Britain maintains a garrison. Sir, we accept that responsibility. We are willing to maintain peace and good order in this northern half of the continent; we are willing to defend it, please Providence, against all-comers to the best of our ability; but, hand in hand with that responsibility goes the right to a free hand, in this hemisphere at least. All other risks the people of Canada are ready to face, if not with a light heart, at least with a cheerful heart; and if Great Britain found Russia, France, Germany, or the whole continent of Europe, arrayed against her, and if the fleets of the combined powers, as they possibly might, were to threaten our territory, I have no doubt, for my part, that Canada would gird herself, and gird herself well, to meet any emergency that might arise. Sir, there is but one foe, that is, the possible foe to the south, with whom we might undoubtedly hesitate to enter into a conflict, and for no unworthy reasons. English statesmen talk of fratricidal war with the United States. I will not say that that is a mere phrase in their mouths; but while they talk about fratricidal war, we know that such a war would be a fratricidal war. There has been an enormous alteration in the Dominion of Canada within the last thirty years, as any one who has watched the movement of our population knows. I believe that I am strictly in the right when I say that at this moment there is scarcely one family in ten in the Dominion of Canada which has not a son or a brother or a near relative in some part of the United States. It is literally true, and it is well that our friends on both sides of the House should remember it, that Canada and the Northern States, at any rate, are more closely knit together in a great many ways than the North and the South were before the war. Now, I am not going to enter into a disquisition on the military aspects of the question, although time was, not long ago, when I might have said something as to that. But there are two plain truths which it is well that we should bear in mind; and which, if General Miles could afford to tell his countrymen the truth, we can afford to tell ours. One of these plain truths is that, by no fault of the people of Canada, this Dominion is one of the most defenceless countries on the face of the earth—at any rate, from Maine to the Rocky Mountains. The corollary of that is that the United States, along its sea-

coasts, from Maine to New Orleans and from San Francisco to Oregon, is likewise one of the most defenceless countries on the face of the earth; and if it were possible that our neighbours to the south should carry fire and sword to every town in Canada, it is equally true that the British fleet could lay in ashes every city on the seaboard of the United States. If it did so, it might destroy tens of thousands of millions of property held by Americans, but it would also destroy a proportionate amount of property held by British subjects living in England. The truth is, that England and the United States could do infinite harm to each other; but I trust, and I think everybody will trust, that means may be found whereby England and the United States may be prevented from ever again meeting in hostile collision. Why is it that Canada is so hard to defend from an enemy coming from the south? I have ventured to say elsewhere more than once what the reason for that is. I have ventured to point out that if Canada be defenceless, as it is to a great extent, against an enemy coming from the south, it is true to no fault of the people of Canada, least of all of the founders of Canada. It is due simply to what the late Lord Charles Beresford described as the "savage stupidity" of 1774 and 1776, when a lot of miserable incapables annihilated the Empire which the genius of the elder Pitt had created. If hon. gentlemen want to know why Canada is so defenceless, they cannot do better than cast their eyes over pages 4 and 5 of a pamphlet which was recently sent to me, on "Canada and Her Relations to the Empire," under the authorship of Colonel G. T. Denison—not our friend, whom I am sorry not to see here, but I believe a brother of his. Now, it is not my purpose to-day to review the series of negotiations, dating back over 120 years, from the Treaty of Paris down to the present day, in which our sharp-witted neighbours to the south got the better of English statesmen and English diplomatists; but I venture to say that there was one negotiation in which they did not get the better, and that was because the negotiation on the British side was conducted solely by Canadian diplomatists, Canadian lawyers and Canadian statesmen. Sir, in my opinion, the true attitude for the people of Canada, now as always, is the attitude of a people who are loyal, but not subservient—a people who know their rights, and will assert and demand them. If there be anything which a true Briton despises, it is, in the first place, anything that savors of flunkeyism and gush, and, I may add, anything that savors of unworthy jingoism. Our history has not many traditions, but it has one valuable tradition that redeems it—that is, the tradition of the settlement of Canada, or a large part of it, by the United Empire Loyalists. How they were treated by the British Government it is not my purpose to enlarge upon to-day. I will merely say that that page in our history has not a correspondingly glorious page in British history. But, Sir, while I desire and my friends desire, so long as we are a part of the British Empire, to do our duty to the utmost, while we are prepared to shrink from no proper sacrifice for the purpose of assisting the Empire to the best of our means, yet, as a Canadian, I take leave to tell the House and the country that it is not a question of obligation between Canada and the Empire; or if there be any obligation, the obligation is by no means confined to one side. Great Britain is the greatest colonizing power on the face of the earth. How many hundred colonies she possesses I hardly dare say. She has acquired colonies in every possible way—colonies by conquest, colonies by inheritance, colonies by purchase, colonies by exchange, colonies founded by her sons who left her shores to obtain religious liberty, and colonies founded by others who left her shores to benefit their position; but among her hundred colonies she has but one which was founded and created by men who did not leave the shores of England to benefit themselves, but who gave up all they had for the purpose of maintaining their loyalty to England—and the name of that colony is Canada. Nevertheless, Sir, although it be largely by England's own fault, it must be confessed that, as regards the United States, Canada is a weak spot in the British armour. There can be no doubt that we are liable to a sudden attack by a foe from the south, and there is no doubt that it would tax all our resources and the resources of the British Empire to effectively defend this country against such an attack. As to the quarrel with Venezuela, if I were to give my opinion, it would be closely akin to that of Prince Bismarck with reference to certain difficulties on the eastern frontier, when he declared that he would not be willing to sacrifice a single Pomeranian grenadier for the sake of all the Turks in Europe and Asia put together; and for my part, I think it would be a thousand pities were a single drop of Anglo-Saxon blood shed for the sake of all those murderous man-monkeys in South America. What they do is to have a revolution and a massacre every half-year, and the only possible chance of their living in peace is for some strong tyrant like General Rosas or Dr. Francois to keep them in due subjection at the point of the bayonet. Sir, my counsel in this matter is this, and it is a counsel which I am beginning to hope and think may possibly be realized one of these days. I hope that if anything is to come of the scheme of Imperial federation, so dear to our hon. friends opposite, it must come in one shape or another after and not before some such thing as I am about to suggest has been put into practical effect. I referred just now to a certain speech of

Mr. Depew. I am not going to say that we have nothing to complain of in the Americans and that the Americans have nothing to complain of in us. My own impression is that, as is usually the case, there are faults enough on both sides. We cannot see those of our own, but we can those of the United States. But I hold that when Mr. Depew proposed, as I see he did, in a recent speech, that a common tribunal should be established, a tribunal before which the English-speaking nations, at any rate, might adjust all their differences in a rational and reasonable way, Mr. Depew did really suggest, whether the time has come for carrying out his suggestion or not, what would be the best outcome and solution of all these difficulties with which we have been confronted in Canada, not now only, but for the past nine or ten years. Sir, I think that the events of the last month have brought that idea of common tribunal within measurable range of the region of practical politics, and I believe that the people of Canada, the journalists of Canada, the public men of Canada, have it in their power, in no insignificant degree, to contribute in bringing about such a result. Sir, my experience, and I dare say the experience of others here, is that, after all, men are to a very great extent what you make them; and although we are a long way from the golden rule, yet the chances are that men will deal with you as you deal with them. In this matter, I may say, that if there be anything in our traditions, if there be anything in the fact that we are here representing, to a great extent, the traditions of the U. E. Loyalists, those men will best represent the idea which underlay the sacrifices made by the U. E. Loyalists, who aid and assist in promoting and restoring in any other way the object which they aimed at, which was not, by any manner of means, to prevent the British Government of the day to levy taxes, without representation, on the Americans. I have reason to know that the U. E. Loyalists took no stock in that idea, but their object was to preserve together the British Empire which had been acquired at such loss and sacrifice and with such danger, within a very recent period, to their fathers and themselves. Sir, I cannot stop now—the theme would be large and too great—to contemplate the spectacle of what would be the results of an alliance between 140,000,000 of English people. All I can say is this, that if such an alliance—and I do not hope, of course, for any restoration of common government, or desire it—but if any alliance could be formed or tribunal established which would put a stop, practically at once and for ever, to all fear of hostility between those countries, then I say that a very great security would be given to the peace and welfare of the world at large and to the future progress of the world at large. And I believe, like my hon. friend, that the statesmen, the journalists, and all men who can aid and help, and who do aid and help, in promoting that, will render the greatest service that can be rendered to Canada in the first place, and the British Empire at large, in the second place.

Mr. CRAIG. This resolution is one which must commend itself to the whole House. I have listened with great pleasure to the speech of the mover, and have no doubt that his sentiments are shared by every hon. gentleman who has listened to his remarks. If there is one thing that does not need proof it is the loyalty of Canadians. That is a thing which we take for granted, and yet this resolution is very timely, for this reason. Canada occupies a very peculiar position. Lying alongside the great republic, it may be thought at times by people not familiar with Canadians, by people living in the Empire, that we may have thoughts of living in union with the republic. But this resolution is not only timely, as assuring people of the Empire that Canada is indeed loyal and proud of its connection with such a great Empire—proud of being a part, and no small part, of such an Empire, but it is also timely as regards the people of the United States. A great many people in the United States have the idea—and it is almost impossible to get that idea out of their heads—that many people in Canada desire annexation. In my sojourn in the United States a few years ago, I found that the people there thought it a ridiculous idea that Canadians should not desire annexation. They asked: How is it that a small country like Canada does not desire to be annexed to the States? I told them that there was no such desire, that we were satisfied to remain as we are. This opinion in the United States arises from a misconception of our position. They look on Canada as a small country, one of the dependencies of Great Britain; they have the idea that we occupy a very inferior position; they know little about our position and the relation in which we stand to the Empire; and I am glad to-day to have the opportunity of supporting a resolution like this, which will show to the people of the United States that all the people of this country are loyal to the Empire. It will show them that this feeling is not confined to one party or one section, but that both the great parties of this country and all sections of it, are one in loyalty to the Empire. I think that sometimes a mistake is made in accusing any party in this country of disloyalty, because the people of the United States, when they see such statements, imagine that they are true, that there is something in them. Whereas, on the contrary, those who make such statements make them perhaps for political purposes, knowing that those whom they accuse of disloyalty would be, if the occasion should arise, as capable of proving their loyalty as those who make the charge. I have travelled all over the country, and am glad to say there is no annexation sentiment in it. You might find one man in perhaps one hundred thousand who might think that union with the United States would be an improvement, but that is about all you would find. The people generally, in every part of the country, are satisfied with their position. They are satisfied to be a part and, as I said before, no small part, of the greatest Empire the world has ever seen. The people of the United States, therefore, may dismiss the idea from their minds that any section of this country has any desire at all for annexation with the United States; but while I say that, I advocate very strongly, as I did in this House some two or three years ago, the most friendly relations with the United States. I said then, as I say now, that they have a people whom it is most difficult to govern. They have a population made up of a great many different nationalities. They find it almost impossible to please them all, and sometimes their rulers and those in authority do things which they would not do unless impelled, as they think, by political reasons. I hope and I believe that the late message of President Cleveland was inspired almost altogether by political considerations. I think he felt that he had to do something in that line, and took this means of making himself popular. In some respects that message was not an unfortunate thing for this country. In some respects that message was fortunate, because it showed the people of the United States that Canadians are united. It showed Canadians, at the same time, that while there were some Americans who had feelings of hostility to Canada, the great bulk of the people of the United States—and the best part of the people—had the most friendly feelings to Canada; and although some have held other opinions, I was pleased to see that some of the most influential papers in the United States expressed the most friendly feeling to Canada and the utmost abhorrence of having any war which would imply an attack on Canada. They took the right view of the situation; and I was pleased, at the same time, to see that some of the party men, at the very outset, when in so doing they exposed themselves to unpopularity, took the strong stand that the United States were not right in their contention, but, on the contrary, had overstepped the mark. I believe in the most friendly relations with the United States, and I think I may say here that our newspapers can do a great deal to strengthen those relations. I have, as we all have, a great respect for the power of the press. As a rule our newspapers commend themselves to all who read them; but sometimes it is possible that paragraphs may appear which should not appear, paragraphs tending to show that we have some feeling of enmity towards the United States.

Sir, I hold that, while there is no annexation sentiment in this country, yet, from one end of the country to the other, there is the most friendly feeling towards the American Union and its people. As was well said by the last speaker, there are few families in this country but have a son or a brother in the United States. Speaking for myself, I have a son there; and that fact does not make me feel less friendly to that country. He had to go there for his health—I would rather he could live in this country, but he is there, he has friends there and among the people of that country are many who have befriended him. I have, as we all have, many friends in the United States. But, above all, the hundreds of thousands of Canadians that are scattered throughout that country are our brothers, not only in name but in reality. I would advocate as strongly as I can that nothing be done to impair the friendly relations between these two countries. It would be a terrible thing if any war between us should arise. We cannot imagine the ruin which such a calamity would bring upon this country and upon that as well. But, Sir, I have no fear of war. I think a remark made by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), who at that time occupied the position of Minister of Militia, was a most sensible remark. When asked about the defences of Canada, he said that the best defence of Canada is the "good sense of the people of the United States." I think the people of the United States have been reflecting, and they are reflecting to-day; and that they realize that they have no desire for war, and that Canada is a country perfectly friendly to them. Not only that, but our business relations are immense. Most of us are doing business with the United States, and the great commerce between us brings about most friendly feelings. I trust that nothing will be said by the newspapers or by members of this House, or by those outside which will in any way disturb our present friendly relations. On this continent there is plenty of room for two great nations. It is true that at present Canada has a population of only about 5,000,000. But we have room for many millions more, and I hope that I shall see the time when we shall have twenty millions. I hope, and I believe, that these two nations will go on rivalling each other, not in war, but in commerce and in the arts of peace. I have great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in advocating this resolution, which expresses my sentiments most fully, and I congratulate the mover upon introducing it to the House.

Mr. CASEY. I, too, must congratulate the mover of this resolution upon his good fortune in being the one to evoke the expression of an opinion that is evidently unanimous in this House. And I beg leave to add my small contribution to the expression of that opinion. The hon. gentleman's resolution deals with the question in three or four phases. It refers first to the threatening aspect of foreign affairs so far as Great Britain is concerned. There is no doubt that the foreign affairs of Great Britain have, within a late period, assumed a somewhat threatening aspect. I think the reason for that is not far to seek. It is not aggression on the part of Great Britain that has aroused a certain amount of suspicion among her neighbours; it is not any wrong she has committed against other nations.

The great and over-growing progress of Great Britain has created this feeling. I claim that the feeling of other nations towards Great Britain at the moment—and I hope and believe that it is only a temporary feeling—is aroused more by jealousy of her great success in commerce, in colonization and in enterprise of all kinds, than by any fault on the part of the mother country herself. It is to be expected that this feeling should be manifested for the moment; but it is to be expected also that further consideration will remove that feeling and that the relations of Great Britain with other countries may be, again, as cordial as they have been in the past. One great consideration alone, it seems to me, should be sufficient to allay this feeling of jealousy, and it is this—that the progress of Great Britain has always been in the past, is in the present, and always will be in the future, the progress of humanity.

In every period of her history, when Great Britain has made a step in advance with her commerce or her colonization, it has meant that humanity, as a whole, is better off. It has meant an increase of the means of subsistence, the cultivation of more land, the development of means of intercourse between different parts of the world. Britain's flag has been the pioneer of progress and the pioneer of development wherever it has gone. And I am sure that when this is fully realized throughout the world, the temporary jealousy of her success must give way to the feeling that all other nations share more or less directly in the prosperity of that great country.

In spite of the fact referred to as the threatening aspect of foreign affairs in this resolution, I do not feel inclined to adopt the phrase "splendid isolation" as descriptive of Britain's position. That phrase has acquired a certain popularity, and, prima facie, it may have appeared the proper phrase to describe Great Britain's position. But I feel that Great Britain is no more isolated in the present juncture of affairs than is the mother of a great family of grown-up children. Great Britain can never be isolated so long as the family tie is maintained between her and the great communities that have sprung from her. I believe that tie is now stronger than it ever was before, and that it will become stronger still in consequence of the temporary feeling against Great Britain which has now arisen. In view of that fact I deprecate the use of the phrase "splendid isolation." I would prefer to substitute for it some phrase, which I am not eloquent enough to coin at the moment, descriptive of a united family supporting the head of that family under all circumstances.

Now, Sir, the resolution, in the second place, voices the unalterable loyalty and devotion of this country to the British Throne and constitution. That phrase, I think, is perfectly correct. There is no doubt of the loyalty of all those who inhabit Canada at the present time. In the discussion of this question, it would be beneath the occasion to attempt to prove that one political party in the country, as compared with another, is equally loyal or more loyal. I do not think any one in this House ever believed for a moment that there was a difference on that point. I wish, however, to refer briefly to the different races which inhabit Canada, and to the reasons why they are, as such, loyal to the mother country.

The largest proportion of the people are of the British races, from the British Isles. Their loyalty is as undoubted here as it was in their native land. Even the race to which I have the honour to belong myself, the noble residents of the ever-green isle, are found in Canada as loyal as anybody else, and a little more so? The Irishman, when he becomes a full citizen of the Empire, with all the privileges and rights of every other citizen, is just as loyal as any other citizen, and has always been. No matter how he was disaffected towards the particular methods of government in the mother country, he has always been ready to shed his blood for the Empire at home.

The next in number of the great strains of blood in Canada, although first in colonization, is that race with which we are so proud to be associated, our cousins from France. I say our cousins from France, because, in the course of centuries, what with the Norman conquest of England, the interchange of settlement between the two countries, the mixture that has taken place in Canada, we cannot affect to consider our fellow-citizens of the French race otherwise than as relatives at the present time. I claim that there is no such thing, or should be no such thing as a racial problem, or a racial difference, between the people of Canada. This country was first discovered, first practically made use of, by our French friends and relatives. They showed their very good ability to look after this country, and to maintain their hold upon it. In the course of events they have acknowledged the sovereignty of the Empire, established by one of their own Norman race, in the first instance.

I say, Sir, there is no racial difference between people so situated. The cry of the aggrieved in all parts of the British Empire to-day, as it is still in the Channel Islands, and was in Normandy, is virtually a cry of "Ha Rou!" the cry to Rollo, when any one is doing them harm. And if there were occasion to display their valour in the field in defence of this country, the cry of "St. George for England," and that of "En avant la Normandie," would be heard side by side. Sir, the other race who form an important portion in our population, is the Germans, especially in the western part of the province of Ontario, and in certain parts of Nova Scotia. These Germans, some of them born in the old fatherland, and some of them born here, have all adopted Canada as their country; and it goes without saying that the devotion of the Germans to their fartherland, on the field or in other circumstances, equals that of any other race. Our Germans will show the same valour in defending Canada as they have always shown in defending the old land in Europe.

From all this, I conclude that there is nothing whatever amongst the people of Canada to divide us in the expression of an unalterable loyalty to the Throne and constitution of Great Britain. Examples of that could be given, but this is not an occasion for wasting time in long-winded descriptions of what everybody knows. I pass to that branch of the resolution which speaks of the substantial sacrifices by which we would be ready to attest our loyalty. There is no doubt on that point, either, Mr. Speaker. Substantial sacrifices would be made by Canada, and I believe by all other off-shoots of Great Britain to defend that country, or their sister dependencies against aggression. Solidity against aggression is, I believe, the present condition of the British Empire, and the only condition which is capable of maintaining its integrity in the future.

I have great hopes that out of the present circumstances, the uneasy feeling in Great Britain, the discussion of the relations between her and her family, may come to something like that for which many have hoped for many years back, I mean to say, something more than a nominal union of this great British Empire. I do not wish to commit myself to any special plan of Imperial federation, or customs union, or differential duties, or anything of that kind; but I do hope to see the day when every British subject, no matter where located, shall be a full citizen of that Empire, with the rights and duties of such citizens.

This branch of the question leads us to consider our relations with the United States, as is done in the last clause of the resolution. What those relations should be has been well pointed out already. By connection of blood, by geographical position, by long tradition, we ought to be the closest friends in the world. But it often happens that those who are the most nearly related by blood, the most contiguous to each other, are not always on the very best of terms, or at least, are not so at all times. I am in great hopes, however, that the present state of irritation existing—not in Canada, for it does not exist here, but existing on the other side of the line, towards Canada—may be only of the nature of a lovers' quarrel, or a quarrel between near relatives, which will soon be composed by more serious considerations. I am sure that will be the case, as long as the better elements in the great republic to the south of us, hold the upper hand.

The only possible danger that can arise, will come from the sudden effervescence of the lower elements in that country, leading them to acts which would necessarily bring about a war. It is to be hoped that the good sense of the many will keep the turbulent few in subjection, and avoid that danger.

With that great nation, related to us, as the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) has pointed out, directly by blood, in many cases, indirectly by blood to all of us—with that great nation, I say, we should endeavour to the utmost of our ability, to preserve good relations at all times; to preserve those relations of commerce which are the surest methods of bringing about personal and national good feeling; to preserve those diplomatic relations which are consistent with continued respect for each other, and to preserve those personal individual relations which lie at the root of all broader relations. I should even have great hopes of seeing some realization of that great future alluded to by my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), some sort of union for purposes of peace and progress between all English-speaking countries. I should be very glad to see that union between the greatest Empire and the greatest republic on earth, to which that hon. gentleman has referred.

Our position, in the meantime, must be one which will give no studied offence to that or any other neighbour, and which will leave it still open for us to realize such high possibilities, and our actions should be directed towards converting those possibilities into actual facts. I hope the present discussion will do something towards that great end, and I am sure honour will be reflected on the House by the way in which it has treated the subject.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to see this debate close without a word being said by a member from the province of Quebec and of my origin. I do not suppose that it is necessary to speak of our loyalty to the Queen of England and to the Empire. Ever since this Canada of ours became a dependency of Great Britain, whenever the necessities of our position called upon us to come forward and do our duty as British subjects, we were not behind: we never refused to do our duty, but we did it cheerfully and cordially. At times the loyalty of the French-Canadians must have been tried very much. Only a few years after this country became a dependency of England, the Thirteen Colonies revolted and asserted their independence. At that time we were called upon to join them and help them against England, which had possession of the country, and against which the French of Canada had fought for years to maintain their allegiance to the King of France and remain a portion of France. But the result of the appeal from the other side, not only from the Americans, or the revolted British subjects, but from the French commandant and generals then on the other side of the line, to come forward and join the standard of France, was that the offer was spurned and the French-Canadians stood by the standard of Great Britain. They shed their blood in defence of that flag, and, though they may have had difficulties in bringing their friends to the convictions they held at that moment, nevertheless, they did their duty, and that duty was performed again at later periods, as I shall show to the House. When this country, by the war of 1812, was threatened again by the United States, you did not see the French-Canadians turn their backs on the standard of Great Britain, but they fought for the liberties of England, for the liberties of Canada, and for the liberties of the world. Later on, again, when our great, gracious Queen ascended the Throne of England, the difficulties that had existed for several years in Canada on account of the manner in which this country was administered by officers and officials from England, came to a climax, you did not see the mass of the people take a position in antagonism to the established authorities. No doubt, they sympathized with those who were asking for their complete liberty, that liberty which was granted afterwards, and granted by England, and which we now enjoy, under which, while we enjoy the rule of Great Britain, we have responsible government here. Ever since that time, when we have been called upon as a race, as British subjects, to defend the British flag, you never saw the French refuse, any more than members of the other races and they even left their province to go thousands of miles westward to re-establish the authority of England. I do not wish to make a speech, I am not prepared to do so; but it occurred to me, that, on an occasion like this, at all events, a voice from the French-Canadian people might be heard, and that voice would say: We, a million and a half of people in this country, having blood different from the other nationalities, worshipping at other altars than the majority of the inhabitants, having different ancestors from those of the large majority in this Dominion, join with the other race, join with our fellow-subjects, in declaring that Great Britain has not in the vast Empire more loyal subjects, more devoted subjects, than those of my race. I do not say that we are better than the other people in the Empire—we are satisfied if we are as good as they. I thank the House for the attention paid to me while saying these few words.

Sir JAMES GRANT. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the House by any lengthy observations, more especially after the address delivered by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), as well as the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I have listened with a very great degree of pleasure to the able, laconic observations that have fallen from both of those hon. gentlemen on the important subject presented to the House by the mover of the resolution, and it was with pleasure indeed that I listened to the few words uttered by one of the Nestors of the great French nationality in this country, an hon. gentleman who, I regret to say, is almost too silent. I was pleased beyond measure to have heard him address the House on the loyalty and patriotism of that great French nationality, of which he is an ornament. We know well that in the history of this country the French nationality has worked with the Anglo-Saxon, to build up in Canada that prosperity we are now enjoying. On every occasion where their assistance was required in the development of the resources of this country and in the protection of the rights and privileges of our people we always found the French people fighting with the Anglo-Saxon. Then again, the able address delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is proof, if proof were wanting, that to-day in Canada, whether Liberal or Conservative, whether French or English, and no matter on what side of politics we arrange ourselves, we live together as one people fully determined to protect the Empire. We are living at an important era in the history of this North American continent. At no time within the past century, have the clouds hovered so gloomily over us as within the past few months. It is a reassurance to see that the principles of peace are likely to prevail, and that there are indications of peace all along the line. Only a few days ago the Rt. Hon. Mr. Balfour, who occupies so important a position in the government of Great Britain, addressing his electors at Manchester, said :

I do not believe that public opinion on either side of the Atlantic or in Europe will permit the outbreak of a war whose end no man can foresee. This expression of opinion from a gentleman, competent to judge of the doings of the nations of the world, is a source of encouragement to the people here who are working with all their power and ability to build up this portion of Her Majesty's Empire. There is another reason why we should be interested in the motion now before the House. Within a few months Her Majesty will have closed sixty years of her reign, and at no time in the history of this world has the Empire made greater progress than during that period. In every part of the world there have been evidences of advancing civilization. What are we devoted to? Our Queen and our country, or rather the Empire of which we are a conspicuous part. We may ask what has this Empire, British in its surroundings and entirety, accomplished, in the past sixty years, to cause such enthusiasm and admiration, not alone by British subjects, but the world at large. In the marked advancement, there has been no grasping disposition, but merely the outgrowth of progressive revenue development cotemporaneous with advancing civilization. Since the Queen ascended the Throne, the "Thin Red Line," which marks the British territorial boundaries, has extended very considerably. Since 1843, the acquisition in India, of Scindh, Punjab and Oudh and Upper Burma as well as the Shan States, have added to the Indian Empire fully 275,000 square miles of territory. In the same period the occupation at Aden, the administration of Hong-Kong, as well as considerable portions of North Borneo, have given to the Empire an additional 80,000 square miles, in fact a territory fully as large as Great Britain. When the Queen commenced her illustrious rule, England had in South Africa 100,000 square miles; at present she holds sway over 300,000 square miles, in this same region. The North American and Australian colonies cover over 6,500,000 square miles of territory. When the Queen ascended the Throne, Canada had, about 1,000,000 population. Now we have over 5,000,000 people. During this same period the progress of the Australian colonies, has been very marked indeed. In Australia in 1837,—the population was about 175,000—to-day the population is fully 4,500,000, and only five years after Her Majesty ascended the Throne, was self-government conferred on New South Wales. To-day the British Empire embraces an area of fully 10,000,000 square miles, with a population of 350,000,000 of people. When we remember the position of Canada as a portion of that great Empire, should we not see that the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) is well timed. It is the duty of as many hon. gentlemen as possible to express their opinions upon that resolution, because it will tell the world at large that we in Canada are determined to remain a portion of the British Empire. We have no desire to become annexed to the United States. We live in peace and prosperity and happiness here. When they were in trouble in their civil war, it is well known that thousands of our young men fought and fell on their battlefields for the abolition of slavery, and for the extension of the principles of civilization. And, if the United States were in trouble again to-morrow, the people of Canada would be willing to assist them out of their difficulty. This resolution of the hon.

gentleman (Mr. McNeill) will show the strong desire of our people, that come what may, we are ready to do our utmost to protect the best interests of the Empire. I again express the hope that the little cloud which hovers over us will pass away, and that when President Cleveland comes to a full appreciation of his manifesto, he will see that his course was irregular, and that there is no desire whatever on the part of Great Britain to grasp territories that belong to any other nation. Great Britain in the acquisition of her vast territories, in the extension of her powers, has merely taken what she was entitled to, and she merely wishes now to protect her Empire and to protect her own subjects. We are one people on this North American continent. We cultivate the same fields, and we promote the same principles of literature, science and art. Let us advance in unity and peace. Canadians are working in the best interests of their own Dominion, and we are at the same time glad to see the great American republic occupy the high position she does among the nations of the world. We wish her every prosperity, and when Canadians are called upon, not one of us will be found wanting to rise as one man to protect the best interests of this country and to maintain that allegiance to the Crown which makes us one people in saying, God save our Queen.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I had never supposed that Her Majesty the Queen or the British Government, or the British people had any doubt in regard to the loyalty of the people of Canada. I am in full accord with almost all the sentiments that have been expressed in regard to this resolution to-day. I was more than pleased with the speeches of some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. When I listened to the speeches of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), and others, it occurred to me that probably one of the objects of this resolution, the opportuneness of which has been referred to by hon. gentlemen on both sides, was to make it known to Her Majesty the Queen, and to the British Government, that the many of the statements on the subject of loyalty, made in the Conservative press and on public platforms by Conservative speakers, were not true. These hon. gentlemen may have thought that some impression might have been made on the minds of some members of the British Government by the misrepresentation that more than one-half of the Canadian people were disloyal to the Crown; and I suppose we are to accept the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite to-day as an apology to the Liberal party for that misrepresentation. We accept it gratefully, and if no other good came from this debate, it will, I trust, make them feel with us, as Canadians having a common interest in our country, that it was more than bad taste—that it was wicked and injurious to our country—that statements should have been made in the House, on the public platform, and in the press, which we all know were incorrect, and could only be made for petty partisan purposes. I have always thought it was to be regretted that such statements were made, and I hope that, in the future, if hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken to-day are in earnest in what they say, we shall be relieved from hearing any public man trying to make political capital by repeating statements which he knows to be untrue, and by trying to disparage any one of our own people, no matter to what political party they may belong. I am fully in accord with the resolution and with the many loyal sentiments which have been expressed to-day, and good results may possibly come from the resolution and the many able speeches with which it has been supported.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to ask the House to listen to me for five minutes on this resolution. I simply rise lest, if no member of the Government said a word on the resolution, it might be thought or said by any one that we were not in sympathy with it. To correct that impression, and for that purpose alone, I rise. But while on my feet, I cannot but congratulate most heartily the mover of the resolution upon his speech. The matter of it was excellent, but the matter of even was exceeded by its good taste. I do not think that any person on either side of this House, or any citizen of this or any other country, could find fault with the spirit of the hon. gentleman's address. I have also listened with a great deal of pleasure to most of the addresses delivered on the other side of the House, as well as on our own side. I think the resolution is an opportune one. I think it will help to guide opinion in Canada itself. It will certainly help to inform public opinion in the United States and in Great Britain as well. It will tend to an increase of that warmth of interest, that feeling of common interest which is all the time growing between Great Britain and her colonies, and which, despite all obstacles and difficulties, which may seem practically to be in the way, is tending continuously and strongly to a complete union of Great Britain and all her colonies. I simply wish to make this statement of my accord and the accord of the Government with the resolution. It can do no harm, it must do a great deal of good, and it will be as agreeable to our own people as it will be to the people of Great Britain, to whom it especially goes.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, though this resolution meets with general acceptance from all sides, and though it requires no support on my part, I also beg to add a few words just to express my entire concurrence with it. I am glad to believe that at this moment, when this resolution comes up for debate, there is, perhaps, less urgency for it than there was one month ago, when it was first placed on the Order paper. At that time the sky was cloudy; now it seems brighter. At that time it looked as if England were on the verge of war, and would have to fight single-handed almost the whole world—as if she would have to face many enemies combined, both from quarters where she might expect to find foes, and also from quarters where she might have expected to find friends. At this time, I am glad to say, matters look better. It is true, England was—as the Minister of Finance said on a former occasion, and is yet, isolated—whether splendidly isolated or dangerously isolated, I will not now debate; but for my part, I think splendidly isolated, because this isolation of England comes from her superiority, and her superiority, to-day seems to be manifest. Apart from the realm of letters and art—in which, in my humble judgment, France is her compeer, and even her superior—in everything that makes a people great, in colonizing power, in trade and commerce, in all the higher arts of civilization, England not only excels all other nations of the modern world, but all nations in ancient history as well. She is isolated to-day; but we can remember that the present position of England, the degree of marvellous development she has attained, dates from the day when her fortunes seemed to be at the lowest ebb, that is, at the close of the American war in the last century. At that time, England had just lost her colonial empire, she had lost her American colonies. The only colonies left to her were a few isolated spots here and there, and the colony of Canada, at that time containing only about 80,000 souls. Since that day, the career of England has been simply marvellous. Since that day she has conquered India, grappled with Napoleon and brought down that colossus, reduced her public debt, reduced the number of her paupers and criminals, doubled her population, trebled her trade, and planted strong and permanent colonies in Asia, Africa, Australasia and almost every other corner of the world. As I said, these splendid accomplishments date from the day when her fortunes seemed to be at the lowest ebb. She has done more, she has done what has not been done by any other nation. At the present day, when the nations of Europe, her competitors, have been concentrating all their energies in creating and increasing their standing armies and in maintaining stupendous armaments, England has devoted all her energies to the arts of peace, so that to-day her accumulated wealth is such that she is the banker of the world. The citizens of England to-day hold in their pockets the bonds of kings and nations, and on the recent occasion when she was threatened with war from across the sea, from a quarter where she had reason to expect nothing but friendship, just by declining the bonds of that nation she inflicted upon it almost as much harm as would war itself. Well, these are guarantees of peace, I think, these are splendid guarantees of peace; but if the day should come—which God forbid—if the day should ever come—which I again say God forbid—when England should have to repel foes, I am quite sure that all British subjects, all over the world, would be only too glad to give to her what help they could—all British subjects all over the world, not only British subjects of her own blood, but British subjects who are not of her own blood, but who have received from her the inestimable blessing of freedom.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, I cannot refrain from rising to give my humble support to this resolution, and to express my approval of the remarks of the hon. gentleman who moved it, and of those who supported it. I am not going to speak as to other portions of the Dominion, but shall confine the few remarks I intend to make, to my own native city of Montreal. I desire to say, that everywhere in the city of Montreal, the people are solid to a man in their support and defence of the British flag. I well remember the words used by one of the greatest men whom England ever sent to Canada—Lord Dufferin. At the time of the Fenian raid there were some in this country who attempted to decry the race to which I belong, but Lord Dufferin amply vindicated their loyalty by these patriotic words which he used, and which have endeared him to the heart of every Irishman. On that occasion, Lord Dufferin said:

During my various progress through the country, I have come into contact with hundreds and hundreds of kindly Irishmen, labouring in the field, the forest, by the riverside or in the mine; and never did I meet one who did not give me a hearty welcome, both as a fellow-countryman and as a representative of the Queen. Nay, on the day of peril, if in the Canadian line of battle I could find a regiment more essentially Irish in its composition than the rest, it would be to the keeping of that regiment. I would by preference entrust the standard of the Queen and the flag of the Dominion.

Mr. Speaker, we are a loyal people in the city of Montreal, loyal not only to the Empire, but loyal to ourselves. Let me mention a fact, Sir, which will illustrate how the people of all races and creeds in Montreal act loyally together. You know, Sir, that almost seven-eighths of the population of Montreal is Roman Catholic, but yet so liberal are we, so united are we in our desire to do justice to all, that only the other day, we elected a Protestant mayor by acclamation. That was not only an act of justice of the majority, but it was the right of the Protestant minority. If all the people of Canada were as united as are the people of that city it would be all the better for the unity of Canada and of the Empire. I hope that this lesson will be remembered in other parts of the Dominion. I hope that throughout our entire country this example will be followed. I trust that no one will be debarred from occupying the highest position in the land on account of his religion, but that, under a broad spirit of toleration, a man's merit, and a man's good record as a citizen, will alone be taken into account. Every subject of the Queen felt proud when a few days ago, great England placed her battle ships in line, and in the face of an almost united Europe against her, declared her readiness to defend the flag which had braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze. If we hope to make Canada a great country, and entitle her to a prominent part of the British Empire, we must stand united amongst ourselves. We must have no religious bigotry or intolerance, and we must ensure that to be a good Canadian, is the best recommendation for any preferment at the hands of the people. I shall say no more except to repeat, that I warmly and heartily support the resolution proposed by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and to thank the House for having given me the opportunity to express the sentiments of loyalty which actuate myself, and the people I have the honour to represent here.

Mr. DAVIN. As we have heard from every quarter hon. gentlemen rising to support the motion of my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), I do not think it would be proper that the sentiments of the North-west Territories in regard to this question should remain unexpressed. Since President Cleveland sent forth his message, I have received from every part of the North-west Territories letters asking me to see the Minister of Militia and endeavour to have arrangements made for the establishment of a volunteer and militia corps in the North-west Territories. This we should have but cannot have at present. I do not quite agree with all that fell from the lips of the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), much as I admire the magnificent speech which he contributed to this debate. There was one remark in it to which I feel obliged to take exception in particular. He said that Canada was a hostage on the part of England for her good behaviour to the United States, and that the choice lay between our being a hostage and being a bond of union between the United States and England. Sir, I do not wish, of course, to misrepresent the hon. gentleman but I apprehend that by his proposition he meant to imply that, in some way or other, at present, Canada is a hostage, and the comment of the hon. gentleman which followed, namely, that from the Atlantic to the Rockies, Canada was the most defenceless country on the face of the globe, showed that, in his opinion, Canada was to-day, to some extent, a hostage to the United States on the part of England. Now, I do not subscribe to the view that Canada is any source of weakness whatever to England or the Empire. On the contrary, I regard Canada at present as one of the strongest portions of the Imperial panoply of England. You have only, Sir, to fancy what the position of England would be if the preachments of twenty-five or thirty years ago of such men as Mr. Goldwin Smith had been listened to. Some twenty-five or thirty years ago, Mr. Goldwin Smith, and others, were preaching independence; but when they saw that that doctrine did not take with the people of the Dominion, they began to preach annexation. Suppose that either independence or annexation had taken place, and suppose President Cleveland had sent such a message as he sent a few weeks ago with regard to Venezuela, would Britain have been in the strong position she is to-day—strong by reason of the fact that she has on the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast the finest harbours in the world, and the greatest potentialities of war? So far from admitting, therefore, that Canada is a source of weakness, I believe that Canada is a source of strength to the Empire and contains within itself the possibility of far greater strength. It is this want of foresight, this inability to see what the future has in store, that is one of the main causes of the position which hon. gentlemen opposite have so long occupied. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) condemned with a sneer, and a deserved sneer, those paltry greengrocer statesmen at St. Stephen's who followed the great Chatham who created an Empire, but it is the same want of foresight, which these men exhibited, that is shown by hon. gentlemen opposite. They cannot tell what Canada is likely to become twenty or thirty years hence, or even less. I will, with the permission of the House, say a few words expressive of the feeling in the North-west. The people of the United States some twenty-five years ago were talking of manifest destiny. They had no idea then of what the North-west Territories and Manitoba were likely to become. They had no idea at the time, of what Manitoba was likely to be. But, Sir, they thought, and thought mistakenly, that the people of Canada were in favour of annexation. Time passed on and they found that there was no feeling of that kind. And now, Sir, I hope I shall not be misunderstood if I refer to a circumstance which occurred in Toronto some 22 years ago. At that time Dr. Tiffany came from the United States to Toronto and gave a lecture in Shaftesbury Hall on "The New Civilization." And what was this new civilization that was to enlighten the world, this new civilization at the feet of which old England was to sit, at the feet of which men who had in their veins the blood, and in their hearts and brains the traditions, of old England, were to sit? That civilization was the civilization of the United States. Sir, I yield to no man in my admiration of the United States; I yield to no man in my sympathy with the struggle that country has made. But, if I am to look at it from that point of view, I must compare that civilization with the civilization of other countries. I am driven to believe that, while that country has energy, while it has inventiveness, while it has 65 millions of dollar-getters and breeders of dollar-getters, it is lacking in many of the great qualities of civilization which have marked the progress of other countries. Now, Mr. Speaker, Dr. Tiffany heralded the immediate annexation of this country to the United States. The St. George's society waited upon a young man who was just then come to Toronto, who was not a Canadian and had then no intention of becoming a Canadian, and asked him to reply to this speech of Dr. Tiffany. The young man accepted that invitation and, in replying to Dr. Tiffany he made a quotation from John Stuart Mill, which I desire to give to this House. When men of the school of Bright and men of the school of Mill spoke in favour of the view that the colonies, the very moment they should express the desire for independence, should be allowed to go, it never entered their heads for one moment that the time would come, when all over the world wherever British colonies were, the sentiment of those colonies would be not a centrifugal but a centripetal force, not a desire to move away from the old motherland, but actually a desire to draw nearer to England, regarding the mother country with a passion of reverence and patriotism greater even than Englishmen have. A great man, a man born in India, has asked:

What should they know of England who only England know?

The poor little street-bred people who vapour and fume and brag,

They are lifting their heads in stillness to yelp at the English flag.

But that is not the sentiment all over the colonies; this is not the sentiment of the people of India. Their sentiment is more Imperial, as is the sentiment of Canada, than the sentiment of many parts even of England itself. Now, John Stuart Mill,—and I happened to have the honour, and it was one of the greatest honours of my life, to meet that gentleman,—thought, notwithstanding his extraordinary powers of thought and his extraordinary political insight, that the time would surely come when the colonies would want to leave the mother country. But still, he perceived the great advantages of the colonial relation, and this is what he said:

But though Great Britain could do perfectly well without the colonies, and though on every principle of morality and justice she ought to consent to their separation, should the time come when, after full trial of the best form of union, they deliberately desire to be dissuaded; there are strong reasons for maintaining the present slight bond of connection, so long as not disagreeable to the feelings of either party. It is a step, as far as it goes, towards universal peace, and general friendly co-operation among nations. It renders war impossible among a large number of otherwise independent communities; and, moreover, hinders any of them from being absorbed in a foreign state, and becoming a source of additional aggressive strength to some rival power, either more despotic or closer at hand, which might not always be so unambitious or so pacific as Great Britain. It at least keeps the markets of the different countries open to one another and prevents that mutual exclusion by hostile tariffs which none of the great communities of mankind, except England, have yet outgrown.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, sh.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, that is a splendid adumbration of the Imperial Zollverein that my hon. friends are in favour of.

And, in the case of the British possessions, it has the advantage, specially valuable at the present time, of adding to the moral influence and weight in the councils of the world of the power which, of all in existence, best understands liberty—and, whatever may have been its errors in the past, has attained to more of conscience and moral principle in its dealings with foreigners, than any other great nation seems either to conceive as possible, or recognize as desirable.

It is quite clear that the man who wrote that splendid paragraph, if he could have conceived of a time when the colonies would have the passionate Imperial patriotism that they have to-day, would have regarded it as a harbinger of a civilization greater than anything the history of the past can show. Well, Mr. Speaker, time passed away, and the Americans saw that the people of Ontario and the people of Quebec did not wish to join them. They found this true, not merely of the Anglo-Saxon—and, after all, that is an unphilosophical use of the term Anglo-Saxon? Why, Sir, does any one suppose that the Anglo-Saxon element is the largest element in Canada or the largest to-day in the British Empire? The Celtic element is just as large or larger. Here we have my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), who spoke so pregnantly and eloquently for the French Celts, and the leader of the Opposition, who spoke, as he usually does on occasions of this kind, with a mastery of his theme that it would be an impertinence on my part to eulogize. And we have my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane), who grew dithyrambic in his enthusiasm for the British flag—reminding me that he was one of a committee on the platform, some sixteen or seventeen years ago, when I spoke, in a theatre in Montreal, on the subject of "Ireland and the Empire." Well, as I say, time passed away, and we opened up the North-west Territories. A political reference has been made—I think not with the taste which usually characterizes my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I think that, considering the character of the two speeches that opened the debate, and others, it would have been better if that political reference had not been made. Without making any political reference, I will only state the historical fact that the Conservative party came into power and opened up the North-west and Manitoba. And since then what has happened? The waste lands of the United States, the lands opened there for settlement, are giving out. The American farmer is coming into the North-west under the immigration policy of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly.)

Mr. MCGREGOR. Politics.

Mr. DAVIN. I am not bringing in politics; I am only stating a historical fact. These men are coming into the North-west, and what has happened? We have had visits from General Sherman, we have had visits from leading statesmen belonging to the United States; we have had a visit from Mr. Thompson, a literary man, who has contributed an article to one of the American magazines. And what does he say? He says that we have in the North-west Territories a grander heritage of fruitful and arable lands than the United States ever had. And what has been the result? Covetousness in regard to the North-west Territories has begun to fire the breast of the people of the United States, and the fact is that when they talk of Venezuela, and when they talk hostilely in regard to any other geographical spot on the map of the world, the spot they are thinking of is Manitoba and the North-west Territories. These places they covet; these lands they need. But, Mr. Speaker, Canada's position is such to-day that with the potentialities of war and with the developed and inchoate material that we have on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, we in Manitoba and the North-west Territories would not fear one whit. The writer in the St. Paul paper who stated that Manitoba and the North-west Territories could easily have been gobbled up, would have been greatly surprised if he could have witnessed what took place in Winnipeg on 30th December last, when the mere mention of Canada standing shoulder to shoulder with England, come what might, ready as our fathers have been, to fight and to win, and if we could not win, to die, created an enthusiasm so great that this gentleman would have been convinced that for the United States to capture Manitoba and the North-west Territories would have been a bigger job than they ever dreamed of. Sir, a gentleman spoke at that meeting—if a reference to his speech may be allowed—though it may procure a narrow sneer, but I can bear a narrow sneer—who could have used the very language with which he concluded a little speech that he made twenty-two years ago, and the first he made in Canada. These are the words he used, if I may be allowed to read them, and they sound almost prophetic:

They evidently regard us as if we were but a chip on the outer circle of a whirlpool into whose vortex we must inevitably be sucked. They have made laws with the idea of coercing us. They have now learned their error, and know they had to deal with.

A spirit too delicate

To act their earthy and abhorred commands.

I am certain it would not be good for Canada, whose spirit and the laws of whose development are evidently British. No! There is no danger of annexation. March may wed September and time divorce regret, and the frost of January nip the flowers of June, but not a law of separation pass between us and the country of our great forefathers, in order that there should take place a marriage traitorous to our most valued and sacred traditions. Let the United States go on in their own course. We neither envy nor fear them. Let them flatter themselves with manifest destiny. But if they would hear the truth I can give them the result of nine months' critical experience. I know the loyalty of the noble people of this country; and I can tell our Republican friends here to-night that that day shall never come when scattered nations of British race, looking with loyal love from every compass to the little mother isle,—

Girt by the dim strait sea,

And multitudinous wall of wandering wave—and reposing, safe and glorious, in that sapphire embrace—will turn round to call on Canada to add her voice to swell the peal of filial gratulation, of proud assurance of co-operation, and, should need be, of help, and will turn in vain.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 47) respecting the Brandon and South-western Railway Company.—(Mr. Christie, for Mr. Davin.)

Bill (No. 48) respecting the Canadian Jockey Club.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 49) respecting the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company.—(Sir John Carling.)

Bill (No. 50) respecting the South-western Railway Company and the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company.—(Mr. Tisdale, for Mr. Bergeron.)

ADULTERATION OF FOOD, DRUGS, &c.
—(HONEY.)

The House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 10) further to amend the Act respecting the Adulteration of Food, Drugs, and Agricultural Fertilizers.—(Mr. Sproule.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. INNES. When this Bill was before the committee on a former occasion, I directed the attention of the committee to some remarks that I read, giving the opinion of a gentleman who is thoroughly versed on the subject, and who had made a life-long study of bee-keeping. His remarks were altogether in favour of the wholesomeness of honey made from granulated sugar. Of course, there are differences of opinion on that subject, as there are differences of opinion with regard to the qualities of honey. Some contend that honey, the product of sugar, is really not honey; others, again, maintain that it is. One authority which I have states that:

By the action of powerful salivary glands, and a secretion of formic acid, the nectar of flowers and the sweet of granulated sugar are changed by the bees from cane sugar to grape sugar. This transformation is one of great importance. Grape sugar is easy of digestion. Cane sugar is one of the most indigestible things in nature. The honey bee, among other good offices which it performs for the human world, transmutes the indigestible nectar of flowers into a digestible and luscious article of food.

That is one opinion with respect to the nature of this particular kind of honey, and the transformation it undergoes in process by the bees. Again, this authority says:

Honey is of various grades or qualities. There is that made from white clover and linden or basswood, which stands at the top of the market. There is that made from buckwheat, which is of inferior quality. There is the honey sometimes made from aphides, or honey-dew, which is worse than buckwheat honey. There is that quality of extracted honey which is thick, ripe, thoroughly evaporated, and will keep till doomsday. There is also a thin, watery, unripe kind, which has been rushed almost out of the mouths of the bees by the use of the extractor, and will turn sour inside of a month.

So we have very different kinds of honey, some good, some bad, and some very indifferent. However, as there is so much difference of opinion with respect to this matter, as this difference of opinion exists among the authorities, not only in Canada, but in the United States, I have not the slightest objection to one or two clauses of this Bill with respect to the prevention of the sale and prevention of exportation. I may be allowed to quote a sentence or two from authorities in the United States, showing that there is a wide difference of opinion even there, and they are hesitating whether legislation should be had on this subject or not. An authority says:

Even in the United States, not a single prominent bee journal dare open its columns to a discussion of it.

Again:

It is a pity this matter could not be discussed in a broad spirit, but I do not think that even

Mr. DAVIN.

you have a fair idea of the prejudice and wrath this subject has aroused.

Another authority says:

Over on our side we think the better course is to be quiet mostly on the sugar-honey question at present, but, if our enemies were so cantankerous as to try to get our legislatures to pass laws for simple purposes of persecution, then the case would be altered.

I have said that I do not object to the clause of the Bill with respect to preventing honey of the kind in question being offered for sale or for exportation, but hon. gentlemen will see towards the latter clause of the section that there is an infringement on the rights of individuals. The clause reads:

No imitation of honey, or sugar honey, so called, or other substitute for honey, shall be manufactured or produced or sold or offered for sale in Canada.

I would ask the committee why it is considered desirable to prevent the production of this kind of honey by individuals for their own use. According to this clause, its sale would be forbidden; not only so, but its production would be followed by a penalty in case the law was infringed. It seems to me that this is going too far in this direction, and I call the attention of the Government to it. I think they should modify the Bill in this respect. If the honey is not unwholesome or harmful—and nothing has been shown to prove that it is unwholesome and harmful—why should an individual be indicted for producing it for his own use? I would suggest that the clause be amended so as to read:

No imitation of honey, or sugar honey, so-called, or other substitute for honey shall be manufactured for sale, or offered for sale in Canada, or for exportation to foreign countries.

Mr. SPROULE. If the right to manufacture for their own use was allowed to bee-keepers, sugar-honey of this quality would be sold. I do not think any one would go to the trouble of manufacturing honey in that way for his own use, but it would be to make money out of it, because honey is rarely so scarce that it cannot be obtained at a very moderate price. I do not apprehend that any person would feed sugar to bees in summer when he can get flowers at hand, and thus produce honey in the regular way.

Mr. INNES. There are many seasons of the year when flowers are scarce, and so the bees are fed with sugar.

Mr. SPROULE. Flowers are never so scarce that those who keep bees cannot obtain them in sufficient quantities to secure an abundant crop of honey for any family, the year around.

Mr. McMILLAN. There are some seasons during which flowers are so scarce that it is impossible for bees to make honey.

Some of my neighbours keep a large number of hives, sixty or seventy, and last winter they had almost no honey. While I believe it is right to prevent individuals feeding sugar to bees and putting the product on the market, I hold that the clause should be amended so as to read "provided that this section shall not be interpreted or constructed to prevent sugar being fed to bees by the owners of bees, when it is for their own use." I believe it would be wrong to prevent any individual feeding sugar in a season like the last one, when it was difficult to obtain enough natural food to keep them alive. I am strongly in favour of preventing such honey being placed on the market and exported, but it would be a great hardship that the owner of a number of hives should be prevented from getting sufficient honey for his own use by feeding sugar to his bees.

Mr. SPROULE. Canadian honey sold last season for 8 cents per pound, and so it could not have been very scarce. The opinion of bee-keepers generally is that if each individual was allowed to feed sugar to his bees to manufacture honey for his own use, the present Bill might as well be dropped, because when a prosecution was attempted, and honey of the kind mentioned in the Bill was found in the bee-keeper's possession, he would set up as a defence that it was manufactured for his own use.

Mr. INNES. How are you going to prevent it? You would require a whole army of inspectors throughout the country.

Mr. SPROULE. Not necessarily. The inspector who examines apiaries would be sufficient for the work.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not seem to me that this Bill, as it stands, would be workable. The legislation proposed, at all events, goes very close to debatable ground. If it were established that honey made from bees that were fed from syrup or something of that kind was a deleterious article, I think the argument then would be very strong from the sanitary point of view that it should not be made. I acknowledge the strength of the argument made from this point of view, that honey is an article of manufacture, that honey-makers are anxious to obtain and maintain as good a reputation and name as possible, for Canadian honey, and it would be much better if nothing but the honey which is produced by natural process should be made. There is a good deal to be said on that side of the argument, especially with respect to maintaining our market for honey in the old country, but I think it will be very generally admitted that the honey made from feeding bees with syrup or sugar is not as good an article, is not as pure and not of as high a class as that made by bees, from natural flowers.

Mr. INNES. Still, it is very wholesome.

Mr. FOSTER. These two sets of arguments have weight, one against the other. But there is a good deal to be said if we try to eliminate the article of honey which is made from the artificial feeding of bees for sale. There is a good deal to be said in this way, that persons having hives, and when flowers are scarce, or for any other reason, making an inferior grade of honey, should have an opportunity of doing so. It is pretty stringent legislation to say to a man that he shall not manufacture, through his bees, an article of food which is not deleterious and which he does not propose to sell to any one, but to use in his own family. The argument which the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) uses against this is, that if you allow bee-keepers to make honey by using artificial food for bees, the makers have a basis of operation by means of which they will be able to put the product on the market. I think you can press this argument too far. You have in the first place, to make it illegal to offer for sale or to sell it, and you impose a penalty as strong and as high as you can, and that will certainly have the effect of preventing it being manufactured to any large extent for sale. I think you had better run the risk of a little of it being put on, or run the risk of making it a little more difficult to detect it, than to go so far as to say to a man, that he shall not manufacture artificial honey for his own use. I would strongly recommend my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) to change the latter section, and to insert something which would leave it possible for a man to make honey from artificial bee food for his own use, but which would not allow him to put it on the market under the same name as honey of the best grade. I would suggest that you should allow a man to make honey for his own use, but that you should prevent him offering it for sale as genuine honey. You could compel him to stamp it and mark it so as to show it was not made from the natural flower.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to say a word in reference to this Bill. Last year in the Niagara Peninsula, we were very much in the same position as mentioned by my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan), we had a scarcity of clover, and the result was that the bees instead of being fed honestly with sugar by the bee-keepers, wandered down to the vineyards, and I know from my own experience that they swept away nearly half of my vines. How will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) protect the buyer of honey, and distinguish between honey made from the grapes gathered by the bees, and honey made from good sugar supplied by the bee-keepers? I think it is far better that the suggestion of the Finance Minister should be carried out, and that when honey is put up either in casks or tins, it should be labelled, as made from sugar or not made from sugar, as the case may be. In my own village there is a bee-keeper, and he gives his personal guarantee on the label under his own signature, that all the honey he places on the market is not made from sugar. But in a season when there is a scarcity of flowers and clover, as we found on account of the dry weather last year, it would be far better that that man should be allowed to feed his bees on sugar, rather than lose them and so destroy an industry which is becoming important in our section of the country. I hope the suggestion of the Minister of Finance will be given effect to.

Mr. SPROULE. My information is that if you allow honey to be made at all in this objectionable way, the Act will be of little avail. A few years ago, a petition was presented to the United States Congress signed by over thirty thousand people, asking for a similar Act to this, and in that petition it was claimed that if the privilege of marking such a product as an adulteration or a substitute for honey, it would be of no use whatever. Although they have tried strongly to get such an Act as this passed in the United States they have not succeeded. An American work which I have in my possession upon this subject says: That it is a known fact, that the analysis of specimens of honey taken from all over the country shows, that in every single case the adulterated article was marked "pure honey." The only samples they found to contain pure honey, were those which were not so marked, and which were simply labelled "honey." You can see where designing people endeavoured to cover up their own misdoings by labelling the adulterated honey in a way to mislead the public. The amendment proposed by the Minister of Finance would not at all meet the case. If you give those persons the right to manufacture for their own use, you will do away with the best possible proof that you can have in a prosecution under the Act. If your inspector goes to the bee hive and finds there is a vessel containing the syrup from which the bees fill themselves and deposit it in the cells, it is prima facie evidence that that is placed there for the purpose of making it into sugar-honey, because it is there during the season of the year that it is not required for food. The very fact that the syrup was found there would be a violation of the law, and would subject the offender to punishment. If you allow the right to manufacture such artificial honey for private use, it will materially destroy the value of the Act. So far as I have been able to ascertain, and I have endeavoured to find out, there are only two prominent bee-keepers in Canada opposed to this measure. All the rest are united in favour of it. They have been asking for this Act for years. It is an important industry, out of which they make on an average $800,000 a year, and those engaged in it ask to be protected. When the butter-makers asked Parliament for a law to prohibit the manufacture of any substitute for butter, there were some members in this House who declared that artificial butter was as palatable as most of the butter made by the farmers. However, the Bill known as the Oleomargarine Act was passed, and it says:

No oleomargarine, butterine, or other substitute for butter, manufactured from any animal substance other than milk, shall be manufactured in Canada or sold therein; and every person who contravenes the provisions of this Act in any manner whatever, shall incur a penalty not exceeding $400, and not less than $200.

There we prohibited the manufacture or the offering for sale. Now, the bee-keepers say that that Act was effectual, because, since it has been on the statute-book, we have never had any reasonable ground for supposing that oleomargarine or butterine was manufactured in Canada, and the makers of butter have been greatly benefited. The bee-keepers ask the same protection for their industry; and they say that as their product is sold at a low price, at about 8 cents per pound, and is, therefore, within the reach of everybody, there is no need of imitations being placed upon the market. They have urged Parliament for years to give them this small protection for their industry, which they think would develop greatly if it had such protection, but which they believe without it will be ultimately destroyed.

Mr. FLINT. In my opinion the amendment is a great improvement on the original Bill: but the point I wish to make is this: I think Parliament has gone a great length in prohibiting absolutely the manufacture and sale of substances that are not in themselves deleterious or injurious to public health. I think the utmost length to which this committee should be asked to go would be to compel persons manufacturing and selling such articles to correctly indicate their character and quality by label. We know that when Parliament is asked to legislate in reference to an article on the ground that it is injurious to the public in ways which are pointed out by the advocates of the legislation proposed, a great deal of excitement is always occasioned, and hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are apt to argue that public liberty is restricted by legislation of that kind. Now, I think we are in this case going to a length which is dangerous. I see no reason why any person who manufactures an article which is not injurious to the health of any individual should not be permitted to manufacture and sell it, provided the nature of it is properly indicated to the public. I would go as far as any member of this committee to compel persons who manufacture substances in imitation of honey to properly label them, and to protect the manufacturers of honey produced by bees. However, the House having passed the principle of this measure, it is, perhaps, a little too late now to take exception to it. I only rise to protest against this species of legislation—the exercise of the powers of Parliament to create an offence, with enormous penalties, of what is in itself no offence and no injury to any individual in the state or to the state itself. If it is necessary to protect the genuine manufacturers of certain articles, and I admit that it is, then let that protection go only to the extent necessary for that purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose the amendment which I spoke of a little while ago, and with that amendment I would be disposed to support the Bill. On previous occasions I have had conferences with the bee-men, who are all anxious in this matter. Bee culture is a beautiful culture, and it may be made a very profitable branch of business in this country; and the bee-keepers allege that it is absolutely necessary to keep the reputation of their honey clear and distinct in the British market, where they are looking to establish a permanent market for it. I think we go a long way when we stamp as illegal the sale of artificial honey, but I think we should not go so far as to prevent persons manufacturing an article which is not injurious to health. Therefore, I think the case would be met by inserting in line 15, “manufactured or produced for sale, or sold or offered for sale in Canada.”

Mr. McNEILL. What is this going to be manufactured for if not for sale?

Mr. FOSTER. For a man's own use. This will put a stop to any one offering it for sale.

Mr. McNEILL. Might there not be a question of law involved as to whether honey which had some of this material mixed with it, would be a commodity that might be offered for sale under this Bill? I think we should take care that neither this thing itself, in its pure state, if you can call it pure, nor this material combined with pure honey, should be offered for sale. What we want to do is to prevent the adulteration of our honey and the destruction of the market for our honey; and if we do not guard against the danger of this article being mixed with honey, we shall not, I think, be advancing the interests of the bee-keepers.

Mr. MULOCK. Under the amendment of the Minister of Finance the offence is in offering for sale. If you would strike out the words, “manufactured or produced,” and let it read, “shall be offered for sale,” I think you would express the object of the amendment. Strike out those words, “manufactured or produced,” and let it read, “shall be offered for sale.” There is no use in inquiring as to a man's motive in manufacturing or producing. The offence is in offering for sale.

Mr. SPROULE. If you did that you might as well not pass the law at all.

Mr. LISTER. It seems to me that, under section 21a, there will be about as much difficulty in obtaining a conviction as there was under the old Combine Bill. The first portion of the section prohibits the feeding to bees of sugar, glucose, or any other sweet substance other than what they gather from natural sources, but, at the end of the section, there is the proviso that this section shall not be interpreted or construed to prevent the giving of sugar in any form to bees to become consumed by them as food. I do not see how you can ever obtain a conviction under this section. If you charge a man with having fed his bees on sugar or other sweet substance other than what is gathered from the natural flowers, with the intent that such substance shall be used by the bees in the making of honey, he will simply reply that he gave them the sugar to be consumed by them as food.

Mr. SPROULE. They never require to have sugar in the time when the flowers are in bloom.

Mr. LISTER. There might be a scarcity of flowers. Last year the clover was very scarce, and there might possibly be a scarcity of the natural sources, so that sugar would have to be used. Then, suppose the bees were fed on one-half sugar, and the other half they got from the flowers, would the owner be liable under this Act? This Bill does not protect the bee interests of the country at all. The remark of the Minister of Finance, I think, was a reasonable one, and that was that the moment you begin to prohibit the manufacture of a thing which is not in itself unhealthy, and which the community have a right to use, you are going a long way in the wrong direction. It is not pretended by any one that honey made from sugar is injurious, so that if the honey manufactured from natural sources is branded so as to inform the public that what they are buying is honey from the flower, that ought to be sufficient for the bee people. If honey be not so branded, the people will know that it was manufactured by the bees out of sugar or glucose, and they will know what they are paying for.

Mr. McNEILL. I would suggest, in order to meet the objection of my hon. friend, that the words of the last proviso be altered to “to be consumed by them for the purpose of food only.”

Mr. LISTER. That would not get over the difficulty.

Mr. McNEILL. What is the difficulty? If the sugar be given for the purposes of food only, no one will object, no matter what time it may be given. There may be times of the year, even in the summer, there may be peculiar seasons when the bees may require some assistance in the way of artificial food, and in that case these words will cover such contingencies.

Mr. INNES. Where will you draw the line, and who will be the judge?

Mr. McNEILL. It will be drawn by the evidence. As a rule, it will be known very well that it is altogether unnecessary to give sugar for the purposes of food in the summer time.

Mr. INNES. There may be summers when it would be necessary.

Mr. McNEILL. Very strong evidence would have to be produced to prove this.

Mr. FLINT. What the hon. gentleman seems to be aiming at by his Bill is a very simple thing. It is, that no one should attempt to palm off on the public as pure honey something which is not pure honey, made in the ordinary way by bees. We have a clause here under which the feeding of bees on certain articles can be called the adulteration of honey, and somebody must be punished, nobody knows how, for this new offence. It is a most absurd piece of legislation. A very simple clause, which any legal gentleman could draw in five minutes, would accomplish what is desired. What is desired is that no person in Canada shall put upon the market as pure honey what is not pure honey. Let the committee rise, and then let us have an amendment providing, in as few words as possible, for the accomplishment of that result. As has been pointed out by hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister), no one could be convicted under this clause. The clause is absurd, both legally and logically, and will not accomplish what the hon. gentleman desires. The House is going at an extent which would not be tolerated on most subjects of legislation. Let us confine ourselves strictly to what we are asked to do. Let us say that a certain punishment shall be meted out to those who label as pure honey any article containing that which is not pure honey, and offer it for sale, allowing those who wish to do so to make an article resembling honey which is not injurious to anybody if it is honestly labelled, just as we do with certain proprietary compounds that are sold throughout the country. If necessary, let the articles of which the compound is made be stated on the label.

Mr. SPROULE. What the hon. gentleman regards as so absurd is already the law with regard to the adulteration of food generally. The law specifies two classes of adulteration, those that are injurious to health, and those that are not injurious, but one is as clearly prohibited as the other. The law says:

No person shall manufacture, expose or offer for sale any food product or agricultural fertilizer which is adulterated within the meaning of this Act.

Then it goes on to provide that whether the adulterant is injurious to health or not, the person making the adulteration shall be punished. So that this Bill, if it passes, will not be so totally absurd as the hon. gentleman seems to think. This Bill was drafted by one of the ablest lawyers in the western section, from which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) comes. I am sure from the reputation of the gentleman that he would not allow anything to pass through his hands unless it contained good common sense, and was likely to be effectual in attaining the object sought after. The hon. member for Lambton asks how we could prosecute, as it may be necessary to feed bees in the summer. My information is that it is only during the seasons of the year when there is an absence of honey that you require to feed bees sugar syrup, in order to keep them alive. Even when there seems to be few flowers, they will find food to sustain themselves. Therefore, if the inspector, on his rounds in the summer, finds sugar-syrup exposed in a bee-hive, he will know that it is not for the purpose of keeping the bees alive. But if, in the winter, or spring, or fall, he finds a bee-keeper feeding his bees, he will know that, owing to the absence of the food necessary to keep them alive, such means of feeding are necessary. The analyst can distinguish between the product which is the result of feeding the bees sugar-syrup, and that gathered by the bees from the flowers. Mr. Macfarlane tells me that there is no difficulty in determining this fact. He says that, although they have made no regular analysis of honey upon which they have sent out bulletins, they intend to do so, and that there is no difficulty in distinguishing between the honey made by bees fed on sugar-syrup, and the honey collected from the natural sources. This Bill goes no further in relation to honey than the general Bill goes in regard to the adulteration of other food: and I think it is not unreasonable to ask the House to pass the measure as it is.

Mr. GIBSON. There is one point, it seems to me, that has escaped the attention of the committee. I do not anticipate so much harm from the manner in which the bees are fed as I do from the adulteration of the honey after it has been extracted from the comb.

Mr. FOSTER. That will come under the general Act.

Mr. GIBSON. This is how the difficulty arises: Dishonest honey dealers who wish to sell their honey at prices a cent or two cheaper than their neighbours are selling at, buy refined sugar for a few cents a pound, boil it down, and add it to their honey, and sell the mixture from 12 to 15 cents per pound. If the proposer of the Bill will accept the advice of the Minister of Finance and prohibit the labelling as pure honey of that which is not pure, the main difficulty will be met, which is in the adulteration of the honey in the liquid state, as the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill knows. The hon. gentleman might as well object to feeding the bees on buckwheat or anything else. The bees will take whatever kind of food they can get. As I stated, they cleared a large portion of the crop of the vineyards in the Niagara district last year on account of the lack of buckwheat, clover, and other flowers. This is the first time I have ever heard that feeding bees on any kind of saccharine matter in order to save them made worse honey than that which is made up from the saccharine matter taken from the flowers, the buckwheat or the grapes. The whole difficulty of adulteration, I believe, lies in the adulteration which is made in the honey in its liquid state.

Mr. SPROULE. Evidently the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, knows nothing of the difficulties the bee-keepers have to contend with. The general Act provides against the adulteration referred to by the hon. gentleman. But the other form of adulteration is growing. It is very common in the United States; it was practised more than twenty years ago, and is being done more largely every year. This practice is destroying the reputation of all the honey that is collected.

Bill, as amended, reported.

THE RATE OF INTEREST.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Mulock for second reading of Bill (No. 8) respecting interest.

Mr. COCKBURN. I should like to say a few words upon this Bill before any further steps are taken. I must say I am rather astonished that a Bill of this character should emanate from a gentleman so thoroughly conversant with mercantile transactions as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), a gentleman who is the able president of the Farmers' Loan Company, and who has managed with great ability, various trust estates that have been placed in his hands. I think, Sir, that whatever reasons there may be for fixing by statute the rate of interest to be paid when no rate has been agreed upon between the parties, no rate should be fixed which would offer any inducement to the party borrowing to make default in one payment of his obligation. Any statute that would have that effect, would be greatly detrimental to the best interests of the public. Now, with the exception of loans upon the security of real estate, and upon stocks and debentures which are immediately convertible into cash, my hon. friend must be aware that the prevailing interest is 6 per cent, and that in all commercial transactions of the best character, that rate is the rate which is now charged. If this proposition were made into law so that in case of default only 4 per cent could be charged, a direct inducement would be held out to the borrower to delay or postpone, by every means in his power, the day of payment; he would thus be making the difference between 4 per cent and 6 per cent on the loan. I may be told, of course, that it is quite possible for the lender to insert such terms in the loan as to secure himself for the full 6 per cent. after default. But there are numerous cases in which no stipulation is thought of, and it would affect injuriously the borrower himself were such an enactment as is here proposed passed into law. The effect would be that in the majority of cases, not only would the object of this Bill be defeated, for lenders would, by their contracts, provide for payment of interest after default at a higher rate than the statutory rate; but a serious injury would be inflicted upon the commercial public. If the lender did not provide in the contract for the higher rate of interest, in case of default the tendency on the part of the borrower in most cases would naturally be to press for payment immediately when the obligation became due. This might be very inconvenient to the person who had borrowed money, but the lender would be placed in the advantageous position of being able, in the exigencies of the case, probably to force a higher rate of interest from the borrower than 6 per cent, which we think to be the present regular commercial interest in commercial transactions. Then, Sir, if this proposition of the hon. gentleman were made law, another trouble would arise. We would be placed in this most peculiar position, that we should be lending money in Canada at 4 per cent as if we were the wealthiest country in the world, while in the States immediately to the south of us, in New York state, for instance, the legal rate of interest is 6 per cent. I may say that in twenty-eight states, out of the fifty states and territories in the United States, the rate of interest, where no special rate has been agreed upon, is 6 per cent; and in twenty-two of those states the rate runs from 7 to 10 per cent.

Mr. LISTER. That is the usurers' paradise.

Mr. COCKBURN. Well, I may tell the hon. gentleman that I do not consider that the twenty-six states in the union are controlled by usurers. I repeat that in the United States there are twenty-eight states and territories where the legal rate of interest is 6 per cent, and in twenty-two of them, it runs from 7 to 10 per cent, according to the risks, and no man can effectually make it more or less by law. Eventually there would means be found of evading any attempt of this kind to fix the price of an article which is variable.

Mr. LISTER. The National Policy has tried to do so.

Mr. COCKBURN. The National Policy has done a great deal for the country, and my hon. friend seems to be so enamoured with the results of it, that he even wishes us to take into our hands the whole of the monetary transactions of the country, and deal with them. We already have savings banks, and other deposit banks under the charge of the Government; we have a Government Banking Act; but if it is the desire of the party opposite that we should take under our immediate care the whole of the monetary institutions of the country, I dare say the Government, in its wisdom, may consult with my friend, and deliberate as to how his wishes can be best effected. However, I want to draw attention to the fact that in twenty-eight states of the union the legal rate of interest is only 6 per cent; and in twenty-two of them it is from 7 to 10 per cent. In only two states of the union, Louisiana and Illinois, the rate is 5 per cent, but as usury laws prevail there, the example is not one which we can, under the circumstances, safely follow. When we consider what is ordinarily paid to a depositor for his money by those going to loan out that same money, when we reflect that the depositor usually gets from 3 per cent to 3½ per cent, I think that when my hon. friend tries to fix the rate at an additional ½ per cent, which has to cover all the risk, with the expenses attending the management of it, he is undertaking a risk which I am sure I am safe in saying he has never ventured to undertake, either in the loan company which he so ably controls, nor has he ever undertaken such a risk in the disposition of those funds of which he has charge as trustee. This effect, I think, must inevitably follow—perhaps that may have been an idea in the mind of my hon. friend—the effect must be to raise the price of money to the poor man. Of course, if 4 per cent is to be the rate, we cannot expect that the capital which can find ready employment at 6 per cent, 7 per cent, 8 per cent and 9 per cent, is going to find its way into Canada. There will be a gradual withdrawal of that capital to England and elsewhere, so that the amount of capital left on hand would be smaller, while the number of those who want to borrow it will remain the same. The inevitable result would be to force up the rate of interest still higher than it has ever been. The supply will be cut off, because there will be no inducement to the Englishman to put his money here, and my hon. friend who may now be contented with 6 per cent on his mortgages, would be netting 7, 8 or 9 per cent.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose you are aware that we have so much money in the country that a great deal of it is sent out of Canada for investment.

Mr. COCKBURN. Where is it sent?

Mr. MULOCK. New York, principally.

Mr. COCKBURN. In New York the rates are higher, so that if this law were to pass it would drain still more largely the country of money, which would be sent to New York. I am obliged to my hon. friend for the suggestion, it illustrates the very fact I am pointing out.

Mr. COCKBURN.

Mr. MULOCK. Surely the hon. gentleman, as a banker, knows better than what he is saying now.

Mr. COCKBURN. I know perfectly well what I am saying. Perhaps the object of my hon. friend's Bill is not so much to raise the price of money, as to manufacture farmers' votes.

Mr. MULOCK. That is a piece of impertinence.

Mr. COCKBURN. I wish also to point out to the House that in England, which has had an experience of centuries, which is the money market of the world, to which we all look as the guiding star in commercial matters, while the rate of discount for commercial paper may have been less than 1 per cent for the twelve months, the legal rate of interest established in the courts on money in default is 5 per cent. Surely the hon. member is not going to hold out a premium to a man not to meet his legal obligation and to remunerate the borrower for a breach of contract. If a man has borrowed from you $10,000 at 6 per cent and you have made no arrangement with him as to the rate of interest in case of default, you do not wish him to be in a position of trying to keep you out of your money because he is going to make $200 on it by paying you 4 per cent instead of 6. I think that when the House has fully considered this matter—and I cannot help thinking that my hon. friend, with his long experience, will himself be convinced—it will arrive at the conclusion that apart from the little advantage that is going to be gained perhaps among the farming community during election time, there is nothing to be gained for the benefit of this country by passing such a proposal as that made.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House has referred to the Act relating to interest passed many years ago, when the farmers were obliged to pay from 10 to 20 per cent on mortgages. But money has come down to 5 and 5½ per cent.

Mr. COCKBURN. No.

Mr. LISTER. Any quantity can be obtained over the country at 5½ per cent.

Mr. COCKBURN. That is on mortgage.

Mr. LISTER. Money has come down from 10 and 20 per cent to, say, 6 per cent. The statute which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) proposes to amend is a statute passed when high rates of interest prevailed many years ago. During all these years no attempts whatever have been made to reduce the rate of interest. No man will say that 6 per cent was an unreasonable rate when people who went to the banks to borrow money would have to pay 10 per cent exchange and on mortgage from 10 to 15 per cent. Six per cent was then not unreasonable when no contract was made between the parties. It was in the interest, then, of the borrower to allow the loan to go on, if no rate of interest was fixed. It was the interest of the lender to exact payment because he could get a higher rate than the law provided he should receive in the absence of a contract. But the position has altogether changed since that time. Money can be obtained on good security at 5 per cent; it can be obtained from the banks at $5\frac{1}{2}$ to 6 per cent if the security is good. Then upon what principle should we retain the legal rate of interest which in the absence of a contract was fixed at 6 per cent, when money can now be borrowed at a lower rate than 6 per cent? The dire calamity which the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) mentioned, that English capitalists would draw their money out of Canada, that money would become scarce here, and the rate of interest would surely advance, might occur under different conditions from those which the Bill would bring about. Capital will go to whatever place will pay the largest return, either to the United States or South America or elsewhere; and if our people will not give 4 or 5 per cent, capital will be withdrawn from Canada and seek investment at a higher rate than can be obtained here. But the hon. gentleman does not profess by this Bill to limit the rate of interest, to restrict the right of the individual to contract as to the rate to be paid. All it provides is, that where no contract exists as to rate of interest, then the rate shall be 4 instead of 6 per cent. So the hon. gentleman is drawing on his imagination when he pictures to the House the lamentable condition of affairs that would follow the passing of this Bill, the withdrawal of capital from Canada and the consequent increase in the rate of interest. Money is like wheat or any other commodity; a chunk of gold will bring what the necessities of the case demand; if plentiful, it will be low, if scarce, high. So interest, like every other commodity, depends upon the scarcity or abundance of money.

Mr. COCKBURN. Will the hon. gentleman explain how mercantile paper is frequently discounted at a fraction of 1 per cent per annum, and seldom reaches the rate allowed by the courts when the parties have not agreed upon it, the rate so allowed (5 per cent) largely exceeding the average rate upon mercantile transactions. That is in England.

Mr. MULOCK. Everything in England is under the control of capital.

Mr. LISTER. It does not follow that where the statute law provides that in the absence of contract there should be a certain rate of interest paid, the volume of business is affected, but only the man who allows an overdue note to remain in that condition. If the legal rate is 4 per cent, and he can obtain 6 per cent, he will say to the maker of the note that he must pay up the note. It has no influence whatever upon the volume of the money in the country, and it cannot affect the credit of the country whether it be 1 per cent or 2 per cent, or if the law provided it should be nothing at all. As I pointed out to my hon. friend, the statute does not interfere with the contracting rights of individuals, and nearly every contract for the payment of money fixes the rate of interest to be paid. If the loan is by a bank, the discount is taken off at the time the money is advanced. It is covered on the face of the note, and all the bank would be entitled to recover would be the 6 per cent after the maturity of the note. I need not tell my hon. friend (Mr. Cockburn), who is a banker, that banks are not in the habit of allowing overdue paper to remain in the bank any longer than they can help.

Mr. COCKBURN. Let me ask my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) whether you would not force the bank to deal harshly with a man in that case, and whether it would not be in his interest to be in default instead of honestly keeping to his obligations.

Mr. LISTER. The bank will make every individual whose note it holds pay up; no matter whether the interest is 8 per cent or 9 per cent. If the borrowers allow their overdue paper to remain, their credit is destroyed, and it is not business anyway. Besides all that, the conditions can be made on a promissory note that after maturity it should bear interest at 7 per cent or 8 per cent, or whatever may be provided. It all comes within the contract, and the contract can be made by the bank. So long as the statute does not interfere with the right to contract, no injury can be done to any person. It cannot affect our credit in England. It cannot attract money here from England or from any other country, to say that because the rate is 6 per cent in Canada where there is no contract English money will find its way into this country. This Bill is in the interest of the community at large, and in view of the fact that the rate of interest has come down from 10 and 15 per cent to 5 and $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, we should reduce the rate of interest chargeable upon overdue paper, so as to conform with the reduced rate. I can see no objection to the Bill. On the contrary, I can see everything in favour of it. Nobody can be injured, because money is not worth more than 4 per cent, for that is all an individual can get for it. A man has money to pay his note, and, if he takes it to a bank, or to a loan company, the highest rate of interest he can get would be 4 per cent on deposit. I do not think you should exact from the people of the country more than they could get from our financial institutions for their money on deposit. I shall certainly support the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no doubt the object of the Bill is a good one, if we could carry it; but this Bill will not reach cases where the hardship is most felt in questions of interest. It is not because people are compelled to pay 6 per cent that it is such a great hardship, but the trouble is when they are compelled to pay 8, or 10, or 12, or even 20 per cent, as is the case in many parts of the country to-day. If the hon. gentleman's Bill went so far as to prohibit that, I would willingly support it, even though he might fix the rate at 6 per cent—which is not considered unreasonable he would be doing great good towards those people who can least afford to pay a very high rate of interest. But, provided this Bill should become law, any sharp business man—and they are the men who always get the high rate of interest—or the banks, or the loan companies, can easily evade it by making a contract. They can make a contract and provide for any rate of interest, no matter how high, even though this Bill should pass, and, therefore, I say this provision does not prevent the evils which now exist. Those who would be benefited by the Bill are those who are indifferent and pay little attention to their business transactions, and they represent only a very small portion of the business community. I agree with the hon. gentleman, that the rate of interest is coming down all the time, and that 4 per cent might be fairly considered reasonable to-day. If we could make that the general rate for business transactions all through the country, then I would say that this legislation conferred a great boon upon the people. If the hon. gentleman does not go further than he proposes in this Bill, I am afraid that it will accomplish little or no good.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). If the argument of the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) is good for anything, it proves that the Act respecting Interest ought to be repealed. But he does not go that far. If Parliament takes the position that it ought to make a legal rate of interest, then Parliament ought to keep in touch with the times, and, if the rate of interest has a downward tendency, Parliament ought to fix the legal rate in harmony with that decline. That is all this Bill proposes to do, and, if it does that, then Parliament ought to accept its responsibility and make the legal rate in harmony with the ordinary commercial rate. If the Bill does not remove all the grievances that exist, under the present rules and laws with regard to interest, it does, at least, afford some measure of relief to people who are paying interest, and to that extent it should be supported by the House.

Mr. MARTIN. It seems to me that the hon. member (Mr. Mulock) has not gone far enough in this legislation, if he desires to have the rate of interest in cases of this kind fixed at 4 per cent, because he still leaves the law as it was with regard to interest upon judgment debts.

Mr. MULOCK. No.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. The Bill does not affect that in any way.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, it does.

Mr. MARTIN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The Bill says:

Whenever interest is payable by the agreement of parties or by law, and no rate is fixed by such agreement or law, the rate of interest shall be 4 per cent per annum.

The hon. gentleman has not altered the wording of the existing Act at all, except to change 6 per cent to 4 per cent. The effect of that has been determined by the courts in Manitoba, and, I think, in British Columbia. In Manitoba the rate of interest upon judgments is 4 per cent, in spite of the fact that that section applies to Manitoba. That is because our rate of interest upon judgments is determined by the English law that was introduced into Manitoba. The hon. gentleman will find that the rate of interest on judgments in Ontario is 6 per cent; not on account of the section 2 of the Interest Act, but on account of the fact that it was 6 per cent prior to confederation. That is the case in British Columbia also. In 1894, by chapter 22 of the Statutes of this Parliament, the Act respecting interest was amended with regard to British Columbia, so as to provide that the rate of interest upon judgment debts should be 6 per cent. We have then these differences in the different provinces. In British Columbia it is 6 per cent by express enactment of this Parliament; in Manitoba, 4 per cent, because there is nothing in the Interest Act which affects the question of interest upon judgments, and in Ontario it is 6 per cent, not because the Interest Act affects it, but because that was the law prior to confederation. If I am right with regard to this, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) reduces the rate of interest in case of agreement or by law to 4 per cent, then there would be a very considerable inducement, as the hon. gentleman for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) has suggested, for creditors to sue at once upon an over due liability which carries interest, in order to escape the law, by which they would only get 4 per cent, and take advantage of the other law by which on a judgment debt they would get 6 per cent. If this Bill is passed, it should be made to include judgment debts in all the provinces, and reduce the rate on judgments debts from 6 per cent to 4 per cent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is a legal one which I do not profess to enter into, but it seems to me that section 2 of the Bill would cover all debts.

Mr. MULOCK. It is easy enough to get over that point in committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, that could be easily arranged, if the principle of the Bill is adopted by this House. For my part, I would rather see the rate of interest fixed at 5 per cent than 4 per cent. I believe that the present rate should be reduced. The rate of interest was fixed at 6 per cent when money was quite freely going at from 10 to 12 per cent, but now the rate has come down very much. The city of Toronto has borrowed large sums of money at 3½ per cent, and I believe the city of Ottawa has floated its 3½ per cent debentures above par at 102 or 103. Gilt-edged mortgages can be obtained at 5 per cent or 4½ per cent. If a man wants to lend $1,000, and thinks he should have 6 per cent for it, this Bill does not prevent him getting that, if he states it in the contract. It is the duty of the man lending the money either to get the note renewed, or to see that the amount is paid, and I know that banks will never allow a note to run past due, if it can be collected at all. That would be a silly kind of banking. A bank manager always sees, when the day arrives, that the note is payed or renewed, as it should be. The only objection I have to the Bill is that I would like to see the rate fixed at 5 per cent, instead of 4 per cent.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I am disposed to agree with the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) in thinking that the present Bill is too radical a change. I do not know that we ought to make any change this session, because the matter is certainly a very important one. Undoubtedly the tendency of the rates of interest for the last two or three years has been downwards. As one hon. gentleman said, a borrower can get money on gilt-edged security on mortgage as low as 5 per cent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, at 4½.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I have not seen any mortgages going through at 4½. I have seen some go through at 5, and where the security is not first-class the rate is generally 6 per cent. But undoubtedly during the last five years there has been a decrease generally in the rates of interest, and I think it is a proper subject for the consideration of this Parliament whether the legal rate of interest should not be lowered. Speaking for myself and for those I represent, I would not be prepared to say definitely whether I ought to support or oppose this Bill in the long run; but at present I think it is too radical a measure to pass this session. There has been no expression of opinion in the country with regard to the subject, and without such an expression of opinion I think we ought not to pass so radical a measure. There is another subject which I think might well have been considered in connection with this; that is, the question whether we should limit the possibilities of contracts in relation to interest. In some of the states on the other side they have what they call laws against usury, which forbid even contracting above a certain rate. While I do not think the evil has grown to such an alarming extent in this country as it must have grown there to require legislation upon it, yet in my experience in dealing with cases coming before the courts, I have seen contracts in relation to interest which certainly ought to be stopped in some way. There is no doubt that advantage is often taken of the necessities of people in that respect. I do not think that is so much the case in mortgages on real estate as it is in chattel mortgages, and I think that possibly we ought to consider the question whether some limitation in that respect should not be imposed. But so far as the present Bill is concerned, while personally I am disposed to favour a reduction in the rate of interest, I do not think we ought to move hastily in the matter. It may be that before the next five years pass over the rates of interest may go up somewhat again.

Mr. LISTER. No, no.

Mr. COATSWORTH. It may be that the hon. member is right. I hope he is right.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The whole tendency is downwards.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Yes, it has been for a number of years, and I hope it is a permanent tendency. At the same time we ought not to be in any haste to pass a measure so radical in this sense, that it interferes with a condition that has existed for many years, that is well known throughout the country; and until we have some expression of opinion from the business community, the boards of trade, the banks and other interests, some of whom would of course be against any reduction in the rate of interest, I think we ought not to pass the Bill. While generally speaking, I am favourable to the lowering of the rate of interest, I would not like to see this Bill passed during the present session.

Mr. TISDALE. I agree with the proposition that it is desirable to lower the rate of interest, but I do not agree at all with the hon. gentleman that that can be done by legislation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are for free trade in money.

Mr. TISDALE. I am for free trade in money, and my reason is this. I want to see the interest as low as possible ; but I am perfectly convinced, and I think history proves conclusively that the way to get low interest is to keep money free. Any one who has lived many years in Canada will remember the contest which took place at the time the usury laws were abolished. Those laws had the effect of compelling the borrower to pay high rates of interest, and the rates have tended to go lower ever since. I cannot remember a single case in which a man was ever convicted of usury. There were extensive law suits brought with the view of taking advantage of the law then in force, but they were almost always unsuccessful. I can remember well when 10 or 12 per cent was more easily got for money than 5 or 6 per cent is to-day. I oppose this legislation on the broad principle that it is best for the borrower to leave money free. If you fix the rate of interest at 4 percent to-day, what will happen? Money cannot be borrowed at that rate, and the instant a note becomes due, if the maker of the note failed to meet it, he would be sued, and he would have to be sued, because he would not be able to borrow money to renew it at as low a rate as 4 per cent. We know that business men are very well satisfied indeed to get money at 6 per cent from the banks. The effect of this measure would be to punish the very men in whose interest it is avowedly introduced. I believe in lines that are practicable—on lines that can be successfully put in practice. I am prepared to say with the greatest confidence that a measure of this sort would be an injury to the very people whom it apparently proposes to assist. Hon. gentlemen who have had an opportunity of studying this matter in the light of experience will agree with me that the result of leaving money free in this country has been to bring millions of dollars from the old country, where money is plenty, to this country for investment ; and this movement has always tended to reduce the rates of interest. I agree with one remark which has been made. It is generally a good sign when the rates of money go up ; I mean the ordinary rates in business circles, because it indicates an activity in business. When money is low it is generally plentiful, because the state of business is such that it cannot find employment. While I would like, if possible, to reduce the rates paid by those who borrow on securities, I think it would be a step in the wrong direction to apply that principle to business transactions, as this Bill is designed to do, because the rate at which you can borrow money depends on the quantity of money in the market. With regard to borrowing from people who have money to lend and who live on the interest of it, the rate depends on the class of security and the plentifulness of money. There is no logic so convincing as the logic of events. On all lines I am strongly opposed to any attempt to interfere with the existing legal rate. I am satisfied that any attempt to alter it by legislation would simply make things worse for the man we would all like to see get the best of it, the man who pays the interest. Every man whose contract or note became due would not be able to borrow money unless at a higher rate.

Mr. LISTER. Why did not that deplorable condition of affairs happen when money was lending at twelve or fourteen per cent and the legal rate stood at six. People were not then forced to the wall.

Mr. TISDALE. The distinction is this : The borrower who did not borrow from the moneyed institutions, such as banks, which were quite ready to lend at the legal rate, but who had to borrow at commercial rates, had to pay these higher rates because of the existence of the usury laws. The danger of the transaction was so great that the lender charged higher rates for the risk.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have not had usury laws since fifty years.

Mr. LISTER. This is not a usury law. The usury law is dead.

Mr. TISDALE. But it is on the same lines. You use compulsion. You compel a lesser rate than the commercial borrowing rate. Take a simple illustration : A merchant sells goods to a man ; he must have credit. The merchant then, to carry on his business, has to borrow at a higher rate of interest from the bank than what he gets from his debtor.

Mr. LISTER. Then put the rate up to 8 per cent.

Mr. TISDALE. I believe in letting well alone. There is no desire for a lesser rate by those who desire not to get an advantage.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to say a word or two in reply to the first speech which the hon. gentleman addressed to the House. I think it only requires a moment's consideration to satisfy the House that the question of usury or free contracts with reference to interest is not involved in this Bill at all. The parties are free to make their own contract with regard to the rate of interest ; and with regard to the plentifulness or scarcity of money in the country, the question does not arise here at all. Then the hon. gentleman said that when the rate of interest was high the country was prosperous, and when low the country was not so prosperous, and he told us that where there is free trade in money the rate is always lower, because the money is more plentiful, and he is in favour of free trade in money. So that he must be in favour of a condition of things in which the country is not so prosperous. I am unable to reconcile the various propositions which the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has put forward. I do not think they can very well stand together. My impression is that when the great money centres of the world are making loans to nations about to engage or actually engage in war, the rate of interest will become high everywhere, and is likely to become high in Canada as well as elsewhere, and that we owe in part the very low rate which has prevailed for some time in this country—first, to the freedom of contract with reference to interest, which has caused money to flow here for the purpose of investment, but also very largely in consequence of the general peace which has existed throughout the world, especially in those countries which are the great money lending centres of the world. Now, I think that the only point involved in this measure is a very simple one, and that is, whether the rate of interest proposed to be fixed by this Bill is very much below the average rate of interest that prevails amongst parties whose credit is fairly good. I do not think that you should judge in this matter by comparison with cases of loans extending over a period of a long time, made by persons who may be advanced in years and with large sums to invest, who do not care to be troubled looking constantly after avenues of investment, and to whom a permanent investment is of more consequence than a very large rate of interest. You should look at the ordinary transactions of life, that occur with reference to the lending of moneys, to the accommodation given in banks and elsewhere, for the purpose of enabling a fair rate of interest where no rate of interest has been agreed upon. Now, there is this to be considered in fixing the rate under these circumstances: What will be the effect upon the man who is a debtor, where credit has been given, say by the retail merchant and by various parties from whom loans are affected? What will be the effect upon the relations which exist between the debtor and the creditor in these cases? My impression is, that, if you fix a rate of interest very much below the ordinary rate, one of two things happens. The merchant will charge more for his goods when he parts with them on credit, or, if he sells at a narrow margin, he will press for immediate payment or for some security upon which there shall be a higher rate of interest than you fix. The ordinary merchant goes to the bank and obtains credit, and he gives credit to his customers. If the bank compels him to pay a rate very much higher than that which he charges to his creditors on over-due bills, of course, he will insist upon the settlement of the account, or upon a note being given in which the rate of interest is fixed. So that while it may be that, as my hon. friend who moves this Bill has stated, that the present legal rate of interest, 6 per cent, is above the current rate of interest which is ordinarily charged, I am not at all sure that the rate he proposes is not too low, and that it will not lead to an immediate demand for the payment of all over-due bills and of due accounts, or for their settlement by bills or notes bearing a higher rate of interest than that named in this Bill. There are very many cases where men allow an amount to stand, between parties where the debtor is perfectly good, but is not prepared to make immediate payment, at the ordinary rate of 6 per cent, because he regards that as a fair charge. It seems to me, that the House, in dealing with these questions, ought to be certain, as near as may be, what is the current rate between the parties, and to see to it that the rate fixed is not higher than that. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. Campbell) has suggested 5 per cent. I am inclined to think that that is very near the right figure, and that, if you were to go very much beyond that, you would be charging the party more than he could obtain the money for upon his note, if his security is good; and, if you put it below that figure, you will compel a settlement by notes, or bills, or cash, where otherwise an inconvenience of that sort need not be incurred. The whole question here is not a question in reference to free trade, or in reference to usury; it is a question as to what is a fair compensation looking at the present abundance of money, to the party who, for the time being, is exercising his forbearance towards a debtor, in order that the business of the country may be carried on with as little inconvenience as possible. You do subject the parties, who may be perfectly upright and ready to trust each other, to a certain amount of inconvenience, if you fix the rate of interest so low as to force an actual settlement at every moment when an account becomes due.

Mr. FOSTER. The remarks of my hon. friend who has just sat down seem to me to get at about the kernel of this question. No doubt, since the rate was fixed at 6 per cent, there has been a considerable lowering in the general rate of money. The whole question for the House to consider is, first, whether any change is to take place; and second, whether 4 per cent is not too low in comparison with the general rate of interest. I am a little surprised to hear that money is loaned generally at so low a rate as 5 per cent. That is not my experience. And I think that we who come from the maritime provinces will be unanimous in saying that there is very much more loaned on mortgage in small sums at 7 per cent than at 5, and very little loaned at less than 6 per cent. There is a good deal to be thought of when you undertake arbitrarily by law to interfere with the rate of interest in the country. I am not going to discuss the question to-night, because I have a proposition to make to the House which, I think, will bring the matter into better shape; and that is, that, having had this discussion—in a rather thin House, I must say—the Bill be read the second time and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, which is one of the best committees of this House, and that the whole matter be taken into consideration there. I am impelled to make this suggestion all the more because I have received a large number of representations from business men, from loan societies and from the bankers' association, asking that they may be heard and putting some pretty strong objections, as I look at them, to the lowering of the rate to 4 per cent. These gentlemen might be heard by the Government, and the Government might make up its mind whether it would declare in favour of 4 or 5 per cent, or whether it would oppose the Bill altogether; but I think it would be much better that these gentlemen should have a chance to be heard before the Banking and Commerce Committee, and of laying the peculiarly business aspect of this question before that committee. The subject will be discussed there, and, probably—though I am not going to make a prophecy—it may be decided that, while there should be a lowering of the rate of interest, yet 4 per cent is too low a figure.

Mr. MULOCK. The suggestion of the Minister of Finance does not appear to me an unreasonable one. But, before assenting to it, I would like to make a few remarks in reference to some observations that have fallen from some hon. gentlemen in this discussion. Of course, it is unfortunate if one's motives for introducing legislation are impugned. But that is one of the consequences we have to face, and I will not make any further remark upon that point. There seems to be some misapprehension as to the meaning of the Bill, its extent and its object. It would be more fairly discussed if hon. gentlemen would speak to the text, instead of importing arguments based upon an imaginary state of affairs. This Bill proposes to deal with the matter of interest where persons have made an agreement to pay interest, but have not fixed the rate; also, to provide a rate of interest where interest is payable by law, and no rate has been stated. Now, let me say that the language of this Bill is the exact language of the Revised Statutes, with the exception of the word "four" in lieu of the word "six." Turning to the original statute, passed in 1858, section 5 is as follows:—

Six per cent per annum shall continue to be the rate of interest in all cases where, by the agreement of the parties or by law, interest is payable, and no rate has been fixed by the parties or by law.

That section was incorporated in the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, 1859, and has continued to be followed ever since. So that there is nothing novel in the language of this clause, the only change being to reduce the rate from 6 to 4 per cent. On that point, as has been suggested in the course of the debate, I concede there is scope for difference of opinion. But, at all events, it is a fair subject of debate and consideration whether the existing rate is not too high. Now, to what class of people will this apply? Let us illustrate. Let it apply to the case of over-due bills mentioned by my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). Commercial paper discounted, how is that to be drawn? As a rule, notes are drawn for a fixed sum of money without reference to interest whatever, and the interest is deducted by the banker by way of discount. Three months after date the promisor promises to pay $100, in some cases, "with interest," is added; in other cases, and in most cases, without; so that as to the great bulk of commercial paper, there is no reference whatever to the subject of interest. The agreement, therefore, is not that interest shall be paid upon that note, the agreement is to pay a fixed sum of money when the note is due. The court allows interest or not on overdue paper, as a matter of damages, and the matter is in the direction of the court. The great class of cases to which this will apply will be the cases of money owing upon mortgages. Farmers have been alluded to, and perhaps they are not altogether to blame if they are not able to pay their mortgages when due. Others, besides farmers, I am afraid, in great numbers, have mortgages upon their property. Mortgagors are not in the habit of paying their mortgages when due, as makers of notes are. Mortgages run on for years after they are overdue. In some cases the rate of interest entered into may have been a high rate at the time the contract was made, and there has been a great change before the mortgage fell due, still the mortgage continues as an overdue mortgage. Now, it would apply to a case like that. If a mortgage were entered into five years ago bearing 8 per cent interest, to-day it becomes due, and what rate should he pay to-day? Should he be compelled to continue to pay his 8 per cent, or should he get some amelioration, and if so, what? He has agreed to pay interest up to the end of five years, he has not stipulated what interest he is to pay afterwards. How much is he to pay?

Mr. TISDALE. They generally put a clause in the mortgage to compel him to pay the same rate.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not interfering with the right of contract.

Mr. TISDALE. Then your argument is no good.

Mr. MULOCK. Where they have agreed to pay interest, but have not stipulated the rate, then the rate is fixed by this statute. Now, the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) argues that the introduction of a change like this would be productive of great injury. In 1858 the current rate was nearly twice the legal rate, and a considerable difference continued from 1858 to the present time, a period of thirty-eight years. During the whole of that period, the current rate has been, we may say, in excess of the legal rate. Have any of those disastrous consequences followed which have been predicted in the case of this Bill becoming law? In 1858 the rate was fixed at 6 per cent, and that condition of affairs has existed up to the present time. Five years ago, the current rate of interest on the best securities was about 2 per cent above 6 per cent. During those five years did we hear of debtors being oppressed? Did we hear of lawyers going about stirring up litigation, and usurious men oppressing borrowers? I have not heard of any such experiences. And if, when there was that difference of, say 2 per cent, within the last few years, there were no serious consequences, what right have we to assume that to-day, with the current rate at 6 per cent, if we fix the legal rate at 4 per cent, there will be a different state of affairs from what happened before? We can imagine consequences, but we have got the absolute evidence to prove that nothing injurious will follow. Probably the only effect will be that the placing upon the statute-book of a lower rate of interest, will have an encouraging effect upon the market price of money, encouraging it downwards, and gradually inducing borrowers and lenders of money to look to 4 per cent as the standard rate, and gradually work down towards that rate.

Mr. McALISTER. Won't the demand for money regulate that?

Mr. MULLOCK. The demand will have its influence, various causes will have an influence, but the public mind has to be educated, and men who have money to lend are influenced by various circumstances. The fact that there is a fixed rate by law, is accepted by many persons as a reasonable rate in itself, and the moment one man recognizes a fixed rate as a reasonable rate to adopt, and adopts it, others will follow suit; and so by voluntary agreement, by free trade, we find the rate coming down to the rate fixed by law. Therefore, I think the measure is in the right direction. I see no force whatever in the argument that because banks choose to pay a certain rate of interest on deposits, therefore, this rate of interest should be in excess of the rate allowed on deposits. There is no connection whatever between the two circumstances. The banks lend vast sums of money in excess of what they receive on deposit, banks have great privileges. But I do not think that our law is to be wholly controlled by regard to the banks, although we ought to have a very great regard too for them. At the same time we must not lose sight of the fact that there is a large borrowing class, and I have not heard any argument whatever on their behalf. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) is acting in their behalf when he pronounces against this measure.

Mr. COCKBURN. I have no interest whatever to promote, except the interests of the country; I have not the interests of the farmers or of any other class.

Mr. MULLOCK. No one would suspect that in this case the hon. gentleman was seeking the support of the farmers; certainly he has not sought to advance their interests by his remarks on this measure.

Mr. MACLEAN. What about the Patrons?

Mr. MULLOCK. The hon. gentleman for East Toronto said he had not heard of any agitation for this measure. I have read during the last two or three years, in organs representing the farming community, articles in the direction of this measure, and I submit it is one demanded by a large section of the public and that it will be in the interest of the public—that it will be injurious to none, and beneficial to all. If there is any question as to the side upon which legislation ought to lean, it ought to be, I think, on the side of those most in need of protection, most in need of amelioration of their condition.

Mr. FOSTER. You alighted on an unfortunate word.

Mr. MULLOCK. Protection from oppression. If it was a matter of a philanthropic character between two classes, my leanings would be towards the weaker, and I think, as a rule, those in debt are more in need of consideration than are the creditors. However, that is not the principle on which we are to legislate altogether; at the same time, many of the arguments advanced have been adduced by hon. members who have taken a limited view of the question. I have no objection to the Bill going to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, but I hope that will not be the end of it for this session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 6th February, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 55) further to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is an adaptation of the Act passed at the last session of the English Parliament, entitled an Act to amend the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act. In short, it makes an illegal and corrupt act the publication of any false statement in relation to the personal character or conduct of either of the candidates during an election without reasonable cause. While I ventured to introduce the Bill, my purpose was not to press it upon the House, even if opportunity permitted. But, as we have legislated in line with the larger part of the election laws of Great Britain, it occurred to me that this measure would be well worthy of the consideration of the Government. I have ventured, therefore, to ask leave to introduce this Bill, so that the Government might, before the session is ended, observe the principle of it, and consider whether it might not be probably taken up and made a part of the law of the land.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the penalty ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It makes the offence a corrupt act under the election law, which would affect the election just as any other corrupt act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MONTMAGNY VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked :

What was the total cost of the preparation of the voters' lists, in 1894, for the electoral district of Montmagny ? What was the total amount paid to A. C. Darveau, Esq., revising officer, for salary and emoluments for the preparing of the said lists ?

Mr. FOSTER. By reference to pages J 25, J 29 and J 31 of the report of the Auditor General for 1894-95, the answer to the hon. gentleman's question may be found, the total cost of the revision being $711.41.

PUBLIC BUILDING—PICTON.

Mr. DAWSON asked :

On what street (giving numbers of the lots or other description of the land obtained) in the town of Picton, is the new site, which is said to be more desirable than the Carter site for the proposed public building ?

Mr. MULOCK.

2. Has the said new site been purchased yet ? If so, from whom ? When, and at what price ? If not, name of present owner, and price asked ?

3. How will the Government dispose of the Carter site ?

Mr. OUMET. On the north side of Main Street, between Ross and Elizabeth Streets, adjoining the Standard Bank building—opposite the present post office—(part of lot 265). In answer to the second question, no. Owner's name is David J. Barker : price asked, $4,000. In answer to the third question, by sale for the price paid for it.

ORDER IN COUNCIL RE SHIPPING UNITED STATES CATTLE.

Mr. CASEY asked :

1. Is the Honourable Minister of Agriculture aware that a copy of an Order in Council concerning the shipping of United States cattle from a Canadian port was published in some of the morning newspapers of Friday, 24th January ?

2. Has the Honourable Minister since heard that the said Order in Council was given to the press by the Premier, and when did he hear it ?

3. Has he since heard that said Order in Council was communicated to and approved and signed by His Excellency before it was given to the press, and when did he hear it ?

4. Are the statements referred to in the last two questions correct ?

5. If so, how did it happen that he knew nothing whatever about such dealing with an Order in Council specially concerning his own department ?

6. Does he still think the course he took then was the correct one under the circumstances, in not producing the Order in the House when asked for ?

7. Does he still feel that the resentment of the honourable gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) because the order was given to the press, is joined in most heartily by himself ?

8. Is he still astounded, and pained, and humiliated, that the said Order in Council was not given to the House before it was given to the press ?

Mr. FOSTER. Stand.

Mr. CASEY. Has the hon. Minister any idea when the Minister of Agriculture will be here.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not.

Question allowed to stand at the request of the Government.

NEWFOUNDLAND BAIT ACT.

Mr. KAULBACH asked :

As the amount of refund has been recovered in the courts and paid over to the Dominion Government on the action taken against the Government of Newfoundland for money collected from Canadian fishermen for licenses under the Newfoundland Bait Act of 1890, when will the sums due the respective claimants be paid to them ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The answer given to a similar question will be found in "Hansard" No. 14, 27th January, 1896, pages 679-680. The latter portion of which intimated that the distribution might be expected at an early date.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Who is the engineer that made an examination of the breakwater at Tignish, Prince Edward Island, during the season of 1895? What is the date of inspection?

Mr. OUIMET. J. B. Hegan, July 25th and 26th, 1895.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Is it the intention of the Minister of Public Works to take steps for the immediate repair of the breakwater at Tignish, Prince Edward Island?

Mr. OUIMET. It is the intention of the department to make such repairs as soon as the necessary money for that purpose is at the disposal of the department.

CASCUMPEC HARBOUR.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to cause further blasting of rock in Cascumpec Harbour, Prince Edward Island, during the coming season, with a view of improving navigation in said harbour?

Mr. OUIMET. It is not the intention of the department to cause further blasting of rock in Cascumpec Harbour during the coming season.

McKIE'S PIER, P.E.I.

Mr. YEO asked :

What amount has been expended on McKie's Pier, Egmont Bay, Prince county, Prince Edward Island, during the past year? Was the work done by public contract? If not, under whose supervision was the work performed?

What depth of water is at the outer end of said pier?

Is the work completed, or is it the intention to extend it during the present year?

Is it the intention to dredge the channel leading to this pier during the coming season?

Mr. OUIMET. The sum of $1,395.19 was expended on McKie's (McGie's) pier during the past year. The work was done by day labour under the supervision of Gilbert Perry, foreman, directed by Mr. J. B. Hegan, the resident engineer. The depth of water is two feet six inches at low water, spring tide, and seven feet at high water, spring tide. The pier is reported by the resident engineer to be in good serviceable condition, and it is not the intention to extend it during the present year. It has not yet been decided whether the channel leading to the pier will be dredged during next season.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— REPLY TO ADDRESS.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I thank you for the loyal Address which you have voted in reply to the Speech with which I opened the session. I am gratified to receive your assurances that the matters which may come before you will have your earnest consideration.

Government House,

Ottawa, 6th February, 1896.

CANADIAN DEFENCES.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I beg to ask the Government what foundation there is for the statement which appears in the newspapers this morning, that the Imperial Government were to assist the Canadian Government in the construction of defences, by advancing to them the necessary money for the purpose? Has any communication taken place? And if so, what is the character of that communication?

Mr. FOSTER. I know nothing of it except what the hon. gentleman has seen. It appears to be a newspaper rumour.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Railways and Canals.—(Mr. Haggart.)

CANADIAN MILITIA.

Mr. MULOCK. I would inquire of the Government when they propose to take the House and country into their confidence with regard to the provision for an increased militia defence. It was intimated in the Address and subsequently that the proposed expenditure on militia and defence would be too large to admit of its being provided for out of the annual grant, from which one must assume that a considerable vote is going to be asked for. To-day we have had a deputation from Toronto presenting a petition.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman is not going to enter into a discussion of this matter.

Mr. MULOCK. Not at all. I merely wish to say that this deputation has asked for expenditure in this direction, and it is probable that similar requests will come from other parts of the Dominion, and it seems to me that the policy and the proposed scheme of the Government ought to be before the House and country at a very early day.

Mr. FOSTER. All I can say is that the Government will use all diligence in bringing down this measure as well as some others.

RETURNS TO ADDRESSES.

Mr. CASEY. When will the return to the Address moved for by myself some time ago for the Order in Council and other documents relating to the appointment of a High Commissioner in London, be laid before the House? I notice that one of the returns laid on the Table is in answer to an Order I moved for last session. If similar delay is to take place in this instance, the papers will not be of much use, and it is important that we should have them, in view of the discussion which must take place in the near future.

Mr. OUMET. I have taken a note of the hon. gentleman's request, and will see that the papers are brought down.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAITS.

Mr. PERRY. The hon. gentleman promised to lay before Parliament a map of the borings in Northumberland Strait.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall endeavour to stop this boring as soon as possible by finding that map.

CABINET CRISIS.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I see by the Montreal "Star" that His Excellency the Governor General has been obliged to cancel his engagements in Montreal by reason of another crisis here. I do not know whether any of the Ministers have again bolted or not, but it states that there is a disagreement between Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Mackenzie Bowell. Will the Government have the kindness to inform the House and the country how the matter really stands and relieve us at once?

Mr. FOSTER. All I have to do is to refer my hon. friend to the editor or reporter of the "Star," who no doubt will give him all the information he requires. He appears to have a lot on hand.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before proceeding to discuss the matter more particularly before us, it is my duty to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to a very grave misrepresentation which has been made both of myself and the Reform party at large. Now, I am not at all disposed to complain of the manner in which our friends, the reporters of "Hansard" usually discharge their onerous duties. My impression is that, as a whole, their work is exceedingly well done, and I am bound to say, for my own part, that I have very little indeed to complain of. Now and again slips do occur. I recollect, no very long time ago, when I had occasion to refer to the political Styx, and I found, to my horror, that the reporters had made it "political stinks." On another occasion when I had quoted, in the same connection, the words: "Strike but hear me, as Themistocles said," I found to my amazement that I was reported: "Strike but hear me, as Peter Mitchell said." These things I have borne like a man, but one must draw the line somewhere, and when I took up Friday's "Hansard" and found that I was represented as having supplicated the elder Sir Charles Tupper for a subscription for myself and the Liberal party, I felt that I could not stand that. Why, Mr. Speaker, it would not require my parliamentary experience to know that no human being could well go on a more hopeless quest than to ask Sir Charles Tupper the elder, to give a portion of his hardly earned—or, perhaps, I should say his hardly won—gains for the benefit of the Liberal party. And then, too, Sir, I felt that there was imminent peril, if this thing went uncontradicted, that we should have cablegrams speeding across the Atlantic and sapient English journals reporting that the reason the Liberal party attacked Sir Charles Tupper was that he refused to make a fair division of the spoils. Sir, this is a grave and serious matter. Here I am reported, on behalf of myself and the Liberal party, addressing Sir Charles Tupper, and saying: "Give us gold." I need not say that no such thought ever crossed my mind, no such words ever crossed my lips. What I did say was: "Give us good old Sir Charles," and that I said without any disparagement of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), for whom I have always had a strong sneaking liking—more particularly since he began to devote his talents to antiquarian research. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am bound to say for myself that I never entertained the smallest or faintest idea that Sir Charles Tupper, who is now restored to us, thanks to my prayers and those of the Bishop of Antigonish—I never entertained the slightest idea that he would celebrate his return in knightly fashion by distributing largesse on this side. I desire to be corrected in this matter, and I hope that the misrepresentation will disappear very shortly from the "Hansard."

And now, Sir, to come down from Sir Charles Tupper to the Minister of Finance. I accorded to the Minister of Finance the other day praise for his skill in executing a strategic movement. Looking over his speech with more deliberation, I am bound to accord to him praise for one other merit, and that is the merit—if it be a merit—of the most persistent possible denial of the plainest possible fact, facts which, if they have not been manifest to him, have been manifest, I think, to every man of business in Canada for these several years past. What is the hon. gentleman's position, Sir? He comes before us obliged to announce a deficit of over four millions of dollars, the largest deficit recorded in our history, with the exception of one for which, no doubt, the rebellion in the North-west was largely responsible. The hon. Minister of Finance knows that; he knows what it means; he has told us often enough what an ugly and grim-visaged thing a deficit is and how terribly it reflects on the financial capacity of the Government of the day, and particularly of the Finance Minister thereof; and, therefore, he can offer no excuse for minimizing or attempting to minimize the real weight and significance of this huge deficit. The hon. gentleman knows well—no man knows better—that the prices of the chief articles which the Canadian people produce are frightfully low to-day, that they are, in all human probability, particularly if you regard the margin of profit obtainable from them, scarcely one-half what they were a few years ago. The hon. gentleman knows likewise, no man better, that his efforts and the efforts of his colleagues to obtain for us any new markets of value have been utterly and entirely futile. He knows quite well that the British market, to which we naturally look, and which is open to us, as it is to all comers freely and without tax—he knows that, so far as one important branch of our trade in cattle is concerned that market is entirely closed, and that there is considerable danger of it being closed as regards another branch. The hon. gentleman knows—no man can know so well, because he comes from the province of New Brunswick and represents a constituency, where, for many years back, there has been no increase at all—that our population in many large districts is absolutely at a standstill. He knows perfectly well, although he attempts to conceal the facts, that our taxation, more especially if you take the real and not the nominal taxation, is enormous for a country of our age and resources. The hon. gentleman knows well, and has had to admit it, that our debt is a very heavy debt, and is piling up in despite of his promise to the contrary made to us for many years back. Nevertheless, with full knowledge of these important facts, the hon. gentleman holds it compatible with his position to come down and prate to us of the great prosperity of the people of Canada; to tell us, almost in so many words, that Canada is the most prosperous country on the face of the earth. I am not sure that he did not tell us that in so many words. He deliberately chooses to close his eyes to every item on the debit side of our account, while he takes credit, and more credit than he deserves, for those which by any exercise of ingenuity can be brought to the credit side. He ignores completely the competition which presses day after day more and more heavily on our farmers and other producers in this community. Moreover, the hon. gentleman, as the House knows, deliberately refuses all economies of any real value. Last year he talked economy. Last year he brought down a Budget, as he said, reduced to the lowest proportions. This year he proposes a Budget which already exceeds by a million and a half the amount he declared necessary last year, and which, before this House rises, as I shall be able to show, is likely to be further, and largely, increased. More than that there are too many indications in the hon. gentleman's speech that, in the teeth of all these facts, in the teeth of increasing debt, in the teeth of huge taxation, in the teeth of a huge deficit for the last year and of probable deficits for the present year and succeeding year, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues and supporters are ready to plunge this country into all manner of rash and ill-considered engagements, whereby, if they are permitted to take their own way, a further huge sum will be added to our debt and a very large amount to our annual expenditure.

Now, Sir, on the present occasion, I propose to do what I do not very often do; I propose to take the hon. gentleman's speech and analyse it in some detail. It is possible that the hon. gentleman may have suffered, as I have suffered, from a little inaccuracy on the part of our reporters, but I would call his attention, in the first place, to a statement made by him, which reads as follows:—

There is, further, this fact to be noted, a similar fact to which has existed only once, I think, since confederation. That is, that the exports from Canada last year exceeded the imports by $2,857,121, although the average of the excess of imports over exports during confederation up to the end of that year was $18,740,000. Whatever there may be in what is known as the balance of trade, other circumstances being equal, the fact that there was last year an excess of exports over imports is a fact which has to be placed to the credit of Canada, and is so much gained to the general of our business interests.

Is that reasonably correctly reported?

Mr. FOSTER. Reasonably correct, yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to that statement, I want to call the attention of the House to our Trade and Navigation Returns. I find in them—the hon. gentleman will correct me if I am wrong—that our total importation for the year 1895 to which he refers, is $105,252,000 of goods entered for consumption. I find, looking further on, that our total exports of Canadian goods, including coin and bullion, amounted to $103,085,000, wherefore, it would appear that so far from having an excess of exports over imports, if that be a benefit, there was really an excess of imports over exports, of $2,200,000, contrary to the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend will allow me to draw his attention to this one fact. As he has put it, he leaves the impression that I have made a misstatement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not a misstatement, but a mistake.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will look on page 7 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will see that since confederation our balance of trade as regards imports and exports has been calculated all through upon the total exports and the total imports, not taking into account what is simply the produce of Canada, or what is not, not taking into account, either, the bullion or coin on either side; and the figures that I have stated are perfectly correct in the line of the statements which have been compiled from confederation, including the five years during which my hon. friend presided over the finances.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought the hon. gentleman would take refuge in that statement.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. He has no right to imply that I am seeking refuge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I think I am.

Mr. FOSTER. I think not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that is unparliamentary, but if Mr. Speaker rules that it is so, I will make use of another phrase.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not object to its being unparliamentary, but I say the idea implied in that assertion is an idea that ought not to be implied.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a little too fine. I think the hon. gentleman will have to sit still under the imputation.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not sit still when you misrepresent me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You will have plenty of opportunities to correct me. Now this is rather an interesting point. The hon. gentleman, you will observe, referred to 1880, when our imports entered for consumption were $71,782,000. Canadian exports in that year, of our own produce, were $74,471,000. It was, therefore, perfectly correct to say that in 1880 our exports exceeded our imports, and, so far as there is anything in the balance of trade—to which I, myself, I may remark, attach no importance whatever—the balance of trade in 1880 was in our favour. Now, I would like to ask, when the hon. gentleman talks of the balance of trade, will he assert that if we had exported of foreign produce, instead of ten millions, say thirty millions, as we would have done if our Yankee friends had used the St. Lawrence to its full advantage, would he rise in his place here and tell the House that there was a balance of trade in favour of Canada, of $22,000,000?

Mr. FOSTER. I have simply this to say to my hon. friend. I have followed out the calculation since confederation, from statistics which the Trade and Navigation compilers, the Controller of Customs, and the Ministers of Finance, have supplied, and upon which alone you can carry out a comparison between the different years, of the balance of trade. I ask the hon. gentleman, is not what I have stated with reference to the balance of trade based upon a comparison between our total exports and total imports? And if he will look on page 7, he will say whether or not that is so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They do not talk of the balance of trade, and the hon. gentleman did talk of the balance of trade. I am as well aware as the hon. gentleman that there was an excess of total exports, foreign and Canadian, over the total, not of those entered for consumption, but the total goods alleged to have been imported for all purposes. But I beg to point out to him that that has nothing in the world to do with the balance of trade. I beg to point out to the hon. gentleman and to the House that supposing, as I say, that the returns showed thirty millions exported via St. Lawrence, that would not enable us to pay for goods which are imported and consumed in Canada. The balance of trade means, if it means anything at all, that out of our own exports, out of the proceeds of our own exports, we are able to pay for all the goods we import and consume, and have a surplus besides. All we can be said to get out of foreign goods passing through our country via the St. Lawrence, all we can possibly get, are the tolls, whatever they amount to, and the value of the freights that go in Canadian bottoms to Montreal, and in Canadian bottoms from Montreal to the point of consumption. Now, the hon. gentleman does not appear to understand the question yet. I will put it to him a little plainer. Supposing a Chicago merchant chose to send one million barrels of flour via the St. Lawrence and Montreal to Liverpool, does the hon. gentleman mean to tell us that the price of that one million barrels of flour would go to help us pay for imports consumed in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. No, I would not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, then, how would it help our balance of trade? Now, why could he not consult the Premier, who is an ex-Minister of Customs, of long experience, and who would have put him right on that question, and prevented him from—I do not say deluding—but undoubtedly misleading the House by talking of having a balance of trade in our favour when, in point of fact, so far as there is anything in it, the balance of trade to the extent of $2,200,000 is against us. Sir, if the hon. gentleman is not satisfied, all I can say is that I am afraid I shall have to refer him to my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden), and my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson), who will no doubt endeavour to indoctrinate him with the true principles regarding the balance of trade.

Mr. FOSTER. I am quite willing to discuss the question with my hon. friends any time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well, does the hon. gentleman maintain that if we send a quantity of foreign goods via the St. Lawrence, they enable us to pay for a part of our imports entered for consumption.

Mr. FOSTER. Not necessarily.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not at all. And if they do not, it does not affect the balance of trade. It may be a very good proof, and a very good evidence, that we are benefiting by the use of our waterways, and had the hon. gentleman congratulated us on that, I would have agreed with him. But when he talks of the balance of trade, I must put in a caveat. The balance of trade is against us to the extent of $2,200,000, and not in favour, as he mistakenly supposes. Now, I would say this is very like a mistake which the hon. gentleman made some years ago with respect to the benefit in respect to agricultural products that had been gained for the farmers of Canada by the operation of the National Policy, and I think he had better, in the future, consult with my hon. friend the Premier, who will put him right on these interesting questions. Sir, for the second point, I observe that the hon. gentleman, I suppose some of his old associations leading him that way, claims credit for a considerable reduction in the consumption of spirits. Now, if there be a reduction in the consumption of spirits, I am very glad of it, but I have my doubts whether the data on which the hon. gentleman founds that statement are quite correct, or quite safe. I have been informed—the hon. gentleman no doubt is in a position to speak with more authority on that point—that there is, at the present moment, a great amount of smuggling going on in the St. Lawrence, and in certain parts of the maritime provinces. I have likewise been informed, but that has reference, doubtless, to particular localities only, that there is a considerable amount of illicit distillation in various parts of Canada, and that in these two ways there is a considerable amount of whisky which finds its way into consumption without paying any duty, and that the diminution which the hon. gentleman speaks of is, therefore, more apparent than real. However, on that point, also, I do not want to dilate too much. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to it, and I think it is worth while that he attend to it.

Mr. FOSTER. I remind my hon. friend that that unknown quantity, whatever it may be, which is and has been equally unknown every year, is never taken into account in our statistics at all, and cannot possibly be. The hon. gentleman knows well enough that my comparison was made upon statistics, not upon suppositions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not quite sure whether the hon. gentleman is correct in saying that his statements are made on statistical data, at any rate, so far as the increase of expenditure goes. The other day I thought he was indulging in promiscuous guessing, and I think that while he was guessing, he might have guessed a little as to the quantity of illicit spirits which are imported. My reason for calling attention to it is this: It is tolerably well known that this smuggling traffic has been increasing largely during past years, to an extent which is well worthy the attention of any Minister of Finance. If he will look at the English speeches on the Budget, he will see that these are matters which are, to a considerable extent, taken into account and calculated on by English Chancellors of the Exchequer, when delivering their annual statements, as, indeed, they have good cause to be.

Mr. FOSTER. They never interject them in their statistics.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I beg your pardon. Very often they allude to the amount, using it as an argument that it is not safe to extract further revenue from that particular article.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, and they allude to it. However, I am not going to quarrel with the hon. gentleman over that point—there are plenty of other points. The hon. gentleman in another place, and here again I quote the hon. gentleman's statements, because, as I say, I wish to give him every opportunity to correct them if I am in error, spoke as follows:—

The per capita rate of customs, calculating from 1874-75 to 1877-78, including both years, was an average of $3.44 per head of the people. The rate in 1874-75 was $3.75 per head of the people. In 1894-95 it was $3.52 per head; that is, only 8 cents per head greater than the average of the period from 1874 to 1878, inclusive, and 39 cents less than the per capita customs taxation of 1874-75.

Less than the per capita taxation of 1874-75! Now, Sir, I might very well say to the hon. gentleman that he was rather wasting his own time and time of the House when he felt himself called upon, in order to defend himself and his policy, to enter into these minute calculations as to what occurred twenty years ago. But as the hon. gentleman has done so, he has made it my duty to some extent to follow him. In the first place, I want to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of my friends to this, that no grosser fallacy was ever attempted, no grosser fallacy can ever be attempted, than to institute a per capita comparison between the taxation inflicted under a revenue tariff and the taxation inflicted under a protective tariff. What is the essence of a protective tariff? That of taxing the people highly for the benefit of certain trade industries, which taxation does not go into the treasury. Therefore, all these per capita comparisons made by the hon. gentleman are, I will not say the veriest nonsense, because that would be unparliamentary perhaps, but they are utterly and entirely irrelevant and beside the point. The hon. gentleman by this time, I think, might have arrived at a definite opinion as to what protection really means, on a scientific basis, and if so, he would have known that, be protection good or bad, this is inherent in it, that under any protective system a vastly larger sum must of necessity be taken out of the pockets of the people than is ever paid into the treasury. That cannot be avoided, it is of the essence of the thing; and therefore all per capita comparisons are not merely misleading and fallacious, but they are, as has often been pointed out, calculated in a high degree to deceive and mislead the people. Sir, what is the real fact? It is perfectly true, and I make the hon. gentleman a present of the fact, that probably no human being can fully estimate the mischief which arises from a protective system. Its ramifications are so immense, its ramifications are so widespread that all any of us can do, in treating of it, is to say that the amount of mischief it does is, on a conservative estimate, so and so. I have gone over the hon. gentleman's tariff time and time again. I have made calculations time and time again as to the amount which the protective system takes out of the pockets of the people over and above the sums that go into the treasury, and I say it is on a conservative estimate about $30,000,000 annually, taking excise and customs taxation, and in addition to this amount $30,000,000 at least more are taken out of the pockets of the people and distributed amongst a favoured few. Sir, that altogether amounts to $60,000,000. Many men whose opinions are entitled to high respect believe that that is utterly too small an amount. My friend the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), whom I do not see here to-day, places the amount at from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000, and I will not contradict him.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the hon. gentleman for what year he calculates $30,000,000 of extra taxation?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I believe on a fair average from 1879 down to the present day, the amount of taxation taken out of the pockets of the people which does not show in our printed returns or in our revenue statements, reaches on an average not less than $30,000,000 a year for the sixteen or seventeen years. That is a computation the proof of which I am fully prepared to give in detail, and of which no doubt there are thirty hon. members who will be prepared to give proof in detail. Take an article of common consumption like rice. Does not the hon. gentleman know that for every dollar of taxation that goes into the treasury, two, three, four or five dollars go into the pockets of the manufacturers? Does he not know that all through the tariff, there are innumerable cases where for every dollar that goes into the treasury four, five and sometimes ten dollars are taken out of the people's pockets, and do not go into the treasury, but go to benefit this or that particular manufacturer. There have been cases well known to us, which I cannot stop to enumerate now, where millions have been taken out of the pockets of the people and not a cent has gone into the public treasury.

Mr. FOSTER. Millions?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Millions. Do you want the proof?

Mr. FOSTER. In Canada?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes. If the hon. gentleman will look at the duties on sugar preceding the recent addition, it will be seen that millions were taken out of the pockets of the people and only the most insignificant possible fraction of it found its way into the treasury. So I put it—and let me observe here in passing of this fact, which I allude to as a very strong argument against the protective tariff, that although it applies to such a tariff with ten-fold force, it applies also against any high tariff, any attempt to levy the bulk or greater part of our revenue by high customs tariff—you cannot impose high customs tariff, more particularly on any article which partakes of the character of raw material, without enormously increasing the cost to the consumer in the end. That is a simple fact which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) or any other hon. gentleman can work out for himself. What was the hon. gentleman's declaration? It was that in 1895 under his tariff the people of Canada were paying 39 cents less than they were in the period of 1874-75. What are the facts? The facts are these: to-day the people on an average are paying per family $60, taking five individuals to a family, as against $25 under the Administration of Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. The present Government have not saved 39 cents per head, but they have lost $7 per head, if a fair account were taken.

Sir, the hon. gentleman, proceeding a little further, attempted to lessen the weight of his deficit of $4,153,000 by observing that an amount of $2,000,000 went into the sinking fund, which, as he truly said, reduced the debt, and he claimed credit for that. I do not object to give the hon. gentleman credit for it. But as we are raking up old history, I may remind the hon. gentleman of the fact that none of his predecessors ever gave such credit to Hon. Alexander Mackenzie when they were howling about the deficits of 1876-78. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to make what I shall not call a fallacious, but a very incorrect and unfair comparison between the deficits of the Mackenzie Administration and his own. And here again I apologize to my hon. friends and to the House for going into this, which I think might well have been omitted. But, as the Minister of Finance has thought fit to do it, I am obliged to provide my friends with the answer. What he said was this :

In the period from 1874-75 to 1878-79 there were deficits amounting to $6,426,000, and surpluses amounting to $935,000, leaving a net deficit of $5,491,000.

Sir, I take exception to every line in that statement. I am not responsible in the slightest degree for the fact that after I went out of office, the hon. gentleman opposite, or his predecessors, chose in 1879 largely to exceed my estimate. I am responsible for this fact : That when I took office in 1873 I found that my predecessor had run up his Estimates to $24,000,000 odd, and I succeeded in keeping down the expenditure to $23,316,000. I am entitled to credit for that, Sir, and I am not entitled to the responsibility for the year 1878-79. Now, what are the true facts, and it is worth while to spend a minute or two in showing them ? We had three deficits for which we were responsible. We had the deficit of 1876, the deficit of 1877, and the deficit of 1878. Collectively these deficits did not amount to $6,000,000 odd, but to $4,488,000. We had two surpluses fairly earned in 1874 and 1875, amounting to $1,824,000, leaving a deficit, not of $5,000,000 as the Finance Minister said, but of $2,564,000.

Our sinking funds during the five years amounted to $3,663,000, so that there was really on an honest statement, a balance to Mr. Mackenzie's credit of $1,101,000. Aye, Sir, and there was more. During Mr. Mackenzie's administration was conducted, as I said not long ago, the one arbitration by Canadian statesmen which resulted to the profit and honour of Canada, and in fairness and equity we ought to be given credit for the $5,000,000 of hard cash we got out of the Americans under the Halifax award, and in fairness and in equity, we ought to be entitled to credit for the $1,000,000 we got out of the Northern Railway and which our predecessors were prepared to throw away. So that, if you give us fair credit on the line the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was using for himself, the Mackenzie Administration—three deficits to the contrary notwithstanding, would come out with a clear credit of $7,000,000 odd.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman dispute that ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On what ground ?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman is going to subtract the sinking funds during the Mackenzie Administration, which were had on a small amount, will he also, in making a comparison, subtract the almost double of the sinking fund now ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am simply following the hon. gentleman's principle, and I am pointing out how grossly unfair he was in charging me with the deficit of 1878-79 over which I had no control, and where the expenditure hugely exceeded the estimate I brought down. I am responsible for my Estimates, but I am not responsible for hon. gentlemen's extravagance. But, Sir, there is another thing I will remind the House of as we are now on this subject. What was the position of the Mackenzie Government when they went into office ? As I have told the House, again and again, the first thing my deputy did, was to call my attention to this fact : That when the Macdonald Administration went out of office they had left encumbrances and charges involving an annual expenditure of $4,000,000, to meet which they had not made a copper of provision. When they went out of office they had incurred liabilities under the statement which Leonard Tilley made in his own Budget speech in 1873) involving $60,000,000 addition to the public debt, and a further annual charge of $3,300,000. So that, we were called upon in our term of office to face an additional annual expenditure of $7,300,000 for which our predecessors had made no provision at all. If under such circumstances there were three deficits, let the men who are responsible for them, the men who imposed these obligations, entirely against our remonstrance, utterly against Mr. Mackenzie's remonstrance, utterly against the united remonstrance of every man on this side of the House at that time ; let them bear the brunt and responsibility, for on their shoulders does the responsibility rest.

Sir, there is another statement which deserves a little attention. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) declares that the Liberals remitted no taxation, but that the Conservatives did. The Liberals remitted no taxation. Well, Sir, that is true, because the Liberals having to face a charge amounting to $7,000,000 a year imposed by their predecessors, were not in a position to remit taxation, and no blame to them. But, if the Conservatives did remit taxation, the Conservatives first took care to put on such a pile of taxation that there was mighty little credit to them in removing a small fraction of it. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) ever hear of that pious saint who stole a goose and gave away the giblets in charity, because the Conservative remission of taxation is strictly analogous to the device of that worthy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I turn to the hon. gentleman's estimate of revenue and expenditure. I take here, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) took, the 20th January, and I take it for this reason: I am obliged to him for sending me the ten days' statement down to the 31st of that month, but I think that even he will agree that the 20th January is a fairer date, and for this reason: Whenever, as he knows, the Minister is going to make his financial statement, a very large amount of dutiable goods are invariably taken out of bond, and I have no doubt, as has occurred on previous occasions, so it occurred on the present occasion, that a considerable amount was taken out of bond and the revenue for that ten days would, therefore, not afford a fair standard of comparison with the same period of 1895. I take the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) up to the 20th January, and I am quoting from his figures, and, of course, if they are incorrect I am perfectly open to correction. The hon. gentleman, I see here, gives the revenue up to the 20th January, 1896, at $19,560,000. That statement I suppose he accepts?

Mr. FOSTER. I presume so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is the statement reported and apparently it is correct. Now, I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to this: Six months and twenty days elapsed up to the 20th January. It follows, therefore, that our annual receipts for that period were at the rate of $2,930,000 a month. There remain five, and one-third months, and if we continue to receive revenue at the same rate, that would yield $15,616,000; and consequently, unless there is a marked improvement during the next five months the total of revenue upon that ratio would only amount to $35,176,000, and not $37,000,000 as he calculated. Even if we add for "miscellaneous receipts" say $824,000, which I think would be a pretty high proportion, it would only give us a revenue of $36,000,000 instead of $37,000,000. Sir, I am not going to dwell too much upon that point, but I am going to show to the House this: that on the data we have we cannot count upon more than $36,000,000. If the hon. gentleman's guess proves correct, and we receive a larger revenue in proportion for the five and one-third months that are to come, than we have received for the six and two-thirds months past, then, no doubt, we may come up to $37,000,000. But this is a mere hypothesis, and not by any manner of means, in the present situation of the country, a very safe hypothesis for the hon. gentleman to build upon. Also I notice that in his expenditure statement, although he will admit that the expenditure for interest in 1896 must be—his own estimate shows it—$514,000 more than in 1895; nevertheless the charge up to the 20th January is $130,000 less than it was in 1895. Now, of that $514,000 for these six and two-thirds months, the proposition would be $300,000. So that it appears that his expenditure statement is on that head alone at least $430,000 less than it ought to be, if a fair proportionate sum, in proportion to the amount paid last January, had been entered against it. I do not at all pretend to say that the hon. gentleman has kept back any payment of interest—far from it; but I point out to him that these two facts—the fact that on so important and easily ascertainable a matter as the expenditure for interest, we are visibly $440,000 or $430,000 below the figure we ought to have put it at, if a proportionate scale had been observed, and that other fact, to which I have called attention, that unless there is a great improvement in the next five months we cannot get more than $36,000,000 of revenue—ought to cause the hon. gentleman to have some considerable doubts as to whether he will escape a deficit for this year.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, in making his estimate of expenditure, is basing it on the statement up to the 20th January.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will recollect that I made the statement of the expenditure up to that date some $400,000 more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have given credit for that.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not catch that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So far as I understand it, I may have possibly misread the hon. gentleman's statements, but I think he will find that I am correct. Perhaps he does not quite understand what I said. I have pointed out that in 1896 we have paid $514,000 more for interest than we did in 1895, as appears from these estimates in my hand. I have pointed out that although that would involve an extra payment in six and two-thirds months of $300,000, yet we were charging up to the 20th of January, 1896, $130,000 less instead of $300,000 more.

Mr. FOSTER. As a payment of interest.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes. So that on that head alone there was $430,000 which the hon. gentleman knows must be paid, and which, in ordinary circumstances and on an ordinary computation, would be credited up to the 20th of January, 1896.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, my hon. friend did take the twenty days statement, and not my statement as given in the Budget speech.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They appear to be the same.

Mr. FOSTER. No, they are different.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under that head they seem to be the same. The only difference was in the estimates of sinking fund, which I have not taken into account at all.

Mr. FOSTER. And the interest on investments.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The interest on investments had nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. Interest on trust funds, I mean.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is an item on the credit side, and not on the debit.

Mr. FOSTER. The interest on trust funds is on the debit side.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think I have the hon. gentleman's two statements here. These are two statements for which I have to thank the hon. gentleman. Now, I have here the statement to the 31st January, 1895, which shows the interest on public debt to that date to have amounted to $4,474,000. Then follows the statement of interest paid to the 31st January of the present year, amounting to $4,346,000, being as nearly as possible $130,000 less for this year, on the statement to the 31st of January, than it was for last year.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, that is conclusive, I think.

Mr. FOSTER. We must take into this account the fact that $119,000 or $120,000 of that is interest on trust funds, the payment of which was made earlier last year than this year, and consequently it does not go into the statement up to the 31st of January, 1896. That is pretty nearly all of the hon. gentleman's $130,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That does not help the hon. gentleman out. The fact still remains that in this comparative statement he shows an apparent gain of $500,000, perhaps a little more; and when we come to analyse it, we find that the apparent gain largely consists of the fact that $130,000 less was charged, whereas we ought to have paid $300,000 more. He has not disposed of those two facts by the statement that a proportion of the money paid in 1895 consisted of trust funds accounts. However, it is not worth while, I fancy, to wrangle over that matter much longer. If the hon. gentleman conceives that I have been unfair in my computation, he can set me right later.

Mr. FOSTER. It is just a question of deferred payments.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a question of importance in computing what payments you have to make. The hon. gentleman will see that if I am correct, he has to pay $430,000 more on that account from this date last year, than he had to pay last year. In point of fact, he has to pay a good deal more than that, because, according to the Estimates, we were to pay $514,000 more for 1896 than we did in 1895.

Mr. FOSTER. The Estimates can hardly guide you.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps not, but they are the only things I have to guide me at the present time, and they are tolerably accurate in a matter of this kind. There is no doubt that we owe more money in 1896 than we did in 1895.

Mr. FOSTER. But the estimate is also made on what we would probably have to borrow, either more or less.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not speaking of the Estimates of 1896-97. I am simply giving the Estimates brought down last year, by the hon. gentleman himself for the year 1895-96, and here is the statement: Public debt (including sinking funds)—for 1894-95, $12,218,000; for 1895-96, $12,732,000; an increase of $514,000. Now, Sir, I think I am reasonably correct in saying that that, at any rate, approximately represents the amount that would have to be paid in 1896. However, the hon. gentleman can, later on if he likes, overhaul and criticise that statement. I fail as yet to see that I am incorrect in pointing out that there are $430,000 which, on a strict computation of the account, should be put to the expenditure of 1895-96 up to date. And that goes far in my mind to justify the statement that it is more than doubtful whether we shall emerge, as he supposes, with an even balance at the end of the current year. I do not gainsay his statements; all I say is that he has been making a guess, and, according to the data up to date, the probability is against him. I do not say that a lucky revival of trade may not possibly pull him through; very possibly it may; but he has not shown the House any good reason that it will be so; and, as we are likely to incur heavy responsibilities and liabilities not yet disclosed to us, it is important that we should understand in what way the hon. gentleman arrives at his calculation. Now, Sir, it is remarkable—and the hon. gentleman may perhaps see fit to correct the omission now—that as to the year 1896-97. I failed to hear, and I did not see it in looking over his Budget speech, that he gave us an estimate of receipts at all—a most unusual omission.

Mr. FOSTER. No. If my hon. friend will excuse me, he will see, if he reads my speech, that I expressly stated that we were so far from the year that I did not propose to make an estimate at all, and I did not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know that, but I am bound to say that it is a very unusual course to take. I do not think it has ever been done before.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There have been numerous Budget statements made in February in former years, as early as the present time or within a few days of it, and in all of those an attempt was made, of course subject to correction, to estimate the income. Now, Sir, that is of importance—of very grave importance; because, as I shall presently show, the hon. gentleman's Estimates for 1896-97, instead of being 38½ millions, look to me extremely likely to be 40 millions; and all he computes the receipts for the present year to be is a dubious 37 millions, which looks very much more like 36 millions. Sir, it is a matter of grave importance under such circumstances that before we plunge into new liabilities, we should know on what the hon. gentleman relies, I will not say to meet the $40,000,000, but the $38,300,000 which he admits he must have to meet, and which is very considerably below the sum he will really have to meet out of the revenue.

Sir, we will do well to remember that when we are talking of the service of 1896-97, the hon. gentleman, who tells us that he requires $38,300,000, must know right well that we have in our statute-book an obligation which we may be called upon to fulfil and under which we will have to pay $750,000 a year for the service of the fast Atlantic line. He knows, too, very well that that obligation will entail other subsidies to the extent, probably, of $300,000 more. He must know, likewise, very well, that he will probably have to borrow $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 more for the various items he requires to raise. He knows that that will add the sum of $300,000 at least to our annual charges. When you put all these things together, you are within the shortest possible distance of an annual charge of $40,000,000 a year. This will, more particularly, be evident when you bear in mind this fact, that the hon. gentleman, like his predecessors, has gone on charging to capital account things which ought, in my estimation, to go against income. He charges $75,000 for Dominion lands to capital, although he knows we have not a chance of extracting it from that source, with our capital account largely overdrawn as it is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

He charges $85,000 employed on public works, which ought not to go to capital, but against income.

There is another rather improper statement of account which I find in the public accounts, and to which I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman, and the House. I find in the public accounts under the head of customs, the following entries:—Total amount received from customs, $17,890,000. Then I find these items deducted from it: Less duties returned, $109,000; less drawbacks returned, $132,000. Now, Sir, I do not altogether object to this, it has to be deducted, because I think that this ought to be entered—at least one of them—to the debit side, and that we should have a corresponding entry made on the credit side; but here is a thing to which I take very grave objection. I find that the bounty on beet-root sugar, $29,000, and on pig iron, $63,000, making in all nearly $100,000. These have no business to be hidden away in an obscure page of the public accounts. They ought to figure prominently in our expenditure account, so that people should know what the beet-root sugar bounty, and the pig iron bounty has cost. These are not refunds. They are not deducted from duties paid into the public chest, but they come out of the consolidated revenue. Why, we might have a million dollars paid to these various industries, and it would not show. The people would have very little opportunity of knowing how much they cost.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. By the law, we are obliged to lay a statement before the House so many days after it is opened.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But these are the books which go into the people's hands, and which they judge from. It is very different, indeed, to have these things hidden away in an obscure page of the public accounts, which probably not one man in twenty in this House—though we are supposed to be all acquainted with the public accounts—look at, I venture to say. Those should be put fairly and squarely in the expenditure account, and if they are, it follows that the annual expenditure is under-estimated by the full amount at least of those two bounties, which would make $100,000 more.

Mr. FOSTER. But we would have a larger revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not object to that. All I say is that the people would see and know what is done, and that it is the hon. gentleman's duty to so arrange his accounts that they may see and know what is done. I contend that that is a very improper statement; and although it only amounts to about $100,000 now, it is quite conceivable, if this kind of thing went on that it might amount to many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and to that extent the people would be kept in ignorance of the amount of taxes they pay or the amount of expenditure for which they have to provide.

Then the hon. gentleman claims merit for the reduction of interest. Sir, that is a process which has been going on all over the world for the last eighteen or nineteen years. Does he pretend that the National Policy or his wise administration has caused the rate of interest in England to fall, practically, from 4 or 5 to $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent? Does he pretend that it is owing to the National Policy or his wise administration that all through Canada the rate of interest is vastly less than it was a few years ago, and that all over the world it is vastly less? I am willing to give the hon. gentleman credit for that, although he has no right to it, but on one condition. Let him have credit for the reduction in interest if he will likewise shoulder the responsibility for the reduction in the prices of grains, cereals, and other agricultural products. He must not use the one and reject the other. Let him take both, and he shall have the credit of both.

And now I come to a matter which was alluded to by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mulock), and that is the hon. gentleman's refusal to take the House into his confidence and inform us what sum he proposes to ask for the special vote for militia. I venture to say this to the hon. gentleman. If he has not made up his mind, if the Council has not made up their minds, on the subject—if, up to the present day, they do not know what they are going to do, and will say that they have not yet decided, I shall not press the hon. gentleman, but if he and the Council have made up their minds, it is the most ostrich-like policy on the face of the earth to refuse, when making the Budget statement, to say how many millions they require for that special vote. What is the hon. gentleman afraid of? Is he afraid of casting dismay into the great American nation by informing the world that Canada wants three millions or thirteen or thirty-three millions, for the matter of that, to put her defence in proper order.

Mr. FOSTER. No danger of that scare after yesterday's debate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad the hon. gentleman's mind is relieved. Then he will tell us, of course, what the amount is.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to say that I am not able to tell the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid that the impression we made on the hon. gentleman is going to be evanescent. If he will look at what is done, usually, in similar cases in England, or elsewhere, he will see that my request is very usual and fair, and that there is no ground whatever for refusing to tell the House what he undertakes to add to the public debt on that score. I think I may speak for my friends behind me, as well as for myself, when I tell the hon. gentleman that no reasonable, no rational proposition will be harshly criticised from this side. We will, as our duty requires, discuss and debate any proposition the hon. gentleman has to make, looking to the better armament of our militia or the better defence of Canada, but it will be done in no carping, ungenerous, or censorious spirit. We will be willing to aid him to the utmost of our power in making proper provisions in this regard.

The hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us, on the authority of the president of Toronto Board of Trade, that there were notable signs of improvement. Well, I would be very glad to believe that. I think thus far it is probably true, that the immediate effects of the financial squall which swept over the United States, about eighteen months ago, have, to a great extent, disappeared, or at least would probably have disappeared by this time, but for that ill-omened and unhappy message of President Cleveland, who, in my judgment, has put back the improvement in the United States for some time, and may indirectly, in that way, affect us. But I beg to call his attention to the fact that all these things that the president of the Toronto Board of Trade alluded to do not go very far: they do not touch any of the great questions or the great issues now before us; they do not give us any grounds for believing that the real and permanent sources of wealth in this country are materially improved, or are likely to be materially improved. Sir, if I were disposed to be critical, I would ask the hon. gentleman to look at the share list of the city of Toronto, and to see in the condition of the loan companies, and the great extent to which their dividends and the prices of their stocks have fallen, that there is only too good evidence that this improvement which he speaks of is very far from being generally manifest at present, at any rate in the chief city of this province, and the chief province of this Dominion. There is another thing to which he alluded, and with which I shall deal a little later on—the almost total absence, as he said, of poverty. I would, with all my heart, that in making that statement the hon. gentleman were speaking the exact and literal truth. But I am afraid that he is in error; I am afraid that, sitting in his office as Finance Minister, he overlooks a great many of the evidences which come to the eyes of many of us who travel about the country—and not in Jamaica cars—that there is a considerable amount of pinching, if not downright poverty, in Canada at this moment.

Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman referred to another matter, and, to do him justice, I am bound to say that he did not enlarge upon it so much here as he has elsewhere. He took credit to himself for the great increase in our home market. The great increase in our home market! We have, thanks, I suppose, to the hon. gentleman, several hundreds of thousands of people more in Canada than we had ten or twelve years ago, and they consume a great deal of farmers' stuff, and, consequently, there is a great increase in the home market. I do not know exactly what he put that increase at. I think I saw that on one occasion he counted the increase at thirty or forty millions.

Mr. FOSTER. You will have to produce that rumour again.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I regret to say that I have not, as yet, imitated the excellent example of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) of keeping a scrap book of everything that the hon. gentleman says. But I will; I will be wiser another time. But I know this, and the hon. gentleman will not deny it, that he took great credit for the increase in the home market. Now, does the hon. gentleman know what the census proves? Why, Sir, it proves that within the last seventeen years we have lost more than two millions of people to the home market, counting the number of our own people who have left Canada, and counting also the number of immigrants who have come here but have left again. There is a home market which, if he had kept it, he might have boasted of. There was a home market that would consume a large amount of farmers' produce. I credit him with the five hundred thousand—though I do not know that he can claim credit, personally, for any considerable increase in the population—but, if I do so, I must debit him and his Government with the two millions that we have lost during that period. Sir, the home market is somewhat increased. But, upon what earthly pretense can the hon. gentleman, or anybody else, in a country which only contains five millions to-day but which is large enough and rich enough to support a hundred millions or more, claim credit for the five hundred thousand whom the census shows to have been added to our population in ten years. Then the hon. gentleman went on to speak of the increase of our urban population, which he described as the healthiest and best increase. I take issue with him directly on that point. I say that the increase of the urban population is too large as it is, and that it would be far better, a thousand times better, for Canada, if the hon. gentleman could point to an increase of the rural and agricultural population from one end of this country to the other.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but he has misread my statement. I was not making a comparison between rural and urban population. I was comparing the home and foreign markets, and I said the home market was the better market. It is a matter of phraseology, but I do not wish the hon. gentleman to criticise as mine a different idea from that which I expressed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see that I ought to have read to the hon. gentleman in advance:

Passing from these to the agricultural interests of the country, it is not saying too much, Sir, to say that from 1891 to 1895, these have shown a gradual, a continued, and a healthy advance. The home market has been gradually increasing. The increase in population itself from 1890 to 1895 has added to that home market. The increase of urban population which gathers in cities, and towns, and villages, and largely gathers there from the planting in these places of industrial establishments of different kinds, has largely increased. And, Sir, every thousand of the urban population is so much of the healthiest and best increase to the markets of the farmers of this country, for it affords a market near to them for products which would not carry to foreign markets, many of which are perishable in their nature, and for which a home market is absolutely essential.

Now, Sir, if the hon. gentleman is entitled to credit for the increase of five hundred thousand, let him stand up like a man and take the responsibility for the loss of the two millions whom we ought to have had, and who are now emigrants in the United States. By just so much as he can claim credit for the five hundred thousand, by just so much do I charge him and debit him with the two millions, and he cannot escape from that position, at any rate. But I tell him in this lies one of the gravest faults of the protectionist system, one of those I have always dwelt upon most strongly, one that statesmen in other countries have complained of and have tried to remedy. There is to-day, from various causes which I cannot pause to enumerate, a very unwholesome tendency on the part of the rural population to flock to our towns and cities, and desert the wholesome and useful occupations of the farm. That is a fault of our people, a fault of the American people, a fault of the British people, if you will. But, Sir, that is a tendency which is hugely increased by the operation of the protective policy. It is a thing which statesmen should check, but it is a thing which gentlemen on the other side have systematically fostered and aggravated; and it is one of the great reproaches to their policy that, in a country like Canada, with most unusual and extraordinary facilities for increasing the rural population, all over the province of Ontario, and all over the province of Quebec, all over the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island—everywhere you go, almost, the rural population is largely decreasing and has largely decreased during the last fifteen or sixteen years. This is a terrible misfortune to Canada, and for that terrible misfortune the hon. gentleman's policy of high taxation and protection is, to a very great extent, responsible.

Mr. DAVIN. How does the hon. gentleman account for the existence of the same tendency in England?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I never heard England, of the present day, spoken of as a great agricultural exporting country. If it is so, it is news to me. I do not say that this tendency is wholly the result of the hon. gentleman's policy, but I do say that his policy, and the policy of his predecessors and his friends has largely exaggerated and intensified that mischievous tendency, and, to that extent, it has worked great injury to the people of Canada ever since it was inaugurated in 1879.

Now I come to another claim—and, upon my word, the hon. gentleman deserves some credit for his assurance in making it, and that is that the National Policy has increased farm products. What would my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) say to that? What would my hon. friend from North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) say to that? What would my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) say to that? And of all things on earth that he claims credit for, one is an increase in the export of cheese. What has the National Policy ever done to facilitate the export of cheese? That trade was growing by leaps and bounds before the National Policy was hatched.

Sir, the hon. gentleman, although he was much more moderate to-night, went on to increase his claims on the people's gratitude by pointing out the great benefit that was done by excluding United States products. Now, really, the hon. gentleman's ideas on that subject are so crude that I shall have to hand him over to my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden), who will go through another course with him on that subject to show him how perfectly worthless the National Policy is in the way of excluding United States products. If he proved anything, he simply proved that the effect of his policy, operating along a frontier of four thousand miles, has been seriously to incommodate a considerable number of people, and to deprive them of an excellent and profitable interchange that they otherwise might have made. Let me tell him that his National Policy has deprived us of a valuable market in barley, it has deprived us of a valuable market in horses, and in sheep. In the way of destroying our markets, as regards agricultural products, the National Policy has been a success, but in no other way. Cannot the hon. gentleman and his friends ever be taught that commerce means an exchange, and a profitable exchange, between two communities, of products which the one are able, from their position, to raise more advantageously than the other, and that all this miserable interference with the course of trade, this miserable interference with the course of nature, this attempt to make water run uphill, can only result in disastrous confusion, and great loss to the people whom it is attempted thereby to benefit? Now, Sir, I will not expose myself to the imputation of misrepresenting the hon. gentleman, so I will read another paragraph:

Business failures in the country have been reduced from $18,000,000 to $15,800,000 in the same period; the average amount of failures per year during that period being $15,700,000 against $22,200,000 in the period from 1874 to 1878.

Well, Sir, again I apologize for going back into these realms of ancient history, but it is the hon. gentleman who has dragged me there. What does it prove? It proves that there was an insolvency Bill, under which you had an accurate record of failures, from 1874 to 1878; and in the period to which he refers, there has not been, and apparently is not going to be, an insolvency Bill; consequently, all these statements are not worth the paper on which they are written. Where there is an insolvency Act, you can ascertain with some precision what the failures really are; where there is not an insolvency Act, particularly under the state of the law which now prevails, every mercantile man whom I am addressing knows, and every lawyer whom I am addressing knows, that you cannot get an accurate record of all the compositions, and all the agreements, and all the side arrangements that are made between debtors and creditors; and until you have that, you have no warrant for making any such comparison as the hon. gentleman made.

Mr. LISTER. When that insolvency Act was passed, insolvents of twenty years' standing came in and took advantage of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, and these were all debited to the Mackenzie Administration. Sir, I return to the question of remission of taxation. I am not going to waste more time about it, except to say this: The hon. gentleman claims that in his seventeen years he remitted $45,000,000 in taxes. Possibly he did; but he forgets to tell us that in those seventeen years he added $500,000,000. Yes, Sir, that is the identical effect of the introduction of a protective system. The protective system from 1879 to the present time has added, at the very least, $30,900,000 a year to our taxation, over and above the sum paid into the treasury. Multiply seventeen by thirty, and you get $510,000,000; and, as $510,000,000 is to $45,000,000, so is the taxation imposed by the hon. gentleman to the taxation remitted by the hon. gentleman.

Sir, the hon. gentleman enlarged on all he had done for Canada by increasing the free goods list. On that list, I believe, there are about 378 articles; of those 378 articles, there are only three which really may be considered as a benefit to the public at large; every one of the remaining 375 articles are not really and truly articles put on the free list, but special bonuses given to pet manufacturers or special classes, and nothing else. Sir, it is absurd to talk of a free list. What does that free list consist of? I will just state a few articles on one page: Burrstones in blocks, rough or unmanufactured; chalk stone, China or Cornwall stone, cliff stone, and felspar, ground or unground; clays, viz.: China clay, fire clay, pipe clay; emery in bulk, crushed or ground; pumice and pumice stone, ground or unground; flint, flints and ground flint stones; fossils; fuller's earth; gannister; gravels and sand; gypsum, crude (sulphate of lime); marble in the rough, in blocks; minerals, viz.: aluminium or alumnum and alumina, cryolite or kryolite, litharge, nickel; mineral waters, natural, not in bottle; mineralogical specimens; meerschaum, crude or raw; diamonds; salt imported for the fisheries. The hon. gentleman is good to his own people sometimes. Ambergris; fish offal or refuse, fish skins, pearl, tortoise and other shells, turtles, whalebone, oysters, and so on, and so on, and so on. Sir, we can import, if we like, works of the old masters, of the highest value, and get them free; but I know very well that, if we want to put a little wall-paper on our rooms, we have got to pay, in inverse ratio to its value, from 35 per cent to about 100 per cent for the privilege. Sir, this free list, when you come to analyse, it is a sham, a delusion and a snare. It is of no benefit to the public at large; it is there for the benefit of the manufacturers alone. Now, I do not grudge to the manufacturers the right to bring in free the raw material for their articles; I do not particularly object to that. What I do object to is the hon. gentleman claiming that these are bonuses to the community at large. What benefit is it to any one, except those of us who have stock in cotton mills, that the hon. gentleman allows 56,000,000 pounds of raw cotton wool, or waste, to be imported free into Canada? Does that lead to the reduction of one copper on the price of the goods? Does not the hon. gentleman know that the price of goods sold by these manufacturers is regulated by the tariff? They sell for just as little under his tariff rate of imported American or British goods, and just as little under the cost of importation, as is requisite to keep them out, and no lower. Consequently, although it may be a benefit for the manufacturer to be allowed to import 56,000,000 pounds of raw cotton free, it is of no particular benefit for the people at large, nor can it be. I repeat that, taking the list altogether, I can find but three articles of real and general utility, and that the rest, while there may be something said for them, are, after all said and done, simply bonuses granted to particular pet manufacturers. Now, anybody who chooses, can, by inspecting our free list, satisfy himself of the accuracy of what I have said. I have not time to go over the list; I observe, however, one or two things in it that are worth alluding to. I may mention that this beneficent Government allows us to import all the ice we desire into Canada, free of duty; likewise brimstone. Agates can be imported free; curling stones—ah, there is a benefit to humanity—curling stones and granite can be imported free, but, I am afraid, not if they are dressed.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And skeletons.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Attar of roses and oil of roses apparently come in free.

Mr. FOSTER. There must be something more, because they would not amount up to $12,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I grant that tea comes in free, I grant that anthracite coal comes in free—those are two of the three articles I alluded to as being of real benefit to the consumer; but I do not think the hon. gentleman will find many more.

Mr. FOSTER. There must be a great many fish skins brought in free.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a large number of articles. Hides are brought in, not for the public benefit, not particularly for the benefit of the agriculturists, who have hides themselves to dispose of. They are brought in for the benefit of the leather trade, and I do not grudge the hides to them. A large quantity of wool is brought in, and that again is for the benefit of the wool manufacturers. I do not grudge it to them. Then there is a large quantity of other articles. Iron or steel rails are brought in, but purely for the benefit of certain railway companies, and I do not grudge them to those companies; but it is not for the benefit of the general public, but for the benefit of a privileged and special class. And so it goes. Whenever you come to analyse this boast as to the free list, you find what I have said is true, that which is put on the free list is placed there not for the benefit of the public at large, but for the benefit of certain manufacturers. I have no objection that they should be benefited, but let the hon. gentleman not attempt to delude us by saying that it is for our benefit and for the benefit of the community at large. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to say:

From 1878, when the people by a large majority gave their verdict for a change in the fiscal policy of this country, the Liberal-Conservative party and the Liberal-Conservative policy has dominated in this country, and has moulded the administration. On those seventeen years the Conservative policy rests. That record is before the country, and by that record we are willing to be judged.

The hon. gentleman goes on to say that they have been sustained in 1878, 1882, 1887 and 1891, and therefore that is proof they have the confidence of the country. I wish to heaven they would show by their acts that they possess the confidence of the country. When did they meet us on a fair field? When did they ever contend with the Liberals unbacked by a gerrymander Act or a Franchise Act, or both together, and all the bribes they could scrape together into the bargain?

Mr. FOSTER. Do you say any time during the last twenty-five years?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The first gerrymander was in 1872. I admit I am wrong as to twenty-five years; the statement should have been the last twenty-four years. During that time hon. gentlemen opposite have not once met us in a fair fight.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been no gerrymander in the maritime provinces.

Mr. AMYOT. Nor in Quebec.

Mr. FOSTER. There have been no elections in the maritime provinces since confederation which have been carried on under a gerrymander Act, and the hon. gentleman knows that to-day, whereas seventeen years ago he and his party had a large majority in the maritime provinces, he can scarcely get a corporal's guard.

Mr. MULOCK. What about the Ontario gerrymander of 1882?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not speaking of isolated provinces. I am stating the fact that since 1872 we have never gone into a fight on fair terms in the major provinces, and of all the provinces the greatest injustice has been done to my province, the province of Ontario. Did I not stand here when on pretense of adding four constituencies to Ontario, fifty-four constituencies were gerrymandered out of shape and knowledge? At that time I had the honour, for I count it an honour, of being especially singled out, so that the constituency which I then represented, Centre Huron, was broken up and riven into four fragments in order that I might be unable to obtain a nomination, and it was so distributed among four constituencies that I could not point to any one of them and say that I had more interest in it than in any other. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and his friends possess the confidence of the people, I think they should show it by dissolving this House without any further delay.

Mr. FOSTER. We will do it in good time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not show any impatience to meet the people. Five years ago, on 3rd February, 1891, when the House was dissolved, on false pretenses I grant you, an appeal was made to the people. This day is five years and three days since the last appeal was made, and if hon. gentlemen opposite possess the confidence of the people they do not dare to face them to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. We are facing the people to-day in one constituency.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In what one?

Mr. FOSTER. In a New Brunswick constituency. You will see where you will be at the close.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there are three constituencies left vacant. Why do you not face the people in them?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman can ask his leader.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can ask my leader!

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Ask him now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Am I to understand that the hon. gentleman has entirely abrogated all control and management of the business of the House, and that he appeals to the Opposition leader to tell us why writs do not issue for vacancies he himself has made? It is certainly a novel constitutional doctrine. I never heard that the hon. gentleman was strong on legal precedents or constitutional lore—

Mr. FOSTER. You should be more united over there, and consult each other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not see under what possible conditions or circumstances my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition can be held responsible for the fact that the hon. gentleman pitch-forked two or three gentlemen into the Senate, and now hesitates to fill their places, which I take it is the exact position of affairs to-day. But the hon. gentleman has a strong fort to which he retires in case of need. It beats Torres Vedras. Here the hon. gentleman was good enough to give us with much formality and pomp the result of the National Policy for ten years. He said:

Canadian industries per census returns:

No. of establishments: 1881, 49,923; in 1891, 75,768, being an increase of 25,845.

Capital invested: in 1881, $163,000,000; 1891, $353,000,000.

Here let me ask why it was that $165,000,000 of capital invested in 1881 produced $309,000,000, and $353,000,000 of capital in 1891 only produced $475,000,000? "What a falling off was there my countrymen." The productive power of Canadian capital sank from 100 to a little over 30 per cent in ten years, according to the hon. gentleman's return. He proceeded:

No. of employees: 1881, 254,000; 1891, 353,000.

Well, Sir, that is a significant showing, and I now proceed with your good leave, Mr. Speaker, to show what that showing is worth. It is a misfortune, to which the hon. gentleman, like other patriots and heroes are subject, that there are critics who sometimes put awkward questions. We were told several years ago that the hon. gentleman had added 25,854 industrial establishments—mark you, industrial establishments—to the industries of Canada. Some of my hon. friends were curious to know how those returns “panned out,” and they put questions to the hon. gentleman, copies of which I have under my hand. One was for the town of Strathroy. Strathroy, I believe, contains 3,000 souls, more or less. Strathroy had 131 industrial establishments. But of the 131, in cross-questioning, it turned out that there were only 11 which employed over ten hands. In Mount Forest, my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) ascertained—and it is a remarkable piece of information to him, because he did not know it before, although he lives there—there were 88 industrial establishments, but only five of them employed more than 10 hands. Yarmouth had one hundred and forty-five industrial establishments, and twenty of them employed ten hands and over; Uxbridge had seventy-eight industrial establishments and of the seventy-eight, seven employed ten hands and over; Guelph had one hundred and seventy-four industrial establishments and forty-one employed ten hands and over; Woodstock, N.B., had twenty-seven industrial establishments of which six employed ten hands and over; Owen Sound had one hundred and thirty-five industrial establishments of which twenty-one employed ten hands and over; Aylmer had seventy-five industrial establishments of which three employed ten hands and over; Blenheim had fifty-four industrial establishments of which six employed ten hands and over; Sorel had one hundred and fifty-one industrial establishments of which nineteen employed ten hands and over; St. Ours—I do not know who represent St. Ours—had seventeen industrial establishments, and not one of them employed ten hands, and the highest employed but four. Clinton had seventy industrial establishments of which seven employed more than ten hands; Montmagny had thirty-seven industrial establishments, not one of which employed ten hands. So, Sir here are fourteen places selected at random, in which there are 1,152 industrial establishments mostly of the new growth, and 142 out of the 1,152 employed over ten hands. Now, I do not take into account Caughnawaga where there are fifty-one industrious Indians of the male and female persuasion, carrying on fifty-one industrial establishments for the manufacture of fancy snowshoes. I make the hon. gentleman a present of that. And I did not take into account that grand discovery made in Shelburne county, N.S., where the ingenious enumerator discovered ninety-three establishments for the purpose of carrying on knitting, engineered, captained and commanded by ninety-three old women, who according to these veracious census returns received in the course of a year, a wage of $1,800 all told, being at the rate of $14.55 per year each, 28 cents a week, and 4½ cents a day. I found also, and it is well to remind the hon. gentleman of it, that we had increased most marvellously in the matter of carpet factories. Carpets were really the pride and glory of these new industrial establishments. In 1881, we had eleven carpet industrial establishments; in 1895, they had grown to 537. Fifty-one of these were in New Brunswick and they employed collectively fifty-one hands—mostly old women.

Mr. FOSTER. Does that show in the census?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That shows in the census.

Mr. FOSTER. The old women?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, the old women. The hon. gentleman has been very accurate. He has distinguished between those of tender years and those of most advanced age. He has distinguished between the sexes, and he has given us the amount of capital employed. By the way, I well know, but I will leave it to some other gentleman to send for the census returns and elaborate these for the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman, and show him the amount of capital employed in carrying on the new, patent, first-class, carpet-making industrial establishments. To the best of my recollection I think the average amount of capital is $18.

Mr. FOSTER. It is well distributed, then.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will just read for the information of the House and for the special information of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), the style of industrial establishments which he takes such just pride in. Sir, here is Montmagny and there were thirty-seven industrial establishments there. There was a blacksmith, and this blacksmith employed one hand, being himself. There was another blacksmith, and he employed one hand, being himself, and there was a third blacksmith, and he employed one hand, being himself. There was a boot and shoe industrial establishment which likewise employed one hand. There was a cabinet and furniture establishment, which likewise employed one hand. There was a carpenter's and joiner's establishment employing one hand, another employing two hands, and another employing two hands, and positively in Montmagny there was one establishment which employed six hands. Carriage works were conducted by two gentlemen, each of whom employed one hand. There were two fish curers, each of whom employed one hand. There was a lime kiln which was run by two men. There was a saw-mill. There was a tailor employing one hand, and there were four tinsmiths, each of whom employed himself, and so it goes. You will mark, Sir, that I have taken these places at random, scattered over the country, and I have shown no preference. Every section of the community has had its just share. This, Sir, shows tolerably conclusively what is the value to the community of those industrial establishments of which the hon. gentleman boasts so much. I desire greatly to make the acquaintance of some of these enumerators, because their work shows what a wealth of talent is lying loose in the country. I would like to know that ingenious enumerator who for the sake of $25, that paltry wage, was able to discover and record ninety-three separate industrial establishments for carrying on knitting in the county of Shelburne? Let the Finance Minister look for him. Surely such talent should not go wasted any longer. Why, Sir, he is fit to be the private secretary of the Secretary of State when he comes back to us. He might, with still greater propriety, be made the Dominion statistician and set to edit the Year-Book, and, Sir, if he had a chance he would run the hon. gentleman hard, provided he possesses a fluent tongue, for the position of a protectionist Finance Minister. I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to a little calculation I made with reference to the 25,845 industrial establishments he has discovered in Canada added in ten years. These 25,845 industries, he tells us, employ 112,000 people. Now, Sir, we will suppose that there are one thousand of these which would average forty hands each, not an overwhelming amount considering that there are a great many women and children as well as men to be found in the industrial establishments we are taxing the people of Canada $30,000,000 in all to support. That would represent 40,000 employees. Suppose 20,000 of them average twenty hands each employed, that would represent another 40,000 hands, or, in all, 80,000; and it leaves this interesting calculation: that there would remain in round numbers, 23,000 industrial establishments employing 22,000 hands, which is a little less than one man, or one woman, or one boy, or one girl, for these 23,000 establishments each. My friend from Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) tells me that this may be accounted for by a very ingenious development of the census returns which came to his attention. My friend, I think, made the statement here, that so careful were the census enumerators not to under-rate the number of industrial establishments, that there is one old lady in his village or town, who is reported in the census as carrying on two industrial establishments; one is an establishment for the sale of lollypops which is duly put down as an industrial establishment, and the other is a knitting factory conducted by herself for the manufacture of foot gear for her grand-children, which also figures as an industrial establishment.

Mr. FOSTER. All of which duly appears in the official record?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, and goes to make up your 25,845 industrial establishments.

Mr. FOSTER. Lollypops are good.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All of them are entered in your census.

Now, Sir,—and here I must apologize to the House, because this is rather a personal matter—the hon. gentleman found it absolutely necessary to refer to a certain letter of mine in the London "Economist," which I am not going to quote again, as I took the opportunity of putting it on record before, and he expressed a certain opinion about it which was not altogether complimentary to the author. Now, I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention, and the attention of the House, to a certain remarkable speech which was lately made in England by an American well known, by name, at any rate, to most of the members of this House—a gentleman who has filled the highest offices in his own country, and who is now ambassador to the court of St. James. I will make no apology, then, for reading to the House what Mr. Bayard said recently as to the results of the operation of the American protective system in his own country, of which he had been for many years a most attentive observer. What Mr. Bayard said was this:

In his own country he had witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled "protection," which he believed had done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards, in the popular mind, to familiarize it with reliance upon state and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of mercenary scramble than any other single cause.

Step by step, and largely owing to the confusion of civic strife, it had succeeded in obtaining control of the sovereign power of taxation, never hesitating at any alliance or resort to any combination that promised to assist its purpose of perverting the public taxation from its only true justification and function of creating revenue for the support of the whole people into an engine for the selfish private profit of allied beneficiaries and combinations called trusts.

Under its dictation individual enterprise and independence have been oppressed, and the energy of discovery and invention debilitated and discouraged. It had unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tended to commercial isolation, dangerously depleted the treasury, and sapped the popular conscience, by schemes of corrupting favour and largesse to special classes, whose support was thereby affected.

Thus it has done much to throw legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers took the place of statesmen.

It was incorrect to speak of protection as a national policy, for that it could never be, because it could never be other than the fostering of special interests at the expense of the rest ; and this overthrew the great principle of equality before the law, and that resultant sense of justice and equity in the administration of sovereign powers which was the true cause of domestic tranquillities and human contentment.

The enfeeblement of individual energies and the impairment of manly self-reliance were necessarily involved, and the belief in mysterious powers of the state, and reliance upon them, took the place of individual exertion, fostered the growth of state socialism, and personal liberty ceased to be the great end of the Government.

There is the statement of a former Premier of the United States, a senator of the highest position, and to-day the ambassador of the United States at the court of St. James ; and, Sir, to Mr. Bayard's immortal honour be it said—and I wish with all my heart our rules and regulations enabled me to share it—so true were those statements, so much did they wring the withers of that mercenary class created by the system which he denounced that—and I am quoting from the "Congressional Record"—he was impeached in the House of Representatives at Washington for high treason, because he had dared to make that speech before the Philosophical Institution of Edinburgh. If the hon. gentleman has done me the honour of listening to what Mr. Bayard said, or if he will take the trouble to read it, he will find that Mr. Bayard might, mutatis mutandis, have written my letter to the "Economist," and I might have delivered Mr. Bayard's speech to the Philosophical Institution.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no, not the latter—it is not virile enough.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, it is virile enough to bring upon Mr. Bayard a charge of high treason.

Mr. FOSTER. But not enough to satisfy your requirements.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot accept the hon. gentleman's flattering statement. But, Sir, in order that the hon. gentleman may know that when I used the language I did, in the "Economist," I was not anticipating or forestalling what was said about us in England—that I was not directing the attention of Englishmen to blots on our national character theretofore unknown, I want to read to this House a few opinions delivered by the English press in the year of grace 1891, many months before that letter of mine was written. In that year the London "Times," speaking of statements which had been paraded in our Public Accounts Committee and in our Elections Committee, said this :

Here in the mother country there can be only one feeling, that of deep regret for the wrong done to the fair fame of the eldest of her daughter nations by the lax morality of her politicians.

The London "Daily Chronicle" almost of the same date, said :

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

It seems to be possible in the Dominion to secure the political support, not only of individuals, but of whole provinces, by gifts of money. The locality is bribed as well as the member, and the consequent demoralization spreads through all ranks.

The London "Graphic" declared :

It is no longer possible to doubt that corruption in its worst form is rampant in a large portion of the Canadian Civil Service.

The London "Daily Telegraph" declared :

Enough, unfortunately, is already known in England to make it clear that only the most resolute and drastic purification can redeem public life in Canada from the taint of corruption, the like of which we have not seen in our own country for hundreds of years.

The Birmingham "Gazette," if I am not greatly mistaken, the organ of Mr. Chamberlain, the present Secretary of the Colonies, declared :

Rascals out of office defraud the public in order to bribe rascals in office, and rascals in office prostitute themselves, sacrifice their honour and forsake their trust in order to keep on good terms with the rascals out of office.

Mr. J. C. Chamberlain might have written that himself. He is virile enough when he chooses to please my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. A good transcript of yours.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was before mine.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the information must have been sent over ahead.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The information was not sent by me.

Mr. CASEY. The Public Accounts Committee sent the information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The London "Echo" declared :

No country can prosper where public departments are in league with fraudulent contractors, and where Ministers are open to offers.

The St. James "Gazette" declared :

The existence of an organized system of corruption among public officials in Canada has been conclusively proved, and, like everything else on the American continent, the bribery has been colossal.

It was no picayune matter that, at any rate, whatever other things may be. The "Graphic" despatch goes on :

The secret of Sir John Macdonald's electoral victories is out. On this side of the water surprise has often been expressed at the patience with which our Canadian cousins submitted to the Tory protectionist rule of that prince of political intriguers. There is now, alas, no difficulty in explaining that curious situation. Sir John's Government rested on a stupendous and all-prevailing system of bribery and corruption. Even Tammany Hall smells sweet and clean in comparison with that huge stink-pot of Sir John's Government.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very like the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Those are the opinions expressed by the English press, one and all, and had I space I might have multiplied them, ten, twenty, thirty, forty-fold, for every English paper of any note during 1891 teemed with the hideous record of corruption which was then exposed. But my point is this. My point is to show to the gentleman that he did me considerable wrong when he declared, as he did, that I had set the key-note to the English papers to attack this country. All those things were on record many months before I addressed my letter to the English "Economist," and it was because I knew they were on record and because, therefore, my words could not add further to the effect that had been produced on the English mind, that I did speak as I did, and I spoke with regret—although it was my duty to speak of it—of the extraordinary extent to which Canadian public life had been debased and demoralized by the results of the protectionist policy which the hon. gentleman and his friends had inaugurated.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman object to say what his object was in writing that letter?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not the slightest objection. I have stated it before. I had found that certain persons on the other side, and certain persons here—among them men who held positions in our Civil Service—had been, for a very considerable time, systematically maligning and slandering the Liberal party and leaders, and I was determined that that should not go on longer without intelligent and thoughtful Englishmen knowing that there were two sides to the question—without their knowing what the Liberal party was, what it proposed to do, and why the Liberal party advocated the policy it did—and therefore I addressed that letter to the London "Economist." The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) went on:

The Empire will be able to feed itself. Yes, that article said 100,000,000 bushels of wheat were necessary to England other than what the colonies afforded her at the present time, in order to feed the people of the Empire there. One hundred million bushels of wheat! Why, 50,000 Canadian farmers, with one hundred acres each in wheat, and raising 30 bushels to the acre, would produce 150,000,000 bushels of wheat for export to Great Britain. And what are 50,000 farmers, cultivating 5,000,000 of acres, compared to the number of millions of acres of good wheat land in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, which have not yet been scratched by the plough? Meats to the amount of 140,000,000 pounds would have to be supplied by the colonies to make up Great Britain's deficiency, supplied now from foreign countries.

The hon. gentleman went on to say:

Why, cattle, and horses, and pigs, in illimitable quantity could be raised in this country. And, as to butter and cheese, 50,000 farmers, owning 50 cows each, amounting to 2,500,000 cows, could supply butter and cheese enough to meet the demands of Great Britain for such supplies.

Now, my object is not altogether so much to find fault with the hon. gentleman's statement as to contrast it with a statement from that side of the House, which this House heard years ago, and to which it is worth now calling the attention of the House. The statement with which I wish to contrast that of the hon. gentleman opposite was made by the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper). He said:

I may say that I believe there are few members of this House, much as our attention has been turned to the development of the North-west, who have begun to contemplate in all its fulness what the capabilities of that great country are. I have spoken of the enormous extent, of the unexampled fertility of the soil, of the splendid description of wheat that can only be produced in these more northern and colder climes. But let me just ask the attention of the House for a single moment to a few figures which will indicate what the capabilities of that country are in regard to the production of wheat. One hundred thousand farmers, each farmer cultivating 320 acres of wheat land. Has any hon. member made the calculation of what they would produce?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad the hon. gentleman has done so. I am glad his attention has been drawn to the fact that 100,000 farmers, cultivating 320 acres each, or 200,000 farmers, cultivating half that quantity each, and taking the produce at only 20 bushels to the acre, instead of 27 or 30, which is the average in the North-west in favourable years, would give 640,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 50 per cent more wheat than the whole United States produces to-day. You have only to look at those figures for a single moment to see what the future of Canada is, to see what a magnificent granary for the world is placed in our Canadian North-west, and, when you remember we have six belts running through that fertile country that would each give 320 acres each to 100,000 farmers, you can understand, to some little degree, what a magnificent future awaits us in the development of that great country.

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is the way it should be whooped up. There is the way—if the hon. gentleman does want to eulogize the North-west—in which it ought to be done. Who cares for his puny hundred millions to feed the British Empire? Let him take example from the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) and point out that the North-west can feed the whole world and produce six times 640 millions bushels of wheat. If the hon. gentleman wants to go into that line of business, that is the way it ought to be done. Do not let him for one moment confine his energies to the paltry task of feeding the British Empire. Let him go in for feeding the whole world, as did the Secretary of State, and then we will have something like an eulogium. And when it is remembered that we have only five millions, or thereabouts, in all our territory, which is able to produce enough to feed the whole world, the population of which, I suppose, is a little over one thousand millions. I want to know how the hon. gentleman accounts for the fact that we have lost, under his regime, in the last twelve years, about two million people.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I suppose we must get on as best we can in the absence of the Minister of Finance and my hon friend the leader of the Opposition, who, I am informed, are more pleasantly engaged. When the House rose, to the best of my recollection and belief, I had just been making a comparison between the pitiful promises of the Minister of Finance and the gorgeous, cloud-capped visions of a much bigger man. And, Sir, it gives me pleasure now to turn to the master-mind. Like the Scottish chieftain, I like to hear of worthy foes. The master-mind has recently been expanding itself in Montreal before the board of trade of that city. To relieve the mind of my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), I may say that I do not propose to analyse that speech to-night, first, because it would take too long; and, second, because I live in hope of hearing it, with certain additional flourishes, within the next few days. But, on the principle that it is always well to sample goods, though I have not been able to find time to read the whole speech, I have read one page and it is interesting, or, at least, it was instructive. In that page I observed that reference was made to twenty-seven "great" things, to ten "vast" things; and that the capital "I"—I by itself I—occurred fifty-one times, having reference to the "great" and "vast" things aforesaid. I will take one statement which was made either on that occasion or not long after, although this is a reference to those ancient times that are getting a little stale. That statement was that Canada had been reduced to the deepest poverty in 1878, and the inference was fair that it had been reduced to the deepest poverty by the misgovernment and mismanagement of Alexander Mackenzie, probably assisted by his then Finance Minister. Sir, I think there are a good many people in Canada of the agricultural persuasion whose land stood at a value in 1878 that they would very gladly see it stand at to-day. I think there are a good many people in Canada of the agricultural and other persuasions whose products stood at prices in 1878 that they would very gladly indeed see them stand to-day. Sir, we will spend a moment in considering this statement, because this is a statement that has been used on many occasions, and careless minds not acquainted with the facts, and apt to be misled by a few instances that have been paraded time and again, are in some little danger of being deceived by broad assertions of that kind. I take exception in the strongest way to the statement that Canada was reduced to the deepest poverty in 1878 under a revenue tariff of about 17½ per cent. because the inference is clear that it was in consequence of having a moderate revenue tariff that it was reduced to that state of deepest poverty. To those who choose to examine the economic conditions of the country at that time, that statement will appear not only false, but ludicrously false. I say that the very reverse was the case; that Canada, in all the essentials of real wealth, was very considerably better off in 1878 than Canada is to-day. In population, I grant, we have grown somewhat; but in the elements of real substantial wealth, and, still more, in the distribution of wealth, Canada was better off then than she is now. I will call the attention of the House for a few brief moments to some of the results of the Administration which terminated in 1878. It is known to everybody that the National Policy did not come into operation until the middle of 1879, and it is also known that for a year and a half more it was impossible, no matter what the results of the policy might be, for them to have developed or fructified within that time. Now, to put the National Policy into operation by the establishment of industries under it, took at least $50,000,000 of subscribed capital for the various enterprises. That was the statement of its supporters, and I have reason to think that it was rather under the mark. Where did that money come from? It was not contributed by England; it was not contributed by the United States. It was produced out of our deepest poverty, which we had struck in 1878. Out of our deepest poverty, we put in $50,000,000 to be invested in various factories; and I greatly grieve to say most of it was lost, thanks to the foolish advice given by these gentlemen who dare to speak of the deep poverty of 1878. More, Sir, out of the deepest poverty another $50,000,000 and more was used for speculative purposes in the North-west. And, Sir, I greatly grieve to say that the most of that sum was lost, thanks not so much to the fault of the country as to the gross misgovernment which frittered away and destroyed the great resources it really possessed. Now, Sir, I will tell the hon. gentleman what the real facts of the case were with respect to the period during which Mr. Mackenzie governed this country. The truth is that during those four years the great mass of the people, far from being reduced to the deepest poverty, were living frugally and were accumulating largely, and it was because they lived frugally, because they accumulated largely, that they were able to invest these large sums afterwards. Sir, they accumulated largely under the wise guidance of Mr. Mackenzie, they launched out foolishly and lost huge sums of money in 1831, and the few years following, under the foolish guidance of those who displaced Mr. Mackenzie. You have there the economic history of Canada during those four years in a nutshell. Under our regime, for reasons I have given already, it is true enough there were two or three deficits, though not of very formidable proportions; but under our regime there was this cardinal difference to which I call my hon. friend's attention, under our regime, though the revenue lost, the people gained; but under the regime of these hon. gentlemen the precise opposite has occurred, the revenue has gained, but the people have lost, and lost very heavily. That is the fact, that is the economic law and the truth about that matter. Now, I am not speaking lightly, I am not speaking recklessly, I am not speaking of what I do not know and what I have not seen; I recollect one small riding in Canada where I had unusual facilities for tracing out the effects of that foolish policy. In one small town, to my own knowledge, $200,000 in hard cash were, at the instigation of the present Government or their predecessors, invested in manufactures of which not a single solitary shadow remains; the $200,000 have vanished into smoke and thinnest air. In that same town and vicinity, $400,000 more were invested in wild speculations in the North-west, all of which has been utterly locked up, and of which by far the greatest portion is a dead loss. In the riding at large, more than double that amount was invested in similar speculative enterprises. What was true of that riding, is true, to my certain knowledge, of many other ridings of my own province, and I believe, though not quite to the same extent, of many other portions of Canada. Sir, it need not have been so, it ought not to have been so. I believe myself that, wisely governed and prudently administered, Manitoba and the region adjacent might have been a mine of wealth to the people of Canada, instead of a sinkhole—and I say this without the least desire to hurt the feelings of the hon. gentlemen from that province—for the immense sums invested there. I say that had the wise policy of Mr. Mackenzie, aye, and the wise policy of the then Minister of the Interior, my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), been carried out, and had our policy generally prevailed, there would have been very little loss indeed experienced on the part of those who chose to invest their money in endeavouring to develop the North-west and the great territory adjacent.

Now, Sir, various fallacies have been advanced by the Finance Minister incidentally in the course of his speech, to some of which I have alluded briefly, and to some of which

I may allude a little more. One of them I have touched upon already, that is what I described as the home market fallacy, where the hon. gentleman, as I said, took credit to himself for the increased consumption of four or five hundred thousand people added to our population in the course of seventeen years, and utterly ignored the fact that we had lost two millions of people, between immigrants coming to this country and leaving it, and the loss of the natural growth of our own population as has taken place, a far more valuable factor in the national life, which we have likewise lost. Then there was another fallacy to which I alluded, closely akin to his fallacy wherein he claimed merit for the reduction of interest. The hon. gentleman knows, and his friends are often pointing to the fact that in certain lines of goods there is a considerable fall in prices since 1878. Sir, do these people suppose that the world stood still because Canada committed herself to a foolish and evil policy in the matter of trade? During those seventeen years there have been enormous improvements, enormous discoveries, enormous inventions in everything you choose to name, all which tend to cheapen goods. Whether it be discoveries in science, whether it be discoveries in mechanics, whether it be cheapness of transportation, in everything you choose to name, including the large reduction in the cost of capital, there has been enormous improvement. Sir, do these men dare to tell me, do they dare tell the House, that the National Policy of Canada is responsible for the fact that there have been great discoveries in mechanics, great scientific discoveries in a thousand directions, that there has been a great cheapening in transportation? These things have contributed to cheapen goods, no doubt. It may be true that in spite of all we have done to prevent and neutralize the beneficial effects of these discoveries and inventions, goods in certain lines are cheaper than they were in 1878. I do not care if they are, and I may come to that point again. Now, Sir, if they are willing to shoulder the responsibility for the huge reduction that has taken place in the price of our land, for the huge reduction that has taken place in the price of our grains, for the huge reduction which has taken place in the price of almost every agricultural product in Canada, I will give them with all my heart the benefit of the reduction which has taken place in the price of goods. But until they are willing to admit the one, I wholly and entirely deny them the right to assume the other. Sir, all that the National Policy can do is, to a certain extent, to break the force and break the effect of these discoveries and inventions, and to make goods in Canada a little dearer than they otherwise would be. That is the result of the National Policy, that and nothing else.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to a matter of more immediate moment. The hon. gentleman, in their time, have sent the people of Canada on many a wild-goose chase, they have sent them after many will-o'-the-wisps. Hon. gentlemen sometimes, however, get hold of an idea which has something to recommend it, and with respect to this question of possible preferential trade between Great Britain and her colonies, not on political-economical grounds, but on other grounds, there is, or there might be, something to be said. But have these hon. gentlemen thought out, have they considered, have they reflected for one moment what preferential trade between Great Britain and her colonies means, and are they prepared to pay the price? Suppose the Government of Great Britain were to come down to us and say: Admit British manufactured goods free into Canada, and we will give you a substantial preference in our markets for your produce, your grain, your cattle, over other countries; are hon. gentlemen prepared to pay the price?—or rather are their supporters, the manufacturers of Canada, prepared to pay the price? Sir, I greatly doubt it; and yet, unless that or something closely analogous to that is done, it is the idlest nonsense to talk about the possibility of preferential trade. John Bull is not quite a fool, and he is not going to give preferential advantages to his colonies or anybody else unless his colonies are prepared to admit his goods, his manufactured products, free of charge into their market, or at any rate, on vastly reduced terms, which, I take it, the hon. gentlemen have not the slightest intention of doing. Now, on this matter, much has been said about the intention and desire of the British Government, and a good deal has been made of a supposed fair trade movement, or a supposed movement in the direction of preferential trade, which is alleged to have found certain champions among certain British statesmen or British politicians—for I cannot imagine any British statesman, properly so called, who has pledged himself to any such doctrine. Sir, I want to call the attention of the House and of the Government to certain utterances made on that subject by men who are responsible statesmen, in whose hands the conduct of the destinies of Great Britain is largely held just now. First, I will take a recent statement on this subject made by Lord Salisbury, the present Premier. Dealing with this subject, he said:

I have simply to say, with respect to the question of protection, that this country has adopted the opposite system after a controversy unexampled in its length, in its earnestness, and in the precision with which the ultimate issue was arrived at. If we are to undertake the re-examination of that question, it must not be done incidentally by insinuations, by allusions, by hints. You must firmly walk up to the fortress that you have to attack, and lay siege to it in form. In my belief, the economical arguments in favour of free trade are very strong, but they are not the strongest with which we have to deal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

If he (Lord De La Warr) will look back upon the debate of 1846 and read the speeches of Robert Peel when introducing his great proposal, he will see that the political argument weighed more heavily than even the economical argument in his mind. And I believe that the political argument has lost none of its force. I utterly disbelieve that it is in your power to introduce protection. If it were, I think it would be introducing a state of division among the classes of this country which would differ very little from civil war.

That, Sir, is the statement of the present Premier of England, made on his responsibility, within a very short space of time. But that is not all. Lord Dunraven, a gentleman known by name to all of us, introduced a proposal for the advancement of trade in Her Majesty's dominions. Lord Salisbury said:

My noble friend's proposal is, that we and the colonies should enter into a tariff arrangement to discriminate in favour of the productions of the Empire, as against those of all the rest of the world.

And with the remark that he did not intend to use any deprecatory language of it, he proceeded as follows:—

I ask him to look at the state of opinion in this country, especially the state of opinion in our commercial, manufacturing and industrial classes, the state of opinion, above all, among the capitalists and the most educated classes, and say if he sees the slightest chance, within any period to which we have a right to look forward, of such a modification of opinion in this country as will enable any statesman, whatever his opinion may be, to propose the establishment of retaliatory duties. It seems to me to be absolutely out of the question. If you wish to set up a discriminating system in favour of the colonies as against the rest of the world, just consider what are the goods on which you would have to lay a heavy duty in this country in order to make that discrimination felt. They are grain, wool and meat. What chance have you of inducing the people of this country to accept legislation which would make these essential articles of consumption susceptible of such tariffs? I see no probability whatever of it. That being the case, I think we should be hardly behaving respectfully to the colonies, if we asked them to send representatives to a conference to discuss the question, when we know that the answer which many of them, at all events many of their statesmen, would give must be met immediately on our part by the information that such a thing is absolutely impossible.

That is the statement of the Premier of England. That is the opinion of Lord Salisbury. Here is the opinion of a great economic authority, Lord Farrar. He said:

What does she (Canada) send us? Chiefly cattle, meat, corn, cheese, lard, butter, leather, skins, fish, fruit and timber. In 1891 the value of these things which we had from Canada was about £11,000,000, but in the same year the value of these things which we had from all other countries was much more than £100,000,000, and the value of these things which we have imported from Canada's great rival, the United States, was more than £50,000,000. We are, therefore, asked to deprive ourselves of necessaries from the United States alone valued at £50,000,000, besides an immense quantity from other countries, on the empty promise that Canada's £11,000,000 will, under the encouragement given by a differential duty, grow into the larger amount.

I will now state what a gentleman who is supposed to be a more modern statesman, said on the subject, and it is worth while for hon. gentlemen on both sides to listen, because if we are to be asked to seriously consider the possibility of differential and preferential trade, we might as well know that not merely the oldest statesmen, but those men who are likely in the near future to guide the destinies of the Empire, are equally opposed to any such proposal. Mr. Chamberlain, speaking on the subject, said :

With the growth of intelligence on the part of the working classes, and with the knowledge they now possess of their power, the reaction against such a policy (a tax on food) would be attended by consequences so serious that I do not like to contemplate them.

That is the opinion of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, on the chances of a proposal being adopted for preferential trade. He added :

Mr. Gladstone designates the scheme as wild, impracticable and full of danger.

Hon. gentlemen opposite will not regard Mr. Gladstone's opinion as of much weight ; at all events, Mr. Gladstone is now outside of active political life. Lord Farrar, speaking again on this subject, made these remarks, which are worthy of notice :

Will it conduce to friendly feelings in this country towards Canada, if our working classes are told that their food is dearer or that their employment is lessened in order to give more profit or more employment to the land-owners and farmers of Canada ? And supposing, as is more than probable, that the United States should retaliate, and exclude the £30,000,000 worth of manufactured goods and the many millions' worth of shipping services which we send them, will the loss of that profit and employment make Canada and her people dearer to our manufacturers and our workmen ? I can give Sir Charles Tupper a much easier and more effectual receipt for attracting English settlers to Canada and keeping them from crossing into the United States, when they get there, and that is, relieve them from the heavy and unnecessary tax they now pay to the manufacturers of Ontario by reason of Canada's protective duties on manufactured goods.

I humbly submit that the vagaries of Mr. James Lowther, of Mr. Horace Vincent, and even Sir Charles Tupper, will hardly weigh against the formal and official statements of Mr. Chamberlain, Lord Farrar and Lord Salisbury on this important question ; and I think that until these statements are retracted, until we have reason to believe that the statesmen of the Empire are receiving new light on the subject, we would do well in our present condition, not to waste much time in discussing the possibilities of preferential trade within the limits of the Empire.

Sir, the Minister of Finance also alluded to the question of reciprocity. I do not know that I would be justified in inflicting on the House a narrative of the proceedings in respect to reciprocity which have occurred during the past few years. But this much I will say. When in the year 1888, I proposed to enter into negotiations with the United States on the subject of reciprocity, I did so with the best possible ground—as was admitted afterwards by Sir John Thompson and by Sir John Macdonald—for believing, that any fair proposition on our part would be responded to generously by both classes of politicians in the United States. How was my proposal met ? It was met by the then Minister of Finance with the declaration, that the Government did not care for reciprocity, unless the interests of their paymasters, the ring of protected manufacturers, were protected. That, in so many words and so many terms, was the resolution with which he answered me. We repeated that in 1889, and we were met with substantially the same answer. Not one step, not one little finger was held up by these hon. gentlemen to meet the advances which were then made freely and readily by many men of eminence in the United States. In 1890, when we brought the matter up again for the third time, does not every man who was present remember right well, that Mr. Colby, then a Minister of State, especially appointed to reply to my speech, said, that reciprocity was a bad thing all through, and especially did Mr. Colby contend that reciprocity was a very bad thing for the farmers of Canada. What was the next act in the drama ? Sir, the next act was, that when the Government found the people of the country were most earnestly desirous of obtaining reciprocity, they pitched their three resolutions overboard, Mr. Colby included, and they deliberately went to the people of Canada, and deliberately went to His Excellency Lord Stanley, with a lie in their mouths, and they told the people that they had the best reason to expect that they could negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States. But they said it could not be done in a moribund Parliament which had only a year to run—it was too important a thing for that—and they must have a fresh mandate from the people. That is the history in brief of reciprocity so far as it has gone. I ask this House, I ask this country : Could any men have taken steps more thoroughly calculated to estrange the American people ; could any men have taken steps more thoroughly calculated to destroy all possible chance of obtaining reciprocity, than did the Canadian Government by their conduct, in three times deliberately shutting the door in the face of negotiations, and then at the fourth time attempting to trick the people of the United States and to trick the people of Canada? Sir, I am not speaking without warrant. I have here the Sessional Papers for 1891, and I will read to the House one or two pieces of evidence which will show the statesmanlike fashion in which these negotiations for reciprocity were conducted by the Canadian Government. One of these is a statement of Mr. Blaine, in supplement be it remembered, of a formal letter addressed by him to Mr. Baker, a congressman in northern New York, who made inquiries as to whether any negotiations were going on. Hon. gentlemen will remember that Mr. Blaine denied in the most emphatic manner that any such negotiations had gone on. Mr. Blaine's statement will be found in the Sessional Papers 38-A of 1891, and it is well that hon. gentlemen should make a note of it. Mr. Blaine says:

In view of the fact that you—

That is. Sir Julian Pauncefote—

—had come to the State Department with the proposals,—

That is to say, the proposals for reciprocity—

—In view of the fact that you had come to the State Department with the proposals, and that the subject was then for the first time mentioned between us; and in view of the further fact that I agreed to a private conference, as explained in my minute; I confess that it was a surprise to me that, several weeks later, during the Canadian canvas, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper both stated before public assemblages, that an informal discussion of a reciprocity treaty would take place at Washington after the 4th of March, by the initiation of the Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State referred to was Mr. Blaine himself. He continues:

I detail these facts because I deem it important, since the matter has been for some weeks open to public remark, to have it settled that the conference was not initiated by me, but, on the contrary, that the private arrangement of which I spoke, was a modification of your proposal, and in no sense an original suggestion from the Government of the United States.

There, Sir, is a most formal and emphatic contradiction of the statement made by the late Sir John Macdonald, and by Sir Charles Tupper, that those negotiations were initiated by the United States, and it is also a contradiction of their other statement, that they were sure to get a reciprocity treaty if they came with a fresh mandate from the people. And here is another letter from Sir Charles Tupper to Sir John Macdonald under date 21st April, 1891. Of course it was for no treasonable purpose that Sir Charles Tupper was in Washington. At least I hope not. When I go to Washington it is high treason, but when Sir Charles Tupper dances attendance at Washington, it is for the good of his country. But that is a detail. Here is what I want to call attention to, and it is written by Sir Charles Tupper be it remembered:

I told Mr. Blaine that I wished at the outset to recognize the accuracy of the statement contained in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote, which I have seen, in reference to the initiation of the negotiations regarding reciprocal trade arrangements between the two countries.

I wish to recognize the accuracy of Mr. Blaine's statement, says Sir Charles Tupper. Sir, in plain terms, Mr. Blaine's statement was a statement that he had been grossly deceived by the Canadian Government, and that the Canadian Government had grossly deceived the Canadian people, and Sir Charles Tupper wishes to recognize the accuracy of that statement. Sir Charles Tupper then spoke the truth, and nothing but the truth, and the whole truth, and I fully believe his statement which I have read to the House.

Now I come to another matter which I have alluded to once or twice before, but which the Finance Minister—or perhaps I should more correctly say, some of his colleagues—found it extremely convenient to disregard. Those men are constantly pointing to little proofs, as I call them, of the progress of Canada, and they say it is a wonderful thing that our savings banks deposits range to forty million dollars or thereabouts. I do not deny that an increase of savings banks deposits, or an increase of bank deposits, or an increase of other deposits of any kind, are pro tanto, and in a certain direction, proofs that a certain section of the community is accumulating money. Whether they are proofs that money could be employed profitably in Canada is another question, and I will not enter on it now. I have again to point out, that while all that might be true, it was a still more important truth and fact for Canada, that the collective indebtedness of Canada has increased enormously during the past dozen years. I gave that collective indebtedness, not lightly but after due consideration, at a sum ranging from $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000, and I pointed out that that debt was almost wholly due abroad, and required an annual tribute on our part, ranging from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000. Sir, I might fairly have made it more; but I was aware that while the indebtedness existed, on a considerable part of it we were not in the habit of paying more than a small percentage. Any gentleman who wants to ascertain the facts for himself may look, not to a paper friendly to me, but to the Montreal "Gazette" of that date, where he will find a tolerably accurate summary, not of all the things I have accounted, but of sums quite sufficient to prove my case, which was that our collective indebtedness was probably not less than $1,000,000,000, and that the tribute we had to pay—and that is a very important matter, especially to gentlemen who are anxious about the balance of trade—ranged from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 a year, which had to be paid in some shape or form out of the earnings of the people of Canada. But, Sir, there is another side to this matter. Over and above all that, I want tonight to spend a few moments in calling the attention of the House to the fact that grave as our taxation is, and I am not going to underrate it, grave as our debt is, and I am not going to underrate it, there is, besides, this further thing to be taken into account in judging of the financial condition of the people of Canada—that we are at present subjected to an enormous local taxation, which is really a good deal larger than I had supposed it to be. Here again I am not going to quote from authorities which I might be supposed to have influenced in any shape or way. I will take an authority from an independent source, which is not by any means specially favourable to myself, but which is, I think, in this matter speaking by the card. I found the other day in the Montreal "Star" a review of the financial situation of the city of Montreal, and this is what it said :

The city debt of Montreal stands at $107 per head. No other Canadian city is so afflicted. Some of the per capita debts, roughly estimated, are as follows :—

	Per head.
Halifax	$71
Hamilton	66
London	59
Quebec	91
Toronto	88
Ottawa	75
Winnipeg	67

Not one of the others run over the century.

Now, Sir, I would like the House to understand what that means. As I compute, if every individual in the city of Montreal is on the average indebted to the amount of $107 for local indebtedness, if, besides, he has to pay his share of the federal indebtedness, if, besides that, he has to pay his share, as everybody knows he has, and more, of the provincial indebtedness of the province of Quebec; what follows? Why, Sir, this follows, that on the average every head of a family in the city of Montreal, to start with is indebted in, and has to provide for the interest on, the sum of $885, a very tidy little sum indeed for each wage-earner in a community like Montreal to have to provide for local, federal and provincial indebtedness. Any hon. gentleman who chooses to make the calculation will see for himself that I have not exaggerated the case. If he adds together the local indebtedness of $107 each per head, or $535 per family, the federal debt, which is at least $250 per family, and the provincial debt, which I am told is about $100 per family, he will find that these amounts make in all about $885. And the same thing applies, although in a less degree, to all the citizens of all those cities which I have named, who constitute, as everybody knows, a very considerable fraction of the whole bulk of our population.

Now, Sir, we were told a little while ago that we in Canada were in a state of exceeding great prosperity. That has been repeated and enlarged upon many a time by the Finance Minister and by his colleagues. Sir, I shall have to take the liberty of quoting from that same authority again, and I will call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite who will not listen to my words, to what is said by a paper which has certainly no interest in running down the value of property in Montreal, or in depreciating the citizens of that good city. This is what it says :

The stagnation in building operations and the large number of unemployed in the city are attracting great attention at present. A well-known priest stated, the other day, that not for years had he seen so many unemployed people and so much misery among the labouring classes. His presbytery, he stated, was fairly overrun, and at the present time he was providing for over two hundred families who were in destitute circumstances. Never had he known so many workmen out of employ. Leading city builders and contractors were seen by "Star" reporters, in order to obtain their views upon the causes of the present stagnation of business, with the following results :—

Ald. Peter Lyall, who has for many years now been engaged extensively in building operations in the city of Montreal, also regards the present situation as most serious. The present high rate of taxation in the city, rendered necessary by wasteful and dishonest methods of managing our municipal affairs, has, in Ald. Lyall's opinion, had a most injurious effect upon the mind of the investor in real estate, who looks for a fair return for his investment. "Why, take my own case," said Ald. Lyall; "I have a large sum of money invested in real estate in the city here, and it actually does not return me enough to pay taxes and cost of maintenance."

Now, Sir, if there be a city in Canada which has been prospered by the National Policy, that city is the city of Montreal; and if that be the condition of Montreal, what is likely to be the condition of towns like Halifax, Charlottetown, St. John and a hundred and one cities, towns and villages throughout Ontario which for ten years have not been able to maintain their natural growth, let alone add, as they ought to do, largely to their population. Sir, I might say the same of Toronto. That city I know myself, and hon. gentlemen opposite may contradict me, if they choose to take that responsibility. I know that in Toronto there has not been for many a long year so much difficulty in finding employment, and the professional classes there all through find the greatest difficulty in collecting their accounts. I know that in Toronto, in large and valuable areas, real estate is almost unsaleable. I know that to-day in the city of Toronto it is a matter of extreme difficulty on the part of a great many owners of formerly productive real estate to obtain enough rent from their properties to pay the taxes on them. If I am wrong in that statement, the Toronto representatives can contradict me, and the Toronto papers may investigate the matter for themselves. While the question of prosperity concerns not only Montreal and Toronto, but the whole country, I named those two cities because they if any stood to prosper by the National Policy. Sir, they are failing to prosper, and why? Because all through Quebec and Ontario the population in the rural districts is stagnant and stationary; because the farmers find it all they can do to make both ends meet; because they have no longer the handsome surplus to dispose of which, when they had it, brought wealth and prosperity to the inhabitants of the cities; and because, in the long result, no city can prosper unless the rural and agricultural communities prosper too. Sir, let me review briefly the Finance Minister's boasts. The Finance Minister and some of his colleagues and supporters, as well as the Conservative press, boast that the deficit is only $4,000,000. It is only as large in one year as the three deficits of the Mackenzie Government were in 1876, 1877 and 1878. Sir, that is the net result of seventeen years of unexampled prosperity, seventeen years of prudent administration, seventeen years of paternal government. I do not envy hon. gentlemen their position. But the hon. Finance Minister has other boasts. He boasts that our debt is only $250,000,000—a flea-bite for a country with the resources of Canada. And there are only $30,000,000 additional liabilities not provided for. He boasts, likewise, that our expenditure is a mere bagatelle of $38,000,000—$40,000,000 if everything were provided for. I have said before, and I repeat, that $38,000,000, let alone $40,000,000, is, in my judgment, a monstrous sum for this people to be called on to provide for. It is a matter of record and history, that when the United States mustered 20,000,000 strong, their total expenditure for federal purposes was barely $22,000,000. The United States, with 20,000,000 people, could administer their federal government for very little more than one-half of that which it costs Canada today. And if it be true that $4,000,000 of that goes in subsidies, remember that we have as yet neither army nor navy, not any of those expenditures for which the United States had then to provide. They make it a boast—and it is a shameful boast—that there are only a million of Canadians in the United States; they boast that only a million of the flower of our population have deserted our country—which, as I repeat, is large enough to provide for one hundred millions—to seek employment in a foreign land. It is their boast that we have lost only 700,000 out of the 800,000 immigrants who came into this country in a period of ten years. They make it their boast that we only owe, collectively, $1,000,000,000—aye, and I see some of these wisecracs were good enough to take me to task because, when I stated that we owed collectively $1,000,000,000, I did not say that some—well, I will not describe them as I might—but some statisticians in Canada and elsewhere estimated the value of Canada's territory at $4,000,000,000. They might estimate it at any amount they liked, that would not render our lands more valuable or our taxes less onerous. This talk of valuing a country at four or five thousand or six thousand millions is preposterous nonsense. The $1,000,000,000 of debt is there, and the interest on that has to be paid, and the four thousand or five thousand millions of hypothetical values are practically of no value to us whatever. I daresay that this half continent of ours is worth many times four thousand millions if properly occupied and exploited, but that does not, in the slightest degree, at present, enable us to pay the interest on our $1,000,000,000. Sir, I suppose they would likewise consider it a ground for just glorification that the income of the chief producing class has only been reduced one-half, and when I am speaking of that I do not mean to say simply that the prices of produce have been reduced by one-half, although that is too near the truth in many cases. But I say their income has been reduced because the margin of profit, out of which that income arises, has been reduced one-half or more. When wheat falls from one dollar to 65 cents, the loss to the farmers is not fairly measured by the 25 cents or 30 cents a bushel. That loss represents very nearly the whole margin of his profit, and his whole income might very easily be swept away by a reduction of 25 or 30 cents per bushel. They might also make it their boast that the rate of growth of Canada has fallen to one-half of what it used to be in our time, and to one-half of what it used to be in the time previous to ours—aye, to one-half of that which actually prevails in the mother country, and many other densely peopled countries. They would make it their boast, I suppose—although they are a little tender and delicate on that point—but they might, with equal propriety, boast that growth has ceased altogether in the three important provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Nevertheless, all those are just as fit subjects for boastfulness as the boast that we have only a deficit of four million dollars, and only a debt of $253,000,000. To my poor mind, we have had enough of these impudent misstatements and twaddle about progress. It is time for the people of Canada to hear a few plain truths; and one of these plain truths is this, that seventeen years ago a majority of the then electorate played the fool, and they have since paid very bitterly for it. They put themselves in the hands of a lot of political tickets of leave, and they have been duped and plundered ever since, as few nations have ever been. One thousand millions of treasure and two millions of people would hardly represent the loss in men and money which they have inflicted on the people of Canada. Over and above all that, we have the control of a huge territory, large enough to carve into half-a-dozen kingdoms. We have lost control of it, absolutely; we can exercise no dominion over it, and we have not got enough out of it to pay for the boundary stakes. I do not speak of the $58,000,000 promised us in cash and securities better than cash; but I say, as an absolute fact, that we have thrown away an Empire and have not enough to pay for the boundary stakes to measure it off. We have thrown away chances, by a wise and judicious use of which we might well have redeemed a great deal of the loss that has been sustained by us. We have failed utterly to get new markets. The markets we have to-day are cribbed, cabined and confined, for more than they were five or six years ago. The Government have failed completely to keep up the prices of our chief products, which was the main inducement held out to the rural population for voting this National Policy in 1878. I need not say it, we know it too well, that we have failed utterly and completely to colonize those territories which we acquired in the North-west. We have failed to keep our people in our own territory. The plain truth is that hon. gentlemen opposite have failed in everything except in the one thing of heaping debt on debt and tax on tax, and in breeding scandals and plotting and conspiring among themselves to betray one another. Now, these men come whining to us and tell us that these things have arisen from causes beyond their control. They tell us that no government can maintain prices, that prices are fixed by demand and supply. Sir, that is true; but if that be true, why did they and their confederates tell the people in 1878 that it was in the power of the Government to regulate all those things? They tell us that they are not responsible for the shrinkage in the value of our imports. They tell us that they are not responsible for the distress in the United States, or for the short harvests which some time ago overtook portions of our Dominion. Granted; but why did they falsely charge Mr. Mackenzie and his Administration in 1878 with being responsible for all those things? Sir, in many respects, they are very much responsible. They have shown themselves to be ignorant and mischievous charlatans. They have shown that they have devised a policy which was perfectly certain to exhaust Canada—a policy which, of all other policies, I hold and believe to have been most utterly unsuited to our circumstances and position. I tell the hon. gentlemen, if they want to know, what Canada did and does need to-day. What Canada needs is lighter taxes, larger markets, bigger population, free land for the settlers, and freedom from government interference. I will grant that these gentlemen could not keep up the price of grain, although they said they could, but while they could not keep up the price of grain, they might, if they had been well advised, have kept our taxes down. They could have given the people the benefit of the reduced prices in many other articles of consumption, which, from a variety of causes exist in other countries. They could have given the North-west a chance. Aye, Sir, and they could have kept their hands from picking and stealing. They could have abstained from Tay canals; they could have abstained from Curran bridges; they could have abstained from McGreevy contracts, from Fredericton jobs, from Onderdonk contracts, from Caraqueet railways and from the thousand and one rascalities of a like order, Oxford and New Glasgow short lines included. Sir, what are our prospects now? I say deliberately—and I speak with knowledge won by seventeen years and more of hard study of the situation—that in all the elements of real strength, in all the elements of true national wealth, Canada to-day is worse off than Canada was seventeen years ago. I say that this National Policy of theirs has put back the progress of Canada for a whole generation; I say that a thousand golden opportunities have been lost. I grant that we cannot undo what has been done—not even the gods can do that—but we can, with God's blessing, stop the downward progress of the country.

What have these men been, Sir, but servile copyists of every vice of the United States; servile copyists of every mistake the Americans have made, and made under circumstances which excuse that people, but which do not exist here. If the United States, under stress of civil war, saw fit to adopt a bad fiscal policy, a policy condemned by the experience of every educated man in the world, what must our loyal friends opposite do but straightway adopt from the United States that villainous fiscal policy of theirs? And they did not forget either, to copy their gerrymander, which is also a complete departure from sound British rule. But while they could copy the vices, they took care not to copy the high redeeming qualities of the United States. They would not copy the American's energy; they would not copy the American's ability; they would not copy the American's patriotism. In lieu thereof they fostered a jingoism of which I do not say more than this—that, while English jingoism may be respectable, I have nothing but contempt for Canadian jingoism in any shape or form.

And now, Sir, these incapables to whom we pay a hundred thousand dollars a year to govern the country—and never was money worse spent—these men who cannot meet in the council chamber without coming to blows, this combination who are worse than Tammany Hall—for the sachems there are at least true to each other—these men take us to task and talk of our having reduced Canada to poverty and misfortune in 1878. I desire to call attention to one charge which these hon. gentlemen are very fond of making against the Liberal party. And of all the members of the Liberal party, I think, that perhaps I have been the one upon whom they have most earnestly tried to fasten this accusation. On all occasions when these gentlemen are confronted with facts such as I have given to-night, such as I have given in other places, they take refuge in the accusation: These men are pessimists; they decry their country, they wish to injure the reputation of their country; do not trust these pessimists. What is the creed of the Liberal party? It is of all creeds the one most opposed to pessimism. The creed of the Liberal party is this—that Canada has such great natural advantages, her people are so intelligent and capable, that given a fair field and fair market they can hold their own against any country, the United States, England or any other. The creed of the Liberal party is that Canada and the Canadians are able to stand alone and need no coddling; that all the manufacturers of Canada who are worth their salt, if they were allowed to compete in a fair market with those of the United States would be able to hold their own, just as the natives of Canada who have left this country and gone to the United States are able to hold their own among the people there. One of the redeeming points of the situation is that our Canadian friends and relatives, when they go to the United States, almost invariably do well, and a very large proportion of them attain positions of eminence and high emolument in the United States. We are pessimists, are we? Well, Sir, I am going to give the hon. gentlemen an illustration of the kind of pessimists we are. I will make no apology for reading a quotation I have read to this House before from one of the most eminent economists in the United States:

North of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and of the River St. Lawrence, and east of Lake Huron, south of the 45th parallel of latitude, and included mainly in the present Dominion of Canada, there is as fair a country as exists on the American continent, nearly as large in area as New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio combined, and equal, if not superior, as a whole, to those states in agricultural capability. It is the natural habitation on this continent of the combing-wool sheep. It is the land which grows the finest barley, which the brewing interest of the United States must have, if it ever expects to rival Great Britain in its annual export of eleven millions, sterling, of malt products. It raises and grazes the finest cattle, with qualities specially desirable to make good the deterioration of stock in other sections, and its climatic conditions, created by an almost encirclement of the great lakes, especially fit it to grow men.

And women, too.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Such a country is one of the greatest gifts of providence to the human race; better than bonanzas of silver or rivers whose sands run gold.

That is the kind of country we have or at least a large part of it; and there are other portions which are very nearly as good. Sir, is it pessimism on my part or on the part of my hon. friends here to say that men who inhabit a country like that ought to be able, in all conscience and in all honour, to hold their own in competition with the people of any nation on earth? Strike the shackles from the limbs of this people. They need no protective coddling; they can hold their own against the world. I oppose protection, as Mr. Bayard opposes it, in all its aspects, because protection means slavery, because protection means corruption, because protection is arrant folly, and I am bound to oppose such an unholy trinity until I die.

And now, Sir, what can the Liberal party offer to Canada? Gentlemen opposite ask what we can offer and what we can do. I will endeavour to state to the House and to the country what, in my poor opinion, the Liberal party can offer to Canada. First of all, the Liberal party can offer to Canada lower taxes and taxes honestly imposed and far most justly distributed than at present; so adjusted and distributed that every farthing of taxation imposed upon the people shall go into the coffers of the nation, and not into the coffers of a few private individuals as at present. What can we do more; what can we offer more? We can offer a fair and reasonable hope of obtaining a vastly larger and more valuable market than we at present possess, and that, too, at our doors, without ransacking the antipodes in the vain hope of finding it. We can offer a fair prospect of the settlement of domestic disputes, a fair prospect of obtaining a solution of complicated and difficult questions which, if handled as they have been in the past by fanatics and intriguers are capable of rending our young Dominion into a thousand pieces. The Liberal party offer the people of Canada, a clean, honest, economical administration, carried on with a single eye to the public good, and free from those shameful scandals which have brought discredit upon the country and have brought the blush of shame to the cheek of every honest man in Canada, whatever political party he may belong to. These are the things the Liberal party can offer; these are the things the Liberal party can do. They offer a reasonable prospect to the people of keeping Canadians in Canada and elevating Canada and making her what she ought to be rather than reducing her to the level of a mere breeding ground of citizens who leave its shores to swell the ranks and add to the power of another state. Sir, all those things the Liberal party offers, all those things I believe, with God's help, the Liberal party will shortly be able to do; and in that belief I again repeat, the Liberal party have nothing to fear from a comparison with the creed or the record of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, we have heard from the member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in three installments. Several days ago we had the first, to-day we have had the last two; and I am in the judgment of this House when I say that in that long speech, and at all these different stages, nothing novel has fallen from the lips of that hon. gentleman with the exception of a reference to preferential trade. There was, of course, the usual criticism of the financial portion of the Budget speech, there was the usual ingenious handling of figures, and the usual effort to minimize any encouraging statement that the Finance Minister put forth. For instance, the hon. gentleman called his opponents again and again, charlatans, liars, conspirators, thieves, rascals, and then turning on the people at large, he called them fools. The language was strong, I might say coarse, but it was not new. For seventeen years we have heard from the member for South Oxford the same style and the same tone, but for seventeen years the people of Canada have preferred to stand his abuse rather than stand him. They had him before, they have been well without him for seventeen years. There was, Mr. Speaker, one new idea that we got from the member for South Oxford. I do not think that in all the other tirades on similar occasions, he has referred to Manitoba as a sinkhole for public money, but to-night he has coupled Manitoba with that description, and thus added to the vocabulary with which he is wont to refer to what he calls the shreds and patches of confederation. Now, going back to installment No. 1 of this long statement of the member for South Oxford, I shall ask the patience of the House while I examine some of his so-called facts and figures, and give some reason why the people of Canada, the fools as he calls them, the majority of the electors of this country, persist in discrediting him, and discrediting any of the different policies that he has adopted and advocated since 1878. That hon. gentleman said there were several reasons why the Government of the day should be turned out of office, and reason No. 1 was that every prediction made by the advocates of the National Policy from 1878 has been falsified. Several times, in the different installments of his speech, he has referred with great glee and at some length to statements made by Conservatives, notably the Secretary of State, where, in his enthusiasm, and in the advocacy of the cause he was then pleading, he had pictured a condition of things as about to take place, or as possible in the history of Canada, in too glowing colours, and he gloried because the prophecies he had made as to the production of grain and all that kind of thing, had not been fulfilled. Does the hon. gentleman think it would be a proof or satisfactory evidence that the National Policy had been a failure, if he can establish that the advocates of that policy made in connection with it, predictions that have not fully come to pass? If he does, and if that argument be sufficient, what becomes of his darling doctrine of free trade? For instance, what position are the advocates of that doctrine in England to-day forced to take in regard to the predictions of Cobden and of Bright, and even of Sir Robert Peel. The latter statesman, for instance, speaking in regard to the great advantage that free trade would bring to the agriculturists, stated specifically, when endeavouring to still their fears and allay their alarms, that the only country in the world that would ever be able to compete at all with England with reference to cattle, would be Holland. What becomes of the prophesy, what becomes of the arguments, indeed, for they were arguments, and pressed hotly, that if England would adopt free trade, all the great nations of the world would be compelled to adopt it also? Their standing, according to the test which the hon. gentleman lays down, would be poor indeed. I dwell upon this for a moment, because it is evidence, if evidence be needed, of the unfairness of the member for South Oxford in dealing with the position of his opponents. I call his attention to the language of Lord Derby, when dealing with similar criticisms in regard to the attitude of the two English statesmen to whom he alluded. Lord Derby, speaking on one occasion in England, says of Cobden:

He was too sanguine; most Reformers are. I suppose, without that temperament a man can hardly be a Reformer. He allowed, perhaps, too little for the influence of various passions on men. But where——where is the public teacher, I ask again, in any age and country, who has fully realized his ideal? A man is not to be deprived of credit for what he has done because he himself expected to do more.

And I call particular attention to this question of Lord Derby:

I am not quoting that as an apology for the advocates of the National Policy. I refer to it simply for the purpose of establishing the exaggerated and unfair position assumed by the member for South Oxford in debate. In regard to the National Policy, I say this, and I am willing to submit to the people of this country upon it—we must perforce submit to their conclusion on that point—I say that taking the arguments of Sir John A. Macdonald and the gentlemen who fought with him from 1875 to 1878, none of them, so far as I can remember, dared to picture the position that Canada has been able to hold in the most extraordinary financial crisis that ever overtook the world. I believe not one of those men ever ventured to say that Canadian banks, that Canadian industries generally, could ride out the world's financial gale as they have ridden it. I fail to recollect a case, and if there be a case where any advocate of that policy predicted this fact, I should be glad to hear it. But when the hon. gentleman denounces men for having said this or that in their advocacy of the National Policy, has he forgotten that it was often from the benches behind him that appeals came during those years from 1875 to 1878? Has he forgotten that business men who had been life-long Liberals, and who desired to see the Liberal party sustained and triumphant—has he forgotten what those gentlemen told him of the actual condition, not only of their particular business, but of the particular portions of Canada from which they came? Has he forgotten the advice and the predictions of the gentlemen who sits behind him, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) as to what a protective tariff would do for this country? Has he forgotten what the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who is not in his seat, declared at that time? Have their predictions been falsified? I hope that in this debate the member for Brant will show the Finance Minister that the predictions he made in regard to protection have not been falsified, and also that under no other policy, and under no other tariff than that which includes and involves protection, could there be anything like the prosperity that exists in this country to-day. For instance, I have under my hand some words spoken by the hon. member for North Norfolk in 1877, where he told the Finance Minister that:

He believed that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufactures being brought to the door of the farmer would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be salable if the market were 3,000 miles away. With a home market of this kind established by protection to manufacturers, the agriculturist can benefit his soil by a rotation of crops.

Every word of that statement is correct, and has been borne out by the facts, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was only belittling in a general way to-night the advantage of the home market, which has enabled the farmers of Canada to withstand the extraordinary decline in the prices of agricultural produce in the markets of the world. Mr. Workman, a leading business man, and a Liberal, representing Montreal, applied to the hon. member for South Oxford when he was Finance Minister to look about him and to take notice of the dire distress existing in that great commercial centre, Montreal; and speaking in this House, he depicted the hard times within his own experience under the free trade system between 1827 and 1837. Speaking in 1878 of the establishment of manufactures under a protective tariff, he concluded:

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Until two years ago they were better, but, since they had to meet the competition from the Northern States, which had partly destroyed a number of them.

Then there was his colleague, Mr. Devlin, of Montreal, elected a Liberal. He made an appeal to the financial leader of the party during the same session, and was compelled to tell him that thousands of workingmen were in dire distress in Montreal, and starvation was staring thousands in the face. Yet the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would make this House believe, by turning and twisting statistics, that everything was happy and the people were contented during the period when he ruled.

But what were two of the great articles of commerce in Canada that were in a most unfortunate position in those days, and regarding which prophecies were made and predictions were put forth? One was an industry of which I know something, the coal industry, and the other was the sugar industry. These two interests involved millions of capital. They had sunk into a pitiable position, and Liberals appealed in vain to the Finance Minister to readjust the tariff, to give some protection, particularly to sugar, in order to keep employment in the country for thousands of workingmen, and prevent millions of capital from going to New York and Boston. Members of the Conservative party did prophecy and predict that with a protective system fairly adjusted as regards those two interests in particular, prosperity would be brought to them and advantage would accrue to Canada. Now, what are the facts in respect to those interests? Coal and sugar are cheaper than they ever were in this country, and cheaper than in any year between 1874 and 1878 people said or thought it was possible to have them in 1896. Let us see exactly what happened when this policy was introduced, because from these articles we can gather much in regard to other articles. In 1874 the production of coal in Nova Scotia amounted in round figures to 900,000 tons, and in 1879 that production had declined to 800,000 tons; whereas in 1894, the latest figures at hand, the production amounted to 2,500,000 tons for the year ending September 30th. Taking Nova Scotia and British Columbia together the production was 1,000,000 tons in 1879 and 3,500,000 tons in 1894. Speaking generally of that industry, I refer to statements recently published by one of the best authorities on coal in Nova Scotia, and the condition of the coal trade—Mr. G. R. Lithgow, of Halifax. He says:

Beginning with 688,628 tons in 1879, the sales increased to 2,060,765 tons in 1894, footing up 23,394,765 in those sixteen years of the National Policy. Comparing these with sixteen years, beginning with 1855, during eleven of which our coals went into the United States, free of duty, the increase is 16,831,910 tons, over 1,050,000 tons a year on an average.

In regard to sugar, I call attention to the fact that we imported in 1878 only 19,000,000 pounds of raw sugar, whereas in 1895 we imported 345,000,000 pounds. I do not intend to go very far into statistics. In a debate of this kind I am of opinion that so far as the financial aspect is concerned, we should in reason be satisfied with the statement of the Finance Minister and the statement of the financial critic, and there is so much matter, and there are so many subjects outside of that line that time will not permit me to deal generally with the trade statistics, even if it were necessary. I wish to establish from the mouths of political opponents as well as from the representatives of banking institutions that the laboured argument of the hon. member for South Oxford is not founded upon fact, is not founded upon the experience of business men or upon the experience of the people of Canada at large. I say that the picture of blue ruin drawn by the hon. gentleman, the picture of despondency drawn from the history of Canada, is entirely contrary to the general opinion, not only of the public at large, but certainly against all statements put forth by Canadian business men. I will give the hon. gentleman the opinions of men who do not see eye to eye with us, or eye to eye with him, but who observe what is going on from day to day, and I will refer to the opinion of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who has lately taken great interest in federal politics. That gentleman gives his reasons for being opposed to the National Policy. He is honest, but in giving his reason we are enabled all the more easily to detect the falsehood underlying the position of the hon. member for Oxford. Writing to the "Week," he said :

If Sir John's theory of confederation be sound and correct, then the National Policy is just the right thing, for its aim and design is to foster commercial union and intercourse between the various portions of this Dominion. * * If I had any confidence in this confederation, I would support the National Policy with all my heart. The ground on which I venture to call in question its wisdom strikes at the root of confederation itself.

There is much in that statement because the hon. member for Oxford continually dwells on our exports and imports with respect to the condition of trade. But this gentleman, an ally, one endeavouring to upset this Government, who is against and was against confederation and against the National Policy, states what is evident to every hon. gentleman in this House, that the secret of Canada's comparative strength to-day, and Canada's comparative calm at this moment, is that there is growing and has already grown, an enormous interprovincial trade and commercial union in this great country of British North America, and this trade is already complete. But there are other men who are not so pessimistic as the hon. member for Oxford, and yet who work with him, and their position and his position on the general condition of Canada's National Policy are as far apart as the poles. I find Sir Oliver Mowat, Prime Minister of Ontario, stating in 1887, when we had considerable experience of the National Policy :

That a comparison of the statistics of both countries, for the past half century, would show that the percentage in every department was greater in Canada than it is on the aggregate in the United States, and, as Canada had prospered in the past, so she would in the future.

Again, that gentleman in 1891 when combatting, as I believe he was combatting, the most dangerous policy that was ever introduced or propounded in this country giving a sort of adhesion to the question of greater and freer trade relations with the United States ; he almost pleaded with his party, in a very able letter at the time, against the dangerous doctrine of discrimination. He was snubbed for a moment by the "Globe," but later on, as I once before said, he carried his point. He wrote the late Mr. Mackenzie as follows :—

Our farmers as a class, or our mechanics as a class, or our labourers as a class, whatever the reasons may be, are not less comfortable, on the whole, than the farmers, the mechanics, and the labourers of the United States appear to be.

And yet, we are told by gentlemen on the other side of the House, and it is dinned into our ears, that in the United States there is free trade between forty nations. In the year 1892, I find a colleague of Sir Oliver Mowat's in the province of Ontario, the Hon. Mr. Harcourt, Provincial Treasurer, saying :

Decade after decade witnesses progress and advancement in every direction and in every part of the province.

The Attorney General of Nova Scotia happened to go abroad in July, 1895. That is very close to the present time and when many years had intervened between the introduction of the National Policy and the present. Interviewed by the representative of an important publication "Commerce," he is asked the following question :—

I suppose Nova Scotia can scarcely be looked upon as a likely agricultural colony.

And this Liberal Attorney General, this ally of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) replied :

Why not ? Agriculture is prosperous, and there are great openings here for the right sort of men. You can have no idea of the charming life a farmer may lead in Nova Scotia on a very moderate income.

I will give the last reference from my political opponents whom I am quoting here to answer the member from South Oxford, as against the lugubrious picture he has drawn of the state of the country. My last reference is to the hon. member for Guysboro'

(Mr. Fraser). The member for Guysboro' is no friend of this Government. The member for Guysboro' is an opponent of this Government, but yet in Boston he told the truth of his country, and in telling the truth of his country he contradicted the larger part of the speech of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). In the Boston "Standard," reproduced in the Reform paper of my county, the "Eastern Chronicle," Mr. Fraser appears to have said under date Nov. 21st, 1895 :

Canada is cosmopolitan, but none the less sincere in its British allegiance. We look upon it as the cleanest, most contented and most honourably governed country on this hemisphere, and, likely, on the other. We have about five millions of people, spread over an area larger than that of the United States. Most of them are English and Scotch, sturdy, ingenious, progressive and peaceful people. Our schools are excellent.

And so on. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, in order, if possible, to clinch this point I have taken, I shall give some references which will be found interesting as well as instructive, and I desire to quote from the reports of some of the great banking institutions of Canada presented as recently as last summer. I desire to call attention in the first place to the observations made by the president of the largest banking institution in Canada. He says :

A wide-spread prostration of trade has prevailed for now many years past, and, looking back on the traces upon the path of industry, commerce and finance, made by that adverse wave, we are glad to believe that they will be found less deep in Canada than in most countries. In this connection, let me draw your attention to the high rank which Canadian securities have maintained throughout the long depression. A leading English authority, writing recently on the depreciation of high-class securities, remarked : " Taken all around, it will be seen that, as compared with fifteen years ago, the yield upon first-class securities generally has declined upon an average of about 25 per cent ; or, in other words, the capital values have risen to a corresponding extent, for one fact merely implies the other. In a table supplied in this authority, it appears that Canadian 4-per-cent securities have risen 21½ per cent since 1880.

That, Mr. Speaker, is almost coincident with the introduction of the National Policy :

That is a higher rate than most of the bonds of any other British colony. The suggestion arises, that, while a property like the Bank of Montreal is owned practically and exclusively in Canada, a comparison upon the lines indicated would not be without interest, and it will be satisfactory to the shareholders to learn that, while since 1880 the value of the shares of the Bank of England has risen 25½ per cent ; of the London and County Bank, 24½ per cent ; of the London and Westminster Bank, 22 per cent, and of the other principal British banks, somewhat less, the value of the stock of the Bank of Montreal has advanced since 1880 by 59 per cent.

Now, that is more important than some hon. gentlemen would suppose, because it is an extraordinary fact, that the National Policy in Canada has had to force its way so far as exhibiting results, over the very years and during the very period when a country like Great Britain has had its greatest trial since the introduction of free trade. No one will deny that the statement is correct ; that in England, since 1880, year after year has seen the bitterest struggles with her greatest and staple industries, with financial convulsions of the most extraordinary character, and with periods of depression, lasting and recurring every now and then. Therefore, during that time we have had to try the National Policy, and during that critical period of the world's history, I believe that policy has become firmly fixed in the majority of the minds of my fellow-countrymen. Let me refer to the statement of the general manager of the Bank of Montreal. The general manager of the Bank of Montreal, a business man pure and simple, said this :

Though the past year has not been a prosperous one, it should be a source of great satisfaction to Canadians that the business community in Canada has come so well through the ordeal and with so few failures and disasters. In that we compare favourably with any other country. Indeed, it has been a great surprise to me how well we have stood.

Then coming to another section of the country, and looking at the report of the Eastern Townships bank on the 5th June, 1895, I am glad to be able to read the following statement from the written report of the president :

Most of the Eastern township industries show increased activity. In agriculture there has been an extension of the dairy industry. In manufactures the mills are running full time, although complaint is still made of low prices. The lumber business presents a favourable contrast to last year. In mining there is, at all events, no falling off, and new workings, new applications of scientific skill, and more enterprise are apparent, and should produce good results. There is abundance of employment for increased population, and trade should, therefore, prove more active and remunerative.

Take the Merchants' Bank of Canada, one of the most important financial institutions of this country. The general manager of that bank, Mr. George Hague, said :

With all the defects of our Government and our institutions, there cannot be a question in the minds of any who have impartially considered the subject, that the Dominion of Canada is the best governed portion of the American continent, having the best constitution, the most equitable laws, the best judicial system, the most solid prosperity, and the most rational liberty.

Later on in his report, he said :

Our various lines of manufacture in Canada have been as profitable as they have been in England or the United States.

And later on again, he said :

There is a general air of hopefulness abroad, and I think it is justifiable. The rise in the value of some great staples is undoubtedly having its effect. Increased railway earnings, clearing-house returns, and high values of stocks are all significant.

And this further statement of Mr. Hague is, I think, particularly interesting :

When I first entered a bank in Canada, in 1856, the whole of the deposits of the country in our banks were $15,000,000 ; in 1878, these had increased to $89,000,000 ; in 1890, to $120,000,000, and in 1894, to $270,000,000. These figures include, of course, the deposits in loan companies and savings banks, both Government and incorporated. The mercantile loans and discounts of the banks have grown during the same period from about $35,000,000 to $203,000,000, and demonstrate that the increase of deposits has not been the consequence of stagnation and want of enterprise, but has been accompanied by just as steady a development in the way of opening up lands, improvement of farms, construction of railroads, public works, development of shipping and navigation, improvement of our harbour and lighting of our coast, the growth of settlements into villages, and of villages into towns, and of towns into cities ; all of which many of us here present have seen with our own eyes. If this statement is not enough to convince the most obstinate amongst us that the country steadily progresses, in spite of all drawbacks, he must be hard to convince.

I think that brings out the difference that exists between the member for South Oxford and many other Liberals in this country. I point to it, not for the purpose particularly of contrasting the position of my party with the position of the party opposite, but for the purpose of showing how poor a guide in these matters is the member for South Oxford—how poor a guide a man of his frame of mind is for any country—a man who makes exaggerated statements which, if true, would contradict the statements I have read, which are known to be true by the bulk of the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite to me. Their position, I hope, is not the position of the member for South Oxford, that Canada is not progressing. The only difference that ought to exist between us is as to which party in this country can make the progress of Canada all the greater and more satisfactory.

The hon. gentleman made another remark which was equally without foundation. He said that every prediction made by himself and Mr. Mackenzie in reference to the effect of the National Policy had been verified. That statement enables me to point out how very little the member for South Oxford really knew of Canada and Canada's possibilities and potentialities. For instance, between 1874 and 1878 the hon. gentleman lived in dread of touching or interfering with the finances or the tariff of the country. He was forced to advance 2½ per cent the tariff which he found when he entered office, but he made the greatest mistake ever made in the history of the Reform party when he declined to readjust that tariff between 1876 and 1878 on the lines suggested by his opponents, and also, I believe, by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). The hon. member for South Brant will recollect that his objection was not so much to protection—not so much to all the venality which he thinks follows in its train, but his objection was that he could not get any revenue to govern this country with if he increased the tariff rate. That was his position, and I have under my hand a brief reference to the statements that were not fulfilled—statements of the Reform leader, Mr. Mackenzie, and statements of the financial leader, Sir Richard Cartwright. This was the statement of Mr. Mackenzie, made at Fergus, in 1877—and he spoke often in a similar strain, as did also the member for South Oxford. Mr. Mackenzie there said :

You have now a 17½-per-cent tariff for revenue purposes. If we impose more, you will get a higher price for your boots and shoes, machines, &c. But we must have a revenue, and, as we could not raise it on a higher tariff, you would be obliged to pay property taxes, or a poll tax, to make up the deficiency. There would be nothing left for us but to appoint an assessor to go around and make a direct levy on the people, and that is something which, I fancy, none of you would like to see.

And yet, if this boasted policy, of which we heard a little bit in the last five minutes of the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, were to be put into effect, there would be nothing left but for the tax-gatherer to go around and levy direct taxation. But, leaving that aside for a moment, I give you proof positive that the reason the hon. member for South Oxford and his party hesitated and were lost in 1878 was because they did not know how to get a revenue under a tariff greater than 17½ per cent, for that is the statement of his leader, and his own statement. We have, in another form references to the tariff, and perditions which were certainly not fulfilled. In 1876 the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) presided over a committee that sat to hear the representatives of the languishing industries of this country tell their tale of woe—the committee on the depression of trade. The proposal of higher tariff duties was put before that committee ; a report was made, and some of the conclusions of that report I have under my hand. The report of the depression committee of 1876, referring to the protective system, came to this conclusion, which was the position of the Reform party at that time : First, the consumption of foreign goods would be diminished in Canada. Now, the imports for home consumption in 1876 amounted to $94,000,000, while in 1894 they amounted to $113,000,000. The second conclusion was that the amount of taxation received into the treasury would be reduced—that we would lose from customs revenue, $9,000,000, whereas, the fact is that in 1876 we got $12,000,000 from customs, and in 1894 we got $19,000,000. Then, the prices of goods, it was said, would be increased. It was not the argument we now hear that but for this tariff we could make cheap goods cheaper. But the argument dwelt upon by the opponents of a higher tariff in those days was that you could not raise the tariff without increasing the cost of the articles produced, or else the increase of the tariff would be of no use to the manufacturer. And no man will tell me that the staple articles required by the consumers in this country have increased in cost over and above what they were before the tariff was introduced. Let me give a reference to some articles. I refer hon. gentlemen to the "Journal of Commerce" of the 20th January, 1895, which gives a comparison showing the reductions in price of some of the articles largely used by consumers in this country. That paper states :

Clothing is 35 per cent less in cost than it was ten years ago. Duck overalls, which cost $15 to $24 a dozen between 1870 and 1880, now sell at $6.50. An average suit, ten years ago, sold by travellers at $10, now sells at $5 to $6. The cheapest suit in 1880 which could be bought was $5.25; the price now is $3.25. Canadian worsted, which sold at $13.75, now sells at $9.50.

But what other predictions were there? We know of all the dire things that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would have us imagine have taken place. But there were worse things to happen even than he now claims to have taken place. In 1879, when the tariff was introduced, he predicted a terrific domestic competition which would make the condition of the manufacturers in Canada far worse than it could be made by a foreign war. That was the language of the hon. member for South Oxford. That was the language of the man who would attempt again to guide and to instruct the people of this country. He said that these men, whom he charges now with getting $30,000,000 out of the people of this country, with fleecing the consumers to the tune of $30,000,000 a year since 1878—he said in 1879 that in all the years to follow these men would have to meet such a terrific competition inside their own border that they would be worse off than they would be even in the case of a foreign war. Those two positions are not consistent. In 1879, instead of telling us as he now does, how they would obtain three dollars for every dollar that went into the treasury, how they would fleece the people and bleed the agricultural class white, he told us that the National Policy was the death warrant to the manufacturers of this country. Not content with that, he prophesied that it would drive us into annexation. In 1881 that was the prediction of the hon. member for South Oxford; and in 1896, as late as yesterday, he was loud as any one in this chamber in declaring that, from one end of Canada to the other, there was but one feeling, and that was the feeling of attachment and loyalty to the mother country and the Empire to which we are proud to belong. Therefore in this year of 1896, the prediction that we would be driven into annexation by the National Policy, which he made in 1881, has been decisively falsified. The hon. gentleman said :

I say, that if the hon. gentleman's object be to disgust our people, to incline our people to alter their political relations by preparing them first to enter into a commercial zollverein, and afterwards into political union with the United States, the hon. gentleman is likely to attain his end.

And the hon. gentleman himself, Sir, was the first member in this whole House to propose that we should take the first step to annexation with the United States, which, according to him, was to enter into a commercial zollverein. The second step was to be political union, but the hon. gentleman has lived to 1896, and he has found that the first of the two steps he has signally failed to induce Canadians to take.

Now, the next reference of the hon. gentleman was to Ireland, whose condition he quoted as parallel to that of Canada. Protection was the curse of Ireland, according to the hon. gentleman, just as it is the curse of Canada, and he spoke of the terrible emigration from Ireland as one of the results. But he failed to tell the House—indeed it was not necessary—that the protection in Ireland from which the people emigrated was nothing compared with the protection of the country to which they went. He failed to tell the House that most of the Irish who left Ireland left that country since it enjoyed the blessings of free trade and came to protectionist United States or to protectionist Canada. In both cases, therefore, these people fleeing from the scourge of protection, went to countries that are wedded to it.

The hon. gentleman quoted Mr. Lecky; and although Mr. Lecky did not bear out the hon. gentleman, I wish to add to the information of the House by quoting a statement in point to show that the hon. gentleman cannot make good his position that protection was a curse to Ireland, but that, on the contrary, it is at this moment the prevailing opinion in Ireland that it was first the fiscal tyranny of England over Ireland, and then the free trade system of Great Britain, which have been the primary causes of injury to that country. Let me quote Mr. Parnell, who was an authority on subjects of this kind. I am reading from a little book which I found in the library entitled "Perils to British Trade," by Mr. E. Burgis, dedicated to the late Mr. Froude, and on the first page is a note of approval from Mr. Froude who had read a few of the chapters before he died. On page 125 of this book I find, Mr. Parnell said :

I claim for Ireland that, if the Irish Parliament of the future considers there are certain industries in Ireland which can be benefited by protection, which can be nursed by protection, and which can be placed in such a position as to enable them to compete with similar industries in other countries, by a course of protection over a few years, parliament ought to have the power to carry out that policy. And I tell English Radicals and Liberals, that it is useless for them to talk of their desire to do justice to Ireland, when, with motives of selfishness, they refuse to repair that most manifest injustice of all—the destruction of our manufactures by England in times past.

Mr. Burgis says in another place :

Ireland's millions of acres of uncultivated land, her ruined manufactures and commerce, her half-starving people, and her landed proprietors, testify to the consequences of free trade. The condition of Ireland is a monument to the folly of the "let alone" policy, or leaving things to the chapter of accidents (the Bible of the fool).

It is quite clear, since the date of the union, during the first forty years, English competition ruined Ireland's mechanical industries, and, since England adopted free imports, Ireland has found, year by year, the cultivation of her soil more and more unprofitable ; particularly since 1874 has foreign produce been substituted for that of her own fields. Ireland has suffered more than England.

And again he says :

No reasonable man can doubt that free imports have brought about the decay of agriculture in Ireland, and are the cause of her being rapidly depopulated.

In another part of his book, touching upon the subject of emigration, Mr. Burgis uses an argument in favour of protection somewhat similar to the hon. gentleman's favourite argument for free trade in Canada :

Emigration is one of the great social problems of the day. The stream of emigration has gone on with steady persistence for many years. The stream of labour, the best bone and sinew of the British Isles, the shrewd workers and skilled artisans, have left our shores to establish industries abroad—mainly in the states of the American Union.

They have turned their backs upon the "blessings" of free trade and gone to a country where their labour is protected. The paupers, and loafers, and ne'er-do-weels remain at home. Under the free trade patent for impoverishing and pauperising the nation, a glorious discovery has been made, that a country must be depopulated to be enriched. Drive out the workers—the able-bodied who produce ; the old, the puny, the infirm, the idlers can remain. The exportation of the flower of the working classes, coupled with the importation of destitute aliens, are the outward and visible signs of "prosperity" under our "blessed" free trade system. This bit of satire is warranted by an utterance a few years ago of that eminent free-trade statistician, Mr. Giffen : "The general increase in emigration to the United States may, no doubt, be considered as an additional sign of the revival of trade."

Then the figures of emigration from 1849-1854, after the introduction of free trade in the British Isles, show that the emigration to the United States amounted to 6,428,389, and that the total emigration to all countries, up to 1892 was nearly nine and a half millions. That is the number of people who have left Ireland since the introduction of a policy which, according to the logic of hon. gentlemen opposite, should have kept them at home.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the hon. gentleman the increase of the population for the same period of time as compared with that of previous years ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have not. I was showing that six millions of people have left Ireland since the introduction of the policy of free trade, and I was endeavouring to meet the position of the hon. gentleman from South Oxford to that extent.

Mr. GILLMOR. We want to hear your own speech, you are reading others' speeches.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am sorry to say I shall have to trouble the House with several references. I do not propose to do as the hon. member for South Oxford has largely done, ignore and despise authorities. I propose to give authorities for the statements I make to-night, and in this debate, as I have a particular purpose in so doing.

Now, I wish to deal with a few of the wild propositions on trade that have been laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite in their several utterances. They take a great liberty. I venture to say, in speaking of themselves as Cobdenites, as disciples of Peel, as disciples of Bright, as free-traders. There is not a free-trader before me. I say that with all deference. I do not believe that even the hon. gentleman from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) who has paraded his free-trade creed, is prepared for direct taxation, nor would he dare to advocate it for federal purposes in the county from which he comes.

Mr. GILLMOR. I despise indirect taxation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Exactly ; but the hon. gentleman has not the courage to advocate the alternative. And so with all these gentlemen. And I say that until they have the courage to do as Cobden did, and as Bright did, they should cease sailing or attempting to sail, under the colours of those men.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would rather not be interrupted, because I have a long speech to make. The hon. member for South Oxford must give this House credit for very little knowledge, if he thinks that by these wild denunciations of protection he is denouncing only one side of the House. When he denounces protection and attributes to it all sorts of venality and corruption, he is denouncing the history of Canada, he is denouncing both parties. The only difference between these two parties since 1867 has been in the amount of protection and in the manner in which the protective tariff is to be adjusted. I have already given the authority of Mr. Mackenzie. I will refer again to gentlemen opposite to show that they never denied, that it was impossible to deny, that the tariff that they administered was a protective tariff. It was sufficient for the main purposes of effective protection; it was insufficient to bring prosperity to this country, and it was condemned on that ground. The hon. member for South Oxford used to tell the country that 17½ per cent was prohibitory on certain articles. So, it is absolutely idle for hon. gentlemen opposite to pretend that up to this year they have advocated a policy which they believe is the only policy free from all the vices they have laid at the door of the National Policy. Take, for instance, Mr. Hyam's statement, made in the presence of his leader when that leader was on a tour of education only last fall. Mr. Hyam advocated 25 per cent duties all round on the basis of the imports of 1893, and claimed that that would injure no one. Remember, also, the exhibition made before the people of this country by Mr. Snyder and the leader of the Opposition. Mr. Snyder is a gentleman who is a possible candidate, and who resides, I believe, in Berlin, a seat of manufacturing industry in Ontario. Mr. Snyder stated that, in his opinion, industries had sprung up under the National Policy, and that the Liberal party was not a party that intended to injure them, but, on the contrary, intended to help them—in fact, to give them more protection, or, as he put it, to give them free raw materials which materials they did not now receive free. Whereas, his leader, the leader of the Opposition, having insisted that not an industry in the country had been benefited by the National Policy, endorses Mr. Snyder as a fit and proper representative of the Liberal party. I claim that gentlemen who attempt to attain power or to gain seats in that way cannot talk in the loud tones or use the big words that the hon. member for South Oxford has attempted to do. The leader of the Opposition, on these trade gyrations, said, for instance, at Merrickville, that Mr. Mackenzie's policy of 1878 had been fully vindicated. What was his policy? Not a man in this House will tell me it was a policy of free trade. Not a man can say so, truthfully. I have here what Mr. Mackenzie said as to what it was. In 1880, after it was done and over, Mr. Mackenzie said in this House:

It is said we are hostile to manufacturers. How are we hostile? We believe the revenue tariff which was formerly in existence, gave considerable protection to manufacturers. It was called incidental protection, and, whatever there may be in a name, it was protection nevertheless, because it gave every manufacturer in the country

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

17½ cents on the dollar more than he would be entitled to were trade entirely free between this and foreign countries.

The only place, so far as I know, in which Mr. Mackenzie was a free trader was in Dundee, when he received the freedom of the city, and declared his belief in the principles of free trade. I believe the hon. member for South Oxford has been initiated into the Cobden club, but none of these gentlemen in Canada ever practice free trade. Later on I am going to give them credit for having defined their position for the next fight to be free trade. But there is this in connection with their policy, and to their disgrace, he it said, that while they are committed to a policy of free trade, they have not dared to do as every other free trader in every other country had to do—advocate a corresponding policy of direct taxation such as must be a part of any policy of free trade that has ever been conceived or advocated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You cannot find a single writer who takes that position.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have nothing to do with writers. We have Bright, Cobden and Peel, who are the very guides appealed to by the Liberal leader.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not one of them took that position.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, we will see a little later on. The leader of the Opposition, for instance, says:

We are English Reformers, Reformers of the school of John Bright, Richard Cobden, and that great and good man, Sir Robert Peel.

Well, in regard to trade, has ever any one read from writers or from speeches of the gentlemen whose names I have mentioned, the pattern for the Reformers opposite, that any of them ever were so wild as to conceive a policy akin to that of unrestricted reciprocity, or of locking-up the business of the country to which they belong to one particular nation, and making a discriminating tariff against all others? Did any one of those gentlemen ever hint at such a thing?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, because they lived in an island, and not in the middle of a continent.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then, if there is logic in that, as we are not on an island, we should not advocate free trade. Another difference between the hon. member for South Oxford and Mr. Cobden, is that Cobden was honest in his advocacy of his policy, and insisted that every duty for revenue was a duty for protection. Now, if the hon. member for South Oxford contradicts me when I state that he is contradicting Cobden, his contradiction could be supported by a reference to one occasion when he himself made the admission that every duty for revenue was a duty for protection. I am showing that while these gentlemen attempt to parade in the clothes of free traders, their conduct has been ludicrous in the extreme when examined. Now, coming down to 1895, I desire to call attention to a statement made by the leader of the Opposition at Montreal, and by Mr. Ross, who went to assist him. Free trade as they have it in England was advocated by Mr. Ross. It was to be an adjustment of trade in a sensible, reasonable and practicable way, a gradual approach to free trade. He pictured how long it took in England, from 1842 to 1880, and Mr. Laurier, coming after him, said at that meeting :

It must come after thirty-eight or forty years, or perhaps more.

Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that that position is not creditable to the party opposite. We could understand far better their policy on unrestricted reciprocity, but it is not fitting for the hon. member for South Oxford to thunder against a protective tariff when the antithesis to that tariff is a policy that he dare not touch or handle in his lifetime, for, with the best wishes for the hon. member for South Oxford, we cannot believe it probable that he will live long enough to see the day when free trade will have full force and effect in Canada, thirty-eight or forty years hence. But the hon. gentleman was most unfair to a very important interest in this country, and I have to deal with that before I come to what I will call the evolution of the present Canadian Liberal trade idea. The hon. gentleman referred in a sneering manner to the iron industry, as he most always does to any interest which he conceives to belong to the maritime provinces; he came to the iron industry, and so little did he know of that industry that he thought it consisted in one or two establishments "away down in Nova Scotia." He says that these men who employ ten hands, referring to the Ontario industries, for one that these Nova Scotia industries can employ in the iron industries, are put to extreme hardship and inconvenience. I want to call attention to the spirit of fair play that permeates the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They have great commiseration for the manufacturers of agricultural implements, for the manufacturers, mark you, Mr. Speaker, because the hon. gentleman dwelt on the hardships of those men, because we had so heavily protected "one or two establishments away down in Nova Scotia." Now, how about the labourers who are concerned, not merely in one or two establishments in Nova Scotia, but in establishments in Quebec and in Ontario, and in the various iron industries where labour is more concerned than in any other manufacturing industry in the world. There is no other industry where labour has so large a share as in connection with iron. But for the supposed sake, and in the supposed interest, of certain manufacturers, the hon. member for South Oxford promises to strike down those interests so important to the labourer, because they exist, apparently, "away down in Nova Scotia." That brings me to his leader's position in Montreal. When it was supposed that we were to have a general election, the leader of the Opposition pledged himself to the manufacturers of pianos, carriages and agricultural implements, that whatever else was uncertain in his tariff, he would make coal and iron free. That was his pledge in Montreal at the Windsor Hall meeting and at Sohmer Park. Was there a spirit of fair play in that utterance? Is there a member from the province of Nova Scotia who would advocate, for instance, a policy of that kind? Mr. Speaker, those who are interested in these western industries are fully conscious that such a policy could not last, such a policy could not exist for any length of time in this country. The development of the coal and iron interest of this country affect, not the province of Nova Scotia only, but Canada as a whole, just as much as the development of those interests affect any country in the world that aspires to be a manufacturing country, and Canada does aspire to be self-contained in that regard, as she is in almost every other. Those interests are the foundation of the manufacturing interests of every nation. Great Britain, to which reference is so often made, protected these till her output of iron, for instance, equalled half of the total of the world's production. That was the example of the mother country. But Sir Oliver Mowat, a good Reformer himself, does not think that this Government has gone far enough, for after these duties had been imposed, and after a bounty had been provided by the Federal Parliament, Sir Oliver Mowat introduced and carried legislation in the Ontario legislature whereby a manufacturing interest in Hamilton, which I am glad to see has been started, will receive, over and above all that is given to the interests "away down in Nova Scotia," a dollar a ton for every ton of iron manufactured out of Canadian ore. Now, let us see how important these interests are to which this sneering reference was made. "Away down in Nova Scotia," for instance, I find that the output of steel from one establishment in New Glasgow in 1886 was 5,286 tons only, of the value of $228,000; whereas, in 1893, it had increased from 5,000 tons to 12,400 tons, with a value of over half a million dollars. The labourers employed in 1886 were 175; in 1893 there were 450, and the average rate of wages paid to these men was $1.45 a day. Iron works have been recently established in the county I have the honour to represent. In 1893 they consumed 126,000 tons of coal, 9,400 tons of ore, limestone and coke, in nine months. The Ferrona iron works, in my county, employ 425 men and 150 men to mine the coal, and the average wage paid them is $1.45 per day. The steel works in New Glasgow alone during the seven years up to 1893 paid out $1,069,180 in wages. But those couple of interests in Nova Scotia are by no means all. I could give the House, and I think I should give the House, in view of the extraordinary statements made, the following record of the various industries during 1895 :

The record of the various Canadian furnaces during 1895 is as follows :—

NOVA SCOTIA STEEL COMPANY.

(New Glasgow and Ferrona, N.S.)

Coke, pig iron made	19,410 ⁴⁴⁸ / ₂₀₀₀	tons.
Ore charged	38,783 ⁵²⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	"
Fuel	28,110 ²⁰⁰⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	"
Flux	16,304 ²⁰⁰⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	"
		Men.
Labour employed in steel works.....	450
do do ore production.....	100
do do furnace work.....	250
		800

This company manufacture all grades of agricultural implements, steel forgings, &c., the basis of which is largely Ferrona iron, made from Canadian ore, so that the utmost possible amount of labour is secured to the country in the special lines now made by this company.

LONDONDERRY IRON CO., LTD.

Coke pig iron made	17,744 ²⁰⁰⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	tons.
Ore charged	41,557 ²⁰⁰⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	"
Fuel charged coke	25,264 ²⁰⁰⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	"
Fuel charged coal	3,088 ²⁰⁰⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	"
Cast iron water and gas pipe produce	2,110 ²⁰⁰⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	"

Average number of men employed, 425 men.
Furnace output of 1895, campaign, 8 months.
Pipe foundry campaign, 7 months.

It is a notable fact that the tariff revision of session 1894, by which a duty on a sliding scale was imposed on wrought scrap iron, has resulted in the Londonderry Iron Company making contracts with Canadian manufacturers of bar iron, which enabled them to start up their rolling mills. The work is just commencing in that department, and will afford steady employment to a large number of Canadians.

CANADA IRON FURNACE CO.

(Charcoal iron produce 1, 1895, in a campaign of 9 months.)

Charcoal pig iron made	6,598 ²⁰⁰⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	tons.
Charcoal consumed	654,361	bush.
Ore consumed	16,203	tons.
Limestone consumed	1,500 ²⁰⁰⁰ / ₂₀₀₀	tons.
Average number of men employed, 600.

In the year ending 30th June, 1891, the importations of pig-iron, kentledge and cast scrap-iron amount to 81,317 tons. These importations were reduced for the year ending 30th June, 1895, in consequence of home production, to 34,449 tons. In addition to the quantity of pig-iron manufactured in Canada last year from Canadian ore, raw materials have been imported, which have been converted into finished iron and steel to this extent, and exclusive of Canadian scrap worked up in our rolling mills, viz. :—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Iron in slabs, blooms, billets, hooped and puddled bars.....	3,932	Tons.
Less peidel, ferro-silicum, ferro-manganese	164
Steel ingots, cogged ingots and blooms...	1,036
Wrought scrap-iron and scrap-steel.....	21,157
Total.....	25,289

G. Macdougall & Co..... 629 tons.
Total pig..... 44,382 tons.

In order to show that these are by no means unimportant and that our works are inadequate to the task, I hold in my hands evidence that they have given entire satisfaction to western manufacturers, to the manufacturers of agricultural implements with whom the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) commisserates—not only satisfaction, but the makers are glad to take iron and steel ore from the Nova Scotia works in preference to the iron and steel they formerly used.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman produce a single letter from an agricultural implement dealer in proof of that statement ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have stated that I propose to do so, and the hon. gentleman is making a not very pleasing exhibition of himself by telling me that I cannot do it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to hear them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman possesses himself in patience, he will do so. The Nova Scotia Iron and Steel Company writing to me in November last of the Massey-Harris Company stated :

I inclose copies of two or three letters showing that Massey's people have been using our iron with satisfactory results. In reference to a matter of fact not brought out in these letters, I may say that Massey's general superintendent gave us the results of their daily tests after they had adopted Ferrona iron in place of Niagara (which is a well-known brand of Lake Superior iron), and these daily test reports show that the average strength of their castings had increased from about 23,000 pounds per square inch to an average of 27,000 pounds per square inch, or an average, say, over 17 per cent.

We have had similar testimonials from scores of other parties using Ferrona iron, not only for implement work, but from makers of stove plates, machinery castings, and other general works of that kind.

Indeed, Ferrona iron is now being sold to every large concern in Ontario and Quebec.

In a letter from the Massey-Harris Company, written in 1895, to the Steel Company, they say :

We note carefully all you say with reference to the question of iron. In reply, we wish to say that we, too, are very pleased that we have been able to displace Niagara iron with your iron. The result of using your iron, instead of Niagara (after a very careful test for two or three weeks daily), is entirely satisfactory. It is always a pleasure to the writer to know that we can get within our own country material equal to what we can import, and, whenever we can do so, and the price is equal, or nearly equal, Canadian material is used.

In the same letter they say :

From our former letter you are aware that, to carry us through the winter months, it will take more than 250 tons. We fully expected to receive all the iron that we wanted from you ; the tenor of the writer's conversations with your Mr. Cantley was along that line, that, so far as it would be possible to displace American iron and use yours, it would be done, and this your Mr. Cantley, at the time of our conversation, was anxious we should do.

That letter, I repeat, is signed by the Massey-Harris Company. Again, I have further information in which the hon. member for Huron stands in need :

Ferrona furnace was completed September, 1892. Bridgeville furnace was completed April, 1893. The Toronto Radiator Company has had during the past year a standing contract for Ferrona pig-iron.

No agricultural implement manufacturing firm of any importance is now, or has for some time past, been buying in the United States. The Massey-Harris Company, Frost & Wood, Cossett Eros., Peter Hamilton Manufacturing Co., Coulthard, Scott Company, Noxon Brothers Manufacturing Company, Sylvester Brothers' Manufacturing Company, and others have for years brought from Nova Scotia practically all the implement steel they used. Any exceptions to this can be accounted for by special circumstances. We have now a contract with one alone of above firms, calling for 2,500 tons of steel, and have already delivered to the same firm over 600 tons of Ferrona pig-iron.

I find again a statement that over 10,000 tons of Ferrona pig iron have been sold and shipped to Ontario and Quebec during four months of 1895, and 14,000 tons from last spring to November. These are interesting facts, which show that even before the Hamilton industry was started, with a capacity, I am told, of 150 tons a day, these furnaces in Nova Scotia were doing a great deal to supply the demand for this article in Ontario. With the additional new industry will come healthy competition and greater Canadian production, so that the manufacturers in the west will have great benefit from it, which they full well appreciate, of being able to get that material at a moment's notice in their own country, and being free from the embarrassment when they depended on producers either in the United States or England.

In regard to prices. I wish to point out to the House in reply to the argument often used, that the development of these industries has caused decreased prices to the consumer, that though the Ferrona furnace has only been established a few years, when it began iron was selling in Toronto at $22 per ton, it has since sold for $15. I also want to point out again in connection with the industries in Canada that they have developed when the industries of a similar character in the mother country have been in dire distress. In October, 1893, the London "Times" stated that "the majority of the works now producing iron and steel are making no progress, and it is only too evident that many of them have been carried on at a loss." Therefore, it is not fair, in debate, nor is it ordinary fair-play to those great industries, that this question of how much protection amounts to, should be tested by the prices that have obtained during this extraordinary depression in the iron and steel trade. That trade was never more demoralized in Great Britain than it has been recently, yet it is upon these demoralized prices that hon. gentlemen opposite seek to attack similar interests enjoying protection in our own country. In the London "Times" of Sept. 24, I find the following statement :—

For a number of years past very serious apprehensions have been aroused by the circumstances of the iron industries of the United Kingdom, more especially in view of the progress made by competitive countries. In commercial circles it is now quite a common thing to hear our iron industries spoken of as a manufacture that has ceased to make progress and is doomed to gradual decay.

The same article, later on, says :

It will probably be among the things not generally known, that more German iron is imported into Great Britain than into any country except Switzerland, and, in the latter case, the iron was probably largely in transit for Italy and other countries, while in our own country it had come to stay. During the year 1893, we imported into Great Britain 116,000 tons of German iron and steel, while into the British colonies we imported nearly 100,000 tons more.

And on this subject, which is peculiarly interesting to me at any rate, I wish to give the latest information to show that this protection which the iron industries in Canada enjoys at present, is not exorbitant ; and that there is every necessity to treat these industries in Canada fairly and carefully. I refer to the London "Times" of January 20th, 1896, in which a very important industrial report is reviewed. A delegation of the British Iron Trade Continental Competition went to the continent and reported the result of their inquiry and investigation. The article in the "Times," in reviewing the report, sums up, as follows :—

In 1882 Great Britain produced 8,493,000 tons of iron, against only 3,380,000 produced in Germany ; so that the output of our own country was fully 150 per cent more than that of our competitor. In 1882 Great Britain produced 5,014,000 tons of finished iron and steel, or 100 per cent more than the output of Germany. But since then the German production of pig-iron had advanced to 5,380,000 tons, and the output of finished iron and steel to 5,927,000, while the British production of pig-iron has declined to 7,364,000 tons, and the British output of finished iron and steel has dropped to only a trifle over 4,000,- 000 tons; so that Germany is now producing a considerably larger quantity of finished products than our own country.

That is a most extraordinary revolution in the iron and steel trade of Germany under a protective system, and it is under this policy of Germany that England is having so difficult a road to travel, and such a difficult experience. It is in connection with this that the price has dropped and dropped to such a figure that one reference in the "Times" goes to show that industries were running in England and selling their goods below cost. While this remarkable progress has been going on, both Belgium and Germany have greatly extended their foreign trade, and they are now unitedly supplying at the rate of 374,000 tons of iron and steel a year to Great Britain and the British possessions, valued at something like £3,000,000 sterling. Then, again, the "Times" says:

The disquieting feature of the case thus roughly presented is, that the iron industry is generally understood to be the only one which England is endowed with natural resources specially to prosecute with success, owing to our large command of ores and fuel, our proximity to the sea, and our ample endowment of highly skilled labour. As a single proof of this fact, we need only mention that between 1888 and 1895 the total number of smelting furnaces erected in Great Britain fell from 854 to 706, while the number of furnaces in blast dropped from 429 to 230.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the object of that reference, I think, is clear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that this week's "Times" you have quoted from?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, the "Times" of January 20th, 1896. Then the "Economist" supports the point which I made as to amount paid labour in iron works, although I suppose it hardly needs support. On the 25th January, 1896, the "Economist," speaking on the report of the delegation to which I have referred, says:

The cost of production of any commodity is usually made up of three elements—labour, royalties, or their equivalent, and transport. The first of these three is usually by far the most serious, and in the special case of the manufacture of iron and steel it is computed at from 60 per cent of the whole, in the cruder products, to 90 per cent of the whole in more highly finished forms.

Now, then, when the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) laid his hand upon that industry, he laid it upon one of the most important, if not the most important in this country, so far as it aspires to a manufacturing position, or a position of independence in that regard. Further, he attacked that one industry which is most directly connected with labour, and which in so marked a degree affects labour. And, judging, therefore, from the fact, that under a protective tariff, higher than we have ever experienced in this country, these continental countries are now pressing England so severely, according to the authorities I have tested, surely with the success that has already attended the efforts and the enterprise of these capitalists in Canada who have put their money into corresponding industries here, the people of Canada will be wise to stand by and protect those important interests from the hands of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to give some authorities—and I have taken some pains to put them in handy form—for, believing in the statement, that so far as the trade issues are concerned, the next elections are to be fought out squarely on the issue of free trade and protection. The Conservative party are prepared for that. We are only too glad to have the advantage of that being the honest and above-board issue. There is every advantage to us, politically, as we think, in having that the defined differences of policy between the two political parties in Canada. But let us both be honest. On this side of the House we are to a man, I believe, for protection. There is no beating about the bush with us. We are in favour of protection and all that it implies as judged from the year 1878 down to this day. We take the risk of the indictment preferred by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). We answer his abuse, and we answer his attack by appealing to the experience of the Canadian people. They know what protection is. They understand how it has worked, and our position is: We propose to continue that policy. We do not propose to budge from it one inch. Now, against that, there is the policy of free trade, advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite. Free trade is certainly not protection, and I have endeavoured to show, according to Cobden, that a revenue tariff is a tariff that depends on customs and involves protection; but free trade, as I will show, involves direct taxation. If the pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite, that they will wipe out every vestige of protection from our tariff, that they will fight us fairly and openly on their policy of free trade, if these pledges are to be redeemed by them, they must have the courage to advocate direct taxation. Or else, they will have to give up the fight, and beat us by that style of campaign, where the Snyders and the Hymans may hold any view they like on fiscal questions, but like the member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) come into the House and vote for the leader of the Opposition, no matter what their individual views are, or what their professions were before the people. Now, I was induced to examine into this matter by the statement of the hon. member for South Oxford. The other day he read to this House a letter which he did not blush to say he was the author of. He tells us to-night that he has found one man in the history of the world who he thinks did as improper and, as I believe, vile a thing. It was not a Canadian or a Britisher. It was not, however, in reference to any circumstances that exist or ever did exist in this country. It was in reference to another country and another set of circumstances. But was ever such an exhibition seen in a Parliament, as a member saying: "I read to you a document in which I say that the only possible relief for Canada is commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States of America; that is my policy"; and in the next breath reading a platform, which he says is his policy, and which has nothing to do with unrestricted reciprocity, but is foreign to it in every particular—foreign to it particularly in repudiating discrimination against the mother country. But he said that this policy, which he read, was an answer to the Minister of Finance and to all who asked, What is the policy of the Reform party? Well, all the members of the Reform party on the stump, in the by-elections and during the recess, are in the habit of taking refuge under that platform when driven into a corner. Whether a man advocates a 15 per cent tariff all round or a 17½ per cent tariff, as in Mr. Mackenzie's time, or the present tariff list, with free iron, free coal, etc.—no matter what their particular views may be, they find refuge or attempt to find refuge under that platform of the Liberal party adopted in 1893. The hon. member for South Oxford sought refuge there. He may, however, have what policy he thinks right. We must search for the actual policy of the Liberal party. I find that it develops in this way, and I will give it to you, Mr. Speaker. The leader of the Opposition, we know, down to 1877, in fact including 1877, was an out-and-out protectionist. We have his declarations to that effect, and I will not repeat them. In connection with them he told Parliament in 1878:

There had always been among the Liberals of the province of Quebec a strong tendency to protection. It was with them a matter of tradition. That would probably explain his strong protectionist views up to that date, if not at that particular time. Then, the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), after the National Policy had been introduced, as late as 1883, without the slightest fear of the hon. member for South Oxford before his eyes, stated in this House:

Free trade has never been an issue in this country. It has always been held that we should afford protection while raising the necessary revenue.

Now, after the hon. member for South Oxford had explained what the policy of his party was, as shown at the convention at Ottawa in 1893, he went on to show the vile features of any system of protection, for he repudiates, as I understand, protection from top to bottom and all around; but the hon. member for South Brant in 1883 was not of that opinion. We all know Mr. Blake's famous statement in 1887, which embodied the protectionist view. After having preached free trade in the manufacturing city of Montreal, he had ultimately to bow to protection. In 1889, the leader of the Opposition had another policy. At Toronto he stated:

The policy which we have advocated, which we still continue to advocate, is the removal of all commercial barriers between this country and the great kindred nation to the south. * * * I have read history in this way, that every reform has cost to the reformers years of labour, and those years of labour I, for one, am prepared to give; and, though the Democrats may be defeated in the States, and though Canadians may grow faint-hearted in Canada, the Liberal party, as long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause, until that cause is successful. I will not expect to win in a day, but I am prepared to remain in the cool shades of opposition until the cause has triumphed.

The hon. gentleman was a protectionist, as I have said, in 1877. I call his statement in 1889 protection—protection of such a character as was denounced by the London "Economist," to which paper the hon. member for South Oxford wrote. When he explained what the policy of the Liberals was in 1891, that free trade organ in London denounced in the severest terms his proposal, which was only to exchange one protective tariff for another. But, going on, we find the policy which is to meet us at the next election more clearly defined. The hon. leader of the Opposition has repudiated unrestricted reciprocity; he has repudiated protection; and in 1893, the Ottawa resolution appears. And in this connection I will read a short portion of it. The Liberal party assembled in convention at Ottawa in June, 1893, declared:

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burden under which the country labours.

After that policy had been propounded, we had some definitions, and hon. gentlemen opposite will not, I am sure, complain of them, since they are all their own. At Newmarket, in September, 1893, the "Globe" reports the leader of the Opposition as saying:

This is the broad distinction between us to-day. I tell you that the next battle to be fought is to be fought on that ground. We will not levy duties to pay into the pockets of any class, we will levy money in so far only as it is absolutely necessary to carry on the Government of the people. This is the ground upon which I stand. * * * But, if it were not true, on the other hand, that the farmer has not received any benefit from protection, then I say, by all means let us stand by the policy of freedom of trade, which I believe alone can give the farmer the full benefit of his earnings. * * * We have protection now. Are we going to get more or less? I will not be satisfied until the last vestige of protection has been removed from the soil of Canada. This is the aim towards which we are progressing, the aim which we have in view, and we will not rest until we have achieved that object. When that will be, I do not profess to know, but, at all events, I say that the Reformers of Canada have reforms to carry out, but that our great reform is to put away from the soil of Canada the last vestige of protection. This is one of the planks of the policy that we adopted some weeks ago at Ottawa.

In 1894, we find the leader of the Opposition again defining the policy of his party. At Victoria, for instance, in September, 1894, he says:

If the Liberals were successful, they would cut off the head of protection at once, and trample on its body.

At Winnipeg he said :

There can be a very radical alteration of affairs looked for. We shall give you free trade, and, although it will be a hard fight, we shall not give in one inch or retrace one step until we have reached the goal, and that goal is the same policy of free trade as it exists in England to-day.

Then, we have the financial leader expounding a policy. There were to be no half measures for him. In 1893 we find the member for South Oxford saying in this House—"Hansard," page 714:

Our policy, first to last, has been to destroy this villainous protection system, which has been grinding out the vitals of the country.

Again, in 1894, in the discussion of the Budget speech, page 390 of "Hansard," he said:

But a very great deal still remains to be done. A great many of these burdens have only been touched, not substantially lightened, and it will be the interest and duty of the Government, if they do their duty, to see that relief is made effectual, and not as it is at present, a mere skin-deep relief, a mere two-and-a-half or five-per cent, when double or treble of that is required to render any real or substantial relief to the people who are suffering from it.

On 25th October, 1894, he said:

The time is ripe for very extensive and far-reaching reforms. I, for my part, would be sorry to see the issue dwindled down to a mere question of revenue tariff. We need, among other things, a radical readjustment, not only of our tariff, but of the whole system of taxation.

In Toronto, in 1895, speaking to the Young Liberals, he said:

If that party tenders the people a stone instead of bread, is half-hearted in the prosecution of great aims it sets before itself, it will be deservedly swept out of power.

Then the leader of the maritime Liberals, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), speaking at Middleton in 1893, said:

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Well, gentlemen, I need say no more. Whatever doubts or difficulties there may have been about understanding our trade policy in times past, there is none now. Our platform is clear and definite. * * * To-day the people of Canada stand face to face with such an issue, and the next contest is to be one between free trade and protection. * * * The policy of the Liberal party, on the contrary, is the reform of the tariff by the elimination from it of every vestige of protection.

Hon. gentlemen may think it is unnecessary for me to weary myself or them with quoting those statements one after the other. I may fail in my purpose, but I do not hesitate to confess that my purpose is, if possible, to find out, by these utterances of responsible leading men of the Liberal party, just as we are going to the people, what their position really is on the trade question. That resolution of June, 1893, as I have shown, will satisfy no one when so many different constructions have been put upon it by members of their own party. I do not quarrel with them for adopting free trade, but I do quarrel with them when they shirk the consequences of the advocacy of that policy. There can be no such thing as free trade, about which these gentlemen talk, unless they adopt the system of direct taxation for federal purposes. Why should the leader of the Opposition try to induce the people to believe that he is following in the footsteps of Sir Robert Peel if he does not propose to do as Sir Robert Peel did? The hon. leader of the Opposition constantly says that he takes for his guide in this fiscal reform in the trade policy of Canada Sir Robert Peel and his policy. I say, then, that if that be true, if that statement be not wholly false and intended to deceive, the policy of the Liberal party means direct taxation, because Sir Robert Peel has stated that only by direct taxation was his policy possible in any one of the forty years to which reference was made in Montreal. It is not treating the people fairly to pretend that you can work out in Canada, in thirty-nine or forty years, the policy of Sir Robert Peel, unless you are prepared to begin, as he did, with direct taxation, for he is our authority for saying that you cannot begin this reform without at the outset adopting that system of obtaining revenue. You must initiate that feature of direct taxation with the introduction of any system of free trade. But what an absurdity. Mr. Speaker, is this policy of the Opposition for Canada? Whatever we may say of the glory and greatness of Great Britain—and there is much to be said—the greatest part of it relates to the years that have gone. There is a keen struggle for existence going on in connection, not only with the agricultural interests in England to-day, but with such industries as those that aforesaid flourished in Lancashire. The condition in Lancashire is something appalling. I have shown what the condition of the staple interest of Great Britain is to-day—the iron and steel industry. Those things are subjects for anxious thought at any rate; and we are now witnessing the beginning of a very lively and important discussion on proposed changes in the fiscal system. The hon. member for South Oxford makes light of it, but I think no reasonable man would deny that in England to-day there is an agitation with regard to the system of protection, which twenty years ago would have been deemed absolutely impossible by every one, whether in England or Canada. The difference in position between the two great periods is great. The countries we see forging ahead, that are giving England all she can do to hold her own in the different markets of the world, are countries which have fostered their own industries by protective tariffs. No country in the world but England ever ventured to adopt free trade, and that country was in circumstances wholly distinct and different from those which meet us to-day. That is the initial difficulty which hon. gentleman opposite have to meet, if they be sincere in connection with the adoption of Sir Robert Peel's policy. It is a policy under which certain successes were bound to continue for a period of years in a country like England, but take the ground for adopting that policy in England and see how absurd it is to apply it to this country. The ground taken by Sir Robert Peel for his policy, shortly stated, is that England stood midway between America and Russia. She was the connecting link between the old and the new world, and her insular position was unique. She had the greatest merchant marine in the world in 1842, her advantages over every rival chiefly consisted in her deposits of coal and iron, and she had above all—what she still to-day is able to boast of—an accumulation of capital in excess of any rival in the world. That was her position when, for reasons that do not exist in this country, in connection with the price of food, she ventured to try the experiment of free trade. And Sir Robert Peel, on that very occasion to which the hon. gentleman referred, the initial stage of his great reform, said that England was carrying on greater commercial and manufacturing enterprise than any other country ever exhibited. That was the position of England in 1842 relative to all other countries in the world. Then she adopted free trade, but at that time it must never be forgotten that the system of direct taxation went hand in hand with it. The protection policy, Sir Robert Peel stated, was the one "under which, practically, our power and greatness had been established." This is the authority to whom hon. gentlemen opposite look, and I must ask the House to allow me to make good from his words my statement that direct taxation is necessary in connection with any such policy of free trade as was approved by Sir Robert Peel. I have often seen it stated—whether hon. gentlemen opposite have so argued or not I do not know—that the income tax was a war tax, that it was not necessarily connected with fiscal reform or with the repeal of the corn laws in England. Let me give Sir Robert Peel's statement of the reasons for the income tax in England. Speaking in the House of Commons on the 6th March, 1848, he said:

The property tax was intended not merely to supply a deficit in the revenue, as compared with the public expenditure, but to lay the foundation for a juster principle of taxation to afford the means of repealing duties of the raw materials of important manufactures.

Later on in the same speech he says:

Now, I beg to ask, whether the imposition of the income tax was not the foundation of the commercial policy of the country? Why is it possible that I could propose the remission of taxes to an amount of no less than £7,500,000 if I had not, as a foundation for that commercial policy, an income tax to fall back upon?

And again:

Was it not to lay the foundation of such a commercial policy that the House of Commons assented to the temporary imposition of the income tax? Did any one at that time say, no to it? True, you did not in express words say that the income tax was to be the foundation of such a policy; but the language used by me was identically that I have just now quoted.

Speaking on the state of the nation, on July 6th, he said:

In 1846 we adopted a new commercial principle; we merely carried further the commercial principle which had been adopted and acted upon in 1842 and in successive years.

He stated there the reasons of the income tax. And I find in the British Economic Association Journal a very interesting discussion which took place recently on the origin of the income tax. It leads to the following conclusion:—

It may, therefore, be fairly stated that the function of the tax from 1842 to 1860 was the double one of providing the extra funds needed in time of war, and of securing tariff and financial reform in time of peace.

So, I think it will be admitted by fair-minded men, that, if hon. gentlemen opposite are serious in many of the free trade arguments they have used, it is necessary for them to tell the people straight out and without any beating about the bush, that, hand in hand with the principle of free trade, as advocated by Sir Robert Peel for a period of forty years, must go a system of direct taxation. And these hon. gentlemen know as well as I do what would be the effect of advocating such a policy before the people, so far as their political interests are concerned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the Finance Minister's position of the financial position of Canada, the hon. member for South Oxford, I thought, resorted to many unfair arguments. But he did astonish me considerably, in his criticism when he used the following language. Discussing the question whether our tariff favoured England or not, he said :

Sir, those gentlemen are fond of telling us that theirs is a purely loyal policy, and that their tariff favours England. Why, Sir, the thing is absurd on the face of it. If the tariff means anything, and can do anything, what it means and what it can do is to keep the manufactured goods of England out of Canada. Who are the chief producers of manufactured goods? England. Who are the manufactureres who can sell cheaply? Why, the manufacturers of England, and nobody else.

Will the hon. gentleman never learn anything? If he will look up his own financial statements when he was Finance Minister he will there find that the competition that played havoc with the industries of this county in his time was not the competition of the manufacturers of England, but the competition of the manufacturers of the United States. The American manufacturers were then feeling their strength, and they were then fighting England and fighting Canada in the Canadian market. For what reason I know not, they took advantage at that time of their opportunities, and the slaughter market in this country was crowded by the competition from across the borders. This idea that when we raised the wall it was practically against England because England alone could manufacture cheaply, is not borne out by the history of the country from 1874 to 1878, nor is it true of the present day. One reason for the decline of exports from England to Canada is the reason I have already given from the London "Times." What is Germany doing, what is Belgium doing in the iron and steel trade? What has the United States been doing from 1878, and particularly of late years in this terrific competition? I propose to demolish this position of the hon. gentleman if I can—it is an important position—by reference to the only authority, I believe, for which the hon. gentleman has the slightest respect. I would refer him to his own speech on the Budget in 1876, where he spoke on this subject differently from the way he speaks to-day :

There is no doubt that immediately the cost of production in America became cheapened, there was an increase in the number of articles brought into this country, and that this circumstance, although advantageous to the bulk of our people, to press with severity on a certain portion of our manufactures.

This is a straight admission. Again, he asks this House :

And that is a point the House would do well to bear in mind—that a good deal of American competition is not competition of American with Canadian industries, but American with British manufacturers, the Canadian consumer being benefited by the operation.

So the hon. gentleman himself may be called to contradict the assertion that, when we raised the tariff the blow we struck was rather against England than against the United States. On that point, I am not going to rest content with the authority of the hon. member for South Oxford. I wish to refer, for instance, to the statistics themselves, and I will quote again the book I have referred to. At page 161 we shall see the evidence of the changed position of affairs which the hon. member for South Oxford was not fair enough to refer to, of the difficulties that have come over England in the years since the National Policy was adopted, and of the competition she has been compelled to meet. For instance, of manufactured goods, not sent merely into her own colonies, but into her own ports. I find that in 1886 the amount, according to the English returns was £34,802,042, and in 1892, it was £43,244,804. The increase in 1892 over 1886 was 24·3 per cent. And again, at page 186, Mr. Burgis says :

Let all who doubt my assertion, that protected countries undersell us in the British home market, study carefully the board of trade returns, and they will find that in hardware, glass, paper, leather, sugar, silks, and woollens, and many other articles of general use, our markets are invaded by the products of protectionist countries, and so British labour is robbed to pay foreign labour.

I would refer again, though not to read it, to the extraordinary statement from the London "Times" of this month, in regard to the changed condition of affairs, so far as it affects the iron and steel industry. Those facts, the House I think will see, without my labouring the point, destroy the criticism of the member for South Oxford. Now, I have once before in this House referred to a rather offensive criticism of the hon. gentleman made by the "Globe." The "Globe" used to jeer at the hon. gentleman, and call him a "financial juggler," and laugh at his manner of handling what they called figures. Now, if there was an occasion to smile, that occasion was when the member for South Oxford dared to meet the statement of the Finance Minister in this debate. It is true, it was before he had time to prepare, it was the first instalment of his reply to the Minister of Finance. But what troubles the member for South Oxford most is the fact that he has been followed, through a large part of his political career, by a shadow which has seriously affected him, and left him in a very unfortunate mental condition. He has been followed by deficits. In his whole history, deficits stand out in bold relief. The member for South Oxford has signally failed in his life. For instance, he was president of a bank, and a deficit overtook the bank as well as the hon. gentleman. He was member for Lennox, and there was a deficit of votes in the county. He tried Huron, and though he says he was gerrymandered out of it, my recollection is that he was beaten, not only in the gerrymander-ed Huron, but in those districts which existed in Huron before it was gerrymandered. Therefore it was not necessary to resort to a gerrymander in order to beat the hon. gentleman, after he had been a little while in any one county. But a deficit of votes bothered him there. He was member for Wellington, and had to meet a deficit there. He was Finance Minister, and a deficit finally overwhelmed him. So there is no reason why he should call the people of this country fools as he did to-night.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, dear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman is surprised that the member for South Oxford should do that, but he certainly charged the people of this country with being fools because they had rejected the Reform party so often. But what shall we say of him, or what idea must he have of the back benches, when he actually turned round the other day to make a point such as this, and expected to elicit cheers? In analysing the Finance Minister's figures, he said:

In 1878 we sold ships to the value of $1,250,000, while in 1895 we sold ships to the value of $172,000.

The leader of the Liberals in the maritime provinces, the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), knows that if that was a serious statement, it casts a serious reflection on the intelligence of the hon. member for South Oxford. He knows that if that was a serious statement, it exhibits ignorance of the grossest description on the part of that hon. gentleman. It is a most misleading statement, and no statement could be more dishonest, but I do not want to charge him with dishonesty. I believe that actually he did not know what he was talking about. The hon. member sitting beside him could have told him many things that would have made that reference wholly unnecessary. Take, for instance, the decline in shipping. He gave the values—mark that, Mr. Speaker—he gave the decline in the value of the tons of shipping sold by Canada to countries the world over. Just think of it, leaving aside the fact that we were then building wooden ships, and that the demand for wooden ships in foreign countries does not to-day exist. Iron and steel have taken their place; but pass that all by. Just think, there has been a decline in the value between the year when the hon. gentleman made his comparison and 1893, from $34 a ton down to $12 a ton. But he did not give the number of ships, he gave the decline in value, and that of course was enormous. Let us look a little into the actual figures, figures that a fair-minded critic and a man who had any confidence in his position, would not have troubled himself to keep back, and we can see from this sample whether the criticisms of the hon. gentleman, so far as they are based on figures, deserve our attention. The value, for instance, in 1876, was $2,189,270 of ships sold. for the hon. gentleman was referring to ships sold. In 1879, under his policy, according to this test, the value declined to $529,000. The hon. gentleman did not tell the House that; that was kept back. If it was a good argument against our policy, what becomes of this lovely tariff that existed between 1874 and 1879? But take the tonnage, and what becomes of his comparison? Notwithstanding that we were building almost entirely wooden ships in this country, in 1878, of ships sold, the tonnage was 35,000, of the class to which he referred; and in 1894, notwithstanding the change of material in construction, we actually sold of tonnage 22,000, a very small difference under the circumstances. But in the good days of the so-called free trade and revenue tariff, the tonnage sold, in 1876, amounted to 64,000, and in 1879 to 19,000. But to show how unfair any comparison of that kind is, either here or in England, I have merely to mention what the hon. gentleman took care not to mention, namely, that the tonnage of British ships under construction in Great Britain was 371,000 tons less in 1894 than in 1881, and they have all the benefits of free trade, and a policy much different from ours. Now, let us take some more of the hon. gentleman's figures, and look at his system of analysis. With respect to the statement that we have grown so rapidly within the last seventeen years, the hon. gentleman said that he would take our exports and imports as a test. He called our particular attention to this as a test of the growth of Canada. Now, whether that is a fair guide or a safe guide, I will leave him to explain himself. I find that when Finance Minister the hon. gentleman took pains to warn this country about several things. In 1875, in delivering his financial statement, he said:

It is my duty, if the House, or any member of it, choose to assume that the fact of a rapid increase in the past is necessarily a proof that an equally rapid increase is to be looked for in the future, to call attention to the fact that that great country (the United States), though it increased in essential prosperity in all respects in that interval,—

This is the interval between 1836 and 1851.

—remained on one occasion without any great increase taking place in its imports for a period of no less than fifteen years, and that a similar phenomenon occurred at other times, though not on so large a scale.

In the hon. gentleman's Budget speech in 1876, page 11, he said:

I must draw attention to the fact that, as our exports have not appreciably diminished, and as it appears that a very large proportion of the diminished imports does not arise from diminished power of consumption by the people, but simply from the better bargains they have been able to obtain, it is, on the whole, an advantage and not an injury to our people.

What was the hon. gentleman seeking to establish when he was Finance Minister? It was this: that when a country, as in the case of the United States, had enjoyed a wonderfully successful and prosperous series of years so far as exports were concerned, there came a halt, and for a series of years their trade returns would show nothing like that as an index of prosperity. But, said the hon. gentleman when he was Finance Minister, do not be disheartened, the country may be prospering all the time, for I will show reasons in the history of the United States when prosperity was beyond controversy, and yet at that time their foreign trade was nowhere. That was the statement of the member as Finance Minister, but now that he is in another position he has changed his views. The hon. gentleman goes on to make a comparison of our imports, and said that in 1867 they amounted to $72,000,000, and in 1878—and the hon. gentleman said he was taking the worst year—they amounted to $91,000,000. Then the hon. gentleman argued that consequently from 1868 to 1878, a period of ten years, our imports had increased $19,000,000 and he gave the percentage. The Finance Minister very properly interjected the statement that certain new provinces had been admitted during that time. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) insisted that that made very little difference—although British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and the North-west Territories had been admitted. He then went on to compare the trade for 1878 with 1895 in lump, and he drew the comforting conclusion that there had been a more rapid growth from 1868 to 1878 than since. I have already shown that from 1870 to 1873 the growth of trade, in Canada, England and elsewhere had been phenomenal, and that the trade carried on by this country as shown by imports and exports was nothing short of marvellous. Mark you, Mr. Speaker, that in order to make a contrast unfavourable to the Conservative policy the hon. gentleman took all the years under Sir John Macdonald's Government from 1868 to 1874. And what was that period? It was one of the most remarkable periods in the commercial history of Canada. Why was it remarkable? The Finance Minister of that time was in the habit of calling it a period of inflation, when people were carrying on an immense trade, for the United States had not as yet recovered from the effects of the terrible civil war, when prices ruling were fabulous, when everybody was making money, and it was owing partially to the fact that we had for a time lost our great competitor. But the hon. gentleman calmly took those five years of remarkable prosperity, when high values dominated, when according to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) it was a time of inflation, and when industries were worked up to the highest pitch. What did it matter whether the tariff was 12, 15, or 17½ per cent in those days. Mr. Devlin and Mr. Workman explained that between 1867 and 1874 it mattered little whether the tariff was low or not, for it answered the purpose of protection, because there was nothing like competition, but that competition came about when the United States industries recovered after the war and exercised their strength. So that the hon. gentleman took for purposes of comparison one of the most glorious periods of Conservative rule, or at any rate, five years of Conservative rule and four years subsequently of Grit rule,—and compared them with what kind of a period? National Policy or no National Policy, the comparison was with a period when not only values declined in this country, but all over the world, and when competition was brought to a pitch that the world had never dreamed possible twenty years before. With this terrific competition all the world over, with a decline in values, with financial crises occurring, and with the face of our trade competition changed, our imports were affected, not from larger quantities of manufactured materials being brought in but by raw material being brought in under the National Policy in lieu of manufactured articles; and without taking into account all these various circumstances which would alter the calculation utterly, the hon. gentleman made a comparison of percentage in order to show that there had been comparatively no development and rapid growth in this country.

I will now refer to some other criticisms of the financial statement made by the hon. member for South Huron. The hon. gentleman took for instance, the imports from Great Britain in 1874, and mentioned the amount of them. Then he took the imports in 1895 and in 1878, and he attempted to make a comparison to show the effect our tariff had had by diminishing trade with Great Britain and that the effect of the National Policy had been to prevent that country selling Canada as much goods as previously. That was a very unfair criticism. Great Britain's exports of domestic manufactures to the value of no less than $230,000,000 declined in that period from 1890 to 1894, the period which the hon. gentleman compared with 1870 and 1878. The volume of Great Britain's exports of domestic manufactures fell off not only as regards Canada but every country in the world. Canada from 1890 to 1894 was the only country whose exports increased instead of diminished. Let that be put down in all fairness to the National Policy. But the reason the hon. gentleman was able to make anything like a prima facie case on the question of diminished exports from Great Britain was not on account of the effect of the National Policy on Great Britain, but by reason of the competition of Germany, Belgium, France and the United States, for figures show that our imports increased from those countries as they diminished from Great Britain, and they were imports of manufactured goods. But the hon. gentleman sought to make his comparison with years that would suit the point he wished to make. Take, however, a fuller statement of the case. The imports from Great Britain in 1874 were of the value of $63,000,000, from the United States $54,000,000. In 1879, under the beneficent system of the Opposition the $63,000,000 from Great Britain dwindled to $30,000,000 and the volume from the United States—and this trade hon. gentlemen opposite now think is essential to Canada's prosperity—dropped from $54,000,000 to $34,000,000. And, under this terrible National Policy, I find that in 1893—the latest figures in the book to which I had reference :—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That was a year of very great depression compared with a year of inflation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but we are taking the hon. gentleman's system of criticism. The figures show that the trade had risen from $30,000,000, to which the hon. gentleman's policy had brought in 1879, to $43,000,000, and in the United States from $44,000,000 to $58,000,000. But now to show the fallacy of the argument of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), and leave that comparison altogether, I want to point to what Germany was doing in this period from 1879 to 1894. Germany sent us $440,000 worth of stuff in 1879, but Germany sent us $5,841,000 worth of goods in 1893. That is what a protectionist country was able to do in a market equally open to her as it was to the United Kingdom. I will not at this moment give another inopportune authority in a discussion of this character, but which was eliminated by the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright). I refer to the extraordinary decline in prices. This is given in the Year Book, and a great deal of attention is given—and I think proper attention—to the calculations that have been made by many of those authorities on the extraordinary decline in values that have occurred in these two periods. And when these declines in prices are considered, it will entirely destroy the system of analysis adopted by the hon. gentleman for South Oxford.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The decline from 1874 to 1879 was much greater relatively than it has been since.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, even admitting that. My position is so strong that admitting that fact, my argument is yet correct. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) has not followed me. Whatever be the decline, I have shown that it was not because of the tariff that this trade from Great Britain diminished in any part. But there were other considerations. There was raw material substituted for the manufactured article, which would make a great difference. There were these other competitors coming in. If Germany and Belgium could sell right under the nose of the British manufacturer in England, of course they were capturing ground hitherto occupied in Canada by the English manufacturer. Those facts are most important in any comparison, and those facts were entirely neglected by the hon. gentleman for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). During that period when the exports of other countries were declining, it is comforting for us to know that our exports rose $28,000,000 from 1889 to 1894, and our imports $3,500,000, while the trade of Germany, France, Great Britain, the United States, and even Australia declined between 1890 and 1894.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is 12 o'clock.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am perfectly willing to go on if the House wishes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let the hon. gentleman move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS.

Report of the Minister of Justice as to Penitentiaries of Canada, for the year ended 30th June, 1895.—(Mr. Dickey.)

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, for the year ended 30th June, 1895.—(Mr. Ives.)

Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs, for the year ended 30th June, 1895.—(Mr. Daly.)

THE NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Government to what is a very grave insult to the North-west Territories, and to the North-west Mounted Police. The Macleod "Gazette" calls attention to a report of judicial proceedings which took place in Halifax, which report is as follows:—

The two young men charged with burglary from Adams' store, were yesterday sentenced by Judge Johnston to six months each in the county jail. An effort is being made to get the prisoners on the North-west Mounted Police, and if it is successful. But if, at the expiration of six months, such arrangements have not been made, they will be sentenced for the Hubley and Grant burglaries.

The "Gazette" comments very properly upon this when it says:

What makes this all the more diabolically insulting is the fact that the outrage contemplated seems to have had judicial sanction, or, at least, the sanction of whatever person or persons would have the authority to allow these criminals to avoid a sentence for burglary by obtaining admission to the mounted police force.

I have no doubt, Sir, that it is unnecessary for me to protest against any such use being made of the North-west police, for I am quite certain that I shall have assurance from whoever represents the North-west Mounted Police here that such a thing could not be done. But it is a grave mistake on the part of the judge, and I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to it, to have suggested such a thing from the bench, as he seems to have done. I may say, Sir, as all in the House know, that there are men now serving in the North-west Mounted Police, and have been ever since the force was established, as well bred, as well born, as well educated as those in any position or any rank of life in Canada or elsewhere.

Mr. DICKEY. The suggestion which the hon. gentleman draws attention to is so abhorrent to one's sense of right, that I can hardly believe that it is anything else than a newspaper mistake. I certainly shall cause investigation to be made, and if any suggestion of that sort has been made, will find out how it was that Judge Johnston made such a grave error.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to make a personal explanation. In its issue of the 6th February, the "Globe" makes certain statements affecting myself. I shall not take up the time of the House by reading the whole article, but will simply read the portions of the article to which I wish especially to refer:

The archbishop implored Father Bedard, in God's name, not to allow Mr. Laurier to appear before an audience of students, lest it should encourage the Liberal leader, whom he describes as an opponent of separate schools for Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIN.

The same bishop, in response to the appeals of Sir Adolphe Caron and Mr. Ouimet, interfered in the election in Verchères. The Bishop of Chicoutimi, Mgr. Labrecque, actively interfered in the Charlevoix election, in behalf of the Government candidate, and menaced his people, unless they voted for the candidate who would pledge himself to support a Bill in Parliament "which would be acceptable to the ecclesiastical authorities."

And in another part, under the heading, "Another Chapter," I read as follows:—

Another chapter in the church crusade piously entered upon by such religious-minded men as Sir Adolphe Caron and Mr. Haggart, opened at Montreal to-day, where a meeting of the bishops of the ecclesiastical province of Quebec is in progress, attended by the following bishops:—Archbishop Fabre, and Bishops Bégin of Quebec, Larocque of Sherbrooke, Laffêche of Three Rivers, Emard of Valleyfield, and Moreau of St. Hyacinthe. Sir Adolphe Caron and Mr. Ouimet appeared before them, representing the Government, and submitted a copy of the Remedial Bill, which has passed the Cabinet Council, for their approval.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to give the most emphatic denial to this whole statement. It is a pure fabrication from beginning to end. I did not know, and I do not now know whether there was a meeting of the bishops of the ecclesiastical province of Quebec held in Montreal yesterday. Whether there has been one or not, I can state that directly or indirectly I had no conference with Mr. Haggart, as stated, and no communication, directly or indirectly, with the bishops or archbishop of the province of Quebec. I had no communication, directly or indirectly, with the bishops or the archbishop of Quebec, and I can say that I know sufficiently my duty as a member of the Privy Council, before a Bill is decided upon and settled to go and communicate it to any authority, however high that authority may be. I deny the whole thing emphatically.

THE CAPE BRETON ELECTION.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the Orders are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) as reported in the Montreal "Herald," at a banquet which was tendered him in the city of Halifax last night. The hon. gentleman is reported, among other things, to have said as follows:—

If he (Sir Charles) had been successful, the Liberal party would not have brought to the use of human devices in the late contest in Cape Breton. That explains the great emergency of the Liberal party, and he said $25,000 was sent down by Liberal emissaries to defeat the hopes of the Conservative party in that county. But they were unsuccessful, in spite of the gigantic frauds in the electoral lists and bribery.

I am personally in a position to know that there was not enough in the whole of Canada sent to Mr. Murray to pay the travelling expenses incurred by him and the gentlemen who went down to assist him, and there is not one atom of foundation for the statement to which Sir Charles Tupper pledged himself at that banquet.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his attempted reply to the hon. Finance Minister, took some very extraordinary positions, as I was endeavouring to point out last night, but none seemed to me so peculiar as his boast with regard to the surpluses which attended his administration of finance, and his plea of total irresponsibility for the deficits which occurred. He had much to boast of in connection with the surpluses, but when it became a matter of loss of revenue and failure to obtain the necessary means to pay our way from year to year, then the hon. gentleman fell back upon the alleged extravagance of his predecessors and the alleged mismanagement of the Government of Sir John Macdonald. But it is an extraordinary fact, which he seemed to have lost sight of, that the surpluses which prevailed under Sir John Macdonald's Government, went on for two years later, and when the effect of Sir John Macdonald's administration was over and the effect of the administration of Sir Richard Cartwright had begun, it was then the deficits appeared, and they never disappeared until that hon. gentleman disappeared himself from the exchequer of this country. The Conservative party certainly started the hon. gentleman well. They certainly started him in such a position that no matter how he managed or mismanaged the finances of the country, gratifying results were exhibited for a period of a couple of years. But for 1876, 1877, 1878 and 1879, the country has undoubtedly held that hon. gentleman responsible. And it does not lie in his mouth at this day to hark back, and charge upon his predecessors such recklessness as he has charged them with. Who has forgotten, for instance, the proof from that hon. gentleman's own hand, on a most important occasion, to the contrary of what he has claimed in this debate. When he endeavoured to borrow money in the London market, he issued a statement—and I venture again to bring that statement to the attention of the House, though it must be well known, because of the audacity of the hon. gentleman in taking a position completely at variance with every line of his position on the present occasion. In October, 1875, after he had been in office two years, after he had had an opportunity of studying the effect of the policy of his predecessors and of knowing exactly the financial position of Canada and the financial history of Canada, he informed the financial people of London that the whole of our debt had been incurred for legitimate objects of public utility. He continued as follows:—

The indirect advantage from these public works has already been found in the remarkable rapidity with which the commerce and the material prosperity of the Dominion have been developed; while a substantial increase in the direct returns may fairly be expected from the improvements now in progress and to follow the steady progress of population and trade.

Again he said:

The revenue has shown a continuous surplus during each year since confederation, 1867, although it has in the interval been charged with much heavy expenditure of an exceptional kind, such as the outlay connected with the several Fenian attacks on the country, the acquisition and organization of new territory, and providing an adequate defensive force for the Dominion.

In addition to that, we have not forgotten that while he pleads now that the extravagant conduct of his predecessors forced upon the country and upon him the financial calamities that occurred in 1876, 1877 and 1878, and so on, he predicted, after a review of the situation in 1875, and counted upon a surplus. His knowledge and investigation at that time led him—it is beyond doubt and beyond dispute—to the conclusion that from what had happened and from the condition of the country we had a right to expect a surplus instead of a deficit, and had the hon. gentleman, even in those dark days for the commerce of this country, yielded to the pressure of business men and the representatives of the labour interests in this country, I have no doubt, and I think the people of this country are of that opinion, that we would have been not only relieved from much of the depression and the injury to Canadian commerce in the days that followed, but that our financial situation would have been a great deal better.

The hon. gentleman, however, is extraordinary in the realm of finance. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what hon. gentleman behind him and what leading man in this country has ever taken any stock, so to speak, in his extraordinary statement as to what the National Policy has cost this country. Year after year, altering the figures only by a few millions, as occasion calls for, that hon. gentleman goes into a most extraordinary calculation, which, if it had any real foundation, would excite a great deal of attention at the hands of the people interested in the history and condition of Canada; but not a man on his right, not a man to his left, not a man behind him, has ever ventured to follow him seriously in the calculation he makes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Queen's says "oh, yes." I would like to hear him, I would like to hear any one in this debate, venture to tell the House that in seventeen years the National Policy has added five hundred millions to the taxation of the people.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Rather more than less.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Rather more than less, says the hon. member for South Oxford. He does not stop at a trifle. What are five hundred millions to him? But the hon. gentleman has an ingenious as well as an amusing way of reaching these conclusions. A great mathematician, as well as a financial genius, is the hon. member for South Oxford. He has told the people, for instance, how he gets at these huge figures. It is difficult even to find them in any official book or official records.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should think so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He himself admits that there is no record outside of his peculiar brain for such a calculation, or such a statement. He told us how he did it at Morrisburg, and I have analysed his statement, and his method of bringing about this result, and will give it to the House. On the 8th October last, at Morrisburg, he said:

To maintain the cost of protection you take the taxation for sixteen years.

He starts in this way with the records and with the books to which we all have access. Then how do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, he proceeds? Why, he simply doubles the amount. That is not enough, however, and he multiplies it by 16. That is a significant and wonderful figure. In that way he reaches, not a paltry $500,000,000, not at all. It is $500,000,000 in 1896, but in 1895 it was $1,000,000,000; and all, as he told them at Morrisburg, was for the purpose of furthering the manufacturing interests of Canada. Well, now let us analyse that and see to what position it would bring the hon. gentleman. He says $1,000,000,000 is paid in taxes by 5,000,000 people, all told. Now, for a population of 60,000,000 in the United States, that would only be $12,000,000,000; whereas Mulhall tells us that the total cost of the American civil war was £740,000,000 sterling, or only $3,700,000,000 at $5 per pound, less than one-third of the amount which I have given. Now let us take another way. We could make a very ingenious and interesting calculation if we were allowed the liberties that the member for South Oxford takes in a debate and in financial criticism. For instance, you have got to double the amount you find in the blue-books going into the treasury and multiply it by sixteen in order that he may launch that indictment against the National Policy. Now, Sir, with your permission I will take the words "Sir Richard Cartwright, K.C.M.G." There are, I find, just twenty-four letters in these words. If you double them and multiply them by sixteen and then—I hope he will pardon me—subtract 102, you get 666, just the number of the beast. That is logical, and it leads to a most unhappy conclusion. But, still, I think it is as fair an argument as the hon. gentleman addressed to us on the subject of the taxation imposed by this Government. Now, Sir, I would like to refer to the subject of expenditure. The hon. member for South Oxford has worked up the figures to about $40,000,000, or $38,300,000, and he says even the latter figure is altogether too large for the business resources of Canada, and he goes on to say:

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

I say it is a disgrace and a shame to the Government that have been entrusted with our affairs, that they come down to us and ask for an expenditure of $38,300,000 a year for federal purposes. Sir, the thing is utterly unjustifiable.

That is the language of the member for South Oxford, but it is significant to observe that from the beginning to the end of the speech, this statesman was not able to tell this House or the people of Canada just about the sum that Canada could be properly governed for, just the amount of money which he, for instance, would undertake to do the job himself, just what the growing necessities and the development of this young country demands, and that, after all, is a very important consideration. I think I can ferret out and can put my hand upon some of the reasons for the hon. gentleman not doing that. I am firmly of the opinion, and I believe the majority of the business men of this country are of the opinion, that it is simply child's play to pretend that in a country like Canada, in a country with Canada's ambition, with Canada's plans, aye, with Canada's preparation for the future, it is within the possibility of human genius, to govern this country successfully for one dollar a year less. As a representative of one of the constituencies of this country, I take the responsibility of saying that whether my party or the other party be successful at the next election, I have not the slightest doubt that the expenditure of this country will increase instead of diminish; and I will go further and say that, provided wisdom presides over the system of management and expenditure, I hope, and devoutly hope, that the expenditure will increase instead of diminish. This country, as it grows, this country as it successfully develops, certainly this country as it accumulates a larger population, will and must require a larger amount than $40,000,000 a year for its government. We might as well look the thing in the face, we might as well realize, too, the strength of our position. The people of this country are in no wise discouraged by the growth of expenditure by the Government, as long as they get something for the money. What they complained of between 1874 and 1878 was that the gentlemen who used to shout retrenchment and reform from 1867 to 1874, got into office, and for four years were neither able to reduce the expenditure one farthing, nor to do anything for the money they were laying out year after year. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to another liberty taken by the hon. member for South Oxford in discussing this phase of Canada's financial position. He refers to the $23,000,000 of expenditure, being the amount that he found requisite to govern this country when he entered office, and to the $23,000,000 which he required when he went out of office four years later. But it is significant to observe this fact: his party came into power on November 7th, 1873, and the last full year in which his opponents were in office, the expenditure was only $19,000,000, and there was money to pay for it in the treasury; whereas, in his first year in office, in 1874, the expenditure was $23,300,000 in round numbers, and in 1876 it had risen to $24,400,000, and then there was not the money to pay. The expenditure of his predecessors had been out of revenue, had been out of an overflowing exchequer, but the larger expenditure under himself took place when there was not money in the treasury to pay, and when he was forced to obtain money from other sources. On what ground can we expect, even at his hands, a reduction in expenditure? According to their professions before they took office, they would hold up their hands in holy horror at the growth of the annual expenditure from some $13,000,000 to $23,000,000. But when those hon. gentlemen came into power, they were not able to reduce it. We had a little hint from the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) on an important occasion recently that retrenchment is not to be the order of the day when the Liberals attain office and power in this country. I find, when opposing the return of the present Controller of Inland Revenue, the hon. member for Winnipeg, at Victoria, in January of this year, denied that the Liberals were mean. They are disposed, he said, to spend more money than in 1878. He added that they would raise the wages of the mail carriers and labourers, but they would cut down the payment of higher officials to the least they could get them for. They would, moreover, proceed with the development of the country, which the Conservatives had commenced. Again, and of course the hon. gentleman did not hold this out as a bribe—he said he did not know where money could be spent with more advantage than in British Columbia.

But I now desire to refer to a higher authority in the Liberal party on the question of expenditure. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, why the hon. member for South Oxford did not say where this expenditure should be reduced. It was enough for him to hold us responsible. But he himself, only two years ago, on 13th July, in this very House, used the following language on this point. Said the hon. gentleman:

Every human being who pays the slightest attention to the state of affairs in Canada, knows that, in all human probability, for some considerable time to come, we will have very great difficulty in making both ends meet, unless we choose to greatly increase our taxation.

On 28th March, "Hansard" reports the hon. gentleman as saying:

The part of our expenditure which is controllable is very small; the amount of saving that can be made is really very limited.

I well remember in 1887, when the hopes of the Liberal party were very high, when they believed, and their leaders believed, they would win the elections, Mr. Anglin came to Halifax and made this statement:

Unfortunately, no matter what government comes into power, it will be simply impossible to get rid of the imposed taxation. We cannot put a stop to that increase.

The late Finance Minister, the hon. member for South Oxford, when in power, used language which corroborates me in the opinion that I have expressed in regard to what we may expect in the future. Said the hon. gentleman in his Budget speech in 1875:

This country, as it grows and increases in prosperity will require additional expenditures, and, though I hope we will always maintain a moderate surplus, a very considerable portion of the natural increase of revenue must go to meet contingencies, which in a country like ours are inevitable.

There is a very interesting reference in the Year-Book for 1894 to show that Canada has by no means come dangerously near that condition when her expenditure would be a strain upon her resources and upon her capacity. The hon. member for Oxford, I believe, has admitted that the outside annual indebtedness of Canada, federal, provincial, and otherwise, was from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000. At least, he is so reported in February, 1893, in a speech in this House, though I fail to observe when referring to this matter in his recent speech whether he had increased that amount. I find in the Year-Book on this subject, a paragraph, as follows:—

T. Lloyd, the chief writer for the London (Eng.) "Statist," affirms that "No better means of ascertaining what a country can pay in the shape of interest to outside creditors exists than can be found in the exports of the country. No independent country can pay its creditors more than one-third the value of its exports. After it pays more than one-third, it has reached the danger point. The capacity of the people will be strained. During the last three years the exports of Canada have amounted to an average of $117,000,000 a year, one-third of which is $39,000,000. It has been estimated that the outside indebtedness of Canada, federal, provincial, railways, municipalities, and other debts, upon which interest is paid, causes an outgo of from $22,000,000 to $25,000,000 a year. Taking the latter figure, there is still a margin of $14,000,000. We have drawn to the limit of 64 per cent, and have 36 per cent to come and go on.

The only foundation for fear such as the hon. member for South Oxford has expressed in this House seems to me to depend wholly and entirely upon the population of Canada remaining stationary. The hon. gentleman has drawn a great deal of comfort from the fact that Canada was disappointed in regard to the returns of the last census. It has been shown by that census the hopes we entertained ten years ago in regard to the settlement of this country by an incoming population have not been realized. I would not be so hopeful of Canada's future, nor so bold in regard to expenditures we can afford to make in order to increase the development of the country, if I thought for the next decade the returns in regard to population would not be larger; but before I resume my seat I will attempt to show that no reasonable man can believe there ever will be so disappointing a period of ten years in the history of this country as regards population, as the ten years to which reference so often has been made, and on that score I have no fear. But I believe in regard to any proposed retrenchment or proposed reduction of certain expenditures, the people of this country will want to know where that retrenchment is to begin, upon what line of policy it is to proceed. The hon. member for Oxford has stated explicitly to the Patrons, and in a letter, that he was opposed to railway subsidies. I take it, then, though he does not announce it in this House, as part of the policy of the Government of which he will be Finance Minister, that he will endeavour to prevent such expenditure, and it will be possible, in that way, to effect a great reduction. But I am with the majority of the people in advocating even more liberal treatment of Canadian interests in that regard from the federal exchequer than they have hitherto received. In this country, like other new countries, for Canada is still in a large part exceedingly new and undeveloped, we must have railway facilities in order to secure prosperity and attract population, and we have not yet the railway facilities that a country like ours, with its vast extent and extraordinary resources, demands and requires. Will the hon. gentleman tell the people of the country if he proposes to reduce expenditure on public works? Will he say that he will cut off the bounties paid to the fishermen or to the miners in the different parts of the country? Will he interfere with the policy introduced by the present member for London (Sir John Carlisle), when Minister of Agriculture, of affording aid to the farming interest, all of which costs money and money from year to year? Will he stop the development of the dairying interest? Will he stop all the steps that have been taken to facilitate cold storage? Will he interfere to cut down the expenditures required for technical instruction in that regard? Will he put the knife into subsidies for steamship communication? Will he cut off those facilities for developing our trade? Will he stop the policy of deepening our canals, and the policy so successfully carried on, of aiding navigation? Will he throw aside that important subject of cable communication now under the consideration of the Government? Will he stop the expenditure that is required for establishing commercial agencies throughout the world, for the purpose of facilitating Canadian trade? All these things cost money, and they are expenditures largely in excess of the expenditure from 1874 to 1878, and expenditures, too, for which I am glad to say the Conservative party alone has been responsible. Will he stop the generous treatment in regard to our postal facilities? Will he be dismayed at the deficit that exists in that department, when the demand from all parts of Canada is for increased, rather than for lessened postal service? Will he cease to give constant attention to immigration, simply because in large part, all the money expended did not bring the returns that we hoped for in the past? Will he throw cold water upon the hopes and aspirations of the business men of this country in regard to the rounding off of confederation by the bringing in of Newfoundland? If the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) goes for retrenchment; if he goes for a cheap government; all these ambitious schemes must be thrown to the winds; all these ambitious schemes will perhaps be associated with what he calls a "jingo policy." But, Sir, all these efforts towards advancement on the part of this Government have been well appreciated by the people of Canada, and with the National Policy there has come, the ability for the Government, not to foster merely the manufacturing interests, but to do for Canada and for Canadian farmers that which has attracted extraordinary attention in the mother country, and which has induced in large part, the bureaus of the English government to set aside their policy which so long had been laissez faire, and to fill them with admiration, for what is known as "The Colonial Policy in aid of Farming interests." Only in December last, I was glad to see a recognition of the work that this Government has done, in common with some of the other colonial governments, towards assisting the farmers in getting their goods in proper shape to the great market of the world. In the London "Times" of 26th December, I read the following:—

The amount of energy that the governments of these colonies have been, and still are displaying, in order to smooth the path of the colonial producer, and more especially in the way of his sending to Great Britain articles of consumption with which our own farmers are unable or unwilling to supply us; can be adequately realized only by regarding the situation as a whole, and as distinct from isolated examples which attract attention from time to time.

Later on in the same article, I find the following:—

Without going into elaborate statistics, it may be mentioned, as showing the practical results of this careful fostering of Canadian industries, that, in the matter of provisions alone, the value of exports from the Dominion increased from $12,360,066 in 1890 to $21,292,733 in 1894; those sent to Great Britain rising from $10,312,902 in 1890 to $20,789,467 in 1894. Taking the one item of cheese: the quantity sent to Great Britain, which represented $548,574 in 1868, rose in value from $9,349,731 in 1890 to $15,439,198 in 1894. The weight of our cheese import from Canada in 1894 was over 105,000,000 pounds. It is too, partly if not largely, in order to obtain still further facilities for increasing Canadian exports, that the Dominion Government have pledged themselves to contribute $750,000 a year for ten years towards the establishment of the new fast Atlantic service.

So, Mr. Speaker, if wisdom prevails I have no fear in advocating most generous treatment to all these interests in Canada, and in giving further fostering assistance to the industries which at this juncture in the commercial history of the world certainly require it more than they ever did in times past. I am in every sense in favour of a fast service instead of a slow service. Party man as I am, ardent for the success of my party, I said in Toronto last summer, and I hesitate not to repeat it on the floor of the House: that so well have the foundations for prosperity in Canada been laid, so rich is this country in resources and possessions of every kind, that no matter what government is in power in Canada, I believe you cannot now prevent the successful growth and successful development of our country. My point of difference with gentlemen on the other side is—and I am glad to believe it is the main point—as to whether their policy or the policy which I advocate, is the one to accelerate the attainment of great prosperity and to hasten the development of all the interests of Canada. The difference between us is suggested by the last word of the quotation from the "Times." The policy on this side of the House is for a fast service; the policy on the other side is, I believe, for a slow service, and I go for the fastest service it is possible for us to obtain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would refer to another view which the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) expressed in regard to the position of this country. He says, forsooth, that geography is against us. In 1867 or before that, though the hon. gentleman was a much younger man, he was one of the most ardent advocates of the Canadian confederation. His reasons and his arguments which he gave then, I have read, and I have failed to observe anything in them so discouraging as the observations which he addressed to us the other day. If his position be sound now, I cannot conceive how he ever became an advocate of Canadian confederation. Our geographical position! Why, if there is anything in that, what is the position of Great Britain herself? Her position would be poor indeed, insular or otherwise, situated as she is at much greater distance from most of the markets to which he referred. And the hon. gentleman said we had in Canada long tracts of land hard to colonize. Mr. Speaker, I say, that all we have learned in connection with the census returns to which the hon. gentleman so often refers, is not, that the lands in this country are in themselves hard to colonize, but there were other lands that had to be filled up to overflowing before we could hope for the beneficial results that we believe will yet attend the efforts we have made to colonize these lands. Other tracts have been filled up, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will still be in opposition, I believe, when that argument in which he revels will be taken away from him absolutely by the results of an ever continuing stream of emigration to this country, an immigration which has already so happily begun to an enormous extent, from the states to the south of us, and they will come to this country despite its geographical position. Its geographical position, in my opinion, is one of the grandest things about this northern country. It gives us a climate that has enabled us to boast of a people with all the splendid attributes that appertain to men of the north. It has given us five millions of people, not only healthy, but with abundant courage and an ambition that startles chiefly the member for South Oxford, but commands the admiration of the civilized world. It is a country which filled our Australian fellow-Britishers, when they came here, with rapture and delight when they did come, at the results of the confederation of these long stretches. And instead of their being dismayed, or adopting the arguments of the member for South Oxford, they went back, every one of them, anxious to follow the example of Canada, and to bring about in their own country that combination of strength which has developed in this country since 1867 in so marked a degree. But the hon. gentleman tells us—and that dismal argument of his was but to lead to the statement—that the markets to the south of us are worth to Canada all the rest in the world combined. For what reason does he say that? Does he imply—indeed, we know he does imply—that the barriers of the tariff duties destroy a great deal of the benefit that would accrue to Canada were they removed. But his colleague in the Government, the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), is an authority for stating that there are many things to be considered in connection with the value of that market. Without saying that the member for Bothwell is right in the position he took, but remembering that the member for South Oxford made a great deal of a statement of Mr. Colby's in regard to this very subject of reciprocity, I want to point out a statement made by his colleague when a Minister in the Mackenzie Administration, which, if true, destroys at once the position now and for some time assumed by the member for South Oxford, which involves the commercial dependence of Canada upon the United States of America. The member for Bothwell, when Minister of the Interior, speaking in 1878, after a long argument, in which he analysed the official returns and the market prices, stated :

I might go over the prices of barley, rye, and other cereals with much the same result, thus establishing the incontrovertible fact that the duties imposed by the American Congress upon the produce of Canada do not fall upon the people of Canada, but are paid by the consumers of these articles in the United States.

I do not say I subscribe to that ; I do not say it, because the question who pays the duty is a large one. But, generally, I am of the opinion that you cannot lay down, as the member for Bothwell did, a hard and fast rule in regard to it. There are circumstances which bring about very different results. In the main, I believe that in this country our manufacturers and our farmers have taken such advantage of the protective tariff that the principal articles requisite to life are produced in Canada, so that on them the consumer does not pay the duty. I believe that to be the general rule ; of course, there are and always will be exceptions to it. But the member for Bothwell is not alone. The member for South Oxford, as I have often said, and as I will repeat as often as he indulges in his present fallacy, told the people of Canada, when he was Finance Minister, what he said in Halifax in August, 1878, as reported by the Liberal paper of that city :

The men who tell you that reciprocity with the United States is essential to your existence, are, in my opinion, playing a most unwise and dangerous part.

In the same speech, in another place, he said :

We are able to hold our own with the United States.

And later on :

For my part, I will deny that we are dependent upon them in one way or other.

And yet, he would now magnify the favours that we could obtain from the people of the United States, and we know those people are determined and set upon keeping us out of their markets if they can do it, upon keeping out the products of England if they can do it, and upon disheartening, if they can do it, every Canadian in this country. There is no comfort to Canada, or to the business men or farmers of Canada, in a doctrine of that kind, and I am glad to believe that it is a doctrine without foundation. When I read the letter in the London "Economist," to which so frequent reference is made, I not only believed it to be the vilest Canadian production I had ever observed, but I thought, as Shakespeare has said :

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

I will be hanged if some eternal villain,
Some busy and insinuating rogue,
Some cogging, cozening slave, to get some office,
Have not devised this slander.

No language I could use, Mr. Speaker, could fittingly describe the disgraceful character of that production. There never was anything like it in Canada ; I believe there will never be anything like it again. The man who wrote it has been, I believe, well chastised and corrected by many men associated with him in political life in Canada. Full of misrepresentations, full of contradictions, the writer regularly ran amuck in London with Canadian interests and Canadian affairs. Some one has stated that the reason for it was to educate the English public as to what the Liberal policy was. Fancy a party out in the cold shades of opposition for some sixteen years having to rush in 1891 to the London prints to explain what their policy was, as opposed to a policy which for sixteen years had been bleeding the agricultural class white. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to nail some lies to the counter to-day. I pick them out of that production. I find, for instance, a statement that the agricultural class has been bled white. I will not give my own contradiction to that statement, but I will give the contradiction of the Prime Minister of Ontario, and the contradiction of the brother of the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the Rev. Dr. McMullen. This letter was written in the first or second month of 1892, and in the last month of 1891 Sir Oliver Mowat wrote as follows—and Sir Oliver Mowat spoke the truth :—

Our farmers as a class, or our mechanics as a class, or our labourers as a class, whatever the reasons may be, are not less comfortable, on the whole, than the farmers, mechanics and labourers of the United States appear to be, though these are harrassed by no McKinley tariff, and by no like obstruction to the dealing of the states with one another.

Printed along with this letter—because the document containing them both was sent to me by Sir Oliver Mowat—I find a letter of the Rev. W. T. McMullen, I believe a leading divine in the county of Oxford ; and in that letter he says :

Take an average gathering of the Ontario farmers and their families, as you see them at a county or other agricultural exhibition, and in no country in the world will you find their superiors as regards being well kept, well clad and other signs of well-to-do circumstances.

And such is the condition of the agricultural class in the province from which I come, though it is not one of the great agricultural districts of Canada. Take another statement :

The sum taken out of the pockets of the people for the benefit of protected manufacturers, in addition to that paid into the treasury, is certainly not less, and probably a good deal more, than sixty millions of dollars.

And another statement :

The Government gives the protected manufacturers the power of taxing the people for their own purposes.

And another statement :

The Government gives them a free hand to tax the rest of the community for their special benefit.

Still another statement :

Shall Canada be governed for the benefit of the people of Canada, or for the benefit of a few hundred protected manufacturers, backed by a subsidized press and a purchased majority in the legislature ?

Those statements with regard to the interest of the manufacturers in the National Policy and the favours shown to them, and with regard to their opportunities for bleeding the people of the country, are without foundation in fact. They are not believed by the gentlemen that sit upon the benches opposite me. One after another has risen to say, at different periods, that the National Policy has been a curse instead of a benefit to the people of Canada. One after another has risen to ask the people to believe that no single manufacturing interest in Canada was created or benefited by the National Policy. None of these statements is accurate : but the first of the lot to which I have referred are misleading, and nothing less. There is a happy medium. I have given one extreme. It is found in that letter. I shall quote now the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in answer to the statement in that letter. Whether he had in mind these statements as to the extraordinary manner in which the manufacturers were revelling in wealth and handling millions out of the treasury or out of the taxpayers of this country or what else he had in mind, this is what he said at Collingwood in February, 1891 :

No man in his senses can seriously argue that the manufacturers are as well off as they were twelve years ago.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, sixty millions of dollars per year and a thousand millions of dollars in seventeen years were being wrung out of the people of this country for the benefit of the manufacturers of Canada according to the hon. member for South Oxford. Such a statement is not only without foundation, it is absolutely ridiculous on the face of it. The hon. leader of the Opposition, Mr. Laurier, too, will not agree with one of those statements, for in 1895, I find him saying at Markham, as reported by the Toronto "Globe" :

Not an industry in the country has benefited by the National Policy.

Those were the statements, however, that were put before the English public at a time which, I shall show, was a very peculiar time for a letter or production of that kind to come to the front. But I shall take the hon. member for South Oxford himself (Sir Richard Cartwright) to contradict those statements. I find that in 1879 he expressed this opinion :

This tariff cannot stand. The manufacturers will find that they may get temporary but no real relief from it. For one or two years they may make a profit, but they will find it a mistake to encourage competition unduly at home, which will inevitably take the place of foreign competition.

That was his prophecy in 1879. In 1880 he said again that these manufacturers derived no benefit from the tariff. Speaking at Uxbridge in 1880, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) said :

The manufacturers had less protection than under the old tariff. He stood before them, as a manufacturer, to say that. The great trouble was not the slaughter of American goods. Take, for instance, the manufactures of boots and shoes. There were so many factories that they made more boots and shoes than the people could wear out, and, consequently, the home competition ruined prices all around.

Those statements cannot be true if the statements in the letter be true. That is enough for me at present. I find again at Newmarket in 1893, the leader of the Opposition saying :

We are told that the manufacturers of agricultural implements cannot live without the protective tariff. There are, I am glad to say, manufacturers of agricultural implements in this riding—the mayor of the town of Aurora is a manufacturer of agricultural implements. He does not want protection : he wants free trade. And it is so all along the line.

And the hon. gentleman went into the question of the industry of boots and shoes in Quebec in order to show that more money was made by the manufacturers in that industry before this tariff than under it. Then I find the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), on the 16th February, 1893, telling us this :

Take the list of failures that occurred during the Mackenzie Administration among the manufacturers of this country, and take the record of failures among the manufacturing classes since the inception of the National Policy, and I venture to say, you will find more capital sunk, wasted and destroyed, under the National Policy, than there was during the whole of the time the Mackenzie Government was in power.

Now, the reason this extraordinary statement found its way to the English public was in order to support the unfair, the diabolical conclusions that the manufacturers supplied, at the call of the Government of this country, a huge fund for corrupting the electorate. And so the picture had to be drawn so as to show that huge fortunes were being made by the manufacturers at the cost of the people, and that by the aid of the manufacturers, by the unscrupulous means to which they resorted, by bribery and corruption of the most determined character, the Government of the day had managed to remain in power.

Then this letter goes on to say :

The best, and probably the only really available, method to overthrow the National Policy lies in introducing a system of perfect continental free or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States.

Now, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) does not believe a word of that to-day. There is not a man on the benches in front of him who believes a word of that sentence : " The only possible policy by which we can overthrow the National Policy is by continental free trade." I challenge any gentleman in this House to support that statement or to say that it is accurate. No one in this House, including the hon. member for South Oxford, will say that that is a correct statement to-day, nor was it correct then, as time has shown. Another statement is in effect :

Free trade and a low rate of taxation impossible. Opportunities for this thrown away, and cannot be recovered.

And yet there are gentlemen opposite who talk of us as charlatans, as humbugs, as liars, as I have heard our party described in this debate, and do not hesitate to preach to the people that they advocate the policy of free trade, and, if given power, would bring it about. And yet, this statement is that the opportunities for free trade in Canada have been thrown away and cannot be recovered. The leader of the Opposition himself says that free trade can and will be recovered, and promises to bring it about if he is given the opportunity in the next general election.

Then as to discrimination. Who advocates discrimination against the mother country to-day ? That was the strong point, the essential feature of unrestricted reciprocity. Said the hon. member for South Oxford, speaking at Ingersoll on the 10th October, 1887 :

There is no doubt whatever that, before we can obtain such a measure of unrestricted reciprocity as the advocates of this system desire, it will be necessary for us to discriminate against the manufactories of other countries, against those, even, of Great Britain.

And later on in the same speech :

We can only get it by taxing the goods of every country on the face of the earth except those of the United States, which is, undoubtedly, part of our policy.

A little later on, after this policy had been dished—if I may so express it—the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) was found saying, in a speech at St. John on the 29th August, 1893 :

He did not favour this discrimination against the home of our fathers. We owed all to the motherland—our free speech, our protection by her fleet, and our free press ; and yet we turn on her, like an undutiful son.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

He was condemning this Government in these extravagant terms because there was even an element of discrimination against the mother country in the National Policy. But that gentleman did all he could for unrestricted reciprocity, which depended on discrimination direct against the mother country and in favour of a foreign country, until the bottom was knocked out of the whole scheme.

Now, what was the reason of that letter ? The late Finance Minister has explained in a Budget speech how sensitive the money market in England is. Lately we have been accustomed to hear from him that any one could get money easily in London nowadays—that money is so cheap that there is more there than can be invested, that money is lying there drawing no interest, and, therefore, it is no great thing that Canada is able to borrow on satisfactory terms, that all countries do so more or less, and so on. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford did not always hold that opinion, and no financial authorities of any repute or standing ever expressed it. In 1877 the hon. gentleman said :

Unhappily, the very fact that money is plentiful in London does not by any means ensure success to a colonial Minister of Finance in negotiating a loan there. Money is plenty in a great many places, simply because credit is scarce ; and it by no means follows that it is, therefore, easy to induce investors to put their money into comparatively unknown security.

He also goes on to remark, and I would call particular attention to this :

It is perfectly well known that Canada is not looked upon with a friendly eye by some persons having great influence with the London press.

And yet in this very speech which I am endeavouring to answer in part, he almost revelled and gloried in the many slanders that were published in the London press in regard to the conditions of politicians and politics and legislation in his native country. But in 1877 he warned us that there were high authorities in connection with the press not friendly to Canada. Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to bear in mind the fact that in 1892 we were going to borrow money in the London market. The hon. gentleman's opponent, in the direction of financial affairs of this country was going, on behalf of this country, to borrow. It was to Canada's interest to get the money on the best terms possible. In that very year 1892, the hon. member for South Oxford anticipated the arrival in England of the Finance Minister by that letter, for the writing of which he is not ashamed even at the present day. He added to all that was hostile to Canada this letter in which there were statements because of which, if they were believed, no man would lend Canada a single dollar. And yet this is what he told us in 1877 :

More than once, during the progress of the negotiations of previous loans, hostile articles had appeared in the London journals of widely-extended circulation, and I had good reason to think that, if there was much delay, we might be exposed to the same adverse criticism, to the very serious detriment of the operation.

The hon. gentleman knew the possible effect of these adverse criticisms; and yet, in 1892, when we were seeking to borrow money, he managed to get that letter into as leading a paper as the London "Economist." Fortunately the London "Economist" laughed at it, and by the criticism and exposition of the relief he was proposing to give to Canada destroyed the effect of the letter and made the writer of it an object of ridicule. The result was that the loan proved one of the best we have ever made, and, up to that date, the very best loan that Canada had ever put upon the market. Indeed, the letter did good after all, for it brought out the weak position of the opponents of the Canadian Government and showed the character of some of the men who were being kept in opposition. And in 1894 the success of Canada in the London market was phenomenal and the terms of the loan of that year were the best ever obtained. The "Financial News," which is not, I believe, a paper of very high standing, was the only journal, so far as I know, that took that concoction seriously. It stated in effect—and I have the paper under my hand—that if the letter were true the sooner Canadian securities were got rid of the better for the holders, that the bottom had fallen out of Canada and that any man who invested in Canada was exposing his money not only to certain risks but to certain loss. Fortunately no one credited that; and the hon. member for South Oxford himself has to repudiate many of these statements, some of which I have referred to in this debate. And I am glad of it.

Now, the hon. gentleman referred to preferential trade. He thinks that preferential trade necessitates the adoption of a protective tariff in England. And so, while he chides me for reading from what he calls a scrap-book, he produced a very formidable looking compilation from which he read speech after speech from English statesmen, not on the subject of preferential trade, but against protection, and to the effect that protection in England was impossible—just as free trade in Canada is impossible, in my opinion. Now let me show the hon. gentleman that if he had read the lecture to which he so sneeringly referred he would not have done such poor justice to himself. On pages 16 and 17 of the document to which he referred—an address delivered recently before the board of trade by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.)—reference is made to English statesmen, not as to what they said about protection per se in England, but as to what they said more directly referring to this important question of preferential trade. We have the secretary of Lord Salisbury, for instance, writing on 5th April, 1887, in reply to some inquiry. He said:

I am to reply that Lord Salisbury does not imagine that differential duties in favour of our colonies, whatever may be said for or against them, can properly be described under the term "protection."

So much for the speeches against protection and its possibility, upon which the hon. member for South Oxford relied as meeting, at the very beginning, the arguments that might otherwise weigh in favour of preferential trade. But on page 17, I find another reference of Lord Salisbury. Speaking, I think, to a delegation, he said:

You have to state the details of your policy, and spare no pains in the effort of impressing it upon your fellow-men. But it is essential that you should explain it. You must submit to your countrymen precisely what it is you want them to do, so that they may examine what will be the results upon their commerce and their own life, so that an estimate of their exact value may be formed, and they may give effect to their opinions in consequence. I am sure that those who are thoroughly convinced of the truth of their doctrines, will feel this ordeal to be one from which they will not shrink, but will heartily welcome, and devote all their energies to it. I would ask you, first, to give your propositions sharpness and definiteness, so that these matters may be threshed out and argued before the country. I know the ordinary view of the duty of the Government is to devise for itself the measures it may bring forward, and then let them take their chance, whatever that may be. And, no doubt, it is in a great measure true with respect to the large mass of legislation on secondary questions that they have to propose; but it is not true with respect to "an organic question which concerns, and will control, the very existence of our Empire and the very foundation of our trade." On this matter public opinion must be framed or formed before any government can act. No government can impose its own opinions on the people of this country in these matters. You are invited, and it is the duty of those who feel themselves to be the pioneers of such a movement and the apostles of such a doctrine, to go forth and fight for it, and, when they have convinced the people of this country, their battle will be won.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the "Saturday Review" also had a very important reference to the same subject, of the most hopeful character, evolved out of the distressing events that have occurred in the history of the United States and of England at a recent period. But suppose the thing is not possible, they have been told by Lord Salisbury to think the thing out, to discuss it, and no man can deny that if it were possible, it promises much for the country's benefit. Why scout, why abuse, any man, and abuse him personally, because he advocates this? After all said and done, it is certainly as possible, in my judgment, as was unrestricted reciprocity. Nothing is possible to those who have no courage, or who have no faith. But the subject is well worth a great deal more consideration than the member for South

Oxford was willing to give it. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question of population and of the census is the pièce de résistance, so to speak, of the member for South Oxford. He has made a hobby of that subject, and he never wearies of it. It is the same old story, the same old argument, and his position, in short, is something like this: that the census, as regards population, is singularly accurate, that a comparison between 1881 and 1891 can mislead no one; that this part of the census work was done to perfection, but that part of it regarding the growth of manufacturing industry and the development of the wealth of Canada, is a perfect farce, that it is ridiculous to the last degree, and cannot be relied upon by any one in Canada or out of Canada. That is his position in short; that is the position out of which he is extracting a great deal of comfort. Well, now, let us see if every one agrees that Canada has no grounds for hope, because Canada's hopes in regard to population were not thoroughly and fully realized in that decade. I find that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton)—who I regret to see is not in his place on account of illness—in 1876 put forth this view on this interesting subject. I do not know whether the member for South Oxford ever sympathized with it, but certainly he has entirely ignored it in his arguments, so far as they have been founded on the matter of the census. Said Mr. Charlton:

Although we had in the North-west, as he was proud to state, an extensive and fertile region, for certain reasons, he believed its settlement must necessarily proceed slowly. He did not believe that a great exodus of the inhabitants of Europe would pass to these plains, as had been the case with the prairie states of the American Union. Quite a large proportion of European immigrants would avoid it; the Germans would naturally go further south; the residents of the British Isles, to a great extent, would follow this example. Though the Scandinavians would likely go there, still it would fill up slowly, and, until a great influx came into that region, it was folly to make provisions for their wants.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there were those in this country who thought that we should wait until, in some mysterious manner, a population was injected into those territories before we proceeded to their development. The Conservative party, however, believed that the development of the territories ought to precede settlement. An enormous amount of money, no doubt, has been expended in order to force into those countries a large and valuable population, and to some extent there has been failure. But the results that have attended the efforts of the pioneers have been indeed remarkable, and are most reassuring. I believe, Mr. Speaker—I have said it already, and I propose to give some interesting evidence in support of my belief—that we have seen the worst of disappointment of that kind, and that the money we have expended there has not, after all, been lost. Canada itself has gained from the money that has been expended in attempting to bring population into her territories, because her resources have been made known all the world over, without loss to Canada, but attended by ever-increasing credit. All these active and energetic efforts have made Canada one of the best known and most favourably known countries in the world. What do we now see? We observe that it was inevitable that the vacant and valuable lands in the western territories of the United States would have to be filled to overflowing before an immigration from those territories could be brought about; but we have the gratifying knowledge to-day that that army, so to speak, forming hitherto the trend of immigration to the Western States, has already begun to march into the North-west Territories of Canada, and those immigrants have given every evidence of their entire satisfaction with the condition of things to be found in this Canada of ours. Now, we have had no assistance, no comfort, from the member for South Oxford, indeed, comfort or assistance offered from a quarter like that would have been suspicious; but we have had from a foreigner, from an intelligent gentleman living in the United States, an inquiry and an investigation into this subject, the result of which is worth all the speeches of the hon. member for South Oxford put together. I propose to call the attention of the House to a most thorough and exhaustive article on that interesting topic, the immigration and settlement of the west. Mr. S. A. Thompson, writing in the "New England Magazine" for October, gives an account of his individual inquiries on the movement of population. It was a curious movement of population from the New England states. There was a movement, for instance, between New England and my native province, because, strange to say, long before the rebellion of the old colonies the movement of population was entirely from New England to Nova Scotia, and the tide seemed to be increasing in volume all the time. And if I am not wrong, the turn of the tide had even begun before the war, but certainly it kept up under the reciprocity treaty, so the wonder is that there is any population in Nova Scotia at all. Thousands and thousands proceeded for a century almost from Nova Scotia to New England states, and from New England thousands and thousands went to the western territories. Mr. Thompson, in a most complete manner, follows out that interesting development and tries to give reasons and assign causes for the currents of human beings, till he comes into Canada. Why does he come into Canada? He finds in state after state out west a movement has already begun, a movement of the most extraordinary character from the western states into Canadian territory. Why? Because the good lands, all the lands, speaking generally, outside of arid lands, are fully occupied, settled and owned so far as the United States controls them, and the people are perforce compelled to go north. He points out that the only thing the United States can do to hold the people within their own land is to go extensively into a system of irrigation. But of Canada, the writer tells us, having no regard for the dismal views held by the hon. member for South Oxford :

For Canada the hour of destiny has struck. She has the physical basis for an empire; and the stream of immigration which has now begun will swell into a mighty movement of population like that by which our central west was occupied, until her fertile lands shall be the home of millions of prosperous people.

That is the creed of the Conservative party, and Conservatives will not lose hope, nor will they be discouraged by the Reform finger pointing always to what has gone by and to what is past. We look to the future, we have confidence in the future. We look to the future with confidence because we know the lands which we possess, we know the advantages we enjoy, we know that if you look over this continent and from this continent to continents on the other side of the world, or look where you will, you will fail to find land equal to our land, you cannot find a country, take it all in all, where comfort is so generally enjoyed, and where the people are so generally prosperous.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with very much pleasure to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He was pleased, in his opening remarks, to allude to the speech delivered in three parts by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and while we have not been favoured with hearing a speech in three parts from the hon. gentleman we have had an address in two parts. I do not know that I will attempt to follow him in all the statements he has made. The hon. gentleman will himself admit, as he said last night, he was very anxious to refer to authorities, that he has referred to authorities very fully, so fully that it would be impossible to review or criticise anything he might have said in that respect until his speech is in print. I was not quite sure myself whether the authorities on all the subjects were the very best that could have been selected, or not. To-day, the hon. gentleman has left the authorities, and has fallen back largely on his own ideas, and I am glad to say that he possesses the same hopeful mind with respect to the country now that he did many years ago. I am a Canadian, as is the hon. gentleman, and anything said that tends to exalt the country, that tends to picture in a bright light what it is, if true, is something that is always very pleasing to me. But I never forget the fact that to indulge in prophecies which have not been fulfilled, and to draw rosy pictures without being warranted in a good measure and degree in doing so, is really not tending to advance the interests of the country. If the hon. gentleman, in making forecasts of the progress and prosperity of the country in years gone by, had given himself a status shown that he is worthy of consideration in that respect, we would have been more delighted to-day in listening to his predictions as to what the future of Canada is to be. True it is that he told us in his concluding remarks that we may look for immigration into Canada, because, forsooth, if I understood him rightly, there is no other country where immigrants can well go. I do not think that was very complimentary to this country. True, the hon. gentleman said that there was no fairer land, no better climate, no place where men and women can do better than in Canada. That is my belief, and I re-echo that statement. But I ask if there is no better country under heaven, if there is no country with a richer soil, a more healthy climate, and where people can establish more happy homes, how is it that the men and women have elected to go elsewhere and not settle here, until, as the hon. gentleman alleges, all the other countries have been filled up? There must be some reason. The hon. gentleman said that the reason does not lie in the land or in the climate, or in the absence of home comforts. Might I ask the hon. gentleman the cause which has prevented this country being filled up earlier?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am very glad to give the hon. gentleman one cause. The means of entering our lands were only afforded a few years ago, after hon. gentlemen opposite had gone out of power. The other countries had been open for years.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman has given me an answer in part, but still that will hardly explain the whole trouble, I think. I do not know whether the Canadian Pacific Railway was fully built in 1883. Let us see, however, what happened in 1883 before the country was opened up fully. This was what the hon. gentleman said during the debate on the Speech from the Throne at the opening of that session :

A little over forty years ago the people of Great Britain were startled by the fact that in the year 1841 no less than 106,000 subjects had left the British Isles, not only for the colonies, but for the United States of America. This announcement caused at that time great comment in England. It was considered that never, from the time the Goths and Huns had overrun the Roman empire, had such an emigration taken place from any country. To-day, Mr. Speaker, we are in the happy position of knowing that instead of 106,000 men leaving our shore for any such bellicose purpose, over 113,000 men, women and children have come into this Dominion in one year to swell its population and to aid in the march of progress.

That was before the avenues to the Northwest had been opened up. What might be expected when 113,000 people came into the country when the avenues were not fully opened up—what might be expected after the avenues were fully opened? That is the question. The hon. gentleman does not answer me. I expected he would do so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would you like me to make another speech?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman would not offend me no matter how many speeches he was pleased to make. He can use so many words in elaborating an idea that it is a pleasure to listen to him. The hon. gentleman in the speech to which I have referred, explained how we were blessed with this great immigration.

The manner in which the Department of Agriculture has been administered must command the admiration of our people. All the immense resources that this country can boast of would be valueless without the men and without the money to make them marketable; and, therefore, in viewing the extraordinary immigration which has been brought about, we are not alone to thank Providence and the National Policy, but we must extend a meed of that praise to the successful administrator of the Department of Agriculture, which is charged with the regulation and control of immigration affairs.

We were to be thankful for three things: Providence, the National Policy, and the Minister of Agriculture. Well, Providence was kind to us then, and I trust Providence is as kind to us to-day. What is to blame, then? What has become of the National Policy and the Minister of Agriculture? It surely must be their fault if the immigration has declined. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says that was something that startled Great Britain, and not since the time when the Huns and the Goths overran the Roman empire had there been any such thing known, as 106,000 people leaving the shores of their own country in one year. The hon. gentleman will not deny that 2 per cent per annum is a very small estimate of the natural increase of a country like Canada, and that would make over 800,000. The Government told us by the figures they gave Parliament from year to year (figures prepared by this Minister of Agriculture who deserves a meed of praise) that 886,000 immigrants were brought into Canada during the decade between the census of 1881 and 1891. What would that make, then? It would make over 1,600,000 souls that should have been in Canada in 1891 more than in 1881. The Conservative Government counted the people in 1881; the Conservative Government counted the people in 1891, and, if I remember right, something like 502,000 was the total increase of the Dominion during these ten years. Am I right in that?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Quite right.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then if the hon. gentleman takes 500,000 from 1,600,000

he will see that in the ten years we had 1,100,000 less people than we ought to have. So that in ten years, 106,000 if it had gone on, would not have amounted to as much as the loss to Canada of the population that has gone from her shores. These are figures from the report of the Minister of Agriculture; that Minister which the hon. gentleman himself has referred to as worthy of a meed of praise. While we would like to rejoice with the hon. gentleman in the prospect that there is better hope for us in the future, than the results that have been obtained in the past, I cannot refrain from pointing out to the hon. gentleman that the hopes held out to us in the past have been very disappointing, indeed. I am, however, glad to endorse him fully when he said that if there be a fault that our population has not increased more rapidly, it is not in the country, it is not in the climate, it is not in the natural causes that prevail in Canada. I believe, taking one country with another, there is not a better country than ours on the face of the globe. And therefore if we have not made the progress we should have made, it does seem to me that there must be some other reason for it. I cannot disassociate from my mind the thought, that if there had been a Government such as this country should have had, there would have been a better showing made in the last census in the matter of population than this Government were able to show.

The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) touched upon the question of expenditure, and he told us boldly that Canada could not be governed for $1 less. I would be very sorry to think that the country never should cost more to govern than it does at the present time, re-echoing the sentiment expressed by the hon. gentleman, but coupled with the condition that this extra expenditure was made imperative because of a great increase in population. All will agree with me that in a country adding vastly to its population year after year, the public service must require the expenditure of more money. But, Sir, if the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) means that under present conditions and with the present population of the country, it would have been impossible for this Government to govern the country at a less expenditure than now prevails, then I take wholly and entirely a different view. I unhesitatingly say that I believe, and, notwithstanding that this Government have increased the fixed charges to such an extent, I affirm my unhesitating belief that if a Government were installed in power, if a Liberal Administration were installed in power, with right views and methods regulating their procedure, you would find that the country would be governed for a sum of money very much less than those gentlemen opposite have been expending.

I shall now allude to another point that the hon. gentleman spoke of, and which was dwelt upon also by the Finance Minister. They maintained that the rate of taxation has increased very slightly, indeed so slightly that it is not worth mentioning. The Minister of Finance himself—and this year for the first time, I believe—ventured to apply a test which, I think, is a good test, that is, the per capita customs tax. It is true the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), speaking of it, and looking at it in one light, refused to accept it as very good authority, because of the fact, as he alleged, that in measuring the taxation you cannot measure it by the amount that actually went into the treasury, as there was a vast amount of taxation taken out of the pockets of the people—estimated by him at $30,000,000 per year—which did not go into the treasury at all. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) makes light of that argument, and, in fact, does not believe it. For my own part, I do not intend to go into figures on that. I will let the statement of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the reasons he has adduced for arriving at his conclusions speak for themselves. I am free to admit that so far as my personal opinion is concerned, I have not been able to see that the rate of duty that was exacted on a certain article, is at all times an extra price exacted for that article by the producer of it in the country. I have never taken that position. But it is manifestly absurd, if I might use that expression, for any gentleman of intelligence to claim that when you have a heavy duty levied upon an article that duty has not the effect of raising the price of that same article when it is manufactured in the country. It is intended for that purpose, and if other circumstances arise (as arise they do, at times) they modify it. But the fact, nevertheless, remains—I will not attempt to fix a figure—that a very large amount of taxation other than goes to the public treasury must be levied from the people by the existence of a high rate of duty. I wish to confine myself to one phase of the subject on which there cannot be argument or dispute at all. I want to get down to the argument on the extra cost of taxation on the people of this country, as revealed by the Trade and Navigation Returns, and as attested by the amount that went into the treasury, leaving the other matter out of consideration altogether. The Minister of Finance told us that from 1873-74 to 1877-78, including both years, the average customs taxation per head was $3.44, while he says, in 1894-95 it was $3.52 per head, only 8 cents per head greater than the period from 1874 to 1878. Well, Sir, what was the reason that the Finance Minister ventured in his Budget speech this year—I think for the very first time—to take the customs taxation per head as a test? Was it because this year it was found to be $3.52 per head, as he states it was, while in the year before it was $3.86, the year before that $4.26, the year before that $4.20, the year before that $4.84, the year before that $5.01, the year before that $5.02, the year before that $4.74, and so on? Is that the reason he ventured for the first time, so far as I remember, to adopt this test of the amount of the customs duties per head—because he found that this year it was reduced to $3.52? Possibly that is the explanation. But I want to point out that the hon. gentleman had during the year 1895 a deficit of over $4,000,000; and if the people had bought the goods which would have given him the revenue that he absolutely required to make both ends meet, then, Sir, instead of paying $3.52 per head, they would have had to pay 80 cents per head more; so that instead of the taxation last year being only 8 cents per head more than the average during the period of the Mackenzie Administration, it would have been 88 cents per head more.

But, Sir, let us see what has been the result of this extra taxation. In the five years from 1874 to 1879 the average customs taxation per head, under the Mackenzie Administration, amounted to $3.31½, while in the sixteen years from 1879 to 1895 the average customs taxation per head was $4.44. In other words, the excess of customs duties paid in the last sixteen years over the previous five years under the Mackenzie Administration amounted to $1.12½ per head. Now, suppose you take the population at 4,000,000 during the Mackenzie period and during the period that hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power, although the estimated population under which they arrive at the figure they have given us is set down in the Trade and Navigation Returns as being this year over $5,000,000. But I say, in order to be within the mark and to leave no margin for dispute whatever—for the figures are sufficiently large and startling to do that—taking the population at 4,000,000 only, $1.12½ per head of extra taxation means that $4,500,000 of extra taxation has been taken out of the pockets of the people of this country each year that this Government has been in power above what was required to carry on the affairs of the country, more than was taken by the Mackenzie Administration. This means that in the sixteen years during which they have been in power they have taken no less than $72,000,000 out of the pockets of the people in the shape of increased taxation, without taking into account any taxation which the people have paid that does not go into the public treasury. That is on the basis of a population of 4,000,000. An hon. member points out that some have estimated the amount to be higher. I am aware that I am taking less than the real population; but I did not want to go into a close calculation, and I always think that in making an argument of this kind, the best plan to pursue is to make it so much within the mark that it cannot be at all assailed. I have not the least doubt, however, that the actual amount is very much greater than I have stated.

The hon. gentleman may say, was there not a deficit in the time of the Mackenzie Government? There have been deficits under the Mackenzie Government, and there have been surpluses under the Mackenzie Government. There have been deficits under the hon. gentleman, and there have been surpluses. But whether deficits or surpluses, these things find their way into the public debt; and during the years that hon. gentlemen opposite have taken this extra taxation from the people, the net debt of this country has increased over $110,000,000 at the same time.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman spoke with reference to the sugar and the coal duties. In speaking of the reduction of taxation, the hon. Finance Minister claimed that he had taken off $19,000,000 of sugar duties. Well, I do not blame him for making that claim, for a gentleman of his ability would not take the position he did unless he was hard driven to make an argument—I give him credit for that intelligence and keenness in debate. But the hon. gentleman knows that if he took off $19,000,000 odd from the taxes on sugar, it inevitably follows that he must have put that amount of taxes on at some previous periods. He could not have taken it off unless he had put it on; and it is that one article that strengthens mightily the position taken by the hon. member for South Oxford, that the burden of taxation levied on the people was not to be measured alone by the amount that goes into the treasury, but also by that amount, which cannot be estimated exactly, but which is put by the hon. member for South Oxford and other gentlemen at many millions of dollars. It is one of the items that give great strength to their position. Let us look at it for a moment. I find by the Trade and Navigation Returns that of raw sugar there was imported up to the 3rd of May, 1895, over 309,000,000 pounds at a cost of $6,700,000 on which there was no duty whatever. But the hon. gentleman knows as well as I know that that raw sugar did not go into consumption, no appreciable part of it, until it was passed through the refineries and was refined and put upon the market as refined sugar. And he knows that the refined sugar that would go into competition with that refined sugar was taxed 64 cents per 100 pounds, while the raw sugar was free of duty. Therefore, I would be warranted in saying that the sugar refiners did not hesitate to avail themselves of a good portion of that duty, as the hon. gentleman can find for himself by referring to the quotations of refined sugar in Canada and the quotations in England at the same time. There was a case in which the public treasury received no revenue at all, while the tariff inflicted a taxation on the people of the country represented by the difference in the prices prevailing for refined sugar in these two markets. But, Sir, we find that of the raw sugar imported last year the entries were made largely before the changes in the tariff were announced. While 309,000,000 pounds came in prior to the 3rd of May, between that date and the end of the fiscal year only 36,000,000 pounds came in; so that we did not benefit much from the imposition of the duty on raw sugar. Again, we have to look into the matter in this light. Take for granted that the Finance Minister reduced the taxation on the long list of articles which he read to prove that he had done so. Suppose we take him on his own ground, where he reduced the taxation three, five or ten per cent. I say that in claiming these reductions, he admits that during those years when the greater taxation existed, he was leaving a certain amount of taxation upon the people that was not necessary for the administration of the affairs of this country. He cannot deny that proposition. If he was able to reduce it, it must have been a burden which he had put upon the people before, and a burden which was entirely unnecessary. When he reduced the duty on refined sugar to 64 cents per 100 pounds, by that very declaration he said: I have left the refiners enough protection, for I still cling to the policy of protection. I have left them sufficient protection, he said; 64 cents per hundred pounds is sufficient protection for the refiner. Yet, Mr. Speaker, 64 cents was nothing compared to the protection he gave them previously, from year to year, of 80 cents per hundred pounds. Why did he take that 16 cents per hundred pounds out of the people for years, if 64 cents per hundred pounds was adequate protection?

Mr. FOSTER. There was a change in the numbers. You must take that into consideration.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There was a change in the numbers. The standard was raised from 14 Dutch standard to 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. FOSTER. That would make a difference.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman must see that there was not a very great difference in that, because the imports of sugar above 16 Dutch standard, to the 3rd May, 1895, at a duty of 64 cents per hundred pounds amounted to $259,000, on which the duty was $52,000. My recollection is that there was an amount of something like $10,000 which went into the treasury the year before, so that the change did not affect the question very materially.

Then we come to another question with which the hon. gentleman dealt—the question of trade with Great Britain. He claimed, as has been claimed by the hon. gentleman who just sat down (Sir Charles Herbert Tupper), that our tariff does not discriminate against Great Britain. Well, we take the opposite ground, and we contend that we are justified in taking that ground by the Trade and Navigation Returns. We claim that while the nominal duty is the same on articles coming from any country, in the practical working out of the tariff, the articles which are more largely produced in, and come out of, Great Britain do bear a higher rate of taxation than goods coming from the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. Similar goods.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am talking of the general arrangement of the tariff, and its general effect. It was to emphasize that fact; it was not only to give relief to the people of Canada, which was the main object, but also to do that which we consider right, that Mr. Davies, the hon. member for Queen's, moved, in 1892, the following amendment to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for North Bruce. That hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill), by his resolution, proposed to the British Government that when they gave us more favourable terms of entrance for our goods into their markets, we would be prepared to give them a substantial reduction in our duties. The hon. member for Queen's moved an amendment to this resolution, as follows:—

That inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain should be reduced.

And hon. gentlemen opposite united in voting down that resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman tell the House what was the attitude of the Liberal party and the leader of the Liberal party on that amendment.

Mr. MULOCK. In favour of that. We voted for it.

Mr. FOSTER. Your own leader spoke against it.

Mr. LAURIER. I voted for it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think my hon. friend will have to look that over again. He has forgotten himself, I am afraid, and looking forward to the future a few months, has supposed the leader of the Opposition to be on that side, and confounded him with the leader of the Government. What are the facts with reference to the working out of the tariff? The hon. gentleman attempted to deny that the practical operation of the tariff is to discriminate against Great Britain. Well, if we take the Trade and Navigation Returns, we shall not have any difficulty in finding out how the tariff works. I find that the imports of dutiable goods into the Dominion from Great Britain amounted to $23,311,911, the duty collected on which was $7,006,676, or an average duty of about 30 per cent on the dutiable goods brought in from Great Britain. Then we imported from the United States, dutiable goods to the amount of $25,795,598, the duty on which amounted to $6,897,395, or an average duty of 26¾ per cent. So that, even taking the dutiable goods alone, there was 3¾ per cent more of an average duty levied on English goods as compared with those coming from the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. That is true.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is true. The hon. Minister will admit that all I say is true. We come now to look at it, and I think we are justified in looking at it in a broader sense than just the dutiable goods coming from the United States and Great Britain, for dutiable goods and free goods must be taken into consideration. And while the argument might be stronger, when applied to dutiable goods, yet we cannot fully understand the position unless we take into consideration the average rate of duty on the imports from these two countries, both of dutiable and of free goods.

Now, the total imports from Great Britain amounted to $31,131,737, on which the duty was levied of $7,006,676, or an average of about 22½ per cent. From the United States the total importations were $54,634,521, the duty collected on which was $6,897,395, or an average duty of 12.6-10 per cent. So that, within a fraction, there is 10 per cent more duty exacted on goods imported from Great Britain than on goods imported from the United States. The hon. gentleman, therefore, will have to admit that, much as he may dislike the result, the figures of the Trade and Navigation Reports bear out the conclusion to which I have arrived.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose my hon. friend has not a similar comparison for 1878.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, I have not.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be instructive just to follow it out some time when you have leisure.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the point? Is it that it would show the same relative difference of 10 per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. Probably more.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Some gentleman following me no doubt will be able to take up the point that is suggested by the Finance Minister. I did not think it necessary to do so for my argument and the purposes of comparison. I was simply proving the one point, that the present and past operation of the tariff is in that direction, and if it be not a position which we should take, it would be well to change it.

Now, the hon. gentleman wants to know what the platform of the Liberal party is, and he attempted to lay it down. I am rather amused at the hon. gentleman and his colleagues taking the position they do, in treating the subject of the trade policy of the Liberal party. First of all, we are told we have no policy. I think I read that the hon. Secretary of State, on his way up, either at Halifax or elsewhere, declared that the Liberal party was without a policy. That hon. gentleman has not caught up to some of the members of the House, who have declared that the Liberal party have a policy, and have attempted to state what it is. The hon. member for Pictou has endeavoured to state that policy. If I followed him correctly, he said that the policy of the Liberal party was a policy of free trade and direct taxation. I do not wish to misquote him. I think that was the hon. gentleman's argument.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Without being offensive or desiring to be offensive I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, when they attempt to contrast the trade policy of the two parties, to be kind enough to declare their own trade policy, and to leave the Liberal party to declare theirs. I ask them by what right they speak upon this matter? Who constituted them the tribunal to determine what the Liberal trade policy is and announce it to the country? I would ask the hon. member for Pictou what right he has to declare the policy of the Liberal party? Has he been admitted to its council, is he a recognized representative of that body? How is he in a position to know what the policy of the Liberal party is, except as he is told by those who are in a position to speak? If this point is to be questioned, let us have something authoritative. Does the hon. gentleman ask me my authority for stating what the platform of the Liberal party is? I may tell him that as a member of that party for at least thirty years, as a trusted representative of that party in Parliament for twenty-four years, I think I am in a better position to say what the Liberal trade policy is than any gentleman who has no connection with the party, who has not been admitted to their councils, and has not been consulted in the matter. But it is not because I have been connected with the party for years that I feel myself warranted in stating in authoritative terms what the Liberal trade policy is. Nor is it because I had the honour to be the seconder of the resolution that declared in emphatic terms what the Liberal policy was. Nor is it for the still stronger reason that the leader of the party moved that resolution. But my authority to state the Liberal trade policy is based on this, that that policy was enunciated at a great representative convention of that party, gathered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from every province. The resolution embodied in that policy was moved by the leader of the Opposition, and I myself had the honour of seconding it. And I have the authority given to state that policy, not because I seconded the resolution, or even because the leader of the party moved it, but because of the unanimous ratification of that resolution by that assembled convention. And yet, Sir, we find gentlemen rising in this House and telling us that we have no policy. We find gentlemen rising in this House and declaring something entirely different to be the policy of the Liberal party. Sir, let me read to them that resolution, so that they may understand it. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has put it upon record. But I intend to read it also. I think that, so long as such dense ignorance prevails on the part of gentlemen opposite it should be read by Liberal representatives in this House. I read it here not because the country needs it, but the gentlemen opposite need it, and it should be given to them. This is the trade policy of the Liberal party, as adopted at that convention:

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency, wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain;

In these and in many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people;

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government;

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country, in the light of experience, is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

The Government themselves admit the failure of their fiscal policy, and now profess their willingness to make some changes; but they say that such changes must be based on the principle of protection.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

There is the trade plank of the Liberal platform. It is amusing to hear a gentleman of the intelligence of the hon. member for Pictou rising in this House and saying that he is not able to understand what that resolution means. Why, Sir, to make that declaration is to rank himself as having less comprehension than is bestowed upon the great majority of the people of Canada. There was no trouble about understanding it in that vast convention that adopted it, as was evidenced by the acclaim with which it was greeted. And yet gentlemen opposite take out of this, that the policy of the Liberal party is to raise the revenue of the country by direct taxation and wipe out the customs tariff altogether. Why, Sir, if he had but read it for himself, he would have seen how foolish such a statement was. He heard the hon. member for South Oxford declare, in accordance with that platform, that there must be maintained a very large customs duty; but he also heard that hon. gentleman declare, in accordance with this resolution, that the underlying principle of that tariff must not be the principle of protection, but the principle of raising a revenue for the public requirements of this country. In order to understand the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, I cannot refer to declarations endorsed by the Conservative party, for they have not dared to summon the members of their party, as our leader did, for conference. They dare not. I am forced, therefore, to take the utterances of the Finance Minister in order to understand what their platform is. If I might trouble the House, first, to show that my own views in reference to the resolution I have just read were the same when it was adopted as they are now, I would like to read from the remarks I made in seconding that resolution:

And to-day you have laid down in clear and emphatic language, what? Not a new principle. You have laid down and emphasized again the principle held by the Liberal party held in this matter of trade and commerce, that in the levying of the taxes of the country, regard should be had only to the necessities of the revenue, and that the Government should not seek by tariff legislation to favour any particular class in the community. I say this is no new principle. A revenue tariff was in force when our late leader Alexander Mackenzie, who has gone to his long rest, held the reins of power and he and his Government fell because he would not yield to the cry for a protective tariff. From that day to this the Liberal party have not ceased to proclaim that they believed that it was not right or just that protection, as a principle, should be recognized by the Government of the country, and that they believed that the duty of the Government was to raise the necessary revenue to discharge the duties devolving upon the Government, and to leave the people free to work out their own destiny, giving no undue advantage to any one portion of the community over another.

That, Sir, was understood, and a revenue tariff has always been known to have been in force during the time the Mackenzie Government were in power. That revenue tariff has been spoken of time and again by hon. gentlemen opposite as a free trade tariff, they themselves giving it that name.

Mr. SPROULE. Why did it not raise a revenue, if it was a revenue tariff?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It did raise it.

Mr. SPROULE. No, there was a deficit every year.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman is mistaken, there was not a deficit every year.

Mr. SPROULE. There was in 1876, 1877 and 1878.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the hon. gentleman had listened to the hon. member for South Oxford, or if he will take the trouble to read his speech, he will see exactly what the condition was, and what the facts were. Well, Sir, as I said before, we have to look to the utterances of the leaders of the Government in order to find out what their policy is. Hon. gentlemen have not ventured to call a convention of their party, consequently we are not in a position to quote the planks they may have adopted. We have ours. I am forced, because they have not formally assembled in convention, to take the views of the Finance Minister, who, I suppose, as leader of the House, we may take as enunciating the views of that party. I say they have not ventured to call a convention, and I think I am safe in saying that. I will just read from an editorial in the Toronto "World" of January 20, 1896, under the heading, "Where does the Conservative party find itself." Among other things, the article says:

What follows? That the Conservative party, as a ruling party at Ottawa, is being forced against the will of the majority of its members and against the sentiment of the entire country, outside of Quebec, to grant legislation coercive of Manitoba, because of a pledge given to the French Ministers in the Cabinet by the rest of their colleagues from the other provinces, but a pledge given without consulting the party at large, and in spite of a solemn pledge that the party would first be consulted before an irretrievable step was taken!

That, Sir, is from a paper, the proprietor of which is one of their own supporters. Will any hon. gentleman opposite deny that statement made in the organ of the party, made in a paper belonging to one of the supporters of the Government in this House? Hon. gentlemen do not deny it. They have not ventured to call a convention, they have not dared to do so. We are, therefore, without their views with reference to this matter, and are forced to fall back upon the utterances of the leader of the House, occupying the position of Finance Minister, and whom we shall have to take as speaking for the party. Well, Sir, what did he state to us in definite terms as the position of the Government in reference to this trade question? Last year, in his Budget speech he said—and I take this statement because he seemed to have made it as a declaration of the policy of his party on this question.

I wish to state here that the Government of to-day, and the party which supports the Government of to-day, take their stand firmly and squarely upon the embodiment and upon the preservation of the principle of protection in the tariff, the degree of that protection to be according to the circumstances of the industry, and the conditions of business and of trade at the present time.

Sir, if that is not the policy of the Government, the hon. gentleman can now state it not to be so. And what does it declare? That the cardinal principle guiding legislation under the Government and the National Policy, is to recognize the protective principle as the fundamental principle; in other words, if I may so describe it, the principle of the Liberal-Conservative party is protection to the individual under all circumstances, and if there be any revenue coming into the treasury, it is an incident; while the Liberal party, on the other hand, have as their fundamental principle the raising of revenues necessary to carry on the Government, and if there be any protection to the individual, it is an incident, and not the principle. That is the difference between the two political parties, and on that difference, as that resolution declares, we are ready to meet the other party. You talk about direct taxation, and seek to force that upon us. As I said, the hon. gentleman has but to read the resolution of the convention if he wants to know where the funds are to be raised, and that to that end the tariff should be—what? That it should be abolished? No, but to that end the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government. It is proposed, Sir, that the revenue should be raised through customs and excise duties, but, in levying these duties, regard should be had to the revenue as the principle, and not to protection to the individual as the principle, readjustment and not abolition. They quote expressions in speeches, and take extracts out of their connection, and seek to attach other meanings to them; but here is the declaration of the party, here are the utterances of the members of the party, taken in the connection in which they stand, and showing the reason for which they are made, and they are perfectly consistent with the platform that was adopted at that convention. I say that, because I hold that when a representative convention like that has been summoned by one of the great political parties of this country, no leader, no member of that party, I care not who, would ever, for one moment, seek to override the convention to which he was a party, and to which the party throughout the country had pledged itself. No leader would attempt it, and it will never be done. I trust, Sir, I have made myself plain with reference to this plank of the Liberal party. I do not hope, however, that I will silence remarks like those that have fallen from the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House. I have no doubt that hon. gentleman will go through the country, as he has done before, and not hesitate to make statements that are not only wholly inaccurate, but which can only be fittingly characterized by some expression stronger than that. Why, Sir, I will cite one of their principal defenders upon the platform, a gentleman whom I am sorry not to see in his seat at present, and still more am I sorry if it be the fact that his absence is caused through illness. I would have desired that he could be present. He is a gentleman who has stood high in the councils of the Conservative party, a gentleman who has fought their campaigns for them, a gentleman who was recognized as their fighting man before the elder Sir Charles Tupper came into the Government—I refer to the Minister of Agriculture, Sir, take his speech of last year in this House, and if a gentleman will venture to say such things on the floor of Parliament, what will he not venture to say when he takes the stump, with no opponent to meet him? Sir, I will quote from his speech in the Budget debate last year. That gentleman generally speaks late in the debate, and there is not much opportunity of replying, but he was pleased to tell us in that speech, in referring to some of the remarks that had been made: On page 16, I read:

I quote it because I wish to say to this House and to the country, that, neither in this House nor on a public platform, have I ever stated what I believed to be untrue, or stated a fact as to which I had not made all the inquiries in my power to substantiate its truth.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I am glad the hon. gentleman mentioned that in his speech, because it might not have been thoroughly understood if he had not done so. Now, we understand the statements made by this hon. gentleman as regards hon. members on this side of the House and their policy. I will again quote from the same page of the special pamphlet of the speech, copies of which were circulated, I suppose, by thousands, and probably tens of thousands in the constituencies of hon. gentlemen opposite. After I have read the extract, I will ask hon. gentlemen opposite what they think of themselves for circulating such a pamphlet, and I will ask them whether they had better not recall the copies. Another extract is as follows:—

Hon. gentlemen opposite are anxious to get into power—for the public good, they say themselves—for the pleasure and profit of office, we know very well from their history.

Was the hon. gentleman warranted in making that statement? Such an assertion was never made on any public platform by hon. members on this side of the House. At page 23, I read as follows:—

But the Liberal party not only lives upon the principles that are opposed to it, but, if I am not mistaken, the only way in which it wishes to live is by the decay of the industries of the country; for nothing gives the hon. gentlemen greater pleasure than to find a vacant shop or a silent factory. They rejoice over an individual being out of work, as if they had been returned to power itself.

I say that is an infamous statement. To declare that the Liberal party are men who find greater pleasure in a vacant shop or silent factory and from an individual being out of work than they would if they found themselves restored to power, is to make a statement to which I venture to say the Finance Minister will not say "hear, hear" and endorse. Why, Sir, it carries its refutation on its own face. That hon. gentleman in the same speech, when endeavouring to make a point in another direction, alluded to my own town, and said that in that town there was a bonus given in order to run a large manufacturing concern there; he further stated that in the town of Bowmanville 440 ratepayers voted to give a large sum of money to maintain an industry there, while only four voted against it, and other instances were cited of the same kind. This same gentleman who declared that the Liberal party and the members of it find more pleasure in a silent factory and an individual out of work, stated in almost the same breath that in some towns and cities of the Dominion, members of the Liberal party have put their hands in their pockets, together with their other fellow-citizens, and have paid thousands and tens of thousands of money to keep factories running and help to establish new ones. Yet this is the literature sent out to Tory constituencies.

Mr. SPROULE. If you had called the assistance "protection," your friends would not have done it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I proceed. As regards statements made personal to myself, I pay no attention to them. I find at page 24, this gentleman said:

I take the town from which my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) comes. I am sorry my hon. friend is not here. He has admitted that the National Policy has made him rich.

He stated in one breath that I had said that I had been made rich by the National Policy, and in the next breath he said:

But my hon. friend from Brant has been making a public utterance as to his industries under the National Policy. He admits that he prospered, but he says it is not due to the National Policy.

That is the literature hon. gentlemen opposite send out to the country in order to inform the electors on public questions. Again he said:

Everywhere, in all lines of industry, capital is being invested and increasing numbers of our people are being employed. Hon. gentlemen know it, and dread it, but the people of Canada appreciate it.

Whoever gave that gentleman warrant for daring to utter such a statement, that the Liberal party fear and dread a return of prosperity to this country. Then he wound up as follows:

I have shown, I think, from start to finish, not only by the facts I have adduced, but by the very sneers which I have produced from hon. gentlemen opposite, that, no matter what they may name their policy, it has but one central and leading idea, namely, that industries should not be established in this country, and that the Liberal party would destroy every item of encouragement for those industries, should the party get into power.

Such are samples of the literature which is sent out by the Conservative party with respect to their opponents. Sir, I hold that a party which is obliged to have recourse to that mode of warfare is a party that has sunk below the level which it was hoped and supposed any party in this country would ever reach.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was pointing out what was stated by the opponents of the Liberal party would be the effect of their policy should it be adopted in the country. I was quoting from the utterances of one of the leading Ministers of the Crown, and I think the last utterance I cited was, that no matter what the name of our policy might be, it had but one main and leading idea, namely: that industries should not be established in this country. I criticised other statements appearing in the same speech as being incorrect, and I cannot fail to ask any intelligent man, if it is possible for him to conceive that one of the great political parties of this country, comprising half the people of Canada, should desire, as he alleges, that industries should not be established in Canada, and that we should not have the benefit of them. Why, Sir, do these gentlemen opposite suppose that they alone are interested in Canada? Do they suppose that they own Canada? Do they suppose that it is their money and their money only that is put into the various manufacturing enterprises of Canada? Do these gentlemen not know that the Liberal party—I am inclined to believe to a greater extent than they, but that I am not in a position to prove—do they not know, I say, that the Liberal party in common with the Conservative party have been forward in advancing the interests of the country? It cannot be a fact unknown to those gentlemen opposite, that connected with the various manufacturing institutions of this country are men who are firm and steadfast in their allegiance to the Liberal party. Do these Liberal manufacturers say that the desire of their party is that manufactures should be destroyed and should vanish?

Then, again, as to the effect of our policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite allege that whether it would be desired or not by the Liberal party, yet the effect of our policy, if put into execution, would be to bring about a disastrous result to our industries. Well, I ask them for the proofs. We are not without the means of determining. A revenue tariff policy is not a thing unknown in Canada. It was put in operation at the time of confederation in 1867, and continued in operation under Sir John Macdonald until 1874. It was continued from 1874 up to 1879 under Mr. Mackenzie. Therefore the country is not without its records as to the effect of a revenue tariff policy. It can refer to the public documents and records and statistics, and, on the other hand, we have also the means of referring to the statistics of the progress of the country under what hon. gentlemen opposite term their National Policy. Now, Sir, if we take the manufacturing industry of the country, that industry which they say will specially suffer under the policy the Liberal party proposes, and if we compare its progress under their policy with its progress under the revenue tariff policy, we can easily distinguish between the two. What was the record of the manufacturing industry during the revenue tariff period from 1867 to 1879: eleven or twelve years? Was that a time when manufacturing industries were unknown in this country? Were there no tall chimneys in those days, were there no operatives employed, was no capital invested in manufacturing enterprises then? Why, the public records show to the contrary, and the public man who would attempt to refute them would take a position derogatory to his standing as a man of intelligence in this House. I suppose when hon. gentlemen opposite make the utterances they do it is not with a view of influencing members of this House, but to influence the people in the country. Sixteen or seventeen years have elapsed since the Mackenzie Government went out of power. A new generation has arisen, and these gentlemen opposite would fain make that generation believe that under the Mackenzie Administration there was want and poverty and dire distress all through the country, and that it was because the Conservative party were returned to power that any people are now to be found in Canada, or that any progress has been made within its borders. I want to remind these hon. gentlemen—and not to remind them so much as to let my words go out to this rising generation who were not taking an active part in political matters at that time—I want to remind that generation that they should study the records of the country, and not take the statements of these men. And if they study the records of that period, what will they find? They will find that in the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, not only was Canada largely making what she required in many lines of manufactured goods for the consumption of her own people, but that she was in addition to that exporting over $4,000,000 worth of manufactured goods to nearly thirty different countries of the globe. That is what the public records will show. And, Sir, to-day, after a lapse of seventeen years what do the public records show in reference to the National Policy? Progress, I grant you, but why should not there be progress after sixteen or seventeen years in a country like Canada, with its resources and its natural wealth. But what is the success? Is it something gentlemen opposite can point to with pride: is it something that will magnify their policy? What were the exports of manufactured goods in the year 1895, seventeen years after the National Policy had been put into operation? Why, a bare export of between seven and eight million dollars' worth, and as was pointed out by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in those seven or eight millions is included an item of over $1,000,000 worth of household effects in order to swell the total. Such an item was not to be found in the records of the last year of the Mackenzie Administration. A million dollars of exports of manufactures, the product of Canada, will be found in the Trade and Navigation Returns this year: but is that a thing which the Government wish to claim credit for? What does it mean? It means not that young men are leaving this country in order to better their position in some other country and return to us. It means that heads of families, householders have, for some cause or another, torn up their homes, and, taking their movable effects with them, have left the country. That is the tale that is told by that item of household effects which swells the export of manufactured goods under the National Policy by over $1,000,000. Deduct that, and you have only an export of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 of manufactured goods seventeen years after their National Policy was introduced, as against an export of $4,000,000 of manufactured goods under the revenue policy which was in existence before these gentlemen came into power at all. I ask, is it not possible to conceive that greater progress would have been made under a revenue tariff policy than has been made under this so-called National Policy? I do not deny that there have been extra mills and factories erected. But, Sir, history shows that large capital has been sunk, wasted and destroyed by industries brought into existence by their National Policy, while the real prosperity of the country, even in manufacturing industries, has not been helped as greatly under the National Policy as it would have been had the terms and conditions that prevailed under a revenue tariff been continued. Then, Sir, I say that these gentlemen are not in a position to predict dire distress should the country return to the sounder economic principles involved in a revenue tariff; and I warn those hon. gentlemen who care for their reputation that the signs of the times—I do not pretend to prophesy; I merely say that the signs of the times strongly point in the direction of the Liberal party being in power very soon and putting their policy into effect. And when that policy is put into effect, if, instead of the dire disasters which these gentlemen predict, the country should witness an era of greater prosperity and progress than it has ever experienced before, hon. gentlemen will look very foolish after the predictions they are making at the present time. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) spent a considerable time last night in reading extracts from speeches by Sir Oliver Mowat, by my hon. friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), by the Premier of Nova Scotia, and by several other gentlemen, as well as reports of bank managers, to show that Canada was in a fairly prosperous condition. He read these for the purpose, apparently, of contradicting the statements of the hon. member for South Oxford. I am not aware that the hon. member for South Oxford has said that the country has made no progress at all. I understand that the position he has taken is this—that a country with the resources, the capabilities, the possibilities, and the potentialities of Canada, has not made the progress that its people are justified in expecting, when its circumstances are taken into consideration. That we have not retrograded, that we are not less in population now than we were seventeen years ago, that we have not lost all our wealth, seem to be matters for congratulation to hon. gentlemen opposite. Members on this side, while willing to admit that Canada, in spite of governmental blundering, has prospered, take the position that she has not prospered to that degree that she might fairly and reasonably expect; and, Sir, the causes that have led to this want of prosperity are not difficult to discover. A great deal has been said with reference to a letter which my hon. friend from South Oxford wrote to an English journal. He has been very much blamed for that letter. He there pointed out certain facts, and he has said that he wrote that letter because men in the pay of the Government of Canada were slandering one-half of the people of Canada, and he felt that it was his duty to place before the English people certain facts. Now, I will read to you what an English gentleman of some standing, in dealing with one phase of that letter, says:

Mr. McALISTER. Who is the writer?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I will tell the hon. gentleman directly. Here is what he says:

The fact that there is an obvious and urgent need for an alteration of the present fiscal and commercial system of the Dominion has been proved by Sir Richard Cartwright in his exceedingly able letter in the "Economist" of February 13th, 1892, by evidence which seems quite conclusive; and the evils he describes as now existing are most serious. His remarks on the connection there is between the terrible corruption which, to the great grief of its friends, has lately been brought to light in Canada, especially demand much attention, and even more is due to what he says as to the results of the recent census, since with regard to these he is speaking of matters of fact which cannot be disputed. He shows that, notwithstanding the very large number of emigrants who have been received in Canada, the increase of the population since the last census of ten years ago, falls short of what might have been looked for from natural increase alone in a prosperous and thriving country. The inference is inevitable, that during these years the Dominion had not been prospering as it ought to have done, and that very many of its natives, as well as of the emigrants who have reached its shores, have been unable to find in it homes in which they could enjoy such an amount of welfare as to induce them to remain there. When we consider what great natural resources and advantages Canada possesses, it is difficult to see how this fact can be accounted for, except by assuming that there must have been some great fault in the management of its affairs which has prevented the population from being as well off as they have a right to expect, and that many of them have in consequence, sought elsewhere for better means of living than Canada has offered.

That, Sir, is the opinion of this writer. The hon. gentleman asks me his name. His name is one not unknown to many hon. gentlemen opposite, and is held in high respect by them—Earl Grey, K.G., G.C.M.G. That is the conclusion that a statement of the facts forced upon him. And, Sir, looking at the matter in the light of what the hon. member for Pictou told us this afternoon, when he said that we had a country unexcelled in soil, in climate, in all that went to constitute a happy home for people whom we seek to bring to our shores, I think that the hon. gentleman, having made that statement, must also be forced to the conclusion that there must have been some grave mismanagement, or Canada would have prospered to a greater degree than she has done under their National Policy. The hon. gentleman said that the hope of the country was in its population. Well, Sir, apply the test of population to the revenue tariff period in comparison with your National Policy period, and what do you find? Why, that in the revenue tariff decade, which these hon. gentlemen say means a time for the blotting out of industries and dire distress throughout all the land, the country increased in population something like 18 per cent, while the census reveals that in their National Policy decade the increase of population was a little over 11 per cent. Apply what test you please for a comparison between the revenue tariff decade and the National Policy decade, and I hold that it stands patent to every one that, so far as progress and prosperity are concerned, the comparison is in favour of a revenue tariff policy. Sir, as I understand the distinction between the two parties, the Conservative party believe that the way to secure the prosperity of a country is to restrict its trade, while the Liberal party believe that the way to secure the greatest prosperity in the country is to remove restrictions from trade, and let trade and commerce flow through their natural channels. Trade and commerce is what enriches a nation, and to speak about restricting it as a means of promoting prosperity seems absurd to us on this side of the House. And, Sir, if you bring common sense to bear upon the question, what gentleman believes that a town confining its trade within its own bounds, and having nothing to do with the surrounding country and with other towns and cities, will increase and grow as it ought? The hon. gentleman says that if you have a tariff of 17½ per cent or 20 per cent, you have protection to that extent. We are not denying that protection is there as an incident; but so far as it appears there, it appears as a restriction on trade which is justified by the necessity of raising a revenue. The incident is there and under that incident, as it existed in a revenue tariff in the years of the Liberal Administration, manufacturers prospered as well, I believe, as they have done since, and as they will do again under existing circumstances when a revenue tariff is restored. For in the readjustment of the tariff, in the introduction of a reform tariff based on revenue, that tariff will be framed with care, with thought, and deliberation. That tariff will be made, I believe, by a government composed of men who understand the requirements of the treasury and the needs and conditions of the country. It will be framed by men who will have regard to what is set out in the Liberal platform which I have read, based on the principle that in reforming the tariff, injustice will be done to no class in the country. More than that, they will recognize,—I believe in the interests of the country they will be forced to recognize—not individual rights, but the fact that having lived for sixteen years, as we have done, under the system which now obtains, conditions have been created, the effect of which will go beyond the individual and become larger in their nature, so that possible reforms which may be desired cannot be effected all at once, but as prudently and carefully as they can be effected with safety to the country and in its interests. Reform will be carried out for the benefit of all classes in the country, manufacturers as well as others. Sir, there is a very strange idea with regard to this matter of restriction of trade, entertained by our hon. friends opposite. I propose to read an extract dealing with that subject, taken from the speech of an hon. gentleman last year, who spoke after I had addressed the House, and whom therefore I had not the opportunity of answering. I quote this extract now because I remember that the sentiments to which he gave expression, at that particular moment, were very heartily cheered by hon. gentlemen opposite. He propounded something new, something quite novel. It is to the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), who spoke on this subject of the restriction of trade, that I refer. That hon. gentlemen did not like to have it said, as it could be said, that the Tory party were in favour of restriction of trade. He thought that did not sound well; and in answering the speech of my hon. friend for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), he said:

He spoke about the removal of the restrictions on trade. Although it may sound strange to his ears—if he requires page and volume for my assertion, I can give it to him without doubt—although it may seem strange to his ears, yet those who are in favour of protection—and they may go much further in that than is necessary for hon. gentlemen to go to support the Government in their policy—those, I say, who are protectionists out-and-out, are just as much in favour of the removal of the restrictions on trade as any hon. gentlemen opposite. The only difference between the two parties is, that, while one party recognizes restriction, another party does not. Let me illustrate what I mean. If a farmer in my riding raises his crops and brings his crops and stock to the country town for sale, I suppose he goes there to trade, and he engages in the occupation of trading when he is selling his stock there. As one who supports the present policy of the Government, I say that anything that tended to hinder the carrying on of that trade or placed a barrier between the producer and the consumer, would be a restriction upon that trade. If that barrier is in the shape of goods coming in from the United States and depriving our farmer of his home market, that is a restriction upon his trade, just as much as any tariff restriction would be, and we, on this side of the House, recognize it as a restriction which ought to be removed.

There is an idea. What we had supposed to be restrictions on trade are really not restrictions at all, according to this hon. gentleman. He illustrated his view by a reference to the operations of a farmer, and he also used an illustration with reference to my business. I am too modest to do the latter. I do not think it is very well for one to refer to his own business; but let me pay the hon. gentleman the compliment of a reference in return, to his profession. He is not engaged in the industry of farming, it is true, but belongs to the legal profession; but none the less he is a producer. He is a producer of thoughts and ideas which he sells to the community. You might term them legal cabbages, if you like, just for the purpose of illustration. Well, this gentleman, probably in his county town, offers his legal cabbages for sale. By and by another legal gentleman, from the outside offers to give his legal services, his advice in that same town. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), if it were in his power, would have an ordinance passed prohibiting that lawyer from another town or even in his own town, or a dozen other lawyers absolutely from selling their ideas and in doing this,—in doing what ordinary mortals would term restricting trade in that direction—he really, according to his own argument, would be removing restrictions to trade, because if these competitors in the legal field were allowed to give their advice, the community might not seek his. That seems to be the idea of hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the restriction of trade—that when a man has goods to sell and another desires to compete with him, the one who desires to compete should be prohibited from selling in order that the first one might have the market to himself; and if this were done, instead of its imposing a restriction on trade, it would really be removing the barriers and restrictions from trade. It was a peculiar position to take, yet it was cheered by the other side. But they must see at once that while they are, as they argue, removing the restrictions from trade by forbidding others from selling, they are losing sight completely of the parties in the matter. They are looking only upon the seller and paying no attention to the buyer, forgetting that in matters of trade and commerce, there have to be buyers and sellers, and the terms must be mutually advantageous, so that both buyer and seller will benefit from the transaction.

Now there is another subject I thought I would bring up, although I hesitated somewhat about doing it. But I think perhaps it is well that I should. I refer now to the loyalty cry, which is raised by our hon. friends opposite. I know that it is termed buncombe; I know that many among themselves would admit that when they are raising that cry, they are dealing in buncombe. They do not believe in it themselves.

but the fact remains nevertheless that they have, by their public utterances, served,—and I believe to a greater extent than they were aware of, as late circumstances have revealed,—a feeling abroad that one-half the people of Canada are disloyal. Sir, an opportunity was afforded the other day, I am glad to say, which this House took advantage of to bear testimony to the fact—and which fact was borne testimony to by the entire House—that loyalty prevails equally on the one side as on the other. But, Sir, if that could be done, as was meet it should be under circumstances then existing, what palliation is there for the attempt of gentlemen opposite to give the people of Canada the impression that one of the great political parties of Canada was made up of disloyal men. They prostituted, if I may use that word, the noble sentiment of loyalty to the basest end. It might not do much harm at home, but it might do a great harm abroad. And they had no higher object in maligning and slandering half the people of Canada than the low object of securing by false pretences a few votes that they could not secure otherwise. I read the utterances that have been made in public by them. My honoured leader seems to be especially a target for these shafts, these innuendoes that he is not a loyal man and that he is seeking American applause. What did the hon. Minister of Agriculture say in his last speech on the Budget? Speaking of the hon. leader of the Liberal party, and referring to that hon. gentleman's speech in Winnipeg, the hon. Minister said:

He got compliments upon that speech, but not from Canada. He never gets compliments from the Canadian people.

This is the statement made by that hon. gentleman who never either in the House or upon the public platform, made any statement that he did not believe to be true or without using every means within his power to ascertain its truth. He says the leader of the Liberal party "never gets compliments from the Canadian people." Mr. Speaker, I think I am within the mark when I say—and hon. gentlemen will be my judges in this matter—that the very contrary of the hon. gentleman's statement is true. I know of no public man in Canada of the age of Wilfred Laurier who has received so many compliments from the people of Canada as he has. And a little lower down in his speech the Minister of Agriculture says:

The hon. gentleman seems alwas to talk for American applause, and, I am bound to say, he succeeds in getting it.

The innuendo again. And at Montreal he is reported to have said:

Thank God, the Conservative party was looking for compliments from the Canadian people, and not from the American press.

Well, Sir, I said I hesitated to touch upon this subject. I do not think it serves any good end. But I remember that the wise man has said, "Answer not a foolish man"—that is not the exact word, but I prefer to use it, and it has the same meaning—"Answer not a foolish man according to his folly." And his very next utterance is "Answer a foolish man according to his folly." These statements would seem to be contradictory, but they are not. The reasons are given by the wise man why he gives these apparently contradictory wise maxims:—"Answer not a foolish man according to his folly, lest thou be like unto him: Answer a foolish man according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit." I hesitate to answer these foolish men according to their folly, not wishing to be like them; for I despise such utterances. But, Sir, these gentlemen have been giving evidences of becoming wise in their own conceit, of having what would be popularly called enlarged heads on this subject. And, therefore, while I do not desire to get upon their plane, yet for the benefit of these gentlemen themselves, to reduce the swelling, perhaps I might just discourse upon this matter a little on the same line that they have followed. Looking at it in that light, what shall we say about the leaders of the Conservative party? I am answering them now according to their folly. In the Ottawa "Citizen" of April 20th, 1895, under a head line of capital letters "Montague at Buffalo"—not Boston, but Buffalo,—I find the following:—

Buffalo, New York, 19th April.—Hon. W. H. Montague, with his wife and a party of Canadian friends, celebrated the Haldimand victory by attending the production of the "Milk White Flag," at the Academy of Music here last night, remaining in Buffalo until noon to-day, when they returned to Dunnville.

Laurier went to Boston. What a fearful thing! What a disloyal man! But here is the hon. Minister of Agriculture visiting Buffalo. The hon. leader of the Opposition was invited to visit Boston, a compliment paid to him by a body of men from whom it is an honour to receive an invitation. But that fact has been paraded again and again as evidence of his disloyalty. Men have waxed wroth in their denunciations of him. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), only the other day, became greatly excited in his references to the matter. Yet here is one of their leaders who has been guilty, absolutely without an invitation, of going to Buffalo to celebrate a Tory victory gained in the county of Haldimand. Why, Sir, if I might treat this matter as the movements of my leader have been treated, what fine indignation might I not express, that one of the leaders of the Conservative party should go to the United States the very next day after his victory in order to celebrate that victory and receive compliments upon it. Why, Mr. Speaker, we have over three millions of square miles of territory in Canada. Was there not one spot of land in that whole three million miles where he could have celebrated his victory? We have eleven thousand miles of sea coast. Could not there be launched from some point on that coast line a vessel upon which he could celebrate his achievement upon Canadian waters. Consider our immense island seas and flowing rivers. Could he not, afloat on some of these have celebrated his victory? No; he must go to Buffalo. Is not that a charge against the loyalty of the Tory party—that one of their leaders visited Buffalo to celebrate a Tory victory in the county of Haldimand? Then he took his wife. The wives of Canadian citizens are the mothers of the voters of Canada that are to be. And he took friends with him. And what did he go for? Why, Sir, to attend the production of the "Milk White Flag." Think of that, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Laurier may have gone to Boston, but, I venture to say that, invited as he was by the Boston Board of Trade, his hosts had the courtesy to intertwine the Union Jack with the Stars and Stripes. But no Union Jack was to be found in the Academy of Music. The old red, white and blue is good enough for Mr. Laurier. But Mr. Montague wants the production of "the Milk White Flag." Sir, this is something which I thought it well to bring to the attention of this House. My only reason and excuse for doing it is to give hon. gentlemen opposite the benefit of a surgical operation, for they have shown signs of becoming wise in their own conceit, and in this particular line nobody on this side, so far, has seen fit to follow them. Sir, the evil of it is that while it is unworthy of hon. gentlemen opposite to attempt to secure votes by any such base and despicable means, it is a danger greater, perhaps, than they imagine, as has been manifested and acknowledged by going outside the country and leaving the impression on parties outside that Canadians are not what I believe them to be, both Conservative and Liberal, loyal to Canada, loyal to her institutions, loyal to Canada's Queen, and to the institutions of Great Britain.

Now, Sir, I want to speak on another subject for a few minutes, and it is a point I think the House should take into consideration and that the country should take into consideration. If there is anything desirable in a country enjoying free institutions, as we do, it is that the people's representatives in Parliament should be independent in every shape and form from the Government of the day; that the people's representatives in Parliament should be under no obligation to the gentlemen who comprise the Government of the day; that there should be nothing to tempt them to give a vote in support of the Government in any action, unless that action commended itself to their judgment and to their conscience. Sir, when you find members of Parliament asking for favours from the Government and receiving promises of favour from the Government, I make bold to say, these gentlemen, whether they are willing to admit it to themselves or not, are not in a position to be perfectly independent members of this House, or to cast their vote as their conscience should tell them that it was their duty to do. And what have we seen? The Government opposite, elected by the aid of gerrymander, a franchise Bill, and other corrupt influences, actually tampering with the independence of members of the House, and with promises of position to these men, receiving, if I say not by virtue of these promises, receiving at the same time that these promises were given, at any rate—which makes it suspicious—the support of these men. Sir, it has been charged that a gentleman lately appointed to the customs in Montreal sat in this House for more than one session with the promise of the position in his pocket. Whether that be true or not, I do not know. It is charged that other members of this House have been promised positions to which they are not yet appointed: of that I cannot say, but I venture to say that if it be the case, these men do not sit there as independent representatives of the people, and that the interests of Canada demand that no man should occupy that position unless he does. But though there may be doubt, it cannot be so, I am sorry to say, with reference to other positions. The Government did make promises to members of this House, and members who received those promises did support the Government in this country in acts for which they should not have received the support of any member on their merits. And those positions were—what? Why, Sir, in it is involved, it seems to me, a double danger to the constitution, a double danger to parliamentary freedom. Whatever doubt there may have been about the other cases, we know that hon. gentlemen supporting the Government sat there, not one, not two, but more of them, with promises from the Government that they would transfer them from this House into the Senate, where the people never could have an opportunity of pronouncing on their conduct. Not only were these men sitting in this House under those circumstances, but they have been transferred to what is called the higher chamber, to review the legislation of this House, removed to a position where their constituents cannot, during their lifetime, have an opportunity of showing at the polls what they thought of the conduct of which these men were guilty. Sir, is our upper chamber to be filled with men in that position? How do I know? I may be asked, I am making a broad statement, some gentlemen may ask: How do I know that these men have the promises of these senatorships? Well, I take it from a written statement signed by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Prime Minister of this country, that was read in this House, placed on the "Hansard," and I have not seen it denied. If it can be denied, I will gladly hear it, and I will take my statement back, but I have not heard it denied; and the leader of the House can tell me now whether it is true or not. I have been proceeding on that assumption, and he will, at least, admit that I have been proceeding with due warrant in doing so. This is a copy of the letter that was read:

Privy Council Office,
Ottawa, 2nd April, 1895.

A. McNeill, Esq., M.P.

My dear McNeill,—I have no doubt you have seen, as I have, notices in the papers that you had been or were to be offered a senatorship. I know of no man in the Commons whom I would rather see elevated to the honourable and responsible position of a Senator than yourself; but the rumour must have been set afloat by persons having some ulterior object in view, as no such offer has been made nor has it been considered. Certainly a senatorship was never asked for by you, either directly or indirectly. Moreover, such a step is precluded for the present by the fact that there are no vacancies that have not long since been promised.

Trusting that you may be successful in the contest before you.

I remain, &c.,

Sincerely yours,

MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Now, that was written on April 2, 1895. There was not only one or two, but I think three gentlemen transferred from benches in this House to the Senate since the opening of the session, one, I think, after the close of the last session of Parliament. Therefore, I am forced to believe that these gentlemen sat in this House with the promise of these senatorships in their pocket.

Mr. FOSTER. Your logic is not complete.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why?

Mr. FOSTER. No names were mentioned in that letter, that I heard.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is the hon. gentleman's moral sense so blunted, is his perception between right and wrong so dim, that he cannot see that if these promises were not given to these gentlemen who have been appointed, then he must have deceived those to whom the promises were made.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not follow. I have not the charge of filling vacant senatorships.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, he is charged with a good many things, but he is not charged with writing a lie. I think he will admit that the logic is complete, at any rate, that if these gentlemen are not the gentlemen who had the promise long since of these senatorships, and they are filling the places, then the men to whom they were promised have been cheated out of them. I think that logic is very conclusive. Sir, I think that, along with many other things we have witnessed here, tends to lower the dignity of Parliament, tends to destroy its usefulness, and is in itself a fact that might lead any free people having free institutions to wipe out root and branch a Government that would attempt to do such a thing. I want to call particular attention to what the Government is doing in order to advance and promote Canadian trade. We had a statement from an hon. member of this House the other day with respect to reciprocity with our neighbours to the south, and this declaration was not in favour of reciprocity, nor was it opposed to it. It was neither one thing nor the other. That certainly does not manifest any great interest in the development and extension of trade in the direction of the neighbouring republic. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not make any great advance in promoting Canadian interests and enlarging trade with that country while they remain on that line. I do not hesitate to say, moreover, that the leaning of hon. gentlemen opposite is rather opposed to extension of trade with our neighbours. When hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have advocated an extension of our trade with the United States, members on the Government side of the House ridiculed the idea of a market of 65,000,000 of people being of any advantage to us. They have even declared that such an extension of trade would prove disastrous rather than beneficial, even if it was a fair exchange of the natural products of the two countries. No step is being taken in that direction. What has been done in other directions? The United States, despite the barriers erected on the one hand by the Canadian Parliament, and on the other by the Congress of the United States, continues to do a vast trade with this country. The Americans are among our best customers; nearly all our foreign trade is done with the United States and Great Britain, a comparatively small volume being done with several other countries. The Liberal party has maintained that if you can lower the barriers between this country and the United States, to the mutual advantage of both, and do this in an honourable way, and no other way would be accepted, then you would have given an impetus to the prosperity and progress of Canada. But it is said we have no power to do so. It is urged that Britain is our market. Yes, Britain is our market, and a very valuable market is there afforded for much we produce. But I want to call attention particularly—and if any words of mine are to be reported in the press and thus go before the country, I trust that they will be my words on this point—to the question of what is being done by this Government with respect to trade with England.

Sir, I cannot say that I am prepared to believe that Great Britain is about to adopt protection within a very short time. I cannot tell, of course; I know, however, the progress made by that country under the present fiscal system, and I have read the utterances of leading English statesmen, who stated their determination to retain it. But I have heard what hon. gentlemen opposite think on this matter, and they have not hesitated to declare that in their judgment Great Britain is about to adopt a protective policy, and that at a very early date, and especially protective duties on agricultural products entering the United Kingdom from other countries. I know that in a country situated as Great Britain is it would be possible to protect the grower of agricultural products in that country by the imposition of duties, from the fact that the country does not produce a sufficient quantity of food products for its needs; and I can understand that it is quite possible for the farmer in Great Britain to be a protectionist, for if protection were adopted he would get the benefit of it, while protection might be absolutely useless to farmers in a country which produces a surplus of farm products and exports them to other nations. What I want to call attention to is the opinion of leading men of the Conservative party in this House in regard to the adoption of protection and the imposition of duties on agricultural products going from this and other countries into the United Kingdom. I will read an extract from a speech delivered by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and I do so because it was endorsed by the Minister of Agriculture as a very able address, and I remember it was an address largely taken up with quotations from the report of a commission appointed on agricultural depression in Great Britain. I will read from the report. "Will my hon. friend read any extract in which they recommend to put a protective duty on these articles," asked Mr. Flint. Mr. Northrup said:

I will give you a dozen before I get through.

And then, among others, the hon. gentleman gave the following quotations from page 31 of the report:—

Low prices are considered removable by a change in the fiscal system which would force the foreigner to pay a corresponding tax to that borne by the producer of home-grown corn and hay, by the maker of cheese, butter, &c., and by those engaged in every agricultural industry, which is now so severely handicapped by the preference given to the foreigner. This, it is urged, should take the form of duty on all foreign manufactured articles, which would include flour, articles which cannot be produced in the United Kingdom being admitted free of duty.

Again, the hon. gentleman said:

A good many witnesses advocated that a duty should be put on live cattle and all manufactured articles coming into the country; and numbers said that all cattle should be killed on landing.

After giving other quotations to prove the point he was seeking to make, that British farmers were seeking protection, the hon. member gave us his own view of the necessity of their adopting protection there, as follows :—

It will be remembered that those who advocated free trade said, that within ten years all the nations of the world would have thrown their ports open to the goods of England; and it is well known to every member of this House how entirely that prediction has been falsified. On the other hand, it was predicted by the landed interest that the removal of the protection which they had always enjoyed, and under which they had prospered, would mean direful ruin indeed to them, and I think I can appeal to the reports coming from the motherland, those which I have just read to the House, to prove that those predictions have been, unfortunately, verified to the very letter.

Fancy a Canadian suggesting to the British Parliament the desirability of having a system of protection. Then we speak of the Minister of Agriculture himself, the gentleman who is particularly charged with the duty of watching the interests of the agriculturists of this country. Let us see what he says in reference to this matter, for he dealt with it very fully. In his last Budget speech he said :—

Just a word or two concerning the condition of England; and I do this because of the constant reference which has been made to the growing condition of England by hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken from time to time. I have here—and I must here pay the highest compliment to my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), who discussed this question so thoroughly—a report to show just the condition of agriculture in England at present.

That is what our Minister of Agriculture said. And on page 19 of the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) in pamphlet form, he says :

Now, Sir, not only has England failed in regard to securing the markets of the other countries, but England is to-day—and I say it in the light of evidence which I have in my possession—England is to-day, in many respects, growing very weary of the policy which was adopted then; and not only that, but, as I shall prove to this House to the absolute satisfaction of hon. gentlemen opposite, England, in the very highest places is beginning to reverse the policy of free trade which she adopted some years ago.

Again he said :

English boards of trade, trades unions, consuls abroad, agricultural societies, as I can prove by the evidence of the Official Debates in the English House of Commons, are now moving in the direction of a defensive tariff, and the English Parliament itself has practically, in one sense, abandoned the free trade policy, and adopted, in one respect, a protective policy.

And again he said :

We find also, that England is losing the trade of India, and it is going where? To protected countries. She has lost her markets in other countries and her colonies largely, as well. Now, Sir, is all this being suffered meekly by the British people without a murmur. By no means, Sir.

And further he says :

When she opened her markets to the world, she had a monopoly of two things: First, of the world's markets, and, second, of skilled labour and the most improved machinery. The time has come when she has lost both monopolies, and not only that, but her markets at home, largely. Not many years hence we may look for a reversal, to some considerable extent, at least, of her policy of trade. That is my conviction, and it is borne out by the signs of the times.

These are the views of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) himself.

Now, Sir, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) declared himself this afternoon as holding the same views in reference to this matter as the Minister of Agriculture. No matter what may be the opinion entertained by gentlemen on this side of the House, as to whether England is about to reverse her trade policy or not, the Minister of Agriculture in this country, and the leading supporters of the Government on the other side of the House, have declared their belief, and have read what they considered positive proof that England is about, and very soon, to adopt the policy of putting duties upon Canadian products going into the markets of Great Britain. And, Sir, I have to ask this question: Is there any gentleman representing a constituency in this House—I care not whether it be a rural constituency or an urban constituency, for we are all interested in the progress of our agriculturists—is there any gentleman in this House who can view with complacency the thought that Great Britain is about to adopt the system that we have in Canada, and that she is urged, if not urged, at any rate, she is encouraged to do so, by hon. gentlemen opposite pointing out how she has been ruined by her present fiscal system. Sir, these gentlemen have given all the aid and counsel it is possible for them to give to strengthen the hands of the farmers in England who desire the imposition of duties upon goods which this country sends there. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, I ask the agriculturists of this country, to make note of this, that the hon. gentlemen opposite believe—if they speak the truth—that England is about to put these duties on, and I ask the farmers of this country what their position is to be then? They will move not to the south. No. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: We are not in favour of reciprocity and we are not against it. They tell us that the British market is about to be closed to us partially, by protective duties such as we impose. Are the farmers of Canada to be asked to support the Government who, by their conduct, by their speeches, by their actions, by their legislation, and in every way they could, have encouraged and strengthened the hands of the men in England who are demanding the imposition of such duties. Ask the farmers how they would like this state of things? Four cents a pound on our cheese, on which we sent $14,000,000 worth to that country; that means something serious for the farmers of Canada. Three cents duty per pound on butter going into Great Britain; that means something very serious, especially when we are preparing to promote the export of butter. Twenty per cent duty on live cattle; that is rather a serious matter for our farmers. Seventy-five cents a barrel duty on flour going into England; that is rather a serious matter. Fifteen cents a bushel on wheat going over there; that is rather a serious matter. All the duties imposed in Canada are to be imposed on our goods entering a market which is open to us now, and they are to be imposed, if we are to take the statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) the member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), the member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and others who have spoken on the opposite side of the House. And who have the agriculturists of Canada to prevent that being done? Who is the man in Canada who would be specially charged with the duty of saving that market to us as we have it now? Is it not the Minister of Agriculture? What representations can he make to the British Parliament when they begin, as he says they soon will begin, to entertain this proposition? What plea will he offer in our defence? Will he say to them: It is against your interest to do it. Why, the member of the British Government to whom he would say that, would reply: I read the speech of the Hon. Dr. Montague, which, if it meant anything, meant that the people of Britain were fools for not having adopted a protective tariff against Canadian goods long ago. And if the Minister of Agriculture would venture to say: Well, it is contrary to your traditions to impose barriers on trade in that way, why, the English Minister to whom he was speaking would say: My friend, you have forgotten that that ceased to be a tradition in Britain. Once it was thought that protective duties were a restriction to trade, but do you not know that in the Canadian Parliament, a new light has arisen on political economy, and that the imposition of duties on an article is not a restriction of trade, but is removing restriction from trade. Go back and learn from the member from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) what true political economy is. What argument can the Minister of Agriculture offer under such circumstances? What position is he in to raise a finger in protest or in pleading, either, with the British Government to prevent such a dire disaster overtaking the people of Canada. I ask him, Sir, if he pleaded their legislation in this country what would the English Commissioner say to him? Legislation? What favour did you extend to us when you had it in your power to do so? Did you not, every one of you, vote down a proposition made by a member of the Liberal party from Prince Edward Island to give us fair-play under your tariff? Are you not a member of a Government who, from the day of their taking office down to the present time have enacted and maintained a tariff, not for revenue, with incidental protection involved in it, which must be the case with a revenue tariff which covers a great list of articles? That we would not have viewed as an unfriendly act; that is done for purposes of revenue; but you enacted a tariff on the principle of protection, avowedly hostile to British goods, and now you ask us to open our doors freely to you. Sir, what answer could the hon. Minister make, or what answer could the Tory party make to that? It is their record, and they know it, written in the history of this country. Sir, I want that point pressed home to the mind of every farmer and every other man in Canada. If my words be worthy of repetition in the press. I want them repeated again and again, that members of this Government say that England is about to re-enact protective duties against goods coming from this country. I ask them to say that men whose legislation has been to strengthen the hands of a party in England, are men in whose hands it is unsafe to trust the interests of the people of this country. I ask, then, is it not time to turn out a Government who have enacted hostile tariffs against that great mother country that has freely taken our natural products in such immense quantities, and put men in their places whose record shows that while they would impose duties on British goods, it would be done in no hostile spirit, but simply to secure the necessary revenue to carry on the Government, and would, therefore, not be offensive to the British people? Sir, what did the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) say in reference to this matter? He said this:

I was surprised to hear one of the leaders of the Opposition refer to the theory of protection in England and sneeringly turn to this side of the House and inquire, whether that would be a good thing for us in Canada. It seems utterly impossible for these hon. gentlemen to fix their eyes on the country they are asked to legislate for. They have been so accustomed to cast their eyes on another country that they cannot fix their eyes upon the country really interested in any particular case. There is not a man in the Conservative party who would advocate protection in England for the benefit of Canada. It would be a different thing if the members of this party were in England and were called upon to consider it from the standpoint of England. We might then prefer to see it introduced there. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite, who, one would think, must be aware of this distinction, quietly discuss this question as if it was for us to say what would be the effect upon Canada if protection were adopted in England.

This is the same gentleman who takes the things so easily, and says we are not in favour of reciprocity, and we are not opposed to reciprocity. As if it were for us to say what would be the effect on Canada if protection were adopted in England, says he. Sir, who is to say, and who is to be concerned as to what the effect of the adoption of protection in Britain would be on Canada, if it is not the Canadian people and the Canadian Parliament sent here to represent and preserve their rights? We are the people who are interested. We are the people who not only ought to move in the direction of freer trade wherever it can honourably and beneficially be obtained, but we are the people whose duty it is, if our markets in Britain are threatened, to do all we can honourably do to prevent the dire results that would flow from the loss of those markets. But this gentleman says it does not concern us. Whom does it concern, I should like to know, if not the vast army of agriculturists in Canada, whose products are threatened with taxation? Sir, it was only a few days ago when the hon. Minister of Agriculture, speaking from his place in this House, told us himself that the reason the embargo was put on live Canadian cattle by the British Government was because the British Government desired to give protection to the British cattle raiser over his competitor from Canada—in so many words. Speaking with reference to the speech of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) the Minister of Agriculture, says:

Suppose carelessness had caused the embargo to be imposed, suppose the Government had been guilty of carelessness, was the position taken by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), one of which a Canadian should be proud, was it one that was in the best interests of the Canadian industry and Canadian cattle breeders? On the other hand, was it not calculated to injure beyond measure the Canadian cattle industry, and also give the British Government another reason for not removing that embargo, when their feeling at the time was against such action, the British Government desiring to afford protection to British cattle raisers against competition with the people of the Dominion of Canada?

There is the statement of the Minister of Agriculture made in this House only a few days ago—an embargo put on live cattle by the British Government, involving a loss to Canadian cattle raisers of whom I do not know how much, but every member representing a rural constituency knows what a serious matter it is. Lost—and why? Because the British Government wants to give protection to the British raiser of cattle, he says. And, Sir, they talk about having the embargo removed. Who is to make the effort? The High Commissioner? What argument has he to offer to the British Government why they should, as a matter of justice or right, or as a matter of favour, either, remove the embargo from Canadian cattle, when, according to the Minister of Agriculture, it is protecting British cattle? "Sir," the British authorities would say to him, "have you not, in common with your colleagues, denounced us in language which would lead to the plain inference that we have been pursuing a foolish course in leaving our markets open? Have you not taught us that by your speeches for years? And now do you ask us to remove that embargo and give free access to your live cattle, which you yourselves have said we were foolish in doing so long?" No. Canada is in evil case: her agricultural products, according to the Minister of Agriculture and others in the ministry, are threatened with high duties in the only free market they have, although the prices of their products are low enough now. That being declared by these hon. gentlemen to be the case, gentlemen who are in office, and guiding the affairs of Canada, their mouths are effectually closed, by reason of their speeches and legislative action, against the possibility of their raising one word of protest or uttering one plea in behalf of our great agricultural industry, which is threatened with such dire results. I have spoken on this subject somewhat warmly, because I have felt that the interest is great, and because it is important, above all things, that the people of this country should grasp the necessity that exists for the removal of this Government from office—not for their other iniquities alone, not because they have brought disgrace on the fair fame of Canada by their quarrels and conspiracies one against another, not alone because they have held power by means which honourable men should not have resorted to, but over and above all because, according to their own showing, while Canada's greatest interest is jeopardized in the only free market we enjoy, their speeches, their conduct, and their legislation preclude them from raising one finger in defence or uttering one plea on behalf of that great interest receiving in the English market in the future the same generous treatment that has been accorded to it in the past.

Mr. POWELL. There is one remark made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Paterson) with which I am sure this House is in full accord. I refer to his remark that the trade question of this country is a most vital one. I would that it were possible for me to agree in most of the other remarks to which the hon. gentleman gave utterance. His points with reference to the trade policy of the country, I cannot exactly understand. I have tried in vain, following him closely, to discover the principle on which he bases his criticism. At one time it strikes me that his line of attack is rather that the manufacturing industries of the country have failed to be protected by our protective policy. At another, his argument seems to me that these manufacturing industries have grown to such an enormous extent as to become monopolies crushing out the life of the country. The hon. gentleman must plant himself either upon one or the other position. He cannot occupy both at the same time.

Before, however, proceeding to discuss particularly the hon. gentleman's remarks, I will direct the attention of the House for a moment or two, to some of those that fell from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That hon. gentleman treated us, Mr. Speaker, to a new version of Irish history. I had thought, after reading Irish history with some degree of assiduity, that I had at least obtained some grasp of the causes that led to the decay, I might almost say, of that unhappy country. It was entirely a matter of news to me, Sir, that Ireland had a protective policy to encourage her industries. I judged that the heroic men, who left her shores to add to the brilliancy of foreign courts, and give strength to foreign lands, were driven from their native land, not by protective policies inaugurated and prosecuted for the benefit of Ireland, but by penal codes and by commercial policies inaugurated by Great Britain, not for the protection of Ireland, but for the protection of England's own manufactures. The hon. gentlemen referred to Mr. Lecky. I too refer to Mr. Lecky, but shall not confine myself to him, for he is a gentleman who was born in Ireland and educated there; a gentleman with Irish sympathies; but I say here that the statements of Mr. Lecky are supported by English writers and by probably the most original economic investigator of the present century, Professor Thorold Rogers. Mr. Lecky, agreeing with Prof. Rogers in this respect, lays down these facts: That England, for the protection of her own manufacturers and of her own farmers, in 1663, I think it was—passed a statute which prohibited absolutely Irish ships from engaging in the commerce carried on between Great Britain and her colonies. The English Parliament supplemented that statute by another statute prohibiting the export of Irish manufactures to an English colony, except through English merchants and ships. They supplemented that by still another statute, absolutely prohibiting the exportation of woollen goods from Ireland under any circumstances whatever. Ireland, owing to the climate that she possesses, owing to her fertile soil, was beginning to compete in English markets, with the agriculturists of England. Under these circumstances, what did England do? She immediately passed a law preventing the importation among other things of cattle and of beef from Ireland. After that the Irish devoted their attention to the growing of sheep. What then did England do? She passed a law prohibiting entirely the importation of wool from Ireland to England. Restricted in this direction, the Irish then turned their attention to the manufacture of cambrics and woollen goods. What then did England do? She passed a law imposing 30 per cent ad valorem upon the importation of these goods to England; and not satisfied with that, she subsequently absolutely prohibited their importation with the exception of white and brown linen. There is another statement of the hon. gentleman with which I wish to deal and it relates to a subject which has been also treated by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. In their criticism of the late census, these hon. gentlemen have attempted to show that the alleged increases in manufacturing establishments from 1881 to 1891 is a fraudulent misstatement. They pretend that included in the census were numbers of basket makers and other small craftsmen of that kind throughout the country. Well, this is true. You could not have, Sir, a complete census without entering in it the product of every manufacture in the country. But I shall not rest the case there. The statements, if honourable, are intentionally misleading—designed to minify the remarkable industrial progress of the country. I have made an analysis which I shall present to the House. First, with respect to the industrial establishments of the country. The American basis of the classification of industrial establishments is to include those whose output is over $500. Then I have arranged industrial establishments of Canada into classes—from $500 to $2,000 output; from $2,000 to $12,000 output; from $12,000 to $25,000 output; from $25,000 to $50,000 output; and from $50,000 upwards. And what do I find? I find the result shown by the following statement:—

DEVELOPMENT OF MANUFACTURES.

No. of industrial establishments having an output of $50,000 and over:

1891	1,675
1881	1,108

Increase, 1891 over 1881..... 567

No. of industrial establishments having an output under $500 :

1891	23,553
1881	14,253

Increase, 1891 over 1881..... 9,300

Total industrial establishments :

1881	49,731

Increase, 1891 over 1881..... 26,237
do per cent, 52·8 p.c.

More remarkable than the increase in the number of the industrial establishments is the increase in the capital invested in these establishments. The following is a statement :—

DEVELOPMENT OF MANUFACTURES.

Capital invested in factories having an output of $50,000 and over :

1891	$207,147,467

1881	164,957,423

do per cent, 115 p.c.

Not only has there been this increase in the capital and the number of establishments, but there has been a most remarkable increase in the number of people employed. One would think, listening to the gentlemen opposite, that these numbers had been swollen by basket makers and other paltry tradesmen as they are pleased to call them, but instead of that, when we look to the records, what do we find? We find the following increases, which should have a most inspiring effect on the people of this country —

DEVELOPMENT OF MANUFACTURES.

Now we come to the wages of these workers. There is a very good way of testing the benefit to the farmers of the country, and that is by noting the increase in the numbers of those who afford a home market for them in the Dominion. The larger the number of wage earners and the larger the amount of money there is in the country to purchase, the larger demand will the farmers have for their products and the greater encouragement will they have to pursue their agricultural calling. The farmers of the country are those who, as we all know, benefit most by an increase in this respect. Taking the same classification as I adopted before, the total increase in wages in this country during that decade has been more than $41,261,948. There is a very large amount of money indeed to be distributed annually among the farmers and merchants of these provinces. It is considerably more than double the customs taxation of the Dominion, which hon. gentlemen opposite complain of as sapping the life's blood of the people insidiously. A very small part of this gain has been in the wages paid in establishments having less than $500 output. These are the figures :

DEVELOPMENT OF MANUFACTURES.

This shows that the increase of wages in those establishments having an output of less than $500 has been $724,835, but that among what may be called the bona fide manufacturing establishments, assuming the United States system of census classification to be correct in principle—an assumption which our friends opposite will readily concede to be correct—the increase in wages has been no less a sum than forty and a half millions of dollars.

Mr. POWELL.

Mr. FORBES. It is about 80 cents a day for each employee.

An hon. MEMBER. All that you would be worth anyway.

Mr. POWELL. You have your answer. The figures showing the consumption of raw material in the factories do not make up an interesting table, so I shall not give them. Now I come to the output of these industries. But let me preface what I have to say on this subject by remarking that it was no part of the design of the National Policy that the imports of the country should be increased, except the imports of raw material, so long as that raw material could not be supplied by Canada itself. It is a poor argument against that policy to say that it has failed to increase the imports, as hon. gentlemen opposite say they should be increased. That was no part of the design of the National Policy, and we should look for it. However, as facts have turned out, such has been the improved purchasing capabilities of our people under the National Policy, that there has been a substantial increase in the imports. Taking the total volume of trade of the country, what do we find? By consulting page vii of the last Trade and Navigation Returns we find that in 1878, the last year of the regime of gentlemen opposite, the total exports amounted to $77,323,000. Last year there was a total exportation of $113,638,000 a net increase in that time of no less than thirty-eight millions of dollars. If we look at the imports, we shall see that there has been a large increase there. In reading this table, we must bear in mind that the value of goods has declined fully 30 per cent since hon. gentlemen opposite left office. Bearing that in mind what do we find? The total volume of trade for 1895 is $224,420,000. Adding to that 30 per cent, or $67,000,000, and deducting from the total the $172,400,000, which was the total value of the trade in 1878, the last year under the tariff of the gentlemen opposite, we find that the increase has been $116,000,000. But that is not all. The trade of this country is partly foreign trade and partly home and inter-provincial trade. Unfortunately we have no figures from which we can estimate the interprovincial trade, but we have means of forming a minimum estimate of it. If we take the figures showing the output of the large industrial establishments, they show that the increase, leaving out of consideration those establishments that have an annual output of below $12,000, which so offend gentlemen opposite, and confining ourselves to those having an output of $12,000 and over, there has been an increase of $155,005,907, as will be seen from the following figures :—

DEVELOPMENT OF MANUFACTURES.

Output.

Annual output of factories having an output of $50,000 and over a year :

1891	$ 260,795,190

Total annual output of factories :

1891	$ 444,003,694

Gentlemen opposite say that in our foreign trade there has only been an increase of $3,000,000 in our exports, and as that increase is included in the $116,000,000 increase in the total volume of our foreign trade, reckoning values on the basis of the prices of 1878, I will deduct it from the amount of increase in the output of our industrial establishments which I have just given, so that we get an item of $152,000,000. This amount in determining the increased volume of our home trade must be increased by 30 per cent for the decrease in prices since 1878 in manufactured goods. The 30 per cent comes to $133,000,000, making the total increase in our home trade, on the basis of prices of 1878, amount to $285,000,000. Adding that to the $116,000,000, which is the total increase I show by the trade returns, it is plain beyond all question that the increase in the trade of this country from the time these gentlemen left the treasury benches to the present time is more than $400,000,000, on the basis of the prices of 1878. In other words, the volume of our trade has absolutely more than doubled in the decade from 1881 to 1891. This is the answer to hon. gentlemen opposite who declaim against this policy on the ground that it has lessened trade or that trade has not increased in an equal ratio with population. Taking the facts I have given, the case is established beyond question that, although population has not increased more than 20 per cent the volume of trade has increased more than 100 per cent, and therefore the policy must be working advantageously to the country.

I have a word to say with regard to protection generally. The republic to the south of us, whose markets are claimed to be the best markets for us—might if open be excellent markets, but we have not the key to those markets—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You threw it away years ago.

Mr. POWELL. We never had the key to throw away, and if hon. gentlemen had their way, we would not only have no key of their market, but we would have no key of our own market. They proposed to hand that key to the United States. Now, I may say, with respect to this 60,000,000 market, that the greatest number of the population in any country is its agricultural population. The United States are no exception. Now, are the farmers of Canada going to trade with the farmers of the United States? Certainly not. It must be only a very small percentage of benefit which our agriculturists can reap from such a policy as the hon. gentlemen opposite propose. However, I am not denying that advantages might flow from a policy of freer trade with the United States. The protection policy is the policy for Canada. Probably the greatest statesman that the United States has ever had, not a man born within the limits of that country, but a man who devoted his life to her interests, I refer to Alexander Hamilton; and the very first act of Alexander Hamilton, after he was selected by Washington to be the controller of the Treasury of the United States, and to place the finances of the country upon a solid and substantial foundation, was to submit to Congress a state paper recommending the establishment of a national policy, the establishment of a protective policy for the United States. Although his scheme was not adopted at that time, shortly afterwards the foundation of American industry was laid, not by the establishment of a protective policy such as we enjoy, but the foundation of her material and industrial greatness was laid by the adoption of a policy of absolute prohibition of the introduction into that country of the manufactures of Great Britain. Then the manufacturing industries of the United States had their start, and from that date they grew, and down to the present moment the United States has ever since, at times in a wavering manner, but mostly in a very pronounced manner, pursued that policy, and her industrial greatness to-day, her greatness in everything that makes a nation, are the proofs of the success of that policy, to which the people cling with the greatest pertinacity; and we may, in following logically and consistently the policy we have adopted, live to enjoy a similar greatness.

Now, I will leave that branch of the subject and pass to another, namely, the effects of protection upon the agriculturists of the country. I was rather astonished that hon. gentlemen opposite should argue for one moment that the protective policy is injurious to the agricultural interests of this Dominion. That above everything, Mr. Speaker, is an illogical and untenable position. If we take the country in the world that has most completely followed out the policy of free trade—of course I do not refer to countries with small populations, like Switzerland and New South Wales—we of course select Great Britain. Now, what is her record? Great Britain most conscientiously, I may say, or unconscientiously if you choose to put it, pursued a protective policy almost right down to the very day when the corn laws were repealed. That is undeniable. Not only did she pursue a protective policy—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, no.

Mr. POWELL. If the hon. gentleman says no, he has never read the commercial history of Great Britain.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why, did they not repeal most of the duties twenty years before the corn laws were repealed?

Mr. POWELL. I say that she did pursue a protective policy almost down to the time the corn laws were repealed. She pursued this policy until she had built up her greatness, and could afford to throw down her barriers and challenge the world.

Mr. GILLMOR. Bosh!

Mr. POWELL. She pursued her policy until she had established her industries beyond all possibility of successful competition, and then she threw down the barriers and asked other nations to come on. How has that policy operated with respect to the agriculturists of Great Britain? The hon. member for South Oxford informed us the other night that Great Britain was not an agricultural country. I differ from him. If I were to select a country on the face of the earth in which agriculture is pursued on scientific principles, in which it is almost a passion of the people, that is of the better classes of the people, I would select England. Now, what is the effect of a free trade policy with respect to that country. We have heard a great deal from the hon. member for South Oxford about the depreciation of farm lands in this country. Have they depreciated as much as they have in free trade England? There is no better home market in the world than there is in England, no richer people, the people are crowded together so thick in that little island that the farmers have no difficulty in getting their goods to market cheaply and quickly. The farmers are almost right in the centres of population. Railway freights are low, labour is cheap, and what is the result? Why, Sir, in the decade from 1871 to 1881 the agricultural population of that country decreased over one million, and from 1881 to 1891 the decrease was almost as marked. Let me mention some of the counties that are better known on account of their names being linked with celebrated breeds of cattle and sheep. Take Berkshire, a decrease; take Norfolk, a decrease; Durham, a decrease; Hereford, a decrease; Leicester, a decrease; Devon, a decrease; Shropshire, a decrease; Suffolk, a decrease. I have the figures here but will not weary the House with details.

Mr. POWELL.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman pardon me? I would like to know whether the decrease which he speaks of the agricultural capabilities for productions of Great Britain is attributed by him, to the free trade policy of England or otherwise?

Mr. POWELL. I will give as my answer the views of two most illustrious statesmen of the century. I will give him the answer of Lord Beaconsfield in the life of George Bentinck—if he will take the trouble to refer to it. I do not recollect the page, but he will find that Lord Beaconsfield, speaking of free trade England states, speaking from memory: England by free trade increased her resources, had become a great commercial nation, but the honest yeomanry of Britain would soon be no more. I will refer him to another statesman, the illustrious statesman who now presides over the destinies of Great Britain, Lord Salisbury. Only a few months ago Lord Salisbury said a great mistake was made in passing the corn laws, that they had not properly provided for the interests of the agriculturists, that they had sacrificed the interests of the agriculturists to those of the manufacturers and traders of the country, and said that one of the things that England will soon have to attend to must be the alleviation of their circumstances, either by a reduction of taxation, or giving them a bonus on their products. That, I think, is a sufficient answer to the hon. gentleman—and my hon. friend beside me, the Minister of Finance informs me that one of the measures prepared for the English Parliament at its approaching session is directly in that line. The hon. gentleman has asked me if I attributed the decline in the agricultural interest in Great Britain to the policy of free trade. Well, I will say that I know there is a logical fallacy known, if I may be excused from following the example of the hon. member for South Oxford in quoting a Latin phrase, as "Cum hoc ergo propter hoc." I do not assert that because two things may be in the order of sequence, that one is the logical antecedent or the logical consequent of the other; but I do say that it is a remarkable fact that almost co-eval with the adoption of the corn laws in Great Britain the decline of Irish agriculture commenced, and this decline has steadily continued. Now, I will place the English farmers themselves upon the stand and let them say what has led to the decay of their industry. Take the report of the commission appointed in England not long ago to investigate this question; the hon. gentleman has read it no doubt. The men who constituted that commission were free traders. I will not ask you to take their report. I will ask you to go further and take the evidence of the men who gave testimony before that commission, and what do they say? You will find their answers tabulated, and almost one and all attribute the decline of agriculture in Great Britain to foreign competition. If that is not due to free trade in agricultural produce, then those hon. gentlemen do not understand the meaning of the English language. I am not here to deny that in Canada there has been a decline in the agricultural interests. I will say this, that if that interest is as it is at present, passing through an ordeal, it is doing so no more than is agriculture in every older country in the world, and on every part of this continent of America, eastward of the Alleghanys. From the moment modern civilization solved the problem of cheap traffic and of reducing the cost of transportation so that four times the quantity of material is carried for the same money four times the distance it formerly was, there were opened the great western territories which have entered into competition with the old countries and the old states. Agriculture has declined, it is true, but it is a remarkable fact, that in this Canada of ours, whether due to our trade policy or to the energy and industry of our farmers, agriculture is in a much more flourishing condition than it is in Great Britain, and, in speaking of Canada, I do not include the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories where the increase in this industry is phenomenal. To return to the point from which I digressed when asked the question by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), I will, for his satisfaction, compare a free-trade country in point of agriculture with Canada, and in doing so I will not detain the House with details, but will simply take summaries. Of the total arable land in England, Wales and Scotland, combined, there has gone out of cultivation from 1873 to 1883 no less than 2,000,000 acres out of 17,000,000 acres, or one-eighth; in other words, the amount of arable land under cultivation has decreased 12½ per cent. From 1883 to 1893 there was a decline of 1,000,000 acres, or about one-sixteenth, or, in other words, a little over 6 per cent. The farmers there have allowed their land to go, not into common as it is known in this country, but to relapse into permanent pasture, which showed an increase of about 3,500,000 acres. In regard to bare fallow, called here summer-fallow, there was a decrease from 1883 to 1893 to the extent of 250,000 acres, a decrease of one quarter, or 25 per cent. This shows the remarkable decline to those who are acquainted with the English practice of summer-fallowing.

The following is a full statement as respects England, Wales and Scotland:—

These figures show the decline in the agricultural interests of the United Kingdom. Now, we return from these figures and look at the progress in Canada. I shall purposely not include Manitoba and the North-west in the comparison, because it would be very unfair to take a new country, in which agriculture is so very rapidly spreading, and compare it with a country like England, where agricultural interests have been pushed as far as possible. I take Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia, leaving out the Territories and Manitoba. The following table shows the increase in the number of occupants of farm lands, in the number of acres of improved land, and the increase in dairy products :—

With respect to the English returns, it will be found that there has been a shrinkage in almost every agricultural product with the exception of cattle, solitary increase, which is explained by the large quantity of arable land that has relapsed into permanent pasture. So it is manifest that agriculture in our old provinces under a protective policy, while not as flourishing as can be desired, is flourishing compared with that of any other country, especially compared with that of England, where free trade has full force to run and be justified. Agriculture in England, one of the very few free trade countries in the world, is in a very declining condition, whereas in Canada we may say it is comparatively flourishing. There is another phase to this matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) said, that this policy is making—he did not use the exact term; but to express it in a somewhat succinct manner, and to use a phrase that is generally used by hon. gentlemen opposite—the hon. gentleman said: The National Policy is making the rich man richer and the poor man poorer. Now, Sir, if I were asked to frame a policy that would have the effect of bearing lightly upon the poor man, I would frame the identical National Policy we have to-day; and if I were asked to frame a policy that would bear hardly upon the poor men of the country, I would frame the policy of free trade, after which these hon. gentlemen opposite are hankering as I understand, I say “as I understand,” for it is very difficult to tell just exactly what they are hankering after. The hon. leader of the Opposition says, that in matters political and industrial his great ideal is England, but other hon. gentlemen of his party say: they are not very anxious to abandon the protective policy for a free trade policy, but they want some kind of a mongrel policy. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon.

Mr. POWELL.

gentleman (Mr. Paterson) said his party wanted to have a policy that was going to bear equally upon the people of this country. Well, if there be a political economist, a writer on the science of political economy who has ever given expression to such a doctrine as that, I—not boasting of the breadth of my reading, but I have read the most of the prominent writers on the subject—I, at least, have failed to see that ever such an idea was broached before. A taxation that will bear equally upon the members of the community, and upon the citizens at large. Who in these modern times has ever heard of such a doctrine as that? Why, Sir, since Adam Smith first published his great work, down to the present time, every great writer on political economy has laid it down as a fundamental principle of taxation, that taxes should be imposed upon the people according to their ability to pay.

Mr. GILLMOR. That is right.

Mr. POWELL. I am glad the hon. gentleman assents to that. I will follow it up for one moment. Take the system of taxation as it is in England. I will not speak just now of the income tax, which, of course, bears harder upon these gentlemen who have large incomes than it does on those who have small incomes; but refer to the custom duties. Leaving out liquor, let us take the two articles that are most heavily taxed, namely, tobacco and tea. Now, if there be two articles, the imposition of a customs duty on which would bear hard against the poor and relieve the rich—that is relatively—they are tobacco and tea. Let us see how it would work out in Canada. The average consumption per head of tobacco in this country is 2½ pounds, and the average consumption of tea per head is four pounds. Just for a moment let us follow up this English policy that is so dear to the leader of the Opposition, and let us take the English system of taxation, and impose duties on tea and tobacco. In England there is a tax on tobacco of 4s. per pound, or $1.00. Two pounds and a quarter of tobacco would mean a taxation of $2.25 per annum per head of the population of Canada. Now, we come to tea. In England the taxation on tea is 12½ cents per pound, and the average consumption per head in Canada being four pounds, then each and every man in Canada would have to contribute 50 cents a year. We have then on these two items alone a tax of $2.75 per head per annum of the population of Canada, a tax that is almost equal to the whole custom duty imposed by the Government of the country to-day. Now, what does this mean, Sir? It means that every poor man pays just as much as the rich man, and even more, because the poor people of this country drink more tea than do the rich, and the poor people of this country, if I mistake not, smoke more of ordinary tobacco than do the wealthy classes. Allowing the average family in Canada to be five persons, we find that each and every household in Canada, if we adopted the English system of taxation, must pay each year in taxation a sum of not less than $13.75 on these articles. Such a policy as that would be simply ruinous to the poor people of this country.

The National Policy, Mr. Speaker, has been in force in Canada since 1878. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to select any test which we would ordinarily take to gauge the improvement of a country and to apply that test to the condition of Canada. By applying that test we find, that since the inauguration of this policy, Canada has been going ahead by leaps and bounds. It is all well enough for hon. gentlemen opposite to talk about this trifle and about that trifle, and the effect on this industry and the effect on that, and the effect on this portion of the country and the effect on that portion of the country. Sir, we must look at the effect upon Canada as a whole, while at the same time we must not ignore, of course, the effect on a particular province or community in framing tariffs. We are not estimating particular sections of the country; we must look upon the country as a whole. When we do this what do we find? We find that all along the line, taking every index you may please to select, Canada has progressed, and is progressing; and why has she progressed and why is she still progressing? It is because the wisdom and foresight of the Government saw fit, at the time of confederation, to adopt a National Policy. The protective system is only one plank in the National Policy. The first thing was to open up the great international highways, our system of canals and our water stretches, and thus to afford facilities for trade and give our inland portions of the country access to the sea. The second was to build a magnificent interprovincial system of railways, and the third was originated and developed in the course of time; the inauguration of what is known as the National Policy. The hon. gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Paterson) in criticising the figures given by the Minister of Finance and by the hon. gentleman from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) spoke of the increase in the custom duties. He said, and the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) also said the same thing: that this Government has wrongfully taken out of the pockets of the people by customs duties a sum of no less than $4,000,000 per annum, and the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) added to that in connection with the protective policy till he got it up to a total somewhere about $500,000,000. Now, Sir, I have heard remarks from the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) before. I have heard him on the stump, and one thing that has always struck me, was the remarkable originality of that hon. gentleman. You cannot limit his resources. He will draw on the immense region of nothingness for his facts, but I had thought that during this past summer, his supply of raw material had been about used up. However, in his speech yesterday, I found that his raw material is yet unexhausted, and the genius of the great artificer is yet unimpaired. When he spoke of $500,000,000 exacted wrongfully from the people by this Government, he was giving expression to a statement that no hon. gentleman on either side of the House would dream for one moment to take seriously.

Mr. GILLMOR. It is true as Gospel.

Mr. POWELL. I am afraid the hon. gentleman does not know how true the Gospel is. The Gospel seems to be the refuge of the hon. gentlemen opposite for their professions, but not for precedents for their practices. The hon. gentleman from Brant, who last addressed the House, quoted scripture. That hon. gentleman was proven out of his own mouth to have been a protectionist only a few years ago. A protectionist then, he is a free trader to-day. Hon. gentlemen opposite have mesmerised him or metamorphosed him in some way. To apply the language of scripture to him, and to hon. gentlemen opposite—I do not know that the hon. gentlemen from Charlotte is in the same boat with the others:

Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and having so made him, he becometh doubly more a child of Hell than ye are yourselves.

Now, Sir, to continue the thread of the remarks I was following before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillmor) interrupted me. I was referring to the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and reiterated by the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Paterson) that this Government has taken out of the people $4,000,000 a year of increased taxation. Why, Sir, $2,000,000 of that was necessary to pay the interest on the indebtedness which these hon. gentlemen piled up while in power, and the other $2,000,000 is due to the necessities of an increased population and the general development of the country and an enlargement of its facilities, which demand at the hands of the country a larger amount of money to meet them. That is the logical effect of the country's advancement, and no country can progress without the necessary demands of its progress being met by necessary taxation. I shall not trespass further upon the time of the House; I did not intend at this stage of the debate to speak, but for the kind hearing I have received from hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in the few imperfect remarks I have given utterance to, I beg to return my thanks.

Mr. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) for having brought us back to the recollection of a period some three or four years ago when this chamber was frequently—in fact on all occasions when opportunity offered—made to ring with the wonderful accomplishments of the National Policy. I have observed, however, within the last two sessions, that we have not heard quite so much about the doings of that great panacea, and I think that my hon. friend has started off in this enthusiastic line is due to the fact that he has not been with us very long. If my hon. friend had read the speech of the Finance Minister of last session, or if he had carefully listened to that hon. gentleman's speech this session, I think he would have observed an apologetic tone in it; and he would fail to discover in either of those speeches any of the old-time ring which the Finance Minister and his followers were formerly in the habit of putting into their speeches on the Budget. The hon. Finance Minister had to face this year, as he had to face last year, a condition of things in which he had to apologize for the existence of a deficit of many millions of dollars. He had to admit that we were passing through troublous times, that there was serious depression in the country, although a very short time ago we were told that the National Policy was introduced with the very object of preventing depression, and up to two or three years ago we were told that it had not failed to accomplish its purpose.

But, Sir, I desire to pay some attention to the observations of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Powell). First of all, that hon. gentleman made some reference—the same thing has been done before by other speakers on that side of the House—to an observation made by the hon. member for South Oxford in reference to

Mr. POWELL.

Ireland, and I think the hon. member entirely misapprehended the argument of the hon. member for South Oxford, and I will take the liberty of referring him to the exact statement which the hon. member for South Oxford made. He said:

The nearest analogy which I can find to the present position of Canada must be looked for on the other side of the sea; it must be looked for in the case of Ireland.

Then he went on to say:

Mr. Leckey was speaking of the effect of an exodus from Ireland, not one iota more important or greater in proportion than that which we have seen from Canada for many and many a year past

And he quoted Mr. Leckey's observation with which I will not trouble the House again.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman will pardon me for one moment. If that be the case, I would ask him to explain how that page of "Hansard" has any bearing on the matter under discussion.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. member for South Oxford, as I understand, was pointing out the effect of an exodus from a country, and he said that the exodus from this country had had effects upon it as the exodus from Ireland had upon Ireland. He did not refer to the cause of the exodus; he referred to its effect.

Mr. POWELL. That is his putative speech, not his real speech.

Mr. BORDEN. That is the speech he made which I am endeavouring to explain to the hon. gentleman, as he has evidently not been able to understand it.

Mr. POWELL. I shall understand it now, undoubtedly.

Mr. BORDEN. I cannot supply the information and the necessary ability to understand what I say. The other argument which the hon. member for South Oxford, based upon his comparison of the condition of things in Canada with the case of Ireland, was this. He said:

Then there is another analogy to Ireland which hon. gentlemen would do well to note. Sir, what, by unanimous consent of every historian worthy of the name—whether he be of English or Irish descent—was the most potent cause of all of Ireland's woes during the last two centuries? Sir, ten times greater curse to Ireland, ten times greater source of evil to Ireland, than even Cromwell's sword or Strongbow's either, was that vile system of protection which, for the sake of propitiating a small number of English manufacturers, stamped out ruthlessly and crushed every attempt which the people of Ireland made to raise themselves in the scale of nations and humanity.

Mr. SPROULE. Who misunderstood it now? He meant that protection was accountable for the exodus.

Mr. BORDEN. He was speaking of something that took place two centuries ago.

Mr. SPROULE. I admit it, but I was asking what was the explanation of the exodus if he did not say it was due to protection, and you read the very words.

Mr. BORDEN. Not at all. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman referred to the census, of which he went into a somewhat elaborate analysis in an attempt to prove that the manufacturers of this country have enormously increased. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman where we would naturally look for the proofs of the fact that the manufacturing industries of Canada had enormously increased? Where should we go to ascertain what the agricultural industries of Canada are doing? What the lumbering industries, and the mining industries of Canada are doing? We look to see what results of the energy put forth in those industries have been exported from this country to foreign countries. Applying that test to these, and applying it also to our manufactures, we find that in this year of grace 1895, we exported a beggarly $7,000,000 of manufactured products from Canada, of which, at least $3,500,000 cannot be at all attributed to any influence which the policy of this Government has upon those industries. That will reduce the exports of manufactures to about $4,000,000, which is the figure at which they stood from 1874 to 1878, before the National Policy was inaugurated.

But the hon. gentleman took a great deal of trouble to classify the manufactures of this country. I have not had the opportunity of examining his figures in detail, of course, and I must leave to some one who will follow me to take that up. But it is an opportune moment, I think, to call your attention, Sir, to the extraordinary exhibit which the census of this country shows with reference to the manufacturing industries, so that we may see how these industries have been padded out in the census in every conceivable manner, in order to make them present a respectable showing. I desire to call attention to a few of these industries, and will take more particularly those of the province of Nova Scotia, from which I come. In this large list of industries which is paraded before this country as evidence of those which have been developed by the policy of the Government, that of carpet-making ranks as an important one; and I find that in the county of Antigonish, according to the census, there are no less than seventy carpet-making establishments. I find that on the buildings in which these establishments are carried on, $100 has been expended for construction. I find that in the tools and machinery used in them, $1,089 have been invested. I find that the labourers who troop to these different establishments to engage in their daily work consisted of sixty-five women, one boy, and two girls, and that the total wages paid out in one year by these seventy establishments, amounted to $4,539. I find, also, that the total value of raw material consumed by them amounted to $4,990, and that the total output was $9,803. Well, Sir, I find that dress-making and millinery figures extensively in the census. In my own county, King's, Nova Scotia, there are, according to the census, 114 of these establishments. With reference to these, $1,472 was invested in lands, $4,340 in buildings, $5,900 in machinery and tools, and the working capital amounted to $4,495. Their employees consisted of 164 women, one boy, and nineteen girls. I find that cabinet and furniture establishments in the county of King's number five, as entered in the census, of which $305 represents the amount of money invested in the land, $1,275 in the buildings, $350 in the machinery, and $230 in the working capital; and the employees are six men and one woman. There is also one confectionery establishment, with one employee, and one edged tool factory. Of tanneries in my county, the census gives nine, in which thirteen people are employed. Well, Sir, I had the curiosity some time ago, having learned from the census returns that there had been a large increase in the number of new industries in the shiretown of my county, to investigate the matter and find out, really what amount of capital was invested, what number of new hands were employed, and what amount of wages was paid; and I found that the increase in the number of establishments from 1881 to 1891 was seventy-two, that the capital invested amounted to $5,034, or $70.20 for each new establishment in that town; that the number of hands increased 124, or a percentage of 1.72 in each establishment; that the wages paid had increased to $29,308, being an average of $407 to each new establishment per year, or to each employee, an average of $236.32. I find that raw material increased $7,296 in all these seventy-two establishments, giving an average of $101 for each one. I found that the value of the increase in the products of each factory was $1,200.55, or a total increase of $87,160.

Now, I think that the simple reading of those statements is sufficient refutation of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the increase of manufacturing industries resulting from the National Policy. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) said that there were forty million dollars paid in wages by these establishments, and that the farmers of this country got the whole benefit of that. Well, Sir, some of us on this side were labouring under the delusion, perhaps, that the gentlemen known as monopolists in this country, the gentlemen who own these factories, the gentlemen who have clubbed together and formed monopolies and rings by which they are able to raise the prices of their products to just a little point below the cost of the imported article, with the duty added, were putting in their pockets a snug little sum of this $40,000,000. It seems that the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland is giving it all to the farmer. I think it will be news to the farmer that they have received so much money. He said that the National Policy was not intended to increase imports. Well, the hon. gentleman is frank for once. But that is not the story that has been told us up to this time. We were told that the National Policy was to increase trade, but this hon. gentleman seems at last to have grasped the truth and he says that it was no part of the design of the National Policy to increase imports. Therefore, the fact that our trade is diminishing is no disappointment, but, on the contrary, gratification to the hon. gentleman, because it shows the fulfilment, according to his opinion, of the objects of the National Policy. No doubt the hon. gentleman is quite right. The effect of the National Policy is to diminish trade, and it would not have had the effect designed for it if it had not decreased the imports. And so, after seventeen years of the operation of that policy we have at last reached the logical result of its adoption in the large deficits which have overtaken us. The hon. gentleman entered into several intricate and extraordinary calculations to show that the conditions of affairs after all, with regard to our trade, was not as bad as it appeared. He said there had been a net increase in the total value of trade between 1879 and 1895 of thirty or forty millions of dollars. But he then goes on to show that it is more. Everybody knows, he says, that the prices of goods have fallen 30 per cent, and he deliberately added 30 per cent to the figures and showed that the increase had been from forty to fifty millions or more. If this rule is to be applied in this case, I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite, who are constantly talking about what happened in the years from 1874 to 1878 to apply the same rule to that time. As everybody knows the shrinkage in values between 1874 and 1879 was enormously greater than the shrinkage from 1879 to 1895.

But the hon. gentleman had something to say about the markets of the country to the south of us. He said we had not the key to those markets. If the hon. gentleman had been here in 1878 or before that, or if he had taken the trouble to read the speeches of his friends, if he had read the speech of my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) in this House as lately as last session, he would have learned that they thought they were going to secure for us the markets of the United States. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, for you were here before 1878, that one of the arguments by which the people were induced—or seduced—into bringing into operation the National Policy was the promise that it would force the people of the United States to agree to a treaty of reciprocity with this country. And my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) said as lately as last session that it would never do to take off the duty on agricultural products and on our manufactured goods, because if we did so we should have no hope of ever securing reciprocity with the United States.

Mr. DICKEY. Does not the hon. gentleman agree with that?

Mr. BORDEN. I am replying to the argument of the hon. member for Westmoreland who said that we had not the key to those markets. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is right in saying that we have not that key. We had it once, but we have lost it, or we have allowed it to get rusty, simply because hon. gentlemen opposite failed to use that key when they had the opportunity of doing so; simply because these hon. gentlemen while professing every desire to have reciprocity with the great nation to the south of us have adopted every means that skilful men could adopt to avoid using that key and to prevent the opening of these markets to this country. The hon. member for Westmoreland said that it would be a serious blow to the farmers of this country to have reciprocal trade with the United States. He asked: Are the farmers of Canada going to trade with the farmers of the United States? I would like to ask him if he does not remember, or if he has not read the commercial history of his country from 1854 to 1866? If he would take the trouble to read that history, he would learn that this country—then five separate provinces—carried on a trade with the United States through which they prospered as they never prospered before, and as they never prospered since. He would have learned that their trade with the United States, which amounted to about twenty millions in 1854 increased in these twelve years to eighty millions of dollars. Does the hon. gentleman go back entirely upon the history of his own party? Does he go back upon what the party professed, or is he sincere and does he refuse to agree to the fraud which they perpetrated on this country in 1891? Does he deliberately go back upon the policy his party adopted in 1891 and which they asked the people to send a new Parliament here to legislate upon—the policy of seeking to enter into a treaty with the United States similar to the treaty of 1894?

Mr. McALISTER. Who abrogated that treaty? Was it not the United States?

Mr. BORDEN. It came to an end and they declined to renew it. In any case that does not affect the question. The hon. gentleman from Westmoreland has argued that we do not want reciprocity with the United States, that it would be an injury to this country.

Mr. COSTIGAN. He did not say so.

Mr. BORDEN. He said that as plainly as the English language could say it. Otherwise there was no point in his statement whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes, there was.

Mr. BORDEN. Now, the hon. gentleman referred to the policy of the United States. He said that the United States had become great by a policy of protection, and he referred to the strict character of the protection which existed in that country. Well, Sir, I was under the impression that the time of the greatest prosperity in the United States was during the free trade period from 1848 to 1860; and I was under the impression that the evil policy of protection into which the United States has unfortunately fallen was due to the fact that they were forced to raise large sums of money to carry on the war and to pay their debts, and not with a view to protecting their industries. But having done that, having placed in a position of great power and influence men who banded themselves together, selfish men, monopolists, the Government of the country fell entirely into the power of those men. Although they have made great efforts to do so, it seems impossible for the country to free itself from the thralldom of the protective influences under which they have fallen. Now, my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) had much to tell us about the terrible condition of the mother country, particularly the agriculturists in that country. However, by way of preface, he said that Great Britain did not adopt a policy of free trade until after she had thoroughly developed all her industries, and become mistress of the situation. What a magnanimous nation she was, to be sure. Having become enormously rich, having control of the manufactures of the world, it was only then that Great Britain threw down the barriers, and opened her doors, and asked all the nations of the world to come there and trade. Now, my reading of the commercial history of Great Britain is entirely different from that. I had a notion that it was after the abolition of the duties, the abolition of the corn laws, the adoption of the policy of free trade, about 1843 or 1845, down to the free trade policy which was fully adopted, perhaps in 1860—that it was in those years, and since that time, that Great Britain has made the greatest strides, and had won, in fact, the commercial supremacy of the world. If the hon. gentleman's statement is true, then I have misread English history. He says that the protective policy is the only policy which can lift the agriculturists of England out of the slough of despond in which, he said, they are now to be found. He says that something must be done for the English farmer, and that something, according to his idea, is protection, that is to say, that duties must be imposed upon agricultural products which go into

Great Britain. That would be an interesting thing for the farmers of Canada to know, that it is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite to advise, by their speeches in this House, the farmers of England to insist upon the adoption by Great Britain of a policy of protection. He says that something must be done. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is something that could be done—give the farmers, give the people of England, Ireland and Scotland, the land of England, Ireland and Scotland, and I will guarantee that the farmers of those islands will be able to take care of themselves against competition from any part of the world. It is the iniquitous land system which is in existence there, against which the farmers of the British Isles have to contend. Protection to farmers! The only protection which you can give to the farmer is to reduce the cost of living, and you reduce thereby the cost of producing the articles which he has to sell. In that way you will protect him. The hon. gentleman says that cheap transportation has had something to do with the melancholy condition in which he says the British farmer is at present. According to the hon. gentleman, cheap transportation is a bad thing, and so he would overcome that by placing a high tariff and increasing the price of the articles which the people of England are to consume. Why, Mr. Speaker, we are asked in this country year after year, to vote thousands and tens of thousands, and millions of dollars, in subsidizing lines of steamboats, and to build lines of railways—for what purpose? For the purpose of cheapening transportation. According to my hon. friend from Westmoreland, cheap transportation is an unfortunate thing, because it is a mistaken policy. Now, the hon. gentleman told us a wonderful economic truth, namely, that free trade was hard on the poor man, and that the National Policy, more than anything else, he believed, conserved the interests of the poor man. Well, this is the first time I ever heard it claimed that protection was in the interest of the poor man. I have heard it said that protection would increase the demand for labour, and indirectly, possibly, it might be claimed that it was in the interest of the labourers; but I have never heard it said before that free trade was against the interests of the poor man. Will he tell me that to permit every man, the poorest man, to buy what he requires to use where he likes, and in the cheapest market of the world, is a hardship to the poor man? Will he tell me that when you grant a man liberty to go where he likes to select his goods in the cheapest market, and to go where he likes to sell what he has produced in the dearest market, is a policy which is inimical to the interest of the poor man? The hon. gentleman referred to tobacco. Well, I am sure if he had listened to the speech of my hon. friend the Finance Minister, he would have learned that tobacco is a voluntary tax. The hon. gentleman always informed us that certain articles are taxed which the people can use or not, as they see fit, and that, therefore, it is not fair to make a deduction of that kind; consequently, I do not think that the hon. gentleman had a right to make that use of that argument. Well, so much for the observations of the hon. member for Westmoreland. I will now turn for a moment to the speech of the hon. the Finance Minister. I observe that this year that hon. gentleman made a very modest claim as to what the National Policy is doing for the farmers of this country. He told us this year that the National Policy had given to the farmers of Canada an increased market to the extent of about $1,600,000. And this was after seventeen years of that policy. I remember the hon. gentleman two years ago claiming in this House that his policy had given our farmers a market of about ten and a half millions a year, and that he considered it a very great achievement. I took occasion at that time to point out to the hon. gentleman that he was entirely mistaken, and that the figures which he had given to the House were entirely misleading; that so far from having given to the country by his policy a home market of about ten millions and a half a year he actually lost to the country a trade of ten millions annually as between this country and the United States; that he and Mr. McKisley together, by duties imposed on this side of the line and on the United States side of the line had excluded from Canada a profitable trade to the extent of $6,000,000 worth of wheat, simply passed through Canada and exported, giving employment to our people and our ships, and that they further destroyed a trade of $4,000,000 in barley and peas which we sent to the people to the south, and for which we brought back $4,000,000 worth of corn and cornmeal. The hon. gentleman has never questioned the accuracy of that statement, and now we find that a claim of benefiting the country ten millions and a half dollars annually has dwindled down to the insignificant sum of $1,600,000, after the operation of the National Policy for seventeen years. This is the gross result of the protection which the hon. gentleman promised to farmers of Canada in 1878. Talk about agricultural interests and a market for the products of the farmers; all the hon. Finance Minister now claims is that a value of $1,600,000 of pork or bacon is prevented coming to this country from the United States. Where do we look for a market for the agricultural products we have to sell? Is it within Canada? No, it is outside the boundaries of this Dominion. What is the annual value of the agricultural products we export? Is it a paltry sum of $1,600,000? The farmers of Canada sell over and above what they supply to the home market not less than the value of $50,000,000, and it is in the markets of the world to which we have to look for purchasers. Where is the best market to be found? In Great Britain, as we all know. Yet we have the hon. gentleman standing up in this House last session and this session to try and teach the people of England that it is necessary to their interest to impose a duty on these agricultural products and inflict on the people of this country severe loss as a result.

One word with respect to the relative importance of the industries of Canada. I have just spoken of the extent of our agricultural products, and I find they form about one-half of our total exports, their value being about $50,000,000. Next in position stand the products of the forest, $26,000,000 odd; next the fisheries, $11,000,000 odd; the mines, $6,000,000, and last of all the products of our manufacturing industry, of the value of $7,000,000, which will be enormously diminished by a million in value of settlers' effects. So that we have the following as the relative position of the industries: The products of the farm, $50,000,000; of the forest, $26,000,000; of the fisheries, $11,000,000; of the mines, $6,000,000. Yet we are asked to tax all these natural industries which belong to Canada and from which most, if not all, our wealth is drawn, in order to maintain manufacturing industries which export only about $6,000,000 in value out of $100,000,000.

We have had many changes in the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, because I have pointed out that while they are constantly charging us with a change of policy, which is entirely unjust, unfair and untrue, they are changing their policy to suit what happens to be public opinion at the time. I have pointed out in this House before that the first policy they adopted was a policy of revenue tariff, later on they were ready to enter into an arrangement for commercial union with the United States, later on they adopted a policy of protection, later on their policy was reciprocity with the United States, on which they appealed to the country, in 1891, and later on it was tariff reform. But now we seem to have a new policy known as the policy of Britain for the Britons; I believe that is the way it was stated by the Secretary of State who has come back to this country to put matters right and make all things pleasant for hon. gentlemen opposite, and perhaps unpleasant for some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, for example the Premier.

Mr. McALISTER. And unpleasant for hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BORDEN. I said hon. gentlemen opposite. It is pretty difficult to understand just exactly what this new policy is, but it is called a policy of preferential trade, which seems to me to be something like this: say to Great Britain. We prefer British goods; it is a matter of preference with us, but we do not buy them. We put on a tariff which excludes them, but never mind, in our heart of hearts, we prefer them.

So far as goes any utterances I have been able to see from any of the gentlemen who are now advocating preferential trade, I have not observed any suggestion as to what means they propose to take to open our markets to the manufactured goods from Great Britain. I do observe, however, that they propose coolly to ask Great Britain to impose differential duties against the rest of the world in favour of us. While we are imposing a system of taxation in this country, outrageously unjust to Great Britain, by which the rate of taxation on British goods is 22 per cent upon what we import from her, as against a rate of 12½ per cent on what we import from the United States, it seems we are to have the hardihood to ask the mother country to impose duties against the rest of the world, and to let Canadian products into her markets free. Mr. Speaker, that is all very well, if Great Britain will do it, but it occurs to me from my reading of the speeches and writings of the leading statesmen in England, that this is not very likely to happen. I find that Lord Salisbury very recently has given utterance to the following words:—

I distinctly disavowed any advocacy of such a policy. I was urging a totally different thing, and that was that our principles of free trade should not include measures for obtaining reciprocity. There is no comparison between the two ideas of reciprocity and protection. On the contrary, so far was I from urging for British producers, that I was urging that we should take measures to prevent our foreign competitors from using protection against us. I am sensitive upon the suggestion that I have ever promised or urged upon any audience a belief that protection would return within any period to which this generation can look.

Sir Charles Dilke, who is a high authority upon colonial matters, made use of the following language recently:—

An Imperial customs union was an impracticable idea. Lancashire, he said, would not favour import duties on American cottons for the benefit of the West Indies; Yorkshire would not favour duties on South American wool for the benefit of Australia.

Then, Sir, I find these words contained in a despatch of the Imperial Government of recent date:

A differential duty is open to all the objections, from the consumer's point of view, which can be urged against a general duty, and, while it renders necessary the same restrictions on trade, it has the additional disadvantage of dislocating trade by its tendency to divert it from its regular and natural channels.

Lord Jersey, who attended the Intercolonial Conference at Ottawa as Great Britain's representative, pointed out at the conference:

That British imports from foreign countries in 1893 amounted to $313,000,000, or 77 per cent, whilst from British possessions the imports were only $92,000,000, or 23 per cent. We find a market for two-thirds of our exports of British produce in foreign countries, and for one-third in British possessions; i.e., £146,000,000 to £72,000,000." In his report to the Home Government, he said that the proposal meant in the colonies the remission of taxation, but in Great Britain the creation of new taxation, not a mere variation in the existing machinery, but the introduction of a new system.

In 1894 the gross trade of Great Britain, imports and exports, was £682,000,000, of which £509,000,000 was done with foreign countries, and £173,000,000 with British possessions, 75 per cent with the former, 25 with the latter. But trade with the self-governing colonies, Canada and Newfoundland, Australia and South Africa, was only £84,000,000, or under 13 per cent of the whole, the rest of the colonial trade being with India (£58,000,000) and minor possessions, which would not be affected. Now, Sir, it seems to me that in view of these quotations which I have given from Lord Salisbury, from Sir Charles Dilke, from the message of the Imperial Government itself, and from Lord Jersey, who represented the British Government at the Intercolonial Conference here—it seems to me that it is the merest and veriest nonsense to suppose that Great Britain is to-day going to adopt any such policy as that suggested by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.) and by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. Sir, I will tell the Government how they can show their desire for preferential trade. If they will take the resolution which my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) proposed here two or three years ago, and adopt that as their policy, they will be taking a very long step towards bringing about better and closer trade relations between this country and the mother country. That resolution reads as follows:—

That inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of the opinion that the present scale of duties exacted by Canada on goods mainly imported from Great Britain, should be reduced.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I take my seat, I desire to call the attention of the House and the country to the promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite prior to 1878 and since that date; and I wish to contrast their promises with their performance. In 1878, and before that time, these hon. gentlemen complained that the annual expenditure of the Mackenzie Government which was less than twenty-three and a half millions, was too much, and they contended that it should be reduced by from one to two millions dollars. How have they kept their promises? They have kept that promise by increasing the expenditure which was twenty-three and a half millions in 1878, up to thirty-eight millions odd, in 1895, an increase of only $15,000,000.

They told us that we were increasing the debt, although we were doing so in order to carry out obligations which they had imposed upon the country before they went out of office. They told us that we were increasing the debt by leaps and bounds, and in an unjustifiable way, and they said, "Bring us into office and we will see that it shall be increased no longer." But instead of that, the debt which stood at $140,000,000 in 1878 when these hon. gentlemen took office, stands to-day at over $253,000,000. That promise they have kept by increasing the debt to the extent of $113,000,000. The hon. gentleman said that all the best blood of the country was leaving us in 1878, and one of the principal objects of the introduction of the National Policy was to stop the exodus, and to keep the people at home; yet the census shows that instead of the small exodus which was taking place in those years, the people have gone out of the country by hundreds of thousands since the advent of these hon. gentlemen to power. Not only has the natural increase of the country, its best bone and blood, gone out, but immigrants to the number of 800,000 whom these hon. gentlemen boasted had come in, have gone out with them. That is the way they have kept their promise to stop the exodus and increase the population of this country. They promised us that if we adopted their policy they would force the Yankees to give us reciprocity. "Raise a high wall, raise the barriers against American goods," we used to hear this chamber ring with the eloquence of the present Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper)—raise high barriers against the United States, and shut out their goods, and in a short time—within two years, I think he said—we will have them on their knees knocking at our doors and asking for a reciprocity treaty. Here we have gone from 1878 to 1896, and we have an hon. gentleman standing up this afternoon and stating that reciprocity with the United States would be the worst possible thing that could befall this country. They promised to increase prices. Everybody was going to get rich; the farmer was to have increased prices for his products, the price of wheat, the price of oats, the price of beef, the price of everything was to increase. I ask hon. gentlemen to compare the prices of agricultural products in the market to-day with the prices of the same products in 1878. In many cases they will find that they are not half what they were in 1878, and the average price will certainly be one-third lower than it was at that time. But, Sir, we had another series of promises—another period of promises; that was the period when the National Policy was being hatched. Later on, we came to a period when hon. gentlemen were approaching the time of a general election, and when they were building the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we find that Sir Charles Tupper, Sir John Macdonald, and

Mr. BORDEN.

Sir Leonard Tilley engaged in a perfect carnival of promises; and, Mr. Speaker, as you must be somewhat tired, and as I am sure my hearers are, I think I will enliven this occasion by reading from the reports some of the promises which were made in those roseate days of 1880. It is almost like reading from the Arabian Nights. I will ask you to compare what those hon. gentlemen promised with what has happened as a matter of fact. In 1880 Sir John Macdonald said:

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are one or two postulates which I must ask the House to consider, because if we admit them, the rest is simply a matter of calculation. It is believed from the best information we can get that 20,000 people went into the North-west last year.

Mr. BLAKE. There were not more than one-tenth of that number.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can inform the hon. gentleman, from the returns of the hon. the Minister of the Department of Agriculture, that 12,000 are known to have gone in, and, from the best information we have got, as many more went in that could not be counted, who were not under the supervision of that department; but let us say that 8,000 more went in, and that only makes 20,000. If we are to judge from the reports we have heard, we may rely upon it that 50,000 people will go into that section of the country this year. We know that in the United States, when railways were about to be opened across the prairies in the various states and territories, a large influx could always be calculated upon, because there is always an increasing rush towards those lands which are being opened up by the construction of railways. We are told that 50,000 will come in, but let us put the number at 25,000, and I have been informed by every one—and I have spoken to a great number of persons who have come from the North-west, and who have the best means of judging—that that estimate is small.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I suppose it was the same person who informed Lord Beaconsfield, who thought it was absurd.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very likely. I would ask the hon. member for Lambton if he really does not believe that number will go in?

Mr. MACKENZIE. As the hon. gentleman has asked me a question, I will tell him that I do not believe so, nor do I believe that 20,000 went in last year. I think a large number will go, but not the number he stated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then, the hon. gentleman is the first person that I have heard say that 25,000 was not altogether too small an estimate of the certain rush of emigration going to that country this year. That number, of course, includes the baby as well as the adult; it includes the whole population moving into the country. In ordinary cases the estimate is, the average family numbers five—the head of the family and four others. In the Western States the average is not so large, for obvious reasons; because so many young men go in without families to settle there, and the average is reduced to three instead of five. But in the future I cannot calculate upon such a low estimate, because, if there is the rush estimated, families will move in there in larger numbers than in any previous year, as many may have sent on their sons before them as pioneers. We have made an estimate of four to the family. It is a larger average than has occurred hitherto in Canada or the United States. If, then, you take four to a family, we estimate that of the 25,000 or 24,000 that go there, 3,000 will be heads of families, occupying homesteads and pre-emption claims. Every man takes up his pre-emption claim. He gets his lot free, and he looks forward to having an additional farm, from the pre-emption; and that is one great advantage of our system over the American system, where a man is obliged to pay cash down for the whole amount of his pre-emption claim. Then, we estimate that one-fourth of the adults, or 1,500, will become purchasers of railway lands—men coming from England, Ireland and Scotland, and some from the United States, who possess money. Notwithstanding the sneer of the hon. gentleman opposite, a great many Americans are going to into that country. There is a large move about to take place from Pennsylvania into the North-west. As I stated, one-fourth of the 20,000 will buy railway lands. They have got money, and every man will take up the homestead and pre-emption claim and become a purchaser of railway lands as well. Probably, another fourth will be labourers, men with families, but men who will not take up land. Some hold that is too high an estimate, and that a mechanic will take up his lot and work it in such a way as to secure a title thereof; but, in making this calculation, we are trying to keep within the bounds, rather than make a statement which would be considered excessive. I calculate that 25,000 people will go into our North-west this year; that 3,000 heads of families will take up free homesteads; that 1,500 will purchase railway lands, and 1,500 will not purchase any. That is a moderate calculation. If this estimate is admitted, then the rest of the problem is altogether a matter of figures. Of the railway lands, we calculate that the average purchase will be 320 acres for each head of a family. We then take the average price of the whole of the lands extending from the $5 section, within 5 miles of the railway, to 60 or 100 miles away. The average price of lands sold to the 1,500 purchasers would be $3 an acre; this is greatly under the average. What then would be the result?

Mr. BLAKE. Over the whole belt—220 miles?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. Take $1, $2.50, $4 and $5 per acre, and they average $3; admit we sell at those terms lands in 1880 to the value of $1,440,000, of which we shall receive one-tenth of the price, or $144,000; we should receive from the fees for the homestead and pre-emption grants $60,000 more, making in all $204,000 in cash. Then we calculate that, as 25,000 would go in 'his year, we may add each year an increase of 5,000, so that we may expect 30,000 to go in next year. That is a very small percentage, if we look to the results of railway enterprises in the United States. We assume, therefore, an increase of 5,000 a year till 1890, and expect in that year 75,000 settlers in our North-west.

Mr. BLAKE. Can you not make it another 10,000?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that is a very moderate estimate. On those figures the estimate of the total cash revenue to be received for the lands by 1890 is $38,593,000.

Mr. BLAKE. That is up to 1890?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, and including 1890.

Mr. BLAKE. That amount with interest?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We expect $38,593,000, including simple interest for the lands sold in that period.

Mr. BLAKE. What proportion is principal and what interest?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot say. That will be the total sum received in cash to the end of 1890. But, besides, there will be all the instalments to come in after 1890, accruing yearly, so that the lands sold in 1890 will be one-tenth paid for nine years afterwards—for each year there will be an instalment of one-tenth paid. The actual value in 1890 of the pre-emption up to that date, unpaid, will be $16,444,000. The actual value of the railway lands sold up to that date will be $16,272,000, making in all $32,712,000. If you add to that total unpaid the $38,593,000 that will be paid in 1890, you get a grand total of $71,305,000. Deduct for that the estimated cost of surveys for the ten years, $2,000,000, and of the land officers, $400,000, and you reduce it by $2,400,000. Having shown that the estimate of the number of settlers, if the land be taken up, and if the average price is not excessive, we find that we have $69,000,000 either of money in hand, or money for which we shall have the best security in the world—the land itself.

Now, Sir Charles Tupper went a little better than that. He said:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When I remind the House that the land alone, according to the authority of the right hon. the Minister of the Interior, upon the calculation, which he believes to be sound, within the next ten years will give us $38,000,000 in hand, and $32,000,000 to be received on mortgages within the following ten years, or a total sum of $70,000,000, it will be seen that we incur no risk. But, suppose the land does not give us that, we have an authority which hon. gentlemen opposite will accept: that the customs revenue from the people who will go into that country for the next ten years will furnish the interest on $60,000,000.

Then Sir Leonard Tilley said:

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. An hon. member says Oh! but when we have $4,500,000 assured for this year, when there is no doubt, after the reduction that we propose to make, that there will be a surplus of $3,000,000 for the next year, it is not, I think, asking too much for the hon. gentleman to accept as reasonable a surplus of $1,000,000 a year for the remaining seven years of the nine, commencing on the 1st of July last; that would make $14,500,000, and would with the sinking fund reduce the net debt to $175,897,680. But, if we estimate the increase of population at but 18 per cent only during the ten years, the increase of the last decade, the result will be that, taking the population at that period and the debt as stated, the net debt will then be $34.27 per head. If we have any extraordinary increase of our population (which I think it is but right to expect we will, but which I have not estimated for here), it will be ample to meet at any rate any extraordinary expenditure that may be chargeable to the debt which we are not anticipating at the present moment. But, more than that, if the 150,000,000 acres of arable land that will be the property of the Government after handing over to the syndicate 25,000,000 of acres, and which is now as established, as fit for settlement, yields but $1 an acre for half of it (the other half being offered as a free gift to settlers), it will meet the whole expenditure of the Government on the Pacific Railway and in the North-west down to 1890. If that be the case, then our debt, which certainly is not alarming, provided we realize from these lands the sum that I have stated, would only be about $100,000,000, instead of $175,000,000, or less than twenty dollars per head.

That was the prophecy of Sir Leonard Tilley in 1880, who was then Finance Minister, that the debt of Canada would be $100,000,000 in 1890, whereas it is $253,000,000.

Sir Charles Tupper, in the same debate said, speaking of the capabilities of the North-west, when he said, there would be 100,000 farmers, each cultivating 320 acres of wheat land :

I am glad the hon. gentleman has done so. I am glad his attention has been drawn to the fact that 100,000 farmers, cultivating 320 acres each, or 200,000 farmers, cultivating half that quantity each, and taking the product at only 20 bushels to the acre, instead of 27 or 30, which is the average in the North-west in favourable years, would give 640,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 50 per cent more wheat than the whole United States produces to-day. You have only to look at those figures for a single moment to see what the future of Canada is, to see what a magnificent granary for the world is placed in our Canadian North-west, and, when you remember we have six belts running through that fertile country that would each give 320 each to 100,000 farmers, you can understand, to some little degree, what a magnificent future awaits us in the development of that great country.

Now, these were the promises made in 1880. They promised that we should have an export of 640,000,000 bushels of wheat per year ; that we should receive enough money out of Dominion lands in the North-west—and mind you, Sir, this calculation was seriously made and placed before the House and the country—to reduce the debt of Canada from $100,000,000, or $20 per head. Yet to-day, after five years longer of this beneficent policy, after five years further opportunity to sell the lands and bring people to the North-west we have a debt not of $100,000,000, but of $253,000,000, and a debt per capita, not of $20, but of $50. So much for the promises of these hon. gentlemen as compared with their performances. And these are the men who are now, on the eve of going to the country—although they do not intend to do it so long as the law will permit them to avoid appealing to the electorate, and perhaps longer, because although they are great sticklers for the constitution when other people are violating it, they are not such great sticklers for it when their own interests are concerned—but these are the men who are now, on the eve of an appeal to the country asking the people to return them again to power for another five years. In spite of the record I have shown, they have the effrontery to make this appeal. They promised solemnly that the expenditure of Canada which was $23,000,000 in 1878 should be reduced ; and yet, despite that promise, they have increased it to $38,000,000. They said that the debt was altogether too great in 1878, when it was $140,000,000, and they promised that even after building the Canadian Pacific Railway they would reduce it to $100,000,000 in 1890, and yet, despite that promise, they have increased it to $253,000,000. These are the gentlemen who ask the people to give them another term in office. These are the hon. gentlemen who assured the people in 1878 that if they were put in power, they would, within two years, by means of their policy, secure the boom of reciprocity of trade with the people of the United States. And these same hon. gentlemen stand up in this House and argue that reciprocity with the United States would be an injury to the people of this country.

These are the promises, Mr. Speaker, and these are the performances. What have these hon. gentlemen succeeded in doing ? They have succeeded in inaugurating in this our country a system of ring rule, of rule by monopoly. They have succeeded in carrying into effect a system by which a vast majority of the people are taxed in order to make a few millionaires. In this country, prior to the unfortunate moment when the people so far forgot themselves as to place these hon. gentlemen in office, there was general contentment and general prosperity. It is true there were not so many millionaires as there are to-day. But the farms were worth more money than they are to-day, the farmers were happier and were making more money out of their farms than they are to-day. The money was left in their pockets and they were not forced to pay tribute to make millionaires, and to create rings in this country. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) undertook to contrast the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite with our policy. He insisted upon putting words in our mouths. These hon. gentlemen can never stand up in this House, or anywhere else, and argue a case fairly upon the facts as they exist. They put words in their opponents' mouths and then proceed to answer the arguments that they themselves have made ; they build up men of straw for the purpose of knocking them down. The hon. member for Pictou undertook to tell us yesterday that the policy of the Liberal party was one of absolute free trade, and, therefore, necessarily, of direct taxation. That hon. gentleman has no right to speak for the Liberal party. The policy of the Liberal party has been fairly defined, and it has been one and the same continuously from the day when Hon. Alexander Mackenzie took office in 1874 down to this very moment. And the underlying principle of this policy is that taxation should be imposed for the purpose of raising revenue, that the chief object of establishing a tariff is to raise money to meet the public expenses. This is the line of demarcation, the distinguishing point between hon. gentlemen opposite and the policy of the Liberal party—and was admitted by the Finance Minister in his Budget speech either last year or the year before, when he said that his party stood upon the policy of protection, that they believed that the tariff should be imposed for the purpose of development. That is the word the hon. gentleman used. We impose taxation, as he said, for the purpose of encouraging and developing Canadian industries. That is to say they impose a tariff for the purpose of forcing the great majority of the people to take money out of their pockets and hand it over to the beneficiaries of the tariff—those who have sufficient influence with hon. gentlemen opposite to secure high rates of duty for the protection of the particular wares they manufacture. These are the distinguishing marks between the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite and the policy of the Liberal party. And by that we are prepared to stand, and upon that we are ready to ask the verdict of the people of this country. Gentlemen opposite talk about the rate of taxation. The hon. Minister takes credit to himself because he says he has taken off certain taxes and has reduced the burdens upon the people. Where does he get the revenue with which he carries on the business of this country? It can only be through taxation. He lowers the tariff upon certain articles, it is true; but he increases the tariff upon other articles. The money comes out of the pockets of the people. And the evil of the system is that, for every dollar that comes out of the pockets of the people under this "development" policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, another dollar goes into the pockets of the gentleman whose industry they are trying to develop. The hon. gentleman has taken credit to himself for having reduced the duty on sugar. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. gentleman that if he had framed his tariff in such a way as to place the money in the treasury which he has ingeniously placed in the pockets of the sugar refiners, we should have no deficit at all. He has taken out of the pockets of the people hundreds of thousands, aye, millions, of dollars which money does not go into the treasury at all. Where, then, does it go? Talk about a free country; talk about a free people! when you have a system of taxation by which a vast majority of the people are forced to support and enrich a few who have the influence and good fortune to be able to secure from hon. gentlemen opposite a law which enables them to levy tribute upon the whole community. Hon. gentlemen opposite have accused us of changing our policy. But I will not refer to that. I will, however, before taking my seat, trouble the House, for I think it cannot be too often repeated, with reading the exact words of the Liberal party's policy:

1.—FREER TRADE—REDUCED TAXATION.

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service;

That the existing tariff, founded upon an unsound principle, and used, as it has been by the Government, as a corrupting agency wherewith to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations;

It has decreased the value of farm and other landed property;

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few;

It has checked immigration;

It has caused great loss of population;

It has impeded commerce;

It has discriminated against Great Britain.

In these and many other ways it has occasioned great public and private injury, all of which evils must continue to grow in intensity as long as the present tariff system remains in force.

That the highest interests of Canada demand a removal of this obstacle to our country's progress, by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to our people;

That to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government;
