House of Commons Debates

SIXTH SESSION—SEVENTH PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 2nd January, 1896.

The Parliament, which had been prorogued from time to time, was now commanded to assemble on the 2nd day of January, 1896, for the despatch of business.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at fifteen minutes before Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod :

MR. SPEAKER.

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And the House being returned,

VACANCIES.

MR. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that during the recess I have received communications from several members notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz. :

Of Josiah Wood, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Westmoreland, by being summoned to the Senate.

Of Robert S. White, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Cardwell, by resignation.

Of Frank Madill, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of the North Riding of Ontario, by decease.

Of Hon. James Colebrooke Patterson, Member for the Electoral District of West Huron, by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown, to wit : that of Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Manitoba.

Of Désiré Girouard, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Jacques Cartier, by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown, to wit : that of a Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Of Hon. John Joseph Curran, Member for the Electoral District of Montreal Centre, by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown, to wit : that of a Judge of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec.

Of Henry Simard, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Charlevoix, by decease ; and

Of Edward Gawler Prior, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Victoria, B.C., by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

I accordingly issued my several warrants to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts respectively.

NEW MEMBERS.

MR. SPEAKER. I have also the honour to inform the House that during the recess the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, certificates of the election and return

Of Henry A. Powell, for the Electoral District of Westmoreland ; and

Of John A. McGillivray, for the Electoral District of the North Riding of Ontario.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

John A. McGillivray, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of North Ontario, introduced by Hon. Mr. Montague and Mr. Hughes.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—(Mr. Foster.)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In accordance with the announcement made during the last Session, Parliament has been summoned somewhat in advance of the usual period.

The bountiful harvest with which Canada has been blessed is a cause for the deepest thankfulness to the Giver of all good.

I congratulate you upon the evidence of increased activity in the various branches of commerce and industry.

Several such indications have come under my personal observation during a tour made recently in the North-west Territories and British Columbia. In particular, I noticed the extension of mining enterprise in British Columbia, where the vast mineral resources are in certain localities being now developed and utilized upon something like an adequate scale.

A special feature of the same tour consisted in the opportunities obtained for visiting a number of the Indian Reservations and also the Indian Industrial Schools. On the former I was received with hearty demonstrations of loyalty and good-will, while in connection with the latter the proofs of proficiency and intelligence on the part of the children are highly encouraging.

As to the work of the Indian Department as a whole, the manner in which it is directed and administered appears to be very satisfactory.

A reference to these topics would be incomplete without an allusion to the valuable services of the North-west Mounted Police, which may justly be regarded by Canadians generally as indispensable, under present conditions, to the well-being of those extensive and promising portions of the Dominion in which they are stationed.

Immediately after the prorogation of Parliament my Government communicated through the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba with the Government of that province, in order to ascertain upon what lines the local authorities of Manitoba would be prepared to promote amendments to the Acts respecting education in schools in that province, and whether any arrangement was possible with the Manitoba Government which would render action by the Federal Parliament in this connection unnecessary. I regret to say that the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor have declined to entertain favourably these suggestions, thereby rendering it necessary for my Government in pursuance of its declared policy to introduce legislation in regard to this subject. The papers will be laid before you.

I am happy to inform you that the representations of my Government and the suggestions of the Ottawa Conference respecting steamship communication have resulted in an announcement by the Imperial authorities of their willingness to grant a substantial subvention towards the Atlantic portion of the scheme. This will, I trust, ensure the successful establishment of a line of steamers between the United Kingdom and Canada, which, in point of speed and equipment, shall fully meet all requirements.

My Government have also learned with satisfaction that it is the intention of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to appoint a Committee to consider a proposed Pacific Cable to connect Canada with Australasia. You will, I am sure, share the gratification with which my advisers welcome these announcements as affording further evidence of the desire of Her Majesty's Government to draw closer to each other and to the motherland the outlying portions of the Queen's Dominions. The papers on these subjects will also be submitted to you.

Your attention will be asked to measures intended to provide for the better arming of our militia and the strengthening of Canadian defences.

The growth of population in the North-west Territories as disclosed by the last enumeration calls for additional representation in Parliament. A Bill for this purpose will be laid before you.

I am happy to be able to inform you that the Commissioners appointed by Great Britain and the United States for the purpose of delimiting the boundary between Alaska and Canada have concluded their labours and have signed a joint report for presentation to their respective Governments. This report will be laid before Parliament in due time.

At the request of the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies a delegate of my Government visited England last summer to confer with the Imperial authorities upon the question of Copyright. His report will be laid before you, and I doubt not that this subject will again receive your earnest attention.

You will also be asked to consider measures for the extension and development of our trade in agricultural products with the United Kingdom, and other markets.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The accounts of the past and the estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before you. The latter have been framed with every regard for economy consistent with the requirements of the public service.

You will be pleased to learn that the revenues of the country show a gradual and continuous increase, and that the promised equilibrium between income and expenditure on Consolidated Fund account for the current year bids fair to be realized.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I commend these subjects and others which may come before you to your earnest consideration, relying upon your wisdom and prudence under the Divine guidance to discharge with dignity and effect the high trust committed to your care.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That the Address with which His Excellency has been pleased to open the session be taken into consideration on Tuesday next, the 7th inst.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That Select Standing Committees of this House for the present session be appointed for the following purposes :—1. On Privileges and Elections.—2. On Expiring Laws.—3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills.—5. On Standing Orders.—6. On Printing.—7. On Public Accounts.—8. On Banking and Commerce.—9. On Agriculture and Colonization ;—which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House ; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon ; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That when the House adjourns this day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, the 7th inst., at 3 o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Joint Report of the Librarians of Parliament.—(Mr. Speaker.)

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 7th January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, certificates of the Election and Return of the following Members, viz. :—

Of James McShane, for the Electoral District of Montreal Centre ; and

Of William Stubbs, for the Electoral District of Cardwell.

MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

Henry A. Powell, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Westmoreland, N.B., introduced by Hon. Mr. Costigan and Hon. Mr. Foster.

William Stubbs, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Cardwell, introduced by Mr. McCarthy and Mr. O'Brien.

James McShane, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Montreal Centre, introduced by Mr. Laurier and Mr. Devlin.

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 2), further to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers. He said: This is, in substance, the Bill I introduced last year, and for which I was unable to get a second reading. If there happens to be a session this year, I hope to obtain full consideration for the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DRAINAGE ON PROPERTY OF RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3), concerning drainage on the property of railway companies. He said: This is a Bill similar to the Bill I introduced last year on the same subject.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MINISTERIAL RESIGNATIONS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I have an important statement to make to the House. Since the opening of Parliament, seven members of the Cabinet have tendered their resignations to the Prime Minister, which were submitted to the Governor General and accepted by His Excellency. The gentlemen whose resignations have been accepted are :—The Hon. George E. Foster, Minister of Finance ; the Hon. John Haggart, Minister of Railways and Canals ; the Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, Minister of Justice ; the Hon. William Bullock Ives, Minister of Trade and Commerce ; the Hon. Arthur R. Dickey, Minister of Militia and Defence ; the Hon. Walter H. Montague, Minister of Agriculture ; the Hon. John F. Wood, Controller of Customs. At the next meeting of the House I hope to be in a position to state definitely what course the Government has taken, or intends to take, under these circumstances. Considering the gravity of the situation, I have to ask that when the House adjourns to-day—of course, I am aware that without notice I can only move for an adjournment from day to day—it stands adjourned for ten days, or a fortnight, which would allow time to consider the gravity of the circumstances. This is the statement, Mr. Speaker, which I have the honour to lay before the House. Therefore, I move :

That when the House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 21st instant.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I really believe that my hon. friend who now leads the House will not be surprised if I tell him at the outset that it will not be possible for me, nor for any of those who sit on this side of the House, to agree at this moment to the proposition that the House should adjourn at all, except in the ordinary way from day to day. I understand very well that the Government are in a very peculiar position, and that they are entitled, I must say, to some commiseration. I am not disposed to refuse that commiseration to them in any way. But on the other hand, we must have something like parliamentary government in this country, and it is time that we should put an end to the travesty, to the mockery, and to the sham which has been too long going on here under the name of parliamentary government. It is not at all surprising to me that there should be resignations of members of the Cabinet. I must say that I have rather expected it ever since we had the resignations on the 8th of July last. I expected then that the day would come when another wing of the Cabinet would do the same thing as had been done by the wing of the Cabinet which resigned on that occasion. On that point I have nothing to say further than this: The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) has told us that seven of the members of the Administration have resigned. Sir, the hon. gentleman should have told us what is the cause which has brought on these resignations. Not a word, not a syllable, not a scintilla of information has been given to the House upon this most important subject. We knew before the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) spoke—because the fact had gone abroad through the length and breadth of the land—that seven of his colleagues had resigned, but we were in the dark then and we are in the dark yet, as to what are the causes which led to this most extraordinary and important course. What are the causes? I must assume, Mr. Speaker, that some extraordinary event has taken place which has induced seven of the members of the Administration to take such a course. I cannot assume for a moment that the hon. gentlemen who have resigned, have tendered their resignations to the Premier for causes which existed when this Parliament met on the second of this month. To assume that, would be to assume that these hon. gentlemen had acted not only in a most unparliamentary manner, but that they had acted in a most treacherous manner to the Premier, and in a most unpardonable manner towards the dignity of the Crown. Why, Sir, what is the position we are in at this moment? The position is this: On the 8th of July last, when the Cabinet had been tossed to and fro, and undecided as to whether or not they would introduce a measure of remedial legislation with regard to the Manitoba school case, based upon the Order in Council of the 21st of March last, they came here with the announcement that they were to reopen negotiations with the government of Manitoba, and that in the event of Manitoba failing to give to the minority the redress which the minority was asking for, then they would summon Parliament not later than the 2nd of January and introduce remedial legislation and press it to a conclusion. Parliament was summoned to assemble on the 2nd of January, and Parliament met on the 2nd of January. The whole Cabinet has put in the mouth of His Excellency a statement of the policy which the Government intended to carry on this session, and of the measures which they proposed to introduce. This was assented to unanimously. All the colleagues of the Prime Minister, of course, pledged themselves to the support of that policy. Now, are we to suppose that after the whole of the Government have been committed to that policy, after they have taken their course, and after they have placed in the hands of the Crown the policy which the advisers of the Crown intended to carry on, are we to suppose that unless something unforeseen has taken place since then, these gentlemen would have resigned on account of causes which existed at the very time they put that language into the mouth of the representative of the Crown? We are indeed told by the ministerial press that no extraordinary event has taken place since that time, but that these gentlemen have tendered their resignations on account of reasons which existed long before Parliament was called. Again, I assume that some very extraordinary event must have taken place since the opening of Parliament. It is true that the ministerial press has given us an event extraordinary in its character, which, however, did not affect the whole Cabinet, but affected only two members of the Administration. It is true, as has been stated in the press, that a member of the Administration had charged one of his colleagues with having anonymously slandered him to His Excellency the Governor General, had carried on investigations behind his back, although they were sitting all the time at the same table in Council, and that under such circumstances there was something to be investigated against those two gentlemen. Well, this is an extraordinary event, I must admit, but it is not an event I would imagine which would bring on such a crisis as we have at present. What is the true cause I ask? We are told in the organs of the Government that the Conservative party are dissatisfied with the leadership of Sir Mackenzie Bowell. As to that I have nothing to say. It is a purely family quarrel in which I would not at all venture to take any part. It is for the Conservatives themselves to settle that question. But, Sir, if that were the cause, if that is really the reason, and the only reason why we have the present crisis, then, met as we are here to-day to discuss the Speech of His Excellency, and asked as we are to adjourn the House, we had better know whether that is the cause or not. But, Sir, this cause existed long ago. Whether the Conservative party at large is or is not satisfied with the leadership of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, it is for gentlemen on the other side of the House and not for me to determine. I have to say that Parliament would be trifled with if that were given as the cause why we should not proceed with the business of the House. Parliament has been called to determine a certain policy, but to me it looks very much as if this were another of those expedients, of which we have had too many already, in order to afford the Government an opportunity to not carry out the pledges which they have given Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the motion of the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) objected to?

Mr. LAURIER. Certainly; notice must be given.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will give it as a notice of motion for to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER. For the day after to-morrow.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourns, I rise to perform a duty which I conceive should be performed at once, and to say at the same time that I do not propose (as neither, I think, do my colleagues who are acting with me in this matter) to enter into any discussion of the subject. I will to-day simply make a statement for the information of the House and the country as to our position—I mean the position of those gentlemen who thought it their duty to retire from the Government—and I shall briefly state the reasons why they retired. I may say in the first place that there is no disagreement between ourselves and the Premier upon any question of public policy, trade or constitutional, with regard to which action has been already taken, or in respect to which an attitude has been assumed by the Government under the present Premier. I beg also to say that we retain our firm belief in the principles and policy of the Liberal Conservative party, with which we are in entire accord, and of which, in common with others, we have been and will remain the exponents in so far as our ability admits. We have lost none of our confidence in the sound and healthy condition of the Liberal Conservative party of Canada, or of our belief that it embodies a policy which the majority of the electorate considers essential to the continued welfare and progress of the country, or of our faith that under firm and prudent leadership it will come back triumphant from the polls. Though with many misgivings we agreed to enter the Government under Mr. Bowell in succession to Sir John Thompson, we have nevertheless unitedly and loyally striven to the best of our ability to make it strong and efficient, and it has been with growing regret that we have seen our efforts result in a measure of success less than that for which we had hoped and striven. We are of the opinion that the Liberal Conservative party ought to be represented by the strongest Government possible to be secured from its ranks, that the necessity therefor was never greater than under existing circumstances, and we believe that such a Government can be formed without delay. This we have repeatedly urged upon the Premier with the result that we found ourselves face to face with Parliament having a Government with its numbers incomplete, and with no assurance that the present Premier could satisfactorily complete it. Under these circumstances we thought it our duty to retire, and in this manner to pave the way, if possible, for the formation of a Government whose Premier could command the confidence of all his colleagues, could satisfy the Liberal Conservative party, that its strongest elements were at its head and impress the country that it had a Government which was united and had power to govern. We affirm with the utmost sincerity that the action we have taken has sprung from no feeling of personal dislike or of personal ambition, but has been solely dictated by our wish to sink all minor considerations in the presence of our great desire that the best interests of our party and country should be duly conserved.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, which is the more extraordinary—the request made by the present leader of the House or the statement to which we have just listened from the ex-leader of the House. Sir, I have had some parliamentary experience. It is three and thirty years since I first sat in the Parliament of the then two Canadas, and in all that time, although I have seen many crises and assisted at some, I can recall nothing in the faintest degree parallel with the present condition of things. Sir, I defy my hon.

friend the ex-Minister of Justice, who is learned in precedents, to point out to us, in the history of any British community, a case in which seven ministers of the Crown have resigned in the interval between the placing of a speech in the mouth of the Governor or Sovereign of the country and the debate that usually follows thereon. Sir, we have heard of sudden conversions and sudden convictions. We know, on the authority of an eminent English writer, that “ Mercy was sought and mercy found Between the saddle and the ground ;”

But that is not a circumstance to the speed with which these new convictions have dawned on the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Mr. Speaker, it does appear to me that these hon. gentlemen, one and all, have offered a direct insult to the representative of the Sovereign, and a direct insult to the House. No matter what their grounds or their reasons may be, for a cabinet to place a speech in the mouth of His Excellency, and then, before the ink on the document is dry, to put a pistol to the head of their own colleague, the Premier of the country—to place him in the utterly humiliating and degrading position in which they have tried to place him, whether successful or not,—is, I am happy to say, utterly unparalleled in the history of any British community. Neither, Sir, is it a less insult to the House. We are, for the first time in Canadian history, summoned to hold a sixth session of Parliament for a most precise and special purpose; and the men who unanimously declared, speaking through the mouth of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed us, that it was necessary to the best interests of Canada that this extraordinary step should be taken, that this Parliament should be summoned on the 2nd day of January, 1896, to consult on a measure to which they declared themselves pledged, which they informed us it was their duty, their imperative duty to bring down, now present themselves before us as the very men who have—what shall I say?—combined together or conspired together to render its discussion impossible. More than that, Sir, I say it is a fraud on the country. If these seven gentlemen long entertained, as is perfectly evident from the statement we have just heard, such sentiments against the leader of the Government as have been expressed, each and every one of them have openly and shamefully perpetrated a fraud upon the electorate of the country. Sir, during the recent bye elections—during the election of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane), during the election in Jacques Cartier, during the election in North Ontario, during the election in Cardwell—I might almost say during the recent election in Victoria—have not these men, one and all, been declaring that the cabinet were in perfect unity, that they were a band of brothers without any dissensions or disputes? Have they not, in tones of thunder—especially through the late Secretary of State—what is he now?—the ex-Minister of Agriculture—declared that these assertions about cabinet dissensions were the vilest slanders of an unscrupulous Grit press? Have they not over and over again declared that all these assertions which we have made so recklessly against men so notoriously at one as the late Minister of Railways and his colleague the Minister of Public Works, were pure inventions of the enemy, and not entitled to the slightest consideration? Now, Sir, it is no light thing at a crisis like this—it is no light thing when several constituencies are called upon to record their verdict—that Ministers of the Crown should come before the country with statements in their mouths which I cannot characterize in parliamentary language other than this, that they appear to have not the slightest foundation in fact, judging from the statement which the ex-Minister of Finance has just made. Then, Sir, over and above all this, the matter is complicated by another consideration. It appears to me that these gentlemen's own honour demands now a full statement of the reasons which impelled them to take that extraordinary course; and it is certain that two of these hon. gentlemen, in view of the most extraordinary statements which are being circulated broadcast from one end of this country to the other, ought, before this day closes, or before this House rises, to inform us what truth there is or what truth there is not in the statement that one hon. Minister or ex-Minister has been caught in the act of slandering anonymously the reputation of an honourable colleague. I offer no opinion on the subject beyond this, that it is due to both those gentlemen that if this statement be true the proofs be given, and that if it is false, it be contradicted on the spot. I shall not say much about the modus operandi of these anonymous letters, but will merely offer the suggestion that if it should again become necessary, in the discharge of a patriotic duty, for any gentleman in similar position to address an anonymous correspondence to His Excellency, the communication should, for the sake of decency, and for the sake of preventing future scandals, be typewritten, and the typewriter be broken up immediately, so that there may be no possibility of afterwards detecting it. What sort of opinion are we to suppose these hon. gentlemen entertain of each other, if they have been sitting in Council, devising schemes for the welfare of Canada from day to day, and entertaining the opinion which apparently they must have entertained of each other, if we are to place the smallest reliance on the statements which have been circulated broadcast through the newspaper press. I will say but this one thing in conclusion, before these hon. gentlemen rise, as I trust they will, to give some sort of explanation to the House of their extraordinary conduct, and it is that for my part I am prepared to grant—and I hope and I believe my friends are prepared to grant—the fullest consideration to the present first Minister, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who, whatever his faults and sins may be, appears, so far as we can see, to have acted straightforwardly under very difficult circumstances indeed.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 8th January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return :

Of Napoléon Charbonneau, for the Electoral District of Jacques Cartier.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Napoléon Charbonneau, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Jacques Cartier, introduced by Mr. Laurier and Mr. Tarte.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 4) respecting the liability of Her Majesty and public companies for labour used in the construction of public works.—(Mr. McLennan.)

Bill (No. 5) to amend "The Dairy Products Act."—(Mr. McLennan.)

Bill (No. 6) respecting the sale of railway return-fare tickets.—(Mr. McLennan.)

Bill (No. 7) respecting the Senate and House of Commons.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Bill (No. 8) respecting interest.—(Mr. Mulock.)

MINISTERIAL RESIGNATIONS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I take it that the House will expect some information in relation to the announcement which I made yesterday. I then had the honour of asking the House to consent to an adjournment for ten days. It was refused, and I had to give notice of motion, and that motion will come up only on to-morrow. I am not in a position to-day to say anything more to the House than I said yesterday, except, that the Prime Minister is now with His Excellency the Governor General, and of course, I can make no further announcement. I would again ask the House if the motion which I made yesterday can be agreed to, and if not, it will of course come up in the regular order to-morrow. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) remembers that yesterday he stated that at the next sitting of the House (that is the way he put it) he expected to be in a position to declare to the House the course which the Government intended to take under existing circumstances.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My expectations have been disappointed.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, and in more ways than one, perhaps. Under such circumstances the hon. gentleman will not find it extraordinary, if again I cannot agree to an adjournment for ten days. The hon. gentleman will see that it is most reasonable that we should not separate, at all events for such a length of time, until we have been informed of the intentions of the Government in reference to the present state of affairs. The hon. gentleman tells us to-day that the Prime Minister is in consultation with His Excellency. That being the case we certainly cannot press for more information, but we will expect it to-morrow.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker. I think, Sir, that before the motion is carried it is important that the House should give some consideration to the very extraordinary position in which it finds itself on the present occasion. The position, Sir, is certainly a very novel one. I think the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, whether they are in the Government, or outside of the Government, will find very great difficulty in placing before the House a precedent for the present position of affairs. Sir, we have been called together, as we supposed, for the transaction of the public business; but, after having been convened, we find that this is a mistake; we have been called here simply to be spectators of a ministerial crisis, and to see how certain hon. gentlemen who have been members of the Government can succeed in getting rid of their present Prime Minister and substituting another party leader in his place. There was submitted to the House yesterday by the late Minister of Finance, then leader of this House, a declaration setting forth certain very important facts. The one piece of information which he gave us was that there is no difference between the members of the Government on questions of public policy, whether relating to ordinary questions or to matters of constitutional procedure, but that the division of the Cabinet has taken place wholly on the question of the intellectual capacity of the Prime Minister. The hon. gentleman has told us that that is the sole question of difference between those who have withdrawn from the Government and those who continue members of the Administration. After having given the Prime Minister a trial for a period of over twelve months, one-half of his colleagues have confidence in his capacity and fitness for the position he occupies, and the other half are of the contrary opinion. Sir, the time chosen by the hon. gentlemen who have withdrawn from the Government for making this declaration and for impeding the public business is, in my opinion, an extraordinary one. Before the House met, these hon. gentlemen deliberated upon the policy that was to be pursued by the Government this session. They determined what measures of public importance were to be submitted to this House, and advised His Excellency upon that subject; and they put in His Excellency's mouth the Speech from the Throne which has been delivered to Parliament. Now, Sir, after that Speech has been given, and before this House has had any opportunity of making a reply to it, seven of the hon. Prime Minister's colleagues have withdrawn from the Government, and have created a political crisis which, if it could be justified at all, ought to have arisen, looking at the causes assigned, before Parliament met, instead of after the meeting of Parliament. These hon. gentlemen, it may be, have considered their party interests: I am not a judge of that matter; but they have certainly not considered the public interests in bringing us here, after making known to His Excellency what measures the Government considered of public importance, and then impeding the public business and making it impossible to proceed with it in consequence of their party differences, which they have seen fit to discuss publicly on the floor of Parliament instead of confining them to the party caucus. They have charged incapacity against their leader—a leader whom they accepted, a leader who was not forced upon them, a leader whom they were not obliged to accept, because it was open to them at the very outset to inform His Excellency that they had not confidence in his capacity or ability, and did not consider him qualified for the position. But they did not do that. They chose to act under him—to undertake to carry on the affairs of the Government under him; and it is only now, at the opening of Parliament, that they attempt to justify the course they are taking in impeding the public business by declaring that they have a leader characterized by imbecility and a want of capacity for the duties that devolve upon him. This, Sir, seems to me to be a very extraordinary position for these hon. gentlemen to take, and an unusual defence to offer for the course they have taken. Sir, the declaration made yesterday by the hon. member has rather the appearance—I do not say it is so in fact—of a conspiracy than a protest on the part of those who make it. Let us look at the facts. This House is the place where the business of the country is conducted; it is here that ministerial responsibility mainly rests; and who is responsible for the conduct of business in this House? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman who read this statement on behalf of himself and his colleagues is responsible as leader of this House, far beyond the Prime Minister, for the conduct of the public business; and if there has been hesitation, if there has been delay, if there has been an exhibition of incapacity, it would rather rest upon the hon. gentlemen who represent the Government in this House than upon the First Minister who sits in the other Chamber. That, Sir, is the way in which this matter strikes me. The hon. gentleman read in this House yesterday a sentence of death against the Prime Minister under whom he served. The hon. gentleman has sat, I believe, for a period of eight years in the Government with the Prime Minister. Now, I have never expressed my confidence in the hon. gentleman who leads the Government. I do not agree with his views of public policy; I do not agree with the course which he and his friends have taken in this House; but, Sir, the hon. gentleman did agree and sat with him for a period of eight years, and knew what his capacity was before he was chosen as Prime Minister, and so did the six hon. gentlemen who have joined with him in this protest. Yet they come here and declare that they cannot get on with the public business because of the incapacity of their leader, although, as I say, that leader is in a less degree responsible for the conduct of public business than the hon. gentlemen who sit in this House. Sir, we have seen hesitation and delay in the conduct of public business. Who does not remember the manner in which the hon. gentleman who has lately led this House dealt with the banking system? Who does not remember the forbearance shown to him by his colleagues and by all the members of this House on that occasion? Who does not remember the promise to lop off the decaying branches in the matter of the fiscal policy of the Government, and the Bill which the hon. gentleman introduced, and the speech which he made in pursuance of that promise? And yet this hon. member, who has shown to what a large degree he rested upon the forbearance of the House and the good-will of the supporters of the Administration, has seen proper to attack the Prime Minister for incapacity in the discharge of public business, and to declare, in effect, that the failures of the Conservative party in the country have been due to that incapacity. Sir, under the constitution of ancient Abyssinia—

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, give us a rest.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, I will interest the hon. gentleman. Under the constitution of ancient Abyssinia there was a council known as the Sacred Council, which claimed the right, when they were tired of the sovereign, to pass an order directing him to die, and he was supposed to obey that order. Ultimately, there was a sovereign in Abyssinia who refused to die, and who ordered his guards to execute the order of the Sacred Council upon that honourable body; and if the Prime Minister should adopt that policy towards these hon. gentlemen, perhaps there would not be a great deal of sympathy for them or a great deal of regret in consequence. There might have been a more effective way than the one which the hon. gentlemen have adopted. In the East there are more recent constitutions than that of Abyssinia. There is at Stamboul a practice, I believe, which the hon. gentlemen might have imitated here. There are surely bowstrings and bags in Ottawa as well as at Stamboul, and the waters behind Parliament Hill are as deep as those in the Bosphorous, so that the hon. gentlemen might perhaps have got rid of their Premier, if they wished to deal unfairly with him, without making the matter so notorious, not merely in this House, but in every part of the country. What is the defence that the late Minister of Finance has made of this attempt to take the life of the Premier? We took him, says the hon. gentleman, with a good deal of misgiving. We took him for better or for worse, and we find him worse than we took him for. That is the position which the hon. gentleman has taken, that is the defence he has made for the course which he and his six colleagues have adopted towards the Prime Minister. The hon. gentleman says: We have not lost confidence in the policy of the Conservative party. He says that policy is a healthy policy, one that commends itself to the Liberal-Conservative party, and that, under the leadership of a competent man, that party could return from the country triumphant. The hon. gentleman has great faith. Now, it was under the lead of the hon. gentleman himself, rather than under the lead of the Premier, that certain bye-elections were held. A number of constituencies represented by supporters of the Government in this House had become vacant. There was Antigonish, which was lost to the Administration. There is Centre Montreal which is lost to the Administration. There is the seat of Jacques Cartier which is lost to the Administration. And the hon. gentleman was afraid for some time to create a vacancy in Cardwell, although an office was promised to the former member for Cardwell some time ago. He was afraid that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would be tempted to tread on the tails of the Government's coat, and so Mr. White was not appointed to office and the seat did not become vacant until Mr. White forced the hands of the Government by resigning. The seat then did become vacant, and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) did tread on the tails of the Government coat with a very great deal of success. The hon. gentleman who used to lead this House (Mr. Foster)—and not the Premier—went into that constituency and the other vacant constituencies and defended the course of the Government, and dilated on the ability of the Government, and waxed eloquent on the masterly manner in which the affairs of this country were being administered by the Government; but notwithstanding his representations in Cardwell, and in the other constituencies where seats held by the Government became vacant, these constituencies were lost to the Administration. Therefore, I say, it exhibits a great deal of faith on the part of the late Finance Minister for him to declare now to this House that the Liberal-Conservative party is quite sure of success in the country if it only had a competent man at its head. Why, the hon. gentleman's statement that the country is in a sound and healthy and contented condition is not justified by the results of the elections. He must see that these results point in a wholly different direction. I would like to know who is responsible for this discontent in the country. Has the late Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), or the late Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague), or the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), or any of the other gentlemen who have retired from the Government, no responsibility in the discharge of the duties of governing? If there has been inefficiency on the part of the Government, if there is dissatisfaction in the country, whose inefficiency is it that has created that dissatisfaction? Is the Prime Minister alone responsible for the feeling which exists in the country? No, Sir. There is no one who has contributed more to create an unfavourable impression with regard to the conduct of public affairs than the late Finance Minister himself. These dead branches that were to be lopped off are still upon the Government tree. Those that were cut off have been grafted on again, and the country has not had that relief from the reforms which the hon. gentleman had promised. Let me read to the House a few of the paragraphs contained in this address which the hon. gentleman read to us yesterday, as a justification for the course he and his friends have taken. He says :

We are of the opinion that the Liberal-Conservative party ought to be represented by the strongest Government possible to be secured from its ranks, that the necessity therefor was never greater than under existing circumstances, and we believe that such a Government can be formed without delay.

Is that the reason the hon. gentleman retired? Was it because he wanted to have a competent Government that he and his colleagues withdrew from the Administration? Has he want of confidence in his own colleagues who retired with him, or want of confidence, at all events, in their capacity? I do not think so. The hon. gentleman himself, by this address, wishes the country to understand that if such men as those, who have retired with him, had control of public affairs, then the Government would be competently conducted. They are able, they are competent men—so they say—and all they require is a competent head. But, say these hon. gentlemen, although we are excellent material, the Government was vacant in the upper story. Now, in another paragraph, he says :

This we have repeatedly urged upon the Premier with the result that we found ourselves face to face with Parliament, having a Government with its numbers incomplete, and with no assurance that the present Premier could satisfactorily complete it.

Well, what is the position of the Government? There are two seats, I believe, vacant—one in the Cabinet and one outside. The Solicitor-General's position was not filled; neither was that of the late Minister of Agriculture. Well, that was not an extraordinary thing, and certainly not extraordinary in a Government by the Conservative party in this country. I remember many instances when seats in the Administration were vacant for a good while; and so far as I remember, there were still over thirteen members left in the Cabinet, so that there was abundance of material, whether it was material of the right sort or not. Let me point out this irrelevant reason assigned for resignation. That reason was just as good two months ago as it is to-day. It was just as good before Parliament was called as after the proclamation. Why did the hon. gentleman wait until Parliament was called before he discovered that the Administration was incomplete. Why did he assist in framing the Speech from the Throne and marking out a policy for the Administration? Why did he come down to this House and invite the attention of the House to the contents of the Speech from the Throne if he were not prepared to go on—if he thought that because there was no Solicitor-General and because one office in the Cabinet was vacant, that was a reason for his not continuing in the Government?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.)

Sir, let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to another matter of importance. Seats have been kept vacant in this House for some months. Writs, I believe, were issued, in some cases, some time ago, but the Government failed to appoint the returning officers, they failed to give the necessary instructions. They put impediments in the way of the election instead of discharging their duty. Thus the hon. gentlemen must have thought it was more important that an unnecessary office in the Administration should be filled than the people of a large constituency should be represented in this House. Then, look at the Senate. The hon. gentlemen know that there have been for a long period of time many seats vacant in that House. That is contrary to the spirit of the constitution. I suppose, from what the hon. gentleman has said, that he is in accord with the course taken with the authority of the Prime Minister in this regard. How is it that the hon. gentlemen assign as a reason a temporary vacancy in the Government, while these vacancies in the Senate and the House of Commons extending over a long period of time were not considered worthy of notice? Then, Sir, there are vacancies outside. The hon. gentleman will not pretend that offices have been created in this country producing charges upon the public revenue which he thinks altogether unnecessary. Why was the Collectorship of Customs of Montreal kept vacant? The hon. gentleman says: There is no Solicitor General, and I must retire from the Government. And yet, while there has been no Collector in Montreal for three years, the hon. gentleman did not think it worth while to retire on that account. Further, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have withdrawn from the Government and the reasons for that withdrawal are all set out in the address which the hon. gentleman read to us yesterday. It was open to the hon. gentleman, if he was dissatisfied with the Prime Minister, to have informed him that they desired an interview with His Excellency and that they desired to inform His Excellency that they did not consider Sir Mackenzie Bowell qualified for the post of Prime Minister. This course was followed in the case of Lord Granville in the Pelham Administration, who was following a course in respect of foreign affairs with which his colleagues did not agree. Five of those colleagues waited upon the King and informed His Majesty that they entirely disapproved of the foreign policy of Lord Granville and asked his removal from office on that account; and, although that policy was one of which the King approved, and although Lord Granville was a personal friend of His Majesty, nevertheless His Majesty complied with the request of a majority of his advisers. And so, in this case, it was open to the hon. gentlemen who were dissatisfied with the Government here to have assigned that as a reason for their withdrawal from the Government, that is if Sir Mackenzie Bowell had been sustained. Now, let me read another paragraph from his address :

Under these circumstances we thought it our duty to retire, and in this manner to pave the way, if possible, for the formation of a Government whose Premier could command the confidence of all his colleagues, could satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that its strongest elements were at its head and impress the country that it had a Government which was united and had power to govern.

Now, Sir, the one astonishing thing in this statement is that there is here an assumption that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of this House had the right to choose a Prime Minister for His Excellency. I deny that altogether. It is the prerogative of the Crown to choose whom it pleases as Prime Minister. The House may or may not, the country may or may not, support the party so chosen. The hon. gentlemen assume that in this matter the Conservative party must have a caucus, that its representatives must determine who their leader shall be, and that they must inform His Excellency that the leader so chosen must be the Prime Minister. I deny any such pretension altogether. There are numerous precedents which would show that no such right can be maintained. The hon. gentleman, so we understand, has undertaken to invite across the Atlantic the High Commissioner to lead the Conservative party. The Conservative party are, no doubt, in desperate straits. But that is not due to the incapacity of the Prime Minister; it is due to the reckless and extravagant course which the Administration have taken for a period of years past. These hon. gentlemen have excited high expectations in the public mind which have not been realized, and the public are disappointed. The elections which have taken place show that the public have no confidence in the hon. gentlemen. These gentlemen have attempted to repair their fortunes. In their desperate extremity they have invited Sir Charles Tupper from his office of High Commissioner to this country, and when he arrives here, they undertake to create a crisis, and they do create it just at the most inconvenient time for the country, when Parliament is called for the discharge of its public duty. Now, the hon. gentlemen, I think, will find that Sir Charles Tupper cannot improve very much the position of the Conservative party. The public have not as much confidence in Sir Charles Tupper as have the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches—I should say who sat on the Treasury benches—because the hon. gentlemen who are retiring from the Government are they who are the friends and defenders of the High Commissioner. In this House and on that side of it there are a large number of members, and if we look to the Senate we find that nearly the whole of that body is filled up with men who have done service for the Conservative party. These hon. gentlemen who have retired from the Government in effect declare that none of those whom they have advised His Excellency to appoint to seats in the other Chamber are men of ability, are men competent to lead their party. They look over this House and they say to the hundred and odd members who support the Administration that there is not one amongst them competent to lead the Conservative party. And so they appeal to Sir Charles Tupper on the other side of the Atlantic and ask him to come over and help them in their extremity. Now, Sir, I am not going to judge of the gentleman as leader of the Conservative party, but I say that it is, to say the least, in extremely bad taste to ask him here under the circumstances and to create a crisis by attempting to force him into the Administration. The hon. gentleman who has submitted to this House the address which was read yesterday as a defence for the course of those who have retired from the Government, will find that the country will regard it, not so much an evidence of the incapacity of the man who led them, as an evidence of the desperate straits in which the leaders of the Conservative party are placed in this House, and the want of confidence in leaders of that party in the country.

Mr. WALLACE. Before that motion is declared carried I wish to make this statement. Yesterday, two hon. members of this House informed me that they had learned from the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) that I was responsible for the anonymous letter alleged to have been written by the hon. gentleman himself. Mr. Speaker, I have to deny absolutely the truth of the charge of the hon. member for Haldimand, and to say that I did not write said anonymous letter or letters, or inspire the writing of those letters, and I did not know that any such letter or letters were in existence for many months after they were received.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think, Sir, though this is a matter upon which my lips, as a recent member of the Privy Council, ought to be sealed in this House at the present moment, I cannot allow the statement made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to pass without saying a few words to this House. In doing so I trust that I shall not break any rule of courtesy or decency which should be observed as between a member of the Privy Council of Canada and other members of that Privy Council, and the representative of the sovereign in this country. First, let me say that three days ago, I think, an insinuation was made to me that I was guilty, or that I was charged by an hon. gentleman who belonged to the Privy Council, with having written certain anonymous letters in relation to himself, either to the Premier of Canada, or to the Governor General of Canada. I need not say, Sir, that, being absolutely innocent of the charge, I demanded, at the very moment the insinuation was made, that that statement should be sent to His Excellency, to whom, as a member of his Privy Council, I was responsible for honourable, manly and above-board conduct. Those charges made by a member of the Privy Council had been concealed. I understand, in a drawer for two or three months, and then, at an important juncture, they were thrown at me without a moment's notice, and I acted as I have stated to you this afternoon. That matter, as it concerns my honour as a Privy Councillor of Canada, is now before His Excellency, and I do not intend, in accordance with the rules of decency and of courtesy to him, to discuss the subject this afternoon—more than to say this, that no baser lie was ever told of a public man in Canada, and it was part of a foul and dirty conspiracy to ruin an hon. member of this House, and a member of the Government of Canada. I am bound to say, however, that since the hon. gentleman has stated this afternoon that he did not write those letters, I am prepared to accept that statement. I never said that the member for West York wrote the letters. What I did say was that the Postmaster General consulted the member for West York, that the member for West York hawked those letters around the city of Toronto, to Mr. Beattie Nesbitt, to Mr. Richard Armstrong, and to men who had nothing to do with members of Parliament, or with members of the Government of Canada—

Mr. WALLACE. That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. MONTAGUE—and that he charged me with writing those letters. Sir, I have only to say this, that when the whole subject is investigated, as it will be investigated in a court of law, then the hon. member for West York will have an opportunity of proving his innocence of the charge which I then made. I am here to say to this House that the charges made against me, humiliating and annoying as they are, are as false as it is possible to make them; and I am here to say also, that with regard to any member of this Government, or with regard to any member of this House, since I have had the honour of a seat here, I have never yet committed an act that could not bear the light of day, or that would not do me honour.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The reason given by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) for not entering into a discussion of this subject at the present moment, seems to me absolutely conclusive. If, as is quite true, the matter is in the hands of His Excellency, it seems to me it would be unbecoming to enter into a discussion of the subject, and unless one can enter into the discussion of that subject, it is impossible to make any statement. I am, however, prepared to say this, that as soon as the matter came to my cognizance in the press, I stated then, as I now state to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House, that, directly or indirectly, I had nothing whatever to do with authorizing the publication of a matter which I considered personal between the hon. gentleman and myself. Not only had I nothing to do with this publication, but when I saw the statement in the paper, I found that it was made by one who knew nothing about the case, or very little about the details. I found inaccuracies in that publication which, knowing the matter as I did, proved to me that it was based upon reports, and was not made with full possession of the facts. Now, Sir, I am prepared to say that in so far as the denial from the hon. gentleman goes, it is my duty, and I say so here before the House, to accept that denial. As to the statement that reports have been circulated, for one object or another, that those letters were hawked about Toronto, I can tell the hon. gentleman that those letters have always been in my possession, and have not left my possession unless I knew where they were going when I sent them, under my own positive instruction, by reliable persons, to reliable people who were investigating them. That is the only statement which I consider it proper to make at present.

Mr. SCRIVER. It is not my intention to take any general part in the discussion which has sprung up regarding the situation as it affects the Cabinet. That discussion, perhaps, from the point of view taken by this side of the House was carried on by the leader of the Opposition and the hon. knight who sits before me to a sufficient length to enable all members of the House to understand the true position. I will simply say that since I became a member of this House, a quarter of a century ago, my experience has never included anything approaching the present condition of things. I would not have said one word on the situation were it not for the fact that an old personal friend of mine, not a political friend, has been assailed in the house of his friends in a manner which constrains me to say a few words in his defence. I cannot but feel as an independent member of this House that the Premier of this country has been assailed in a manner which very few would have expected to witness. If he has not been stabbed in the back, he has been, in the words of a late Governor General of this country, struck below the belt, at least. It was my good fortune when I first became a member of this House, twenty-five years ago, or thereabouts, to find as one of its members the present Premier. Although we were not at one in regard to all of our political views, we saw alike in respect to many of them. I received at his hands many personal kindnesses. I was indebted to him for obtaining a seat near himself, which relieved me from occupying a seat that, in the then construction of the Chamber would have proved very detrimental to my health. I did not forget his kindness because of that fact, and because it afforded me the opportunity of cultivating a friendship and personal relations which have continued to exist till this day. I was then led to form a high opinion, an opinion which I entertain still, of the force of character, of the clear-headedness, of the sound common sense possessed by the Premier. And the revelations which have been made to us this afternoon, and which were made to us yesterday, have constrained me to believe that he has displayed signal evidence of ability in one respect at least, in that he has succeeded, as head of the Administration, in preventing certain members of it from flying at each other's throats. What may be the outcome of the present embroglio, it is impossible for me to say. I do not know whether or not the Premier will be enabled to reorganize his Administration, and it may be, within a few days, in the power of those who have been instrumental in procuring his overthrow to exclaim with some men in the past: "Le roi est mort, vive le roi." They may, perhaps, become Ministers in a new Administration. But if that be the case, of this I am convinced, that if the hon. gentleman becomes again simply a private member of this House, I trust that years of usefulness will be spared to him. In those years of usefulness as a public man I have no doubt he will continue to display those qualities of head and heart which, during twenty-five years, or more, have distinguished him as a public man, whether as a private member of this House, as the head of an important department of the Government, or as First Minister of the Crown.

Mr. CASEY. Like the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, I do not intend to discuss at any length the issue which is now before the House. I, like himself, and like many others who have a sense of fair-play, feel inclined to express my opinion of the immediate events which have been the cause of the downfall of the hon. gentleman to whose Government we on this side of the House have been long honourably opposed. It would seem that the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), who has been, till lately, Finance Minister, told the House yesterday in an incidental moment of frankness—my hon. friend beside me suggests in a moment of weakness, and it may prove a source of weakness to him—at all events, in a moment of intentional or unintentional frankness, the hon. gentleman appears to have told us the truth.

In the course of his remarks yesterday he referred to those Ministers who have acted with him, as his colleagues; he spoke of the other six of the seven bolters as colleagues who had acted with him. So we look upon that hon. gentleman as the head of the provisional cabinet of wreckers; and I can easily believe he was the head of the movement, the history of which he briefly outlined yesterday, for everything in the whole proceedings indicates that he was the master-spirit in the movement. I should be sorry to think that several of those hon. gentlemen whom he designates as his colleagues, and who acted with him, would of their own motion, have taken the course which he states they have pursued in this affair. The tortuous course of policy they followed is more proper for the hon. member for King's to pursue than it is for any of the others in that wrecking cabinet, so far as their natural dispositions are known to this House. That hon. gentleman has been the moving spirit in the revolt, the leader of the mutiny.

Not to go into the matter at length, I may say that that hon. gentleman confessed that he and those who acted with him had entered the Government feeling no respect for, or confidence in, the leader whom they had asked to lead them. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that Sir Mackenzie Bowell did not have to go around and solicit the support of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) or that of the other bolters. Sir Mackenzie was chosen by all of them as the one man who could lead the Cabinet under the circumstances of the day. Those hon. gentlemen declared they would support him; they accepted office under him, and were pledged as men of honour, not less than by their oaths as Privy Councillors, to give him their most loyal and hearty support during the time they held office under him.

Now, what, in brief, is the statement which was made to the House yesterday by the hon. member for King's? That hon. gentleman said that they took office at that time not then believing what they pretended to believe, that Sir Mackenzie Bowell was the right man for the place, and not having that confidence in him which they were bound, as men of honour, to have before they took office under him. And further, that during the whole time they remained in office under him, they retained that lack of confidence in him, and while the member for King's (Mr. Foster), then Finance Minister, was thundering from the platform at Smith's Falls and elsewhere about the unanimity of the Government, he and six others of that Cabinet were plotting for the downfall of the Premier.

That is what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) confessed to us. Not only did he confess it, but he almost boasted of it to us across the floor of the House. These men sitting at the Premier's right hand and at his left, professing friendship for him in private, professing confidence in him before the public, were conspiring to raise a mutiny against him whenever it should seem to them that the time had arrived when they could most surely kill him politically. It would seem that the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) is blest with instincts so peculiar and so abnormal, that they did not inform him beforehand of the effect that such a statement as he made would have upon the public feeling of the country. When he avowed his political treachery, he did not seem to know that it would bring upon him the contempt of people of both parties throughout the country, and that it would rally a strong feeling of sympathy to the support of the man whom he wished to politically assassinate.

On his own statement this was a conspiracy and a mutiny against the leader of the Government, and further proof of it is to be found in the time chosen for bringing it to a head. If the object of the consultation, or rather I should say, if the understanding, between these seven who are properly dubbed by the press as "wreckers" had been to reconstruct the Government with the purpose of securing a strong Ministry for the Conservative party in Canada, they would have worked out the question, as my friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says, in a party caucus long before the House met. But they kept mum. They bided their time; they waited until the policy of the Government had been announced; they waited until an adjournment had been obtained, ostensibly because the House was called too soon after the holidays; they waited for what might be called the psychological moment to drive the blow home, to assassinate the man whom they were bound, in party fidelity and common decency, to defend against surprise and against all midnight attacks. It is therefore clear that their object was not to strengthen the Government but to drive out of power one man who stood in the way of their ambition.

I repeat that the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) was mistaken, if he thought he would gain anything by that announcement. I must say, as a Liberal and as an opponent of Sir Mackenzie Bowell for twenty-three years or more, that I myself felt stirred by a sympathy which I cannot refrain from expressing upon the floor of this House, a sympathy for that gentleman under the circumstances in which he is placed. He had been sitting for thirteen months or so with colleagues who were plotting against him. It is no wonder that he did not make a success of his Government, as we all know he did not. What Prime Minister could succeed with half of his Government plotting against him? It is no wonder that he could not fill up the vacancies in his Cabinet, for who would choose to sit with such colleagues as these gentlemen have confessed themselves to be?

I think, Sir, I am speaking the sentiment of all Liberals. I know I am speaking my own, when I say that we have no sympathy with this kind of domestic treachery. We are anxious to beat Sir Mackenzie Bowell and his Cabinet and to beat them as completely as possible, but we desire to beat them openly in a fair field and without any personal disgrace to the man who is beaten. We do not sympathize with mutiny. I should be glad to see the captain subdue this mutiny. I should be glad to see him bring his ship into the fight in the open sea of the general elections, and there sustain as severe a defeat as possible at the hands of the leader of my own party.

Sir, there is another question that I think must be spoken of before we leave this subject. I refer to the intervention of a salaried officer of this Government in the Cabinet making transactions which have been, or are now going on. By whom was Sir Charles Tupper sent for? At whose suggestion was he sent for to come to Canada at this crisis? We are told that as a matter of form he was sent for by the Premier to discuss, as he says, the East Atlantic Service, the Pacific Cable, and perhaps the Chignecto Ship Canal. We do not know how much the Chignecto Ship affair had to do with it, but we do know that Sir Charles Tupper was to return to England at a fixed date. He did not go on that date. He is still here, and he is known to be in consultation with the members of one or other of the two existing Cabinets on the other side of the House. He is in fact intriguing with one side or the other, perhaps with both.

What has become of the self-respect of the leaders of the Conservative party, or of those who are claiming to be the new leaders of it, when they take into consultation a public servant in the intrigues which are going on as to who shall rule the country? Nay, Sir, it is suggested and proposed, as everybody knows, that Sir Charles Tupper himself should become the leader of the new Government. He has always been the "deus ex machina" of these gentlemen. He has always been the great medicine man to be sent for whenever the Government was sick, and now it appears that he is to be called upon to lead the mutineers, to lead the "wreckers" in the formation of a new Ministry.

We cannot say whether or not he may succeed in attaining that eminence; but we can say that it is a scandal to public propriety that a highly salaried servant of the people, supposed to be the non-partisan representative of Canada in the mother country should be here receiving public pay, while he is spending his time in assisting to wreck the Government of this country. I say that while Sir Charles Tupper poses here as the chief of the wrecking gang, it is a scandal that he should be receiving public pay which all the people of Canada irrespective of party have to contribute to.

Now, Sir, what would be a petty scandal if it were not in such a high place, between two Ministers, is that matter of the anonymous letters, which should have received further explanation than it has had. The fact that the question is now before His Excellency prevents further being said upon it at the present time. It is well that we have had to-day, at least, what we did not have yesterday, a sort of anonymous explanation of the anonymous charge. I hope, Sir, that to-morrow such an announcement will be made as will enable us to have a fuller discussion of all the issues of the case.

Mr. LAURIER. Before this motion is put, perhaps the hon. gentleman who leads the Government will permit me to ask him for some information as to the character of public business. I understand that at the present moment what is left of the Government is fast depleting this House by distributing amongst its members senatorships, collectorships, and other offices. I understand that since yesterday no less than four or five members of this House, perhaps more, have been appointed to divers offices. I would like to have some explanation as to that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the information he requires just now, but I think that by to-morrow I can give it to him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, to hon. gentlemen opposite it may seem very funny, but it is very serious. Supposing those appointments have been made, the papers may not have returned yet from His Excellency, and I think I am right in saying that I will take the first opportunity that I can properly do so, to give my hon. friend the information he asks.

Mr. LAURIER. Then I understand that my hon. friend suggests that His Excellency may think it advisable not to carry out the wishes of his Council.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LAURIER. That is quite proper, and I think a very good point for His Excellency to consider in his wisdom. Perhaps my hon. friend is right, because I understand there are a hundred or more offices to be distributed, and he cannot remember them all—he may have to refresh his memory on that point.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I wish to correct my hon. friend on one point. Supposing the Orders in Council making those appointments to have passed, they must go to the Governor General to be signed; and would it be proper for me to give any information until I know whether they have returned from Government House, and whether they have been signed or not signed? Now, with regard to the hundred appointments. I have no manner of doubt that my hon. friend is just speaking from rumours—

Mr. LAURIER. Nothing else.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, it is very unsafe to put a question upon rumours.

Mr. LAURIER. It is not safe to depend on rumours, and that is why I want a positive answer.

Mr. EDGAR. There is another rumour which the hon. leader of the House will answer or not as he thinks proper. The latest rumour is that the Prime Minister has ordered the High Commissioner to go back to London and attend to his own business.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 4.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 9th January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

TRADE CONSPIRACIES AND COMBINATIONS.

Mr. SPROULE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 12) to amend the law relating to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of trade.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Could not the hon. gentleman enlarge the bounds of this Bill so as to include Cabinets as well?

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 9) better to secure the Independence of Parliament.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Bill (No. 10) further to amend the Act respecting the Adulteration of Food, Drugs and Agricultural Fertilizers.—(Mr. Sproule.)

Bill (No. 11) respecting Detective Corporations and Mercantile Agencies.—(Mr. Sproule.)

Bill (No. 13) to determine the length of the working day for workmen and labourers employed on public works.—(Mr. Lépine.)

REPORTS.

Report, returns and statistics of the Inland Revenues of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1895; Part I. Excise, etc.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Part II. Inspection of Weights and Measures and Gas, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1895.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Part III. Adulteration of Food, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1895.—(Mr. Costigan.)

MINISTERIAL RESIGNATIONS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, before I move the motion which appears in my name, I desire to make an announcement to the House. After several interviews between the Premier and the Governor General, the former waited upon His Excellency yesterday for the purpose of tendering his resignation. His Excellency, however, intimated that he was not at that moment prepared to receive it. The chief reason for this attitude on the part of His Excellency is that the Speech from the Throne, although presented to Parliament, has not yet been considered, nor an expression of opinion given by Parliament upon it. It is regarded by His Excellency as unfitting that the Premier, as head of the Administration responsible for that Speech, should not have a full opportunity of reviewing the situation and testing the feelings of Parliament thereon. Under these circumstances the Premier deems it his duty to endeavour, as far as in him lies, to reorganize the Government. I therefore move :

That when the House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 14th instant.

Hon. gentlemen will see that the period that the Premier desired me to ask an adjournment for is made shorter than in the original motion, which made it to the 21st.

Mr. LAURIER. The announcement which has just been made by the hon. gentleman who, at this moment leads the House (Sir Adolphe Caron) puts a new face upon the crisis, and will to some extent—to a large extent—modify the views which otherwise I would have felt it my duty to express upon this occasion. I may say, however, to my hon. friend at once that I do not think it would be parliamentary or consistent with usages and rules of parliamentary government, to grant an adjournment later than to-morrow. It is a well-known, a well-settled law of Parliament, which has come down to us by a series of precedents extending as far back as the last century—that whenever a ministerial crisis arises while Parliament is sitting, it is the first duty of Parliament to extend to the Administration not only all possible courtesy, but every facility for accomplishing the task they have in hand of reconstituting the Government. But, at the same time, it is also the undoubted right of Parliament to be here from day to day, in order to be informed, from day to day, exactly of what progress is made. Now, while the statement made by the hon. gentleman has put a new face upon the crisis and modified, to a large extent, the position I had intended to take, I must, at the same time, express my regret that the promises which were made, not later than last night, by the First Minister in another House, are not being implemented. I understood from the statement of the First Minister last evening that he would be in a position to-day to say what progress he had made in filling up the vacant portfolios. Instead, however, we are asked again to wait until Tuesday. I call, again, the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that an adjournment of more than a day is altogether contrary to the spirit of our constitution. Let me call the attention of the House to the authorities on the subject. I quote from the book of Dr. Bourinot, page 795 :

If Parliament should be sitting on the occasion of a ministerial crisis, it is usual to adjourn from day to day, and questions to be asked with respect to the progress made with the formation of a ministry. The motion to adjourn may be made, when necessary, by one of the ex-Ministers, at the request of the person who has been entrusted with the duty of forming a ministry. In case of a reconstruction, it is customary for members of the former Cabinet to make such explanations as have been given them by the new Premier, since they hold their old offices until arrangements are finally made.

Therefore, nothing can be clearer than that the right and the duty of Parliament to-day is to exact from the Government that the adjournment should be only for one day, and on the morrow to be informed of what progress, if any, has been made, and if the task of reconstruction be not then completed, then again to adjourn until the following day, and so on, until the Government is in a position to tell us that the crisis is at an end or is not curable. And I must express my astonishment that my hon. friend should depart from what undoubtedly is the law and the constitution. Hon. gentlemen opposite, not only those who are in, but those who are out—not only the orthodox, but the dissenters; not only the steady, but the kickers—have always been most profuse in their declarations that, under all and every circumstance, they would stand by the constitution. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is an occasion for the hon. gentleman to show that he abides by the constitution. Why should we have this delay of four additional days? It is evident that the delay is but for the purpose of allowing the plotting and the conspiring of which we have been the witnesses—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LAURIER—the plotting and conspiring which has been going on among hon. gentlemen opposite, to continue. For my part, I stand by the constitution, as I have always done. I have no objection to give all the delay that these hon. gentlemen want—even a delay of fifteen days, or more—provided we adjourn from day to day. Though my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), said some days ago that the crisis was only skin-deep, it is far deeper, I am afraid, than his words would convey. The hon. gentleman told us a few days ago that the cause of the crisis was simply this, that they, the stalwarts, the giants of the Administration, would no longer serve under a man who, in their estimation, while not altogether a pigmy, is still not their equal in stature and majestic proportions.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose this is a paraphrase of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. LAURIER. I have no objection to take the words of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not recognize the words; it is a paraphrase.

Mr. LAURIER. In language, the expression was more modest, but the thought was just the same. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say that I am bound to take his statement? That is the law and the constitution. But the law and the constitution do not prevent me—nor even parliamentary courtesy—while accepting the statement, from accepting it, not with a grain, but with a very large measure of salt, indeed. This is not the first time we have heard an expression of opinion from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) as to his leader, and the expressions he used on the public platform on other occasions do not bear out the opinion he has given on the floor of this House. This is not the cause of the crisis; the cause is deeper. What is the cause? It is simply this, that when Parliament is called upon to implement the promises which were made by the hon. gentleman himself towards the close of last session—when Parliament is called to pass the legislation which was then promised, the Government find that their party is irretrievably divided upon this question. That is the cause of the crisis at present. Was the information not spread broadcast throughout the country, when seven of the more important members of the Administration sent in their resignations to the Premier, that an urgent whip had been sent out to all the Conservative members to assemble here and hold a general caucus? The caucus was called, but it never sat. They dare not have it sit, and that is the reason we have this crisis. There have been caucuses of provinces, but there has been no general caucus; and I must say to my hon. friend who leads the House (Sir Adolphe Caron) that for my part I cannot agree to an adjournment of more than one day. It is true the Government has not made much progress in the formation of the Cabinet, but if what is left of the Government to-day had displayed in the work of reconstruction the energy they had displayed in depleting this House of its members, perhaps they would be more advanced in their task. The greater part of their energy has been consumed in making voids in the representation of this House. Where is the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay) to-day? Gone to his rewards—appointed collector of customs. Where is the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle)? Gone to his reward, also. Where is the hon. member for Soulanges (Mr. Bain)? Also gone to his reward. Where is the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Baker)? Gone to a sphere above. And the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Adams)? Also gone to a higher sphere. It is true that we still have with us my hon. friend from North Bruce. Under such circumstances, for my part, I think that, while it would be quite proper to grant an adjournment until tomorrow, it would be altogether antagonistic to the law of Parliament to have the adjournment extended to the time now asked by the Administration.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I think that on reflection my hon. friend will regret the expressions he has used in reference to the statement which I brought down. From the remarks which have fallen from him I take it that the hon. gentleman doubts the correctness or veracity of this statement.

Mr. LAURIER. No, no.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Then what could the hon. gentleman have meant when he stated that the cause of this demand which was made, the reason of this delay which was asked by the Government, was to allow organized conspiracies to be carried into effect? Now, I submit to both sides of the House that the statements which I have had the honour of laying before Parliament from the beginning of this crisis have been absolutely frank and have taken the House into the confidence of the Government to the fullest possible extent. The hon. gentleman says that the constitutional practice is that the adjournment should take place from day to day and not beyond. Well, Sir, I must say that, in so far as I have been able to look up precedents, I think that the practice is not limited to an adjournment from day to day; and I take it that in a contingency like the present one—and I think it would be very difficult indeed to find a precedent for this occasion—the duty of the House is to afford every possible facility to the head of the Government and to help him in re-forming the Government if it can be re-formed. I think that the only question that is left for the House to consider is whether the delay I have asked from to-day until three o'clock on Tuesday is an unreasonable delay. If it is an unreasonable delay it should not be granted. But I claim that, under the circumstances the delay which I have asked is more for the convenience of the members, while at the same time it will facilitate the work of the Premier by not putting him to the necessity of attending his parliamentary duties, but will allow him to go to work and ascertain, as well as is possible in that short time, whether he can reconstruct the Government or not. These, Mr. Speaker, are really the reasons why the delay is asked. The hon. gentleman has criticised the conduct of the Government in filling the vacancies which have occurred. I think that the Government were acting within their constitutional rights in filling vacancies and in carrying on the public business. The hon. gentleman knows that last session the Premier pledged himself to the House that these vacancies should be filled at the very beginning of the next—that is the present—session. For this reason, and in any case, the strictly constitutional duty as well as the undoubted right of the Government was to fill these vacancies. The Government has not ceased to be an advisory and executive body; it has not abdicated any of the privileges which it possessed previous to the crisis which has taken place. The hon. gentleman has referred to the statement made by the Premier yesterday that he hoped to-day to be able to give information in reference to the filling of the vacant portfolios. I think he has lost no time, he has shown how much in earnest he was in the promise he made to Parliament; for, ever since yesterday he has been in communication with His Excellency, and the result of these communications has been the statement which I have laid before you.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I had the honour last night to attend a sitting of the Senate and to listen to the official statement made by the leader of the Government there, and I am somewhat disappointed that the promise he then made in most equivocal language has not been implemented. I would like to know if the same statement read by the hon. leader of the House has been read by the Premier in the Senate.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, exactly the same.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I can hardly conceive, after the language the hon. Premier used last night—language used with great care and twice repeated—that he would positively make a statement with reference to filling up of the vacancies in the Government, how he could make a statement such as the hon. gentleman has read to this

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

House. There is no denying that that statement as read to this House alters the course which probably the Opposition would see fit to take upon this occasion. But I challenge, just at this moment, the correctness of two observations made by my hon. friend opposite (Sir Adolphe Caron). One was with respect to the construction he put upon the language by my hon. leader. I did not understand my leader to say that the purpose of asking the House to adjourn was to enable a conspiracy to be entered into with respect to the formation of a Government, but that the result of such adjournment would be to enable conspirators to carry out their designs. There is no one on either side of the House who doubts that there is at the present moment a vast conspiracy on foot to oust the present leader from his position and to prevent this House meeting to give an answer to the speech with which His Excellency opened the session. I have met no one in the House or out of it who doubts that such is the case. The men can be named, their names are mentioned in the daily press; the means they are taking to conspire, the persons they are using to carry out the conspiracy and to attain the object they have in view are well known. Nothing could be further from the thoughts of the hon. leader of the Opposition than that His Excellency or any one connected with him was a party to this object of this conspiracy. But what the hon. gentleman did say—and I do not know how the leader of the House could have misunderstood it—was that the result of this extended adjournment would be to give aid and comfort to these conspirators and to enable them to complete their nefarious work.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, Sir, "nefarious work" is a very strong expression to use, but I think that the circumstances quite justify it. This is not an attempt made by an organized Opposition to defeat the existing Government in a proper way. Why, Sir, we all welcome that, there is not a man on either side of the House but likes a fair, open fight. What is despised, and what ought to be looked down upon, is the attempt of those within the family circle to conspire against and to defeat their own leader and their own friends. There is another remark which fell from the hon. gentleman—passing from that branch of the subject entirely—which I would challenge; and I wish to observe that I am confining my remarks merely to the length the adjournment should take, and not discussing the many subjects to which I had hoped to call the attention of the House to-day. There is another observation which he made, and which I think on reflection he will see has not been well considered, and that is that it is for the convenience of members that this adjournment should take place. Now, the hon. gentleman must recollect that quite a large proportion of the members of this House are gentlemen who come from a very long distance. They cannot go home, they have got to remain here until Tuesday. I am speaking solely on the question of convenience which the hon. gentleman has advanced as one which ought to weigh the House in taking a course absolutely opposed to all former precedents. If I understand the hon. gentleman aright, the proposition laid down was this, that we were passing through a condition of affairs for which it was difficult to find a precedent. We acknowledge that, but there is no difficulty in our adopting the constitutional course, which I think I am right in saying has been almost invariable, that while a government is in process of construction and the House of Commons is sitting, adjournment should take place de die in diem. That is an almost absolute rule, and I think hon. gentlemen will find it exceedingly difficult to quote a precedent the other way. Now, we stand in that position, and the hon. gentleman advances the proposition that the adjournment is for the convenience of members. I challenge that proposition; I say it is not; I say it is distinctly for their inconvenience and disadvantage; and when you are asking us to violate a constitutional rule which has been most rigidly adhered to in Great Britain and her colonies, and to adopt a new, and I venture to say, a bad precedent, and when there is no other argument in support of it than the one which the hon. gentleman suggested, that it is for the convenience of members, I respectfully submit to him that it is not. I would urge upon him that since the leader of the Opposition has expressed his earnest desire to give every reasonable latitude to the Government in undertaking, in the peculiar circumstances in which they find themselves, to re-form the Government at the request of His Excellency, and while we are willing to do everything in our power reasonably to further those views, still the hon. gentleman ought not to ask us to join in setting a precedent which in itself is bad, and which will be quoted hereafter and have a bad effect on future occasions. The convenience of members is against it, parliamentary procedure is against it, the precedents are against it, and there is nothing I can see in favour of it at all. We can meet to-morrow, and the hon. gentleman, if he has made any progress then, can inform us; and the House will then be in a position, if called upon, to give advice to His Excellency from day to day. That is one of the rights of which this House is possessed, a right which we can exercise to-day, or can exercise to-morrow, that is, tendering respectfully to His Excellency any advice the House may see fit, or may be in a position to give. I am inclined to think that, if it were not for the message which has been read to-day, the House might have done that. The House will not, under the circumstances, do it now; but I say that to ask the House to adjourn for four or five days, when it will not be in a position to give the advice which it ought to give, if called for, is a course to which I hope the hon. gentleman will not press the House to accede, and one which, if he does press the House to accede to, the House will refuse to do so.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If I may be allowed one word in explanation—when I spoke of the convenience of members, I viewed it in this manner. First, most of the members leave town on Friday and return on Monday, and when I spoke of the convenience of members I thought that we were reducing the delay from the time which was mentioned in my motion that is now on the Order paper, to Tuesday instead of ten days, the delay which I originally asked for. Now, that is one of the reasons why I think that the delay we ask for now is the shortest possible delay that will meet the case. The hon. gentleman knows very well that we do not sit on Saturday, so that it is really only a delay of two sittings we ask for, in order to give the Premier an opportunity of re-forming his Government.

Mr. McCARTHY. For my part I do not quite understand the anxiety of the Government to obtain a delay or an adjournment of the House until next Tuesday. Speaking for myself, and echoing in that respect what has fallen from the opposite side of the House, I think the House is quite willing to give every indulgence and every facility to the Government in their difficult task, and in the very difficult position in which they have been placed. Then why should we depart from the well established constitutional rule? This is the great council of the nation. We are here to advise His Excellency, if necessary, and why we should be sent about our business in order that the Government may be filled up, or that the Government may fill up the vacant portfolios, is, under the circumstances, what I am unable to understand. I am quite free to admit that there are no precedents; and I quite agree with what has fallen from the hon. gentleman who is leading the House, that no precedent for the position can be found. We have a Government de jure; we have a Government, as I understand, de facto; and the only question that occurs to me is whether we will have a quorum of the House of Commons when we meet next Tuesday, if members are taken from the House to fill positions at the rate that has been going on for the last forty-eight hours. We have, therefore, a Government both de jure and de facto; and it is to be remembered that this is not a ministerial crisis in the ordinary sense, it is not the case of the resignation of a Minister, or the resignation of a Prime Minister, or of a new Prime Minister being asked to assume the responsibility of a Government; but we have a Government, and I am unable, I may add, to conceive why this long delay should be asked for, the Government having every office filled, either by a Minister or an acting Minister, and being able to carry on the affairs of the country, I am bound to say, more efficiently than has been done during the last thirteen months. So far as I can understand there has been more done in the last two or three days than has been done in the last thirteen months; and the very delay and the very difficulty which, we are told, induced these seven gentlemen to withdraw their confidence in their leader, seems, so far as I can judge by the result, to be caused by their presence in the Administration. While they were in, the Government could not go on, they were evidently blocking the way, nothing could be accomplished. So I would suggest to my hon. friend that, as we meet to-morrow, he intimate to the gentleman who is to move the reply to the Address, that he go on with his speech. It has been bottled up now so long that possibly it will have to be recast. I do not see why we should not at once go on with our business, and let this House discharge the duties which it has been called upon to discharge. I can certainly see no necessity on the part of the Government asking for any prolonged adjournment. I am quite satisfied that there is no independent member of the House, there is no member on the opposite side, so far as I learned from the language of the leader and of the hon. gentleman who followed him, disposed to throw any obstacle in the way of the Government. So far as I know the feelings of the House, it is prepared to give to the Administration every possible facility; and how they can be hampered, or how they can be prejudiced in any way by allowing the constitutional rule to prevail, is what for my part I cannot conceive.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that the request of the hon. leader of the House is an unreasonable request under the circumstances. This House is the great council of the nation, it is the most important body to advise His Excellency, known to our constitution. Under the circumstances it seems to me, when the Administration experiences a crisis such as that which has overtaken the present Government, it is of the first consequence that this House should sit from day to day. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman asks us not to meet to-morrow. Why not? If the Government are not prepared to go on with the public business because all the portfolios in the Government are not filled, that may be a reason for a further adjournment. I am sure that this House has no intention of interfering with the Government, or with the Prime Minister, in filling up the vacancies in the Administration; but this House ought not to abdicate its functions. It has important functions to discharge. The events which have happened since Parliament has been called together, and since the Speech from the Throne has been delivered, are of such a character as to make the House suspicious. The House does not know what may transpire next, and as we can only advise His Excellency in our capacity as members of the House collectively, it is of first consequence that we should meet from day to day whenever the sittings of the House, under our rules, come about. That being so, I think the leader of the House ought not to press his motion. He should consent to the House meeting to-morrow, and if the Government then requires further time to fill up the various vacancies in the Cabinet, further time will no doubt be given by the House. No one would put obstacles in the way. But events have been transpiring every day since we have met which are of very great consequence. We have seen three or four members taken from this House and translated to the other Chamber. We have had the announcement made that several hon. members who have seats in this House have been appointed to fill positions in the public service. I do not know whether those appointments have been confirmed or not. We may have information on that subject within the next twenty-four hours, and if we do not obtain such information, I think what has taken place calls for an expression of opinion on the part of this House. We are, Mr. Speaker, we know not what—whether this House is composed of members representing the constituencies whose electors sent us here, or whether it is composed of place-men of the Administration, or of that part of the Administration that still continues in office. Under the circumstances the leader of the House should not ask us to adjourn beyond to-morrow, and if then the Government have made progress in filling the vacancies, perhaps we may be able to go on with public business and answer the Speech from the Throne. But if the hon. gentleman is not, it may be that Parliament will require to consider other matters. The hon. gentleman knows right well that if a member has been promised an office and has agreed to accept that office, his seat becomes vacant whether he has been actually appointed to the office or not. We know that an hon. member sitting in the House of Commons years ago was named as Chancellor of the Exchequer; that he agreed to accept the office; that before the acceptance actually took place, His Majesty was unable to make the appointment; but nevertheless it was held that by his agreement to accept office his seat had become vacant, and he was obliged to retire and be re-elected, although he was elected as nothing more than a private member. The law is perfectly clear on this subject. I see hon. gentlemen sitting in the House to-day who, we have been informed, have been approached and promised offices under the Crown, and have agreed to accept those offices. In the face of events of this sort it is important that this House should meet from day to day. The liberties of the people, as well as the rights of the Prime Minister, are attacked in what is being done. This House has important duties to discharge, and if the House sits every day at the usual-hour it will be in a position to undertake the discharge of those duties if opportunity occurs. Under these circumstances I trust the leader of the House will not press his motion for an adjournment until Tuesday next.

Mr. WELDON. I hope the hon. gentleman now leading the Government will press the motion for adjournment, for the reason that the Prime Minister, who is responsible for the request made to the House, has declared that in his judgment it is necessary to ask for an adjournment over Friday, Saturday and Monday to enable him to reform the Administration. What possible good to any one, what possible protection to the public, what possible regard for public safety makes it necessary for hon. members to come here on Friday and again on Monday to meet and adjourn. I cannot understand. Time will be wasted. What we now desire is, that the crisis should be brought to an end at the earliest possible moment; and if the hands of the First Minister, who is now employed in the duty of reconstructing the Cabinet, would be more free and his attention be less distracted by the House adjourning two or three days—it being admitted that we are willing to give the hon. gentleman as many days as are asked, if the House meets from day to day—I see no good reason why the Minister who leads the House should consent to the request made by the leader of the Opposition. I think the adoption of the motion before the House would lead to the more rapid conclusion of the crisis, which all good Canadians must heartily desire.

Mr. EDGAR. With respect to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that no harm can happen by giving the Premier four days' delay, instead of the House meeting to-morrow, I would ask the hon. gentleman if any harm can arise by meeting to-morrow. The rules of the House say that the House shall do so under all ordinary circumstances. The members are all here; they have come to the capital to try and transact some business, or get some information for the country at all events, and not merely to knock their heels together around the hotels for four days. The balance of convenience is altogether against the contention of the hon. gentleman. If the leader of the House should come down at three o'clock to-morrow and state that no progress has been made, we want to know it, and the country wants to know it. On the other hand, if he is then able to say, as we all hope he will be able to say, that progress is being made, that satisfactory progress is being made, then the meeting of the House will stand over till Monday, and the Premier can go on with his work of reconstruction. Does the meeting of the House for a quarter of an hour to-morrow or for half an hour on Monday delay the Prime Minister in filling up vacancies in the Cabinet? Not one whit. It will accelerate the work; it will cause him to do his duty more rapidly and will hurry him up in discharging the duty of filling the Cabinet positions. I think the leader of the House should consider this matter, and not endeavour to take away the undoubted constitutional right of Parliament, that when a Ministry is being reconstructed or formed in the face of Parliament, members shall have the right to ask explanations as to the progress made from the representatives of the Government at the meeting of the House from day to day.

Mr. DAVIN. I hope the leader of the House will not press his motion. This Parliament is the Parliament that governs this country and not the Committee that we call the Government, which is a Committee of this Parliament. The reason I urge on my hon. friend who is leading the House not to press his motion is this: I must emphasize my opinion and enter my protest against the tendency that is noticeable in parliamentary life in Canada for Parliament to efface itself before the Government of the day. Any man who has observed the course of parliamentary institutions in this country for any length of time, and who has sat in the House for seven or eight years, as I have done, must have seen this—and it would be the same if parties crossed the floor, I have no doubt, it seems to be in the air and to belong to the country, and the sooner it is got rid of the better—that there is a constant tendency on the part of members of the dominant party to voluntarily efface themselves before the Government of the day. And we see a correlative impatience on the part of the Government of the day with the least assertion of the rights of Parliament on the part of their supporters. This Parliament is the Parliament concerned with the Government of Canada to-day, and we have a right, and it is our duty as well as our right, to know from day to day what progress is being made under the unhappy circumstances with which we are now face to face. And I say, Sir, that I am now not speaking more in the interests of parliamentary institutions, than—addressing my hon. friends who are around me—than in the interests of the Conservative party itself. If a proper regard had been had by the members of the Conservative party to their own dignity as members of this House, and if a proper regard had been shown by the Government of the day towards the members of that party, we should never have been face to face with such an unhappy and such an unprecedented crisis as meets us to-day. Sir, the people of this country are deeply concerned in the crisis that we are now called upon to humiliate ourselves as members of Parliament by observing. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has not been too strong in expressing his opinions on this subject, and the leader of the Opposition has, I think, very moderately requested the leader of the House to take the constitutional course. I will not discuss whether harm can come of it or not. I am quite sure of this, that it will be impossible for the leader of the House, or impossible even for my hon. and learned friend (Mr. Weldon, Albert), who is usually supposed to be an authority on constitutional questions; it will be impossible for him to show that any harm can come of it. What harm can come from the representatives of the people in this House, who are the source of power to which the Government must look, coming here from day to day, to know what progress has been made? I am not going to discuss, or to remark on the filling up of offices, further than to say that I regret to see these offices being filled up. I do not know whence the motive of the movement to fill up offices comes, but it is regrettable, and I do not think it is in the interest of the Government, or of the Parliament, or of the Conservative party. My desire is, that the party of which I am a humble member, the party that at this minute represents the people of Canada, the party that up to the present commands the confidence of the people, my desire is that it should guide the destinies of our people. I defy hon. gentlemen anywhere, in or out of this House, to show that the policy of the Conservative party at this moment is not a policy dear to the heart of Canada.

Mr. FORBES. You cannot vote for it yourself.

Mr. DAVIN. What is that? Speak up and let me hear.

Mr. FORBES. I say that the hon. gentleman dare not support the measure of the Government on remedial legislation.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, when the Government measure on remedial legislation, of which I know nothing—I have not seen it—when it is brought forward I will discuss it. I was speaking of the general policy of the Government. I did not expect to be challenged because I did not expect that anything of a party nature would be said here just now, but as I have been challenged, I will go further, and say that from a far larger point of view than the trade policy, from a point of view truly Imperial, it would be a disastrous thing if, at this minute, anything should occur that would place power in any other hands than in the hands of that party which has the instinct and tradition of Government, and has no undivided allegiance—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. The party which has no divided allegiance to the great Empire of which this Canada forms an important part. Now, Sir, I turn aside from these party amenities into which I have been unwillingly drawn. I hope that my hon. friend the leader of the House will not press the motion. I do not think that any leader of the House could object to the language or tone of the leader of the Opposition, and I entirely agree with the position that hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has taken in this matter.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire merely to say a few words. I heard with very great pleasure, indeed, the friendly and kindly remarks that have been made from the other side of the House on every occasion on which we have met here during this session, in reference to the leader of the Government. I would have appreciated those remarks still more highly had they been followed up to-day by deeds. All that is asked by the leader of the House is a very small matter, and I have not heard any argument whatever to show that the request made could do any harm to any interest in this country. It is asked that on Friday and on Monday this House should not sit. It is known that the House does not sit on Saturday or on Sunday, and when the suggestion is made by members on the other side that four days are asked for, that statement is a proof that their position in opposing the motion is a very weak one. Two days' adjournment is practically all that is asked. I am quite sure that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is wholly sincere in the kindly remarks he has made in reference to the hon. gentleman who leads the Government of this country to-day, under the very painful circumstances that exist. I would appeal to the leader of the Opposition to exercise his generosity in this matter, and to withdraw his objection to this very harmless and reasonable proposal. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) asked what harm can be done if the House does meet. I would answer him that the First Minister asks for this short adjournment in order that he may be better able to carry out the work he is engaged in, and unless some real danger can be shown, I do think that ordinary generosity might induce hon. gentlemen opposite to acquiesce in the request.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) tells us that the First Minister has sent a message to this House which asks that we stand adjourned for four days. The First Minister has not given us the reasons that moved him to make that request.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, he has.

Mr. MULLOCK. He has stated that he desires to reorganize the Cabinet, but he has not shown how the meeting of the House will embarrass him in that important work. The leader of the House says that it will serve the convenience of members if we adjourn. But what are we assembled at Ottawa for? Does Parliament exist for the convenience of members, or for the discharge of public duty? I was under the impression that our public duty was the first obligation upon us until this new doctrine is now laid down for our guidance. The leader of the House tells us that the situation is unparalleled. I admit that. It is not the first strike that has happened within the last few months in this Cabinet. The striking was inaugurated a few months ago by the late Minister of Justice. He struck. He returned to his allegiance for a short time, and, on being taken back, when he gave the bad example, that three months afterwards three other members of the Ministry went on strike. Two of them returned. To-day seven of them have followed that example, and perhaps want to return also. Is it to the interest of the country that we should facilitate this work of rebellion in the Cabinet? Not a gentleman charged has arisen to dispute or deny the charge of conspiracy. If there is a conspiracy against the liberties of the people, on what institution can the people depend for the defence of their liberties? The House of Commons? The House of Commons is the only instrument now existing to guard the rights of the people. The constitution demands that the House of Commons shall, every moment of time from now till this crisis is over, be in session to guard, if needs be, a weak Premier. We saw the late Finance Minister forty-eight hours ago arise in his place in this House and read a carefully prepared document discrediting the ability of his First Minister.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And his own, too.

Mr. MULLOCK. And he told us that he had only made that discovery after the Address from the Throne had been presented to Parliament. Sir, the flimsy excuse offered for the crisis that now exists discredits, in my judgment, the honesty of purpose of the Administration. A year ago as Premier they selected Sir Mackenzie Bowell. Not a stranger. He had been in public life for a generation. He had been a colleague of these gentlemen for a dozen years. He had been working side by side with them in the councils of the country, on the public platform, in Parliament—in every position which would enable them to test his capacity to fill the high office of Premier. When they took office under him thirteen months ago, did they not know as well as they know to-day his fitness for that office? How comes it that after thirteen months the late Finance Minister suddenly discovers that the First Minister lacked capacity for administering the affairs of the country? And what was the evidence the hon. gentleman furnished? That seven colleagues of the First Minister in the Cabinet were so rebellious that he could not keep them in order—that he could not extract from them that degree of usefulness to which the country was entitled; and their disobedience, their rebellious spirit, their treasonable conduct against the country, is the cause they assign. Instead of the First Minister being removed, these hon. gentlemen have overreached themselves and have removed themselves; and the highest interests of the country demand that these men, who have for the moment gone into the shade of a position they do not like, outside of the emoluments of office, shall be allowed to continue to enjoy that position. Mr. Speaker, we hear a great deal as to who is to succeed the First Minister if this conspiracy succeeds. They wish a change of allegiance, they wish to abandon King Log and serve under King Stork. However that may be, they feel for the moment that they are outside of the vineyard, and feeling that they have failed through the infirmity of their leader, they think, in the language of the blind poet, that they can wait in this outer place until some greater man restores them to the promised land. Such is their object in asking that Parliament shall now adjourn till Tuesday next. Sir, the circumstances of the case do not warrant us in allowing this conspiracy to succeed. It is a conspiracy most foul; no one has dared to stand up in this House and justify it. I ask the Finance Minister if he can tell us how these seven Ministers came to arrive at the conclusion, only forty-eight hours after Parliament assembled, that the First Minister was unfit for his place, and how came it that they did not find that out twelve months ago? Why did they not find it out nine months ago, when the ex-Minister of Justice struck? How comes it that in July last they did not find out his incapacity? How comes it that not until Parliament assembles and the Address from the Throne is delivered, and the affairs of the country are in a most critical state, have they decided almost to demand the surrender of the First Minister from his high office? Sir, the names of the men who have done that act will go down with dishonour to the history of our country. They have sought to destroy the usefulness of a public man who to that moment enjoyed the confidence of His Excellency. Sir, I ask in what position would the First Minister be were he to appeal to the country now, with the solemn written statement of his seven colleagues that he was unfit to take charge of the Government of the country? Was ever such a treacherous act committed before in any British country? You will search in vain for an instance in the past, and I trust that this will not furnish a precedent for the future. Under the circumstances I regret that I am unable fittingly to express my abhorrence of what has taken place. I trust that hon. gentlemen will take the will for the deed and give me credit for the desire to use whatever language the vocabulary of this House will permit in order to express my abhorrence and disapproval of these hon. gentlemen's action. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances we shall be permitted to stand guard here from day to day, over the rights of Parliament and the liberties of the people, until we have formed a strong, stable and effective Government. Sir, when we see the great party which Sir John Macdonald led to victory in 1891, with an overwhelming majority, to-day shattered, torn, divided by dissensions, weak and paralyzed, we know that there is but one source from which that strong and effective Government can be formed, and that is by the hon. leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) claims a monopoly for his friends of all the loyalty that is going. Sir, is it loyalty for the majority, the active part of a Government, when engaged in discharging Her Majesty's business, to rebel against Her Majesty? Talk of loyalty! Loyalty must begin at home. You must be loyal to the institutions under which you serve and to the country you belong to, otherwise your loyalty is, at the best, only lip-loyalty. Sir, Her Majesty's Opposition share in every sentiment of loyalty that may be in the breast of any good citizen of Canada; and I believe that Her Majesty's institutions would occupy a firmer position in Canada, were the administration of the Government now in the hands of the loyal Opposition led on by the first man in Canada to-day, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier).

Mr. COCKBURN. It is to me a source of much gratification to find such exuberant declarations of overflowing loyalty coming from the lips of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). And I am sure that it must be a source of unfeigned pleasure to all of us to see on the part of Her Majesty's Opposition such an exhibition of loyalty as that to which they have just treated us and which has forced them to constitute themselves the special guardians of the liberties of this country and the guardians of the privileges of every citizen of the Dominion. I only regret that our country has been so unappreciative of their efforts as not to have understood apparently the depth of the feeling that moves them, and has not set sufficient value on their exuberant loyalty to send them here in larger numbers to protect the constitution. Their loyalty seems to-day, however, to be centred, to a very large extent, on the hon. gentleman who leads this Government. I must say that, for my part, hearing the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) dilate on the many noble qualities which characterize our Premier, hearing him declare that for the last thirty years our Premier has filled every office under the Crown, to the greatest satisfaction of the country and the benefit of the Dominion, I fail to understand how, in the name of common sense, he can ask us to refuse the request of our Premier for a two days' adjournment. If the First Minister has given us for thirty years the strongest assurances that he has the welfare of his country at heart, if he has risen superior to all temptations and stands before the country with an unblemished reputation, how can the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) ask us for one moment to believe that this same First Minister desires a two days' adjournment in order that he may give license to conspirators. The supposition is monstrous and absurd. If we will only bring a little common sense to bear on the question, we shall easily arrive at a reasonable conclusion. If it is so necessary that this House should be in session every day to watch what is being done by the Premier of this country, would it not be well that some self-sacrifice should be made by Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, and that the proposal should come from them that we should sit here, not only on Friday and on Monday, but on Saturday and on Sunday as well? It is surely a religious duty to watch the interests and the rights of our fellow citizens. We are sent here for that purpose; and if we cannot trust the Government for two short days, surely it becomes us not to leave them free on Saturday and Sunday to further the work of the supposed unhallowed conspiracy. I cannot but regard the action taken by the leader of the Opposition as a tactical blunder, for I can assure him that if he will press his resolution to a vote, he will rouse such a feeling on the part of the Conservative party, under the present circumstances, as will show the whole country that the confidence of this House still remains with the Conservative party.

Mr. LISTER. It seems to me that several of the gentlemen who have spoken misapprehend the position of the Opposition and do not appear to thoroughly understand the question which the House is now discussing. It is not a question of expediency; it is not a question of antagonism to the present leader of the Government or to the Government as it at present exists. It is a question of law. It may be that in future years such a good, noble and upright Government as we have to-day will not be in existence. It may be that such a Government will be here as we shall not be in a position to trust; and if you once change the law of Parliament by breaking the well established rule on this occasion, on some future occasion, instead of an adjournment of four days, an adjournment of four weeks or even four months may be required. For wise reasons the law of Parliament is that when a crisis occurs while Parliament is in session, Parliament shall continue sitting from day to day in order to be informed by the Government as to what progress is being made in the reconstruction of the Cabinet. So it is out of no feeling of antagonism to the leader of the Government or any member of the Government that the Opposition take the stand they do, but it is as a matter of right and law settled by well established precedent. It is the right of the people's representatives to remain here until the Government has been re-formed, and it is the right of the people to be informed through Parliament, from day to day, of what progress is being made in reconstruction. We have no desire to throw any obstacle whatever in the way. On the contrary, we desire to assist the First Minister in every way possible. But what the Government wants to do is to take away from Parliament the right which our constitution gives us, of being informed from day to day as to what progress has been made in the re-formation of the Cabinet. It may be that no exigency will arise which will require Parliament to advise His Excellency. It is unlikely that it will. But if you disregard the plain law of Parliament you make that law of no value; and as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says, the Government have been practically ignoring Parliament. If we permit the Government to take this position, we will be practically condoning their course of assuming the power of Parliament instead of merely recording its wishes. Sir, the First Minister of this country is entitled to the sympathy of the members of this House and of the country at large. We find that he is to-day attempting to reorganize his Cabinet. We find that this man who was accepted by his colleagues as the one man fit to fill the place which the late Sir John Thompson vacated, whom the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) and the late Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) said throughout the country, up to a few days ago, was eminently fit for the position he occupies, now attacked and called upon to resign by these men on the ground of incompetency. We find the members of the Crown sitting at the Council table and drafting the Address which has been presented to this House and read by His Excellency; we find measures introduced into this House indicated in that Address; we find Parliament meeting here; and yet in the face of all this and in the face of the statement of the Ministers of the Crown made throughout the country, at the last elections, over and over again, that the Government was a unit upon every public question and that every member of the Government had unbounded confidence in the First Minister, we find that seven of these Ministers of the Crown, after Parliament has met, send in their resignations and withdraw from the Government on the ground that the First Minister is mentally incapable of governing this country. The evidence all points to the fact, beyond any question, that the First Minister has been made the victim of the blackest political conspiracy that Canadian or English history has ever known. Sir, we can read between the lines; we can draw the necessary deductions from a certain state of facts. We find that the High Commissioner is brought over here ostensibly for the purpose of advising the First Minister as to the fast line and cable schemes. These were mere devices. The plot had been hatched long before Sir Charles Tupper came to this country. The man who leads this Government was persuaded into the belief that it was necessary, for the purpose of ripening these schemes, that Sir Charles Tupper should come to this country, when, as a matter of fact he came here to carry out and give effect to the conspiracy. Sir, he came and the hands of the evil geni can be seen in what takes place from that moment forward. When was it that these men made up their minds that they would abandon their leader and destroy the Government? Sir Charles Tupper, it was announced, would sail for England again. He ought to be in England to-day discharging his public duties. He is a servant of this country as much as any civil servant employed in these buildings. He draws from the coffers of this country $10,000 a year and expenses. We find him here, a public servant, paid by the public of Canada, plotting against the Administration of the day and seeking to become the First Minister of Canada—to carry out, it may be, the wild schemes that characterized him when he was a member of the Administration of this country? When Sir Charles Tupper comes, what do we find? Why, seven Ministers of the Crown send in their resignations to the old Prime Minister, and they insult him by telling him that he is mentally unfit to lead such intellectual giants as have been associated with him for a number of years past. Evidently, they reckoned without their host. The Prime Minister did not capitulate, he did not say: I am willing to degrade myself; I am willing to go out and let somebody else come in. He has clung to the helm of the ship of state—and that is the trouble. Now, the Prime Minister should have time to reorganize his Administration. No member on this side of the House desires that that time shall be denied him. But, Sir, what we do contend is that the law of Parliament is explicit that during a crisis of this kind Parliament should meet from day to day. What the Government propose is that the law of Parliament shall be disregarded and that the House shall be adjourned for a fixed period. While there may be no danger to-day in breaking the law of Parliament, we must remember that if this precedent is once established and it is declared lawful to adjourn for four days, it can, without violation of the principle thus established, be declared lawful to adjourn for a week or for four weeks. The safe course to pursue is to follow the law as we have received it, particularly when no harm can be done, and no obstacle is thrown in the way of the First Minister, but every move is facilitated for doing what he wishes to do and what, in the interests of the country, he ought to do. There can be no sound reason for the Government asking for the adjournment which the leader of the House asks, and I think the hon. gentleman should yield to the request, made not only by those on this side of the House, but by some of his own followers, that the usual course should be pursued and this House should meet from day to day, accepting from the Government the fact, if it should be a fact, that they have not yet formed their Administration, and giving them from time to time such delay as they may require for the purpose of accomplishing that object. I think, Sir, the hon. gentleman is making a mistake in forcing the House to vote upon this question, seeing that the meeting of the House from day to day can do no harm and that it will be in accordance with the law of the land.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The practical difference between adjournment from day to day and adjournment from now till Tuesday is comparatively trifling, and because it is comparatively trifling, there is all the more reason why the constitutional rule should not be departed from. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) made a remark which this House would do well to bear in mind, to the effect that this House followed too much the custom of effacing itself and allowing the executive to govern without regard to parliamentary rule, and not only without regard to parliamentary rule, but in defiance of constitutional usage. I will not go into that subject now, otherwise it might be shown that this Government, which is so ready now to lay aside constitutional rule, only a little while ago was willing to carry out what they claimed to be a constitutional rule with regard to the legislation concerning Manitoba schools, in which case they falsely alleged that the constitution compelled them to do something which, even though against their own convictions, they had decided to do. It is for that reason that every opportunity should be taken by this House to assert its rights and powers and privileges. Especially as it causes no public inconvenience there is all the more reason why, on the present occasion, hon. members should not accede to the request of the hon. gentleman who now leads the House. But the hon. member for West Assiniboia made another remark with which I cannot so entirely coincide. The hon. gentleman spoke of the devotion to Imperial interests shown by the gentlemen on this side of the House. He laid great stress upon the long tradition and long experience of the Conservative party in governing this country. I am not going to enter into this question so far as the traditions of the past and the history of the country are concerned; but, Sir, it was a very extraordinary thing, in view of such a remark, to find that at the very time when the Empire was threatened from every quarter, when danger was apparently near us, these hon. gentlemen, who are said to be so careful for the Imperial interests, should choose that particular moment to bring their cabal to a head. Sir, it is a comparatively unimportant matter to this House, and a comparatively unimportant matter to this country, whether these hon. gentlemen who are now engaged in what I think has been justly termed a conspiracy had the right to disagree with their leader or not. It is a trifling matter whether there were domestic circumstances which justified the break up of the Government. It may be that their contention is correct; it may be that they found from experience, though they showed it in a most extraordinary fashion, that their leader was incompetent to carry on the affairs of the country. But it is a most extraordinary state of affairs and discredits these gentlemen who pretend to be so careful on Imperial interests, that they should choose such a moment to break up the Government which, if it was capable of carrying on affairs before was capable of continuing still longer. Where do we find the Finance Minister at the time when it was of the utmost importance to the Empire that all its resources should be most readily available? Instead of attending to his duty we find him carrying on a conspiracy which, so long as his name remains upon the roll of Parliament, will be to him a disgrace. Where was the Minister of Militia at the time when the resources of the country might have been required for the maintenance of Imperial interests? Instead of devoting himself to the best husbanding and arrangement of our resources, unfortunately for his reputation, he was also a party to this cabal. Where was the Minister of Railways at the time when the means of communication throughout Canada were of the utmost importance in the Imperial interest? Instead of being at his post and attending to the duties of his department, which might, at any moment, have become most important, he, also, was carrying on this same conspiracy and this same cabal. Other members of the Government, of less note, whose duties were, perhaps, less important, also allowed themselves to be led into the same undertaking. Sir, it does not lie in the mouths of any hon. gentlemen who talk about their devotion to Imperial interests, to defend, or excuse, or palliate in the slightest degree, the conduct of gentlemen who took this particular moment, one of the most critical in the history of Canada, to show their devotion to the Empire by breaking up a Government whose duty it was, regardless of all minor considerations, regardless of all personal considerations, regardless of all those disputes which may arise in a Government for the time being, at any rate, to carry on the affairs of the Government until a fitting time came to resign their positions. They should have settled their differences before Parliament met, but, having allowed Parliament to meet, they certainly showed how little regard they had for anything beyond their own petty personal interests, their own petty political ambitions, when they chose that particular moment to break up the Government and render it impossible for it to carry on the affairs of the country.

Mr. TARTE. The result of the elections in Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier has brought on this ministerial crisis. The First Minister did not go to Montreal Centre, nor did he go to Jacques Cartier. Nearly all the other Ministers came down. The ex-Finance Minister came, and made several magnificent speeches. The ex-Minister of Justice came to Jacques Cartier, and he made a magnificent speech. My hon. friend the leader of the House also came down to Jacques Cartier and made a magnificent speech. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works also came down and made a magnificent speech. My hon. friend the Secretary of State came also. I had the honour to meet him, and he also made a very good speech. All those members, past and present, of the Administration, came down and made magnificent speeches, but the Prime Minister did not come. They lost the battle. Sir, I rise from my seat as one who took a large share in those two elections, and I say that the electors did not vote against the Prime Minister, they voted against the whole Administration. I was surprised when I read, in more than one paper, I am sorry to say, that it was French Quebec which was rallying round the leader of the Opposition. Montreal Centre, as every one knows, is composed of many races. Take, for instance, the Board of Trade. Out of the whole Board of Trade, composed of English members almost exclusively, there were not twelve men who voted for my hon. friends. Sir, it was a square fight on our part, at any rate. Was it a square fight on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite? I listened to several of their speeches. They resorted to the worst possible appeals, to racial passions and prejudices.

Mr. DEVLIN. They charged us with doing so.

Mr. TARTE. They said to the Roman Catholic electors of Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier: If you do not vote for the Administration and their candidates, you won't get any remedial legislation. Ministers of the Crown spoke in that way; members of the House used that language. We used the language of toleration, we used the language of moderation. Now, what has taken place? Seven Ministers of the Crown, exactly the number of bolters to-day, came to Montreal Centre and to Jacques Cartier. They said they were taking their lives in their hands on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority. What is the result of those two elections? The day after the election, we read in the ministerial press that the Protestant members of the Administration had made up their minds that there would be no remedial legislation. That language of the "Mail" and of the Montreal "Gazette" was not disclaimed. But what have we seen since? Seven members of the Administration, seven Protestant members of the Administration, I am sorry to say, went out, dividing, thereby, the country into religious factions. Still they claim that they are the loyal party. The facts are there, Mr. Speaker; I wish I were wrong, but the facts are there. We are face to face with those facts. We do not know the whole truth—we know it, but it was not written in the document which was read by the ex-leader of the House. The real facts are—let us state them like men—that my hon. friend and his colleagues do not want to carry out the pledges they have solemnly made during the last session of Parliament. Instead of coming out like men, and saying: We cannot do what we have pledged ourselves to do, they knife their own Prime Minister. That is the position, as every one knows. Now, Sir, the name of the High Commissioner has been mentioned. I have been one of his followers in times past. I know him well. He is an able man, and I am only sorry for one thing, and that is that he happens to be in Canada when such a crisis has arisen. He should not be here, Sir, and every loyal man—I use the word in the best sense—and every Conservative, should be of my opinion. Here is a man occupying the dignified position of High Commissioner, and we hear him accused of conspiracy. One thing is perfectly sure, and that is, that the members who have gone out of the Administration are trying to put him at their head. I have been surprised at the new doctrine that has been propounded in this Parliament. Some hon. gentlemen have said that the Conservative party have a right to choose their own leader; that is to say, their own Prime Minister. Sir, if there is a well-established doctrine, it is that the sovereign is entirely and absolutely free in the choice of his Prime Minister. The ex-leader of the House has said in the paper which he read to the House, that the Conservative party are prepared to form a new Government. He has no right to make such a statement. In the first place, he was not speaking in the name of the Conservative party. The Conservative party is not composed of seven men, or even ten or twelve. The Conservative party is composed of the members of the House now sitting here. Are the members of the Conservative party in the House in a position to give their opinion to-day? Are they prepared to stand up in their places, and to take a vote, and to advise His Excellency in the choice he should make? None of those hon. gentlemen would dare to do it. The ex-leader of the House has made an undignified statement, as it has been qualified by his leader, an unconstitutional statement. Sir, we are face to face with a grave crisis. What I have said is perfectly true. The members who have gone out of the Administration happen to be Protestants, and nearly all the members which have remained faithful to the Prime Minister are Roman Catholics. That fact cannot be ignored, and the members of the Administration who have gone out must bear in history the responsibility of having divided this country on religious lines. I hope their scheme will not succeed, and I do not say so for the sake of my party. We are prepared to defeat hon. gentlemen opposite in the open field. Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier have given the keynote. Let hon. gentlemen opposite dissolve the House, and instead of knifing their friends let them come into the open field, and they will be defeated. But I beg of them, because I belong to the minority, not to divide this country on religious lines. When there was a crisis in this House last year three Roman Catholic members of the Cabinet went out of the Administration. Two of them subsequently returned; and what did they say? They told the House that during this session a remedial law would be introduced. The same pledge given either verbally or in writing has been circulated from one bishop's palace to another in the province of Quebec. I and my Liberal colleagues have been accused of being traitors to our race and our religion. Accused by whom? By Ministers of the Crown and by their organs. And now to-day we are face to face, I repeat, with a party divided on religious lines. I did not intend to take any part in this debate; but when I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) speaking of the Conservative party, constituted as it is to-day, as the only party which could be loyal and which could govern Canada, I said to myself that it was time that in the name of my electors, I should rise and declare that the Conservative party as it is to-day is surely not the party to which some of us belonged not very long ago. Under Sir John A. Macdonald was there ever such a shameful crisis as the one with which we are now face to face? Under Sir John Thompson was there anything like it? Under Sir George E. Cartier did anything of this kind occur? What do we see to-day? That party which believes itself to be the only one capable of governing Canada, is unable to find among its members in both Houses a man who can be placed at the head of affairs, and that party is trying to impose on His Excellency a man who is not supposed to be here. The High Commissioner is not supposed to be in this country, but he is supposed to be at his post. By what right is the leader of the Government or any member of the Conservative party entitled to impose upon His Excellency a man who is not even a member of either House. I resume my seat expressing the hope that the country will be taught a lesson by this crisis, and that the people will learn to watch their rulers with the greatest care. In this aspect of the case I quite agree with my hon. friend before me (Mr. Davin). Members of the Conservative party during the past years have forgotten that they were representing the people, and I know there are in the country thousands of Conservatives who are to-day rallying around the banner of my hon. friend because they did not find on the other side of the House that security which existed in past days.

Mr. DEVLIN. I do not rise for the purpose of taking any extensive part in the debate that has arisen on the motion for adjournment, but I desire simply to correct an impression which has been created by a recent discourse of the ex-Minister of Justice. I rise in view of the statement just made by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) in regard to appeals made to the feelings of race and of creed. It is true, I attended a meeting in the town of Lachine at which the ex-Minister of Justice was present. I had the pleasure of listening to his able discourse on that occasion, and I was led to reply to a few points made by him. But the ex-Minister of Justice will bear me out in this statement, that on that occasion I never said a single word against the present Premier of Canada because of his having been connected with the Orange order, nor a single word in favour of my leader in this House because of the fact that he is of Catholic allegiance and of French birth. I did not do so, and the ex-Minister of Justice knows it perfectly well. Nevertheless, if I am to believe what has appeared in the newspapers, on the very day following the Minister of Justice, speaking in a constituency in which the majority of the electors belong to a religion and race entirely different from the electors whom he addressed in Lachine, stated that Mr. Brodeur and Mr. Devlin made appeals when in the province of Quebec based on the racial origin and faith of their leader and declared against the Premier because of the fact that he was an Orangeman. I think it is only proper in view of the statements made by the hon. member for L'Islet, that I should have the opportunity of denying that accusation. I never made such declarations, and if the ex-Minister of Justice made in Cardwell the statement attributed to him, he made an assertion that was entirely wrong and inaccurate. There was no necessity for making such an appeal on the occasion referred to. What were the facts? We witnessed a delightful scene in the town of Lachine on that memorable evening. We had with us the present ex-Minister of Justice, who was then Minister of Justice. We had also the present Minister of Public Works. The ex-Minister of Justice opened the meeting by stating the position of the Government in regard to its policy on the Manitoba school question. He said, come what might, no matter what might arise, the Government would adhere to its policy of remedial legislation. It mattered not what difficulties might arise. It mattered not what might transpire, the policy of remedial legislation would be brought before this House, and if necessary the Government would fall by it or triumph by it. I look to-night at the gentleman who was then Minister of Justice, and I have every reason to ask him, is it his intention to have remedial legislation passed? Mr. Speaker, not only during the late recess of Parliament, but during the last five years, we have made the charge that the Government never intended doing justice to the minority in Manitoba. What are the facts? Those representing the Catholic minority of Manitoba, when the legislation of 1890 had been passed asked this Government to disallow these Acts of which they complained. The Government of that time did nothing. It is true an election was coming along and the impression was circulated throughout the province of Quebec that the law would be disallowed, whereas in the province of Ontario an entirely different impression was created by the speeches delivered by the hon. gentlemen supporting the Administration. The elections passed and the Catholic people of Manitoba had been humbugged. They were advised to go from court to court until finally they obtained a verdict in their favour from the highest tribunal in the land. Then it was that this Government assured them that in obedience to the judgment there delivered, justice would be done. This session was called for the purpose of doing justice to the Catholic minority of Manitoba by the Government of the day. It was not called for the purpose of showing what conspiracies could exist and did exist within the ranks of the Government, but simply for the purpose of righting what they claimed, and what I claim to have been a great wrong. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, was there ever such a wrong perpetrated upon any people as that which has been perpetrated by the ex-Minister of Justice and his bolting colleagues upon the Catholic people of the province of Quebec? Why was it that they put that speech in the mouth of His Excellency when they knew that they were about to bolt? Why is it that they advised His Excellency to call this Parliament together for the purpose of passing a great act of legislation when they knew perfectly well that they had not the slightest intention of passing that Act? Why is it that they called Parliament together, bringing members from every part of Canada, simply to trifle with them as they have been doing during the last four days? Why is it that they trifle as they have been doing with that large class of the community having business with the Parliament of Canada? Is Parliament simply to be a witness to the antagonism which exists among members of the Administration? We are here, representatives of the people, in response to the call of His Excellency, anxious to transact the business for which Parliament was called, and what do we find? We find that the gentlemen who advised His Excellency to call Parliament together know not what their own mind is, and know not for what purpose they did call Parliament together. This, Sir, is perhaps as sad a condition of affairs as can be found anywhere. I would like to ask the present Minister of Public Works, if he could stand upon the floor of Parliament to-day, as I saw him stand up at Lachine a few days ago, and thank the ex-Minister of Justice for his attitude on the question of remedial legislation? Only two weeks ago the Minister of Public Works stood before a large audience in the town of Lachine and gave his thanks in most profuse language to the ex-Minister of Justice for his noble stand, for his spirit of generosity to the Catholic minority, and for the fact that he was ready to sacrifice his political life to uphold the principles of the constitution. I ask the Minister of Public Works to stand up to-day in the Parliament of Canada and to repeat those thanks to his late colleague the ex-Minister of Justice. Can the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ouimet) to-day thank the ex-Minister of Justice for what he has done for the Catholic minority? This is the place and this is the time, if such thanks can be given with any degree of sincerity. I can understand what the confusion of the Minister of Public Works must be now. I believe in my heart that the Minister of Public Works thought that night, that the Minister of Justice was sincere, and I sympathize with him in the downfall of his hopes and of his aspirations. Mr. Speaker, I simply rose for the purpose of correcting the impression which had been created by the speech of the ex-Minister of Justice in Cardwell. No, Sir; not in Montreal Centre, and not in the county of Jacques Cartier did we make appeals to feelings of race and religion. Our opponents did that. Our opponents conducted in Montreal Centre the most despicable campaign which was ever conducted in this country. We knew what they could do, but we placed our trust in the good sense and in the judgment of the people of Montreal, and, Sir, we have seen the most gratifying results. We appealed solely on the ground that no faith could be placed in the gentlemen who then composed the Administration, because of the fact that they were not sincere in the promises they made. And, Sir, as we view that decimated Administration, that weak and vacillating Administration, that Administration shorn of its strongest elements (that is if we are to believe the ex-Minister of Finance, because he claims all the intelligence of the late Government for the "bolters")—we are satisfied that the people understood what we told them. We claimed that no faith could be placed in them. Were we wrong when we claimed that it was not a capable Government? Were we wrong when we claimed it was not a strong Government? The other day we witnessed the Minister of Finance in this House stating: We have resigned because we have not strength, and because we are incapable to govern this country. That bore out the truth of our claims in Montreal Centre. We insisted that the Government were incapable of governing the country, because we pointed out the proportions of the national debt, we pointed out the immense amount of money which had gone into wrong channels; we pointed out the long list of scandals, and we added that the Government were unable to show a good record of administrative ability. We pointed out that the ex-Minister of Finance has a worse financial record than any man who ever had charge of the finances of this country. We affirmed that that gentleman in one short year built up a deficit of five million dollars, and if he touches a deficit at all it has got to be five millions. The people of Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier understood the truth of these statements, and the answer they gave to them has smashed the Administration to-day. Mr. Speaker, we appealed to the electors of Montreal Centre on good honest grounds. We explained what the platform of the Liberal party was. They understood what it was. They appreciated the platform of the Liberal party. They understood that if this country is to be honestly governed, it must not be governed by men who are constantly boasting of their loyalty when there is treason in their hearts, even against their own leader; for men who have treason in their hearts against their own leader cannot be expected to be loyal to their country. More than that, I would point out this fact to the ex-Minister of Justice, that in that very election of Jacques Cartier, where he claims appeals were made by the Liberal party to Roman Catholics and French-Canadians, the majority of the English Protestants voted against the Administration. That is about as good an answer, I think, as he could wish to his statement in Cardwell.

Mr. DEVLIN.

No, Sir, we are quite satisfied that if we could only have the happiness of a dissolution of this Parliament to-morrow, there will not be here at the next session of this House any such men as the bolters, and much less the present Government.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, there is just one phase of this question which has not been thought about, that is, that if the time of the present leader of the Government is necessary for the reconstruction or the filling up of the Cabinet, much more time has been taken up in the discussion this afternoon than the next two sittings of the House would have taken. But, so far as that question is concerned, I am not going to discuss it further than this: I understand that it is unconstitutional to adjourn otherwise than from day to day; but on that question, I, individually, am perfectly content to throw the entire responsibility upon the Government. There is just one other word I desire to say, that is, that recently I had the pleasure of attending several meetings in company with the hon. leader of the Opposition, both in Roman Catholic and Protestant constituencies. As I have the pleasure of understanding the French language about as well as the English language, although, unfortunately, I cannot speak it as well, I can certify that on no occasion at any meeting did the hon. leader of the Opposition divert from the one course. He dealt with questions in exactly the same way before a Protestant community as he did before a Roman Catholic community. I was also a witness of the contest in Montreal Centre, and I can state, and verify the statement most fully, that so far as the Liberal party is concerned, questions of race, nationality or religion did not, in any sense, enter into the contest.

Motion to adjourn until the 14th inst. agreed to, on division.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 5.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 14th January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 14) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: This is the same

Bill that I introduced last session, and it is for the purpose of making it plain that railway companies shall not furnish passes to enable electors to attend the polls. Our law has been uncertain on this subject, while the provincial law has been settled. I think it is important, in view of the near approach of an election, that it should be perfectly clear that railway companies shall not have the right to furnish passes under these circumstances and that electors shall not have the right to accept passes from the railway companies when about to attend the polls. The Bill is also intended to prevent what is commonly known as "plugging," and to give facilities for the arrest of personators.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 15) to amend the North-west Territories Act. He said: The purpose of this Bill is to confer upon the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories full and complete power in the matter of education.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 16) to amend the Act respecting the House of Commons. He said: This is a Bill which I trust I shall have the opportunity to press through. The important provision of the Bill is that when a vacancy occurs in the House of Commons, the effect of the Speaker's warrant shall not be delayed or intercepted by the failure of the Government to name a day for the election and to appoint a returning officer. The Bill provides that if the Government do not appoint a day within a certain time after the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery receives your warrant, Mr. Speaker, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall direct his writ to the sheriff, or, if there be more than one sheriff in the county, to one of the sheriffs, and that the election shall take place within a given time. The object, of course, is to prevent the abuse which, I am sorry to say, has prevailed under the present law. We have had elections fixed by the Government with reference only to their own interest, or what they supposed to be their interest, and without the slightest regard to the power of this Parliament. Above all things this Parliament ought to recognize the fact that it is the supreme body in the state, and this conduct on the part of the Government is an insult which we ought to take the earliest opportunity of resenting, and the power which the Government seeks to exercise of controlling this House is one of which we ought to deprive them at the earliest moment.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

VOTING BY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. RIDER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 17) to facilitate voting by employees at the elections of members of the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MINISTERIAL RESIGNATIONS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to express my regret that I am not in a position to-day to make a final announcement in reference to the reconstruction of the Cabinet. The negotiations are almost completed, and, to-morrow at three o'clock when the House meets, I have no doubt I shall be in a position to announce definitely that the Cabinet is reconstructed. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the House adjourns I wish to make a statement. An article appeared in the "Mail and Empire" on Saturday last in which reference was made to the anonymous letters attention to which has been called in this House. In that article it is stated that there is one man in this country who has particular reasons to feel uneasy. I have been told by several members of the House of Commons that it has been freely stated that I am the one man referred to in the article which has appeared in the "Mail and Empire." From the rumours that are industriously circulated and what has previously appeared in print I have come to the conclusion that there is no doubt that I am the person alluded to and aimed at in the statement which I have just read, and I have, further, no doubt from what I have heard, but I make the statement subject to contradiction, that these rumours and the statement in the Government organs have originated with the Minister of Railways and Canals. I allude to the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), who, I understand, is Minister of Railways and Canals to-day. Under these circumstances I have deemed it right to add to the formal and explicit denial that I gave to the House respecting these anonymous letters on Thursday last a full statement of all the facts and circumstances in connection wherewith that have come to my knowledge.

Some time in the latter part of June or in the early part of the month of July last, as I was returning home from the House of Commons I was accosted by Sir Adolphe Caron, then Postmaster General. He told me that there was a conspiracy of the vilest kind against him for the purpose of driving him out of the Government and ruining his character. He went on to explain that this conspiracy had been carried out by the writing of an anonymous letter to the Prime Minister which charged him with having received the bribe in connection with the Montreal Belt Line Railway of $15,000 or $20,000. In answer to my inquiries he stated that he suspected Haggart and Montague, to use his own words, of "being at the bottom of it." I asked him why Haggart or Montague should seek in this way to ruin him? To which he replied that some time previous to the receipt of the anonymous letter, he and the then Minister of Railways and Canals had had sharp differences as to the composition of the Cabinet. And Sir Adolphe Caron added that he was looking round to try and ascertain who it was that harboured such feelings against him as would make them resort to such means to ruin him, and he could think of no others than Haggart and Montague. He said that he had obtained affidavits and papers and had cleared himself from the imputations contained in the letter to the satisfaction of both His Excellency the Governor General and the Prime Minister, and he proposed to bring the anonymous letter to me and the letters and papers which had satisfied the Governor General and Sir Mackenzie Bowell that he was innocent of the charge made in it. I had not heard anything of this matter prior to this interview, nor had I, in fact, seen Sir Adolphe Caron, except casually, in connection with my departmental business.

A day or two afterwards he brought me to his room in the House and showed me the anonymous letter and also the other documents, which he read to me, and he asked me as to whether I had any opinion as to the writer of the anonymous letter. I saw the letter then for the first time, and I was impressed with the idea that the letter was in the handwriting of Dr. Montague. This opinion I mentioned to Sir Adolphe Caron, saying that I thought his suspicions were correct.

The next that took place in connection with the matter was Sir Adolphe Caron coming to my office with the letter and asking me to compare it with the letters which I had in my department from Dr. Montague. This I did and I became more firmly convinced than ever that the anonymous communication was in Dr. Montague's handwriting. He suggested that it would be better to have the letter submitted to an expert in handwriting and I, with his knowledge and at his request, showed the letter to gentlemen whose names I do not feel at liberty to mention without their consent, but who are perfectly well known to Sir Adolphe Caron, and they were of the opinion, without doubt, that the anonymous letter was written by Dr. Montague, and they came to this conclusion on the comparison of Dr. Montague's letters which were then submitted to them.

Sir Adolphe Caron was not yet satisfied, and he suggested that it would be better to have the opinion of the best expert that could be procured. He ascertained that Mr. Ames, of New York, was an expert in the matter of handwriting, well known and much thought of, and a man of the highest reputation in his profession. Sir Adolphe Caron caused a photographic copy of the anonymous letter, and six letters which undoubtedly were written by Dr. Montague, to be sent to Mr. Ames for the purpose of ascertaining from him, whether in his opinion, the writer of the six letters was the writer of the anonymous letter. These six letters I have now in my hand and they are subject to the inspection of Dr. Montague or of any hon. member of the House who desires to see them, and if deemed proper they will be laid upon the Table of the House, but, as some of them are private in their nature, I do not feel at liberty to do that without the consent of the writer. The opinion of Mr. Ames is contained in the following communication, part of which I now read, omitting the comparisons made by him which are unnecessary to read, but which I am quite willing to do if any hon. member desires it; they deal with the comparison of the various letters and the style of writing and are somewhat technical in their nature. I will read a portion only of the report of Mr. Ames, who, I am since informed, stands at the very highest mark of his profession, and I have the words of one of the most eminent barristers in Canada that on Mr. Ames' opinion he would willingly take a brief and be quite positive. This is Mr. Ames' report:

New York, 11th July, 1895.

This is to certify that I have made careful examination of the writing upon a photograph of an anonymous writing, dated Montreal, 18th December, 1894, addressed "Dear Mr. Bowell," and marked by me for identification Aa. That I have made careful comparison of this writing with that upon six other sheets marked by me for identification, A1 to A6 inclusive, and that I reached a very clear conviction that all the said writings were written by one and the same person, writing Aa being disguised. I reached this conclusion from the very numerous coincident and highly personal and peculiar characteristics I find throughout the two sets of writings. Writing Aa is in what tends to be a back-hand, but of so vacillating a character as to make it apparent that the author was accustomed to write upon a direct slope. As an example I find the date line mostly in a back-hand.

And so it goes on. I will not read the whole of the report, but just a portion here and there. In another place, it says:

Letters identical in form and in their relation to other letters are in exhibits A2 line 12, A3 lines 4, 5, A4 line 3, A5 lines 2, 6 and 12. The final "r" of "dear," and "Mr." are exceptional in the writing of Aa, but are duplicated in A1 line 2 twice, in A3 line 6.

In another place it says :

Letters in form and relationship are almost identical in A1 lines 3, 14, 17 and 18. The small "b" is peculiar in that it is usually made with a short single stroke for a staff, example in Aa lines 4 and 7. * * * * Letters similar in character are in A2 lines 8, 11, 19, and in A3 line 8. A very peculiar and highly personal combination is in the words "of the" in Aa, the beginning of line 14. * * * * Examples are in lines 6, 9, 11, 13, 15 and 16 and others. Identically the same combination and relationship is in A1 lines 7, 8 and 10.

He winds up as follows :—

In the examination of the writings A1 to A6, I find an exceeding variety of writing to be written by one person, so different that from a casual examination, no two of them would be taken to be written by the same person. They differ in the forms of letters, in the slants of the writings, in the shade and in the movement. For instance, Exhibit A5 is an open running hand, while Exhibit A1 is a compact, formal, large hand, while Exhibit A2 differs from either of them and is more angular and written with less facility than either of the others, indicating that the writer has great versatility.

DANIEL T. AMES,
Examiner of disputed writing.

This letter was ultimately delivered to me by Sir Adolphe Caron and is the original opinion given by Mr. Ames himself. Sir Adolphe Caron, anxious to be perfectly certain of the matter, forwarded another batch of Dr. Montague's letters to Mr. Ames for the purpose of seeing whether this other lot of letters corroborated the view which Mr. Ames had already arrived at or affected his opinion in any way, and Mr. Ames's response by letter, which Sir Adolphe Caron has, was to the same effect as his first opinion—that the writer of the second batch of letters was also the writer of the anonymous letter. I heard nothing more about the matter until some time towards the end of November, or beginning of December, when Sir Adolphe Caron told me that another letter similar in character and purport to the one of December, 1894, had been sent to the Prime Minister, and he said it was in the same handwriting as the first letter, and in the second page the disguise was apparently thrown off. He showed me the second anonymous letter, and I was clearly of the opinion that it was also in the handwriting of Dr. Montague, and Sir Adolphe Caron told me he intended to submit it to Mr. Ames. I have only to add that when Sir Adolphe Caron told me that he had reason to suspect Messrs. Haggart and Montague of being the instigators or writers of the anonymous letters, it recalled to my recollection that somewhere about the time Sir Mackenzie Bowell's Government was formed, Mr. Haggart came to my office, quite an unusual thing for him to do, for there had been nothing more than official intercourse between us prior to that time, and expressed the greatest hostility towards Sir Adolphe Caron, using very violent language in regard to him, and saying he ought to be driven out of the Government. I may conclude by saying that I felt bound, under all the circumstances, and the evident attempt that has been made by Dr. Montague and his friends to shift the odium of these anonymous communications to me, to make this statement, and I must positively assert that there is not a pretext for charging or insinuating that I had anything to do, directly or indirectly, with the writing of either of these communications.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I exceedingly regret that under present circumstances, and at this particular juncture, Parliament should be troubled by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) dealing with this matter as he has thought fit to deal with it this afternoon; and more particularly do I regret it, since it appears to me that the attitude the hon. member for West York has assumed this afternoon, can be taken as nothing more or less than an insult to His Excellency the Governor General, before whom this matter has been placed in its entirety, and who has absolved me, and who has expressed his most perfect confidence in me; and no Governor General, much less Lord Aberdeen, would express confidence in any Privy Councillor against whom a taint of a suspicion such as this, could be found to exist. For my part, I stood before Parliament the moment this charge was made, as confident that, when the facts were known, I would be shown to be entirely absolved, as I am that I stand here to-day. I knew, Sir, from almost the very first, the hostility that had prompted the conspiracy to ruin me in the eyes of the citizens of this country. I knew that the attack upon me was not instigated by Sir Adolphe Caron, with whom, I am glad to say, I have always been on the most friendly terms; and did I possess the meanness within me to do such an act, there was not within me, nor within sight, the motive to say a word against Sir Adolphe Caron in his connection with the Government, or his place in this House. Sir, it is a serious thing to charge any man with a conspiracy in this regard, until you have the absolute facts under your fingers upon which to base the charge. I do not think now that there is any necessity whatever for me to make that charge. Am I the uncomfortable man to-day in this Parliament with regard to these anonymous letters? I think Parliament will say I am not. Am I the gentleman asking the privilege of raising this question for the purpose of casting off an insinuation? No, but another member of this House seeks the ear of the House. What for? For the purpose of attacking me, without making a direct attack, or for the purpose of throwing off as against himself insinuations which seem to hurt him, which seem to cut to the quick. Sir, what is the statement that has been made here to-day by the member for West York? Is it not this: That when Sir Adolphe Caron went to the member for West York he called his attention to the fact that it was my handwriting? What motive did the member for West York have for this? Is it not the same motive which prompted the man who wrote that anonymous letter, and endeavoured to fasten the charge upon me, the motive of desiring to ruin a man who, whatever his faults may have been, has done his best upon the platform of this country for the party to which he belongs, and for the principles which he has held. I appeal to my hon. friends opposite. I have hit them as hard as I could in public debate, but there is not a man of them in this House to-day who will say that I have ever hit below the belt, either in this House or upon the platform, that I have ever yet done an act which should bring a blush of shame to the face of any man who is proud of his position as a Canadian in the public life of his country. Sir, after this matter had gone to His Excellency, after His Excellency had looked into the matter between Sir Adolphe Caron and myself, I think, in obedience to the rules of decency, in obedience to the respect in which we should hold the representative of Her Majesty, and in obedience to that respect which should guide one member of this House in his intercourse towards another, it might well have been let rest until the courts may deal with it, until the courts will deal with it. And men are afraid that the courts will deal with it, for when I came to engage a counsel in Toronto to deal with it, the best criminal counsel in the province of Ontario, I found that the member for West York had engaged him in advance. I have only to say this, that when this subject is dealt with in the courts, and when the photographs of these letters are distributed to members of this House, and are printed in the press of this country, there is not a man in Canada, expert or no expert, who will say that there is a trace of resemblance between my writing and the writing of those anonymous letters; and I wish to God, for the honour of this House, and for the honour of Canadian public life, that another man in this House could say the same thing.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I need hardly say how deeply I regret that the matter, which I considered from the very first a matter personal to Dr. Montague and myself, should have been brought up again this afternoon. I regret more especially that the hon. member who has made the statement which he has made, although coming up to my seat and telling me that he was going to make a statement, should not have considered it necessary, as he was using information which he supposed to have come from myself, to let me see the statement before he gave it to the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And had given me notice.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. And had given notice of his intention to proceed in this matter. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not consider that the statement made by the hon. gentleman changes in any way the position of the case as it stands before the House and before the country. I wish at this moment to express how deeply I regret that His Excellency's name should be brought up in connection with a matter of this kind. But I know that on both sides of the House it will be the feeling of every hon. gentleman that if he did consent to look into the matter, it was because of the fact that it concerned two hon. gentlemen who were his constitutional advisers, and who were sitting in the Cabinet with the Prime Minister whom he had charged with the responsibility of advising him. I wish to say now, without going into a discussion of the statement, that the declaration I made the other day to the House is the one which I am prepared to stand by. I received from Dr. Montague a denial of his connection with the anonymous letters. Beyond this, the circumstances under which he was supposed to be connected with the case were explained to me by the hon. gentleman. I stated openly and frankly to the House, as I did to the Governor General in a letter under my own signature, that I accepted his denial, and I repeat it to-day; and I think when a matter of this kind has been settled in the manner in which it has been settled between the two parties interested, it would have been better to have allowed it to remain as we left it, after the Governor General had given, not his sanction, but an expression of his opinion that it was satisfactorily settled, as I state again it was.

Mr. LAURIER. The House, I am sure, will readily understand that I have no intention whatever of even alluding to the little episode of which we have just been witnesses. I rise simply to address myself to the statement made just now by the hon. gentleman who leads the House with respect to the negotiations that are now going on between the Prime Minister and certain parties with a view with reconstructing the Cabinet. If I understood the hon. gentleman rightly, he told us that at the present time negotiations were going on with certain parties, that they have advanced to a certain stage but are not yet completed, but he hopes that by to-morrow he will be in a position to give to the House a full statement. Under such circumstances I certainly deem it my duty to put no obstacle in the way of the Prime Minister, and I shall not offer any objection to the hon. gentleman's motion. But perhaps the hon. gentleman might tell the House, if he can conveniently do so, if certain gentlemen who a week ago to-day he told us would not serve under the present Premier have thought better or worse—I will not say which—but have, at all events, thought differently and have now gone half over to the fold. That is all the information I should like to obtain at the present moment.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If I could give that information to-day, I would hardly ask the hon. gentleman to consent to an adjournment of the House until to-morrow. But I tell my hon. friend that I will not keep him without that information any longer than to-morrow at three o'clock, and I am sure the hon. gentleman would be disappointed, as he has agreed to the adjournment, if I were to give him any information until to-morrow, when I can give him the whole programme, which I have already promised to bring down.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 15th January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, certificate of the election and return

Of Edward Gawler Prior, for the Electoral District of Victoria, B.C.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Edward Gawler Prior, Esquire, member for the Electoral District of Victoria, B.C., introduced by Hon. Mr. Daly and Mr. Mara.

MINISTERIAL RESIGNATIONS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make a statement to the House. And I wish to say that the statement I am about to make has been submitted to the Governor General by the Prime Minister, and I am authorized to say that, in its bearings on the position of the Crown in matters, of this nature, it has His Excellency's approval. Since reference was made, in this House, to the retirement from office of certain members of the Government the Prime Minister has had an opportunity of carefully reviewing the circumstances connected with these resignations, and has satisfied himself that the best interests of the country would be served, notwithstanding any differences of opinion that exist respecting the importance of filling the portfolio made vacant by the resignation of the Hon. Mr. Angers, by the return to their former positions in the Cabinet of those who deemed it their duty to retire on account of that vacancy. While it is true that this point was freely discussed between the Prime Minister and his colleagues, it is equally true that the Prime Minister did not regard that vacancy—the importance of filling which cannot be questioned—as a sufficient reason for the resignation of any member of the Government. This view, however, was not concurred in by some of his colleagues who urged that a meeting of Parliament with a Quebec portfolio vacant might seriously imperil certain important measures to be presented during this session. He had reasonable hopes of being able to fill that position up to the very day when Parliament met, and was disappointed when his efforts failed. After the opening of Parliament certain members of the Government sent their resignations to the Prime Minister, giving among other reasons, the fact, that “having failed to fill the portfolio” and, that he evidently “intended to go on with the transaction of public business with an incomplete Cabinet,” they thought this course so great “a departure from sound constitutional practice and so weak, as a matter of policy,” that they were “unwilling any longer to remain as members of an incomplete Government.”

Mr. MULOCK. And therefore to make it more incomplete.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think the hon. gentleman will permit me to continue the statement. Since the receipt of the resignations referred to, the objections put forward by the Ministers who resigned have been removed by the acceptance of a seat in the Cabinet by the Hon. Alphonse Desjardins, a gentleman well known and esteemed in the province of Quebec for his ability and integrity of character, and by the acceptance to the Ministry of Sir Charles Tupper, Bart. Under these circumstances and with these objections removed, the Ministers who resigned have deemed it consistent with duty to their country to resume the positions they respectively held in the Government. It is gratifying, therefore, to be able to inform the House and the country that a Ministry has been formed which will command the support of the majority in Parliament and enable us to proceed with the measures foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne. The Government, as reconstructed, is as follows:—President of the Council, Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell; Secretary of State, Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.; Postmaster General, Hon. Sir Adolphe Caron; Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Hon. John Costigan; Minister of Finance, Hon. George E. Foster; Minister of Railways and Canals, Hon. John Haggart ; Minister of Public Works, Hon. J. A. Ouimet ; Minister of the Interior, Hon. T. Mayne Daly ; Minister of Trade and Commerce, Hon. W. B. Ives ; Minister of Justice, Hon. A. R. Dickey ; Minister of Agriculture, Hon. W. H. Montague ; Minister of Militia and Defence, Hon. Alphonse Desjardins ; without portfolio, Hon. Frank Smith, Hon. Donald Ferguson ; Controller of Customs, Hon. J. F. Wood ; Controller of Inland Revenue, Hon. E. G. Prior.

An hon. MEMBER. And Solicitor General ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no Solicitor General at present. This is the statement I have the honour to lay before the House. I move that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. LAURIER. So, at last, Mr. Speaker, after these long days of waiting, after the public business has been blocked for almost two weeks, after the House has been subjected to the ignominy of dancing attendance upon the pleasure of weak and vacillating men—vacillating by their own admission as stated here to-day—at last the comedy is at an end ; and the end is what might have been expected from the experience we have had in the past under similar circumstances, just what everybody might have foretold ;—the stray sheep have gone back to the fold, the bolters have eaten their words, and they are expected to sit again under the man, who just a week ago yesterday, they declared was too small to be their leader. Sir, it is always the same thing, everybody might have expected it. These ministerial crises are becoming ludicrously monotonous in their regularity and in their sameness. It is always the same thing. A few days out in the cold and they return to the fold. A general kissing and embracing, an admission and confession of guilt, pardon from all sides, and everything serene and lovely on the surface ; though, I presume, still underneath there is a great deal of kicking, and swearing, and cursing, and vilifying each other. In the month of March last year my good friend, whom I am sorry not to see in his usual seat at the present time—he was at one time Minister of Justice ; he is now simply a member of Parliament, my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper)—gave a bad example. One day, from the serene skies, came a bolt from the blue. We were told by the papers that he had withdrawn from the Government ; but after a few days he asked to be taken back again. One day we were told that Achilles had withdrawn into his tent, that he refused to come out. But, after sulking a few days in the cold, he came back repenting, subdued and tamed. Then, in the month of July, my hon. friend, the warrior of the party, the former Minister of Militia and Defence, the present Postmaster General, and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, did the like thing ; they also went out in the cold, and, after three days, they came back again, repentant, subdued, tamed. Now, Sir, on this occasion it was not only one or two, but even seven members of the Administration who went out—what shall I say ?—in a moment of weakness ? Yes, it is nothing else, by the confession of the hon. gentleman—in a moment of weakness, and they also came back to the fold. But I must give credit to whomsoever credit is due. They have exhibited upon this occasion a staying power which their colleagues on the former occasion did not exhibit. They remained out ten days in the cold, but they found the cold too much for them, and they also came back tamed, subdued, repentant. Well, Sir, now, in view of the result, it is not inappropriate for us to look at the causes which gave occasion to this crisis. In view of the results we have at the present time, it is not inappropriate to go back to the language which was used on the former occasion by the hon. Finance Minister, when he gave to the House the reasons which had induced him and his colleagues to take the very extraordinary course they have taken. He stated, that after the death of the late Sir John Thompson, when the present Prime Minister, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, was called upon to form a Government, they accepted indeed to serve under him, though with great misgivings, and the course of events more than justified those misgivings. The course of events has shown that, though they had supported the Government with their gigantic intellects, still the result had not been such as one would have expected. They did not obtain that measure of success which they had reason to believe should meet their efforts, and, therefore, tired and fatigued with struggling in vain for a Government which was weak, they had taken the course of resigning. True it is, that before they took that supreme course they had again and again hinted to the Prime Minister that it would be well for him to make way. But the Prime Minister was deaf on that score. He did not hear, at all events he did not accede to those hints, and he remained obdurate. Then they took the only course which was left to them to take, that was to resign in a body. They wished to have a strong Government,

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

A Government whose Premier could command the confidence of all his colleagues, could satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that its strongest elements were at its head, and impress the country that it had a Government which was united and had power to govern.

This was the reason why they bolted, this was the reason why they resigned, in order that they might have the strongest Government possible, in order to satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that the strongest elements were at its head ; and in order, last, though not least, “to impress the country that it had a Government which was united and had power to govern.” Such was the object of the resignations. What is the result to-day? Why, Sir, the result shows this, for one thing, that, if there was weakness, the weakness was not in the leadership, but the weakness was in the following. The leadership remains the same as it was eight days ago, but the following has been strengthened. Six of the followers came back to the fold. Another, it is true, has remained outside, but the plums remain in the family, at all events, by the accession of Sir Charles Tupper. The following has been strengthened, strengthened by the accession of really a strong man in the person of Sir Charles Tupper. Then, perhaps, some vigour will be put in the vacillating Premier. Well, Sir, I ask in face of what has taken place, if all these scandalous proceedings have been justified by the result? Can the hon. gentleman who, I suppose, will now resume his position as leader of the House, declare that the Government has at its head at this time a Premier who can command the confidence of his colleagues? I doubt it very much. Is this a Government whose Premier can satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party "that its strongest elements are at its head," that "it has a government which is united, and has power to govern?" Why, Sir, if the country has been impressed in any way, it has been impressed with the conviction which now prevails, that the Government is composed of a band of plotters, and schemers, and conspirators, whose bond of union is the cement of office, and whose only aim and purpose is their own selfish and personal aggrandizement. The paramount conviction at this moment is that the hon. gentlemen opposite can sacrifice anything and everything, honour, friends, convictions, principles, so long as they can remain in the places which they have so long misused. Why, Sir, what have we to-day? We had eight days ago the announcement made on the floor of this House by an hon. gentleman who was supposed to speak with authority as to the causes which had led to these resignations, and to-day we learn that the true causes were not given to us on that occasion. I am sorry to use this language, Mr. Speaker, but we have the confession made here, in the hearing of the hon. gentleman who leads the House at the present time, that the reasons which were then assigned for the withdrawal of himself and his colleagues, were not the true reasons, but that the whole thing dated back to the month of July last, when the Hon. Mr. Angers resigned his seat in the Cabinet and did not return to the fold. This was the reason. We have known all along that such was the reason. We have known all along that the Cabinet was divided upon the same question at the present time. Sir, to-day have we a complete Government? No, Sir, we have still the rump of a Government, we have not yet a complete Government. Well, Sir, I leave the hon. gentlemen and their colleagues, and their followers, to the reflections which must arise in their minds at this moment. Further than this I will not say. I remember on a certain occasion when there was a political commotion in England. Mr. Disraeli was then in his prime, but was not taking part in the affair; and when he was asked the question why, he answered that he was loth by word or deed to take anything away from the effect of the lamentable exhibition which the Government was making of itself in the eyes of the country. Sir, I would be loth myself, by word or deed, to say anything that would diminish from the result, or from the effects which must follow from the lamentable, from the humiliating, from the base exhibition which the Government have made of themselves during the last eight days in the eyes of the country at large.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. When I brought down the announcement which I made to the House, I realized the great disappointment which hon. gentlemen on your left, Mr. Speaker, would experience from the fact that a strong Government, one which we believe will control and command the confidence of the country, has been formed, no doubt to the regret of the supporters of the hon. gentleman who leads Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. I felt that the hon. gentleman and his friends must have seen that their chance of reaching the Treasury benches could only come to them through dissensions in or the breaking up of the Conservative party; and, Sir, I venture to state that the reasons which have been given in the statement that I laid before the House are reasons that must appeal to the country, and must prove satisfactory to the people. What is the reason which induces the hon. gentlemen to return to the portfolios which they had considered it their duty to vacate? It was because, as stated in this document, they felt that, in the interests of the country they should put aside any consideration except the one of public interest, and for that reason, and that alone, they have come back and form to-day the Government which I have announced to the House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has spoken of several crises which have taken place, and he has drawn the attention of the House to the fact that in April one hon. gentleman left the Government, and that in July two other hon. gentlemen resigned, and the last crisis, which has lasted, as he said, two weeks, but it has continued not quite that length of time, he has spoken of as indicating, on the part of the Government, a state of affairs in the constitution of the Cabinet which rendered it unfit to control and govern the destinies of the country. Sir, I venture to express the opinion that when troublesome questions arise it is not only possible, but it is natural to suppose that great difference of opinions must arise between members composing the Cabinet; but when those differences disappear, when those men, sinking their personal views and opinions, band together for the general good, and determine to stay together to carry out the most important matters of public interest that have ever come before the country, I think the people of Canada, at least, whatever hon. gentlemen on your left, Mr. Speaker, may say, will find that the reasons which induced them to resume their portfolios were such as will receive the approbation of public opinion. I am, therefore, not in the least surprised at the manner in which the explanations have been received by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I felt that he would be disappointed, but this is one of those numerous disappointments which he has already experienced, and which he must put up with once more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is not often I feel it to be my duty to differ from the hon. gentleman who sits besides me (Mr. Laurier), but few as those occasions may be, this, I am bound to confess, is one of them. My hon. friend will pardon me when I say that he takes the hon. gentlemen opposite quite too seriously. Sir, he assumes that he is dealing with responsible statesmen. Now, viewed from that standpoint, I must admit that my hon. friend has not said a word too much, and, in fact, a good deal more might justly be said than he has said. But I submit to this honourable body that that is not the true standpoint from which those hon. gentlemen's actions should be regarded. Sir, as I understand it, we are here in the presence of the Royal Ottawa Low Comedy Troupe, and we should be grateful to them for the great benefit they have done us as a party, and for the amusement they have afforded, not only to us, but to all Canada, during some time past. As I understand it, and I submit this to my hon. friend with all deference, what we have been listening to, after all, has really been a series of rehearsals. We had No. 1 rehearsal—because I can hardly count the little episode of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) as one—a sort of undress rehearsal, as we may call it, in July, when three members of the Cabinet went out, and one of them, being a person of some honour and self-respect, stayed out. Then we have lately had what I may call a full dress rehearsal, when seven members went out, and practically seven came back, because the mere substitution of junior for senior, or senior for junior, really hardly affects the situation, as no one will more frankly admit than the hon. member for Pictou. Now these hon. gentlemen being pretty nearly letter perfect, we can have the real performance, which will not long be delayed, when all will go out and none come back. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, allow me to congratulate those hon. gentlemen on the magnificent spectacular effects which they have produced entirely regardless of expense. I think you, Mr. Speaker, will admit, and I think all constitutional authorities from the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) down, will admit it is of the highest moment that the Ministry of the day, under a form of government like ours, should command the respect of the great mass of the people of this country, and the confidence of their fellows. Sir, I think those hon. gentlemen stayed out too long, when they allowed the weekly issues of the Conservative press to be sent to the country, and if I am any judge of the effect produced, it is only too plain that they have utterly failed either to inspire respect in the country, or confidence among their own followers. Now, Sir, let us consider for a moment what this whole farce means. It means, in my judgment, nothing less and nothing more than this: that this whole business has been transacted for the purpose, and for no other purpose, than to make room for my ancient acquaintance, Sir Charles Tupper, Baronet of the United Kingdom. Sir, it is impossible that even such a crew as I see yonder—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is impossible that even such a crew could dream of returning except on a most distinct understanding, whether written or verbal, that within a very short space of time Sir Mackenzie Bowell must make way for Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.

Mr. POPE. You are right for once.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, right for once and right always, and right all through. Not even their fronts of brass (and I give them credit for any imaginable quantity of that commodity)—not even their fronts of brass could endure—and I will do them that justice, and particularly to the Minister of Railways will I do that justice—could endure to sit very long under Sir Mackenzie Bowell in Council after what has passed between them. And now, Sir, as to Sir Mackenzie Bowell himself, and here I candidly confess that I feel some pity for that hon. gentleman. Up to the present time, Sir Mackenzie Bowell might have commanded the sympathy, not merely of a great number of his own followers, but of a large proportion of the people of this country irrespective of party. That was a sympathy which naturally went out to an old leader fighting for his life with his back to the wall against seven treacherous ministers. But, Sir, I am sorry to say for Sir Mackenzie Bowell that although I am ready to make large allowances for him, I must say that he cannot expect the same measure of our sympathy and respect when he sinks to play the part of a warming-pan to one of the most corrupt politicians our country has ever known. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., is a very ancient acquaintance of mine. Using the word "fame" in its scientific definition, I may say that the fame of Sir Charles Tupper, if not precisely well known in all the churches, is well known in all the provinces of this Dominion. It is well known that he graduated with very high honours in his own peculiar school in Nova Scotia many years ago. Nova Scotia—"arida nutrix leonum," which if my hon. friend from Picton (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will permit me, I will freely translate—Nova Scotia, which has produced so many eminent men, but which has also been the dry-nurse, aye, and the wet-nurse too, of the most highly developed type of Tory boodlers this country has ever known. I say that with the most profound apology to those of my hon. friends from Nova Scotia who have helped us so well in driving that valuable class of individuals to the wall. Now, Sir, I am bound to say that knowing what tremendous pressure was exercised on Sir Mackenzie Bowell, I feel considerable pity for that hon. gentleman. I have no doubt whatever that his intentions originally were right, and I think some of those whom I know to have exercised this pressure upon him for the purpose of bringing together at all costs and at all hazards men who have no possible ground for respecting or trusting each other; I say, Sir, these men might very well have spared him that. But all the same, and I say it with regret, I have to say to Sir Mackenzie Bowell, that if there be anything on earth which could justify the conduct of these gentlemen, it is that he himself, by his own conduct in admitting them once more to his councils, has gone far to justify them. And now, Mr. Speaker, as to the statements which have been made, I have been given to understand—though I cannot imagine how the idea has got abroad—I have been given to understand that there have been some persons in this House who have insinuated in times past that I did not always attach the implicit credence which I ought to have done to the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have been told so. Permit me to say on this occasion, I am prepared to state here in my place in Parliament, that I attach implicit credence to the statement made—that is to the statements they have severally made about each other. As I understand the rulings which were frequently laid down by the Chair in this House, that is my duty as a member of Parliament, and I mean to do my duty. I believe also, and I am here open to correction, that it is my constitutional duty to extend to the other Chamber in the legislature, similar courtesy. If that be your ruling, and I presume it is, I feel that I am likewise bound to extend the same implicit credence to the statements which have been made by the hon. the Premier in his place in the other Chamber. It is in the recollection of some hon.

gentlemen here that the hon. the Premier, in the hearing of many gentlemen around me, described himself not many days ago—I do not think you were in the Chair at the time, Mr. Speaker—described himself on the floor of this House as having been living in a nest of traitors. Whether he did that or not, there is no doubt whatever that in his place in the Senate Chamber, speaking of this transaction, the Premier declared (I have got his words here) that the conduct of his colleagues to him had been unparalleled in British history. And he went on to remark, although not exactly in these words, that he feared they were a set of ruffians who had no reverence for gray hairs. This he said, together with many other remarks of a similar character, which will be found extended at considerable length on the pages of the senatorial "Hansard." I suppose I must believe the statements made by the Premier of this country in his place in the Senate, and I will endeavour to do my duty accordingly. Similarly, Sir, I feel that when the Minister of Finance, speaking for himself and friends, and speaking, mind you, not lightly, but speaking from a document carefully prepared and revised; when that gentleman, with exceedingly little circumspection, declared in the course of the document that the Premier of Canada was an old fool, and an obstinate one at that—

Mr. FOSTER. "Ipsissima verba."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I think that is an accurate if not a literal translation. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, I must believe the Finance Minister, too, when he made that declaration. I suppose it is my duty to believe him, and I will endeavour to do my duty on this occasion as always. Now, so far the case is plain sailing, because, Mr. Speaker, you will observe—and I call the attention of the House carefully to the fact—you will observe that the statements made by the Premier and the Minister of Finance are not at all necessarily irreconcilable. In point of fact, some people have said that they go far respectively each to prove the other. But, Sir, I am in a little dilemma. What am I to do if a case should arise in which two of these hon. gentlemen should contradict each other, and that is a possibility. Light may arise out of the darkness, even if it is from the lurid illumination which may be shed by certain threatened lawsuits on the subject, but as yet we are in darkness. However, one great difficulty has been taken out of my way. Sir, it has been my privilege, and I have no doubt it has been yours, to peruse certain affectionate letters—I might almost call them an amatory correspondence—which lately passed between my esteemed friend the Postmaster General and another eminent member of the late confraternity. Sir, I feel it my duty for purposes of illustration to read these letters in order that they may not be lost to posterity. They are as follows:—and they are not anonymous, Mr. Speaker:—

“Ottawa, Jan. 13, 1896.

“Dear Sir Adolphe Caron.—Although I have already in my place in Parliament denied any complicity whatever in the matter of these anonymous letters, I wish to repeat in this personal manner my emphatic denial of having been in any way connected with their authorship. I wish at the same time to say that I entirely acquit you from the suspicion of having been the cause of communications to the press in regard to this matter.

“I remain, yours faithfully,
“W. H. MONTAGUE.”

The reply is worthy of the preceding:

“Dear Dr. Montague.—In reply to your letter I fully accept your repudiation of the anonymous letters, as, indeed, I have already stated in Parliament, and I regret the annoyance to which you have been subject in the publication of an allusion to the matter in the press. I wish to add that I am glad that you exonerate me from the suspicion of having been the source of any communication to the newspapers upon the subject.

“Yours truly,
“ADOLPHE CARON.”

Now, Sir, I think our fair friends, the hon. Postmaster General's fair friends, looking at all the surrounding circumstances, will agree with me in designating these letters as sweetly pretty. Here is the point, Sir, and the reason why I have introduced them; they illustrate in a most remarkable way the value of the ruling which I have been endeavouring to comply with, and the duty of all public men to believe as true all statements made in Parliament. Just think of it, Mr. Speaker. But for that excellent rule—I put it to the hon. Postmaster General—how could he and Dr. Montague have fallen on each other's necks and wept and gushed over each other as they have done just now? Verily, Mr. Speaker, wisdom is justified of her children, and so are your rulings. Now, Sir, I think that in many ways the explanation we have just heard, and in fact the whole performance from start to finish, forms a most fitting climax to the history of this present Parliament. This Parliament, Sir, is likely for many reasons to occupy a perfectly unique position in Canadian history. It has done several things which no Parliament ever did before, and which, if I may venture a prediction, no Parliament will ever do again. In the first place, Sir, this is a Parliament which is on the high road to get six years' indemnities for five years' work. In the next place, it is exceedingly likely to be the only Parliament in Canada to expire by effluxion of time. In the third place, it is the only Parliament I have ever heard, known or read of in any English-speaking community which deliberately refused to investigate a charge against a Minister of the Crown preferred by a member in his place; and it is most assuredly the only Parliament that has ever sat in any community I have ever heard of in which, when a Minister of the Crown has been accused of high crimes and misdemeanours, that Minister has been allowed to choose his own judges and draw up the charges to suit himself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think I am in perfect order. I am stating what is on record; I am stating what was drawn up and made the basis of a royal commission issued, the more shame to them, in the name of Her Majesty, by these gentlemen, for the purpose of giving effect to the identical thing to which I have alluded. Well, Sir, all I can say is that the parliamentary majority that would sanction such proceedings is a most fitting complement to the Cabinet we now see before us. The Parliament are worthy of the Cabinet; the Cabinet are worthy of the Parliament. Sir, I did think on Tuesday week that we had reached the lowest depth of degradation to which it was possible for a Canadian Parliament to sink; but I see that I was wrong. To-day's proceedings have convinced me that even in the lowest depths a lower deep can yet be found. I think it was Oliver Wendell Holmes, or some other gentleman equally eminent in psychology, who declared that the real way to get at the truth as to any man or thing was to apply the rule of triangulation to such person or thing. Sir, I propose to apply that rule to the Cabinet. I know pretty well what is the opinion of them held by the Liberal party, and I can form a pretty shrewd guess what is the opinion entertained of them by every true Conservative. But it is interesting to see these things in profile, and it is my happy privilege to be able to afford a side light as to how they strike our neighbours, the citizens of the great American Republic.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was that remark made by an hon. gentleman who, if not a naturalized citizen, is a large property holder in some portions of the great American Republic? As it happened very recently, four of these hon. gentlemen were travelling either in the United States or in the immediate vicinity of the United States. They were, as I am informed, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Railways. On this particular occasion, Sir, they were not screened from the vulgar gaze within the sacred precincts of the car “Jamaica;” but they were travelling in an ordinary Pullman car like common mortals such as you and me, Mr. Speaker. At any rate, they were identified, and a friend of mine pointed them out to an American gentleman travelling with him as distinguished Canadian luminaries.

An hon. MEMBER. Chestnut.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, the story will suit. I dare say some hon. gentlemen have heard it before, and it is just as well that they should hear it again. It so happened that the American gentleman had not seen these four pillars of the state before. He regarded them long and carefully, and when asked his opinion of them, delivered it in these few words: "Stranger, if them four fellers are Privy Councillors and Advisers of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, then, stranger, I never said it before and I never thought to say it all, but I do say now and say it from the very bottom of my heart. God Save the Queen." Now, Mr. Speaker, in sad and sober seriousness, one word more. As I said at the outset, if there be one thing which is more essential than another to the good working of representative government, it is that the men who are chosen from the representatives of the people to discharge the important functions of government in any country shall be men who command the respect and honour of the bulk of the community at least. Sir, I say—and in saying it I will have the concurrence of every true man in Canada,—that the honour and character of its public men are the most valuable possessions of any people. I say furthermore that anything which tends to lower and degrade the honour and character of public men in any country, tends to lower and degrade, in the very highest degree, the morality of that whole community; and I say that all the churches, colleges, clergymen and schools collected together can do will fail to undo in generations the evil which has been done by such exhibitions as those we have been compelled to witness within the last few days unless the people—and that speedily—purge and purify themselves from all connection with them by inflicting condign punishment on the men who are responsible for such scenes. We can well believe, knowing what I know, looking at the character of the patent combination now before us, that if they are left in office for a very short time indeed, they may plunge this country into entanglements which will cost at the very least $100,000,000 to escape from.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friends have not sat in Parliament as long as I have or they would know that the predecessors of these men, for the purpose of concealing their infamy, for the purpose of buying a ransom from the consequences of the first Canadian Pacific scandal—and it was not worse than this—deliberately added more than $100,000,000, or what if capitalized would have represented more than $100,000,000 to the capital expenditure of Canada more than twenty years ago. These men are just as capable as their predecessors of adding $100,000,000 to our debt and charges; but for my part, grave as that may be, I would rather see $200,000,000 thrown into the sea than see Canada degraded as she has been by the exhibition of falsehood, of treachery, of meanness, of weakness and cowardice which this country has witnessed in the last few days.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has spoken of a comedy troupe. Well, Sir, if he pursued that figurative way of regarding the present situation, I think he would on seeing these galleries crowded and looking at this House, filled as they are to-day, have asked those who fill the galleries and the House: "What went you out for to see?" They came here to-day expecting to hear the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat and the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition make such an attack on the Government of Canada as would ring throughout the length and breadth of the land. Well, what went they out for to see? A reed shaken by the wind? Why, a reed shaken by the wind would be respectable compared with the hon. gentleman and his leader. Sir, the hon. gentleman went on very well for a few minutes, with his carefully prepared jokes and his studied impromptus, conned day by day and by the midnight lamp, until he began to review the Government as reconstructed and pointed out one new element in that Government. And, Sir, Macbeth, at the famous feast, when the ghost of Banquo appeared to him, was never so unmanned as was the hon. gentleman by the spectre of Tupper that rose before him. From the moment that he uttered the name of Sir Charles Tupper, Baronet, the sinking of heart that came into his breast many and many a time, the chicken quivering beneath his frock coat, which he had often felt when the war-horse of Cumberland neighed, made itself again felt. Sir, the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald was a keen observer of men; and I well remember his sitting where my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) sits now, and looking over and remarking how much afraid the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat was of Sir Charles Tupper, Baronet. And, Sir, we have seen something of that here to-day. Why, as I once or twice pointed out here, if we are to canvass this Conservative Government with the view of changing it, we have to ask the question: What Government shall succeed? Sir, we have heard the two leaders of the Opposition to-day under circumstances that give to a leader of the Opposition a great chance. I say that every member of the Conservative party who hears me is ready to acknowledge that the circumstances were peculiar, and gave any competent leader of men in this House an immense chance. And what has been made of it? My hon. friend who leads the House has not risen equal to the occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You are right.

Mr. DAVIN. I should have said my hon. friend who leads the Opposition. If there is any comfort in the slip, the hon. gentlemen may have it. I say the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition has not risen to the occasion to-day. There is no man in this House who likes the hon. leader of the Opposition better than I do. He is a scholar, and a gentleman and a man of great charm of manner; but, Sir, he is not a leader of men—he is an academic personage. He is altogether too nice for the high position he occupies; and I say that to-day he has not availed himself of the opportunity which the circumstances gave him. And as for the hon. gentleman who would be our Finance Minister, if we were to change sides, what has he done? Why, he has been simply telling us a story that belonged to the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen). A statesman of the standing of the ex-Finance Minister—what constituency does the hon. gentleman represent? He has been from constituency to constituency, and I do not recollect which one he represents now.

An hon. MEMBER. South Oxford.

Mr. DAVIN. From a gentleman occupying the position in this House which the hon. member for South Oxford does, we naturally expect something. But on this occasion he has simply been a political rag-picker in the McMullen heap. To-day, Sir, we not only get instruction in the newspapers from the pen but also from the pencil, and in the "World" newspaper there are appearing some very clever pictures of political thought by a man of real genius, Mr. Hunter. I hope that that gentleman will send down to posterity forever a picture of the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat as the political rag-picker in the McMullen heap. Let me say this. These gentlemen have given us nothing but comedy, and low comedy degenerating into farce that ceases to be laughable and becomes painful. Let me say one word seriously of the situation. Sir, I consider that the situation was one that gave great anxiety to the country and great anxiety to the Conservative party. And one of the greatest anxieties to patriotic men was this, that it did afford a chance—a desperate chance—to the gentlemen on the Opposition side of getting into power. I say that the fear that was in the hearts of patriotic men was not that power and patronage might pass from us, but that at such a crisis as this in the history of the Empire and in the history of Canada, men such as we see before us should obtain portfolios. That was our fear. Now, Sir, the two hon. gentlemen who spoke have made no points against the Government as reconstituted. As a matter of fact the Government has been reconstituted. According to the statement of the Finance Minister these gentlemen went out because they wanted a stronger Government; and, although I am not here to undervalue any, though no man can value more highly than I do the administrative ability, the great talents of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice, at the same time I am sure that he will agree with me, as the country agrees with me at this moment, that there cannot be the least doubt that the Government has been strengthened. The presence of Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., in that Government strengthens it. The announcement made by the Finance Minister is an important one. He said that the Conservative party ought to have the strongest possible Government. He said that was the aim we should have in view, and, in the course of two weeks they have given us a Government much stronger than the one that preceded it. And, Sir, the principle then enunciated is a principle that the people of Canada and the members of this House will hold the Government to; and on succeeding occasions, when that Government shall be reconstructed again or added to again, I hope that this principle will be followed, and that not merely will local considerations, geographical considerations, ethnological and theological considerations have weight, as is too often the case whatever party may be in power in Canada with our unfortunate mosaic politics—but that the question of ability to fill a ministerial position will also be taken into account. Whatever party may be in power here, the sooner we adopt and carry out the methods of the English constitution as carried out in England the better. We have a replica of the British constitution in this Canada of ours, but we have not its methods. The method in England is to take men into the Government because of their weight in Parliament; and the consequence is that, at each successive change, at each successive reconstruction of the Government in England, you have men in the Government capable of dealing with the vast and complex questions of an entire Empire. But here we see pressure brought to bear because a man is of this colour or that, of this stripe or that, irrespective of the important question, not whether he is fit to manage a department, for that is not enough, but fit to be one of the leaders of Canada, one of the pillars of the state. We should aim higher than we do, we should have not merely men fit to manage a department, but men of adequate knowledge, men of the highest ability we can find, and we should have those who can fairly claim the high title of gentleman. Sir, I rose merely because of my disappointment. I came here for a treat; I came here expecting that the leader of the Opposition or his first lieutenant, or probably, my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), or, it may be my hon. friend who can roar like a lion and coo like a sucking dove, the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) would afford us that treat. But the fact is that these gentlemen were not equal to the occasion, and we need never expect them to be equal to the occasion as it rises. Above all the point of importance is that the Government has been strengthened. The appearance of Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., in the Government has frightened the wits out of gentlemen opposite. The addition of my hon. friend, Hon. Mr. Desjardins, also greatly increases the strength of the Government, for Mr. Desjardins is not only a man of ability, but, as the hon. leader of the Opposition too well knows, he represents an element in Quebec that is of great force. Well, Sir, we have a stronger Government, and I think that the events of this day prove that we have a weaker Opposition.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it must be a matter of poignant regret to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and my hon. friend to my left (Sir Richard Cartwright) that they were not able to make speeches upon this occasion sufficiently interesting to please the taste of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). That hon. gentleman has told us that there is nothing that he despises more than studied impromptus and carefully-prepared witticisms. I am not surprised at that, Sir, because the hon. gentleman has given the House a greater surfeit of these things than any other man I know. I think I remember that a few years ago, the hon. gentleman undertook a pilgrimage to Stratford, having prepared a very learned and brilliant extempore lecture to be delivered from the public platform in that city—production bristling with witticisms, and not only that but with interruptions from small boys and clever retorts with which the interrupters were instantly crushed. For one reason or another the hon. gentleman did not reach his destination. Nevertheless we had the speech with the carefully-prepared impromptus which were not even delivered all fully reported in the columns of the next morning's "Citizen." There were the interruptions from the small boys and the lecturer's brilliant retorts, the applause which greeted every brilliant impromptu and the thunderous cheers which marked one of the most magnificent perorations ever heard in the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman, I may remark in passing, had reached only about half-way to his destination, and all this time was slumbering peacefully at a wayside town. Of course, whether a speech pleases or not is largely a matter of taste. But I will venture to say that of the hundreds who are sitting in this Chamber, and who heard the attack made by the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), few will leave this Chamber without feeling that that attack was as strong and as effective, and as true, as the English language could make it. If they did not please their opponents, they may be gratified to know that at least they pleased their friends and all independent men. It may be nothing to some men, it may be nothing to the hon. member for Assiniboia that dishonour and treachery and backbiting and meanness and untruth should be exposed in this House, but it matters much to the honest people of Canada. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) phrased the situation very neatly. I think, when he told us that these gentlemen were playing as the Royal Ottawa Low Comedy Troupe. I have known the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia too long to call him names, but I regret that he descended to playing the part of mountebank in that troupe. That is not his customary role, and I do not think that in it he came off with his customary applause. I would advise him, notwithstanding his great versatility, to drop the role he has played to-day. The hon. gentleman tells us that the practice is to take men into the Government on account of their weight, their intellectual weight, and their qualities as gentlemen. Why did the hon. gentleman not explain that, notwithstanding that he has sat here under Sir John Macdonald, Sir John Abbott, Sir John Thompson and Sir Mackenzie Bowell, not one of these gentlemen ever discovered these distinguished qualities in himself. Let me tell him that the situation is one which should not be passed by in silence, one which has, I think, been aptly designated by my hon. friend. You may search the annals of your country's history in vain to find a precedent or a situation such as we have had here. We have had seven men leaving the Government and openly proclaiming that they left it because the leader was incompetent and an imbecile. And you have the seven men coming back to the Government and ranging themselves under the banner of this incompetent and this imbecile, and asking the country to believe that we have got a strong Government which should be followed. Where, Sir, can you parallel that in the history of Canada, or in the history of any other country? The hon. gentleman who leads the House to-day told us that no reason but that of public interest prompted these gentlemen to resign, and no reason but the public interest prompted them to come back. But he was singularly forgetful of the fact that the reasons which prompted them to resign have all been embalmed in the statement read by the Finance Minister in this House as his own statement and the statement of his six colleagues, and that those reasons are entirely different from the one he has given to-day. Sir, I am glad of the limitation which he put to the statement when he opened to-day, that the official statement he was reading had the imprimatur and sanction of His Excellency. I say I was glad of the qualification he put in, so far as that statement affected His Excellency's position; because the statement which he read, outside of that one qualification, was a statement contending that to be a fact which was untrue—unless he is prepared to accept the view that the ex-Finance Minister read a false statement the other day. One statement directly contradicts the other. In the statement read the other day we were told that notwithstanding the fact that they joined his Government with very many misgivings, because they doubted whether the Premier was equal to the occasion, although they had unitedly and loyally striven to make it strong, they found that the Premier was too weak a man, too incompetent a leader, to give courage to his followers and to form a strong Government, and they left him on that account. Sir, although clothed in diplomatic and euphemistic language, it meant this: The present leader of the Government was an incompetent and an imbecile, and that is the reason they left, and that is the reason that appears before the eyes of the country in language which anybody accustomed to read between the lines, can clearly understand. But to-day the hon. gentleman does not scruple to come down and ask this House to believe, with the echo of the language used by the Finance Minister still ringing in our ears, that his statement was false, and that the real reason they left was that it was a matter of public interest. Why, Sir, is it not time that this system of public deception should cease, and that this House, at least, should be treated with the respect due to the representatives of the people, and told the truth? Why, Sir, the ship of state—if I may be allowed to use a maritime expression, coming as I do from a maritime part of the Dominion—started out a year ago under this hon. gentleman, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, tight, staunch and strong, and reputed to be in every respect, seaworthy. What did we see? We saw the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) while she was rolling in the deep seas of remedial legislation, suddenly bolt, run away from the ship, desert her, and, as my hon. friend beside me said, sulk in his tent for two or three days, and was it public interest that drove the hon. gentleman out? Did he leave because he could not agree with the policy of the Government? No explanations have ever been vouchsafed to us here; but the hon. gentleman was led back by the ear two or three days afterwards, and told to be a good boy, and he came back whipped into line, looking very sheepish for several days here.

not able to open his mouth, and never to this day has he had pluck to stand up and tell us why he left. But I will tell them what he had the pluck to do, and this I will give him credit for; he is about the only one of the English-speaking members of the Government who has had the pluck to say what the policy of the Government really is on the subject of remedial legislation. He said it on the floor of this House, and he said it in Antigonish, and I believe he repeated the same statement in Cardwell. But did anybody ever hear the Finance Minister say anything, that was not equivocal and capable of leaving a retreat open for him, as to what the object was? Never. I will do the hon. gentleman from Pictou that justice at least, that he had a policy, and he had the pluck to say what it was. But, Sir, after he ran away from the ship, signed articles and ran away, and was brought back by the ear, he remained here for some time in the Government until this big bolt came. But when the big ship was rolling, as I say, with its cargo of remedial legislation on board, then came what my hon. friend described as the great bolt of the three members. Well, Sir, I thought they were sincere. Everybody thought the Postmaster General must be sincere, because he was known to be a man who based his public life upon principle. There are other men who might be open to the accusation, there are other men in this House who might be open to the accusation, that other motives than public interest prompted them to take this extraordinary course; but did ever anybody hear that the hon. Postmaster General was accused of that? We all knew that when he went out, accompanied by that bold lion, who sits behind him, we all knew that the hon. gentleman meant business. He went out upon principle, he went out because he thought the interest of his compatriots was being—not lost, but sold, sacrificed; and he remained out two or three days with a very bold face on, and he came back as a cat to lick the milk again, humbled, tamed, subdued, if I may repeat the language of my leader. He has remained there ever since, whipped into line. One lesson was enough for him, and I do not think anybody will ever catch him going out of the Government again, no matter what is at stake. But to-day I call his attention to the fact that his colleague, who had the pluck and manliness to go out on principle—a view of the principle in which I myself do not agree with at all—but he who went out on that principle believing that he was right, to-day has the respect of all honest men, French and English; while those who went out professedly on principle and came back, sacrificing their principle, have earned the contempt of all honest men. I hope if he has respect for public life at all, if he has respect for the high models of public life which he says we ought to follow in England, he knows that when a man sacrifices his place and power for principle, he has the respect of friends and foes alike. But when a political mountebank or time-server professedly goes out on principle, and eats the leek, and comes back and swallows the principle, he earns the contempt of those with whom he sits, and is despised by his opponents. Well, Sir, what did we see next? We find, Sir, this old ship of state I am talking about, staggering into the parliamentary harbour here the other day, dismasted, running under jury-mast, as my colleague from Queen's County (Mr. Welsh) phrased it the other day to me, and we find, Sir, that notwithstanding the wrecked condition in which she was, public proclamation was made by the Finance Minister that, all suspicions and declarations to the contrary, there was nothing but unity on board that ship, unity among the officers and unity amongst the crew. The hon. gentleman, a few weeks previously, had taken the trouble to go up to Smith's Falls and had proclaimed in the loudest tones he was capable of using that all stories to the effect that there was disaffection in the Cabinet, were untrue, that they were all united, each one to the other, and all to their chief; and he called upon the people to rally around them under the old National Policy because they were united, and because they were loyal, and because, in his opinion, that policy was good for the country. He came here to Parliament. He joined in the public proclamation that peace still continued, that there was unity. He joined in putting a Speech into the mouth of His Excellency. He came down to the House and had that Speech read. He put his name on the Order paper that he would move that the Speech be taken into consideration by this House, and, after having put His Excellency in the most awkward position he could possibly place him, he had the meanness at that particular juncture, and the treachery, I will say, too, to resign his position and throw affairs into a crisis where, except for an accident, the Speech never would have been answered at all. Well, Sir, he tells us that although he joined, as he stated in his explanation the other day, Sir Mackenzie Bowell's Cabinet with many misgivings, he and they had unitedly and loyally striven to maintain that Cabinet intact, and to carry out the principles upon which it was originally formed. What a strange commentary we have had on that official declaration made by the hon. gentleman. I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the House to the fact, that while the words used by the ex-Minister of Finance are still ringing in this Chamber, that they, as a Government, had unitedly and loyally striven to carry out the policy of the Government, within a few days we had the celebrated Caron-Montague letters read in this House, showing the statement was true that the members of the Cabinet had been, for the past twelve months, flying at each others throats, fighting internally, and that fact was known to the hon. gentleman when he placed his name to the statement that they were loyally united. We have more than that. We had a statement made here by a late member of the Government that at the very time the ex-Finance Minister pledged his word to the statement that the Government were loyal and united, such statement was not true, because the Minister of Railways came to him and told him that "Caron," to use his expression, "should be kicked out of the Cabinet altogether." We have, Sir, the public rumours, which have never been denied, so far as I know, that the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Public Works carried their union and their loyalty to the extent of fighting across the Council Chamber Board. These particular evidences would not show that the Cabinet was united and loyal, but the hon. gentleman, who has made similar statements before, rose in this House and, speaking on behalf of himself and his friends, made that declaration of loyalty and unity which was contradicted so pointedly by one of his former colleagues, the late Controller of Customs, yesterday. One would naturally ask whether, under the circumstances, the old ship is worth saving. I think she is. I think, although the country has been torn by internal dissensions and discussions, she is worth saving, as well from foreign foes as domestic enemies. We have a policy to save her, and we have a leader who can save her. It is true she may have a dangerous cargo on board just now, but I think her timbers and hull are pretty sound yet, and, with a good captain, and an efficient crew, she may be threshed through this storm, and reach her port of destination. But she wants new masts, she needs a new captain, and, I think she must have a fresh crew, and the sooner hon. gentlemen opposite go back to the owners and give up the articles they have signed, and let new officers be elected, the better it will be for themselves and for the country.

Mr. DAVIN. Will you supply the fog horn?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I need not while you are on deck. I was calling attention, before the interruption, to the fact that the confidence of the public, on which we, as legislators, must depend, has been rudely shaken since Parliament met. My hon. friend referred to a session of Parliament a few years ago. It is within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that when the McGreevy-Connolly scandals were first exhumed and exhibited in this House we thought Canada had reached the point of degradation, below which there was no lower depth. But we had the Caron episode afterwards, and, at that time, the hon. gentleman boasted he would like to repeat it if he had the opportunity, and we found then there was a depth a little lower than we had previously supposed. Then the want of confidence which spread and permeated the whole public, was confirmed by the Curran Bridge scandal, and the incapacity and mismanagement which was shown to have characterized the administration of the public departments. And to-day our humiliation is complete. A lower depth has been found when we learn that, in addition to incapacity and mismanagement, treachery and mutiny have been found to exist at the very foot of the vice-regal throne. Sir, one day we are told that hon. gentlemen opposite have a leader entitled to respect. One day the hon. gentleman, the Finance Minister, comes down and asks his followers to give their adhesion and their loyalty to a man who, I think, he, or, at all events, one of his colleagues, at the Bowell banquet in Belleville, declared was a man worthy of being selected by Her Majesty for the high position in which he was placed, and at that banquet the true and faithful were called upon to rally around this able man who had been selected to succeed Sir John Thompson. They came down to Parliament, and in the Speech from the Throne intimated that Sir Mackenzie Bowell was a fit and proper person to continue in the leadership; but two or three days afterwards, those hon. gentlemen came down and told us in euphemistic language that he was incapacitated for the post, and was a fool. We were further told that they could have no confidence in a Government so constituted. But we are now told that those mutineers have gone back, and to-day they are feeding at the public crib, as the Postmaster General says, from a sense of public duty, and, as their followers outside the House allege, from party allegiance. Party allegiance can excuse a good deal, but it is hateful and disgusting when it involves the loss of self-respect. I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, whether those hon. gentlemen, after the statement they made here that their leader was a man unfit to govern and to rule, and who went out because they thought the state was unsafe under his guidance, can possibly have any self-respect now they have gone back under the same man, without a single change in the composition of the Cabinet, except the introduction of Sir Charles Tupper, Bart. If they can have self-respect, can any of their followers have respect for them? I should like hon. gentlemen to ask, not those who place party loyalty and party allegiance in the fore-front, but men in the party who believe there is public honour, truth, and justice, what they think of the position which those hon. gentlemen have assumed, and of the respect which should be entertained for men acting as they have acted. Sir, the hon. gentlemen have fallen into the error of mistaking opportunism for statesmanship, and have to learn that self-seeking is not patriotism. If truth, honour and patriotism can all be sacrificed on the altar of self, then there is a poor future in store for this country. But I have no such low estimate of the better element in the Conservative party, because I know, myself, hundreds of them who are as good, or better, than I am.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say, unhesitatingly, that I know there are hundreds of such, not in this city, but scattered throughout the Dominion, and the contempt with which we look upon these men is exceeded by the contempt with which these honest Conservatives look at them. Why, Sir, the party heeler may to-day shout with joy, and the hoodler may smile at the possible return of the good times when he can fleece the public treasury again. But the old-fashioned virtues of truth and honour which are still enshrined in the hearts of the tens of thousands of Conservatives in this Dominion impel them to look with loathing and contempt upon men who went out one day because their master was an imbecile, and not finding anything to do, went back again under the same master to the crib, at which they had been feeding. But, Sir, the verdict which Cardwell has pronounced, and the verdict which Montreal Centre has pronounced, and the verdict which Jacques Cartier has pronounced was repeated yesterday by West Huron, and, if I mistake not, it will be re-echoed in every district in Canada where truth is valued above deception, and where self-respect and honesty have not been bartered for falsehood and selfishness.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise this afternoon with the least idea in the world of following up the apologies, and substitutions for argument and logic, which have been so freely used by hon. gentlemen opposite. Neither do I intend to ask the members of this House, who have something much better to do, to give me one single moment of their time in listening to any attempt of mine to reply to the usual—no, I am not quite right in saying simply the usual—but the more than usual exaggerations and misrepresentations which these hon. gentlemen have made, of documents which have been placed before them, and are to-day in the public records to be read by them, and by all members of this House. What in the world, a gentleman thinks, before an intelligent House, and in an intelligent country, can be gained by a mere parody and utter misrepresentation of the documents submitted—and submitted in no haste—and put upon the records, I cannot, for the life of me, conceive. That these hon. gentlemen have done from the first one who spoke (Mr. Laurier) to the last one who has just sat down (Mr. Davies). I am here to be judged, and every public man is to be judged, by his own statement, made from his heart, and uttered from his lips; but I am not here to be judged by any suspicion, and by any parody, and by any misrepresentation that an opponent may make of that statement. The very moment that gentlemen in a representative assembly go off from the solid ground of taking the statement that a man actually made, and believing it, as they are bound to do, that moment they leave gentlemanly and parliamentary discussion, and appeal to a plane which is far lower and far more unworthy. These hon. gentlemen opposite talk about kaleidoscopic changes. I think I can see a kaleidoscope change on the other side of the House. I think that a spirit has come over the dreams of these hon. gentlemen now, as compared with a few days ago. I read their faces to-day, as I read them before. They are not so pleasant-looking. Their smiles are not so seductively alluring, and their cast of countenance is in quite a different mould. You would think, Sir, that between that day and this a funeral had occurred. Perhaps it is the funeral of the ill-starred, and too quickly begotten hopes that hon. gentlemen opposite formed a few days ago; a repetition of hopes that they have formed again and again, and buried in a mantle of disappointment. That is the hope that maybe, the Conservative party some time or other would be so foolish as to go to pieces by internal dissensions, and let them come into power. Sir, contrasting that period of two or three days ago with the period of to-day, and contrasting the varying facial expressions of the hon. gentlemen, the truth of the whole matter can be easily seen. A day or two ago they were hopeful that they would get into power, because they could creep through a chink in the Conservative ranks, but to-day they see the Conservative ranks solidly opposing them, and displaying a united front. The other day, Sir, tears were not hot enough nor copious enough to properly represent their feelings of heartfelt sympathy for the Bowell Government. To-day, Sir, their indignation and hot words of contempt are not strong enough to show their hatred of that same Bowell Government which they declare has not been strengthened by the addition of a single element. Take the false sympathy of these hon. gentlemen, and their equally false expressions of contempt that they do not, in their hearts, feel, and you have an unerring barometer which tells you the state of their political temperature. Now, I put it to the members of the House, and I put it to the people of the country who will read these debates, because the country is interested enough to read them, I ask if these gentlemen opposite have, in their discussion of the subject this afternoon touched the germ of the question in dispute during this critical period of the last week. They have uttered their words of contempt, they have had their expressions of deep loathing, they have had these hoarded up for the last week to be delivered to the House. They have given us the pleasure of listening to some very good comic rehearsals by my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), and some very good mock tragedy by my hon. friend (Mr. Davies). But, outside of that, where has there been a business-like or statesmanlike discussion of the issues involved so as to show where the members or the leaders of the Conservative party were wrong. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), who started the discussion, gave, unfortunately (and I think not altogether to his own credit), a wrong trend to the discussion, by making a complete parody of the statement which was read by myself in the House a few days ago. Others followed him, and they ended up with the declaration that the statement which had been submitted, after having been presented to His Excellency, and read in this and the other House to-day, was completely subversive of, and contradictory to, the statement which was read previously. Here are the two statements, and both of them will be on the records of the House. I challenge any honest and reasonable man to read the two of them and not see that they entirely agree as to the main question which has been the central point of the differences that existed between the members of the Government. Leave aside, for a moment, all the misinterpretations, the inferences, the imaginations which have been founded upon, and drawn from, the first statement, and when you boil it down it means exactly this: That seven members of the Government, bound by their oath of office as Privy Councillors to give their best consideration to the public questions which come before them, without personal considerations of any kind, that these seven gentlemen came to the conclusion that, upon a certain point, there existed a sufficient reason for them to insist upon the strengthening and completion of the Government. No man can deny that. To-day, Sir, the statement which has been read here by my hon. colleague who represents the Premier and the Government in this House makes that the very kernel and gist of its meaning. It says, as plainly as the English language can put it, that between members of the Government there was a difference often discussed, as to the constitutional propriety as well as on the policy, not simply of meeting this House, but of coming to the transaction of the business of this House with a Government that was incomplete and not, therefore, as strong as it should be. Has one of the gentlemen opposite discussed the constitutional question as to whether or not this was sufficient ground to cause a difference of opinion leading to the result reached? Let us look at the facts of the case. When this House was in session last year, a vacancy occurred in the ranks of the Government arising out of an important question of policy which was discussed in this House. Owing to that difference a member of the Government handed in his resignation, and the office he held remained vacant during the remainder of last session. It was asked in this House when that office would be filled, and it was stated that it would be filled. That vacancy was more than an ordinary vacancy, from the fact that it arose out of a question that was more than an ordinary question; and the seven members of the former Government who resigned contended, and held to the contention, that any vacancy in the ranks of a Government held over from one session to another was not according to constitutional practice, and was not conducive to strength. In this case, they conceived, that contention had even more force because of the peculiar nature of the circumstance out of which the vacancy had occurred; and it was on that point, as stated both in the first statement made by the seven Ministers who resigned, and as stated by the Premier in another place this afternoon—it was upon that point that the differences existed, and upon that point that the resignations took place. Now, Sir, that vacancy has been filled, and consequently the Premier is able to present a completed Government; and that vacancy has been filled from the same province from which the vacancy was made, and by an adherent, and a favourable adherent, of the very same question out of which the vacancy arose last year. The Government has been completed, then, and it has been strengthened by the addition to it of the hon. gentleman whose name has been mentioned here to-day—Sir Charles Tupper, Baronet. Some gentlemen on the other side rose to the occasion, as they always do, and have tried to break the force of that addition to the Government by saying that one member of the family went out and another come in, but the plums remained in the family just the same. These gentlemen are inaccurate as usual. Sir Charles Tupper has been in the enjoyment of one of the highest offices in the gift of this country, where he has stood between this country and the Imperial authorities, where he has been of the utmost service to this country. Sir Charles Tupper, true as always to the call of his party and to the interests of his party, to-day resigned that high and honourable and distinguished office in order to come down among the rank and file of his fellow labourers in the old Conservative party to help to lead them to victory again, as he has often done in the past. And Sir Charles Tupper, the younger, my colleague—whose absence from the present Government I and all my colleagues deplore, whose services were of the best and whose abilities were of the highest in the Government—he is with us still, though he has voluntarily and for the good of the party been willing to return to the rank and file of ordinary membership, and battle strongly and loyally and effectively, as he did before, for the progress and prosperity of the party; but, Sir, he does it now without the salary that attaches to the Minister of the Crown, and therefore my hon. friend opposite was wrong. But what position is that for a man who aspires to be a statesman? What expression is that for a man who hopes some day himself to become a member of a Government in Canada—to taunt us on this side with not being gentlemen; to taunt us with lowering the type and the grade of public life in this country: to point to a man on this side, one of my colleagues or myself, as feeding at the public crib. Is that my hon. friend's idea of what governments or Ministeries mean? If so, all I have to say is that the moment his lips utter a sentence of that kind he pronounces his own condemnation. So I say there is no difference in the statement as handed down by myself on behalf of the gentlemen who retired from the Ministry a few days ago and the statement that has been authorized by the Premier to be read here to-day in so far as the main points of the question is concerned. Some men say to us, Why did you agree with the Speech and put it in the mouth of His Excellency, and then, before it was discussed and passed by this House, tender your resignations? The Premier himself, in his statement as read here to-day, has given the reason and the only reason. We often discussed that question of constitutional difference with him. In his statement to-day he says that up to the very time of the meeting of the House he had hoped to be able to fill that vacancy, and so present a united Government to carry on the business of the country, and that his own disappointment was equal to ours when he found that he was not able to do it. But, Sir, cannot six or seven gentlemen, who have gone in and out of this House of Commons and who have been before this country for some considerable time, say that in duty bound—and reading that duty in the only light in which they could read it—they were perfectly consistent having once insisted on the constitutional practice in handing in their resignations and not consenting to remain in the Government when that constitutional practice seemed to them not going to be carried out? Cannot they be considered as having some regard to the contention that was held as fundamental? Cannot they be considered as being honest in that? And is it wise—does it help to raise the tone of public life in Canada—is it true or honest—to say that when they have these convictions and carry them out, they are to be charged with treachery, with conspiracy, with everything that is dark and underhand and mean? I think if such had been the rule in past times, the history of no Cabinet or government under the sun would have been free of the same charge; for in all cabinets and all governments differences of opinion will arise, which will be fought out to the end and will result in the resignations of those who feel that they cannot give in to the contentions that prevail in the Cabinet. Now, Sir, the great desire and the great aim, evinced the other day in this House by my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, persisted in to-day by some of his followers, spread throughout the country from one end to the other most sedulously, is to make it appear that there is a reason behind the reason; and that reason they read to be that there is a lack of unanimity in the Government on some vital questions of policy. I say again that the only basis you can have for argument amongst gentlemen and in a parliamentary assembly is to take the records and the statements and argue from them. And taking the records and the statements, can my hon. friend find warrant for an assertion of that kind? No, Sir, he cannot, but he is one of those gentlemen who will inquire in this way. If you make a statement that the sun rises at six o'clock in the morning and sets at six o'clock at night, he will take up that statement and read it, and then declare that although you said this, what you meant was that the sun rises at six at night and sets at six in the morning. In reply to that kind of misrepresentation you can have no argument. It may, however, be of some benefit to those in the country who hear of or read the hon. gentleman's statement, to place the truth just briefly before the House this afternoon. The hon. gentleman could find nothing better to do a moment ago than to rise and coolly assert that I had made no statement in this House or the country from which any intelligent man could find out my position on the Manitoba school question. He said that I had gone to Smith's Falls and said something there. So I did, and I will tell the hon. gentleman what I did say. But I will tell the hon. gentleman first what I said in this House last session, and if my hon. friend thinks himself unable to understand English, he may give other gentlemen credit for knowing what the English language means. I said this on July 8th of last year:

A session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If by that time, the Manitoba Government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievances of the minority—

Does my honourable friend understand that?

—the Dominion Government will be prepared at the next session of Parliament, to be called as above stated—

To wit, as stated in the first line of the paragraph that I am reading—

--to introduce and press to a conclusion—

Is not that definite?

—such legislation as will afford an adequate relief to the said minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895.

It strikes me that that is tolerably plain, concise English. Mr. Foster was at Smith's Falls, said the hon. gentleman, and made a statement. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have a copy of the statement that I made there, and from which, the hon. gentleman said, no man could gather at all what position I took upon this question. This is what I said:

I tell you, as one having authority to say it, that on that question of policy, as stated definitely by me in the House and by Sir Mackenzie Bowell in the Senate, every member of the Government sees eye to eye. Our opponents get up their fanciful narrations as to who is not and who is going to approve it.

I think I must have had the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) in my eye.

It is all simple imagination. Every one of the Government is united upon that just as closely as upon the trade question—that is, altogether and unanimously.

Here you have our position as a whole, as a Government, and on both these questions. Now, I appeal to fair-play, to the sense of what is right in this House and out of it, to know whether that is a statement which is clear and definite. And if my hon. friend wants more, I will read him another bit of fairly terse English. That is in the statement read by me the other night:

I may say, in the first place, that there is no disagreement between ourselves and the Premier upon any question of public policy, trade or constitutional, with regard to which action has been already taken, or in respect to which an attitude has been already assumed by the Government under the present Premier.

And yet, in the face of those consecutive statements, first, my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, and then those who follow him, find nothing better to do than make the assertion that the real reason is something else than what I give as the reason, and that there is no unity in the Cabinet on this question. My hon. friend thinks he has stated the whole case when he says that Ministers went about the country from place to place and declared that the Government was united while all the time they were disunited. Again my hon. friend will not state the facts. Let him read those statements. We stated that the Government were thoroughly united upon all the essential lines of its policy. And so it was. But I suppose it will be many and many generations before you will find a Cabinet, all the members of which agree with each other on all the different questions that come before it for discussion and decision. Now, I make these few remarks simply to draw back the attention of the House and country as well to what is really involved in the differences that have taken place, and which are simply and concisely set forth in both statements, and which consequently we may take to be true and to be the real reasons. We need not, therefore, go about looking for others that are not stated. These statements show that these differences were, in the opinion of the seven Ministers, as stated by the Premier in his statement read to-day, on the ground of the completion of the Government in accordance with constitutional practice and the strengthening of the Government, that on those points they were of sufficient weight to give us a basis for our action; that we thought so and took the action we did honourably and as men, and we stood by that action until the trouble was removed and the Government presented, as it does to-day, a united body, with its departments complete and most materially strengthened as well. I do not wish to sit down, even after making these few remarks—and I expected to make but a few—without stating this, that the attitude of the Liberal-Conservative party in this trying period of six or eight days has been an attitude which must strike the country, and strike it forcibly. Without panic, without passion, steady and true, the members of the Liberal-Conservative party, as represented here at Ottawa, stood firmly upon the principles of their party, with that solidity behind it which assured everybody, as leaders or otherwise, that come what would, a strong, steady, hopeful combination would emerge from it all, with differences healed, with dissension set aside, ever loyal and firm to their lifelong principles and determined to conduct them to a successful issue in the elections which are shortly to come. My hon. friend who spoke so slightly of Sir Charles Tupper, who has entered this Cabinet, might deem himself fortunate indeed if he had a record of such patriotism and ability.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, and of such sterling service to his country. My hon. friend before now has shown that he can be very brave in denunciation when his opponent is not before him. He seems to have feared that the public would forget his idiosyncrasy in that respect, and he wished to give another proof and exemplification of that trait in his character. Let me inform the hon. gentleman that Sir Charles Tupper will be in his seat before many days are over. My hon. friend can get ready all his vigorous Anglo-Saxon, and he will find, as he has always found, in Sir Charles Tupper a foeman worthy of his steel, one who before his denunciation will neither cower nor blench.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that, notwithstanding all that the hon. Minister of Finance has said in defence of the reorganization of the Government, neither the House nor the country will be deceived with reference to the reasons assigned by the hon. member a few days ago for the retirement of himself and a number of his colleagues from the Administration and the reasons assigned to-day for their going back. In his speech to-day the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to impress the House with the view that the sole ground for difference of opinion in the Government was that he and the others who withdrew from the Government desired to see certain vacancies filled, and that the Prime Minister had failed to comply with their wishes. If we look at the changes that have taken place in the Government we can only come to the conclusion that these hon. gentlemen, when they told us that they desired that the Government should be strengthened, were very easily satisfied; for, excepting the retirement of the hon. ex-Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), there has been, so far as this House is concerned, no practical change in the Administration. I am quite sure that when the hon. Minister told the House the other day that the retiring members desired to see the Government strengthened, and they wished to see the strongest men of the Conservative party introduced into it, he did not wish to have it inferred that the Minister of Justice was the one incapable man in the Administration, and that they retired along with him for the purpose of getting rid of him. That was not the impression made upon my mind, and I am quite sure that was not the impression made upon the mind of any hon. gentleman on either side of the House. When we look at the statement, the carefully prepared statement, made by the hon. gentleman on behalf of himself and those associated with him, we cannot but see that, if the whole is taken into consideration, there is much in it that is omitted from the paper read by the hon. Postmaster-General to-day. The hon. Minister of Finance told us on that occasion that he and his colleagues who had withdrawn from the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell entered it with a great deal of misgiving.

We have nevertheless unitedly and loyally striven to the best of our ability to make it strong and efficient, and it has been with growing regret that we have seen our efforts result in a measure of success less than that for which we had hoped and striven.

Does the hon. gentleman stand by that statement still? Does he say that they entered the Government with misgiving, that they consider the present Prime Minister an incapable man, that they suspected his incapacity at the time they consented to serve under him, and that after twelve months' experience they discovered his incapacity to be even greater than they had feared? That, Sir, is the statement the hon. gentleman made to the House the other day as the chief reason for withdrawing from the Administration. Has that defect been corrected? Has the Prime Minister withdrawn from his position? Has another Premier been found? If not, then what reason have these hon. gentlemen for returning to the Administration now? The more this statement is examined the more it will be seen that it was a much more candid statement than the one read to the House by the Postmaster-General to-day. Does any hon. gentleman seriously entertain the opinion that these hon. gentlemen, with a majority of fifty behind them in this House, were afraid to meet this House and dreaded their inability to carry on the Government because a certain place in the Administration had not been filled up? The hon. gentleman says in effect: Mr. Angers retired from the Government some months ago; we pressed upon the Premier the propriety of filling that position; the Premier neglected to do so, and for that reason we withdrew from the Administration. Sir, that is not the statement these hon. gentlemen made a few days ago: that was not the reason they gave for their withdrawal from the Administration. They assigned wholly different reasons, and I say again that I have no doubt that the statement read by the hon. Minister of Finance was a more candid statement than the one that has been submitted to-day as a reason for the return of these hon. gentlemen to the Administration. The hon. gentleman spoke of misgivings as to the capacity of the Premier, which misgivings he found to be more than justified by a year's experience. Now, what has been done to strengthen the Government? What has transpired to induce the hon. gentleman to return to the office he held before or to induce his colleagues to join him? The hon. gentleman will not pretend to say that Sir Charles Tupper possesses ability so much superior to his son, the hon. gentleman's late colleague, that he is justified in going back again because one has gone out and the other has come in. The hon. gentleman did not point to the ex-Minister of Justice when he gave his reasons for returning. It was not by the withdrawal of the ex-Minister of Justice that he expected to strengthen the Administration. The defect in the Administration, according to his statement, was in its head; the Prime Minister was said to be incapable and must be got rid of. But these hon. gentlemen, without getting rid of the Prime Minister, fearing that their occupations might be gone, have returned and have consented to continue to serve under him. All the facts show that these hon. gentlemen sought to become tools in the hands of one man in order that they might be the destroyers of another. They have not succeeded. They may have got their friend into the Administration, the man whom they hope will assist them in the elections; but they have not got rid of the man who they said was an incubus upon the Conservative party and the continuance of whose premiership would prove a disaster to the party. Sir, there was a time, I suppose, when the hon. gentlemen thought that when the brains were out of a Government, the Government would die; and the hon. gentleman retired, and his associates retired with him, and they thought the life of the Government would cease. But the Government did not die, and these hon. gentlemen have come back into the Administration again. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has spoken of exaggeration, and misrepresentation, and parody of the statement he read the other day to the House, in the speeches that were made by the leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). What did either hon. gentleman say with respect to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance, that is not borne out by the statement itself? Did he not say that the Prime Minister was incapable? Did he not say that he was utterly unfit for his post? Did he not say that unless he was got rid of it would be disastrous to the Conservative party in the coming elections? Is not all that set out in the statement which the hon. gentleman made? Are not those the reasons given by the hon. gentleman for retiring from the Administration? And the Prime Minister, this incapable man, this imbecile man, is still at the head of the Administration, and the hon. gentleman has come back to serve under him. That is the position which the hon. gentleman occupies at this moment. Why, Sir, the hon. Minister of Finance talks about standing for principle. The hon. gentleman talks platitudes, and they have not served him a good purpose on the present occasion. Some years ago, there was a church critic who said that his church was divided into three great schools—there were the platitudinarians, the latitudinarians, and the attitudinarians. Well, we have had in the speech made by the hon. gentleman on this occasion, the platitudinarians. The hon. gentleman has travelled over a great deal of ground, and has spoken of his devotion to principle. But he has said very little in defence of the reasons which he assigned the other day for retiring from the Government, and for returning, under circumstances which he led us to believe were such as to preclude his entering the Government again. Sir, let me say that the hon. gentleman in his speech spoke of his devotion to principle. What principle was he devoted to? He said, the constitutional principle of going out of a Government if the Prime Minister did not fill up at the moment a particular seat in the Administration. Now, Sir, I have pointed out before that the hon. Minister has entered the Government again with still one seat vacant. Why did not the hon. gentleman insist upon the office of Solicitor General being filled before returning? He did not. The office is still vacant. The hon. gentleman does not think that it is of such a character as to lead to a revolution in the Government, and so he comes back again. Why, then, can any one believe that the hon. gentleman wishes us to take him seriously? He says that seven members retired from the Administration because one seat in the Administration was, for a time being, vacant. Has the hon. gentleman ever been member of a Government before when a seat was vacant in the Administration? Why, Sir, it is important that the seats in this House should be filled; it is important that the people of this country should be represented on the floor of this Parliament. What has the Government done, what is he responsible for having been done during the past ten days? Why, to denude this House of a number of its members and transfer them to the other Chamber. How then, could the hon. gentleman sit in the Government with a number of seats vacant in the Senate for years? The constitution provides that there shall be a certain representation for each province, and for each division in this Chamber. Has the hon. gentleman taken care that that clause of the constitution is complied with in that regard? Not at all. He has wholly disregarded this provision of the law, notwithstanding his devotion to principle on this one occasion. Now, Sir, let me say that the Prime Minister the other day declared that the statement made by the hon. gentleman on the floor of this House was uncalled for, that it was undignified, that it was unfair. Has the hon. gentleman apologized to the Prime Minister? Why is it that the hon. gentleman has not given to the House some explanation of the character of this document which he read? Upon what terms has he gone back into the Administration again? How is it that the man whose political life he undertook to take a few days ago, is the one under whom now he is ready to serve? What change has taken place in the circumstances? Sir, the hon. gentleman has acted very much like a kangaroo: driven to stand at bay, he has undertaken to disembowel the Government, and, failing in that, he has returned, and is ready to serve in it. Sir, the hon. gentleman says the Government is completed, they are all back in their places again. The hon. gentleman says the whole Conservative party is united. I suppose he counts the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) a nobody, he counts for nothing. I supposed the hon. member for West York was a member of the Conservative party. I did not know he had been read out, I did not know that the hon. gentleman had authority to excommunicate the hon. member for West York from the party. And yet the hon.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

gentleman declares that the whole party are united in this House, and so stands before the country, and that we on this side of the House are greatly disconcerted because we see the Conservative party united. Well, Sir, it does not disconcert me, and I am quite sure it does not disconcert any of my hon. friends sitting beside me, or behind me, to see the Conservative party in this House united. We rather prefer to see them in that condition than making the exhibition which they did during the past week. We do not think it redounds to the honour of Parliament, or to the credit of the country, to have such an exhibition made on the floor of Parliament as the hon. gentlemen have made during the past ten days. Why, Sir, we had a Speech delivered by His Excellency, by the advice of these gentlemen, and before this House had any opportunity whatever of considering that Speech, seven of those gentlemen who had advised it, withdrew from the Administration. The hon. gentleman may think that he is devoted to constitutional principles, but it seems to me there was a very wide departure from one essential principle of our constitutional system when the hon. gentlemen, under these circumstances, withdrew from the Administration. Sir, the hon. gentleman admitted that he had misgivings as to the chances of the party with which he is associated, succeeding in the next election. His misgivings were so great that he retired under unusual circumstances, accompanied by six of his colleagues. He has strengthened the Administration, so he tells us, by bringing in one prominent gentleman of the Conservative party, and putting out another. Now, Sir, does the hon. gentleman, under these circumstances, expect to succeed? Within the last few months, five constituencies represented by supporters of the Government in this House have become vacant, and four of the five have returned opponents of the Administration. That is the prospect that the hon. gentleman has before him, and so it does not disturb us on this side of the House in the least to find the supporters of the Government standing by them. It does not disturb us in the least to find those who left the Administration returning to it again; it does not disturb us in the least to find them supported on their return by the late High Commissioner. We are perfectly willing when the time comes to meet those hon. gentlemen on the hustings, and we have no doubt that the verdict of the entire country will be what it has been in the constituencies in which elections have recently been held. The hon. gentleman will find that the exhibition which he has made and the humiliation and degradation to which Parliament has been subjected by the course which he and others have taken during the past ten days will, notwithstanding the aid of the late High Commissioner, prove disastrous to them when the day of trial comes.

Mr. HAZEN. Mr. Speaker, I would not rise this afternoon for the sake of protracting the discussion which has taken place on the motion of adjournment that has been made by the hon. gentleman who is leading the House, were it not that I desire to place on record my own personal regret that in the Cabinet changes which have taken place on the reconstruction of the new Ministry the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who until very recently has occupied with credit to himself and with satisfaction to the country the honourable position of Minister of Justice, has thought it necessary to retire from the Government. I feel, Sir, in giving expression to that feeling that I am not only voicing my own personal feelings, but voicing the feeling not only of hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the Chamber where the hon. gentleman sits, but also of many hon. gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of this Chamber as well. During the first three or four years I had a seat in this Parliament, representing as I do a maritime constituency, and one largely interested in matters pertaining to the Department of Marine and Fisheries over which the hon. gentleman then presided, I came very much indeed in contact with that hon. gentleman in the administration of his department, and though, as he knows, there were times when I differed from him on matters regarding the administration of that department so far as my constituency was concerned, at the same time I always attributed to him, as I think the whole country has done, the most honest motives in all his actions, and I never received anything but the greatest personal kindness at the hands of my hon. friend. No man, I think I am safe in saying, of his age in Canadian politics has ever had so distinguished a career in the history of this country. He is regarded by friends and foe alike as honourable, competent and capable. And all those who desire to have competent and honourable men in the government of the country will trust that at some time in the future, in the not very far distant future we may see the hon. gentleman occupying a still more distinguished position in the Government of the country even than he has occupied up to the present time. My honourable and respected friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) found fault with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) because he criticised the speech which had been made by the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and he said that if those speeches had been disappointing to members on this side of the House, he could assure hon. gentlemen opposite that there was no such feeling on the Opposition benches, and he considered that those speeches had been strong and had been bitter. No one, I think, for a moment will question one part of that statement, that those speeches were at least bitter. If that is a merit in the speeches of public men, then I think hon. gentlemen on this side of the House concede at once not only that that merit was possessed, but that that merit was possessed in a very great degree, especially in the speech made by the hon. member for South Oxford. But, Sir, there was reason for the bitterness that possessed the souls of those hon. gentlemen. Only a few days have lapsed since a storm, to use the expression made use of very often in this debate, left the ship of state almost in the condition of that ship of state which my classical friend from South Oxford will remember was described by Horace, deprived of rowers and without sails. To-day, following the advice contained in that ode, they have bravely made the harbour, and the ship of state again sails on the sea of Canadian public life, furnished with all its oars and sails and crew, and capable of successfully buffeting the waves of opposition criticism. But the hon. member for South Oxford found fault in his usual manner. It is said that the ruling passion is strong in death, and whatever the reason may be I am unable to conceive, but whenever the hon. member feels especially bitter, he goes out of his way to insult the lower provinces, the maritime provinces of Canada. Just after the election of 1891, it is now historical that that hon. gentleman, then especially bitter at the verdict pronounced at the polls, especially by the overwhelming voice of the maritime provinces against the policy which he had advocated, wrote an article in which he said that the maritime provinces were things all shreds, patches and ragged remnants, that the people had no political convictions, but were simply influenced by promise or money in hand or subsidies for public works. To-day we find the same motives actuating the hon. gentleman. Sir, we find exactly the same vein of thought running through the hon. gentleman's mind, and again he assaults and insults in a manner that I think is without justification the sister province of Nova Scotia by saying that it is the cradle and birthplace of boodlers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No. I must correct the hon. gentleman, for I did not make such a statement. What I said was, not that Nova Scotia was the birthplace of boodlers, but that Nova Scotia had succeeded in developing the most highly developed article.

Mr. HAZEN. I accept, as I am bound to do, any statement or correction which the hon. gentleman may be disposed to make. Now he has told the House that Nova Scotia has produced the highest type of boodlers in this country. There is the same idea running through the hon. gentleman's mind whenever he becomes especially bitter, for some reason which as I said I do not understand, and he deems it necessary to go out of his way to offer insults to the lower provinces of this Dominion. I will say no more on this point. No doubt my hon. friends from my sister province of Nova Scotia—the hon. gentleman did not include my province in his remarks—will take him to task for the remarks he has made. I do not wish to protract the discussion. As a member of the Conservative party who believes in the party, in its history, traditions and policy, I think the Conservative party of this country has reason to congratulate itself on the strength of the Cabinet announced to-day. In the first place, we have as a member of that Cabinet an honourable representative of Montreal in the Senate, a gentleman of position in his province, a man who has occupied positions of the highest honour at the hands of the people, and who is a gentleman of the very highest character. In the second place I think it is an immense advantage to the Government and the party, and it will prove of advantage to the country, to have in the Cabinet a gentleman of the strong personality, the great ability and the thoroughly loyal Canadian patriotism of Sir Charles Tupper, who has consented to take a place in the Administration, and in a few days will occupy a seat on the floor of this House. I believe his appointment will be received with applause and approbation not only in the province of Nova Scotia where he is known and honoured as one of the greatest of our public men, not only in New Brunswick and in the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec, where his name is received with plaudits as a man who has done so much in the past to build up their industries, but also on the prairies of the west and in the province of British Columbia will his name be held in respect and prove a tower of strength, being that of a man who was one of the main instruments in building the Canadian Pacific Railway. And not only in Canada, and in every part of this Dominion, but in the great British Empire, in Great Britain itself, where there is no colonial statesman better known or more respected, his appointment to a seat in the Cabinet of Canada will be as heartily welcomed as in this country, and will have the greatest effect in helping to advance the welfare of this Dominion and strengthen its credit at the present time.

Mr. MULLOCK. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, the explanation that the Finance Minister has offered to the House and the country this afternoon of the unprecedented event that happened on 4th January inst., was that a vacancy occurred in the Cabinet in the month of July last and continued until the assembling of Parliament this month. That is the reason assigned in the paper read to-day, and that is the reason as endorsed by the speech of the Finance Minister. Now, if that is the case I venture to question the bona fides of that statement in the light of the evidence furnished in the House, and before the Finance Minister leaves the House I would like to ask him a question and will give him the floor for a brief moment if he wishes to reply. Will he explain to the House and to the country, why, that vacancy having existed from the 8th day of July, he and his colleagues did not resign sooner. I ask him why they postponed their resignations until the Address was prepared and placed in the hands of His Excellency; why they selected Saturday the 4th day of January, and I ask him further whether there was not a combination? Did he notify the First Minister at any time between the resignation of Mr. Angers and the assembling of Parliament, that he and his friends would take such a course if that vacancy were not filled? I pause for a reply. Mr. Speaker, the country is entitled to a fuller statement and a fuller explanation. The Finance Minister has heard my question but he remains silent. He cannot answer the question. I will take the hon. gentleman at his own word for a moment. He told us that they resigned on the 4th day of January because the Cabinet was incomplete. But the Cabinet had been incomplete since the previous July, and I ask, would it not have been his duty as an honourable man to have notified the Premier before the assembling of Parliament as to what he and the other six Ministers intended to do. Sir, we are told now that the whole cause of the strike has been removed by the filling of that one vacant portfolio. The country has not drawn that conclusion, nor has Parliament drawn such a conclusion. The press of the country has not drawn that conclusion, and I venture to say that when we go before the country, as I trust we shall in the near future, the electorate will not draw that conclusion. The question as to whether Ministers may embarrass a Cabinet is one thing, but it is a question now whether the conduct of Her Majesty's advisers will be condoned if it be established to the satisfaction of the public that one member of the Cabinet speaking for them all, has stated on the floor of Parliament for the information of the public a matter that is not true. Is the Cabinet bound to be frank and candid with the country, or is it to be allowed to adopt deception, concealment, and misrepresentation? What is the issue? It is contended that there was a deep laid plan to depose the First Minister and to appoint in his place Sir Charles Tupper, Sr. The Finance Minister tells us to-day that such is not a fact, and that the sole object of the strike was to cause a Cabinet vacancy to be filled in a constitutional way. The First Minister did not draw such a conclusion from the conduct of his confrères. He tells us, that he learned that their object was to strike at him. Speaking in the Upper Chamber last Thursday, the First Minister said in most unmistakable language, that the inference he drew from the paper read in the House, was that it was an attempt to strike at him, and he proceeded to defend himself and to declare his fidelity to his party. He contended that he had efficiently governed the country. But the Finance Minister tells us to-day that the First Minister was in error, and that he had drawn a wrong conclusion. Did the Finance Minister do what an honourable man would have done and apologize for the vagueness of the language used by him, and which led the First Minister to draw that wrong conclusion? Let me say further, Mr. Speaker, that the action of the strikers since the strike is not in harmony with the statement made by the Finance Minister to-day. Did they assist in reorganizing the Cabinet by allowing the First Minister that free hand which they professed they were willing he should have in order to fill up the vacancies? Why, Sir, the newspapers of the country are full of statements as to the conduct of the strikers during the period of the strike. Instead of allowing the First Minister to fill up the Cabinet, like ordinary strikers they set out their pickets, and whenever the First Minister made progress they succeeded in intimidating any member who would be willing to take office under him. Let me quote a statement from the Hamilton "Spectator," which I believe is a newspaper enjoying the confidence of the Government; a paper the loyalty of which to the Conservative party no one will question. The Ottawa correspondent on the 13th of January writes as follows to the "Spectator":

The seceding Ministers are working methodically and energetically. You might suppose the headquarters of the party was the place they would avoid, but such is not the case. There is generally one, and sometimes two or three of them at a time among the members. Some of the Bowell men expressed the opinion with considerable energy that the men who smashed the Cabinet should carry on their canvassing outside the rooms of the followers of the Ministry. The canvass is becoming a good deal more earnest and serious as the time draws nearer for meeting on the floor of Parliament.

That is the conduct of gentlemen who now say that they desired to give the First Minister a free hand in filling up the vacancies. The Toronto "Telegram," referring to an informal caucus of the Conservatives from the maritime provinces, said:

Foster made a speech that had the effect of stiffening the backs of the seceders.

The Toronto "World" of the 11th January, says:

If Sir Mackenzie fails in his present task it will be because of the adverse influences at work against him.

And so numerous other papers point out that these gentlemen adopted every possible method to prevent the Prime Minister reorganizing his Cabinet. Let me give you the evidence of the Hamilton "Spectator" of the 7th January, which doubts very much the reasons assigned for the action of the strikers:

There is nothing in the explanations to show why the Ministers should bolt just now after giving Sir Mackenzie Bowell and his policy their support even down to the preparation of the Speech from the Throne. It is manifest that the alleged reasons given in Mr. Foster's statement are no reasons at all, and that the real reason for the bolt remains to be guessed at.

That is the statement of an organ of the Government and not of a Grit newspaper. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Postmaster General, who leads the Government in this House, stated that he thought the action of the seceders, or the bolters as they are undignifiedly called, in returning to office, would meet with the approval of the country. Let me show the House, so far as I can in a few moments, how far their action has met with the approval of the country, and the quotations with which I will trouble the House will be wholly from Conservative and Independent Conservative papers. The Hamilton "Herald," which, I believe, is an independent journal, said editorially on the 13th of January:

Politicians will learn from it that treachery of the rankest character is not regarded simply as smart politics.

The same paper, on the 11th of January, in its Ottawa correspondence, says:

Conservatives are in high feather. Down with the seven traitors.

The same journal, on the 9th of January, said:

It is just a question for Conservatives to consider, if the men who have proved traitors to one leader, are not quite as likely to prove traitors to another and to the party itself.

A paper published under the shadow of this building, the Aylmer "Sun," of the 9th of January, says:

Many are calling for Sir Charles Tupper to take the helm, as being the one strong man who can command the more unruly and ambitious men who have helped to bring on the crisis.

In this connection let me read a statement made by the First Minister in which he says that the embarrassments of the Government were, in his opinion, not attributable to his weakness, but to the misconduct of his supporters, who made government under him an impossibility, and who were determined to destroy his usefulness and to break up his Government, with a view to securing the succession of some one else. The First Minister's precise words, spoken in the Senate one week ago, are as follows:—

I say that, had I had that loyal support which every Premier ought to have in his endeavours to govern the country, the support that was given most loyally to my late chief, Sir John Macdonald, and to Sir John Thompson, I would have been just as successful in carrying on the affairs of the Government as my predecessors. * * * Had not that jealousy prevailed and the ambition to destroy the usefulness of the Government been so firmly rooted in the breasts of those with whom I was associated, I flatter myself that we should have been as successful in carrying on the affairs of this country.

In proof of the suspicion that there were conspiracies against him, the First Minister in this same statement says that until the strike occurred, not one single intimation had been given to him that he was the man in the way.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was proceeding to say that the inference drawn by the public from the action of the gentlemen who withdrew from the Administration did not harmonize with the explanation given by the Ministry to-day: and I must apologize in advance for continuing that line of argument, which is instructive, though perhaps not interesting, and not altogether pleasurable to the gentlemen to whom the references are particularly made. Let me proceed with the evidence, to see whether the statement read to the House to-day, and endorsed by the speech of the Finance Minister, is entitled to credence or not: because, Sir, it is to be borne in mind that we are now testing a most important question in connection with constitutional government, whether or not a Government, or a section of a Government is entitled to represent Her Majesty in the Canadian Parliament who issue to the country statements which are, in themselves, misleading, which are intended to be misleading, and which, in another place, where strict parliamentary rules would not apply, would be characterized as absolutely false. Sir, the First Minister, speaking in another Chamber one week ago, after reading the explanation offered in this Chamber by the Finance Minister, of the reason for the strike of those seven gentlemen, used these words:

Can any of you conceive why, after the opening of the session, after the Speech from the Throne had been given, not only to Parliament, but to the whole country, you should find seven members of the Cabinet sending in their resignations—

Not, as they say to us to-day, because there was a vacancy in the Cabinet, but, as the Prime Minister says:

—simply because they did not like the gentleman with whom they had been so long associated?

I cite the First Minister as a witness against the statements of the strikers themselves. And, Sir, that the issue which I present is the true one, namely, that these strikers concocted a plan for the deposition of the First Minister and the elevation in his place of Sir Charles Tupper, is made abundantly clear in other ways. For example, there is published in Toronto a paper called the daily "World," which is well known to be under the control of, and, in fact, owned by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), and I have no doubt that the communications from Ottawa to this paper emanate from him, or are sanctioned by him; at all events, they are published with his responsibility. So that this extract which I am about to read bears, not only the weight of a Conservative journal, but that of a supporter of the Administration. I find, then, the Ottawa correspondent of that journal, on the 13th of January, writing as follows of the strike:

All this time, however, friends of the bolting Ministers were thoroughly organized, and played a game of checkmate. It is said they intimated to every member who consented or was disposed to join the Bowell Cabinet, that only failure would result.

And then, after alluding to some attempts at reconstruction, the writer goes on to say:

THE BOLTERS GOT IN THEIR WORK.

To-night the friends of the bolters are cock-a-hoop. It is hinted in some quarters that the dissentient Ministers have sent a statement to His Excellency charging the First Minister with misrepresenting their position to him. Report has it also that charges are to be preferred by the bolters against one of their late colleagues. This will take the shape of a statement by Mr. Foster in the House on Tuesday. From present appearances the outlook is a very gloomy one. Charges and counter-charges are being bandied about, with a freedom almost appalling. There is, moreover, lamentable lack of confidence, no one, seemingly, having confidence in his neighbour.

From present appearances, Sir Mackenzie will not be able to fill up the existing vacancies, and this being the case, there will be no alternative but for him to tender his resignation, when, it is expected, Sir Charles Tupper, sen., will be sent for.

There we have his organ giving to us, in advance, a culmination of this scheme. I shall now quote from an important paper, the Hamilton "Spectator," which, I think I am safe in saying, is the leading Conservative journal in Canada, west of Toronto, and a staunch supporter of the Conservative party. This paper, in its issue of the 13th inst., contained an editorial from which I extract the following:—

The unfortunate complications at the capital are due solely to the blunders and wrong-doings of Ministers.

Not to a desire to reconstruct the Cabinet in the way now professed—not in consequence of the Cabinet's being imperfect, as is now alleged, but in consequence of the blunders and wrong-doings of the Ministers. Wrong-doings. What wrong-doings? A conspiracy, a cowardly conspiracy, to depose the Premier in favour of another gentleman. That paper goes on to say:

If disunion and discord reign at Ottawa, if a feeling akin to dismay has consequently spread throughout the country, it is solely because the men who have been honoured with the chief places of trust and emolument have betrayed the confidence reposed in them and have proved unequal to the task they assumed—so much is clear. Much stronger language might be employed to characterize their conduct.

After some further reference, the writer proceeds :

If they persist in thinking of themselves,—
Not of the constitution.

—and refuse to put principle, consistency, honour and duty before their own interests and their own inclinations, they will be held responsible. They may wreck the party, but, if they do, they will go down with the wreck, and never rise again. The party will survive defeat, and will regain power, but the men who lead it to temporary defeat will never be trusted again.

Here is the language of a staunch supporter of the Administration. Would such language as that be used by a journal supporting this Government, if the action of these gentlemen were as pure, disinterested and straightforward as alleged by the Finance Minister to-day? The Toronto "Telegram," an independent Conservative paper, in its issue of the 11th inst., thus alluded to the conduct of these gentlemen :

The seven mutineers—
Not the seven patriots—

—The seven mutineers forsook Sir Mackenzie Bowell. Their continuance in office under him might endanger their own interests.

That is the inference which that independent supporter of the Government drew from their conduct. The Ottawa "Journal," another independent Conservative paper, said

Mr. Foster's statement puts the ex-Ministers in the light that they have been more loyal to themselves than either to their Premier or their party.

Sir, there is a newspaper published in Belleville, which is said to be the Premier's own organ. I quote now from the Belleville "Intelligencer," in which the following editorial item appeared :—

Following the surprise and indignation which were aroused in the minds of the people, irrespective of party, by the desertion of seven members of the Bowell Administration on the field of battle, come feelings of sorrow to Conservatives that men whom we had delighted to honour could have so shattered our ideals, and disgust at their disregard of the dictates of honour and the feelings of gratitude by which they ought to have been actuated.

The organ of the First Minister in Belleville evidently did not draw the conclusion that these men were solely guided by their respect for the constitution, but drew the inference that they had degraded the honour and principle for selfish purposes. There is an independent journal published in the city of Toronto, known as the "Evening Star." What inference did the "Evening Star" draw from the action of these gentlemen? Did it draw the conclusion that they had withdrawn from the Cabinet because of this vacancy? That they had been solicitous to have this vacancy filled up and had manifested their supreme respect for the constitution? On the contrary the "Evening Star" characterized their conduct as follows :—

The shadow of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the Assassinated, will fall upon every caucus and secret council of the party for years. Faith, the sense of security, reliance upon each other, are gone for a generation. Tricks and treasons will be suspected where they do not exist, and will exist where they are not suspected. Haunted by the wraith of a strangled leader, the party house will permit no repose to the red-handed. Peaceful sleep will be impossible, and waking ease out of the question.

The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who quoted from Macbeth and conjured up the ghost of Banquo, might much more fitly have compared the bolters to Macbeth who had murdered sleep and peace in their party. The "Evening Star" goes on to say :

The souging of the wind will be ominous; the bellying curtain at the open window will suggest a hidden bravo; the word of a man will be held worthless, and his oath of small value. Before eating, every dish will be tested for poison with the finger-ring of Machiavelli; before sleeping, every couch will be probed with daggers, as in the palace of Henry VIII. Sir Charles Tupper is not the man to lay the ghost. It cannot be done in his generation, nor by one who was accessory before the fact. What is to be done to re-throne Faith and to re-establish Confidence? Shall the men who introduced treachery at the hearthstone be made the heads of the house or sent into exile? Can they be exalted without treachery becoming the whole habit of the ambitious?

Sir, that language was sufficiently clear. Certainly, the writer of that article drew no such inference as the leader of the House to-day desired should be drawn. Again, I quote from the Toronto "World" of the 11th inst. Perhaps the hon. member for East York will give us the name of the gentleman alluded to in the paragraph which I will read, or disavow the article if it was not authorized. The article says :

A Conservative member says—

Is the hon. member for East York at liberty to give us the name?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I will have to ask our correspondent.

Mr. MULOCK. The Toronto "World" says :

A Conservative member says that they (the seven bolters) made their mistake in acting as if they owned the earth, at least the Conservative section. They overestimated themselves.

Is that the language which should be applied to men who sacrificed themselves on the altar of their country in defence of the constitution? Perhaps the hon. gentleman can communicate with that correspondent and find out who is this traitor in the camp of the Conservative party. Or is this the true explanation? There is a journal published in the county of Grey, the Meaford "Mirror," a supporter of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). Here is a choice piece of reading from this Conservative journal. Where did the editor get his inspiration, can the hon. member for East Grey tell?

Mr. SPROULE. I don't know.

Mr. MULLOCK. No doubt, however, he has drawn it from reliable sources.

Of all the abominable intrigues, treachery is the worst, and Mr. Foster was the last man we would have suspected of playing the role of Judas Iscariot.

Now, as my hon. friend from L'Islet says, the writer of this article evidently did not know the Finance Minister, but he knows him now, and what he does not know of him now he will know hereafter when the conclusion of the drama is reached. The article goes on to say:

But he has put himself on record as a politician willing to sell his birthright for a mess of pottage.

Not willing to sacrifice a mess of pottage for the constitution, but willing to sell his birthright for that article.

Sir Charles Tupper came to this country, ostensibly for the purpose of consulting the Government with reference to the fast Atlantic steamship service. He disclaimed any desire to re-enter Canadian politics.

Then it goes on to intimate that he has been lying in wait, by his presence countenancing this conspiracy.

While we are ready to admit that Sir Charles Tupper is a talented man, still, we by no means think that he possesses the brains of the Conservative party.

I believe there is a considerable portion of the Conservative party of the same opinion.

If he came to this country on a certain mission, let him complete his negotiations with the Government and depart in peace, without seeking to undermine a patriotic leader who enjoys the respect and esteem of his fellow men.

We have never taken much stock in the utterances of Sir Richard Cartwright, but must confess that he voiced the true sentiments of the great Conservative party when he declared in his place in the House that the attempt to undermine Sir Mackenzie Bowell was a vile conspiracy, unprecedented in the annals of British history.

And in support of that statement he has the testimony of the First Minister himself, who repeated it in the Senate Chamber on Thursday last. The article proceeds:

Moreover, Sir Richard pointed out, that when Mr. Foster and his colleagues were telling the people that there were no dissensions in the Cabinet, that all was peace and brotherly love, they were deceiving the electorate. There is no getting over the fact that Sir Richard Cartwright is right in the conclusions he has formed. If not, Mr. Foster and Dr. Montague should rise and explain.

There is another leading Conservative journal published in the city of Kingston. I am only going to give a few of many extracts that I have. The Kingston "News" says:

Sir Mackenzie Bowell has more pluck and will power than the seven bolters put together. How they can reconcile their present attitude with their platform utterances during the recent bye-elections, certainly passes our comprehension. We cannot for a moment entertain the suggestion that they have been hypnotized by what the Opposition press is pleased to term "the Tupper dynasty." What then? They have either seen a new light on the Manitoba school question with amazing suddenness, or they are panic-stricken by the reverses in Quebec, and are ready to desert principle for power and pelf.

Not, you will observe, that they accept office and its emoluments only for the sake of the constitution. Again I quote from the independent Conservative paper, the Ottawa "Journal":

A leading Conservative with an intimate knowledge of the situation, makes the statement that the rupture between the Premier and his Cabinet was influenced by the tight hand which he kept on the finances and his repugnance to enter into nefarious contracts which would supply the Conservatives with funds to bring about their return to office. The party understand that their condition is anything but promising for another term, and that unless money can be raised by the granting of subsidies, their case is almost hopeless. It is generally and very naturally claimed that Sir Charles Tupper's fiscal policy would be the very opposite of that followed by the existing Administration, and that, in the language of the gentleman, "money would flow like water."

This paper is of the opinion that one of the objects of this conspiracy is to impose Sir Charles Tupper upon this country and through him to cause public money to "flow like water." There is a paper down in the city of Quebec known as the Quebec "Chronicle." I am sure the Postmaster-General will recognize this language. At the time this was written the Postmaster-General was one of the few who stood by the Administration. There were some of them who stood by the Treasury and the offices, and were anxious to do so. Now, I would ask the Postmaster-General how the editor of this paper came to publish such treason as this against the Administration. The hon. gentleman is not included in the charges here made, as these are directed against certain of his then ex-colleagues. Alluding to these seven patriots it says:

They resigned in a body, and left him—that is the Premier——to find out why they deserted their seats, in the newspapers. They did not even favour him with a copy of their reasons. They, who fawned upon him twelve months ago, left him without saying so much as good-bye. They do not say to his face that he was incompetent to lead them. They allowed him to find that out later. They told the House of Commons the story of their desertion, and a wretched story it was. No one sympathizes with them. No one can respect them. They are politically lost, and their treacherous conduct should keep them out of politics forever. If they are ruined politically and socially, as they ought to be, the lesson will not be lost.

What does the Postmaster-General think of his organ writing such treason about the seven colleagues he has embraced? There is another paper, published in West Bruce, and called the Kincardine "Review," a Conservative paper. This paper hardly draws the conclusion from the action of the bolters that the Finance Minister desires should be drawn. But, not to discount this choice morsel, I will quote it directly:

The crash that was inevitable has come, and now we must get to work to clear away the wreck. Premier Bowell is to-day the most picturesque figure in the whole Administration. In his hands he holds the key of the situation. The gang of cut-throats and rebels that he had in charge has gone out on strike, after having failed to get him to resign. * * * We are almost sorry now that Sir Mackenzie, having got rid of a section of the malcontents and mischief-breeders, cannot remain at the head of the Conservative party, but he cannot do it, pledged, as he is, to remedial legislation.

Seven of his Ministers have resigned, and the idea was to get Sir Charles Tupper to take his place, when the seven could come back under the new Premier. Now, we take time by the forelock, and protest against any Bowell Ministers being placed in any new Cabinet formed to evade the pledges given in favour of the Roman Catholic minority.

Then after some further reference to that subject the article proceeds:

We have had too much of the Tupperts, Haggarts, Ouimets, Carons, Montagues and the other peanut politicians who have risen to high places in the ranks of the Conservative party. Let us not deplore any extremity into which the Government can fall, if we can get rid of such men by it. We have had enough of them. Let us try some other material now. Surely, the womb of the Conservative party has given forth hundreds of men better fitted to command the fortunes of the most progressive political elements in Canada. Looking back at the past, we are constrained to remark, that we should not have expected anything else than what has happened. For the past ten years the petty politicians of the party have been crowding out the men who would have developed into statesmen. Until last week we had an aggregation of men who could run a circus all right, but not a country. The party stood by, and, with a self-complacency that was criminal, saw those fellows advance step by step to places of power and prestige. Since the party refused to get up and slay them can we not rejoice in secret that they have turned on each other after the example of the cats of Kilkenny?

You observe, Mr. Speaker, how frequently the feline race affords illustrations on an occasion of this kind. The article proceeds:

For the past year they have done nothing that we could honestly and sincerely applaud.

There have been some speeches as we sometimes hear in this House, but not honest and sincere. The article proceeds:

Now they have done something that challenges our admiration.

What do you think it was?

But our glee is tinged with regret that they did not kill themselves long ago. But we should not expect too much of them. They dilly-dallied in everything, even in their self-destruction.

The sentiment this writer gives expression to, is an echo of one that is attributed to certain enemies of a Prime Minister of England, Lord Castlereagh, on the occasion of his death. unkind enemies remarked that the only useful public act in his life was the cutting of his own throat by himself. The writer of the Kincardine "Review" will have reason to regret, I presume, that the victims have recovered from their only pretended attempt of self-destruction. I will not exhaust the patience of the House further.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Read the other letter over again.

Mr. MULOCK. Since the hon. gentleman wishes some more extracts, I will proceed. I will only trouble the House with a couple more. One is from the Toronto "World" of yesterday; and this, Mr. Speaker, is not what a Conservative member said, this is what the editor himself said yesterday. To-day he is applauding and endorsing the utterances of the Finance Minister when the Minister of Finance said that the sole and one reason for the withdrawal of the seven gentlemen from the Cabinet was because a portfolio remained vacant from the 8th July last until 4th January. They wish the public to believe that is not a true statement. Before this utterance of to-day by the leader of the House, this article was published. It is entitled "The Ottawa Crisis."

The most remarkable political crisis known to Canada reached a point of settlement last night. A movement was begun on January 2nd, the day Parliament met, to depose Sir Mackenzie Bowell from the Premiership of Canada.

The movement was begun to depose Sir Mackenzie Bowell from the Premiership of Canada. How did the editor of the "World" discover that fact?

An hon. MEMBER. By his wits.

Mr. MULOCK. That is a very good source of information, and I have no doubt his wits guided him correctly on this occasion. And if so, how does it harmonize with the statement of the Finance Minister? The article goes on to say:

Two days after, the movement came to a head, and seven of his Ministers sent in their resignations. Last night six of these Ministers agreed to return to office and to continue under Sir Mackenzie; and with them came as a new colleague the man who, they intended, should succeed the man whom they had set out to depose.

And yet a Minister of the Crown to-day made the statement on the floor of this House which I wish parliamentary rules would allow me to characterize as the truth would warrant. Sir, this question has found its way into the pulpit. The ministers of the Gospel have drawn their conclusions as to what has taken place. Have they drawn the inference that these resignations were for the purpose stated to-day by the members of the Government? Not many have spoken yet, but I have one utterance in my hand now. The Rev. Dr. Campbell, of Montreal, is stated by this journal to have characterized their action as follows. I read from this extract:

In his sermon, on Sunday, in St. Gabriel Presbyterian church, of Montreal, the Rev. Dr. Campbell was very forcible in recommending his congregation to do their duty in the approaching civic elections, and deplored the position into which the city had been forced. He then turned his attention to the recent doings of the Cabinet, which he declared were humiliating to every citizen who loved his country and desired her advancement. "Every one of us," continued Dr. Campbell, with impressive solemnity, "should go upon our knees and confess our sins to God because of the shortcomings of the nation."

Well, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we had the utterance of the leader of the House. Since then, one journal has spoken. The paper I am to read from now is the Ottawa "Journal," published under the shadows of this House, a journal in sympathy with the Conservative party, a high toned journal, a journal which I think is governed by a conscientious desire to promote the interests of the country, even if mistaken as to the party it supports. This paper, has, since the utterance of the Government to-day, given expression to its view of the situation, and though the article is somewhat lengthy, I would ask the permission of the House to read from it. Under the heading "The Reconciliation" that paper says in its issue of to-day, January 15th:

Prior to the public announcement of the split in the Conservative administration, the "Journal" voiced a feeling which was wide-spread, that the Administration had not since the death of Sir John Thompson done itself credit in the government of the country. The gravest count in the indictment made was that the members of the Administration had subordinated statesmanship and public interest to their personal rivalries and suspicions. The ink was hardly dry on the charge before a startling proof of its truth was furnished by the resignations of half the Cabinet on professed personal grounds.

The Ministers who resigned have returned to the fold, and the question is, How is the situation to be looked at now? If there was any truth in the indictment made prior to their resignations, that truth remains. More, it was accentuated by the resignations. The people, by the nature and time of the resignations, were given more reason than ever if they had any at all, to condemn the Conservative politics of the preceding year, and more reason to feel that men who had subordinated patriotism and statesmanship to the petty game of office could have little claim to public confidence.

Mr. MULOCK.

Since that, on the back of that unpleasant culmination, has come the reconciliation. Ministers who alleged that a Premier was so incompetent that their patience was forced to an end at a most trying juncture for both country and party, take office under him again. Is that honesty or patriotism? To consent again to consign the weal of Canada to a man whom they a week ago pronounced unfit. True, a new and strong hand has joined the Government. That does help to excuse them to their party, but does it matter much to the country, which must judge the Government, not by one man, but by its collective personnel and record? On the other hand, we have a Premier who, so painfully attacked, retorts upon his former associates by counter depreciation; yet, within four days, reinstates them as his colleagues. They cannot retract what they said: that would show lying, either then or now—they have not had time to discover an honest mistake—yet the Premier replaces them in charge of the country's interests—these very men whom he four days ago stigmatized as conceited and treacherous. Is that justifiable as regards the nation?

The good of the party! What of that, if it be bad for character and honour? The good of the party! What of that, if it be bad for the people? Is it a wrong to the country that, from the bolters' point of view, we should have an incompetent Premier? Yet they accept him. Is it a wrong to the country that, from the Premier's point of view, we should have treacherous men in the Cabinet? He forces them on us. If either side is right, the country is wronged. If both are right, the wrong is worse. If neither be right, where are the brains the country pays for? We have cause to look to the mother country for standards of public honour, and is there any good reason why our standard should be lower? Is it possible to imagine a British Cabinet presenting the appearance the Canadian Cabinet does to-day, or British Ministers acting as our own are doing? We doubt whether a man in this city will say, yes. They would feel as keen a concern for party good, but, surely, their concern for their own honour would be their first consideration, and their country is the better for it.

Party good! A fine thing when it means public good. If a stout suspicion arises that to those who use the shibboleth, party good means chiefly office, and salaries, and patronage, and swelled heads, the people need to consider whether the time is ripe to give that party a trial in the fire and burn out some of the dross. Is the time ripe now? The answer is, of course, partly dependent on how far the country's general interests may be affected—the national ideal and the business welfare. As to business welfare, the Liberals argue very strenuously that their advent to power will not cause any violent upsetting of trade or manufacturing, and it is a matter for the people to think over. As to the national ideal, there is some reason to think that a change in office would accomplish national good. Since Confederation, now nearly thirty years ago, the Liberals have had four years of power. For eighteen years successively, up till now, they have been in opposition. They are Canadians, but they have had no Canadian responsibility. Possibly a term of responsibility would promote their virility as Canadians, their pride in the Canadian heritage, their broad-mindedness and patriotism. If this be so, if the Dominion can be thus better solidified, the people would be well repaid indeed by chancing something as regards their business interests in an effort to purify the atmosphere of government and point the attention of parliamentarians to higher purposes and standards than seem to be fashionable among the Conservative leaders just now.

I will not utter my own sentiments—it is not necessary to do so. As I said at the beginning, I say now, at the conclusion of reading these extracts, I have quoted but from Conservative sources or independent Conservative sources. This is the testimony of the people, or a portion of it, as to the interpretation placed upon the action of the seven men who, on 4th January, rebelled against the Crown and the dignity of the country, the seven men who went on strike, as the public journals describe, like common millmen in the busy season, and put out pickets to prevent a reorganization of the Cabinet unless it should be reorganized on the lines of their conspiracy. And so I regard this question to-day as higher than any party question, greater than any party question, it is a question that strikes at the very root of constitutional government in Canada. Shall Governments be formed to-day of these elements, of men without confidence in each other, of men who have banded charges against each other, of men who are incapable honestly of trusting each other, and coming together and deliberating for the promotion of those common objects for which alone the Cabinet exists? Sir, the public have drawn their inferences. The public will criticize the utterances of the Minister to-day as the culmination of their disgrace. The general public will withdraw respect from the Administration, if they ever had any, for being, if I might use the word, pettifoggers where they should have been statesmen. I will not use that expression if it be not parliamentary, but that will be the impression of the public with respect to such action as we have seen, and which we see now. One more scene in the drama is to be enacted. Within a brief period, we are told, the Premier, the honoured Premier, who, with all faults, bears a spotless name, a name which certainly stands for high personal integrity, will be deposed, and the late High Commissioner put in his place. Does anybody in his senses believe Sir Charles Tupper was not brought out here as part and parcel of this conspiracy? Are Premiers picked up by accident in the streets of Ottawa? Was it an accident that he who is to become Premier of Canada was sitting here, giving counsel to this movement, receiving communications, and, at the same time, with uplifted hands, declaring that he would have no communication with those unworthy stewards? Was it an accident that he was here? Sir, so many accidents as these had an origin in a common design. Was it an accident that seven of those gentlemen signed a document at the same time? Was it accident that those seven minds all came to the same conclusion on the same day, at the most critical period in the fate of a Government, after submitting the Address to the House, and before its adoption by this House? The public have drawn their conclusion, and if this conspiracy culminates, and if Sir Charles Tupper takes the place of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, these hon. gentlemen will have succeeded, for the moment, they will, by their intrigue, have usurped honour and virtue, and they will have, if they succeed in the country, have set an example which must operate to the injury of Canada. As the virtue of a few men has been the foundation of great nations, so the misconduct of men may be the occasion of the disintegration of the most powerful peoples.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I only desire the attention of the House for a few moments while I discharge what I conceive to be a duty on my part in reference to the subject which is under discussion this afternoon. I do not propose, as you, Mr. Speaker, can well understand, to attempt to deal with many of the statements that have been made of an entirely personal character to-day, and not in a very good temper at that, but I do desire, so far as I can, briefly to put myself right with this House if possible, and as I feel confident I can do with the Conservative party in this country at large. Hon. gentlemen opposite who have to-day so unfairly pressed their criticisms by not accepting the two statements which have been read to this House in connection with the recent crisis, have taken that advantage which was of necessity open to them if they were so desperate as to stoop to it. By suggesting suspicions, and then assuming that these suspicions were founded on fact, they made serious charges which could only be satisfactorily and fully met if each of the seven Privy Councillors who deemed it his duty to retire from the Cabinet of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, was free to say all that happened at the Council Board. Those gentlemen in the front Opposition benches well know the disadvantage under which the seven gentlemen laboured, and they made the most of it, I fully admit. Every Privy Councillor opposite knows how difficult it is for any Minister, either in Canada or in England, to put himself fully and freely before his countrymen in regard to the particulars that may concern any event which has induced him to retire from the council of the nation. Be a man's object ever so high, be his principles ever so good, there is, we know, grave difficulty before him in the vindication of any step which he takes in that direction. But, Mr. Speaker, although our lips are, to a large extent, sealed, I think I am justified in referring to two features which prominently stand out in this discussion. These features concern, first, the character of the gentlemen who left the Cabinet, and, second, their action as regards the Governor General, the representative of the Queen in this country. In regard to the last feature, and, perhaps, the most important one, it ought to be sufficient to fair-minded men to know, that after explanations have been exchanged between those gentlemen and the present Prime Minister, and submitted to His Excellency the Governor General, there has been found nothing inconsistent with, and nothing derogatory to, the dignity of the Crown, to prevent the Queen's representative taking back to the councils of the country, six of these gentlemen. As regards the other facts which immediately concern the action taken, I am justified in saying that it clearly appears, that whether the point was put before the Prime Minister at the proper time or not, or whether or not wise judgment was used by the seven as to the mode in which they took that important step; they were actuated by two strong reasons and two good reasons. First, the interests of the country, as they conceived. And what did the interests of the country demand? The interests of the country, in their opinion, demanded that remedial legislation, if necessary, should be put upon the Dominion statute-book this session. In their opinion, it was impossible to rely upon hon. gentlemen opposite to do this. In their opinion, the Conservative party alone could be expected to enact that legislation, and, in order to do that, the Conservative party must be strong in the Government, and the Government, in their opinion, never required greater strength than on the present occasion. The proposed legislation is admittedly unique, and it has evoked all kinds of opinions in the two parties. The Conservative party, it is known, was not united and did not speak as a whole upon that subject. No one ever pretended they did.

Mr. LAURIER. The Minister of Finance said the very reverse this afternoon.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all. I am speaking of the Conservative party, but the Minister of Finance spoke of the Government, which has always been united on the question. The Cabinet of the Conservative party has been a unit on that question from the first moment down to the present, and only differed last spring in regard to the time when that legislation should be adopted. Regarding that principle of the Conservative party as the most important that was at stake this session, those seven gentlemen, under the circumstances which existed, believed that it was absolutely impossible to hope for success in the promotion of any measure of that kind, while such an extraordinary state of affairs should exist, as that a representative of the French Catholics of the province of Quebec could not be found to join them in their efforts to obtain that legislation. At the time when the seven gentlemen left the Cabinet, it goes without contradiction that the Government had failed to obtain the services of a representative of the French Catholics of the province of Quebec, in place of the Hon. Mr. Angers, who retired over six months ago. More than that, the gentlemen who took that step believed, and I agree with them to the full, that the Government, as it stood, could not, for that, and other reasons, hope to command the support of their own party, be it ever so strong, numerically, in this House, and could not, with a difficult measure, hope to surmount the difficulties and obstacles that stood in their way. We may have been wrong, we may have been entirely without the necessary faith, and without the proper and fair confidence that we should have reposed in the members of this House. These points do stand out as the reasons which actuated these gentlemen in taking the important step they did. And if any doubt ever entered into my mind as to the wisdom of our course, seeing that we had for an object the success of the legislation to which we were pledged, and the success of the Conservative party at the next general elections, I, for one, would have all that doubt removed on account of the extraordinary spasms which have taken possession of hon. gentlemen opposite since that crisis occurred. Instead of letting loose their invective, instead of breaking through all parliamentary rules, instead of transforming this chamber into a veritable bear garden, these gentlemen should have been as happy as the day is long, and a crisis such as they have described should have brought them joy instead of sorrow. Hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of acting so as to resemble the hyena, which laughs when it is mad, and descending to the vile epithets and gross abuse, mingled with coarse jests and jokes, would have arisen to the dignity of the occasion; buoyed up with hope, they would have presented an entirely different front. But from the very beginning of this episode, they have confirmed me at any rate in the wisdom of the course I have taken. I believe remedial legislation is safe, I believe the Conservative party is safe, and I believe these gentlemen understand that just as well as I do. While they would have preferred things to remain as they were at the beginning of this session, while they hoped for success under that state of things, hope has been banished. Even the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who last session had assumed an almost genial role, has so lost control of himself that he now in his rage and anger finds it impossible for any one on this side of the House at present to engross his attention, and travel outside of this chamber to abuse an old and absent opponent. Well, it is not for me to defend—thank God,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

it is not necessary for me to defend—the hon. gentleman to whom I refer against the assaults of the member for South Oxford. I comfort myself with the reflection that all the great Canadians, notably two who have passed away, who have won all the honours obtainable in Canada at the hands of their countrymen, and have seen their labours crowned with the approval of Her Majesty, have had the inveterate hate and abuse of the member for South Oxford. There was nothing too vile for him to say of Sir John Macdonald in season and out of season. In his rage and violent conduct towards that hon. gentleman, he lost the little hold he once had upon the people of this country. Indeed, on these topics, I think on both sides of the House, as well as in the country, he is regarded as a political madman, absolutely devoid of reason, absolutely without any ability to see any virtue whatever in the character of those hon. gentlemen. Sir John Thompson was the last to come under his lash, and I think a certain scene in this chamber is familiar to hon. gentlemen present, because the hon. member for South Oxford had then audacity enough to say those things before his opponent's face. The scene is familiar to this chamber when the late Sir John Thompson administered to that gentleman such a castigation that he was not only civil to Sir John Thompson for the remainder of his life, but acted with wonderful success the part of a gentleman in this chamber from that time down to the present day. So I think the hon. gentleman may do as a certain animal has done—gnaw at those files for a considerable time without hurting the files. The hon. leader of the Opposition even departed from his usual happy vein and disclosed the secret of his mortification at the changes which have taken place. He referred to purposes of selfish aggrandizement, and imputed sinister motives and the most unworthy objects. But against this suspicion or charge, I set in bold contrast the fact that there were gentlemen willing to risk their positions and even the good opinion of their fellow countrymen, in order to obtain the success of their party; and they have, I think, the gratification to-night to know that though that task was difficult and the trial hard, they have been afforded abundant and cogent proof that their action was wise and has resulted most happily for the Conservative party and for the interests which that party holds dear. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) was not content to deal with the present so-called crisis alone; but he drew largely upon that fertile imagination of his for some facts in connection with myself. He went so far as to say—though I think one of his colleagues corrected him later—that I left the Cabinet last spring. I have to tell the hon. gentleman that there is no truth in that statement. I have to tell the hon. gentleman that the only time that I have resigned from the Cabinet of this country I have remained out, and I am out to-day. I do not regret the step I have taken. I have parted from the Cabinet, as has been already explained, for the benefit of the Cabinet, and I am willing to admit it. I never assumed to be a strong man in that Cabinet; but I have proclaimed my belief in the principles of the Conservative party, and my ability faithfully and loyally to represent the interests of my county, and my willingness to do what I can to promote the principles of the Conservative party. I differed from my colleagues last spring, there is no doubt about that, and there is no dishonour in the fact. I had strong views as to the course that ought to be adopted; but finally, after the discussion of those views, I abandoned them and was willing to remain and did remain a member of the Cabinet. Do the hon. gentlemen opposite, who sat in the Cabinet for a few years, brief though the time was, pretend that no strong differences of opinion prevailed between them? Do they wish the people of this country to believe that in the discussion of matters pertaining to the interests of Canada, at the Council board, unanimity is ever to be found. Sir, we know that at that board the strongest differences exist, and have to be discussed and solved; we know that cabinets are continually occupied with the discussion of differences of opinion. But on the occasion to which I refer I can say that I played neither part of a skulker, to use the dignified language of the hon. member for Queen's, nor the part of a coward. I had the courage of my convictions then, I have the courage of my convictions now, and in that respect I differ from the hon. member for Queen's. I never ran away from this House, as the hon. member did last session when there was to come before it this important and vital question concerning the minority of the people of Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is fond of making false accusations. I tell him that the charge which he has made to-night is false.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I tell him that the charge that he has made is without any foundation. He said I ran away from this House. That is not correct.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I shall not bandy words with the hon. gentleman, but I shall tell him that he disappeared from the chamber of this House—that he was not present during the discussion which took place on the question of the policy of the Government as regards remedial legislation; and if there was a time when a man professing to be the coadjutor leader of the Liberal party for the maritime provinces ought to have been in this House, surely it was on the occasion of the discussion of a grave constitutional question of the kind to which I refer. Whether he ran away, whether he walked away, whether he vanished into thin air, or what became of him, this we know, that his delightful presence was a thing of the past when that subject came to be discussed, and he never reappeared on the scene. So that, so far as that is concerned I think that the hon. gentleman had better not dwell upon the subject of cowardice or courage until we know a little more definitely what he is going to do on this question which he rolled around his tongue so gently to-day. I was more embarrassed by the very generous and kindly praise showered upon me from the lips of one of the representatives of St. John (Mr. Hazen) than I was by the personal and gross language used with regard to a gentleman very closely connected with me, and which fell from the opposite side of the House. Now, one word more and I have done. The hon. gentleman from St. John was good enough to speak of me in a way that I in no sense deserve. But this I do say to the House, that while I never claimed to have the qualities that could make me worthy to fill either of the high offices of state which I have held, I do submit with confidence to those gentlemen who have had anything to do with me in either of those departments, that no man ever struggled harder in either to do his duty and to serve his country: and it is only fair on my part to say that while no man in either department, perhaps, ever more required assistance, aid and co-operation from the officers under him, none ever had greater assistance, and none was ever more loyally supported than I was, both in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and the Department of Justice. It gives me a great deal of pleasure, when cutting my connection with those departments, to say that the men in both of them deserve at the hands of Parliament the highest consideration. From the top to the bottom of the staffs in those departments I do not know where—and I say it seriously—you could find better men, and it has astonished me that Canada has been able to obtain as high and efficient a class of officials as I have had to do with for the paltry stipends that are paid to them yearly.

Mr. PATERSON. I shall not take up much of the time of the House in discussing the question we have before us, and I trust I shall say nothing very offensive to the gentleman who has just taken his seat. He knows the kindly feelings with which I regard him, and I should certainly be very unwilling to wound his sensitiveness in any measure. He seems, certainly, a little sensitive to-night, and I think a little unfair. He is, however, in rather a peculiar position, and, therefore, allowance must be made. I have read in the public press, and no doubt it is correct, an account of a personal interview with the hon. gentleman himself. In that interview, on being asked the question whether he supposed there was any possibility of Sir Mackenzie Bowell forming a Government which would exclude any of the dissentient Ministers, he replied:

It is inconceivable to suppose that any of the six Ministers would enter the Cabinet if the rest were left out, under circumstances which in the slightest degree reflected upon him.

And the hon. gentleman has told us that he was left out.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I was not one of the six, but one of the seven.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. gentleman could not understand how it was possible for one of these to go back without all going back.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman said one of the six.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes; the hon. gentleman might say, perhaps, that there was not room for him, but I think that sticklers, as they pretend to be, for a full and complete Cabinet, the position of Solicitor General is still open; and even if it were deemed that his paternal ancestor was an abler man than the hon. gentleman, the party certainly would have considered that he was able to fill the position of Solicitor General, and thus have completed the Cabinet, the completion of which they deemed to be of so much importance. Now, the hon. gentleman tells us that it is rather difficult to speak freely concerning matters which come before the Privy Council. Taking up the reason given the other day for the resignation of the seven gentlemen a few days ago, that reason differs in my judgment from that now given, namely, the necessity of the Cabinet being filled. That was the point dwelt upon by saying that there was a very important measure to which the Government and each individual member of the Government were solemnly pledged, and knowing that they were in honour bound to see it carried through, they found it absolutely necessary that the one vacant position should be filled; and the Prime Minister, having failed to fill that one position, these gentlemen, in order to implement the solemn pledges that they had given with reference to this matter, attempted to remedy this shortage of one individual by making the Cabinet shorter still by seven members. That was a very strange position to take. If the Cabinet were unable to deal with that question because there was one vacant portfolio, did these gentlemen, pledged in all honour, as they say they were, to carry through that measure, hope to strengthen the Government in carrying it by handing in their resignation before the measure was submitted. We are making history in this country, and I am afraid the history we have been making in the last few days is history that will not redound to our credit. Sir, if it may be said that truth has fallen in our streets, it would be sad to know that it fell because it was slain by men in high places. But while I wish to use no language too strong, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this House if they can reconcile the different statements which have been given to this House solemnly by hon. gentlemen opposite. To-day they tell us that they have the authority of His Excellency the Governor General for informing this House that the reason they resigned was because the Cabinet was not complete, inasmuch as one portfolio was not filled. Sir, that was not the reason which was given to this House in a carefully prepared and written document, in which all the gentlemen who had resigned, concurred. In that document, the reason assigned was because the Prime Minister was not strong enough to lead a Government and conduct the Government. What this country wants is that there shall be truth and honour in high places, and whether there has been honour in high places, let these gentlemen say who sent in their resignations to the Prime Minister, alleging as they did in this House, that the cause was his unfitness and incapacity to administer the Government of this country. These gentlemen who gave that as their reason should have adhered to it and not have come before us to-day with another and a totally different reason. The hon. Minister of Finance asked that the very words he had used should be given, and said it was not fair to paraphrase his statements. Well, in order to gratify him, let me read the reason he gave for these resignations :

We have lost none of our confidence in the sound and healthy condition of the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada, or of our belief that it embodies a policy which the majority of the electorate considers essential to the continued welfare and progress of the country, or of our faith that under firm and prudent leadership it will come back triumphant from the polls. Though with many misgivings we agreed to enter the Government under Mr. Bowell, in succession to Sir John Thompson, we have, nevertheless, unitedly and loyally striven to the best of our ability to make it strong and efficient, and it has been with growing regret that we have seen our efforts result in a measure of success less than that for which we had hoped and striven.

Going on, he says :

This we have repeatedly urged upon the Premier, with the result that we found ourselves face to face with Parliament having a Government with its numbers incomplete, and with no assurance that the present Premier could satisfactorily complete it. Under these circumstances we thought it our duty to retire, and in this manner to pave the way, if possible, for the formation of a Government whose Premier could command the confidence of all his colleagues, could satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that its strongest elements were at its head, and impress the country that it had a Government which was united and had power to govern.

Now, Sir, I have read the very words, as desired by the Finance Minister, of the reasons given to this House, and I would ask if it is not there emphatically shown that the reason that these gentlemen resigned was that the Prime Minister was not strong enough in character, was not mentally fit to guide the affairs of the country and discharge the duties pertaining to government. To-day they come down and assign a totally different reason. They give as their main reason what at first was only given as a proof of the incapacity and weakness of the First Minister. They tell us now that it was because the Government was not full that they sent in their resignations. And the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, feeling the weakness of their position, seeks to strengthen it by alleging that a question was then pending before the Government which made it absolutely necessary that this one member who was lacking should be in his place. How is it that they have secured that one member now when they could not secure him before? The Prime Minister, in his speech in the other House, which I have in my hand, in dealing with this question, stated that it was not without precedent for the Government to carry on the affairs of the country without its membership being full. He cited two instances, and one of the instances the vacant portfolio had been held by Sir Charles Tupper, the great man of the Conservative party, the only man, apparently, in the Conservative party who has strength of character and ability to re-unite and lead forward the Conservative host. The Prime Minister said :—

The record shows that Sir Charles Tupper resigned the office of Minister of Railways and Canals on the 24th day of May, 1884. Parliament met the following January. The Hon. John Henry Pope was not appointed to succeed Sir Charles Tupper until the 28th September, 1885, so that through one long session of six months some of these very gentlemen sat in the House, while one of the portfolios was vacant—that, too, one of the most important in the Cabinet.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Certainly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I interrupt in order that the point that I alluded to may be understood, because the hon. gentleman does not understand it. I do not deny that there are precedents for vacancies in the Administration during the session, even running through the whole session. That was not my point. The difficulty I had, as I believe was the case with the other gentlemen who acted together was not that there was not a precedent for the vacancy, but that it was impossible for us to promote successfully legislation in regard to the minority claims in Manitoba when it appeared we had not the confidence of so large a section of the party, that we could not as it appeared then obtain a representative of the French Catholics of Quebec in place of Mr. Angers. That is the frank statement I sought to make.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is it not a strange thing, then, that two members from that province should be willing to assume the responsibility of not having a third Minister in the House of Commons? The Prime Minister had to have recourse to the other Chamber, where their seats are absolutely safe, and where so much patriotism prevails. Did the hon. gentleman, might I ask, make an honest effort to combine the seven bolters—if I may use that expression—in an effort to induce some Senator to accept the position?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The vacancy was in the Senate and the vacancy has been filled.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is not an answer to my question. Was an effort made by the seven bolting Ministers prior to their taking the final step of resignation, to induce some Senator—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I cannot take that question seriously.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The reason they have assigned is one that will not bear consideration for one moment. Another instance was given by Sir Mackenzie Bowell of a portfolio being vacant during the whole session, when, I think, the hon. gentleman himself and many of his colleagues sat in the Cabinet without raising any protest against it. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that when it was possible for a place held by the great Sir Charles Tupper to remain vacant during the whole session, it was dangerous, in fact fatal, to any measure proposed before this House, that one of the portfolios should remain vacant? Is Mr. Desjardins of the Senate a greater man, a more powerful man, than the great Sir Charles Tupper, whose praises we have heard so loudly sung to-day? Is the Cabinet saved, is the country saved, only through the patriotism and self-denial of Hon. A. Desjardins of the Senate? That would seem to be the position we are placed in at the present time. Well, Sir, it is a serious matter to trifle with Parliament. The honour and dignity of Parliament should not be trampled upon by men who hold the places of advisers to His Excellency the Governor General. I am sorry to say that the records are before us showing that this is not the only time that these gentlemen have come before us telling us tales irreconcilable in their nature. Both statements cannot be true, yet both are made by themselves. They went on the public platform in this country and made declarations that they were united as one man, that there was not a shred of disunion among them—the very expression that was used—

Mr. MONTAGUE. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And now the hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I ask him, then, if those who attended these public meetings will not say that the men who addressed them lied to them when they told them that? I ask him how these gentlemen are ever to face the public again and tell them that there is not a shred of disunion among them, when a late member of the Government told us no longer ago than yesterday that one of their number came to him and asked him to join him in driving another of their number from their midst. Sir, when they go before this people again and tell them anything, does the hon. gentleman suppose that their words will carry any weight? Not that I want to throw any opprobrium upon them, but, Sir, the country's welfare is concerned in this matter. The people of Canada do not want to have it recorded and go forth as a fact that the men who advise His Excellency in this country are men who, on public platforms, will state to the people what their own words give the lie to when Parliament meets in this House, as I claim has been done by these hon. gentlemen since this session opened. Well, Sir, let us see what these gentlemen said with reference to this very Prime Minister, whose weakness and incapacity they assigned as a reason in this House for sending in their resignations at the time they did. What do I find in reference to that matter? I read what the hon. Secretary of State said with reference to this same Prime Minister, Sir Mackenzie Bowell; I read from the "Mail-Empire" report of December 7th, 1895, at Orangeville:

He compared the present Premier with the leader of the Liberal party. For seventeen years Sir Mackenzie Bowell has been an honoured member of the Government who had successfully administered the affairs of his department. During all these seventeen years not one mark could be placed against Sir Mackenzie's honesty, either as a Minister or as a public man.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is the reason you wanted to kick him out.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not accuse my hon. friend opposite of giving still another reason; that reason is assigned by my hon. friend:

Not only that, but the Premier has always favoured the broadest lines of policy, and had always supported plans for Canadian progress and development.

A broad man, a large man, the very man the country wants. He could not have given a description of a stronger intellect, and a more progressive statesman than he gives there:

In addition to that, first as Minister, and now as Premier, he had invariably supported the strengthening of the ties which bound them to the dear old motherland.

And that ought to have made his person almost sacred to those patriots who wave the flag on every occasion. Well, Sir, we read again from a speech of this same gentleman at another place. But I forgot to mention, Mr. Speaker, that this opinion entertained by the hon. Secretary of State in reference to the Prime Minister's capacity and ability, was entertained as late as December 7th, 1895. Well, about a month before that, namely, on November 15th, 1895, when at Smith's Falls, he had as much faith, for the "Mail-Empire" reports him as bestowing a warm eulogy upon Sir Mackenzie Bowell:

Whose character, after seventeen years of administration of one of the greatest departments of the Government, had not shown one trace of dishonesty or incapacity. He reiterated the statements of Mr. Foster and Mr. Haggart, ridiculing the assertions that the Cabinet was disunited.

He was not even content with saying, as they said, that the Cabinet were united, but according to this report, he ridiculed the statement the Cabinet were disunited. Sir, we read how his praises were sounded, how the hon. gentleman carried the audience with him, treating as the most preposterous thing it was possible to conceive of, the accusation that in that happy family there was anything but union and brotherly love existing in its fullest and most complete sense:

When the time came, they would show their opponents, that, far from this being the case, they were united as ever they were, and they would win, not only in constituencies where they had formerly been successful, but in constituencies where victory had not previously been with them.

Well, that is a prophecy. We have not had the general elections, but we have had some since then, and the prophecy has not been very well fulfilled. Then we had the hon. Mr. Foster, no longer ago than November 15th, speaking at Smith's Falls:

After stating that, from reading Grit literature lately, he had come to the conclusion that the grand old Conservative party outside of Ottawa was disunited, demoralized and on its last legs, it was a great relief to him to know that this was not the case, at least in Smith's Falls, and to find present the remnants of the grand old party, and to feel the old-time enthusiasm, and to know that he had been simply reading a concoction of lies.

Then he went on to say:

He had another reason for being glad to be present. They had, perhaps, learned also from the Grit press that their Government at Ottawa was disunited and demoralized. Having reassured him, as they had, that the Conservative party outside of Ottawa was in good health, he was there to demonstrate to them, with his two colleagues that were present, and also for those that were not present, that the Liberal-Conservative Government now as of old was a Government which was united on its different lines of policy, without one shred of disunion.

"Without one shred of disunion," "united now as of old." And that gentleman, when he made that statement to the public, and whose words ought to be taken anywhere, according to the revelations made in this House, was aware of the fact, I suppose must have been aware of the fact, that one of his colleagues in that Government believed that another colleague in the Government was base enough to write anonymous letters in order to do him harm. If he did not know it, we had it told here, that one of the colleagues in that Government endeavoured to secure another colleague to lend his influence to drive some member out of the Cabinet. But, Sir, we know more than that and we know it from the lips of the Prime Minister of this country whom, though they have charged with incapacity, they have not yet ventured to charge with uttering falsehoods. And what did he say? In his speech delivered in the Senate, commenting on a paragraph of the statement that was read in this House by the Finance Minister, the Premier said:

I shall not comment upon that statement.

That is, that they were loyal to him:

I could, however, characterize it in other language than that in which the sentence is couched, and more than that, with no less degree of truth. Then, they stated that they waited upon me repeatedly in order to insist upon the Government being strengthened in its personnel. That is quite true. But is there a single word in any of those sentences which would lead you or might lead others, after what has been whispered about the country, to conclude that it was the head of the Government they were striking at, instead of the other members of the Government.

This united family:

It is true, they waited upon me and pointed out the necessity of strengthening the Government, as all governments ought to be strengthened, and according to my own views, I should acquiesce in any proposition of that kind, and there were intimations at those interviews pointing to certain members of the Government who, in their opinion, ought to go out.

Yet these hon. gentlemen stated in the face of thousands of Canadians that all was harmony, peace and union in their ranks. The Premier continued:

Certainly they never meant themselves, because from their statement one would suppose that all the wisdom was concentrated in their craniums. But there were others of whom they had not such exalted opinions; had they intimated to me that I was one of them, I should have made way for them, but I heard nothing of that until two days after Parliament had met. I make these explanations in order that I may show the nature of their anxiety for the strengthening of the Government.

It will seem almost incredible, in view of past history, that the Government should be so lowered that public men having access to His Excellency and whose duty it is to give him advice, should stand upon public platforms in this country and make the declarations they did make, knowing all the facts that have been revealed to us in the statement made by the Prime Minister. Take, again, the document presented to-day, which gives the lie to the document those hon. gentlemen presented the other day, and what do we see? The reason assigned was that a constitutional point was involved—the necessity of filling a vacant portfolio. Do they believe that, do they wish the House to understand such to be the case? If they do, I only ask them how they came to frame a sentence like this:—

I may say, in the first place, that there is no disagreement between ourselves and the Premier on any question of public policy, trade or constitutional.

There was no disagreement, they say in the carefully prepared document, on any constitutional point; and yet to-day it is a constitutional point, because a portfolio was not filled. Sir, there is to-day proof against those men, their statements have been contradicted by the words of the same men who uttered them. I choose to put it in that way. What do they say further? In the document that Mr. Foster submitted to Parliament, they said:—

Though with many misgivings we agreed to enter the Government under Mr. Bowell in succession to Sir John Thompson, we have, nevertheless, unitedly and loyally striven to the best of our ability to make it strong and efficient, and it has been with growing regret that we have seen our efforts in a measure of success less than that for which we had hoped and striven.

This is the solemn statement made in this House by one of His Excellency's Ministers, that they had unitedly and loyally striven to make the Government strong. That is the statement of one of the Ministers, who said he spoke for the seven who went out. I put against the statement made by Mr. Foster in the House of Commons the statement made by the Prime Minister, the head of the Government of which Mr. Foster was a member, and I leave hon. gentlemen, if they can do so, to reconcile these two statements; and if they cannot be reconciled, what is the inevitable inference, what is the conclusion to which we must be driven? It is a conclusion the character of which must appear shameful in the eyes of any man who loves his country. I now submit the Prime Minister's statement, as follows:—

Even in the present trying circumstances, I hesitate not to say, and to say it boldly,—I would not have stated it had not such reasons been given to the House as the cause which induced these gentlemen to leave the Government—that had I that loyal support which every Premier ought to receive in the arduous duties incident to the governing of a country, such support as was given most loyally to my late chiefs, Sir John Macdonald and Sir John Thompson, we would have been just as successful in carrying on the affairs of the Government as my predecessors, though not possessed of their measure of ability or political tact.

What more follows a few lines further down:—

Had not jealousy and a determination to destroy the usefulness of the head of the Government been firmly rooted in the breasts of those with whom I was associated, I flatter myself that we should have been successful in carrying on the affairs of this country.

Were ever such words printed? The Premier stated that if they had only been loyal to him he could have carried on successfully the public affairs; but instead of that, they were disloyal to him, they were endeavouring to undermine him, and they added to the excuses put forward that this course was taken because the Premier was mentally unfit to carry on the affairs of this country. The Premier said, "had not jealousy and a determination." It was not an idea sprung upon them all at once, but it is a determination. What did the First Minister say further? He said it was "firmly rooted." That means that it had been growing for some time and was not a sudden impulse. This is the Cabinet in regard to which the Secretary of State, the Minister of Finance, and other men who are called Ministers of the Crown, knowing these facts, have nevertheless gone on public platforms and told the people that all was peace and harmony, and everything was going on well. I do not wish to continue the discussion further. I simply wish to emphasize these facts, not that I wish to bring discredit on the Government, for I wish in the interest of this country it might not be possible to read such extracts from the speeches of Ministers as I have read, but the hope of this country now lies in the future, and we want the people to know the exact truth that has come out so far, if we cannot know the whole truth, with respect to the manner in which the affairs of the country have been conducted, so that it may be possible for the people to say that the men who are selected by the Crown to give advice to the Crown, the men who occupy the highest positions in this Canada of ours shall be men who will have at least common honour, common decency and common regard for the truth.

Mr. CASEY. It is alleged, now, Mr. Speaker, that all the brains have gone back into the Cabinet, and I am not sure that the occurrences of this evening do not give some colour to the assertion. The brains of the Minister of Finance have been taxed to some extent in making it appear that what he said some time ago, as the mouthpiece of himself and his six colleagues did not mean what it meant to the natural ear, but that it meant something quite different from what he intended it to mean at that time. That was not much of a task for the Finance Minister to perform. It is no new duty for him to have to explain away and change the meaning of words he has used across the floor of this House. It is so much his habitual attitude that his brain cannot have been severely taxed in undertaking it.

But the late Minister of Justice, Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, who has staid out of the Cabinet, felt bound, with that constitutional distension of the cranium which he legitimately inherits from his distinguished parent, to give further explanations, and further proofs that the bulk of the brains has gone back into the Cabinet. He gives us a totally new version of the reasons why the wreckers wished to wreck the Bowell government. The Minister of Finance told us that they wished to wreck it merely because it was weak, and that it was weak because the Premier was not fit to be a leader. But the Minister of Justice gives another and a most startling reason. He says that the bolters went out of the Cabinet, because they did not believe it was honest in its desire to carry out remedial legislation, and because they were afraid that the Liberal party were not to be trusted to pass such legislation if they came in.

Whatever may be the truth of that remark with regard to the intentions of the Liberal party, it is certainly news to the people of Quebec, to learn that the bolters comprised that particular section of the Cabinet which was especially anxious to carry out remedial legislation. We are asked to believe that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), and the other four who went out, comprised the section of the Government especially anxious to pass a remedial law. Well, I am sure that nobody with a quicker perception of the ludicrous than the late Minister of Justice would have asked us to believe anything of the kind. It is a strain upon the credulity of the country which amounts to the ridiculous.

He further said that the Cabinet was not united on this subject and never had been. We have had the proof read by my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson); we have had the proof in the papers every day and we have had the proof across the floor of this House, that it was pretended that the Cabinet was united upon this and every other subject. But now, this bolter who did not come back, feels himself free to tell us that there were constant dissensions in the Cabinet about remedial legislation. We fully believe him in that statement, but we must not be asked to believe him when he says that it was the anxiety of the bolters to carry a remedial law which induced them to burst up the Cabinet.

Again, the late Minister of Justice tells us that the Government as it stood could not hope to get the support of its own party in this House upon that question. What section of the Conservative members was it in danger of losing? Was it the French-Canadian section? The hon. Minister insinuates that the Government could not count upon that, because they could not fill the vacancy in the Cabinet from the province of Quebec, and that they wanted another leader to do so. If he had not, to use his own classical phrase, run away from this discussion, by leaving the House, I would like to ask him: which was the more likely to secure a Minister from the province of Quebec, a Cabinet with Sir Mackenzie Bowell at its head, or a Cabinet with Sir Charles Tupper at its head? Every one knows that Sir Mackenzie Bowell has the confidence of the people of the province of Quebec to a greater degree than Sir Charles Tupper, to a greater degree than the Minister of Finance, to a greater degree than the Minister of Railways and to a greater degree than the Minister of Agriculture. It is insulting to the intelligence of this House to tell us that the bolters wished a change such as has taken place, in order to obtain greater strength in the province of Quebec. And, as if to show how absurd it is, it turns out that, immediately it was known Sir Mackenzie Bowell was in undisputed control of the Cabinet after the bolters left, he got a Minister from the province of Quebec. It was no thanks to the bolters, and no thanks to Sir Charles Tupper, that Mr. Desjardins entered the Cabinet, for his entry was decided upon during the days that the bolters were out, and when it was believed to be impossible that they could ever return.

The ex-Minister of Justice attacked the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and other members on this side of the House for their conduct in this debate. He accuses us of turning the Chamber into a bear garden, and says that we used foul epithets towards gentlemen on the other side. I deny those charges entirely. I say that it is the members of the Cabinet themselves who have used foul epithets against each other. It is the Council Chamber that has been turned into a bear garden, and not the House of Commons. It is the members of their own household who have defiled the domestic hearth. It is they who have told the people of this country how little they think of each other.

Did any member on this side of the House declare that he believed the Minister of Agriculture was mean enough and scoundrelly enough to write an anonymous libel against the Postmaster General? No, it was a member of the Government though not of the Cabinet (Mr. Wallace) who made that statement. Did any member on this side of the House charge the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) with the somewhat Irish intention of trying to forge an anonymous letter in his name? No, it was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) who said that he believed the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) had himself written the anonymous libel and was trying to put the blame on him.

These are charges made against each other by men who know each other intimately; who have sat together around the council board, or were consulted outside the council room on Government matters, and who ought know each other's character well. These men had better take care lest the people of the country at large should believe both sides, and come to the conclusion that what Ministers say about each other in this Billingsgate style, is true all around. It matters little whether these charges be true or false, or whether the Minister of Agriculture, or the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) be capable of the scoundrelly conduct with which each charges the other. What remains absolutely certain and positive is that those men who claim to be united, who claim to be sitting in unity around the council board, sworn advisers of the Queen, sworn brethren to each other, entertain such opinions of each other as to make that kind of suspicion of each other possible.

It is certain, Mr. Speaker, that these gentlemen have opinions of each other which would prevent them from associating as gentlemen, in any ordinary capacity, outside of the Council Chamber. If they believed such things, the one about the other, they could not meet in peace and harmony—on a board of directors, in a club, in a drawing room, anywhere where gentlemen congregate or have business to transact; and it is they who have blackened each others' characters in this House, not we on this side. That is where the bear garden is, where the violent hates exist.

Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) told us one bit of truth when he said he believed he had helped the Government by going out. That is quite possible. It is natural for him, also, to believe that he helped the Government and the country by securing the entrance of his father into the Cabinet. It is quite proper for him to believe that, and quite natural; but he must not expect the country to take everything he says on that subject without a grain of salt, without, perhaps, a barrel of salt.

The people of this country knew Sir Charles Tupper, senior, when this young gentleman was too young to have much appreciation of the older gentleman's position in public life. They have not forgotten what they had learned to know about him at such great expense, and his son in this House must not be too thin-skinned. It is not his fault that he was born the son of Sir Charles Tupper, senior; it is not his fault that he and his father are both in public life; and he must take it for granted that he and his father will be discussed individually and collectively, as if they did not belong to the reigning dynasty of Canada. They will be treated exactly as other politicians are; they will be discussed with the same severity, and will have to put up with the same criticism.

I was referring to the hon. gentleman's belief that his father would be a source of strength to the newly reorganized Government. It must be noted that the entrance of that gentleman is the only new source of strength that has been secured to the Government by the return of the bolters. Now, what reason have we for believing that that gentleman's entrance will be a source of strength to the Government, and a benefit to the country?

As to Sir Charles Tupper's past record, the House would not bear with me in going into much detail just now, but whatever it be, we know that for the last nine years he has been out of Canadian politics, with the exception of one ill-advised, indecent, irruption into our politics as a paid Government servant during the elections of 1891. He has been living in England in luxury at the expense of the taxpayers of this country, associating with the aristocrats of England, forgetting his connection with what to him may seem the local politics of Canada. He has evidently not been taking treatment to reduce the measure of his hatband while there—I use this phrase about the hatband, merely to describe that state of self-appreciation which is supposed to extend the measure of a man's head. For we know that he granted an interview to a reporter of the "Mail and Empire" a few days ago, in which he displayed a most exalted opinion of himself and his importance to Canada and the Conservative party.

It is worth while to place on record this utterance of this man who was then the most-highly-paid public servant of Canada, and with the least to do for the money he received. After explaining how he had been called in to consult Sir Mackenzie Bowell, he says:

I assured Sir Mackenzie that I had approached the consideration of this question wholly from the standpoint of altogether subordinating every personal and private consideration to the exigency of what I believed the party and the best interests of the country required; that if I were prepared under those circumstances to enter his Government, I thought he, animated by the same considerations, ought not to allow his personal feelings towards any gentleman to influence him. The only thing, I said, that could induce me to re-enter parliamentary life at all was the belief that an overwhelming proportion of the Liberal-Conservative party in Canada believed that I could be of great service to the country in the present emergency by taking the leadership; that I assumed he would be animated by the same feelings, that of considering alone what the interests of the party demanded, and that the only inducement I could possibly have to enter his Government, even temporarily, would be to reunite and consolidate the great body to which we belonged, and which had accomplished so much for Canada.

Now, Sir, here we have this public servant, who had been awaiting developments here, ever since the business for which he had been summoned to Canada was done, to see what would turn up—a veritable Micawber looking for an opportunity to reinvest his talents in Canadian politics—an investment which, in the past, has borne for him the most tremendous and undue financial profits. We have, I say, a gentleman in that situation, talking as if he were a little tin Jupiter, the only resource, the only saviour of the Conservative party—who would only condescend to take a place as Premier of the Canadian Government under the belief that he could save Canada by so doing, and that he could bring back all the mutineers in his new crew.

Witness the condescending tone he adopts towards Sir Mackenzie Bowell, towards the chief whose servant he was, as High Commissioner in London. He told Sir Mackenzie Bowell, speaking as one away up to one down below, that he would condescend, on certain terms, to come in. He thought that with the mutineers at his back he would be able to enforce these terms; and, Sir, the circumstances have proved that he has been able to enforce them.

He gave his chief distinctly to understand that he would only go into the Government on condition that after the Address was passed he would become Premier, and leader of the party. That is a point on which we have not received proper explanation from the Government to-day—a point on which we should have explanation.

Is it understood that Sir Mackenzie Bowell or Sir Charles Tupper is to be the actual leader of the party, when we come to the elections? We want to know whether a conspiracy between a public servant and a set of Ministers whom their own leader denounced as treasonable, and unreasonably jealous of himself, has been a full success or not. We want to know that, and it is very hard to make it out from all the changing incidents that have characterized this crisis.

It has been a great series of events: First, resignation; then, recrimination; then, reconciliation; then, reorganization. But, oh, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing there has not been, there has not been renunciation, on the part of anybody in connection with the whole affair. The Minister of Finance would have us believe that there was renunciation—that the bolters were giving up something great and grand, when they gave up their key of the streets and took refuge again in the comfortable old lodgings which had housed them so long.

But unfortunately for them they have an organ in this city which must have drawn the inspiration for the article I am about to read from some member of the bolting party and which has given away the whole secret to the public. It says:

Sir Mackenzie Bowell, so far from having given up in despair the task of recruiting the depleted ranks of his Cabinet—a denouement which most of the political wiseacres have been predicting since Friday last—is believed to have provided himself with a pretty fair outfit of fighting men. These gentlemen who have been offered portfolios during the late unpleasantness will be pleased to hear how they are designated by the party organ:

Such at least was the report about the House of Commons, a report which certainly intensified anxiety as to the outcome.

They were anxious because they heard that the Premier had succeeded in forming a Cabinet? That was a strange cause for anxiety amongst patriotic Conservatives, I should think!

So long as the prospect of Sir Mackenzie's failure held out, many of the party seemed to be satisfied that all would come out right in the end, on the principle, probably, that all's well that ends well.

Here we have the Government organ telling us that the Conservative party regarded Sir Mackenzie Bowell's failure to form a Cabinet as a good ending that would make up for any sort of failure in the way by which that end was attained. All would be well if only he could fail to form a Government. But here comes the gem of this statement by the Ministerial organ:

But the possibility of a successful attempt to reconstruct the Cabinet, although minus some of the party's strongest element, was regarded with grave apprehension.

Evidently the formation of a successful Cabinet would disrupt the party!

And it is possibly on that account, that simultaneously with the announcement of Sir Mackenzie Bowell's success in getting a new Cabinet together, there was noticed a very general and decided disposition among the party leaders to bring about a speedy reconciliation of existing differences.

Compare this naive, and, I believe, true explanation, with the cooked explanation of the Finance Minister across the floor. He says it was done to save the party, but the "Citizen," the inspired Government organ, says it was done to save the bolters. They got in out of the cold, as quickly as they could, because they were afraid Sir Mackenzie was going to form a Cabinet without them. That is probably the exact situation of the case. Then the "Citizen" continues with a sub-heading:

THE HUSTLE BEGINS.

The work of mediation was readily undertaken by men who on Saturday were content to allow matters to drift towards what they considered to be the inevitable and perhaps undesirable result of the disruption. A regular hustle of stalwarts set in, and in an hour or so the habitues of Parliament were enjoying communion with the common secret that a reapproachment had been effected and that the crisis was at an end.

I am not a good enough English scholar to know exactly what it may be to enjoy communion with a secret, but, at all events, the point is that everybody was glad and happy to find that the hustling stalwarts had succeeded, and had managed to hustle in again out of the cold. The Minister of Finance and the still more stalwart Minister of Railways, and the passably stalwart Minister of Agriculture, hustled for all they were worth, and did get back again before the door was finally shut in their faces.

Mr. Speaker, a kaleidoscope is a very pretty toy, which shows many remarkable things to him who uses it. There is a lot of broken scraps and rubbish in the interior of this toy, but by a combination of crooked reflections in mirrors, an appearance of solidity is given to this broken mass of atoms when you shake the tube. The political kaleidoscope has been shaken up again, and the mass of incongruous atoms within it has been made to seem to adhere in a solid and cohesive mass. But it is nothing but an optical illusion.

There is no real cohesion between the members of the Cabinet, and the very next jar that occurs will separate the atoms and leave nothing but a disorganized mass of rubbish again.

How can there be union amongst men who, on their own solemn declaration, read in this House and printed in the "Hansard," have no respect for each other? How can there be union among Ministers who, on their own statement, have no respect for their leader? How can there be union between a Premier and his Cabinet who, he says, have a firmly rooted jealousy of himself? How can there be union among men who have proven that they have no respect for themselves?

The action of the bolters in going back to that Premier whom they first betrayed and then insulted—their action in begging to be taken back into his Cabinet—shows that they have lost all respect for themselves as they did for him. There can be no union, no solid reconstruction, in such a Cabinet as that.

I expressed, on a previous occasion, across this floor, my regret, for the sake of Canada, that such things had been possible in the Cabinet, as were stated by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the wreckers. I expressed my sympathy for the chief who had been betrayed, and who now, with the pistol at his head, has been induced to sign a statement of the causes for taking back the bolters, which we know to be contrary to the truth. I have now to express my regret that this mutiny has been successful. Like my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) I cannot feel any pride in the political institutions of Canada when it is possible for such schemes to succeed for the time being; but I have yet an abiding faith that when this scheme comes to be tried in the furnace of a general election; when this Cabinet, got together by such improper means, has to face the electors of Canada, the whole construction will come to ruin, and those who have been the authors of the disruption will go down to posterity branded with the accusation that they have ruined the Conservative party of Canada, and disgraced the politics of this country.

The only good which is likely to spring from the series of political crimes that have taken place is this, that all those who have taken part in this mutiny, this wrecking scheme, have committed political suicide and erased their names from the list of those who will be remembered as benefactors of Canada, and to that extent the political atmosphere of the country will be cleared and its political health greatly improved.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 16th January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VACANCY.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received notification of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the electoral district of Cape Breton by the resignation of David McKeen, Esq. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER. I move, with the consent of my hon. friend's opposite:

That questions and notices of motion be deferred until after the consideration of His Excellency's speech at the opening of this session.

Motion agreed to.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's speech delivered at the opening of the session.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, in rising to move that a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, I must crave the indulgence of the House on account of the physical incapacity under which I am suffering this afternoon. This duty devolves upon me under peculiar circumstances. I presume this is the most important occasion on which Parliament has been convened. The constitution, which has been sufficient for all the purposes of ordinary government in this country, is now put to its most severe test. It would have been much more satisfactory had the most important matter which had called this Parliament together, been settled amicably by the Government of Manitoba. Such has not been the case, and there now devolves upon this Parliament the duty of exercising as a Parliament of final resort, the corrective jurisdiction which is vested in it by the constitution of the country. In approaching the discussion of this subject, I cannot do better than refer in the briefest terms to the historical facts of the question. In the first place, Sir, as is well known, in the territory which is now the province of Manitoba, and which was then a portion of the Hudson Bay Territory, there were existing denominational schools, schools of Protestant type and schools of Catholic type; and at the time this constitutional compact was made and the province of Manitoba was formed, it was agreed between the people of that country and the Government, of the day, that a certain Act should be passed by Parliament and certain provisions should be incorporated in that Act, guaranteeing these denominational schools. It turns out, Sir, that since that Act has been passed it has been found that the intentions of the parties were not fully embodied in the agreement. According to the statement of the Lord Chancellor of England, the constitutional compact does not embrace the intentions of the contracting parties. Not only was that intention clearly understood at the time, but immediately after the constitution of Manitoba was framed and that district was formed into a separate province, its legislature, as one of its first acts, embodied that agreement in a statute whose spirit, for a period of about 20 years, was universally adopted and acted upon. In 1890 that legislative agreement was cast to the winds; and now this Parliament, after the necessary preliminaries have been taken, in the exercise of our corrective jurisdiction, will be called upon to remedy the injury that has been done to the minority in that province. I say, Sir, that it was regrettable that the legislature of Manitoba did not of itself, acting upon generous principles, remedy these evils. It has not seen fit to do so. When this matter was first brought to the notice of this Government in 1894 by petitions from that province to this Government—and I refer to this to rebut the contention that has been made throughout the country that this Government has acted in an arbitrary manner, that it has been inspired by a coercive spirit—on that occasion, Sir, the declaration that was made to Manitoba was a most pacific one. It appeals entirely to the good sense of its Government and to their patriotism, and it is very much to be regretted that it was not received in the spirit in which it was made. The last clause of the Order in Council then passed by this Government runs as follows:—

The committee beg to observe to Your Excellency, that the statements which are contained in this memorial are matters of deep concern and solicitude in the interest of the Dominion at large, and that it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and religious belief and practice; and the committee, therefore, humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hope that the legislatures of Manitoba and the North-west Territories respectively may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint of grievance may be ascertained to exist.

That, Sir, was a moderate course to pursue. There is nothing there that savors of coercion in the exercise of the constitutional rights of this Government; and I find no fault with the Government of Manitoba, either, for having planted themselves particularly upon the plea of provincial autonomy. The document containing Manitoba's answer is an able one. It is not, I contend, in harmony, however, with the spirit of the constitution. Again, when forced to act, the Government of this country, in the exercise of the function as a quasi-judicial body, heard the complaints, made another Order in Council, expressing their opinion, and directing what was necessary to be done in the interest of the minority in that province. This was also refused to be complied with by the Government of Manitoba. Still desiring the difficulty to be settled by that province, the Government again invited the province of Manitoba to make concessions. The reply to that invitation is one of which I do complain. It is an evasive reply; it does not grapple with the difficulty. It declares, notwithstanding the constitution has invested in this Parliament remedial power, the Manitoba Government have expressed their determination that they will not allow the Federal flag to float within the province of Manitoba in respect to this matter. They have opened their guns upon every portion of the Federal fortress, with this result, that we are called upon to undertake, during this session, a very unpleasant office indeed. With this brief statement of the facts, I shall proceed to discuss what to me are the salient features of the question. In the first place, I deny the constitutional contention of the Government of Manitoba, and I affirm broadly and positively the doctrine that there is in this constitution of ours no such thing, no such constitutional principle, as provincial autonomy. The principle of provincial autonomy is a principle of unquestionably wise policy. It has to be adopted, no doubt, as a matter of legislative policy, but as a question of constitutional policy and principle, it does not exist. In making this statement, I know I am taking strong, and, it may be thought, novel ground. Let us look into the history of the constitution and see whether that history supports it. At the time the Confederation was formed there was a grand purpose in view. That purpose was what? It was to collect and bind together a series of scattered and detached provinces, and to make them an organized whole. In order to do so, the provinces had to sacrifice what they had, they had to sacrifice provincial autonomy; and when the framers of the constitution were looking about for precedents, they looked first to the British constitution. In the preamble of the British North America Act, it is said that the provinces desired to be confederated under a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. If this statutory declaration is true, what do we find? There is no such thing as local autonomy, there is no such principle as local autonomy in the British constitution. Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen and Welshmen in all things are absolutely under the control of the Imperial Parliament. We may therefore regard this statutory statement as being rather the prompting of patriotism than of truth. The real prototype of our constitution is that of the republic to the south of us. If the founders of our constitution had determined to preserve the principle of provincial autonomy they might have adopted, not the constitution of the United States of to-day, but of the old federation which preceded it. That constitution was one of the most abortive which history records. It provided for no strong national government and ended in failure. The present constitution of the United States had shown its power; it had power to triumph over sectarian animosities, race antipathies and diverse territorial interests. It had also shown its weakness. That weakness consisted in the inadequate control of the central Government over the states which composed the union. The fathers of our constitution seeing its strength, determined to adopt its strong features and to avoid its weak ones, and therefore in moulding our constitution they did away entirely with the principle of absolute provincial autonomy. In the first place, in regard to the constitution of the local legislatures; an integral part of the law-making power of the province is a lieutenant-governor appointed by the federal government, to which he is responsible. In the next place, each and every Act of the local legislature can be disallowed by the federal authority, the federal government being in each case responsible to this Parliament. These two features standing there contain a declaration of the supremacy of the federal government, a declaration that the dominant power in this country is the federal power, and that the genius of our constitution is the federal genius. Particularly in regard to the subject of education, what do we find? It is treated as an exceptional subject. Generally it is relegated to the local body, subject to the federal power of disallowance, but in respect to denominational rights and privileges subject to the exercise of a corrective power that is vested in the federal government. This power which is vested in the federal government, in the case of Manitoba, whose constitution in that respect is on the lines of the general constitution of the Dominion, goes with the power to legislate given to her. The very Act which gives her power to legislate controls that legislative power in this respect, and the government of Manitoba has as much right to deny the power to this Parliament to legislate with respect to the criminal law, or to legislate with respect to promissory notes, or in regard to any one of the subjects of jurisdiction which the constitution confers on the federal power, as it has to deny to this Parliament its right to exercise its jurisdiction in regard to the matter of schools. This departure from the American constitution was made by men of no ordinary calibre. I question whether there ever sat as a board, charged with the duty of framing the constitution of a country, a more able, experienced and patriotic body of men than those who gathered in the Council Chamber of the old Parliament Building in Quebec. They were men selected without respect to party; they represented all parties, all religions, and both nationalities in Canada, and what those men in their calm deliberations determined on is the basal rule of our national life. It cannot on any particular occasion be departed from without resorting to the principles of revolution itself. But while it is conceded that this constitution does confer upon the federal parliament the powers I have mentioned, it is denied that there is any occasion for their exercise. I will point out this fact, that the School Act of the province of Manitoba affords the only possible ground for this Parliament's interference. The legislature of Manitoba has gone from one extreme to the other. They have swept away every vestige of denominational right or privilege. The power must be vested in this Parliament for some purpose, and no human ingenuity is equal to suggesting a case in which it is right and proper for this Parliament to intervene.

if that case is not now before us. But it is said that there is no grievance in that country; that there is nothing imposed on the Catholic conscience which is a violation of the principles of religious liberty. Now, Sir, there may be an infringement of the rights of conscience which is negative, as well as an infringement which is positive, and if you say in respect to religious matters a man shall not do so and so, in principle the infringement of the rights of conscience is as great as if you say he shall do so and so. The infringements are but different phases of the one objectionable principle. Now, Sir, look for one moment at the legislation which we have there. In the first place, the legislature of Manitoba lays down in the portion of the law of 1890 which relates to religion, that it shall be the duty of the teacher to teach with the consent of the trustees, religion of a certain type. It is true that this religious teaching is in its positive aspect colourless,—that it is an abstraction. But the Catholic conscience is not satisfied with that. The Catholics want something beyond it. In juxtaposition to this clause they have, strange to say, inserted a clause prescribing that the Act shall be entirely undenominational. The legislature has invited the Catholics to feast. That feast is one which satisfies the Protestant palate, and it says to the Catholics: If you are not satisfied with that feast you may leave the banquet hall. Not only on that ground is there an interference with the rights of the Catholics of Manitoba, but there is the main interference which I have mentioned, in relating the history of the case. There was understood to be guaranteed to the Catholics by the solemnity of the constitutional contract certain rights and privileges with respect to denominational schools that existed at the time of the union; and although the Privy Council of England have said that there were no such rights and privileges known to the law; yet, as I have pointed out, the Chancellor of England in the argument of the school case declared it is evident from reading the document itself that there was something which was not incorporated in it by which rights and privileges supposed to be guaranteed were not guaranteed. That was an error of the draughtsman. Now, Sir, I ask this House if it has come to this: if we are to plant ourselves behind an error, and to say that inasmuch as a certain privilege was not properly embodied in the constitution, that we will tolerate sharp practice, and standing firmly by the letter of the law refuse the minority their rights. I say that if we should do that we would be committing a great breach of faith with the people of this country. We would be committing a breach of faith which this country cannot afford to be guilty of. We have a standing to maintain. We must be revered at home, we must be respected abroad; and if that respect is to be merited, and if that reverence is to be maintained, then there is but one principle to live by: that each and every man or set of men in this country shall be true to the other in respect to those matters that lie at the basis of the national compact, and which by the solemn terms of allegiance they are pledged each to the other to stand to, and to abide by. I have great faith, Sir, in the people of this country. I believe that when they rightly understand this question there will be no difficulty in the way of our doing justice. I anticipate that when Manitoba thoroughly understands the action of this Parliament she will abide by the constitution most reverently, and that this troublous question will then, soon be happily solved. How can it be otherwise? Why, Sir, in order that the other portions of Canada should be true and loyal to Manitoba what have they done for her? In order to work out the grand principle of nationalism in this country, the older provinces of Canada have poured from their treasury into that western province. All that we ask of Manitoba now is, that she should respect this feeling of nationalism, be loyal to the principle of federalism in the constitution, and do nothing that will outrage the religious sentiments of the minority in Manitoba, and of their fellow citizens in every province of this Dominion. I have very much pleasure, Sir, in referring to another article in the Speech from the Throne, that, in relation to the favourable condition of our trade and commerce. It is a pleasure to know that during the last six months ending in December, that while the increase in revenue has been about a million and a quarter dollars, the decrease in our expenditure has been about six hundred thousand dollars, giving a difference for these six months alone of about $1,800,000. It is also a pleasure for us to know that the imports and exports of this country, so far as the statistics are to hand, afford evidence that the trade of the country, and that the fiscal policy of the country have been such, that notwithstanding the peculiarly unfavourable condition of trade throughout the world, our trade and finances are in a healthy condition in Canada. Both our imports and our exports are increasing. That is a highly satisfactory state of affairs. I would refer, Sir, for a moment to that paragraph in the Address which speaks of the delimitation of the boundary between Alaska and Canada. It will be a pleasure to this House to know that the matter is almost satisfactorily consummated. It is a subject for congratulation to the world that the two great nations upon this continent, bound to each other by ties of race and political institutions, should be willing to calmly submit to a mutually selected commission, those difficulties which agitating other nations are unfortunately generally settled by a recourse to arms. It is a remarkable thing indeed that we, lying to the north of the United States, and notwithstanding the numerous disputes which have arisen concerning our boundary, have invariably settled them, not by the sword, but by that more philosophical, Christian and civilized method of arbitration. It is to be hoped that in other controversies between Great Britain and the United States the same kindly feeling which has prevailed in respect to our boundary questions, will display itself, and that never shall the good feeling and harmony existing between the two nationalities be impaired or sacrificed. Now, Sir, in closing I desire to say that this great question for which this session has been specially called together, is one that I trust every member of this House will approach in the largest spirit of Christian charity, and that our decision on this question will be received by Manitoba in the same spirit as that in which the legislation will be instituted by us. There is one great principle that must underlie this young country, if we are to attain national eminence, and that principle is, that each and every man in every portion of Canada shall feel, that although he may be a resident of New Brunswick, or a resident of Nova Scotia, or a resident of Manitoba, or a resident of Quebec, he is a citizen of Canada and of Canada alone. This country has no sympathy, humanity at large has no sympathy with a man who stands up for his parish, or his county, or his province, and who does not allow his patriotism to embrace the whole extent of the national territory. The history of the Republic to the south of us comprises the history of seventy or eighty years of constitutional struggle for federal amplitude. During that time great men clung to the principle of state autonomy; but, Sir, of the long list of illustrious names which that great country has produced there is not one of those who held to the doctrine of state autonomy—notwithstanding the greatness of their intellectual endowments—there is not one of them who to-day lives in the hearts of the American people. These men met with the plaudits of the party claquers of the day. They were lights that shot out like meteors for a moment and then expired; but the names which are deeply entrenched in the affections of the American people—Washington, Hamilton, Madison, Jefferson, Marshall and Webster—are names that are imperishable. These are lights set in the political firmament, eternal as the stars; and I trust that this country will ever be guided by the spirit of such men—

Such men and men like these can ne'er expire;
They shall withstand the empire of decay
When time is o'er and worlds have passed away;
Cold in the dust their perished hearts may lie,
But that which warmed them once can never die.

Sir, I feel proud in being a supporter of a Government who on this question have the boldness to come out and take their political lives in their hands, the true and manly course to take, and lay aside all considerations of office or party vantage, in view of the solemn duty before them; who although defeat may be staring them in the face, are not afraid to be patriotic, honest and honourable—to plant themselves firmly on the constitution of the country, and carry out its provisions at all hazards trusting that posterity may justify them, if the present generation does not. No state can afford to deal unjustly with itself; no state can afford to deal unjustly with any portion of itself. For party purposes we may act differently; but these evils may ultimately, if persisted in, destroy the national existence itself. All along the banks of the stream of time we may see empires shipwrecked—why? Because rulers followed the blind impulses for the time of the majority. Statesmen may think they are acquiring popularity; they may hope to acquire or cling to office by such a course; they may even deceive themselves and imagine they are doing a service to their country.

But the destinies think not so;

To their judgment chamber lone Comes no voice of popular clamor—

There Fame's trumpet is not blown.

That you grant; but then you say,

That you differ from them somewhat;

Which is stronger, you or they?

Patient are they as the insects

Which build islands in the deep:

They heed not the bolted thunder,

But their silent way they keep;

Where they have been that we know;

Where empires towered that were not just,

Lo! the skulking wild fox scratches

In a little heap of dust.

I thank the House for the attention they have given me. I am sorry indeed that I am physically incapacitated for the task that has been imposed upon me; but with these few remarks I have much pleasure in moving that this humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Mr. Speaker, in rising to perform an important function of public duty and personal pleasure, I must follow in the wake of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed you, and ask for that indulgence that is gladly and willingly extended by the members of the House of Commons to all new members. Ere I proceed to speak in detail upon the questions upon which I am expected to speak, I am reminded at the moment that lately within your hearing it has been said that this Parliament has been remarkable for several things. Those things were specified. Sir, I think this Parliament has been remarkable for other things besides. We are here in its dying days; and if I be not familiar with parliamentary practice, and not familiar, perhaps, with the proper language to use here, it is evidently not going to be my lot, at least in this Parliament, to learn very much thereof. But, Sir, carrying my mind back to its beginning, and, remembering that then we had with us a man who has since gone to his reward as the leader of the Liberal-Conservative party, of whom we all were proud—followed soon by another leader of whom every Canadian, whether he belonged to the professions or to the laity, felt proud—followed closely by yet another leader who lived in the affections of the people of this country more than most others, and who died at the very foot of the Throne—I think, Mr. Speaker, that this Parliament is remarkable in that it has furnished an example of a political party being able to withstand such great reverses. No wonder, Sir, it can come out unscathed from a political crisis. This Parliament is remarkable also in high measure in another respect, inasmuch as it is affording a welcome back to the shores of our beloved country of one whom, during forty years past, we have learned to admire—one who has been highly honoured in his native province and who sat in that great council in the old hall at Quebec which has been spoken of to-day, and joined in the endeavour, the successful endeavour, to build up a great empire on this side of the Atlantic under the same old flag that floats on the other.

Mr. Speaker, I do not purpose speaking in detail of the many triumphs of this Parliament of Canada. My one regret in connection therewith is that my entry into Parliament had to be heralded by the death of one who in his native country, and particularly in North Ontario where he was best known, was best beloved. I am sorry, indeed, that in order that I should have a place in the Parliament of Canada, he had to step down and out from the councils of the nation. But there is this satisfaction to us of his country, who have always known him, that he left the Parliament of Canada in possession of the fond affections of its members on both sides of the House. This Parliament is remarkable yet again in that it welcomed to our shores a year or two back one who has a name not only in the vice-regal service of the Empire, but throughout the length and breadth of all countries in which the English tongue is spoken. I have reference to His Excellency, who has shown his opinion of our country and his belief in its future by investing his means in our broad acres. I think it was a happy day when His Excellency came to our shores, and I believe that the Home Government will in the future, as it has in the past, give us, in the vice-regal chair, men of whom Canadians can be proud.

Now, coming down to that paragraph which speaks of the Mounted Police—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Hon. gentlemen laugh, but I know something of the efficiency of the Mounted Police, for I once got into their clutches. Well might His Excellency speak in kindly and eulogistic terms of that noble body of men. When General Miles and General Terry can speak of them as a body of men of which any country might be proud, surely Canadians can well afford to be proud of them. We hear of little incipient rebellions on the other side of the line; we hear rumours of little wars over there; we hear of thefts and murders in their territories; but we do not hear of such on our side of the line. Our Indian population are quiet and contented, and our Mounted Police are the men who go among the Indians and the Half-breeds and the Whites in our North-west and keep order. It is they who gather in our revenue and maintain peace and order, and they do this at a comparatively very small expense to the people of the country.

Agriculture is spoken of as likely to be stimulated by this Government and by our people. Speaking as an agriculturist, I think there is no body of men who deserve better at the hands of the Government than those who till the soil; and permit me to add that I do not think any body of men are better treated by the Government of Canada than the farmers of Canada. We have a great North-west, the possibilities of that country are beyond the comprehension of any mind in this House. A short time ago we purchased it at an expense of $1,400,000. It cost us as much more to organize it, and a further sum of $3,668,904 to put the land of that country in a position for proper sale. In other words, we have expended upon that country, in these respects, $6,468,904, and have got back into the treasury in golden dollars since then, through the sale of those lands, $4,275,526, leaving a balance against the treasury of $2,192,378. Well, Sir, during these last twelve months, ending the 31st of December last, we find that the farmers of Manitoba alone have been able to reap from their lands:—

	Bushels.
Wheat	31,775,038
Barley	5,645,036
Oats	22,555,733
Flax	1,281,354
Rye	81,082

not taking into account upwards of six million bushels of potatoes, turnips, and mangolds which that country has yielded; and if the yield of the territories were added, the grain crop, instead of totalling up to 61,366,472 bushels, would be upwards of one hundred million bushels. Compute the value of that grain at, say 30 cents a bushel, on an average—and I think the average is a low one—and you have a yield in a single year to the farmers of Manitoba alone worth the enormous sum of $18,000,000, or nine times as much as the balance still owing to the national treasury from the sale of Manitoba lands. If that be true of Manitoba, what of the North-west Territories? What of the provinces down by the sea? What of our great Ontario, and great

Quebec? Why, the possibilities of the future are incalculable if the Government of Canada be true to its duty, and render to the farmers of the country even in greater measure than in the past that assistance to which they have proved themselves entitled. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes that there is an exodus, or that there has been an exodus in the past. But if we go through the counties of Manitoba, and the lands of the North-west, we find them settled, not by the English and the German, and the foreigner, so much as by the sons and daughters of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia. We have had an exodus from the older settled portions of the country to that newer portion, and we may be thankful for this further fact, that in the seventeen years during which the National Policy has been in force in Canada, there has been no exodus of any considerable proportion from this great country of ours. Hon. gentlemen opposite, judging from their remarks, appear to join issue with me upon that statement, but let them go to the Canadian settlements on the other side of the line, let them go to Michigan, if they will, and while they will find there half of its entire population Canadians or descendants of Canadians, they will also learn that these people went yonder long before the Government of Sir John Macdonald took office. If they go to Northern Dakota and there meet three out of every four in the northernmost part of the state, Canadians, they may have the satisfaction of knowing that these people left Canada before the National Policy came into operation. Let them go to the settlement in Kansas if they will, and they will discover that our fellow Canadians went in there before the National Policy was heard or dreamt of. Go where they will, they will find that the Canadian settlements over yonder are not the results of the National Policy. Then again these people are coming back in large numbers. This paternal Government of ours has had its agents in Dakota and Michigan and elsewhere, bringing back these children of Canada to our country from which they have been long separated, and settling them in the North-west Territories. Now, Mr. Speaker, is there reason for the further existence of the National Policy? Take an illustration from the experience of the people of Scotland. When I first had the pleasure of going to the land of my fathers some sixteen or eighteen years ago, I found the tenant farmer of Scotland a gentleman indeed, in the sense that he had gloved hands and spent his time in sporting and hunting as did the laird himself. But if we go to Scotland to-day we will find the tenant farmer working as hard with his ungloved hands as the farmer of Canada is doing. And so, too, in the south of England, in that portion of the country where the sheep industry flourishes. Throughout the United Kingdom, we find farm after farm thrown upon the hands of the landlord, not to be let again, simply because the farmer can no longer raise wheat—even though his crops still yield thirty to forty bushels to the acre as heretofore—in competition with the farmer of the United States and Canada and other portions of the new world. The English farmer to-day is a protectionist: he is crying out for duties upon his products in order that he may have the very same protection, the farmers of Canada are now enjoying. And they have a body of eighty men in the British House of Commons acting in the interest of the farmers of the country and clamouring for protection to native industry. It is not my purpose to dwell long upon this subject, but I cannot leave it, without according the thanks of the farmers of this country to one who has still a seat in this House. Years ago little interest was taken in the agricultural industry of this country. True, certain returns and tabulated statistics were submitted every year, but only to be filed away in order that they might be referred to now and again. Not until the Government of John Sandfield Macdonald came into power in Ontario was any particular interest taken in the farmers of Canada. Then we find an experimental farm purchased in that province at the instance and upon the suggestion of the hon. member for London (Sir John Carling). And when he left the local political sphere to take his part in national affairs, we find him again, ever considerate of the interests of the farmers, establishing experimental farms in the province of Ontario, in the North-west Territories, and other portions of this great Dominion. The Department of Agriculture had an efficient head in the person of the hon. member for London, and if there is one man who, more than another, lives in the affection of the farmers of this country, he is that hon. member.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the reason he is now out of the Government.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman was succeeded in that office by another gentleman, who was alleged by the friends of gentlemen opposite to be incompetent because he had been trained in a noble profession to which many of us in this House are proud to belong, and because he had not been brought up to the sheepfold or the plough. Nevertheless, Sir, the hon. senator then at the head of that department made a good Minister of Agriculture. And now, within the last few weeks, there has been welcomed by the yeomanry of Canada as the head of that department one who gives promise of becoming a stalwart agriculturist. He tells the farmers that his policy is to be an aggressive policy. He has told them already that he is going to have a sheep expert upon the Experimental Farm here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To take care of stray sheep?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Well, I am not the stray sheep. If there is one branch of agriculture that has been more neglected than another in this country of ours it is the sheep industry. I say that without fear of successful contradiction. You may say to me: Look at the Columbian Exposition, where the Canadian farmers carried away nine-tenths of the awards given. That is a subject of perhaps pardonable pride to me, coming as I do from the old banner county of Ontario. The hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith), and the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) must share my pride in the fact that a large majority of those prizes came to our county. But if we have had successes of that kind, it has been because of the individual effort of the individual owner, except that the Government transported our sheep to Chicago and kept them while they were there. But, if we turn our eyes to Australia or to England, we find that our sheep industry is a drop in the bucket as compared with theirs. We have gained success in the old world with our cheese, and to-day we supply 50 per cent of the English consumption. We have gained occasional successes with our fruit, although it is true, occasional failures have befallen us as well in that respect. But what is there to prevent us, if we stimulate this industry as we ought to do, from making our mutton the favourite mutton of the London market? Let the Minister of Agriculture purchase his sheep and engage his experts, and, after a while, the farmers of Canada will know what class of sheep it is best for them to raise. Other industries have been stimulated by this paternal Government of ours. When, through no fault of our own, we lost a market we formerly had—a market which we do not really now require—our eyes were turned to the British market, and our cheese men sold their product there, until they now supply one-half of the cheese required and used over there, but notwithstanding such is the fact, this Government of ours noticed that our butter found no place in the British market, although Denmark and France and Australia were selling their butter in that country, and they, therefore, copied the example of the Australian governments which gave a bonus on a sliding scale for the production of that class of butter likely to find a place in the British market, with the result that they increased our sales in Great Britain from one to two per cent of the total consumption in a single year. What they have done in the matter of butter they can do in respect of other industries; and we the farmers of Canada claim they should do so, if farming is to retain the position it has had in the past, and reasonably hopes to attain in the future. In the last three years we have trebled our sales of horses going from Montreal to the old country, and I am glad to notice that the Minister of Agriculture has assured us that he is going to try to stimulate the production of the class of horses most likely to find purchasers in Britain. It is well known that horses are in great demand there now, and if we Canadians can produce the class of horses required there, we will find a ready sale for them. Now, another thing. This Government has already established the principle of cold storage. A prohibition has been put upon the sale of our live cattle in the old land, and it is now the purpose of the Government to establish the cold storage system on such a basis that our cattle can be killed here, transported to the old land, and sold to the English consumer from warehouses established in various parts of the Empire. That scheme is worthy of support. Now, if they have been doing that, why can they not also stimulate the bee industry, as has been promised—an object well worthy of their consideration. I may suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he also endeavour to stimulate the fruit industry, and let the farmers of this country know what classes of fruit will find the best market in England. Then, Sir, I may be permitted to speak of another subject, that of fall wheat. I believe nothing has been done at the Central Experimental Farm in respect to fall wheat. The soil does not permit of it, I am told. But, Mr. Speaker, there are counties in Ontario, and counties in every province of this great Dominion, where fall wheat might be tried and tested; and I would invite the Minister of Agriculture once again to look at North Ontario. I would not complain a great deal if the Minister, in his researches, were to visit my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith), nor yet the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), or South Victoria (Mr. Fairbairn), or, indeed, my hon. friend for West Durham (Mr. Beith), or my hon. friend for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). We can give the Minister of Agriculture soil in which he can test that question in a way that he cannot test it here, and I think in the interest of the people of Canada that ought to be done. Now, one word more before leaving this subject. We have to-day the satisfaction of knowing that the lumbermen of the Ottawa valley, operating in our great north country, can no longer go to Chicago and buy their oats at 12 cents a bushel, and bring them here to be consumed. We have the satisfaction of knowing, as producers of meat, that Mr. Armour can no longer sell his meat here. We have the satisfaction of knowing that American horses that come away from the interior of the United States and are sold at Buffalo at ten dollars a head, as was reported a few days ago, cannot come into this country any longer to be sold at those prices in the face of the Canadian farmer. Sir, I am satisfied, speaking for the farmers of this country, that if the Government were to do their full duty towards the agricultural interests, we have before us a future of unknown greatness. Now, this brings me to the last matter I wish to touch upon, and that is the militia of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite who seem to endorse the very word "militia," are militiamen like myself. Perhaps they have had the experience of a quarter of a century with the active militia of Canada, as I have had, and as many hon. gentlemen around me have had. We who have had that experience know full well that this present Government, and all other Canadian Governments, have been unkind to the militia of Canada, unkind in the sense that they have not given us the annual drill we ought to have had. Why do we require it? Mr. Speaker, the men upon the field require to know one another, as the men in this House require to know one another; and if we meet but once in two years, and, as happened on the last occasion, once in three years, we can never hope to know one another as we ought in order that we may stand by one another in cases of emergency. Sir, I believe that the militia of Canada is deserving of the very best thought of Canada. The militia of Canada have done great things in the past. Sometimes it is said of us that we are not the brave men that our fathers were. Give us a chance, Mr. Speaker. We have not had a chance in our generation. We want a better rifle than the old Snider, and we have been promised it by this Government. We are promised that the militia is to be encouraged, and our defences are to be strengthened. I believe that the best way to strengthen the defences of this country is by strengthening the individual members of the militia. Let us have proper arms, let us have free ammunition as far as possible; and then, Sir, instead of having but one Queen's prize winner in this great Dominion of ours, we will have prize winner after prize winner in years to come. We are proud as Canadians to think that one of our sons went to the old land and captured that valuable prize from the sharpshooters and marksmen there assembled from all parts of the Empire. One word more on this topic. We have furnished for the British service, already two regiments of men. Only a few years ago, we found the 100th regiment raised here in old Canada for the Imperial service, and the 104th, in New Brunswick. We have had individual Canadians making famous names for themselves, not only in the Crimean war, but in the wars in the east as well. Only a few short years ago we put down a rebellion in Canada, unaided by British forces, and with the loss of but little Canadian blood. In the first North-west rebellion we suppressed the disturbance with the aid of a few British forces, and our Canadian volunteers distinguished themselves so well in those troubles that General Wolseley, when he went to Egypt, sent for Canadians to surround him and assist him in the great work he had to do there. Mr. Speaker, we have done grent things in the past. In 1866 and in 1868, when a horde of misguided men thought to do their country a service by striking at us, we repelled them with but little loss. In 1812 our grandsires showed that they were worthy descendants of Britons. The raw militia of Canada then won for us the battles of Stony Creek, Chrysler's Farm, Chateauguay, Lundy's Lane, and Queenston Heights. These were Canadian battles, fought by the sons of Canadians. Sir, I ask this House to consider the subject of the militia of Canada with the idea that they are worthy of greater attention on the part of this Government. Although we are now happily at peace, we know that possibly, though I hope not probably, a quarrel might arise with our neighbours across the line, and when we find England in her present isolated condition, it is possible, I say, though not probable, that the Empire may require the services of Canada; therefore, we who have the protection of her flag ought to be ready, at any moment, not only to defend our own homes, but to rush to the rescue wherever and whenever danger threatens. It gives me pleasure not a little to have the high privilege of seconding the Address in response to the Speech from the Throne, so ably moved by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), and I do so in the fullest confidence that the Parliament of Canada, inspired by the very best influences of the democracy of the old world and the new intermingled with abiding traditions and sustained by the everlasting principles of the British people in the past, who have shown to the world that the monarchical form of government as it is exemplified in England and in the colonies is, after all, the best—so sustained and so supported will act always in the very best interest of our people and our beloved country.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, the House, I am sure, will regret, and, perhaps, will somewhat resent the loss of time which, through the action of vacillating men, has prevented it, up to this moment, addressing itself to the task which it has in hand, and the duties which it is incumbent upon it to discharge. Among those statements which were made by the hon. member for Westmoreland in which I can at all agree, I admit, is the statement that this is a special and most important session. This is not only an important session, but it is an unprecedented and extraordinary session. It is unprecedented and extraordinary for more reasons than one. It is unprecedented and extraordinary not only for the crisis of which we have been the witnesses, and of which, perhaps, after having heard the two speeches we will think we have not seen the last, but it is important, extraordinary and unprecedented for this cause especially, that Parliament is here summoned to determine one of the gravest questions which Parliament has ever had come before it, the gravest perhaps which has engaged, up to this moment, the attention of the confederation, and a question which, in its bearings, and in the manner in which it shall be settled, may, perhaps, permanently affect the future of this Canadian confederation. Sir, for my part, I thought that it would be well that every facility should be given to the Government to bring forward at the earliest possible moment the measure for the consideration of which this session has been called; but, before so doing there are certain duties which have to be attended to, and first and foremost is the duty in which we are now engaged of offering an answer to the Speech with which His Excellency was pleased to open this Parliament just two weeks ago to-day. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it affords me much pleasure, in accordance with parliamentary usage and traditions, to offer to the mover and seconder of this Address the congratulations of the House on the manner in which they have performed an always difficult duty. I had, myself, when I first came to this House, the honour of seconding the Address, and I know from personal experience that it is always a most ungrateful task to perform. I may say to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) that his advent to this House had been preceded by a reputation earned in another sphere, on the floor of the legislature of his native province, and I am very glad to tell the hon. gentleman candidly that it was a reputation well earned, and well deserved. I say it was fame well earned, and well deserved as an orator, though the hon. gentleman will pardon me if I say that I could not take him as a guide in constitutional matters. My hon. friend has uttered views which I do not propose to discuss at any length at this moment, views which he suggested amounting to actual heresy in regard to the form of this Government, views which we may all have the opportunity of discussing on a future occasion. But, again, I repeat that the hon. gentleman has proved that he will turn out to be quite a success in the House, and quite an honour to the party to which he belongs. My hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) has also done very well, and if he will permit me I will at once pay him the compliment that he excelled in stretches of imagination, though I must say, if he will pardon me for saying it, that his memory is not as good as his imagination is vast. My hon. friend is ignorant of the fact that there has been an exodus since we have had the National Policy in force. He knows there has been an exodus at some time, but he does not appear to know, and he would not admit, that an exodus has taken place since the introduction of the National Policy. I will not enter into figures with him, but if my memory of the censuses of 1881 and 1891 is correct, the rate of increase in population for the decade previous to 1881 was something like 90 per cent, whilst for the decade following (under the National Policy) the rate of increase fell to 12 per cent. But the hon. gentleman, while admitting there had been an exodus at some time, stated that if some of our people had gone to Michigan, Dakota, and the Western States at some time in our history, still to-day we might console ourselves with the fact that they were coming back to this country. Well, if it takes them nineteen years, odd, to come back, I must say they are not possessed of the same rapidity of locomotion we have seen exhibited on the floor of this House within the past few days. I may also say to my hon. friend the member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) that I was rather anxious and curious when listening to his remarks to-day.—I was anxious and curious to listen to him, because in common with many others I was in doubt as to whether in the election that took place a few weeks ago in the good riding of North Ontario, the Government had actually won a victory or suffered a defeat. It is true, Sir, I do not deny it, it is in the memory of all the members of this House, that the election of my hon. friend (Mr. McGillivray) was heralded throughout the length and breadth of this land as a great and substantial victory for the Government. It is true that the elation was such that my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who was then a leading member of the Government, and who happened to be at that moment in the city of New York, proclaimed to the American people at large in an interview published in the New York papers, that the victory of North Ontario was an endorsement by the people of Canada of the policy of the Government upon the school question. But, Sir, though this may be true, it is equally true that only a few days afterwards, if the papers do not lie to us, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who had just left the Government upon that very same school question because as we understand he could not agree with that policy, stated somewhere in the province of Ontario, that when the proper time came the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) would vote with him upon that question. I understand that statement has been disputed, but I imagine that if there has been a victory in North Ontario for the Government it was at best a victory which may at some time or another turn into a defeat. But, whatever may be the result in North Ontario, whether it was an approbation or a condemnation of the policy of the Government upon the school question, there was no uncertain sound in the election for Cardwell, there was no uncertain sound, for I was present myself, in the election for Montreal Centre, there was a still less uncertain sound in the election of Jacques Cartier, and there was no uncertain sound in the West Huron election. The Government may console themselves with the victory in Victoria, B.C., but my hon. friend (Mr. Prior) knows very well that there has been a landslide in the city of Victoria which almost buried the Controller of Inland Revenue, and if a few more boulders should come down, my hon. friend (Mr. Prior) would be crushed under a heap of earth and ashes next time. Now, Sir, there is something very peculiar in the debate so far as it has gone up to the present moment. We have had already two speeches, and it seems to me that there is echoing in my ears yet, what took place last session upon a similar occasion. To-day we have had the speech of the hon. the mover of the resolution (Mr. Powell) which was almost altogether devoted to the Manitoba school question. We have had the speech of my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray), but not a word did he say about the Manitoba school question. These dualities are not new to this House. We had them last session when the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne was moved by my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and seconded by my hon. friend from Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley). The first of those hon. gentlemen (Mr. Bennett) declared that the remedial order which had just been passed by the Government was simply a reference of the question to the Government of Manitoba, while my hon. friend from Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) declared in no uncertain tone that the Government had pinned its faith to the policy of interference, and interference there would be. Upon the present occasion we have one sound coming from one province and we have another sound coming from another province. We shall know by and by which is singing in tune with the policy of the Government. Sir, there are many things in the Speech from the Throne which have been neglected by the mover and seconder of the Address, and which, therefore, I presume I may also neglect. For instance, the first paragraph of the Speech declares this :

The bountiful harvest with which Canada has been blessed is a cause for the deepest thankfulness to the Giver of all good.

Well, that is a sentiment which I can certainly re-echo. But there is something a little new in this paragraph. A bountiful harvest, I am sorry to say, has not been of late very, very frequent. But we have had bountiful harvests before, although this is the first time, since the National Policy has been in existence, that Providence has been thanked for a bountiful harvest. Generally, the thanks were given to the National Policy. We were told that the National Policy was responsible for the good harvest, just as at one time the National Policy was the cause of the hens laying bigger eggs than usual. I do not want to decry the glories of the National Policy, but there is one thing further that should be told in this Speech, and it is not fair that hon. gentlemen opposite should decline to give the National Policy due praise for the good prices which the Canadian farmer is getting for the fruits of the bountiful harvest in the Canadian market which has been built by the National Policy. The Speech also says :

Mr. LAURIER.

I congratulate you upon the evidence of increased activity in the various branches of commerce and industry.

"I congratulate you." This is an expression which I have often heard used in derision in this House, and I did not know that at the moment the advisers of His Excellency put these words in the mouth of His Excellency, they were at that time incubating a great political crisis. I would suppose that they were speaking in a jocose manner and using the words in an ironical sense. Reference is made in the Speech to the loyalty of the Indians. Well, loyalty is a very big word when you speak of the Indians. The Indian is not generally supposed to be loyal except for good cause. Loyalty implies a sentiment, an idea. I have this to say : Since the Department of the Interior has been brought here the experience is that so long as the Indian is treated well and rations distributed to him, and so long as his reservation is not invaded, he will be loyal. I agree with the sentiment expressed in the Speech that the Indian industrial schools in the North-west are quite a boon to that country. I have heard the usefulness of these schools discussed, but for my part, after having visited the North-west and seen these industrial schools, I believe, although they cost dear, that they do a great deal of good to the population there. I may reiterate also everything that has been said by both the mover and the seconder of the Address with regard to the North-west Mounted Police. The mounted police is certainly a body of which Canada has every reason to be proud. Sometimes in the east, the usefulness of that force has been discussed, but for my part, after having visited the North-west, I came back with the conclusion deeply seated in my mind that the North-west Mounted Police force is worth all the money that it costs the country. So long as the population is sparsely settled, so long as the population is not sufficiently numerous to allow of the different groups to be in touch with each other, I consider that the services of the mounted police are absolutely requisite to the good government and peace of the country at large. Now, Sir, I pass to another subject which has been touched upon by my hon. friend the seconder of the Address (Mr. McGillivray). It is a subject on which I listened to him with a great deal of attention. The paragraph in the Speech is this :

Sir, I confess that when I read that statement in the speech my curiosity was aroused and I listened attentively to the seconder of this address when he referred to it in order to find out (since he is in the confidence of the Government) what was really intended by the Government, what were their motives, and why the words were used. The dry utterances of the speech are tantalizing in this respect, that they inform us that the Government have some design in their minds, but what that design actually is we do not know. I am curious, for my part, to have some information on this subject. With regard to the better arming of the militia, I have only this to say at this moment, that it seems to me that the subject is not one that should call for such a solemn announcement as that made in the Speech. To my mind, this is simply a departmental affair and nothing else. I quite agree with every word on this subject that has been uttered by my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray). If we are to spend money on our militia and our volunteer force, and we must do so, common sense requires that this money, to be effectively spent, should be spent in such a manner as to provide them with the best armament that can be obtained, according to the progress of the age. What is the object of our militia force? Why, Sir, the thing is obvious. The object of arming the militia or the volunteer force is this, that should we, in the grave contingency of war, be called upon at any moment to defend our country, we may have a force ready to meet the enemy or to repel invasion; and if our militia or volunteers are to meet the enemy at any moment, which God forbid, then it would be simply sending them to butchery if we forced them to go without equipping them with an arm equal to that in the hands of the enemy. I quite agree with the hon. member for North Ontario that the best armament, the best defence for Canada, is to put good and sound weapons into the hands of the soldiers of Canada. I do not understand what is meant by the remark in the Speech from the Throne with reference to strengthening the defences of Canada. What is the meaning of that expression? Sir, I hope it does not mean any jingo policy. We are at peace with our neighbours. It is true, there was a few days ago a little ripple between Great Britain and the United States; but I am glad to say that the best people in the United States to-day would regard a war between England and the United States as fratricidal, almost as much so as the war which a few years ago drenched the soil of the republic with torrents of blood. It is to be regretted that in many quarters in the United States there is a deep feeling of hostility against Great Britain. The war of emancipation has left in the hearts of some classes there a feeling of irritation against England; but knowing as I do something of the feelings of the American people, I venture to say that among the mass of the nation, among the educated classes, among the better classes there, there is nothing but a feeling of love towards the old land, the motherland of the United States as well as the motherland of Canada. I was proud and touched to read a few days ago two lines from perhaps the most American of all the American poets. Whittier addressed these lines to the English people:

We bow the heart, if not the knee
To England's Queen; God bless her.

When these words were uttered, I am sure from what I know of the American people, that they did not fall upon dull ears. Let me, Sir, pass from the language of a poet to the language of a statesman—to the language used only a few days ago by Governor Morton of the State of New York. In his annual message to the legislature of that state, Mr. Morton used the following language:

Any disturbance of the existing friendly relations between the United States and Great Britain cannot fail to have a serious effect. Because of the possible baleful consequences of such disturbances, I feel myself justified in making this reference to the larger affairs of the nation in which we feel such a peculiar and vital interest.

I cannot believe that the relations between our country and Great Britain will be ruptured or seriously impaired by the misunderstanding now existing between that country and Venezuela concerning the proper location of the boundary line of their possessions in South America. Arbitration affords a simple, humane and honourable method of determining national disputes; and it is scarcely conceivable at this period of the world's history that any great nation is willing to take the responsibility of the needless sacrifice of human life and the wanton destruction of property which would be the inevitable result of an armed conflict.

These are the words of one of the most important men living to-day in the United States of America; they are the words of the American nation; and I trust and hope that this Government will do nothing to suggest even the possibility that we indulge a thought of war with our American neighbours. Now, Sir, there is another paragraph in the speech which I fail to understand, and to which—though it has not been referred to by my hon. friends the mover and the seconder of the Address—I wish to call the attention of the House. Let me read it to the House:

The growth of population in the North-west Territories, as disclosed by the last enumeration, calls for additional representation in Parliament. A Bill for this purpose will be laid before you.

Sir, what is the meaning of this paragraph, I want to know? The last enumeration that took place in the North-west Territories, so far as my memory goes, was the general census of 1891. In the following year the Parliament of Canada undertook to redistribute the representation of Canada in this House, at the instance of Sir John Thompson. On that occasion, the representation of the Territories was left just as it then was. Are we to understand, Mr. Speaker, that this moribund Parliament, in its last days, is to go back upon that legislation, and create a new disturbance in this respect? Sir, I have nothing to say at present as to the advisability or not of increasing the representation from the North-west Territories. That is a subject which can be better discussed at another time; but at present I have only this to say, that it is not within the duty of this moribund Parliament to take up such a large subject. There is, it seems to me, a smell of gerrymander in this paragraph and of an unfair advantage to be taken by the majority in this House over their opponents. If I be mistaken, I shall be only too glad to retract every word I said. But I repeat that so important a paragraph should have been heralded and announced beforehand in some more open manner. Now, my hon. friend has also alluded to another paragraph in the Speech, which is this:

You will also be asked to consider measures for the extension and development of our trade in agricultural products with the United Kingdom and other markets.

What is the meaning of this? The Government last year went into the butter trade. Are we to understand from the hon. member for North Ontario that they propose going this year into the sheep trade? We have a doctor now at the head of the Department of Agriculture. He is a stalwart, my hon. friend says, and a strong agriculturist. But I very much fear that the hon. gentleman is about to turn his lancet from the human patient to the treasury of the country. I do not object that the hon. gentleman should do everything to promote the trade of Canada, especially in farm products, but if that is to be done according to the policy cheered by hon. gentlemen opposite, I doubt very much the success of the attempt. Why should we endeavour to increase our trade with Great Britain? Have we not been told by the hon. gentleman, amidst the cheers of his friends beside him, that Great Britain is going back to protection—that England is to be for the English as Canada is for the Canadians. Why, if the eighty men in the English House of Commons who are in favour of protection can impose their will on that House, England will be a protectionist country such as Canada is now. And in such event, what kind of a market will England be for our products, if our products are treated there as British products are treated in this country? What kind of a market will that be for us where the products of Canadian farmers are met by a wall in England just as the products of English manufacturers are met by a wall in Canada? This is the policy which is cheered by hon. gentlemen opposite—a policy which, if adopted by Great Britain, they would for ever deplore, the unfortunate day when it was adopted for ever rue. But by far the most important part of the

Mr. LAURIER.

Speech is that which relates to the Manitoba school question. My hon. friend, the mover of the Address, devoted a great deal of attention to that part of the Speech. I do not intend at this moment following all the arguments he advanced. I do not intend, for instance, to discuss his proposition that provincial autonomy is a pure fallacy and that we have been living in a world of illusion in this respect since confederation. But, I take the Speech as it is. We are told that the negotiations entered into between Canada and Manitoba for the consideration of some measure of justice to the Catholic minority have not been productive of those results for which we might have looked. What these negotiations were, we do not know, and the Speech does not inform us. I do not know myself. I only know one thing in common with the people of Canada, and that it is that some time in the month of July last, shortly after prorogation, an Order in Council was passed by this Government amending the Order in Council of March previous, and telling the people of Manitoba that, in dealing with the school question, they were not bound to deal with it on the strict lines of the Remedial Order of March last. That is the only thing that passed, as far as I know. This order, I presume, was sent to the Government of Manitoba. Whether any other negotiations took place, I do not know. We know, from the manifesto which Mr. Greenway issued a few days ago to the people of Manitoba, at the opening of the campaign, that he refused to comply with the terms of the Order in Council even as amended, though at the same time he intimated his readiness to investigate the whole subject jointly with the Government of Canada. That is all I know. But as far as indications go, we know something more. We know that the people of Manitoba feel very strongly on that subject. We know that from the elections which took place yesterday and from the issues which were brought up before the people of that province, Mr. Greenway's government has been sustained at the polls by an overwhelming majority. But we must remember this, that the issue between the Liberal Government of Mr. Greenway and the Conservative opposition was not at all as to whether the School Act should be modified or not modified, but the issue raised against Mr. Greenway by the Conservative opposition was that if the people of Manitoba wanted to keep their school system intact, they should not trust him because he might make concessions to the minority, but they should remove him from power and elect his opponents? In order to show the character of the conflict which was decided yesterday in Manitoba, let me quote a manifesto which has been standing in the columns of the "Daily Nor-Wester," the organ of the Conservative party of Winnipeg, during the whole of the campaign:

" DECEPTION ! "

Electors of Manitoba.

" The Greenway Government is Deceiving You. "

" Mr. Laurier said at Montreal, in the late contest there, speaking as to the Manitoba school question :

' I have no hesitation in telling you that I want to have the minority in Manitoba restored to the same privileges which are freely granted in Quebec to the Protestant minority, and to the Catholic minority in Ontario.'

The Brandon " Sun " (the organ of the Greenway party), in its issue of 26th December last, said :

' Let it be shown that the Manitoba School Act attacks the conscientious convictions of Catholics, and we will join in demanding its amendment or correction.'

The Hon. Mr. Sifton, in his speech at Douglas, on the 31st December last, as reported by the Winnipeg " Daily Tribune " (the Government organ), said :

' We are prepared to consider any changes in method that will make it acceptable to the Roman Catholics. We will do anything in reason, anything that will not compromise principle ;' and again, ' Anything in reason, if we can settle this matter without compromising principle, then we will do it, but not otherwise. If there is any change that can be made in the religious exercises that will make them acceptable to all parties, if any change can be made in the time they are held, or other like changes, we are prepared to consider them.'

" What does all this mean ? Is the present School Act going to be modified to meet the grievances of the Roman Catholics, by the Greenway party, if returned to power ? Why are these doubtful and qualified expressions uttered and published at the present time if no understanding has been come to ? The evidence is clear, and the inference is clear. The Greenway party are coming before you on a false issue. They are deceiving you on this school question, and hope by means of it to cover the numerous shortcomings of their administration."

" You may depend upon it that, if returned to power, they will so change and amend the present School Act that the conscientious convictions of the Roman Catholics will no longer be attacked by it, and, though they will not have separate schools in name, they will have them in fact."

" Remember Greenway's withholding of Maximum letter as to freight rates."

" Remember Sifton's concealment of Dalton McCarthy's opinion re Ryan & Heney claim."

" Remember Greenway's deception towards the Roman Catholics in passing the School Act, and he will deceive the whole province."

" ELECTORS, DON'T TRUST THEM ! ! ! "

The Conservative party asked the electors of Manitoba not to support the Greenway Government because the Greenway Government would be prepared to extend to the Roman Catholic minority a measure of relief, whereas, the other party, if returned to power, would keep the law as it is inviolate. I am glad to say that the result was in favour of the party which, by the mouth of the Attorney General, and through its principal organ declared itself ready to consider the claims of the minority, and if a grievance was found to exist, to give them such measure of relief as would be adequate. Such is the position to-day in the province of Manitoba. There is no issue, therefore, between the two parties upon this point. All agree upon this, that the system of public schools is to be maintained intact, and inviolate. Sir, if such be the public opinion of Manitoba to-day, what is the course to be followed by the Canadian Government upon this great question ? The difficulties of the constitution are very great, I admit. The hon. gentleman who moved the Address now in your hands stated that the principle of provincial autonomy did not exist. Such a doctrine cannot be accepted for a moment : it would be giving the lie to the whole history of confederation to tell us, in this year 1896, that the principle of provincial autonomy does not exist. Though it is recognized that the power of interference with provincial legislation exists under the constitution, yet the united will of the people, declared again and again, has been that this power of interference, if it is to be used at all, is to be used only for cause, and when a substantial injustice has been shown to exist. That is the only principle upon which we can go with safety. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) told us that it was the imperative duty of the Government to interfere in this matter. Let me say, Sir, that I have never gone back on the words I uttered in the city of Montreal. I deeply sympathize with my co-religionists in the province of Manitoba. I would wish to see them restored to their privileges, and there is not a man, whether he be in favour of public schools or of separate schools, who would not be glad to see the Roman Catholics of Manitoba restored to their full privileges if that were done by the legislature of Manitoba. But in the mind of everybody in this House, and out of it, there is a repugnance to substituting the will of the superior body, the federal legislature, for the will of the people of Manitoba, or of any other province, as expressed by their legislature. Now, how does this question come before us to-day ? Two judgments have been rendered by the judicial committee of the Privy Council upon this question. The first of these judgments was to this effect : That the legislature in Manitoba, in passing the Act of 1890, was acting within the sphere of its authority, and that the Act was, therefore, valid. The second judgment was to this effect : That as against this very Act, which the legislature of Manitoba had the power to pass, and did pass, there was an appeal to the Government and to the Parliament of Canada. Now, some men take the view that, because there is such an appeal, that appeal must be granted in all cases : other men take the view that, though such an appeal is allowed, the appeal is to be denied in all cases. I take issue with both these extremists, with those who say that the appeal must be granted, ex officio, as well as with those who say that it is to be denied, ex officio. There is but one way to approach this question; we must approach it in the very terms of the Act itself, and apply the remedy in every case as the circumstances of the case shall warrant and justify. That is the position I have taken all along. This question came twice before this House for discussion—once in 1893 and once in 1895. I maintained the same position on those occasions; I have maintained it in Ontario and Quebec; I have maintained it with friend and foe; I maintain it now. And, Mr. Speaker, I go further. Whatever may be the course taken by the Government upon this question, the day will come, sooner or later, when the position I now take must be taken by the Government of Canada, no matter who may be at the head of affairs. Gentlemen opposite have taken a different course. I know. This is not the time to discuss the course they have taken. When the Bill they are to propose comes before us, the matter can be discussed as a practical issue. I simply for the present, lay down the salient principles which must govern our dealing with this subject. The hon. gentlemen tell us, as they have told us all along, that they are bound by the terms of the constitution to take an extreme course in this matter. Bound by the terms of the constitution! That is a subject we shall have to discuss on a future occasion. Let me, however, tell the hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-day that we know what value is to be attached to these words of theirs, "bound by the terms of the constitution." We know by their conduct that the constitution is in their hands simply to be used or not used as party exigencies may require. We know by their conduct in the past that if party exigencies demand it, they will take refuge behind the constitution, but if party exigencies require it, they will trample under foot its most cardinal principles. I challenge these sticklers for the constitution to say if there is a principle of the constitution better known or more necessary to the proper working of representative institutions than this—that every elector shall be represented here, and shall be given his due share of weight in the affairs of the country. But, notwithstanding this, we find that to-day two constituencies are disfranchised by these sticklers for the constitution. Some forty thousand of Her Majesty's subjects have not a voice upon the floor of Parliament in deciding this great question, and others that are to come before us. Why is not the hon. member for West Huron in his seat to-day? What is the reason that the election for West Huron did not take place at the same time as the others? And what is the reason that the people of Charlevoix are not represented on the floor of Parliament? Upon what ground have these sticklers for the constitution denied the right of representation to some forty thousand of Her Majesty's subjects? There is not a reason except that of party expediency. For this expediency is sacrificed not only the statute of the land, but also the most sacred right of the people guaranteed under that constitution which these gentlemen, forsooth, tell us it is their abundant desire to carry out. Sir, these words are empty words, words which will deceive no one. What is the reason? We have not here a member for West Huron and a member for Charlevoix. It is because these hon. gentlemen, these sticklers for the constitution, have been delinquent in the performance of the duties which they owe to the people and to the representative of the Crown as well. Sir, you know the law upon this subject as well as, and even better than, I do. The law requires that whenever a vacancy arises in any constituency represented on the floor of the House of Commons, the Speaker shall forthwith issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for a new election. Sir, I am proud to say that upon this, as upon all occasions, you have discharged your duty as fully as might be expected; I am proud to say it. I must also say of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery that he has never been dilatory in carrying out his duties, when he had an opportunity to do so. But, unfortunately, though you are the Speaker, and you may issue your warrant, your warrant is not honoured by the hon. gentlemen sitting opposite, who pose as defenders of the constitution. Your warrant is not honoured, though it may be lying in the dust of a pigeon-hole for weeks and months. On the very first day of the opening of this Parliament you informed the House that you had issued your warrants for elections in Westmoreland, in Cardwell, in North Ontario, in West Huron, in Jacques Cartier, in Montreal Centre, and in Charlevoix. Sir, have these hon. gentlemen, these sticklers for the constitution, honoured the warrant of the Speaker? They should have issued the writ: they did not do so. They have it in their power to block the warrant of the Speaker, to block the constitution of the country, to deprive the people of their rights, because there is in the Act an unfortunate paragraph whereby the nomination of the returning officer belongs to them, the fixing of the date of the election belongs to them, and, until they fix a date for the election, until they have appointed a returning officer, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is altogether powerless to act. Well, then, what is the reason we have not had those elections all at once? The Government thought they knew better. Last year they had experience with several elections on the same day, those of Antigonish, Verchères, Haldimand and Quebec West, and in two of those elections they were defeated. This year they thought they would do better, they would have the elections one after another. They would first select their own ground, the county where they thought they would be the strongest, and they would move therein their boodle brigade, they would then take their boodle brigade from place to place, in order to have the same result in every one. They tried first in Westmoreland. Sir, the parchment that called the Hon. Mr. Wood to the Senate was hardly dry before they issued a writ for Westmoreland. Brave men they were, indeed. There were 2,000 majority for Mr. Wood in the last election, though in this one that was reduced to 500. Then they went to North Ontario; their success was only partial. Then they went to Cardwell; no success there whatever. They could not recall the writs for Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier, but they postponed as far as they could the date for the other elections. And these, Sir, are sticklers for the constitution. Mr. Speaker, I have no right, perhaps, to address myself to the majority of this House, to those hon. gentlemen who sit behind the Treasury benches, who keep the Government in power. But though I may have no right, perhaps, to address myself to them, I appeal upon this occasion to their patriotism, I appeal to their honour, nay, I appeal to their own manhood. They are party men; for this, certainly, I do not reproach them, I am a party man myself. They are Conservatives; for this I do not reproach them, all convictions are respected. They want to win; for this I do not reproach them. It is a fair and legitimate ambition. Very well, they are welcome to all means, to all tactics which can be defended under the law; but I submit to them that these tactics are base, are cowardly, are criminal. These tactics are base, are cowardly, are criminal, which violate systematically, wickedly and designedly the very letter of the statute and the most sacred rights of the people. They pretend to be strong in the confidence of the people. Sir, the Liberal party make no boasts, but we believe we are strong. We believe that we are strong in our record, in our principles, in our past; and the Liberal party will never fight with such weapons, and will never win by such methods. The Liberal party will fight with fair weapons, and will win with its head erect, and no shame upon its brow.

Mr. FOSTER. I join, in the first place, most heartily and sincerely with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, in giving my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the reply to the Address, for the distinguished manner in which they have acquitted themselves in what is, to every newcomer to Parliament, a peculiarly trying task. I think my hon. friend has not stinted, nor yet has he exaggerated his congratulations to them, although he endeavoured to break the force of his congratulations by some faults which his critical eye discerned, and which his critical mind perforce must make note of. That is all right, and, I suppose, is one of those things in common with dispensations of Providence which prevent men from being too much praised and growing too proud over compliments that are given to them. I well remember when my hon. friend, the late member of this House and the predecessor of the hon. gentleman who to-day represents Westmoreland, made his first speech in this House, and how strongly he impressed upon the House and the country his great ability, the remarkable purity and terseness of his diction, and the fine and cultured force of mind which he possessed as a business man and as a public man. Many members of this House, without doubt, felt that when he went to another place, and an honourable place in the Parliament of the country, this House might stand to lose something here in force, and in ability, and in power. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman who has spoken this afternoon so well and so ably, has shown to this House that, on the whole, parliamentary public life has experienced a very great gain. Our former member and associate has his place to fill, and will fill it worthily, in the other House; but he is succeeded here by one who, I believe, by his efforts to-day, has convinced the House that he is no unworthy successor even to such a predecessor. Now, Sir, as to my hon. friend who seconded the Address, too much cannot be said in praise of his sentiments and the manner in which he expressed them. But my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) had some few criticisms to make, and some information to ask for. My hon. friend is a great seeker after information. Among other things he wanted to know who gained the victory in North Ontario, and he wanted to know what were the sentiments of my hon. friend on the school question. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman opposite knows full well that his party did not get the victory. He knows full well that the representative of the great Liberal party, now eighteen years out, having formulated all its politics, and laid all its plans, and gathered all its strong men in that contest in North Ontario, fell to the rank of third party, and came within about eighty votes of losing its deposit. So one question is settled for the hon. gentleman and his confrères, viz., that who ever got the victory, it was not the Liberal party or the nominee of that party in North Ontario. As to his laudable desire for information respecting the sentiments on the school question of the hon. gentleman who seconded the reply to the Address, my hon. friend (Mr. McGillivray) is perfectly entitled to rise in his place in the House, as the hon. gentleman leading Her Majesty's Opposition is versed more or less on this difficult matter, the Manitoba school question, in all its constitutional and other diversifications, and especially after this last and most earnest speech of the hon. gentleman, full of the finest sentiments, full of the strongest declarations, full of the most logical deductions and ask him : Please what is your opinion about the Manitoba school question ? And I venture to say that the answer will be just as barren as regards an affirmative as it was in the case of the hon. gentleman who did not try to instruct this House, and therefore made no failure. If the hon. gentleman does not know who gained the victory in North Ontario, perhaps he does know the result of the contest in Cardwell. He certainly knows that his party did not gain the victory, for the nominee of the hon. gentleman lost his deposit, became the third party in a diminishing ratio, and the result gave rise to the very general conclusion, which was taken up by independent newspapers in this country and newspapers in other countries, that the Liberal party, whatever may be said as regards other parties had collapsed in the province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman agrees with most of the Speech. I am happy to know that. I do not recollect any Speech presented to the consideration of this House which has met with so hearty an acquiescence as this Speech has at the hands of my hon. friend. He agreed with almost every section. There are eighteen sections, I think, in the Speech, and he did not criticise adversely more than one or two of them, and he heartily agreed with most of them. There is that much then we can congratulate ourselves upon, that in framing a Speech and presenting it to this House. His Excellency has the approval, in the main, of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, as voiced by its leader in this House. There is one section, however, on which he did make a little objection. The harvest, he said, was bountiful : he almost stuck at what interpretation he should give to the latter part of the clause, as to whom was the giver of all good. At first he was inclined to think it was the Deity himself, afterwards he rather qualified the expression by wanting to know whether or not it was not meant to be the Liberal-Conservative party. Well, Sir, the nearest benefactor is often the one that is first looked to, and I think the phrase itself may be interpreted in this way : that for the bountiful harvest and for all blessings we enjoy in this country conjointly we may be thankful to the Giver of all Good, and one of the items which enters into the basis of that thankfulness is that the Liberal-Conservative policy and the Liberal-Conservative party is in power in this country. The harvest was bounteous, the hon. gentleman said, but prices were not good. At all events, by virtue of the Liberal-Conservative party and its policy the prices in Canada for the cereals of the country have been kept higher than they would have been if the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite had been in force. A bountiful harvest in this country side by side with an overflowing harvest on the southern side of the line that separates us from the United States made it possible that if the surplus of that country could have been sent over to Canada, it would have materially diminished the prices that the farmers received for their cereals and agricultural products. The only thing that saved prices was the fact that there was the barrier of a protective tariff against the farmers on this side of the line and the abundant crops on the other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad the hon. gentleman opposite agrees in that sentiment. My hon. friend also drew attention to the section in the Address which refers to the arming and the strengthening of the militia and defences of Canada. He spoke words none too hearty, he spoke none too approvingly of the militia of this country, and he voiced what is the general sentiment of this House and the country, that its militia deserves well at its hands, and it is the duty of the country to put the best and the newest arms in the hands of the militia, and see that they are well taken care of and equipped in this respect. But he had to qualify that by saying, that he could perceive in it the flavour of a jingo policy. Well, Sir, I leave it to the hon. gentleman and all reasonable men to say if, taking up that paragraph in reply to the Speech, they can see anything in it which savours of defiance or in the least approaches to a jingo policy. It is a modest and straightforward expression, meaning exactly what he says and nothing more, and my hon. friend, I think, will agree that it does not in the least show a tendency in the direction suggested. No person in Canada who loves his country and desires its peace and prosperity, can, in the present juncture of circumstances, whatever may be said at other times, think of breathing a spirit of defiance and jingoism. This would be furthest remove possible from that sensible and well developed sentiment of Canada, which while it honours love of country, feels the evidence of strength in its arms, and cherishes in its heart the full purpose to defend that country and stand by it whenever it is threatened, yet relying on its own calmness, force and strength, does not ask for declamation, and does not flaunt itself in defiance. But he would read the signs of the times not aright in these somewhat troublesome days, when the great mother Empire stands splendidly isolated in Europe, with interests stretching over the wide world, with a commerce the greatest of any nation of the world has ever possessed and vulnerable on every quarter of the sea, who did not feel as Britain feels to-day, and is showing it, that the country's weal, the country's progress, the country's stability, all of the country's pride and glory must base itself upon the strong arms and willing loyal hearts of the citizenship of that Empire from one end of it to the other. It is the right and duty of Britain herself and of every dependency that belongs to her to be ready, aye, ready as well as steady in its sentiments of loyalty and devotion for the Empire as a whole. It is in that spirit and not in any spirit that asks for war or trouble that that modest reference was placed in the Queen's Speech. And in pursuance of that it is the determination of this Government to put the militia, and the defences of this country, so far as can possibly be done by Canada, into a state which is adequate to the feelings, the interests, and the security of this country in itself, and as a portion of the Empire. Now, Sir, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has referred to the developments of foreign markets. I would not speak of that for a single moment except that he introduced a specious fallacy which is often thrown at the Liberal-Conservative party. It is this: You tell me that the farmer of Great Britain is seeking for protection, that to-day the weight of competition is being felt by the English farmer who when raising his wheat 100 miles from London is at a disadvantage in competition with the man who raises his wheat 3,000 miles away under other and freer conditions; and that therefore the British farmer is looking for protection to aid him in the unequal competition. But, says my hon. friend, if the British farmer gets the protection that he needs, it is a death-blow to you as a protectionist in Canada. That I think, Sir, is not a view that takes in the whole of the situation. We shall have time to discuss that by and by, but there is just one great question to-day which is pressing itself to the front, which is becoming every day more and more considered by the best statesmen of Great Britain and the Colonies, and that is, as to whether these forces and outside circumstances conjoining together, the time is not approaching when it shall not become a question simply as to whether Great Britain shall give protection to her farmers, but when the greater problem will appear for solution as to whether the needs of the Empire can not be best met within the Empire itself, as to whether the Empire's markets can not be supplied by the Empire's producers, and practical independence of foreign countries in food supplies be secured, so that in time of trial and war the Empire's producers may be rid of that great danger of the present time, in this, that the Empire itself shall be sufficient to feed and to produce for the needs of the Empire itself. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) approached another question, and that was what he called the gravest question which could possibly be approached by Parliament. He declared that this session of Parliament was remarkable because it was called to approach and settle that question. No one doubts that it is a grave question. I am not going to discuss it at this time broadly. The time will come, and come before long in this House, when the House must settle down to a discussion of this question, and then, I hope that the House, as I believe it will, will settle down to that discussion with a full understanding of its gravity and its bearings, not only upon the small minority of people in Manitoba who feel that certain rights which they have had and enjoyed and that they thought were guaranteed to them were taken away; but that the House will discuss it also in its bearings upon the country as a whole, as doing even-handed justice to every minority, to every class, and to every condition of people that live under our constitution and who have the benefits and perform the duties of citizenship in our common country. But, Sir, I want to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to a most remarkable exhibition, one which I am sorry to say is not unusual even in this House. You saw the fire flashing from the eye of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) as he approached this question filled with a noble purpose to plant himself squarely upon definite facts and to take this House and this country into his confidence as to his exact position upon that great question. You saw him flagellate, and lacerate the weakness, and delay, and vacillation of the Government on the position it had taken. You heard him utter brave sentiments as to Manitoba, as to the constitution, as to provincial autonomy and what not; but, Sir, he still remains within the lines of Torres Vedras. He still remains within these lines, for whilst he said that he deeply sympathized with the Manitoba minority, whilst he said he wished to have their schools and their privileges restored to them, whilst he went over the question as to whether it could be effectual at all if Manitoba did not do it, and expressed an invincible repugnance naturally to forcing anything upon people who did not want it; whilst he argued finically about appeals in general, that if there is now an appeal some people say it ought to be granted and some people deny it should be granted; he himself takes the definite and clear position: that it must be granted or denied as the circumstances of the case warrant it. And then, Sir, rising to the full height of clear and definite statement, he says: This I maintain, who will say the opposite. But what is the "this" that he maintains? After five years, he has got so far outside the lines of Torres Vedras as to say that there is an appeal and there is a right to interfere, some men say it ought to be granted, some men say it ought to be denied, but I take my stand upon the definite and well understood ground, that it must be denied or granted as the circumstances warrant. So much for the hon. gentleman's position. I saw a very comic picture in a daily paper, illustrating what I suppose were the long line of Torres Vedras, and two heels sticking out from under a rampart with the name of the leader of the Opposition printed upon them. To-day I do not even see the boot heels. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has worked himself entirely within the lines. He has planted himself upon an airy nothing done up in verbiage to which no man living can give a definite meaning. And, Sir, having planted no defences, having trained no guns, having deployed no army, having shown no line of battle; he cannonades the Liberal-Conservatives for sticking to the constitution only when it is to the interests of their party to do so. He makes a show of cannonading the enemy's position and then gently and quietly retires under a burst of applause for the attack he has made upon the Government. They may be his tactics, but they are childish tactics. Sir, there is not a suspicion of statesmanship in tactics like that. But my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) will have this much to comfort him. The time is coming, Sir, when the lines of Torres Vedras will not be able to shelter him. He must come to the question sooner or later. Whatever be the result of it one thing will happen; that after a long six years of tergiversations and wanderings, and meanderings, my hon. friend will have to plant one vote that will have the power of a direct answer as to his convictions on this question. Oh, he says, you stand upon the constitution and say you are bound by it; but you are not bound by the constitution when it suits your party interests not to be bound by it? How can you show it? Two constituencies are at present not represented in this House; for not having them represented when this House met, he declares we are base, cowardly, criminal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Those words form a bond of connection, a tie thicker than of blood, between the hon. leader of the Opposition and the member for South Oxford; because, if there is anything that will make a family connection with the member for South Oxford, it is a flow of strong and sturdy expletives, which have much of sound but little significance, because they are based simply upon the spirit of invective. Well, Sir, what has happened? Why are we criminal, may I ask my hon. friend? He himself stated—he was bound to state it—that the law as it is did not compel us. A man is a criminal if he violates the law; if he has not violated the law, he is not a criminal. Will my hon. friend wipe that word out from his list of his expletives? My hon. friend has a poor memory. He pounds and lacerates the Liberal-Conservative party because two constituencies are not represented—in one the election being now over, and in the other the election being in progress; but his mind does not go back to a short time ago—no, quite a long time ago—when he was a member of the Liberal Government in this country, and when his party—that party of principle, that party of constitutional right, that party of open and manly fair-play—pursued the very same tactics, and in the province of Nova Scotia—that 'arida nutrix leonum' of which my hon. friend spoke last night, and then denied the very words he used—

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Denied that he called that province the 'arida nutrix leonum,' which he freely translated as the dry-nurse, and the wet-nurse, too, of the most gigantic pack of boodlers this country has ever known. If my hon. friend will read a little of his own party history, he will find an instance in Nova Scotia in 1878 in which the very same tactics which he has denounced to-day were the tactics of his own party, and if I may have the benefit of such a suggestion, I say that if his party were in power and not in opposition to-day, and the law did not prevent, they would pursue the very same policy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Give the facts and the dates.

Mr. FOSTER. The facts and the dates are here. Mr. Vail, who was Minister of Militia, and Mr. Jones, went to Nova Scotia. They were disqualified from sitting in this House, they went to Nova Scotia, and their elections were held consecutively and not simultaneously.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FOSTER. One of the noblest sentiments which ever came from the lips of my hon. friend was uttered in the city of Montreal or the city of Toronto, I am not sure which, not long since. That sentiment was this, that in the United States of America, when a public man had been declared guilty of corrupt practices, he was driven out of public life entirely by the force of public sentiment. "I am sorry to say," he added, "that public spirit in Canada does not rise to that height."

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend himself has foregathered over and again with men who have been unseated and disqualified for corrupt practices in the Dominion of Canada. My hon. friend's memory is short in this respect too. There was a man in this House of the name of German, who represented a constituency in the Niagara peninsula, and who was disqualified for seven years. Not many months afterwards my hon. friend stood on a platform with this same disqualified gentleman, and sang a paean of praise in honour of the sterling qualities of Mr. German.

Mr. LAURIER. Will my hon. friend permit me? There was a man disqualified in the province of Quebec under precisely the same circumstances as Mr. German, and he was raised to the Senate by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. And so my hon. friend, feeling the prickings of conscience, feeling that he has been found out as a poser of magnificent proportions in the distance, when the fact has been brought home to him that he herds with disqualified men who have been driven out of public life by the courts, says, granted, but of some of you the same may be said. Where was his candidate in Montreal Centre in the last by-election that he talks so much about?

Mr. LAURIER. I ask the hon. gentleman's pardon. He will have to apologize to the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane).

Mr. FOSTER. Will he? What for?

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, because the sentence given against Mr. McShane was reversed by the court of appeal.

Mr. McMULLEN. Take it back.

Mr. FOSTER. I will proceed, if my hon. friends on the other side will be quiet. I was proceeding to say, where was the candidate for Montreal Centre at this last by-election?

Mr. CASEY. At the head of the polls.

Mr. FOSTER. At the head of the polls, and a candidate with a record which is written in the evidence and the decisions of the courts—such a record and such evidence that the staunchest Liberal paper in the English language in the city of Montreal wished and prayed, and put its wish in its columns almost daily, that the Liberal candidate might be defeated for the credit of the Liberal party. Yet my hon. friend, having done the same when he was formerly in power as he has charged against us, in this matter of keeping constituency after constituency open, and taking them in their time, finds fault with the Liberal-Conservative party and Government to-night. I cite to him the election of Westmoreland if he pleases. The contest there came on early after the appointment of Mr. Wood to the Senate, and that campaign drew into the ranks of the Liberal party as fighters all the prominent public men they had in the maritime provinces against but few on the other side. They had a full opportunity of deploying their whole strength for that struggle, and they were ignominiously defeated.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not care to ask the House to listen to me after 8 o'clock. If they will give me two minutes now I will finish my remarks and leave the floor to some one else. I do not think, looking over my notes, that there is any other remark that I wish to criticise at this particular time. Before closing, I wish to draw the attention of my hon. friends on both sides of this House, to the impotency of the conclusion to which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, as representing his party, has come to-night on the Manitoba school question. He had the goodness to taunt some gentlemen on this side with not speaking their opinion. I reply to that simply by asking him to name a prominent supporter of himself and party on that side of the House, who, within the last three years, since this question has been discussed, has ventured to give his opinion with reference to the Manitoba school question, and how it ought to be settled. Until my hon. friend has courage himself, and until he can infuse courage into the hearts of those gentlemen who support him, it would be better for him to cease taunting gentlemen on this side with not having the courage of their opinions and with failing to express them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rise to express my hope that the hon. gentleman will not fail to be here to-night. He is rather apt to avoid attendance.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I propose, on the present occasion, to reply, first of all, to the last question which was put by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). That hon. gentleman desired to know why it was that the leaders of the Opposition were so exceedingly reticent in dealing with the question of the Manitoba schools. Sir, it is a strange question for a leader of the Government to put, why it is that gentlemen in the Opposition, in no wise responsible to the country or to Parliament for dealing with this question—men who understand, if he does not, how grave a question it is, how deep its issues go, and what the consequences of a mistake may be in dealing with it—should be somewhat cautious and somewhat reticent in expressing an opinion until, at least, they have the measure which the Government have proposed to lay before us for a year back, and which they have not, up to this time, found courage to submit to the House—which, peradventure, they have not yet found courage to submit to that remarkably united and harmonious body which constitutes the present Government of Canada. Sir, I will tell the hon. gentleman briefly—it is true, and it is a good old respectable proverb, that fools rush in where angels fear to tread, and I do not propose, and my hon. friends here do not propose to be dragged into a discussion of this question until, at least, we know what the Government proposes to do. I am sorry that the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is not in his place, because I remember that a few months ago he addressed a somewhat similar question to me. Were he in his place I would tell him that statesmen may well pause and hesitate to deal with this question, and it would have been well for him and his colleagues, too, if they had paused and thought a little while before they issued the remedial order which they were obliged, very shortly afterwards, practically to cancel. Sir, allow me to say this, with respect to my own attitude on all questions of this kind. I have had occasion, I know, to excite to a considerable degree, the animosity of hon. gentlemen opposite, and it may have been that in my career I have not sufficiently respected the delicate feelings and fine susceptibilities of those hon. gentlemen, and it may well be that I have occasionally called a spade a spade, and then when I have caught men with their arms up to their elbows in the public treasury, I have designated their acts as they deserved to be designated, and I propose to do so still. But my record, on one point, at any rate, will bear investigation. In the thirty and three years I have sat in one Parliament and another—and I may say my record has been pretty minutely scrutinized—I challenge the hon. gentleman, I challenge his friends and his followers, I challenge his hireling press, I challenge any and everybody on that side of the House to point to one instance where I have attempted to make political capital by stirring up strife on questions of race and religion. Sir, I am a Canadian, and not of yesterday. I am a Canadian, the son of a Canadian, the grandson of a Canadian, the great-grandson of a man who was an Englishman, and who forfeited everything that men hold dear for the purpose of maintaining and supporting the English flag. Under those circumstances, I am not likely, under any temptation, to be the man to set one class of my fellow-countrymen, on any such grounds, against another. But, as I have said, it is a strange question for hon. gentlemen to put, who, at present, are supposed to be the Government of Canada, who are supposed to be the men charged by the country with the express duty of dealing with this question, who are the men to whom we pay $100,000 a year—very badly earned, I fear—for the express purpose of dealing with this question and similar questions. They turn to us, they turn to my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), and they say: Tell us what to do; tell us, for heaven's sake what to do; do not conceal your views on this important subject; help us poor sinners in this dilemma, we do not know what to do; for heaven's sake come to our rescue. The hon. gentleman might well have spared his very inconsiderate and very foolish taunt at my hon. friend. I will take it upon me to say, once for all, that if there be one man in Canada who deserves less than another the reproach of undue reticence, much less the reproach of inconsistency in dealing with this question, that man is Wilfred Laurier. More, I say that if ever any public man took his life in his hands, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, and if any public man has, for years back, been more straight or consistent in dealing with the question than my friend beside me, I should like to know his name, for he is assuredly not to be found in this Chamber. From the very start, Sir, my hon. friend has declared that this is a question of fact as well as of law, that this is a question which it is imperatively necessary you should investigate, in which it is imperatively necessary you should ascertain the true and exact conditions and circumstances, and having done that, that you should, not pass a remedial order taking the province of Manitoba by the throat as these hon. gentlemen did, but negotiate calmly and prudently with the province and, in that way, endeavour to obtain, as it only can be obtained, a proper and amicable settlement of a most important and most complicated question. Sir, there are none so blind as those who will not see; and I am in the judgment of this House, to quote a distinguished gentleman who, we hear, is shortly to be a member of this House, whether, except the Minister of Finance and others like him who cannot afford to see and cannot afford to admit the fact, there is one man on either side who does not understand distinctly what my hon. friend meant, or one man who does not know that my hon. friend, whether in this House or in the province of Quebec or in the province of Ontario from end to end has, for the several years steadily and persistently advised the self-same course. These paltry jeers might well be spared. They do not do any credit to hon. gentlemen, and they simply invite a comparison with their conduct in this matter. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that we do not know why that same precious remedial order was passed? Does the hon. gentleman think we do not know that, nearly nine months ago they were prepared to go to the elections with a lie in their right hand? Does the hon. gentleman not know that when the order was passed—and we have proof of this in the declaration of his own colleagues—they meant to take the remedial order to Quebec, or to the gentlemen who, they thought, controlled the people of Quebec and say: There is our remedial order and that is the legislation we will pass? And do they not know that lodge pledges were being given at the self-same time in Haldimand and other places to the effect that they would have no remedial legislation at all, and that the remedial order was not worth the paper it was written on?—and they spoke the truth there, whoever made the assertion. Why was it, let me ask, that that excellent plot was not carried out to a successful termination? It is the misfortune of some men to be better known than trusted. It was the misfortune of these gentlemen that the men whom they sought to impose upon would not take their promissory note. No, Sir, nothing short of an Act of Parliament, signed, sealed and delivered would be sufficient to fill the bill, and therefore we had a fifth session of this Parliament—

An hon. MEMBER. Sixth session.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—and therefore we have also a sixth session of this Parliament. No, Sir, we had the fifth session because the remedial order was not accepted as satisfactory by the parties for whose benefit it was passed. Are not gentlemen present in this House who know, and know right well, that when the Minister of Public Works, who I am sorry not to see in his place, was contesting the election in Verchères, he took his Maker to witness that during the approaching session an Act would be passed exactly and precisely in the terms and words of the remedial order? Does not the hon. gentleman know that? Or will his colleague the Minister of Public Works dare to deny that he made that assertion? He will have plenty of time before this debate closes, and there are friends of mine who will recall it to his attention. I do not see my hon. friend from Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) in his place at the moment. That hon. gentleman knows that the Minister of Public Works made the statement, and I challenge the Minister of Public Works to deny it when he comes to his place. As to what passed in the lodges in Haldimand, perhaps my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) can give some information. We have not heard him, but we should like to hear him on that question. As I have said, these gentlemen's conduct might have warned them not to stir up reproach on this subject. Their policy, forsooth, is first to bully and then to cringe. Our policy, on the contrary, is first to investigate and then to negotiate, and then to do justice between the two classes of our countrymen. What has their policy done? Let the result of yesterday answer. Sir, I tell them that I fully expected that Mr. Greenway would have sent a telegram to the ex-Minister of Justice to inform him that thanks to his remedial order and thanks to that alone, the Greenway Government to-day is returned with 32, if not 33 supporters out of 40, the remainder being composed of 4 Conservatives and 3 Patrons. There is Manitoba's answer to your remedial order. What is the Dominion's answer? The hon. gentleman was good enough to say that the Liberal party had not much to boast of in the late elections. I read the record rather differently. The Liberal party can point to Antigonish, the Liberal party can point to Verchères, it can point to Montreal Centre, to Jacques Cartier, and to West Huron. I think all these are reasonably conclusive answers as to what the Dominion at large thinks of this policy of bully and cringe. I may have something more to say on that subject before I close; but, in the meantime, although I am trespassing on my hon. friend's prerogative, I do want to say a word or two about this constitutional question. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) need not be afraid, however. The authority I am going to quote is one which, although he is well acquainted with it, he does not frequently quote. The authority I am going to quote is no less than Hosea Biglow:

Here we stan' on the Constitution, by thunder,
It's a fact o' which ther's bushels o' proofs;
Fer how could we trample on't so, I wonder,
Ef't worn't thet it's ollers under our hoofs?

For the particular edification of the hon. gentleman's supporters, I may remark that this is a quotation from the works of an ex-Minister to the Court of St. James. There are other very valuable suggestions in this work, and perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to peruse it. The hon. gentleman was good enough to allude to the action of my hon. friend in consorting with publicans and sinners who had happened to get into trouble in the courts. I think it can be shown that he is not without example in that respect. I beg leave to say, and with some knowledge of the facts, that when I perused the evidence on which my friend Mr. German was disqualified, I came to the conclusion that, whatever were the grounds on which the courts of justice acted, very great hardship was inflicted upon that gentleman, even if very grave injustice was not done him, when he was disqualified upon the evidence presented in his case. As to my hon. friends in Nova Scotia who, the hon. gentleman declared, had been disqualified—and here let me ask them how it came that if, they were disqualified, they again ran for seats in Parliament—

MR. FOSTER. I must say that that word "disqualified" should not have been used. The memorandum was put in my hands hurriedly, and I scarcely read it.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman was not good enough to give us the dates on which these seats were vacated and the writs of election given. Had he done so, he would have shown and the House would have seen that under the Mackenzie Government there was no parallel for the cowardly trickery my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition most properly denounced. I will say just a word or two about the cases of Messrs. Jones and Vail, honourable men both. It is true that, at great cost to themselves, at enormous loss to themselves, these gentlemen and four or five others did run a Liberal journal in Halifax which did receive some trifle of Dominion patronage. It is true that by a strict construction of the law, they were obliged to vacate their seats as being part owners in that newspaper.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They resigned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They resigned, owing to the doubt. Now, what they ought to have done was this, as a good many gentlemen opposite did and they ought to have profited by experience. They ought to have formed a joint stock company of five, as Mr. White, of the Montreal "Gazette," and other ingenious gentlemen did, and thereafter drew hundreds of thousands of dollars at various times out of the Dominion treasury. Or they might have done as my hon. friend suggests certain proprietors of the Regina "Leader" have done, who also figure very conspicuously in our Auditor General's account. Sir, I am not here to defend or excuse the mistakes which Mr. Vail and Mr. Jones made. They suffered for it, they had to resign their seats rather than stand an action at law, and thereafter Mr. Jones was elected for the very constituency, my hon. friend opposite represents. But I do protest against any rational man contending that there was any moral criminality on the part of Mr. Jones or Mr. Vail. Why, Sir, their losses on that transaction might be measured by thousands. They never made a penny, or hoped to make a penny, from any two-penny ha'penny patronage which they obtained from the Dominion Government. Sir, I now come to something where the hon. gentleman ought to be more at home. The hon. gentleman tells us that although prices were low in Canada, they were better than in the United States. Now, I would like the hon. gentleman to explain to me, or explain to this House, and would like him to explain to this country, what, in the majority of cases, fixes the prices of cereals in Canada or in the United States. Does he not know that the prices of cereals in Canada and in the United States are fixed by the European markets? It may possibly be true—I leave that question to be dealt with by my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan)—it may possibly be true that in a few isolated cases, for a very short time, under very exceptional circumstances, and when it was no benefit whatever to the farmers of Canada, prices in one or two isolated points in Canada, may have ruled higher than they did in the United States; but on the average, and taking the whole country through, I say that the statement is wholly incorrect, and that as a rule, and taking the thing from year's end to year's end, prices were, as a matter of fact, higher in the United States than in Canada, the hon. gentleman's tariff wall to the contrary notwithstanding. Sir, the hon. gentleman poses as an authority on agricultural matters. Must I remind him of the lesson which was read to him by my hon. friend behind me when, in his budget speech, he made this most extraordinary statement, and mind you, this was not lightly made, this was made in a document which is a state paper, a document which I think was typewritten, a document which was, at any rate, carefully thought over and prepared. Here was what the hon. gentleman said:

I wish to adduce some figures to show what has been done for the agricultural interests of this country. In 1877 the people of this country consumed, in agricultural products, animals and their products, from Great Britain, $56,000 worth; from the United States, $16,000,000 worth; from other countries, $7,000 worth, making a total of $16,131,000 worth. In 1878 these imports for home consumption amounted to $15,000,000, and in 1879 to $16,420,000. The National Policy did its work, and the result was that the importation of these products fell to $4,240,000, in 1891; to $3,000,000, in 1892; to $2,741,000, in 1893; in other words, in the three years, 1877-78-79, there was an average annual import of those products for consumption of $13,867,000, whereas in the last three years, there was an average annual import of the same materials for home consumption, of $3,358,000.

There is a statement made in his place by a Finance Minister of six years' standing, by the hon. gentleman. Sir, the fact was this, that hon. gentleman was utterly ignorant of what he was talking about. The hon. gentleman did not know the first a, b, c of these identical Trade and Navigation Returns I hold in my hand. Had he turned over the second page, he would have seen the facts to which my hon. friend here directed his attention, and he would have seen that in 1877 he had made an error of $4,000,000, in 1878 he had made an error of $9,000,000, in 1879 he had made an error of $6,700,000; and in the three years he had made a total error of $20,000,000. Sir, my hon. friend, I am sure, will be very happy to give him a much needed lesson in political economy, which will teach him what was the real effect of the National Policy in the matter of promoting the market for agricultural products, and after he has done that, I would advise him to consult on the question that other financial sage whom I do not see here, the present Minister of Agriculture. Why, Sir, the youngest clerk in my department, when I had a department, would have risked his head if he had brought a statement to me, when I had sent him instructions to prepare a document of that kind, and he had committed a mistake of that kind. It is not so much the mistake itself, as the character of the mistake. I have never denied that the hon. gentleman is an excellent talking machine, a first-class talking machine, a magnificent talking machine; but I have denied, and do deny, that the hon. gentleman possesses any real, genuine, thorough knowledge of the questions which he attempts to deal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh. oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps my hon friends who cry "oh" will undertake to back up that statement; they will have an opportunity as soon as I sit down, and let them do so. Let them take the statement of my hon. friend from King's (Dr. Borden), let them read it to the House, let them point out the errors my hon. friend has made, as he has pointed out the errors the Finance Minister has made; and when they have done that I will withdraw most humbly the aspersions I have thrown out against the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman comes to another matter, a question I desire to approach with all possible care, under the present circumstances. The hon. gentleman twitted my hon. friend because he ventured to suggest a doubt whether, under present circumstances, it was altogether prudent to call attention in the Speech from the Throne, to the necessity of increasing the armament of Canada. Now, he will not find, and he has not found in the past, that this side of the House was disposed to throw any impediment in the way of any well-considered scheme for increasing the efficiency of our militia, or even for improving our defences, in reason. I have this to tell him, however. The hon. gentleman declared—he is welcome to correct—I took down his words, that England to-day "stands splendidly isolated." Sir, England does stand isolated, but I think true statesmen would have said that England stands dangerously isolated, and not splendidly isolated. And that I know is the opinion of English statesmen of very high rank whose opinion on such a subject is worth much more than that of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. Still, I suppose, I have a right to express it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You have the right to use the word "splendidly" and I have the right to point out that it was grandiloquent nonsense. Now, Sir, I have a word or two to say on this same subject of "splendid isolation." For many a year, not alone in my place here, but in the Cabinets of English ministers, I have steadfastly pointed out—I, a descendant of men who quitted the United States rather than see the English flag pulled down—that the true interest of England, the real interest of England, the thing of all others which English and Canadian statesmen should apply themselves to, is to provide England with a true ally and the only true ally worthy of her that she can find, are her own descendants in the United States. That, Sir, is the true policy; that is the policy which true friends of Canada most anxiously desired to see after the heat of battle had passed away. That is the policy which Canada can help to promote, if Canada is guided by statesmen who understand her interests and the real interests of the Empire. I repeat, that it is not of yesterday I have made these statements. I can well remember, two and twenty years ago, discussing this subject with Lord Carnarvon, then Minister of the Colonies, and I told Lord Carnarvon that this was one of the things which British statesmen would do well to lay to heart, and were I Minister of the Colonies, the first thing I would do would be to paint above the door of my office "In 1900 there will be 80,000,000 English-speaking people on the continent of America." These are the men whom England should secure as allies, and after all these passing war scares and clouds have disappeared, I do hope and trust it will yet be found to be in the power of English statesmen and of Canadian statesmen worthy of the name, to bring about a true defensive alliance with the only nation which can really imperil the supremacy of England on the sea. Sir, it may be that the mischievous policy and language of hon. gentlemen and their press have put numerous difficulties in the way of my hon. friend beside me and his colleagues when he comes to deal with that question, as he will shortly do. But here I take the opportunity, as I have been accused of being unjust to Sir Charles Tupper, the elder, of saying that he possesses one merit which I recognize fully. Sir, when in this House in 1888 I proposed a scheme for obtaining an honourable reciprocity with the United States, with the consent and approval of my hon. friends behind me, to the credit of Sir Charles Tupper, the elder, he it said that even a pair of horses could not drag him into the House to oppose the proposition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman deny it; let him look at the records. Sir Charles Tupper preserved a discreet silence on the subject, quite equal to that maintained by any hon. gentleman on the Manitoba School question by any hon. gentleman on this side of the House. More than that, to Sir Charles Tupper's credit be it said—and it atones, in my eyes, for many sins, and he has a great many to atone for—and the speech is on record, he took occasion very shortly afterwards to proclaim aloud his extreme dislike to any other policy, and by and by he reproved in pretty strong terms some of his colleagues for the way they conducted negotiations at Washington by which they brought this country almost to within an hour or day of a commercial war with the United States, which he truly said—and his words will be found recorded in "Hansard"—would have been preliminary to actual war, than which said Sir Charles Tupper, and I for once agreed with him, no greater misfortune could befall civilization than war between England and the United States. Sir, the hon. gentleman was good enough to talk as to what they have done for the development of the markets, and he insinuated, and his friends have insinuated for a long time, that in all this National Policy of theirs they have a single eye to the unity of the Empire and the promotion of trade with Great Britain. Well, Sir, their intentions may have been as good as those which pave the High Street in Hades, or any other avenue in that locality, but their performances have been miserably inadequate. I take first from the hon. gentleman's own return, the aggregate trade of the Dominion by countries. In 1874, when the renegade Grits were carrying on the Government of Canada, our trade with Great Britain, Canada's population being 3,750,000, was $108,000,000. In 1895, with a population of 5,000,000, our aggregate trade was $92,000,000, or $16,000,000 less than it was under Mr. Mackenzie's regime. Sir, the hon. gentleman talks of the wonderful progress we have made. In 1874, with a population of 3,750,000, our aggregate trade was $217,801,000, being a per capita aggregate of $.58 per head.

Mr. WELDON. Read the figures for 1879.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have nothing to do with 1879; but I will explain the point to the hon. member before I am done. In 1895, our aggregate trade, with a population of 5,000,000, was of the value of $224,000,000. Our trade had fallen from $58 per head to $44 per head. It is quite true that our trade had fallen considerably in 1878; and why? Let the hon. gentleman opposite explain to his followers the reason why. There had been a tremendous commercial depression during four or five years extending over the whole world, but chiefly affecting our greatest customers, Great Britain and the United States. There had been a huge shrinkage in the values of imported goods. Probably we imported nearly as much, but the values had shrunken largely, and hon. gentlemen opposite made a disingenuous use of the fact in their attack on Mr. Mackenzie with respect to steel rails; and although the quantities of goods imported remained about the same, the values were considerably less in 1878 than in 1874. These were the grounds on which the Minister of Finance lately justified the shrinkage in the returns, and the deficit of $4,153,000, which is one of the many signs of prosperity accruing under our present policy.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman has not yet given us the figures.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The amount is $175,000,000, and if the hon. gentleman will divide that sum by 3,800,000 people, he will find that after five years of depression and shrinkage of values, we did as well in our worst year as hon. gentlemen opposite are doing now, if not better. Now, I will take the value of exports. In 1894, (and be it remembered that hon. gentlemen opposite are increasing our trade with Great Britain by leaps and bounds) we exported to Great Britain the value of $68,000,000. This year we exported the value of $61,000,000, a loss of $7,000,000. Per contra, in 1894, we exported to the United States the value of $35,000,000; last year we exported the value of $41,000,000, being a gain of $6,800,000; in other words our export trade with the United States increased by $7,000,000, while our export trade with Great Britain decreased $7,000,000. By way of showing in what fashion the National Policy has increased our trade with Britain, I now take the value of goods entered for consumption, which is also a useful test. I take the year 1874, to suit the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). We imported in that year from Great Britain, goods to the value of $63,000,000; in 1895, we imported goods to the value of $31,000,000, rather less than half. And here is a remarkable instance of the way in which the National Policy gets in its fine work, as the hon. gentleman opposite is fond of saying. I have here a table—and I am obliged to him for it, as it saves some calculation—of the duties collected. The duties collected on goods to the value of $31,000,000, which we imported from Great Britain amounted to $7,000,000. We imported, during the same year, goods to the value of $54,000,000 from the United States, and we charged them $6,897,000 duty. Coming to the percentage, which the hon. gentleman is so fond of quoting, I am sorry to say that whereas in 1874 the percentage of duty on the total value of goods imported, dutiable and free, amounted to 11¼ per cent, the total percentage now amounts to 16¼; and it is a very curious fact that the duty on the goods imported from Great Britain under the hon. gentleman's tariff is as nearly as possible, 100 per cent more than the duty levied on American goods. The average duty on English goods is 22½ per cent, the average duty on American goods is 12½ per cent, so that you charge on English goods just about double what you charge on goods imported from the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. The same quality of goods?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course not, but the hon. gentleman will understand that I am following Solomon's rule, and I am answering these foolish people according to their folly. As for the great comfort and advantage which our Canadian protectionists are going to obtain from the growth of the protection sentiment in Great Britain, let my friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan), and let the farmers from Canada whose cattle and whose sheep have been excluded from the English markets testify at their pleasure. It may be that that heresy will spread in England. Will it not be a most glorious thing for the Canadian farmer that after having been tariff-barred from the United States market, he is to be scheduled out of the English market, and won't it greatly tend to increase his resignation and patience under the high burdens the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and his friends have been inflicting on him. And now, Mr. Speaker, I have a word or two to say myself on a question to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) challenged my attention. With respect to this said Manitoba school question, I think it is rather unfair for the men who are charged with the government of the country to come to us to teach them how to deal with a matter which is in their special province, and which they have specially muddled. Now, I will give the hon. gentleman, as he wants to know, my own view on this matter. I say here—and I am a Protestant, and I represent perhaps an ultra-Protestant constituency—I say here, that I have great sympathy with the Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba. I say more; I am disposed to do all I can in order to have their views met. I wish to be just to them: I wish likewise to be just to the majority in Manitoba, and I have great confidence, for my part, that if properly dealt with and properly appealed to, the majority in Manitoba, strong in their victory, will deal generously with the Catholic minority, and that if it be found on examination and investigation that there is a real grievance, they will be ready to redress it. Let those of our friends who object to any interference with Manitoba remember that when I am saying this I am merely re-echoing the sentiments expressed by the present Premier of Manitoba, who has been so triumphantly returned yesterday. But, Sir, I refuse at present to discuss that question on its merits. I am not going into any disquisition on provincial autonomy. I would like to hear the opinions of some of the constitutional authorities opposite as to the statements and views that were promulgated this afternoon with respect to the right of the provinces to manage their own affairs. I do not think we would find a united and happy family, particularly from the province of Quebec, on that question on the other side of the House. Sir, I waive the technical legal question. I am not going to enter into a disquisition as to whether this Parliament has the legal right to deal with the matter. For argument's sake we will admit that; but I have this to say: every man in this country who knows anything of the composition of this House knows that at best and under the most favourable circumstances the House of Commons is a bad tribunal before which to bring a question of education. It is a question which to be properly dealt with requires special knowledge, which most of us have not. It requires special local knowledge which very few of us can possibly possess, and for these reasons, and under any circumstances, except as a matter of extreme necessity, I deprecate bringing that question from its proper arena of the local legislature into Dominion politics.

Every man of any experience in Canadian politics will, I think, most heartily re-echo that sentiment of mine. Apart from that, I desire to say to my hon. friends on both sides this: there are, it appears to me, the very strongest imaginable reasons, looking at the matter from a moral, from an equitable, from a constitutional point of view, why this House at this particular moment, and under these conditions, should not be called upon to discuss this question at all. First of all, as a matter of physical fact, this House, which was elected on a registration roll made in 1888, seven or eight years ago, has long since ceased to represent the existing electorate of Canada. An enormous proportion of the electors who were on the roll of 1888 have since died; an enormous proportion have left this country, and an enormous proportion have grown to manhood since then. I believe in many constituencies you will not find on the roll to-day fifty per cent of those who were on the roll in 1888. I am certain that, taking the country all through, you will not find that more than two-thirds of the existing electorate were represented in 1888. Therefore, as a mere matter of physical fact, this House cannot pretend to represent the people of Canada to-day. More than that, since this House met a census was held, and the proportions of the representation in no less than four provinces has been altered. The maritime provinces have now 10 per cent more than their population entitles them to, and Manitoba has scarcely two-thirds of the representation its population entitles it to. Now, Mr. Speaker, constitutionally speaking, you know, and every constitutional student knows, that after a census which has disturbed the representation, an appeal to the people ought to have followed, and it is not creditable to the Government that an appeal to the people did not follow within a reasonable measure of time after the census of 1891. Then, Sir, I have a third reason which ought to weigh with those hon. gentlemen. It is extremely inexpedient to introduce a question of this kind, stirring up race and religious prejudices in what is not merely a moribund Parliament, but a Parliament actually in the throes of dissolution. Must I remind those hon. gentlemen who were members of the Government of Sir John Macdonald of the plea on which they anticipated the proper time for the dissolution of Parliament in 1891. We were told by Sir John Macdonald, on his authority as a constitutional lawyer, that it was not proper to deal with a great question involving our commercial relations with the United States in a moribund Parliament, and therefore he anticipated the dissolution of that moribund Parliament by rather more than one year, and justified his action in asking for a dissolution on that score. Sir, is the Minister of Finance going to give Sir John Macdonald points on constitutional law, or is the ex-Minister of Justice going to teach Sir John Macdonald constitutional law? If it were right and proper to refuse to deal with the question of a commercial treaty in 1891, until we had an appeal to the people, because forsooth the Parliament was moribund and did not therefore represent the people of Canada, what are we to say of men who propose to deal with a question of this gravity in a Parliament which at the best has scarcely a few weeks to live. Sir, I say, in brief, if those hon. gentlemen opposite want my advice: repeal your hasty and ill-considered remedial order, do as Mr. Greenway and the Government of Manitoba have done; appeal to the country. Learn what the opinion of the electorate is on the subject (they have never been consulted yet), and when you have done that, accept the reasonable proposition of Manitoba, issue a proper commission, as my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has advised, have the question investigated, negotiate with Manitoba, and I pledge my word in this House that I have every reason to believe that a settlement perfectly satisfactory to all honest men of both parties will be arrived at. Sir, the hour has come, the man is here, and in the seat of my hon. friend Wilfrid Laurier sits the man to whom Canada looks, and not in vain, for the settlement of this question.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid nothing I can say would add anything to the weight of the compliment that has already been paid to the mover and seconder of the resolution this afternoon. They have already been told by high authority on both sides of the House with what gratification we have witnessed their admirable performance of the duty assigned to them, a duty that is always a most difficult and trying one to perform, and one which, in my short experience in this House, I have never heard performed in better style, both on the part of the mover and the seconder. I am sure every hon. member of this House on either side must feel that persons who acquit themselves as these hon. gentlemen have done this afternoon, cannot fail to prove with experience most valuable members of this body. I do not propose, Sir, to follow the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) through the whole course of his address; and I suppose, in order that we may get along as fast as possible, it is well that I should begin with the subject on which I can agree with him. I may tell the hon. gentleman that I agree with him in his deprecation of anything like jingo talk on the present occasion. I think it would be most unwise in responsible men, speaking from their places in Parliament, to say anything that would stir the susceptibilities of the most sensitive nation that one could imagine. When the late excitement arose in the neighbouring republic, I had the honour to be the Minister of Militia, and I took the very first opportunity in my power to state, so far as my utterances in that office had any weight, that so far as Canada was concerned, she looked to the common sense of the American people as her best defence. That attitude, Sir, I still maintain. But admitting all that and speaking here with the grave responsibility of office, I have to say this, that I am quite sure that no self-respecting American would think the slightest bit less of any Canadian because in the Speech from the Throne we have dared to say, what is perfectly true, that the Government intend to improve the condition of the militia and to strengthen the defences of the country. Sir, what insult is that to any peaceable neighbour? The most susceptible person could not take the slightest offence from that. I am quite sure that no thoughtful person in Canada took offence because the United States Congress proposed to vote $100,000,000 for the improvement of the defences of their seaboard. No person questioned their right to do so or felt the least aggrieved at that proposition; and I am sure that the hon. gentleman is more tender for the United States than the United States itself would be, when he says that the mere statement in the official Speech from the Throne that we intend to improve our reserve forces, would excite any offence there. There is one statement of the hon. gentleman in that connection with which I find fault. He speaks of the mischievous language of the Conservative press in connection with that trouble.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will excuse me. That was not what I said. I referred not to what they said on that occasion, which I think has been fairly considered, but to the language used by them against the Liberal party in 1891, when charges of treason against the half of Canada formed the staple of their campaign sheets.

Mr. DICKEY. I am extremely glad to learn that the hon. gentleman agrees with me—and I think it should be acknowledged here publicly—that the attitude of the press throughout Canada, Liberal and Conservative, during that trying crisis, was eminently creditable to them and eminently creditable to the self-respect and self-restraint of the Canadian people. They held, so far as I could see, a most dignified attitude, and while firm in their language, were most careful not to offend the susceptibilities of our neighbours on the other side of the line. As to the conduct of the Conservative press in 1891, though I can scarcely expect that the hon. gentleman will agree with me, I think I could commend it equally on that occasion. Now, Sir, with respect to the incident which has been mentioned regarding Messrs. Vail and Jones, the hon. gentleman has, I think, misunderstood the charge which was made. The hon. leader of the Opposition charged the Conservative party with high crimes and misdemeanours because they did not hold the elections for the vacant seats during the recess simultaneously—because they chose their own political pleasure, as he put it—because they chose the days of the several elections so as to benefit their own party. Now, Sir, it is admitted that that was a legal course; it is admitted that that is a course contemplated by the statute.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. DICKEY. I am not here to defend that course in its abstract morality—not at all. I am here to say that that represents the course which the Parliament of Canada, in framing its Election Act thought was the best for this country. Now, the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition is not considered on this side of the House to be entirely immaculate politically. If the hon. gentleman would condescend to admit some of the weaknesses of humanity, perhaps we would not be so severe with him; but when he stands up and sets his own standard for his own conduct, and throws around himself a mantle of purity, and denounces this Government from a high standpoint, he must take the measure that he has set for himself. Now, the hon. gentleman has declared to this House that it was cowardly, base and criminal to arrange in succession the elections for the vacancies that had occurred. That is the hon. gentleman's own statement. If that statement is correct, the hon. gentleman in his practice was cowardly, was base, and was criminal. I do not say he was, because I have regard to public exigencies and to party exigencies. But I take the hon. gentleman on his own statement. Mr. Vail and Mr. Jones were both disqualified to sit in this House by reason of contracts. No person on the Conservative side that I ever heard imputed any moral blame to either of those gentlemen on that account. Certainly nobody did to-day. The gravamen of the charge was this, that when the seats which those gentlemen had vacated were to be filled, hon. gentlemen opposite dated the election writs on the same day, the 31st day of December, and set one election for one date, and the other election far enough ahead to change their policy in case the first election did not go right. Was that cowardly? Was that base? Was that criminal? If it was, the hon. leader of the Opposition stands convicted of all these things. The then Government made Mr. Vail its Minister of Militia and ran him in Digby, where he was beaten. It immediately appointed Mr. Jones Minister of Militia, and ran him in the county of Halifax, and elected him. Now, Sir, it is not for me to complain of that at all; I admit that frankly. But I say that when a gentleman stands up and assumes a high standard of morality, it is well that he should realize that he is to be judged by the standard of morality which he applies to others.

So much for the Vail and Jones episode. I am quite certain of this, that the hon. the leader of the Opposition will always be moral, that he will always hold his elections together, that he will always do everything which is politically right, so long as he stays where he is. The hon. gentleman has been politically virtuous, so far as holding elections is concerned, for the last seventeen years, and he will have the opportunity of being so for another considerable term. But the only record we have of the hon. gentleman in office is one short year, and during that year the transaction I complain of occurred, which, he says, was base, cowardly and criminal. A good deal has been said with reference to consorting with criminals. I do not propose to follow up that line. I do not think it is a very fruitful subject to discuss, but I must say this. Where a member of this House has been unfortunate enough—and it may be misfortune—to have been convicted of personal corruption by the courts, I do not think it tends to the dignity of debate for a member of this House to get up and attack the judiciary who condemned that man and say he was wrongfully condemned. We may have our private opinions, but I ask the hon. gentleman from South Oxford if, strong, bitter, partisan as he is, he considers himself a fair judge of the evidence on which his own colleague was convicted?

The hon. gentleman was good enough to say that the Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) possessed no knowledge whatever of finance or trade, and in fact I think he went so far as to say that he possessed no knowledge of any kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I did not say that.

Mr. DICKEY. I am not here to defend the Minister of Finance. Where that hon. gentleman is not known, perhaps he needs some defence, but in this House, which has listened so often to his able speeches, he needs none. We who have listened to the Minister of Finance meeting the hon. knight from South Oxford and downing him, from time to time, can only feel surprise that the hon. gentleman from South Oxford should rate his own powers so low as to admit before this House that he has been beaten so often by a gentleman who knows nothing about finance or anything else. I wish to say a few words with reference to what the hon. gentleman said concerning the Manitoba school question. He began by stating that the course of the leader of the Opposition was straightforward, clear and consistent throughout—that his view had been that the question was one of fact and not of law, and that his advice had been to investigate the facts and to negotiate from start to finish. I admit frankly, as a member of the Administration, that if the hon. leader of the Opposition could make out a case of that kind, he would stand in a strong position before the House and country ; and it is only because I feel that the leader of the Opposition is open to the charge that he has made a party football of this question, that I consider he stands in a weak position before this House and country with regard to it. I do not propose to discuss the Manitoba school question in many of its bearings.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. DICKEY. I am glad to see that the hon. member for Wellington agrees with me that it should not be done. I wish, however, to say something concerning the course of the leader of the Opposition upon that point. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, has touched upon it to some degree. I wish to recall to your memory, Mr. Speaker, and to the recollection of members of this House, that the Manitoba school question began in 1891 ; that Sir John Abbott, who then led the Government, refused to disallow the first act ; that when the appeal came up, Sir John Thompson took this ground and said to the appellants, we will only get you into trouble if we hear this appeal, unless our jurisdiction to hear it has been settled by the courts—it will have to go to the courts anyway, and it is far better we should refer it, under the statute, and get a decided opinion. Sir John Thompson and the Government took that course and Parliament endorsed it. That was in the direction of negotiation ; that was in the direction of caution and delay. Did that meet the approval of the leader of the Opposition ? Not at all. In 1893 he supported a motion on the Manitoba school question. What sort of a motion was it ? The hon. gentleman has said in this House, and in Toronto and elsewhere, that he does not wish to get into power on the Manitoba school question, that he does not wish to make political capital out of it ; and yet, what sort of a motion was made in this House by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) with the knowledge and connivance of the hon. the leader of the Opposition ? Not a square motion, not a manly motion, not a straightforward motion, but a motion so framed as to catch all the extreme votes upon either side—the extreme Protestant vote and the extreme Catholic vote. I would not complain of that course, if the question were an ordinary political question. I would not complain of it upon a tariff matter, but when the hon. the leader of the Opposition stands up in this House and poses as a man who is going to treat the question as above politics, and when we find him resorting to the most tricky tactics—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DICKEY. I withdraw the word "tricky." When we find him resorting to tactics which are only justifiable by the extreme laws of warfare in connection with party matters, he must give up his claim of being non-partisan and non-political in this matter. That is the first move which the hon. gentleman made. What was the hon. gentleman's cry at that time, that we were moving too fast ? No, that we were not moving fast enough. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) made one of his characteristically fiery speeches. His voice was then for war. I do not know what it is for now. I think the hon. gentleman has been dragooned into silence ; I think the hon. gentleman will now turn up on the other side of the question, driven thither by the party whip. However, this is what he said on that occasion :

Our petitions were there ; they were not taken into consideration. And why ? Because, as usual, the Government was inspired by the desire to cause no commotion. We, therefore, had to wait. The courts of justice decided legal questions.

The hon. gentleman then complained that the Government did not cause commotion ; that was the gravamen of his charge. The hon. gentleman further said :

We are now discussing one of the most momentous questions public men in our country had ever to discuss for the last forty years. After a solemn compact, after arrangements were accepted by the majority, guaranteeing the rights of the minority, without any notice being given, without any regard for the negotiations which took place, these guarantees are thrown aside which protected the rights of the minority. And they would have us believe that Parliament is powerless to do justice to those who suffer !

That was nearly three years ago. The hon. gentleman was burning then to have action taken in this matter. He said again :

Separate schools were abolished ; they had no right to abolish them. And they screen themselves behind mean legal subtleties so as not to do justice to us.

The hon. leader of the Opposition voted and spoke in favour of that motion. That was a motion in favour of haste ; it was against deliberation and care. And it is for that reason I say that the hon. gentleman to-day stands on exactly the same platform from that on which he stood two or three years ago. Now, when we have taken action, he says : You have acted too hastily ; when we did not act, he said : You are not acting fast enough. On that occasion he said :

The question, after all, is a simple one. In 1890 the legislature of Manitoba passed a law which the Roman Catholic minority deemed oppressive ; that minority appealed to the Government against that law ; their prayer has to be denied or has to be granted ; this is the simple issue ; and yet, Sir, one year, two years, three years have elapsed, and during those three years the Government have never dared yet to come to a decisive action—nay, to express a simple opinion. And, Sir, what is the reason ? The reason is well known. The reason is not new ; it is as old as the constitution itself. The reason is, that upon this occasion, as upon similar occasions, there is not in this Government the courage equal to the duty of the hour.

In those days the hon. gentleman said we had not courage enough. He said: You have spent three years without coming to a decision; all these people want is for you to admit their petition or to deny it. We have admitted their petition, and now the hon. gentleman says we have acted too fast and are imperilling the safety of the country by going too rapidly. The hon. gentleman says we should investigate the facts. I do not propose to go at length into that question, for it will come up in another form, probably, later on. In the year 1893, when the hon. gentleman had studied this question for three years, he informed this House, that there was only one fact to investigate, and that was whether the schools in Manitoba were Protestant schools or not. Does the hon. gentleman want that fact investigated now? He has spoken recently on platforms throughout Ontario and Quebec; he has taken the trouble to enumerate to his audiences the questions of fact that he wanted investigated; and I have never yet read a report of one of these speeches in which this fact is mentioned as one of the facts requiring to be investigated. And this is the hon. gentleman who has always been consistent upon this issue. The hon. gentleman has been making speeches throughout the country similar to the speeches he made in Montreal. And I must admit that they are speeches which do him infinite credit. I have not the experience and the boldness of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and, therefore, I would not for a moment think of saying that the hon. leader of the Opposition was a good talking machine. But the hon. gentleman has had considerable practice in saying a good deal without meaning very much. The hon. gentleman, in Montreal, actually succeeded in making a speech which was so frank, which so exposed his position to the public, as he said, that the Winnipeg "Tribune" quoted it to show that he was dead against interference with Manitoba in any event, while the Rouge papers in Quebec quoted it to show that he was for interference no matter what happened. The hon. gentleman has been clear, he has been consistent in his course. His consistency has been the consistency of a man who wanted power and was prepared to get it at any price, of a man who was willing, on such a delicate question as this, to run the risk of plunging his country into any sort of religious strife, of a man who says: Let anything happen, so long as I can cross the floor and administer from the Treasury benches. Does the hon. gentleman remember the motions he made last session? This Government, as we have heard recently, has been a government distinguished for strikers. Last July three members of the Cabinet went out on this question, because, as they alleged, they had not at that date confidence that the Government would carry out its pledges. What course did the hon. leader of the Opposition take on that occasion? I leave it to the House, I leave it to the country, to say if the hon. gentleman on that occasion pursued a straightforward, manly course, a course calculated to allay strife and stop religious agitation. Did he take a position one way or the other? On two occasions he moved colourless motions to adjourn the House, so as to avoid expressing any opinion himself, so as, he hoped, to defeat the Government and attain power. So I think the hon. gentleman has not much to say with reference to his patriotic course upon this question. I would like to know from the hon. leader of the Opposition, whether he endorses his statement of policy on the Manitoba school question made by the second leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for South Oxford. A short time ago a statement was made by another parliamentary leader of the Liberal party. A few days ago the leader of the Liberal party in Parliament made a statement on this question. He stated that remedial legislation was perfectly useless. Does the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition agree wholly in that? The hon. gentleman for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says to-night that his first step would be to repeal the remedial orders. Does the hon. leader of the Opposition approve of that policy? Does the leader of the Opposition want us to understand that he would adopt that policy, that he and the member for South Oxford have concocted in their conferences together? He says the first thing they would do is to unwind all that has been done, and start this matter again from the beginning, that they would wipe out what this House has already done, and begin de novo. Is that the policy? That is the policy the hon. member for South Oxford advocates. However, that hon. gentleman is not entirely without comfort for the minority in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman generously extends to the Catholic minority of Manitoba his sympathy, and we know that the hon. gentleman's sympathy is so scarce that the Manitoba people ought to value it very highly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The sympathy is large, but the object of it is small.

Mr. DICKEY. I think the hon. gentleman's sympathetic faculties are all exhausted in sympathizing with himself, so that he has nothing to give to other people. But, Sir, he thinks the Manitoba Government will right this wrong. He points out, and points out with great justice, that the legislature of Manitoba is the proper place for this to be righted. No one disputes that; no one doubts it. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to go a step further? He was very bold in stating his policy, and I will do him the credit to say that cowardice is not one of his traits. The hon. gentleman said he had sympathy with the Catholics, and that he thought the Manitoba Government would give them relief if they were properly approached. Will the hon. gentleman tell me what his policy is on the principle of remedial legislation, supposing it to be impossible to get relief from the province of Manitoba; supposing it should turn out in the last resort that the neck of Mr. Greenway was too stiff, and that he utterly refuse to bow it under the yoke? Is the hon. gentleman prepared, in that event, to stand up for the constitution and for the rights of minorities in this country?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am ready to prescribe when we are called in.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman says he is ready to prescribe when he is called in. That is what I like. This non-political question, this question upon which parties are not divided, this question on which hon. gentlemen opposite would not come to power if they could. And yet upon that question, that non-political question, they will not give us the slightest aid in carrying on the Queen's Government. I am quite aware that every hon. gentleman upon your left is in the same position. If he could get there by any hook or crook, whether on the Manitoba school question or any other, he would be glad to get here. I do not blame the hon. gentlemen opposite, providing the question is an ordinary political question. Everything is fair in war and politics. But, Sir, when the leader of the Opposition, whose word they ought to take, tells them that this is not a political question in the sense of being one on which he would like to get into power, I suppose the hon. gentleman is actuated by high and patriotic motives. The hon. gentleman said that in 1891 Sir John A. Macdonald would not allow Parliament to meet because he wished to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. Well, I suppose this House remembers the reason why. There was a party in the country at that time who were going up and down the land, preaching what Sir John Macdonald thought to be the doctrine of treason. They claimed to have the support of the majority in this country. Mr. Speaker, does anybody suppose that a Government could go to Washington and negotiate a moderate reciprocity treaty when a large party in the state who claimed that they would control the Government in a year or two, was willing to give them everything for nothing? For that reason Sir John A. Macdonald stated, and stated properly, that in the interest of this country this question between the parties must be settled once for all. He wanted to know whether the people of this country wished to control their own affairs and to make a reciprocity treaty to suit themselves, or to give away everything.

Mr. DICKEY.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He said he was going to Washington to secure a treaty.

Mr. DICKEY. Now, Sir, there is just one more question which I would like to recall to the attention of the House. The hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition is an integral part of the constitution of this country. He has a right to a title, the leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. Now, I must say that I did hope that the leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, when speaking on the Speech that was made by His Excellency the other day, would have confessed to this House his sentiments and those of the hon. gentlemen who sat behind him, in gratification that the British Government had decided to assist us in the fast steamship line. I hoped that on the occasion of this, the first step, which may be everything to the British Empire, the hon. gentleman would have, at least, said some word of commendation, not of us—I never expected him to commend us—but of the British Government, some word of congratulation that this country and the Home Government had joined hands on this matter. I believe, Sir, important as I regard the other clauses of the Speech, that they will sink into insignificance compared with that clause which states that:

In pursuance of the resolutions of the Ottawa Conference, the Imperial authorities have decided to give a subvention to a fast line of steamships across the Atlantic.

Mr. LAURIER. Neither the mover nor the seconder of the Address said a word about it.

Mr. DICKEY. Very well, then the hon. gentleman required to be reminded of his duty by the youngest members of the House. If that had been in the hon. gentleman's heart, it would have come out, but, not being forthcoming in his mind, not attaching very much importance to this subject, he missed it altogether. Sir, I think this House should realize that this is a most important statement, and I firmly believe that it foreshadows very much greater things to come. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) some years ago, spoke in this House, almost the first time that it was mentioned, about a little cloud, which he described as no bigger than a man's hand, which was rising in favour of preferential trade. The hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. leader of the Opposition have made merry to-night on the subject of protection in England. They say if they adopt protection in England it will be a nice lookout for our protectionists in Canada. Well, Sir, all I can say is that if those hon. gentlemen read the speeches and reports on protection in England, they will find that the whole direction of protectionist opinion there is in favour of including Canada with the rest of the British Empire, that the whole force of protection in England, the backbone and strength of protectionist opinion is united to the national and Imperial feeling in England, and that it draws its strength from that feeling of Empire which I am glad to say is developing in England and in the colonies as well. If protection does come to pass in England—although I pretend to know nothing whatever about the state of political matters in England—but if protection does come to pass in England, it will be in the shape of a protection against the rest of the world outside of the British Empire, and in favour of the products of the colonies of Great Britain.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that protection will be a good thing for the English farmer, and that the English Government ought to confer it?

Mr. DICKEY. I do not pretend to know very much about trade, but I try to guard against being drawn aside by theories and supposing that they fit every possible case. I know nothing, practically, about the situation in England, and, therefore, I do not pretend to express any opinion. I have no doubt that those who are on the spot are quite able to look after her interests.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What does the hon. gentleman wish the House to understand by his special reference to protection in England?

Mr. DICKEY. I made that reference because the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pointed out that if there was protection in England, if those theories we were advocating prevailed in England, it would shut us out of the English market.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you believe that?

Mr. DICKEY. No, because if protection prevails in England it would be a protection against the rest of the world.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Could you prove that?

Mr. McNEILL. When England had protection before, the colonies enjoyed preferential trade with England.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not propose to dogmatize to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I tell him this, and I believe I am supported in this opinion by a majority of the House, that the trend of protection sentiment, which it is admitted is growing more or less in England, is not for absolute protection against the whole world, but in favour of the colonies as against the rest of the world.

Mr. LAURIER. What would Canada do then?

Mr. DICKEY. I am not talking theories, I am simply stating facts. I have already occupied the time of the House longer than I intended. It is scarcely time yet to discuss the Manitoba school question, but I hope at some later date we shall have the pleasure of doing so and placing on record the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and I hope they will vote together.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have listened to an address from the Minister of Justice in which he has attempted to give the House some information on the Manitoba school question. I have listened to most of the Ministers, I have heard some of them on the stump, and I have read the speeches of others on this very important question. But I have never yet heard one hon. gentleman clearly and distinctly outline what course they intend to take in dealing with this question. Even with their own candidates in the field, in Cardwell and in North Ontario, each man was asked to shut his eyes, open his mouth and swallow the pill without knowing what was being administered to him. The Minister of Finance visited both these constituencies, on neither occasion on which he delivered an address, did he let the audience understand what the Government intended to do. They have shot all round the mark, and although they have been politically shooting at the Manitoba school question for three or four years, not one of them has made a bull's eye. The Minister of Justice shot around the mark, but he never came near it. The hon. gentleman found fault with the leader of the Opposition because he had not clearly and distinctly told them what he would do if he came into power. It is most singular that although we have thirteen or fifteen Ministers of the Crown, and I am sure they consider they are political Solomons, and that all wisdom would die if they were to drop out, they have not been able yet to come to a decision as to their action, nor have they yet told a single candidate whom the party has placed in the field what is the character of the School Bill they intend to propose or what are any of its provisions. They have endeavoured in some sections to make political capital out of the question. When the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) went back to his constituency for re-election, he stated that they had only sent forward the verdict of the highest court in the realm, and had passed it from the hands of the Governor General to that of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, and it remained with the Government of that province to deal with it. In other sections of the Dominion, however, different statements were made. It is to be hoped that the long promised Bill will soon be presented to the House in order that we may be able to scrutinize its provisions. The Minister of Justice, while finding fault with the leader of the Opposition on the ground that the Liberal party were not in unison with him in his view, forgot to state the dissensions on the other side of the House. The Minister of Justice had better induce the Minister of Militia to call out the volunteers and have the galleries of this House crowded with men with guns charged, ready to fire and destroy the first member opposite who does not rise to vote for the Bill, because there are a number of members on the other side of the House who will require something perhaps stronger than such a threat to lead them to vote for the Government Bill. I challenge the Minister of Justice to point to a single row on the other side of the Chamber in which every man will support remedial legislation. The hon. gentleman does not know where his followers are; it is stated right and left that members are not going to vote for remedial legislation. We know what has been stated by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and there are other members disposed to follow the course he has taken. The Government has not yet had even a caucus of its followers, they have not dared to call their members together, but I hope ere long the promised Bill will make its appearance and hon. members will be able to form some idea of its provisions. The Minister of Justice made some remarks with respect to the statement made by the hon. member for Oxford in regard to the action of the Minister of Finance. That hon. gentleman evidently repeats parrot-like, figures submitted to him by officials, and no doubt he was thus led into the very serious error pointed out by the hon. member for Oxford, an error of several millions in his statement submitted to the House. It is a very common thing with the Finance Minister to make errors of that kind in the House. The other evening in trying to explain how the difficulties in the Cabinet had been healed, he told us that it was the funeral of the Reform party, who expected to get into power on account of the dissensions. Well, Sir, from the exhibitions we have had in this House from the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, we can honestly say that they are willing to swallow anything and everything rather than leave office. The Minister of Finance was rather disposed to challenge the statements made on this side of the House, and he thought the Cabinet Ministers were not fully remunerated for the services they rendered to the country. Well, looking at the gentlemen occupying seats on the Treasury benches, for my part I fail to recognize a man who was ever able to earn $7,000 a year until he was made a Minister of the Crown. The best evidence that they were not able to earn such a salary is to be found in the hurried manner in which they ran back to their portfolios, least they might be taken by somebody else. Sir, with regard to the position taken by my esteemed leader on the Manitoba school question, I have a few words to say. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has desired that a commission should be appointed to thoroughly investigate the whole difficulty, and thus throw the onus on Mr. Greenway. Had the Government taken that course last session the report of that commission would now be before the House, and the members could deal intelligently with the question. But the hon. gentlemen opposite did not want to accept any suggestion from Mr. Greenway. They did not want to do anything which might tone down the differences that existed between the Government of Manitoba and the Dominion Government on that question. They had taken the bull by the horns themselves, and they were bound to rush it with all the strength and power which they considered was vested in them under the provisions of the constitution. They evidently do not want a peaceful settlement of this difficult question. As far as I am personally concerned, I would rejoice to see the matter quietly and satisfactorily settled in the best interests of the country. I have no desire to see it kept in the political arena, and I believe if the Government had taken the proper course, a settlement could have been obtained long ago. But, Sir, the Government saw that the National Policy was losing its grip upon the people, and that they dare not again face the country with it, and so, they dragged in the Manitoba school question for political purposes. We are quite well aware, Mr. Speaker, that in 1891, the Government promised to secure a reciprocity treaty between this country and the United States. Sir Charles Tupper, sr., came from England, and he declared from place to place that the Canadian Government had an invitation to send delegates to Washington after the 4th March for the purpose of discussing a reciprocity treaty. He and the members of the Cabinet told the people throughout Canada: Gentlemen, for the first time in the history of this country for years you are now offered the golden opportunity of having reciprocity with the States, the only thing that is wanted is a mandate from the people, send members of Parliament to support the Conservative party, and we will send delegates to Washington to arrange for a treaty. They deceived the people then as they have often done since and before. The statements they made to the people were soon discovered to be untrue, and Sir Charles Tupper, sr., who is now in Canada and expects to be installed as First Minister, went before the people of this country five years ago with an untruth in his mouth, preached it from stump to stump, and when the elections were over, he was compelled to go on his knees to Mr. Blaine, in Washington, and confess that what he had stated was not true. He had the brass, after misleading the people of this country, to write back to the First Minister over his own signature, that he lost no time in seeing Mr. Blaine and telling him that Mr. Blaine's interpretation of the correspondence was correct, and that the interpretation he (Sir Charles Tupper) put on it was incorrect. That is the kind of man who is going to be the Prime Minister of Canada in a short time. That was not the first time that the late High Commissioner misled the members of this House and the people of this country. We very well know that when he occupied a seat in Parliament he was designated as one of the greatest stretchers this country had ever seen. We well remember in what glowing terms he pointed out what would be the result of the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the opening up of the North-west. He told us that when a certain specified year had arrived there would be so many farmers in the North-west, every farmer would cultivate so much land, and that land would bring forth so much wheat that in a few years we would have an export of 640,000,000 bushels. That year has passed long since, but where are the 640,000,000 bushels of wheat? We remember that in 1887 in what glowing terms he referred to the result of his legislation to increase the duty on iron. He told us that men were standing on our borders ready to invest millions, that our iron mountains would be honeycombed with mining tunnels, that 200,000 people were to be added to our population and that the benefits to Canada would be grand, glorious and great. He got the Bill passed, but where are the iron furnaces?

Mr. WALLACE. In Hamilton.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) says there is one in Hamilton, but that is the first one that has been built, and it is hard to tell when we will get any more. That was prophesy No. 2 of Sir Charles Tupper. Then we had many other prophesies from him with regard to the outcome of appropriations that he secured from this House as to the construction of railroads and other schemes. We will be able to point out to him that all his glowing prophesies remain unrealized.

We earnestly hope that if he does come back, he will not be the Balaam in the future that he has been in the past, but that he will be more moderate and discreet in his prophetic utterances. Now, Sir, the retired Minister of Justice undertook last evening to size up the hon. member for South Oxford, and, after considering his ability, he decided that there was nothing in him and that he was no statesman. Well, Sir, that is an amusing thing to come from a man of his limited years and experience. If he were possessed of that intelligence and courtesy which we might well hope to find in him, he would not dare to express such opinions. I am quite sure that the members of this House, as well as the public throughout this Dominion have learned to respect the hon. member for South Oxford as one of the best and ablest men in Canada; and it ill becomes a young man whose beard is hardly grown to undertake to size up and pronounce as brainless and as having no ability, a man who has sat in Parliament for over thirty years, and has been elected by an intelligent constituency. I dare say that the late Minister of Justice fancies that when his hat is on, the best brains of this House are covered, that he is one of the Solomons of the present age, and that it will be a sad loss to this country and to the world when we have to lose such ability as his head contains. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite, the Minister of Finance particularly, made some very discourteous allusions to the hon. gentleman who has been sent to this House as the representative of Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane). The Minister of Finance, without any reason whatever, and in a very discourteous and rude way, drew attention to the fact that that hon. gentleman had been at one time, under certain circumstances, disqualified. He forgot that the disqualification had been removed. You would fancy, to hear hon. gentlemen opposite, that all the corruption that ever existed in Canada belonged to the Reform party—that there was none in the other party at all. Well, Sir, we can say this, that, commencing with the Pacific Scandal, of which Sir Charles Tupper was one of the chief promoters, for he was in the Cabinet at the time, down to the present day, there has never been a session of Parliament when the utmost efforts of their opponents have not been used to get at the bottom of the political corruption and the stealing of public money that has characterized the whole history of that party. Year after year we have been called upon to take part in investigations that have been a disgrace to this country and to the party concerned in them. Well, we are to have Sir Charles Tupper back, and I would like to know why we should not have the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) installed in office with the High Commissioner. He has as good a right to be taken back. In order to complete the bill and grant an absolute and entire pardon to all offenders, I would suggest that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy) should be taken back, also, and put into the Cabinet. We had better have the whole of them, because I am quite sure that when we take back the High Commissioner, we may just as well take back the whole lot, and be done with it at once. Then, hon. gentlemen opposite have pointed out that the hon. leader of the Opposition has been seen on a platform with a gentleman who was disqualified on a technicality—disqualified, perhaps, by the evidence of a character who certainly does not stand very high in the estimation of the section where he lives, and whose word very few would be disposed to believe. We know perfectly well that other men have been disqualified. We know that men who have been not only preven guilty of the most abominable corruption, but who have been compelled to pay the penalty of the law, have been introduced into this House by the whips of the party opposite, and have been received into their bosom again. It ill-becomes hon. gentlemen opposite to try to fasten on members on this side, crimes of which they themselves have been guilty: and they have always been doing that. We had an admission from one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke with regard to the revenues we have received from the sale of lands in the North-west, and the amount we have expended in connection with surveys. He said we had spent some $6,000,000, and had got back only $4,000,000. That is true. But if we go back to one more of the prophetic utterances of Sir Charles Tupper, we will find that when he was introducing his resolution for granting a loan of $30,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, he said he had not the slightest doubt that by the year 1891, Canada would have received money enough from the sale of lands to recoup her for every dollar she had spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, here is the statement of the hon. gentleman who moved the Address to-day, which gives the lie to that prophetic utterance, and proves that in place of having received any money towards the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway or the expenses connected with the development of that country, we are yet over $2,000,000 short of the amount spent in carrying on surveys. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman who moved the Address pointed to the magnificent crop which had been gathered in Manitoba and the North-west this year. We are very glad, indeed, that the people of Manitoba have had a fairly good yield for their labour, and we earnestly hope that the success which has attended their efforts this year may be realized year after year in the future. We shall be glad to see that country developed and grow in population and wealth, and increase its exports of produce. But hon. gentlemen opposite must remember that the National Policy is not to be thanked for the exports of the products of Manitoba, such as oats, barley, and pease, which the hon. gentleman pointed out as likely to be exported this year. The National Policy, instead of encouraging, has positively restricted the export of produce from that country. I see, on looking over the returns of last year, that these people paid between seven thousand dollars and eight thousand dollars for duty on binders which they had to buy in the United States; and calculating the duty on each binder, I find it amounted to about $32 on each machine. This certainly cannot be looked upon as an assistance to those people in prosecuting their industry, so that instead of the National Policy doing any good to the people of that country, it positively militates against them in every possible way. They are overcharged for everything they buy and have to use, while, on the other hand, they are excluded from markets which would be unquestionably profitable. We are told, however, that we have now a Minister of Agriculture who is going to do wonderful things in the interests of the farming community. He tried his hand last year at buying dairy butter and exporting it, and he made a very considerable loss on the speculation. However, I am quite satisfied, if the farmers of the country are to reap the advantage, that he should repeat the operation if he likes. He talks now of establishing a dead meat export business. Well, I do not know what he may be able to accomplish in that line, but I should not be at all surprised if he and those associated with him politically were to become dead ducks before they got the dead meat project set on all fours. However, we will be glad if he does establish an export dead meat business in this country or do anything for the farmers. I can say that although the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) has taken every opportunity on the stump to declare that our farmers are prosperous, he must know that, at this moment our farmers are driven to their wit's ends, as they never were before at any period in our history, to make both ends meet and do not know what way to turn financially. If the Minister of Agriculture would take the trouble to look over the files which are furnished every day of chattel mortgages, he would find that never has the volume of chattel mortgages filed in any period been so great as during the last six months. And this, above anything else, is positive evidence of the straightened condition of our farming community, as it shows that they have to chattel mortgage their stock and their valuables in order to meet their debts. The hon. gentleman also said that he was going to relieve the farmers by showing them how to raise horses for export. Well, if our farmers have to wait four or five years to get rid of the extra stock of horses which they now have, and if they have to wait until such time as the Minister of Agriculture will have produced a model horse such as he thinks our farmers ought to raise for export, I doubt whether he is going to accomplish very much. It will be the old story: Live old horse and you will get grass. I may say for the benefit of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and in reply to the statement made by an hon. gentleman here that horses were being sold in the United States, in Chicago, for $10 apiece, that I am credibly informed that a buyer went to a station in North Grey and bought a carload of horses, eighteen in all, at the magnificent price of $1 a head and brought them to Toronto.

Mr. SPROULE. They were ready to die and of no use.

Mr. McMULLEN. If they are selling at $1 a head in East Grey, that is still worse than $10 a head in Chicago.

Mr. McSHANE. Horses are selling in Chicago at from $80 to $100 per head all the time.

Mr. McMULLEN. If we can get a proper price for our horses in Chicago we will not challenge what use they make of them. They may use them for any purpose they like so long as we get the money. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we do not want the American market. I do not think that is the voice of the people of this Dominion. I do not think it is the opinion of the farmers of this Dominion. If you will consult our farming community, you will find that they do want the American market. If there is one thing that they want more than another, it is a liberal and fancy market for a great many of the things they can produce; and if the American market were open to them, they would get better prices than in England or Canada. The hon. Minister of Justice spoke about bettering our trade relations with the United Kingdom. He expressed the hope that all the dependencies of the Empire were going to be brought closer together and that we would be enabled to enjoy better facilities in the direction of sending to them and receiving from them many commodities, the trade in which is now restricted by tariffs. If I understood him rightly, this is what is going to take place. In all probability, England, if she makes any change in her policy, will do so, of course, in her own interests, and will treat Canada just as Canada treats her. We know that when Sir Charles Tupper introduced his resolutions into this House regarding iron, the iron-mongers in England, the different boards of trade and commercial organizations, passed resolutions strongly condemning and clearly pointing out the inevitable results to the English iron industry of the passage of that Bill. Sir Charles Tupper, however, took no notice of these resolutions. He treated these remonstrances from England just as Sir John Macdonald treated similar remonstrances when he introduced the National Policy. Sir John Macdonald then made this memorable statement: If the National Policy is going to endanger our imperial connection, so much the worse for our imperial connection. We were going, he said, to look after ourselves, and England might look after herself. This, Mr. Speaker, we have been doing for the last eighteen or twenty years. We have struck the mother country in the face every time, as has been pointed out here to-day. We are now receiving a volume of goods from the United States at a lower tariff than that at which we are receiving the same goods from Great Britain. We are virtually discriminating against Great Britain, and it is surprising that hon. gentlemen opposite should look forward so hopefully to England receiving suggestions at our hands in the way of shaping her trade tariff so as to increase the trade between us and her and give us advantages over the outside world. I question very much if England will not have a very vivid recollection of the many slaps she has got in the face from Canada on the trade question during the last twenty years, and treat Canada with that measure of consideration which Canada justly deserves at the mother's hands. Something has been said with regard to the farmers of England agitating in favour of protection. The farmers of England possibly might be benefited by putting a duty upon the food supply which goes to England's shores, simply because they do not grow enough to feed their own population for two months out of the twelve. England is not an exporting country of agricultural products, but is, on the contrary, a very large importer. Consequently, if she put a tax upon the grains imported, she would increase the price of the grain. But, apply the same principle to Canada. This is an exporting country, and what we export regulates the price of what is consumed at home. We know that perfectly well from past experience. And so, while protection in Britain might mean an incidental advantage to the farmers there, it cannot possibly accomplish the same in Canada, for what the farmer exports fixes the price of what he sells in the home market. Gentlemen opposite are very fond of pointing out the advantage that our farmers have in the home consumption of their products. We are glad to know that our population is increasing; but I would like some gentlemen opposite to give us the name of the man who pays more for a barrel of flour or a bag of potatoes than its actual value simply because it is the product of Canada. We know perfectly well that every man buys at the lowest possible price, and that price is regulated by the price in the foreign market. No man pays a brass farthing more than the article is worth abroad less the export charges. I do not wish to prolong this debate too late, for I presume we have plenty of time to discuss the items in the Speech from the Throne, and no doubt there are others who wish to speak. Moreover, I dare say the Government are considerably behind in the preparation of the papers that they intend to lay before the House, and we do not wish to hurry them too much. The hon. gentleman made some reference to cold storage. They told us that they were going to provide cold storage for the exports of the farmers of this country. Well, they ought to know what cold storage is—they were in it for ten days themselves. But they suffered so much in the cold that they were glad to come back. They have all been reinstated, their salaries have been set running again, and they are comfortable and easy. They now fancy that every man in the country should be satisfied, that all should be deeply grateful that the country has not been deprived of the admirable services of these hon. gentlemen, and rejoiced to know that their towering ability is to be at the service of the country for a little while longer. It certainly must be humiliating to the Conservative party that of all its membership in Parliament, young and old, men of large brain and great eloquence, there is not one fit to take the position of leader, but they must bring in a man of seventy-two years of age and set him at the head of the party. All these gentlemen seem to have a certain suspicion of one another. All summer, when the Reform press of this country was pointing out that there were nothing but rows and quarrels going on in the Privy Council Chamber, the Conservative papers, including the "Mail and Empire," declared that it was all a Grit canard, and without any truth. But now we have an outburst. At last the pot has boiled over, and we have had an exhibition that must be simply sickening to the best people of this country. There is not a man in this Dominion who respects his country and desires to see its affairs properly handled but feels disgusted and realizes that the dignity of the country has been lowered by the actions of Ministers of the Crown during the last five or six weeks. The Finance Minister drew attention to the apparent difficulties that were gathering around Great Britain at this hour. But, at the very time when the hearty co-operation of all her colonies was most needful to Britain, the Ministers here into whose charge the affairs of Canada had been committed, were on strike. The reason of that strike, as now explained, is that no gentleman had been appointed to fill the position of Minister of Agriculture. They were so weak that even the absence of one man might prove a very serious disadvantage. We hope that the change made may prove beneficial, but we question very much that the strength they have brought in to the Cabinet will help them much. I think the people are ready to say to them that their course in the past has been such as to justify the country in spewing them out of its mouth and committing the care of public affairs to men who will administer them honestly and prudently. The gentleman who is to take the lead in a few days, Sir Charles Tupper, has said on one occasion by the gentleman who is now at the head of affairs, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, in my hearing, would rather undertake to justify an increased expenditure of $100, than to defend a decrease of $5. Sir, if ever there was a period in the history of this country when we wanted a man in charge of our affairs who was a pronounced and determined economist, that time is the present.

We don't want a man whose whole career has been outlined by the statement that he would rather defend the expenditure of a hundred dollars than attempt to justify a reduction of five. Well, that is the man we are to have now at the head of affairs, and the people of this country may look forward, if he gets a grip upon the affairs of this country, with a solid following, to the prospect that at least another hundred millions will be added to the debt, and another very large increase added to the annual expenditure. I do not think that the people of this country are in a temper or tone to encourage anything of that kind, and I think they will be prepared to speak their mind very plainly and very frankly, when they get an opportunity. Mr. Speaker, as the hour is late, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend had better finish his speech.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend is tired.

Mr. FOSTER. I must say that he has given indications of being somewhat tired for the last half hour. On that consideration I will not object.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

Bill (No. 18) to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 19) to abolish the superannuation system as applied to the Civil Service of Canada.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Bill (No. 20) to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act.—(Mr. Davin.)

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Powell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add a few words to the observations I presented to the House last night on the Speech from the Throne. I then endeavoured to answer some of the remarks that had dropped from the Minister of Justice, and I also took occasion to reply to some remarks made by the Minister of Finance. I shall now confine myself to the several clauses of the Address, and in doing so I shall be as brief as possible in closing my remarks on this occasion. In one clause of the Address the Governor General refers to the harvest as a cause of thankfulness on the part of the people, and especially for the bounteous return that the farmers have realized in that regard. While the farmers are undoubtedly thankful to a kind Providence for giving a bounteous harvest and a fairly good yield, they have no cause for thankfulness towards the Government for having in the slightest degree assisted them in securing advantageous markets for the disposal of that bounteous harvest. Never in the history of this country since it became a confederacy have the farmers been called upon to accept such exceedingly low prices for their products as during the past year, and at the present time prices are far below those which they have been accustomed to realize. We know very well that at the inception of the National Policy one of the advantages that advocates of protection declared would result from the introduction of that system was, that the farmers would get a home market and a better market for everything they had to sell. At the time the Mackenzie Government was in power, from 1874 to 1878, hon. gentlemen opposite declared that in the matter of securing fair prices for the commodities the people had to sell, the Government were veritable "flies on the wheel." We have had an exhibition of flies on the wheel during the last year. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made no effort whatever to secure a better return to the farmers for their products, save and except in the article of butter. It is, of course, now their desire to show some little interest in the poor agriculturist. Always when elections are at hand the cause of the farmer is taken up and advocated, but just as soon as elections are over and hon. gentlemen opposite have secured the confidence of the country for a few more years, the interests of the farmers are neglected until elections again come round. That has been the experience in the past, it is the experience to-day and it will be the experience so long as hon. gentlemen opposite occupy their present positions. Another point to which the Governor General referred in the Speech was the vast mineral resources of this Dominion. We are indeed proud to be able to say that the mineral resources of Canada are valuable and immense. We rejoice to know that we have within our borders a mineral wealth unsurpassed by any other nation in the world. But that mineral wealth needs development, and no policy could be better calculated to cripple the development of our mineral resources than the National Policy. It is well known to every one that had we free access for our minerals to the markets of the United States it would be of vast advantage to us. But, because the manufacturers of this country wanted to monopolize the home market, the National Policy was introduced to please that class, and so the development of our mineral resources was neglected. There is no doubt that years ago a treaty could have been secured with the United States to give us an outlet for our minerals, had not hon. gentlemen opposite strongly opposed and discountenanced the making of such a treaty. His Excellency the Governor General, in the course of the Address referred to the kindly reception he met with on the different Indian reserves, and he congratulates the people of this country on the efforts they are making to educate the Indians. Well, Sir, we are all willing to do anything we possibly can for the unfortunate Red man who has come absolutely under our care. There is not a man in this country who would not readily contribute his mite to place them, the Indians, in a position of comfort, but we do not want that money should be squandered in taking care of them. We know well that a very large sum of money, vastly beyond what was necessary, has been expended on the industrial schools. Last year, in company with another hon. gentleman, we had the privilege in the Public Accounts Committee of examining the expenditure on these training schools and reserves, and we can honestly say that extravagance reigns in connection with every reserve. The prices paid for supplies are largely beyond the intrinsic value of the commodities, and the schools are conducted on a scale altogether beyond the ability of the taxpayers of this country to bear. Some of the schools with an attendance of fifty or sixty cost from $18,000 to $20,000, and some cost as high as $25,000, which expenditure is altogether on an extravagant basis. The people of the country are willing to train the Indians in industrial habits so as to fit them for civilization, but they are not willing to sanction an extravagant expenditure of money for that purpose. His Excellency also referred to the Indian Department, and I presume that the Ministers of the Crown put those words in his mouth in order to try and hide the extravagance of that department. We are spending over $1,000,000 a year on the Indians in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. We claim, Sir, that not one-half of that money reaches the pockets, the mouth or the back of the Indians. About half of it is pocketed by instructors, by reserve superintendents, by doctors, and by others who press their services upon the Government, and who, when no other place is found for them, are foisted over as a charge on the Indian Department. We raise no objection to the proper expenditure of money for relieving the distress of the Indians, but we object to paying unnecessary officials, many of whom receive a salary far in excess of what their education or ability would entitle them to in other walks of life.

Mr. DAVIN. Would the hon. gentleman cite some instances of excessive expenditure?

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman will quietly take his seat, I will be willing to hear him after a little while. Now, with regard to the North-west Mounted Police. Nobody challenges their efficiency, nor denies the fact that they have rendered desirable services in that new country. I remember, however, that the late Sir John Macdonald, when he had charge of that corps, as Minister, declared in this House that the day was not far distant when we would be able to reduce that corps by a considerable number. Although originally the force was 1,000 strong, it was then about 900, and the right hon. gentleman stated that from year to year, as the time of the members expired, the force would be reduced by refraining from filling up the vacancies. I quite admit that along the frontier there is reasonable ground for having a fairly efficient force, particularly to prevent smuggling, which very often comprises commodities which it is well should be kept out of the territory, and especially out of the hands of the Indians. We are quite willing that the force should perform that particular duty, but to maintain so many men at such expense as at present is, I maintain, against the wishes of the people who have to contribute to this heavy expenditure. If the wishes of the people of Canada are to be carried out, there must be a reduction of expenditure along the whole line. If hon. gentlemen opposite fancy that by eulogizing the Mounted Police, or the industrial schools, they can shield themselves from the consequence of their extravagance, I warn them that they will very soon find out their mistake. Reference is also made in the Speech from the Throne in regard to arming the militia. I am quite prepared to say that, in my humble opinion, it is the duty of Canada to improve our militia service. Our militia force, with our volunteers, have always been a credit to this country. They are highly respected by the people of this Dominion, and I do not think that any reasonable amount properly and economically expended for the purpose of keeping the force in a state of efficiency for any service that they may be called upon to perform will be grudged by the taxpayers of the country. But I hope that this expenditure will not be made a means of spending money unnecessarily and foolishly. Our fortifications may possibly require some little repairs, and I am sure that our friends to the south will not find any fault with us for maintaining them in a fairly good condition. At the same time, I quite agree with what has been said to the effect that an efficient militia force well equipped is the most important kind of defence we can have, and I do not think our people will raise any serious objection to the expenditure of money for that purpose if it is kept within proper limits. We also have, as the principal feature of the Speech from the Throne, the announcement of this remedial Bill which is to be introduced. I drew the attention of the House last night to some features of the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite on that question. I have been struck with this fact: the gentlemen who left the Cabinet assigned as a reason why they did so was because the Cabinet was weak, and they wanted to strengthen it in view of the introduction of this measure. It is a very peculiar thing, Sir, that all the bolters were Protestants. Not a single Catholic member of the Cabinet was so afraid of the measure that he felt it his duty to bolt. Another very peculiar circumstance, which has happened since this House met, is that hon. gentlemen opposite have appointed from among themselves a certain number of members to the Senate. I have looked over the list of names of those who have been transferred from this House to the other House, and I would naturally conclude that every one of those men would have voted for remedial legislation. But, Sir, while the Government are expressing their anxious and earnest desire to strengthen themselves by additions to the Cabinet so as to secure the success of remedial legislation, on the other hand, they have weakened their vote in this House by picking out men who would undoubtedly vote for remedial legislation, and sending them to the other Chamber. I am sure the country will wonder why the Government on the one hand, express such anxiety for the success of remedial legislation, and on the other hand weaken the possibility of their being able to carry it out. The Governor General, in the next place, promises a Bill for extending our trade in agricultural products. That promise was, no doubt, put into his mouth for the purpose of catching the agriculturists of this country, with whom hon. gentlemen opposite are very anxious, for the moment, to cultivate the most kindly and considerate relations. I wonder where we are going to be able to find a market to which to export our agricultural products that will be equal to what we could find just across the border if our people were disposed to take advantage of it. But some new scheme must be got up to please the farmers and to capture the rural vote, now that the general elections are at hand; and so the Government put this promise into the mouth of the Governor General in order to show that they are anxious and willing to accomplish something in the interests of the agriculturists of the country. Well, Sir, we shall be glad to see their Bill, and we will give its provisions our best consideration. I am sure we earnestly hope that its provisions will be such as will help that class out of the financial difficulties they are now in, and place them on the high road to prosperity. It is quite evident that the National Policy has failed to do its duty in this respect. The promise of this Bill is a plain admission that while the National Policy was going to accomplish a great deal, especially for the farmers, it has utterly and absolutely failed, for the Bill is presumably not to be along the lines of the National Policy. For my part, if it is such a Bill as will assist the farmers of this country, it shall have my support, I care not who introduces it or whence it originates. My sympathy for that class is such that I am anxious and willing to give every fair and reasonable consideration to a Bill that is likely to accomplish anything to promote their interests. Sir, I am afraid that after all this Bill will not help them out of the financial difficulties they are now suffering from, and put them on the high road of prosperity. A promise was also put into the Governor General's mouth that the equilibrium between income and expenditure is at last to be realized. Well, we have had that promise for years. The Finance Minister years ago, in the course of his Budget speech to this House, declared that the period when Canada had of necessity to borrow money was drawing very rapidly to a close, that the debt of this country had virtually reached the highest point, and he predicted that in the future there was a very strong probability—nay, almost a certainty—that the debt would begin to recede from year to year. We had that promise; it has never been realized. Every year we have been adding to the debt. Hon. gentlemen opposite used to point to the history of the Mackenzie Government as the days of deficits—the dark days when my esteemed friend the hon. member for South Oxford had to come before this House and announce a deficit as the result of each year's operations. But, Sir, during the time of the Mackenzie Government the deficits amounted to something like $4,000,000 altogether, while hon. gentlemen opposite, by their admirable management of the affairs of this Dominion have rolled up in the last four years an aggregate deficit of over sixteen millions.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Eighteen millions.

Mr. McMULLEN. One hon. gentleman says eighteen million dollars and I have no doubt he is correct. Well, the expenditure of the country, in place of decreasing in the face of these deficits, in the fact of the restricted and hampered condition of the people, in the face of the failures that have taken place, in the face of all the evidences of the absence of that measure of prosperity which we would be glad to see prevail from one end of this country to the other, has been largely increasing. But we have another promise. We are to reach the equilibrium this year. The receipts and expenditure this year are about to balance. I shall be glad if that be the result, and I hope that the Finance Minister's prophetic utterances with regard to the days of Canada for borrowing having reached their limit, will be fulfilled before very long. When we come to realize the enormous addition to our debt, the enormous drain upon the resources of the people—a point to which I shall endeavour to give some personal attention when we reach the Budget debate—we must hope earnestly that this period of extravagance will soon end and that a different condition of things will prevail. I was rather amused, and in some measure pleased, to hear my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) rise in his place, and at a very critical moment endeavour to defend the Government. He is always willing, always ready. He appears to be always willing whether he is ready or not, always ready to jump to their support, and I suppose his willingness is largely regulated by the advantages which he enjoys of being kept so comfortably under the wing and protection of the Government opposite. He is grateful for small things, he is grateful for large things—he is grateful anyhow.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. The hon. gentleman says I am kept comfortably by the Government and kept under their shadow and wing. I call on him to explain.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was going on to explain, and I would have satisfied the hon. gentleman if he had only kept his seat. I am sorry that he got disturbed so soon. If he had just quietly kept his seat and cultivated a little silence, he would have learned before long and I would have satisfied him upon that point.

Mr. DAVIN. Satisfy me now.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will draw his attention before doing that—if he will cultivate a little patience—to what his opinions were of the Government a few years ago.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. I will not cultivate patience. The hon. gentleman has made the statement that the Government is supporting me and that I am under its shadow and protection, and he is bound to explain these words.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am going to explain. I stated that the hon. gentleman no doubt was grateful for the kindness and the mercies and the assistance which had been extended him by hon. gentlemen opposite, that he had no doubt lived under the shadow of their wing. I should like to know why he challenges that remark. I think he is certainly a good Tory. I am sure everybody in this House believes he is. He is ready at all times to jump up and defend the party of which, I admit, he is a very shining light.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that all ?

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no doubt he is always ready to defend them. If he is prepared to challenge what I am going to say, he will, when I am through, have the opportunity of doing so, and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will grant him the privilege of entering into an extended explanation. With regard to his opinion of the Government at one time, he said, not many years ago—

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order, Mr. Speaker, and will have your ruling. The hon. gentleman has not used exactly the words he used previously. He has tried to wriggle out of what he said. He speaks now about assistance, and so on. But the language he used implied that I had received some protection or favours personally, either directly or indirectly, from the Government, for which I had reason to be grateful. I say here that a single favour of any kind or assistance of any kind, apparent or real, I have never had from any Government or Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman said that the hon. member for Assiniboia had received favours from the Government in return for which he gave them his support, I think that would be out of order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not say so—not at all. I said that he had a right to be grateful to the Government for kindness. The hon. gentleman says he never received any favours, and I am willing to accept his statement for the moment. I have been,—and I admit it now—misled by the Auditor General's Report. It certainly must be incorrect. The hon. gentleman may be right and the Auditor General may be wrong, and if he chooses to take that position, I am willing, for the moment, to let him out on that ground.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order. That is trifling with this House and with my rights in this House. The hon. gentleman must withdraw his charge.

Mr. McMULLEN. I presume that in the course of the debates which will necessarily take place in this House on the items that will be submitted for the consideration of Parliament, we may have a better and more favourable opportunity for threshing out this little difficulty between my hon. friend from Assiniboia and myself, and I am willing, in the meantime, to free him from any charge of personally having been bribed or bought. I am quite willing to do that, and I hope he will rest quietly in that condition until we reach a more favourable opportunity for discussing the items.

Mr. DAVIN. I still rise to order. I am not going to rest quietly when the hon. gentleman disgraces this House by making the matter worse.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order ; take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman ought not to use an expression of that kind.

Mr. DAVIN. I withdraw the expression, and now I beg to submit and ask that you, Sir, rule the hon. gentleman out of order, and that he went on to aggravate the offence, and has never withdrawn the charge or atoned for the offence he was guilty of. I shall insist on the hon. gentleman putting himself in order with the same readiness that I have shown in submitting to the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I listened, after my attention was called to the observations of the hon. member for Wellington, more carefully. I did not discover that subsequent to the time when my attention was called to his remarks he had made any observations that were contrary to the rules of Parliament. If the hon. gentleman did state, before my attention was called to his observation—and while I was not listening very carefully, I confess, to them—that the hon. member for Assiniboia had been purchased by the Government or has received from the Government any consideration, in return for which he had given them his support, then, as I have ruled already, that would be an improper and unparliamentary expression, and the hon. gentleman should withdraw it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not say so, Mr. Speaker. I would not think for a moment of making even an insinuation of that kind, because I am quite sure that hon. gentlemen opposite, with all the wealth they boast, have not sufficient means to buy my hon. friend. I was going on to point out that certain opinions had been expressed by the hon. member for Assiniboia respecting some of the members of the present Cabinet. At one time, in his sober moments, or non-sober, I do not know which, he declared that they were a Cabinet of antiques. On another occasion he declared that he was not going to peddle brains for the Government. He has very considerably changed his views with regard to the Government since that time. I was pleased indeed to notice that the hon. gentleman had got so completely into line that he was ready to rise and, with his usual eloquence, attempt to protect the undefended heads of the members of the Cabinet from the attack that was made upon them.

I desire to call attention to just one matter more. I refer to an interview that took place between the correspondent of the "Globe" and a very eminent divine, Principal Grant of Queen's College, with regard to the differences that have recently existed and which seem to have been patched up, as the hon. gentlemen are all back in their comfortable quarters again:

Kingston, Jan. 15.—(Special).—A representative of the "Globe" waited on Principal Grant this afternoon to ask an expression of opinion in regard to the Ottawa crisis. He answered that, as the Government is not yet reconstructed, it would be premature to express an opinion on it or its proposed action. "I see in the press," he continued, "that Sir Charles Tupper stated that the Premier told him plainly that he would not have Messrs. Foster, Montague and Haggart again in his Cabinet, and that Sir Charles had replied that, in that event, neither would he accept a position. Is not the question, then, simply this at present: Will Sir Mackenzie stick to his determination or not? I hear that these three Ministers have just been sworn into his Cabinet. I am sorry to hear it, for his sake, for their sakes, and for the sake of public morality and the decencies of public life, which have been violated recently to such an extent that there must be an overpowering feeling of shame, amounting to disgust, in the minds of Canadians, no matter to what party they may belong. The Premier described the seven who deserted him on the ground of his incompetency as a leader, as a nest of traitors, and, according to Sir Charles Tupper, he charged the three of them in particular with a bad pre-eminence in the work of treachery, and now for him to take these back, and for them to go back, gives one a shock of so many volts that it can be described only by the algebra system, X or N. However, Sir Mackenzie has not yet given his explanation, and it is only due to his position and the spirit he has recently manifested to wait for that."

Now, Sir, that is the opinion of a man occupying a very distinguished position in this country. He was also, some years ago, as he declared himself, a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. But he has become so disgusted with the evidence of weakness and treachery and discourtesy among them that he feels called upon to give expression to the opinions I have just quoted. I have no doubt that he voices the vast majority of the citizens of this Dominion, including a great many in the ranks of the Conservatives. I shall not continue further my remarks in connection with the Address. I shall have another opportunity, I presume, of discussing some points that in my opinion, might well have been dealt with. But I shall seek an opportunity at a later stage of the session to point out, where, in my opinion, hon. gentlemen have failed to put in the mouth of the Governor General any announcement with regard to matters that should have been touched upon if we are to deal during this session with the questions of vital interest to the people of Canada.

Mr. WELDON. I shall not follow at very great length the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, but I desire to call attention for a moment or two to some of the points he has made in this afternoon's portion of his speech. He complained of the Conservative party that they discover an exceptional fondness for the farmer in the days just preceding a general election. He did not prove that statement, nor did he give any grounds for it. But I think it is clear that the statement is not very well founded, having regard to the most salient facts of our recent history in connection with this matter. We in the eastern provinces know and appreciate highly the work that has been done by this Administration—largely through the agency of Prof. Robertson, and with, I am glad to say, the hearty co-operation of our local governments—in the way of stimulating dairy farming and the manufacture of dairy products. This has not been going on only for the few months before an election; it has been going on continuously and steadily for a considerable number of years. Our farmers, furthermore, have felt the very great advantage that has come to them through the work of the Experimental Farm. In many ways this has been found to be of great benefit to them, and, year by year, they are learning more generally to watch for the farm bulletins, to follow them carefully. Our intelligent farmers eagerly watch for these bulletins, study them carefully and file them away for reference, showing that they regard as most valuable the expert testimony, and advice they convey. I heartily endorse the cordial words that were spoken yesterday by the gentleman who seconded the Address when he commended in high terms the services rendered by Sir John Carling to the agricultural industry of Canada and which, I think, the farmers are beginning to recognize as of very great and permanent value. But I wish to be a little more plain with the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I wish to know a little more directly what the hon. member's views are on this question of tariff for the farmer. Is the hon. member for North Wellington a free trader in that part of the tariff which touches the farmers? We wish to understand the hon. gentleman. It is but a few weeks before he and I and all the rest of us must face our own constituencies, and I addressing the farmers of Albert shall tell them frankly that I am in favour of the present tariff upon our coarse grains, in favour of the present tariff upon oats and wheat, in favour of the present duty upon horses, in favour of the present duty upon beef, in favour of the present duty upon pork, in favour of the present duty upon butter and other agricultural products. Is the hon. member opposed to it, and if he had his way, and if he can only influence his financial leader, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), will he bring it about that the duty on farm products shall be struck off and that there should be free trade in those articles? I think that is a fair question. I pause for a reply. The hon. gentleman will not answer.

I think we have a right to have an understanding, as I shall take occasion to put this question as plainly as I can before the farmers of my own constituency and point out to them that the hon. gentlemen opposite will not deal with us fairly and openly in this House in this matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. I say to the hon. gentleman that the debate on the Budget will be the proper time to discuss this question, and I will answer him then.

Mr. WELDON. I accept the hon. gentleman's answer, which I think is a fair enough answer. On the question of the Mounted Police we have the opinion of the hon. member for North Wellington; we also had the much wider opinion and more carefully considered opinion, and to my mind an opinion more to be regarded, that of his leader, and I put the opinion of the leader of that party against his opinion. I heartily commend the patriotism, sagacity, fairness of the utterances that were given by the leader of the Opposition yesterday in respect to the Mounted Police. I know little of them, we live so far away in the east that we know little of that force, though many of us have warm and intimate friends in the North-west, and when these friends come east to see us and write letters to us, they speak almost precisely in the line the leader of the Opposition spoke yesterday. I heartily agree with what the hon. member himself said with reference to the militia, and I endorse his view. I think those views are shared by every member of this House, and it does seem to speak well for the credit of Canada that her press and her public men without exception have spoken with such prudence, with such courage, with such firmness, with such notable moderation on the question of defence. Mr. Speaker, as to remedial legislation, now is not the time for me to deal with that question.

Mr. FORBES. Oh, oh.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. member laughs. Everything in its place. The hon. member for Queen's heard me speak last year, and I have nothing to alter in the statements I then made in the House and in the former and more elaborate statement I made; though as I pass from the subject I shall only express the hope that when this matter comes up for discussion during the approaching weeks of this session the House will preserve the same excellent temper, the same calmness, the same capacity for reasoning quietly that it showed last session. That certainly will be a good example for the country. But I must say to the Administration and their friends who have entered upon this policy, and I must point out what was pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for South Oxford, that their difficulties are deepening by reason of this consideration. This Parliament is six years old, we who sit here were chosen by people whose names were put on the list eight or nine years ago, and so far as I know, we came from the eastern provinces without any mandate from the people with regard to this question. I never heard the question discussed in Albert County, I never heard it mentioned by the candidates on either side. We knew of no such question; therefore, if it be a question of much magnitude I must, among other things, shelter myself behind the constitutional defence, that I have no mandate from the people of Albert to speak for them in this regard. My view of the law, and which I expressed with much modesty, is that action once taken by this Parliament is unalterable by this Parliament. You see, therefore, how much stronger is the view I take of the position in this regard, and how much deeper are the difficulties of the Government in forcing this measure through, even in the view of many who are in favour of separate schools.

The hon. member for North Wellington said that the National Policy had failed to do its duty. I cannot share that view; I differ in toto from that view. I do not worship the National Policy as a fetish. Like many other of the younger members of this House I was trained in the old school of free trade, brought up on Adam Smith and Ricardo, on Henry Fawcett, on Stuart Mill and the rest of them. It was with singular pleasure that I read three or four weeks ago in the weekly edition of the London "Times" a notice by an old friend of Mill of a fact which I had never seen before, and which confirmed the truth of that famous saying of his so much in controversy between his admirers who are protectionists and the orthodox free traders, as to the advantages and necessity of a protective tariff in a new country. It was stated in the London "Times" of about 11th December in an extract from Mills private correspondence that he had expressed in private conversation to his friends that view much more strongly, and that he could easily understand how, if he had been in the United States he would have been a protectionist. But, Sir, we have seen Canada and her course and her success in the last three or four years, we have seen the country beside us and her course and her success in the last years. Do we not know what has been said with so much power and very frequently in this House within two years that the National Policy did act as a bulwark to break the force of that storm blowing upon us from the south, and did give us a degree of protection, a degree of safety that we could not have enjoyed under a low tariff. Of course I do not conceal that we owe something to our sound currency on a gold basis; I do not conceal that we owe something to our excellent banking system with a perfect secure circulation, with a very elastic currency; but mainly do I attribute our exceptional immunity from the world-wide storm to the industrial protection of this tariff wall that was thrown up on our southern border. On the question of the debt it was true that within the last year or two we have struck down the sugar duties, and if we had left them on and if we had left the sugar duty where it was two or three years ago, for the last three years we would have had no deficit. The thing has given us no anxiety and has not in any way influenced our credit in London, and all these cries of alarm are, in my opinion, not much better than clap-trap.

I now turn away from the hon. member for North Wellington. He will not think me lacking in courtesy if I now turn to the financial leader, the stronger parliamentarian, the hon. member for South Oxford—though I by no means underrate the experience or strength of the hon. member for North Wellington. I have sat too long in this Chamber and followed him too closely to undertake to minimize or underrate or depreciate his very great services and his very great industry and his parliamentary ability. I would not have spoken in this debate had it not been for the shocking misstatement that drew me to my feet last night to interrupt the hon. member for South Oxford. I do not believe the hon. member has many gentlemen in this House who are more cordial admirers of him, his courage, his ability, his extraordinary gifts of speech with its wealth of literary allusion, with its parliamentary strength and dignity, than myself. That I am free to say. But when I heard him make these old-time charges to the discredit of this Government and to the discredit of the National Policy, taking four years before the National Policy began, for the first term of his comparison, I thought it was a trick of a political—I am not allowed by the rules of Parliament to use the proper word to characterize his device. And this is not the first time he has committed that offence. You will pardon me for reminding the House that you yourself a year or two before you were taken from the storms of this floor to the dignity of that Chair, that you yourself in an unanswerable argument met that very misstatement and battered it to pieces. I will borrow the quotation used by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills):

“Time was, the brains were out, the man would die.”

The brains are out of the wretched comparison that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has made for five or six years past between what happened in 1874 and the current year. We care nothing about what happened in 1874, when we are testing the effect of the National Policy as regards the decrease or increase in English trade. The National Policy did not begin in 1874. To institute such a comparison is a disreputable fallacy, unworthy of a man of the high learning and strength in this House possessed by that hon. gentleman. It is absurd to take 1874 for the purpose of any such comparison. Who was in power then? Why, the hon. gentleman was, and the next year he was, and the next year, and still the following year. The first year with which a comparison could be made, if you wish to test the effect of the National Policy upon our trade with England, is 1879. That is a fair year with which to commence. And I have the figures here in my hands. Between 1879 and the year 1894 the total trade, exports and imports, between Canada and Great Britain, increased at a much more rapid rate than the population. In 1879 our total trade with England was $67,000,000 in round figures; last year, according to these returns, it was $107,000,000. That return is for 1894.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I gave the figures for the following year, the value of volume of the trade for 1895.

Mr. WELDON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will give me the book from which he read.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly I will.

Mr. WELDON. I will then correct my figures, because I was unable to get that return.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The volume of trade, $92,900,000.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman would not read the figures for 1879 to me when I asked for them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have nothing to do with 1879.

Mr. WELDON. I have been fairer than was the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Read them now.

Mr. WELDON. The figures I have for 1879 show the total import and exports between Canada and Great Britain as $67,250,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The year of the very great depression.

Mr. WELDON. In 1894 the trade aggregated $107,250,000 in round figures, or a clear increase of $40,000,000. Our population is not growing so rapidly as that. I therefore say the hon. gentleman's statement is a fallacy—a falsehood I will not call it, but I would so call it on the stump, for I like to call a spade a spade. I do not know a more immoral act than to make a comparison that is deliberately false. It is the trick of a cheap, two-penny-half-penny petty advocate. On the stump I would treat such a man with contempt and refuse seriously to argue with him—I would not do him the courtesy to argue with him.

Mr. CASEY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will read the figures for 1895.

Mr. WELDON. I am astonished that a man of the parliamentary experience, general intelligence—I will not say fairness, but observing usual regard for the decencies of debate—of the hon. member for South Oxford, after the matter had been fully explained on several occasions, should continue to repeat the same disreputable and discreditable fallacy. There was an enormous decline in trade after 1874, I grant you. It fell from $112,000,000 to $67,000,000. Who were the Ministers at that time? The Premier was Mr. Mackenzie; Sir Richard Cartwright was Finance Minister. I do not undertake to say that the decline from $107,000,000 to $67,000,000 was entirely the fault of the hon. gentleman opposite. I do not think so. I have already stated, and I am fair enough to say that the years between 1874 and 1879 were years of phenomenal depression of trade, when the volume declined and the prices went down, as the hon. gentleman has explained. I am not unfair enough to attribute the large decline entirely to him; but in some degree it was owing to an absolute lack of faith in themselves, owing to a political atheism, and an absolute lack of capacity, their actions tended to intensify it. It was Sir John Macdonald with his sagacity, it was Sir Charles Tupper with his Titanic energy, and I would not forget a representative from the Eastern Townships, Hon. Mr. Colby, who made a magnificent presentation of the case of this protective tariff; these were the men who brought hope and heart to the great mass of the people, brought in a protective policy, and put an end to that condition of affairs.

The second statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) I cannot characterize in the same strong terms, because it requires to be dealt with in a more temperate manner.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have been trying to follow the hon. gentleman's argument, and, although I can generally do so, I fail to comprehend it at the present time. Does the hon. gentleman intend the House to understand that the decrease in exports from 1873-74 to 1879 was caused by the then existing tariff or was attributable in any sense to it?

Mr. WELDON. I have already answered that point. I said that the depression which struck Canada was part of a world-wide depression, but in their later years, whatever power remained in the Government, they failed to exercise it, for they had lost all faith in themselves. The hon. member for South Oxford addressed to the House a second argument, of which I am not speaking too strongly when I say that it was not a candid argument, namely, that the tariff operated against Great Britain. I have heard that argument on hundreds of platforms, I have read it in hundreds of newspapers, and

Mr. WELDON.

I have heard it twenty times in this House. Let us look at the facts of the case and see how far and in what sense that statement is true. The hon. gentleman has the rough-and-ready method of the schoolboy in making calculations. He takes up the trade returns, and he finds, as any of us will find, in looking over them, that we bought from England last year goods to the value of about $39,000,000, that we bought goods from the United States to the value of $53,000,000 odd, and then he says the duty we paid on the American goods was so many millions, and the duty levied on the English goods was so many millions. He then divided the duty by the value. It is a clumsy method.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a mighty awkward one for you to meet on the stump.

Mr. WELDON. Let the hon. gentleman call it what he pleases, but I will show it is a trick. He is merely attacking that feature of the National Policy which says that raw materials and food products are to be free.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I was answering a fool according to his folly.

Mr. WELDON. It will be exposed, before I have done, to a degree which the hon. gentleman himself will not enjoy. It is true that we bought from England in 1894 goods to the value of $39,000,000. It is true also that we bought in that year from the United States goods to the value of $53,000,000. But let us see what kinds of goods they were. These imports included about six and a half millions of anthracite coal, almost three millions worth of raw cotton, two and a quarter millions worth of bullion and coin, two and two-third millions in value of settlers' effects; I point to that item with a special emphasis, as showing that some people are coming back to Canada from the United States. Then, there were one and two-thirds million in value of hides, one and two-thirds million value in tobacco, considerably more than half a million in value of raw wool, about two hundred thousand dollars in value of raw silk, rather more than a million dollars worth of rubber, gutta percha and unmanufactured goods; under the heading of fruit, there were bananas to the value of $471,000, and there was lumber, largely Georgia pine, to the value of $1,200,000. These are the items, with some minor ones, which aggregate $23,500,000. Let the hon. gentleman subtract $23,500,000 from $53,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not at all.

Mr. WELDON. Then he will find the goods dutiable, and he may divide the duty by that figure. Let the hon. gentleman make the same correction in regard to English trade.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman want to know what I was trying to establish ?

Mr. WELDON. I know perfectly well. The hon. member was trying to create the impression upon the electorate. He knew he could not befool the House, but he was trying to befool the electorate by saying that the tariff was levelled against English manufacturers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As every protective tariff must be.

Mr. WELDON. We know better. I have here a list of goods that we import from England, such as furs, hides, wool, soda, jute, and the coarser forms of metals, and so on, which aggregate $9,000,000. A fair comparison is to subtract from the English imports $9,000,000, and from the American imports, $23,500,000, and then reckon the ad valorem duties.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not at all.

Mr. WELDON. Yes. If you do that you will find there is not very much difference. The reason a tariff on the ad valorem basis does show a little heavier against England than against the United States, is because the bulk of English imports are more highly manufactured. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has some regard for the intelligence of the House. Will he not show some little regard for the great democracy, his masters in this House, and forbear to impose on us, and through us, on them, any more of such unadulterated rubbish. Now, Mr. Speaker, for a plain word or two. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) used an expression which, as we all quickly saw, caused unspeakable pain to the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden) behind him, when he referred to the character of Nova Scotia's public men. He called them a rascally pack of boodlers. I have heard the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) speak at Halifax long ago, when he went to the drill shed in that city with Mr. Mackenzie. He has not been long enough in Nova Scotia to understand Nova Scotia, and her people, and he will not establish any entente cordiale with that province by the use of such ill-considered language. Nova Scotia has her faults, but she has one enormous vanity. That little peninsula, walled in from the sea by its iron-bound rocks all along the coast, has been proud of one thing. It is a small province, it has not many people, but it has been singularly proud of its public men. It has a suspicion which it never whispers—and I think I am the first Nova Scotian who ever, in this House, whispered it in the capital of the Dominion—that no province with double the population has ever had a group of public men of such singular ability, such remarkable probity, and such genuine devotion to the public service. And, when I heard the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) speak of this pack of boodlers, my memory brought me back to days of which I know better than he. I bethought myself of the Nova Scotians that were held in honour. I speak of our statesmen dead; I will not speak of the living. Was Herbert Huntington, of Yarmouth, a boodler? He has a name of honour in Nova Scotia. Was James Boyle Uniacke a boodler? That is a name of honour in Nova Scotia. Was Robert John Uniacke a boodler? That is a name of honour in Nova Scotia. Were the Stewarts, James and Andrew, boodlers? They are names of power and honour in Nova Scotia, although the Stewarts are long dead. Was Lawrence O'Connor Doyle a boodler? He was a man who, in many respects, reminds us of our friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). Lawrence O'Connor Doyle, that witty Irishman, did he ever dream that he could be called a boodler? Was John Young a boodler, or were his distinguished sons? Did any foe in the bitterest and hottest fight in Nova Scotia ever charge John, George or William Young that he was a boodler. Take James W. Johnston, a man who had, perhaps, as strong an intellect as any I have named, and a man of unimpeachable character, beginning life poor, giving magnificent abilities and life to the public service of Nova Scotia, and dying beloved by the people of Nova Scotia: was he a boodler? Was any man ever foolish enough to charge that that man who is enshrined in the hearts of the people of Nova Scotia was a boodler? Sir, I come to the last, and, perhaps, the greatest of them all, Joseph Howe, for whom we are now striving to erect a monument by the provincial building of Halifax. "Old Joe Howe," as the people affectionately call him, whom they loved with an affection still strong, although he is now twenty-two years dead, whom they love with an affection such as boys have for their own father. Was Joseph Howe a boodler? No man in the province, taking him all in all, had the abilities he had. Nay, I will go further, and I will risk my reputation for historic perspective by saying that no man born in British North America, and no man born abroad, who has served the Queen in North America, taking him all in all, his gifts of mind, his nobleness of character, his large aims, his remarkable gifts of eloquence, his permanent achievements for the colonies, and the Empire, not one of them was the equal of Joseph Howe. Who ever dreamed of calling Joseph Howe a boodler? Money, he never cared for. These are the names—I am speaking of the dead—these are the names which the people of Nova Scotia have put in the niches in our temple of fame. These are the names of the men we honour. I agree with the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in the magnificent statement he made, that not all the sermons in your pulpits, not all the lectures of your university professors, not all the teachings of your schoolmasters, not all the writings in your press can undo the immorality of putting in a position of power and preferment, an unworthy public man. I agree with that statement. He touched my heart when he made it, and it is in the spirit of that statement that I refer to these able, unselfish, blameless public men, whom Nova Scotia has given to Canada. I should have remembered the Archibalds, the old Master of the Rolls, D. T. W. Archibald, and he who died only a few years ago. I need not speak of one who recently passed from our midst. Were the Archibalds and John Thompson boodlers? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) knew Sir John Thompson, and I need not tell him now how unfortunate was his remark. He (Sir Richard Cartwright) does not know how deeply he wounded the hearts of many men in this House. I am not a Nova Scotia boy, I am a New Brunswicker, born in New Brunswick, but the last half of my life I have lived in Nova Scotia, and I can tell my hon. friend that we are an extremely sensitive people there. We are proud of our public men. No other province in Canada is so proud of her public men as we are, and we are especially proud of their high character. The remarks of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) were unfortunate. I leave it at this.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with reference to one or two questions of the hour. My friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) last night, in a kindly reference to me, took my own mind back to a discussion in this House some four or five years ago. And when I mention the name of the Minister of Justice, I may say that one of the happy results, that gave pleasure to many members of this House as coming from that embroglio which gave us all pain, was the preferment of my old friend the Minister of Justice. When he made reference to myself and to my advocacy in this House some years ago, of the idea that the Empire should strive to develop and perfect trade relations within our own colonies, and make herself independent of food supplies from foreign powers, who might be hostile powers, it brought me back to a canvass made by myself in this House, and in the country and with much greater ability by others in a good many counties in Canada. As the hon. gentleman said, then it was a cloud the size of a man's hand. We thought then that we saw that the one danger that in times of war threatened that magnificent Imperial power, centred in the British Isles, was that our people were not quite sure of their food supply. We saw that they were buying more than two-thirds of their wheat from abroad, and not raising quite one-third at home. Once again, we see this question coming to the front, and I hope, Sir, that those remarks cabled yesterday from London are the expression of a deep movement that is on foot, and that the Imperial authorities will answer back the call which went from this Parliament in 1892. I must refer to the efforts, in this connection, of my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), who has advocated it, in season and out of season, with a fixity of purpose and with a devotion to Imperial interests, and with that strength of Imperial feeling that he has shown in this House and out of it, in this country, or in the British isles. I do not forget the magnificent advocacy of the Imperial idea made by the hon. gentleman in the towns of little England, three summers ago. I had the opportunity of reading in the English papers powerful editorials endorsing his position, and seeing the full report of his speeches in town after town, and before board of trade after board of trade. It is only fair to give honour to whom honour is due, and had the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) known what I know, when he spoke he would have mentioned, not my name, but the name of that distinguished member (Mr. McNeill) in this connection. To that hon. gentleman I looked eight years ago as my master in this matter. It was he who first put in my hands the documents—the famous Hofmeyer scheme—the scheme of that distinguished statesman from South Africa who honoured Ottawa by his presence last summer; and it is with great pleasure that I see that sound Imperial idea, which, if it ever bears fruit, promises much for the development of Canada, taking this step in advance. The growl of menace which was uttered the other day by the German Kaiser, and the attitude of defiance by England assumed in face of all the possible complications that might follow, accentuated the danger of the mother country depending upon foreign nations for her food supply. It may be hoped that hereafter English statesmen will see, what colonial statesmen saw long ago, that there must come from this prolific English race which breeds so fast in the British islands, an overflow into our own colonies—Canada, Australia and South Africa. If we can hold that overflow, which has gone to other countries in the past, how soon will the prairies of Canada, the fertile lands of South Africa, and the plains of Australia, be filled with a teeming people. Therefore I hope—if this Government be reconstructed, as I am sure it must radically be if it is to go to the country with any hope of success—that the best capable man will be placed at the head of the Department of the Interior, in order to join hands with the Imperial authorities, with the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the Grand Trunk Railway, with all the steamship lines—the Allan Line, the Dominion Line, the Beaver Line, and all the other lines carrying people to this country—to make a heroic and magnificent effort to direct the overflow of the people of the British islands—such as are fit for farming life and will stay on the farm—to make a strong and heroic effort to settle our prairie country;—not so rapidly as to cause congestion, but as rapidly as possible; taking care that when they go to the prairie they will remain; and thus bring about a swift and healthy development of our western territories. That is a part of the scheme to which I look with great interest as being of immense value to Canada.

We had, Mr. Speaker, one remarkable—what shall I say?—statement, confession, declaration, by the hon. member for South Oxford. He told us last night that he was a great-grandson of a United Empire loyalist. Why, in the name of conscience, did a gentleman of his pride make such a declaration? Why does he come retailing his pedigree in this Chamber? A gentleman of his pride, why does he deem it necessary to accredit his loyalty by a communication so unheard-of and unprecedented? I leave him to answer. It excited in my mind a strong suspicion that he was like the soldier in the play whom the old Welsh doctor caught hugging the servant girl in the cupboard. The soldier comes out and says: "I am an honest man." "Yes," says the Welsh doctor, "but what is an honest man doing in my closet?" Well, I say, what was that descendant of a United Empire loyalist doing in Boston—he and Erastus Wiman, as thick as two thieves? What was he doing in the company of that crew of the Glens and the Farrers, whom the Toronto "Globe" found it necessary some years ago to drum out of Canada, and who has gone to his proper home—

Some hon. MEMBERS. To the "Mail."

Mr. WELDON. He has gone to make his home in New York, has he not?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, he is in Toronto.

Mr. WELDON. Is Farrer on the "Mail"? My information is that he is on the New York "Sun" with Mr. Dana, the most inveterate enemy of England on the North American continent. I am not speaking of the dead; it is not necessary to speak of them. But where to-day are the Farrers, the Glens, the Wimans? Where is Congressman Hitt? In these days we hear no more of him. I was about to point to the series of dramatic performances between the hon. member for South Oxford and Congressman Hitt in 1890. They were like two ships signalling to each other at sea. Congressman Hitt would spring a motion in Congress on Monday, and Sir Richard would answer by another here on Wednesday; and so these two adroit statesmen were constantly signalling to each other, from Washington to Ottawa and from Ottawa to Washington—a motion here, an answer there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELDON. I think the hon. gentleman must see arising these phantoms of the Farrers, the Wimans and the Hitts marching before his vision in procession like the ghost at the banquet in Macbeth. The hon. member for South Oxford for the moment forgot his prime duty to his Queen and his country so far as to allow himself to be spoken of as a prospective Senator from Ontario. The hon. gentleman knows his Shakespeare very well. I wonder if he heard then the witches calling: Hail, thane of Cawdor! Hail, Glamis! By the good-will of the Canadian electorate he is a member of Parliament; by the favour of our good Queen he is a Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George; but Senator from Ontario, please God, he shall never be. Glamis thou art, and Cawdor; but king thou shalt not be. He told us last night of his statesmanlike views. He referred to a conversation with Lord Carnarvon twenty-one years ago. I do not think nobler words or more fit could have come from a public man. But I remember also that my hon. leader performed deeds when the hon. gentleman uttered words. In that great crisis between the North and South, when the conduct of England, especially in letting the "Alabama" slip from her ways, gave so much offence to the North, I remember that while the North complained, and had reason to complain, of the breach of neutral duty on the part of England, our old leader—Sir John Macdonald—who was acquainted with international law as well as with everything else necessary to the successful conduct of public life in Canada—kept a firm hand on the rudder of the ship of state, and maintained Canada faithful to the duties of neutrality—so much so that the United States Secretary of State, William H. Seward, said that he would to God that England had acted as well as Canada had done. I put the wise deeds of our old leader against the wise words of this leader, and I am willing that the country should judge between them. But I admit that the words of the hon. gentleman are the words of a statesman; I do not think that he could have uttered any sounder or wiser words. And in my own province of New Brunswick, it is true, too, that the Administration of that day, under Sir Leonard Tilley, was well advised in its international law and did take care to observe strict neutrality and to follow strictly the rules of international law, as between the North and the South, even after the belligerency of the Southern States had been recognized by the powers of Europe. So that the Liberal-Conservative party is not open to the taunt contained in the innuendo of the hon. gentleman that we Liberal-Conservatives are not sisterly, that we are unneighbourly and forgetful of the debt we owe to the Empire in the way of keeping peace between her daughter here still under the old roof-tree and that other daughter who is house-keeping for herself. I think he is the best friend of Canada and of the United States and of England who pursues the policy outlined in that conversation with Lord Carnarvon in 1874. There is a book written by a young and gifted public man in Toronto, called the "New Empire," which gives the very fullest expression to that idea, an idea I heartily share. There is no duty which should be more carefully regarded by every member of this House than that of avoiding words of taunt or insult or reproach to that proud, irritable people to the south. Especially in these dark days, threatening to the old Empire across the sea, it is still more incumbent on us to do all in our power to avoid exciting the slightest hostile irritation. If by outspokenness we can promote a better feeling, let us be outspoken; if reticence will do it, better let us be silent or reticent, all the while doing in our judgment what is the best, taking care to do nothing to provoke or offend so that England may not have this enemy in her rear, should the day come, which may come shortly, when she will have to fight and grapple with her great rivals in the old world. It seems that these nations are possessed to-day by a spirit of envy at her success. It seems as if old England which, since the treaty of Utrecht, some two hundred years ago, has had the supremacy of the world, will have to fight for that supremacy once more as she has twice before fought for it. She fought for it in the Marlborough campaigns and won; she fought again in the Napoleon wars, that desperate fight, and again won. And it looks to-day—I hope I am reading the signs wrong—as if once again she would have to repeat the struggle. All the fertile, unsettled parts of the earth are under the English flag. There are no fertile lands of any considerable extent unsettled under any other flag except the northern part of Russia in Asia. All the rest are under the English flag; and if we have but thirty or forty years of peace, Canada, Australia, South Africa will be filled up; and with these places filled up with powerful nations, she could pursue her policy of peace and defy the whole world. We only pray God, that she may have peace, and have that growth of population in her Empire which her destiny requires, and realize that beautiful prayer of the noblest of Englishmen in the seventeenth century, which may not irreverently be repeated in this House:

Oh Thou, who by thy free Spirit didst build up the Britannic Empire to its present glorious and enviable height, with all her daughter lands about her, stay us in this felicity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to have a few words of personal explanation.

Mr. WELDON.

Mr. LANGELIER moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to say a word to my hon. friend (Mr. Weldon) whose susceptibilities were touched by my innocent reference to Nova Scotia as a nurse of lions. Possibly there was a little envy on his part that I had not referred to the sister province of New Brunswick which he represents, and by-the-by it was rather a curious circumstance that among the galaxy of talent so free from boodling in Nova Scotia I did not hear him mention the name of the illustrious baronet to whom I had reference. Possibly that was an omission on his part which he may supply later. Now, Sir, with respect to what I did at Washington, Boston and New York, I ask the hon. gentleman to read what I said there. Every word I stand to. Every word I am prepared to repeat here or elsewhere—in England, Canada or the United States. Every word that I said to the Chamber of Trade of New York, every word that I said to the Chamber of Transportation at Boston, every word I said to Senator Sherman, Senator Carlisle and Mr. Blaine, I am ready to repeat here, and I defy any one to find fault with it, who will repeat truly and honestly what I said. I want to call the attention of the House to what I did say about Nova Scotia. I never have denied that that little province by the sea has produced many eminent men. I said that she has, and said so often, and among those men whom the hon. gentleman has enumerated are men I respect and admire. But I said likewise that it produced about the most extravagant type of boodlers this country has ever seen, and I gave illustrations. I am going to quote from a distinguished Nova Scotian, erstwhile Minister of Finance in this House, erstwhile colleague of the Minister of Justice, erstwhile colleague of Sir Charles Tupper, who is not yet a member of this House. I am going to quote what he said, and when I have done, I will ask the hon. gentleman and the House what Nova Scotia thought of each other and the type of boodlers they produced before they became a part of the Dominion. What Mr. McLellan had to say was this:

But the picture, dark as it is, has something blacker still. I see there, standing in the background, the Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia privately handing over to this same engineer a contract for the whole work.

I believe the Provincial Secretary for Nova Scotia bore the honoured name of Charles Tupper.

I see him shrouded in darkness and bearing it for months in the grave of secrecy. Another provincial secretary comes forward and tells us it was so hidden to serve the public interest; to enable Sandford Fleming, after he had taken the contract, to make better terms with the old contractors, to grind a few more dollars out of them. Public interests, indeed! Mr. Sandford Fleming's interest alone. Sir, I know not what term to apply to such conduct in a government. I know not what to call it—I shall not venture an opinion; but in private life it is called extorting money under false pretenses, and our laws make it indictable knavery.

They have heard of men riding in public conveyances with a loose mantle about them and a pair of false hands folded in front to lull suspicion, while the real hands were finding their way into their fellow travellers' pockets, and they now think that when the hon. gentleman—

Mind, this was the Provincial Secretary, whose name was Charles Tupper—perhaps no relative whatever—

—when the hon. gentleman put on the mantle of Herbert Huntington and the old Reformers, the hands he put to the plough were not real—that the real hands were hidden, that they might the better get deep to the arm-pits in the public chest, and they wait, they long, for the opportunity to sweep him from his position. Therefore, Sir, there was no necessity to bring this case here to excite public opinion. But, Mr. Speaker, if, having brought it here for investigation in the discharge of a public duty, what if the people should, on examination of it, decide that the public interests have been bartered away and betrayed—that the man whom they once believed in as the apostle of retrenchment has become the great high priest of jobbery and corruption? Who then shall restrain limits to their just indignation, as they take him, loaded down though he may be with the share of the offerings that fall to the priest, and impale him upon the horns of the altar at which he ministers?

That was the opinion of Mr. McLelan, former Minister of Finance in the Government which these hon. gentlemen supported and of which they were colleagues. I called the attention of Mr. McLelan to the statement he had made relative to Sir Charles Tupper, and I wanted to know then whether he had repented or whether Sir Charles Tupper had repented, and Mr. McLelan took exceeding good care not to deny or withdraw a single solitary word, so that if charges of boodling had been made against prominent Nova Scotians, they were not made by me in the first instance, but by a gentleman who was highly honoured by hon. gentlemen opposite, and who died, I think, a Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia. Now, I do not intend to prolong this discussion further than this. I say that I never impugned the honour of the people of Nova Scotia nor the honour of the public men of Nova Scotia. What I said was this, that while Nova Scotia has produced many eminent men, it has likewise produced a type of the most discreditable boodlers that Canada has ever known. As to the argument—if I can call it so—of the hon. gentleman, I leave that in the hands of my friends who are well able to reply. If the hon. gentleman wants further information of what Nova Scotians think of the gentleman I have alluded to, let him peruse the "Hansard" of 1878. Let him read the speech of one Alfred Gilpin Jones, former member for Halifax, and I think he will get all the information he wants as to the capacity of Nova Scotia to produce boodlers of the highest order and most pronounced type.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I intend to adhere to the principle which I long ago laid down, of refraining from discussing a subject which it would be delicate for me to discuss. But it is impossible for me to-day to remain absolutely silent while the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) hastens with his usual delight, to offend the most delicate feelings that a brother member can possess. The hon. gentleman, in referring to an extract from a speech of Mr. McLelan, has not, it is significant for me to observe, had the manliness or the honour to refer to Mr. McLelan's explanation and apology for these utterances—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He made no apology.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER—made in this House. I pass by this incident by simply stating that nearly all of the prominent public men to whom so eloquent and just reference was made to-day by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) died the political and personal friends of Sir Charles Tupper, though they had opposed him, and hotly opposed him, for years. But, if the hon. gentleman desires that family records shall be exposed in this Chamber, I will give him something to study while this debate proceeds. He has referred to heated references to Sir Charles Tupper made by his political opponents. I will refer to the archives of Canada as they relate the experiences of a certain gentleman who, we are informed, and I believe was the grandfather of the hon. member for South Oxford. Who was this grandfather and what did he do politically? I know nothing about him except for the few references to him that are on record. I find, for instance, that

A warrant was sent in 1778 by J. Van Rensselaer, Isaac de Fonda, and M. Visscher, commissioners appointed for detecting and defeating all conspiracies in this State (New York) against the liberties of America. All persons described of as neutral and equivocal characters, are to be removed within the enemy's lines. John Stevenson, Richard Cartwright, John Van Allen, and Isaac Mann, are, in accordance with the Act, to be arrested for refusal and to be sent into the enemy's lines.

I would not be very proud of a United Empire Loyalist if he became one of these Loyalists only because at a trying time of his country he was of "neutral and equivocal character." The unfortunate gentleman came to Canada perforce, but he obtained a record which I think his grandson has fully justified in his own lifetime as applicable to him. Continuing this interesting family history, I find that on the 10th September, 1793, Governor Simcoe wrote to Mr. Dundas:

Mr. Hamilton is an avowed republican in his sentiments, and though the merchants are justly obnoxious to the settlers of this province, and he is particularly so, yet the ascendancy he and his friend Mr. Cartwright must acquire by being agents for the contract which supplies the King's troops with provisions, is of that nature that there is nothing to prevent them from exercising it to the detriment of Government, if they have any particular object to promote that may gratify their avarice, ambition or vanity.

On the 16th March, 1794, Mr. Dundas wrote to Governor Simcoe :

The conduct of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Cartwright appears to be such as to by no means entitle them to the favour or attention of His Majesty's Government. Nothing is more destructive, both in example and in effect than that influence flowing from the executive authority should be excited against that authority.

On the 23rd December, 1794, Governor Simcoe writes :

I conceive Mr. Cartwright's opposition to have been principally directed to the establishment of a court of justice, which deprived him of the seat of judge, a station of some trifling emolument, but of greater power and to display his own talents, which are respectable.

And, in that particular, I will be fair enough to say that there is a remarkable resemblance between the grandson and the grandfather.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I be permitted—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would you like another adjournment of the debate ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, but may I be permitted to state that in 1778, the time referred to, my grandfather was serving in Butler's corps at the risk of his life, being then of the age of 18 years. If at 18 years he was important enough to be specially singled out, it must be pretty clear that he had made himself tolerably effective under the officer whom he served. In 1793 and 1794, to which years the hon. gentleman has made allusion, my grandfather was a member of the Legislative Council of the province of Ontario, and was leading the Opposition to a very unjust Governor.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I wish to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I wish to say nothing more than this—that the hon. gentleman has proved exactly what I would like to say, and that is that charges were made against both our relatives which they could probably refute if they were here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. KENNY. I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that the insulting reference which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Cartwright) made on Wednesday last to the province from which I come, will be accepted by the House as my excuse for taking part in this very unexpected debate. It is well within the recollection of the members of this Parliament that the hon. member for South Oxford has seized upon every possible occasion to offer insult and contumely to the maritime provinces generally, especially to the province of Nova Scotia, and more particularly to the representatives of that province in this chamber. The studied insult which the hon. gentleman has heaped upon the representatives of those provinces, and the unprovoked manner in which he has gone out of his way to speak disparagingly of those who represent the maritime provinces here is a matter of notoriety in this assembly, and must be my excuse for taking up the time of the House this afternoon. The hon. gentleman stated, referring to the province of Nova Scotia, that it was the "arida nutrix leonum," or, to give his own free translation, it was the dry nurse and the wet nurse too of the most highly developed type of boodlers this country has ever known. These are the words that appear in "Hansard," and they are words that will live in the memory of the people of Nova Scotia as long as the hon. gentleman remains a member of this House. But, Sir, this is not the first occasion on which that gentleman sought an occasion to insult the people of the province of Nova Scotia. Some years ago he told this House, and it is recorded on the pages of "Hansard," that the people of Nova Scotia were so corrupt that they offered to sell themselves to Mr. Blake for railway subsidies; but Mr. Blake was too honest to buy them. Now, Sir, the circumstances under which that statement was made will be within the recollection of many hon. gentlemen. It was not made in the heat of debate, it was not provoked by any discussion, it was said almost in a conversational tone across the floor of this House. Subsequently, after the election of 1891, that gentleman again, not on the floor of Parliament, it is true, but in the quiet of his own study, humiliated as he was at the defeat of his party, at the failure of the disloyal policy which he had been advocating for four years in Canada—the policy of commercial union, of continental union, of unrestricted reciprocity, or whatever he chose to call it—when he was smarting under that defeat, and the rebuff which was given him by the people of the maritime provinces, and Manitoba and the Northwest Territories and British Columbia—then, Sir, in the calm of his own study, he wrote that the majority which the Liberal-Conservatives held in this chamber was a majority from the shreds and patches of the Dominion, that the men who represented it came here to boodle for themselves or their constituents, Sir, the men from the province of Nova Scotia who sit behind the hon. gentleman, and for whom

I have a personal regard and respect, in their own homes in their own province, will not stand up and say that man for man they pose as being any better than the men who represent here the Conservative party of that province. I am quite sure there is not a man amongst them who did not feel that all Nova Scotia was insulted when that offensive statement was made. Sir, my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), with his usual eloquence and his usual force of language, has spoken of the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford at the famous banquet in the city of Boston, and that hon. member tells us again that he abides by that statement, that he is proud of it, and that such are now his sentiments. I desire to say to hon. gentlemen opposite who come from the province of Nova Scotia that I believe that the language which the hon. member for South Oxford has applied to the people of the maritime provinces and to the people of the smaller provinces of the Dominion, was as objectionable to them as to the hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the House. I come to what was said by the hon. gentleman in the city of Boston. On that occasion the hon. gentleman was advocating in the Dominion of Canada, the commercial union of Canada and the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Mr. KENNY. He was advocating continental free trade.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Mr. KENNY. He was advocating unrestricted reciprocity—in fact, he did not understand what he was advocating; and it was so impossible for him to make his policy known to the men who occupied seats in this assembly, that when he was asked here, in this British legislature for an explanation of his policy, he referred us to a measure that was introduced by Mr. Hitt in a foreign legislature—the Congress of the United States of America. And thus it was, as my hon. friend from Albert has pointed out, that this conspiracy was entered into, which meant that on one side of the border one man was advocating, in this assembly a measure which was calculated, if it was not intended, to destroy the independence of Canada, another man was advocating a like measure in Washington. Mr. Blake warned his old party that it would have that result. It appeared to us so disloyal a measure that the only conclusion we could come to was that these gentlemen were not looking to Ottawa, they were looking to Washington, and that the only logical sequence of their conduct must be the annexation of Canada. This was the measure, this was the policy, these were the views, which the hon. gentleman was expressing in Canada when he was invited to a public banquet in the city of Boston. Sir, I have never had the honour of attending a public banquet in the city of Boston. I can readily understand that the hon. gentleman might, in a moment of weakness, and, being desirous of saying something that was pleasant and agreeable to the audience that he was addressing, a Yankee audience—he might have forgotten that loyalty which should enshroud a man who has been honoured by his Queen.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Read what I said.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman may have given away, in a moment of weakness, and in order to say something agreeable to his American audience, just as his leader did in 1891, in Boston, when he made a speech which every Canadian who read it, must have read it with pity and shame.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Read it.

Mr. KENNY. Hon. gentlemen do not wish me to tell them the Irish story of one at a time. They have heard it before.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. KENNY. It is the hon. member for South Oxford who has provoked all this interruption.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Read the shameful statement you said he made.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I rise to a point of order. A year ago, I was going to read the same thing, but I was ruled out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. That is no point of order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, if it is proper for hon. gentlemen opposite to have a privilege which was denied to this side.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not understand that the hon. member for Halifax proposes to read anything.

Mr. LAURIER. I heard the hon. gentleman make a statement that I had said things of which any Canadian should be ashamed.

Mr. FOSTER. Order, order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no point raised.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes, there is.

Mr. FOSTER. What point is raised?

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman stated a moment ago—

Mr. FOSTER. Order, order.

Mr. LAURIER. I am speaking to the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin), to my mind, certainly did not raise any point of order.

Mr. LAURIER. You have just stated that you had understood the hon. member intended to read nothing. The hon. member, a moment ago, within your hearing, stated that at Boston I said things of which every Canadian should be ashamed. Is it in order to make such a statement if he does not intend to read it? If the hon. gentleman has anything to say about it, let him say it now.

Mr. KENNY. I have much pleasure in complying with the hon. gentleman's request. I was going to say that these hon. gentlemen had a fashion of going down to Boston and making speeches there which were very derogatory to Canada, and that the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, occupying a position of responsibility in Canada, the representative of a party in whose ranks there are many loyal men, the majority of whom are loyal, the vast majority of whom are loyal—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. Do not rise to another point of order.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman on that occasion said, inter alia, that England and Canada must separate.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I deny the accusation in toto.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back, and apologize.

Mr. LAURIER. No; order. The hon. gentleman brought this matter up last year and I referred him to the 'ipsissima verba' which I uttered in Boston that day; and it is all the more shameful on his part to again bring it up to-day. Why should the hon. gentleman repeat that accusation which I denied on the spot? Let him take my speech in Boston, which was reported in toto, and I defy him to find anything of the kind. I will not be responsible for any garbled report of my speeches, especially garbled by the Tory press; but the speech I made in Boston was reported in full, and by that speech I will abide.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman may be in a difficulty, but his friends behind him will not improve his position by endeavouring to prevent me going on with my speech.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You are in the difficulty.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman stated last year that he would only be responsible for the report of his speech which appeared in the Toronto "Globe." Now, we all know the facility which the hon. gentleman possesses of protecting himself by subterfuges.

Mr. KENNY.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. That word is out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. It means to lie under.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. KENNY. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the word is unparliamentary, and I apologize for using it. I was going on to say—and I consider it my duty to refer to it here as a Canadian in view of the responsible position which the hon. gentleman holds in the public life of Canada—that the hon. gentleman went to Boston and his speech was reported in the Boston newspapers by men who took down his words as they fell from his lips, and yet that report, which appeared in the newspapers of the following day, is not to be accepted. What possible object could reporters in Boston have in misrepresenting the hon. gentleman? I am quite aware that the speech the hon. gentleman delivered at that time was of such a character, that it was offensive to the public sentiment of Canada, was so offensive to his own party, that the loyal men of that party told him that it was a very bad policy, at least, and as a consequence he had a rehash of the speech published in the Toronto "Globe."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame.

Mr. KENNY. I have just had the report placed in my hands which appeared in the Toronto "Globe," and it is only fair to the hon. gentleman, and I desire to be fair, that I should read it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. KENNY. Hon. gentlemen opposite may not give me credit for that sentiment, but I not only desire to be fair, but to be just to the hon. gentleman, and I will therefore read it, assuming it to be what it is now represented to be, the report of the hon. gentleman's speech which appeared in his own organ the Toronto "Globe." The hon. gentleman went on to say:

The tie which now binds Canada to the motherland is Canada's own will; and, it is with pride that I say it, though still a colony, yet Canada is free (applause). Of course the tie is that of a dependency, and it cannot last forever.

What does that mean? The hon. gentleman says the relations between England and Canada cannot last for ever.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We will be a nation larger than England in a few years, if we govern the country.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman continued:

Even at this stage Canada and England have interests totally apart.

Why do not hon. gentlemen opposite shout for that sentiment? Is that a nice loyal Canadian sentiment? He said further:

And the time will come when in the very nature of things separation will take place.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated that I desire to be not only fair, but I desire to be just to the hon. gentleman. If I were disposed to accept the statements of the Boston newspapers, I would be obliged to go on and tell you that the hon. gentleman when he made that statement about the separation of England and Canada went further, and addressing an American audience, said: "the interests of my country are identical with the interests of the United States." It is true that these words do not find a place, that this sentence does not appear in the report published in the Toronto "Globe," and therefore I do not use them to-day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why do you quote them?

Mr. KENNY. I do not use them, because the hon. gentleman has denied them. He has said he will abide solely by his corrected and revised speech as it appeared in the Toronto "Globe," and therefore I do not use them. So much for the point of order. I really do not know at this moment, I have been interrupted so often, whether I am speaking to the point of order or to the motion for adjournment. Assuming I have the floor, I shall with your permission, Mr. Speaker, now deal with the speech made in the same city by the hon. member for South Oxford.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Be good enough to read it, then.

Mr. KENNY. When hon. gentlemen opposite ask us to read reports, will they be kind enough to indicate what they want us to read,—what they said in Boston, or the report as revised by them when they got back.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will find my speech reported perfectly correct in the transactions of the Boston Society which invited me, and the members of which honoured me with their presence at that time, and by that I stand, every word of it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In what year was it?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Let the hon. gentleman take his seat.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, a request has just been made by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) for the date on which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made that speech. With every desire to inform the House as to that, I regret that I do not remember the exact date. I do, however, remember that the almost more important speech of the leader of the Opposition was made in November, 1891, after the general elections, after the people of Canada had told the hon. gentlemen that they did not want to have anything to do with him, and just before the by-elections which resulted in doubling the majority which the Conservative party had in this House. I regret that I am not at the present moment able to comply with the wish of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to read him the exact words which he used at the Boston dinner party. I will quote them in substance to the best of my recollection, and I am quite sure that if I cannot give the exact words I can convey to the House the meaning of what the hon. gentleman said. On that occasion, at a time when he was advocating in the Dominion of Canada a policy which his former leader has pronounced to be a disloyal one, he went to the city of Boston and at a dinner given by some commercial association, I think the very people with whom Mr. Wiman had been associated, he made some interesting remarks. I think it was on that occasion that the announcement was made that Laurier in Quebec, Davies in Prince Edward Island, and Cartwright in Ontario, looked to them, the people of the United States, for the sign by which they should conquer. It would be interesting to the House if we had the details of that dinner and all the speeches which were made there. The only thing which was absent on that occasion was the British flag, for I have never heard that the Union Jack was seen in the room. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) there intimated that if his policy were accepted, if the American people would only do what he wanted them to do, the result would be the establishment in Canada of a northern tier of states, of which Boston was to be the entrepot, and that the trade being once secured to Boston no man living could take it from them. Hon. gentlemen will at once see that that would have meant the destruction of the export and import commerce of Montreal, of Quebec, of St. John, of Halifax, and of every maritime city in Canada. The hon. gentleman tells us now that such language is commendable, that he is proud of it, and that he sticks by it yet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not by what you say but by what I said.

Mr. KENNY. It is impossible for me to quote from memory the exact words, but I believe I have given their correct meaning. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) tells us now that he adheres to those statements. We are satisfied. They helped us in the last elections in Nova Scotia and they will help us in the next elections. Sir, complimentary and well-earned references have been made in this House to the services of distinguished men who have been leaders of the Conservative party, but I say that there has not been one of them, from Sir John Macdonald down, who has done so much to keep the Conservative party in power as has the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How ungrateful a lot you must be.

Mr. KENNY. Gratitude finds a place in my breast, and I am grateful to the hon. member for South Oxford. An hon. friend of mine has just handed me the "Hansard," in which appear the exact words of the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) at the Boston dinner, and in order that there may be no misunderstanding, and that this debate may be conducted in perfect fairness, I shall quote those remarks in accordance with the hon. gentleman's request. After I have read them I will leave it to hon. members of this House if I did not give a correct interpretation of them, before. I quote the words of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) from the "Hansard" of 1891, page 1155 :

In one word, given free trade with Canada, and you are within one stride from the position, in some respects, of a frontier city, with no great extent of trade territory secured to you, to that of a central entrepôt, with the practical monopoly of a great region behind you, whose commerce no man can take away from you.

This is the language used by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) says he is proud of that language, and that he abides by it. Let me tell him that in the maritime provinces at least, these sentiments have never found a defender on the platform or in the press. The hon. gentleman tells us now that he never advocated commercial union, and never advocated continental free trade.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I did not say that. I said I never advocated commercial union.

Mr. COCHRANE. You supported a man in my riding whose platform was commercial union.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By some of your lighthouse-keepers, I suppose.

Mr. COCHRANE. No.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) will have great difficulty in proving to the House what difference there is between free trade between Canada and the United States and the entire obliteration of customs ; and commercial union or continental free trade. At all events, the policy of the hon. gentleman was of such a character that it was pronounced by his late leader to be disloyal. Now that I have given the hon. gentleman his exact words, and now that he persists in them and says that these are still his views, I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is not to be regretted that this discussion took place. It is seldom, Sir, that on a motion to adjourn the House we learn so much as we have learned this afternoon. Here, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), who poses as the financial guide of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, tells us that he still thinks that the best thing for Canada is to have free trade with the United States and to make Boston the entrepot for the commerce of Canada. Only yesterday the hon. gentleman drew, by inference at least, a comparison between himself as a financial guide and my hon. friend the present Finance Minister, and endeavoured to convey the impression to this House that he was so much better an authority that it was unwise and inexpedient for us forming the majority to follow any longer my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Sir, with all due deference to the hon. gentleman—and I am a man of commerce—he will pardon me for saying that, although we recognize his great ability and his great usefulness in this House—and I listen to him even when he abuses me, for he is never more amusing than when he is abusing—I say, following out that comparison, which I did not originate, but which he himself introduced, he must permit me to say, as a member of this House and as a merchant of Canada, that in all matters of detail, connected with the trade and commerce of this country, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is much better informed than the hon. member for South Oxford. And that is not to be wondered at. It is due to the fact that the hon. member for South Oxford has not the time—it is not his metier, his avocation ; whereas my hon. friend the Finance Minister is constantly dealing with such questions. But, Sir, I should have had some hesitation in intruding my individual opinion in this matter if I did not know that the merchants of Canada, the men who deal in finance in Canada, and the people of Canada, have more confidence in the hon. Finance Minister than in the hon. member for South Oxford, and they have shown it by their votes at the polls.

Mr. KENNY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They have shown it in Montreal Centre, for instance.

Mr. KENNY. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that nothing that I could say, or that could be said in this House or in this country, could disabuse the mind of the hon. member for South Oxford of the idea that he knows more than all the other members of the House of Commons together. But as he has instituted a comparison with only one of us, I carry it no further. That the comparison made by the hon. member for South Oxford is disposed of, I desire to refer to the appeal recently made to this side of the House by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The leader of the country.

Mr. KENNY. Well, it will be a long time before he is that. It will be a long time before the people of Canada forget that Boston speech.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What guarantees have you taken from the bolters that they will not go out again ?

Mr. FOSTER. The bolters will answer for themselves.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They have been very slow to do it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must appeal to hon. members on both sides of the House to assist me in keeping order.

Mr. LAURIER. Make the appeal to that side.

Mr. KENNY. No one will accuse me of causing disorder in debate. My desire is that discussion should be carried on in the most charitable way possible; but it is necessary to instruct the people in the language of truth, and no amount of interruption which hon. gentlemen opposite can offer will deter me from doing so. I was going to refer to the appeal which the hon. leader of the Opposition made to the patriotism and the honour of the men who sit on this side of the House when he told us that as patriots and as honourable men we should support the party with which he is associated. Now, Sir, let us review the patriotism of the hon. gentleman. In the year 1886 the hon. gentleman encouraged, aided and abetted the very dishonest and very disloyal repeal agitation which was started by Mr. Fielding in the province of Nova Scotia. Sir, the hon. gentleman may think that it is a wise thing to disintegrate this Dominion. That is not the sentiment of the people of Canada. But one way of doing it would have been to have succeeded in the purpose of that very dishonest and disloyal agitation; so I termed it in Nova Scotia, and so I term it here. Sir, I do say that an hon. gentleman occupying a position of responsibility in this House and in this country who appeals to my patriotism and my devotion to Canada must first of all show me that he is entitled to be called a patriot himself. There is almost immediately before the House a question which is supposed to bristle with evidences of the hon. gentleman's patriotism. For some years past no question has so disturbed the people of Canada as the one which is before us—that known as the Manitoba school question. Sir, the action which has led to the introduction of this very unpleasant subject into our political arena was the action of Mr. Greenway, as leader of the Liberal party in the province of Manitoba. That gentleman being then in opposition, and the party at Ottawa feeling that they had not much chance of success in federal politics, and being anxious to obtain power in the different provincial legislatures, Mr. Greenway co-mingling with the leaders of the Opposition here—so it is said, for I do not speak from original knowledge—together they inaugurated this movement which resulted in depriving the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba of schools which they always possessed and such as has always been enjoyed by the minority in Ontario.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Why did you not disallow the Bill? That is the point.

Mr. KENNY. Was the hon. gentleman in favour of disallowance?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer the question.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman has put to me a question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And you have not answered it.

Mr. KENNY. I answer it by asking another. The whole career of this hon. gentleman, the hon. leader of the Opposition, who appeals to us on patriotic grounds to support him, is one which, I regret to say, I cannot as a Canadian admire. We know that immediately after the Manitoba School Act was passed by the legislature of Manitoba, an agitation arose in that province on the part of the Roman Catholic minority for the restoration to them of rights which they had enjoyed up to the time the Liberal party came into power in Manitoba. What happened? Mr. Greenway, I believe, came down to Ottawa after he had received the information from the Government of Canada that the matter had gone through the courts, and that the final court of appeal had decided that it was the duty of the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada to remedy the grievance which existed. Now, Sir, Mr. Greenway came to Ottawa at the invitation of His Excellency the Governor General, who, being a wise ruler, was anxious that this vexed question should be settled as a matter of compromise and arrangement. He came down here, it is reported, in a spirit of conciliation. I am told that his desire was to have the matter disposed of, but it will be remembered that he arrived here very shortly after hon. gentlemen opposite last year first introduced into this Parliament their free trade as-in-England-policy—and we know what an arrant failure that was. We know that its advocacy was met by their own friends in the country with the statement that on such a platform they could never carry the approaching general elections. The Grit party was in a difficulty, and it was necessary to apply some remedy. And what happened? Mr. Greenway put himself in communication with the hon. gentlemen opposite, and, so the story runs, it was decided that it would never do, in the interests of the Liberal party of the Dominion to allow the question to be settled, but that it must be kept open.

Mr. LAURIER. Does the hon. gentleman affirm that?

Mr. KENNY. It is impossible for me to say what took place at a private interview.

Mr. LAURIER. It suits the hon. gentleman not to affirm, but to insinuate. That is his style.

Mr. KENNY. I say that was the impression in the public mind, well founded, well based, but the matter was too well managed to make it possible for me to prove it. But it was the generally accepted opinion of the country that this question was to be kept open in order to help—a remote possibility and a desperate one—these hon. gentlemen opposite to get into power by the disintegration of the Conservative party, which they could never do on their trade policy.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg to say here to the hon. gentleman that when Mr. Greenway was here, I did not speak to him—never!

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must again appeal to the hon. members on both sides to aid me in putting a stop to these unseemly interruptions. The hon. member for Quebec East having stated positively that he had no communication with Mr. Greenway when he was here, the hon. member for Halifax should accept that statement.

Mr. LAURIER. I think I can appeal to you, Sir, that in the discharge of the duties which I have to discharge in this House, I have always endeavoured to carry out my part with consideration to friends and foes, but I cannot submit to hear in silence the most—I will not characterize it otherwise—unparliamentary language which the hon. gentleman has used towards me this afternoon on two different occasions.

Mr. KENNY. I unreservedly accept what the hon. gentleman has said. I never insinuated for a moment that he had any special interview with Mr. Greenway, and, after all, the hon. gentleman must not be so sensitive. He is in the habit of applying epithets, which are anything but seemly, to the men who sit opposite him, and he has used language, during this session, to the men who sit on the right of the Chair, the independent supporters of the Government, which we cannot be expected not to resent. The two references which I made to the hon. gentleman's conduct were regarding what he said in Boston, and I proved that I was correct by reading his own speech; and now, when I refer to the belief which prevails in the country—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It does not prevail.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Never heard it before.

Mr. KENNY. When I refer to this belief, and when I draw a fair inference, at all events, from the course of public events, the hon. gentleman finds fault with me for having done so. I accept, unreservedly, his statement when he tells me that he did not meet Mr. Greenway in Ottawa. I suppose that the other day in Montreal, on that Sunday afternoon when the Hon. Mr. Sifton was there, he did not meet the Hon. Mr. Sifton.
Mr. KENNY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He does not say that.

Mr. KENNY. At all events, we do know this, that when the Hon. Mr. Sifton got back to Manitoba—I do not say it was the result of his interview with the hon. gentleman; I cannot say that, for I was not present—but I do say that what happened was that the Manitoba school question was not settled, no attempt was made to settle it, the sore was to be kept open, there was to be a general election. That is what happened. As I do not believe that England and Canada should separate, as it is in the interests of Manitoba and this Dominion that this question of the Manitoba schools and remedial legislation should be kept no longer in our public life than is absolutely necessary, I must decline to accept the hon. gentleman's appeal to my honour or my patriotism.

An hon. MEMBER. You have not got any.

Mr. KENNY. I would not like to have much of it, if it is of the character of some that is on the other side of the House. The debate which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has provoked in this House has, I am sorry to say, taken a very extensive range. But I do say to the hon. gentlemen opposite, that when they make use of language, characterizing men who sit here as thieves and robbers because they happen to be identified with some manufacturing industry, which, in many cases, is not very profitable to them, financially, or when they call them hoodlums because they come from a certain province, or when references of a similar character are made to our political leaders whom we are very glad to serve, it is not possible for us to sit here quietly and not take cognizance of such abusive statements. The hon. member for South Oxford went out of his way to insult a gentleman who has just joined the Government, the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, in his absence. Let me say this, that if there is one trait or one characteristic of the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, if there is one point in his public career which makes his return to public life at this moment particularly acceptable to the people of the Dominion, and especially to the people of his own province, it is this: He arrives at a moment when there is a religious excitement in Canada, and we who know him best, we of his own province, know that the happy relations which exist there between the people of all denominations are largely due to the salutary influence which Sir Charles Tupper has exercised during his whole career. And, Mr. Speaker, I do believe that it is a fortunate thing for Canada that Sir Charles Tupper is coming into the Government of the country at the time when we are dealing with such a vexed question. Referring to the attack made upon the absent Sir Charles Tupper, I desire to read the retraction made by the Hon. Mr. McLelan, which the hon. member for South Oxford, in a moment of forgetfulness, said Mr. McLelan had not made. At page 26 of the Debates of 1882 I find the following statement made by Mr. McLelan :—

Whatever I may have said on that occasion, I say now, namely, that when that contract was complete, and that when the whole history of the railway was made known to the people of Nova Scotia, no man will pretend to say that, whoever may have benefited, the hon. Minister of Railways—

Sir Charles Tupper was then Minister of Railways——ever personally benefited by that contract. Therefore, all the insinuations that have been made against him by the hon. gentlemen opposite are unworthy of repetition on the floor of this House.

Could the English language be made to convey a statement more positive and explicit than that? The hon. member for South Oxford was, I do not like to say unfair, but was so unjust as actually to tell this House—and very few of us were here in 1882—that the Hon. Mr. McLelan had never retracted or explained his words. I say, Sir, that nothing, as regards Sir Charles Tupper's connection with this matter, could be more satisfactory to his friends than this explicit statement of the late Hon. Mr. McLelan.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MARTIN. I have always noticed that when hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends throughout the country find themselves in trouble, find it hard to justify the acts of their party, they invariably have recourse to laudations of their own loyalty and denunciations of the disloyalty of their opponents. Thus, a subject that should be held sacred is continually used by gentlemen opposite as a means of covering up their own iniquity. I think that there has never been an occasion in the long history of their party when some ruse of that kind was more necessary than it is now. Gentlemen opposite must find it extremely difficult to say anything in their own defence, or even to feel any degree of loyalty to their leaders, who have been in charge of the fortunes of their party. It must have been for this reason that the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) introduced into this discussion stale charges of disloyalty, chestnuts of the worst kind, the same that have been heard in every part of Canada for the past five or six years, the same that did full duty in the campaign of 1891, and answers to which have been forthcoming on every possible occasion. But to-day, in order, if possible, to distract public attention from the extraordinary position of the Conservative party, the hon. gentleman brings forward these charges again. The hon. member for Albert rather poses as a man of independent character, as one who is above his party, as one who regards public questions from an independent standpoint and does not take part in ordinary partisan discussions. That is the estimate of the hon. gentleman that I have read before I became a member of this House. But I must say that since coming here I have wholly failed to discern any difference between the hon. gentleman and his fellow-members on the score of partisanship. There has never been, so far as I know, since I came here, any question on which the hon. gentleman has given an independent vote or expressed an independent opinion. When shady transactions have come before the House, the hon. member is often put up by the Government to defend them, with the view possibly of trading upon the reputation which he seems to have acquired in some quarters. One of the worst things this Parliament has done since I became a member of it, in my opinion, was the whitewashing of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte), against whom a charge was made that he was a contractor with the Government while a member of this House. We found that this independent gentleman, the hon. member for Albert was prepared to support the Government in that matter. The reason given among members of the party for whitewashing the hon. member, as I understand, was that the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) had been whitewashed, though the charge against him was even a worse one, and that, as he was an Englishman, it was only fair that the same leniency should be extended to a French member. The Government endeavoured to stifle public inquiry by refusing to put the oath to witnesses in the investigation in the Committee on Public Accounts, and it was the hon. member for Albert who took the most active part on the floor of the House in defending that most outrageous proceeding. I understood that the hon. member for Albert was led to bring up these old charges of disloyalty by the reference made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to the new member of the Government, Sir Charles Tupper. The hon. member for South Oxford has shown to-day, in the words of one of the former leaders of the Conservative party, the opinion that was held of Sir Charles Tupper. The attempt has been made by hon. members on the other side to show that Mr. McLelan, on a subsequent occasion, apologized for words he had used. But the extract from "Hansard" which has been given does not fairly bear that construction. In the speech quoted, Mr. McLelan did not apologize to Sir Charles Tupper for the charges he had made against him. I understand that Mr. McLelan's reference to Sir Charles Tupper in the Nova Scotia legislature was a charge against him upon his record, and applying that record to propositions which were then before the legislature with regard to a certain railway corporation, Mr. McLelan denominated him the high priest of corruption, and I find nothing in "Hansard" to show that Mr. McLelan at any time withdrew those words. And certainly, Sir Charles Tupper's record after he left the legislature of Nova Scotia and entered Dominion politics affords every reason to warrant any member of this House in applying that epithet to him. I believe that it is the opinion of the country generally that if there is a man in Canada who deserves the epithet used by Mr. McLelan—a high priest of corruption—that man is Sir Charles Tupper. Now, the hon. ex-Minister of Justice, taking this as an attack upon himself, made a counter-charge against the hon. member for South Oxford. It will seem very strange if the public men of this country are to be justified or condemned, not for their own actions, but for the actions of their grandfathers. Had the hon. member for South Oxford or any other member made a charge against the ex-Minister of Justice on account of something Sir Charles Tupper, his father, had done, then there would have been some kind of reason for his striking back in this way. But no charges made regarding Sir Charles Tupper the elder are made to affect the political standing or conduct of his son, the ex-Minister of Justice. I think the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) made it very plain the other night when he said that if the Government undertake to bring into their ranks the late High Commissioner, that gentleman becomes a fair subject for comment, and the comments must be taken as directed against himself and not against his son. It seems to me, therefore, that the ex-Minister of Justice was ill-advised in bringing up in this House the record of the grandfather of an hon. member on this side. Even if it be granted that a member of this House is bound to account for and be responsible not only for his own actions, but those of his father, and not only those of his father but those of his grandfather, still, so far as anything appears from the discussion to-day it seems to me that the hon. member for South Oxford has nothing to excuse but much to be proud of. The first charge read was in the form of an extract from the archives of Canada, and from it it appeared that the authorities of the State of New York were not satisfied with Mr. Richard Cartwright, the grandfather of the hon. member. I have always understood that the United Empire Loyalists left New York and other states because they were not prepared to live loyally under republican institutions that had been adopted there. The ex-Minister of Justice seems to think it a crime on the part of Mr. Cartwright that the Americans charged him with being neutral and unsatisfactory; in other words, not loyal to their institutions. Such a charge must lie against every United Empire Loyalist who came to Canada. While many would not agree with the course taken by the United Empire Loyalists, but would rather approve the course of those British subjects who resisted the tyranny which was practised upon them at that time by the English Government, still we must all admire the courage and devotion to their cause that these men displayed. Not being able to live loyally under the institutions of the country they took the manly course of breaking up their homes and coming to what was to them a foreign country. That is the charge made by the ex-Minister of Justice, and it is a charge that can be made on the same ground against every United Empire Loyalist who came to Canada. The ex-Minister of Justice, not satisfied with proclaiming that this man was a United Empire Loyalist, because that covers the definition of the phrase, which means that he was a man whom the authorities of the United States were not prepared to have live among them, and who was driven from the new union because his allegiance to the British Empire was so strong that he was prepared to give up his home and make for himself a new home in a foreign country, as Canada then was, he went on and stated that when this man, Richard Cartwright, came into Canada his actions were reflected upon by Governor Simcoe.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He was at that time a member of the Legislative Council.

Mr. MARTIN. His conduct was reflected upon, so far as we can judge, because he was not prepared to knuckle under to Governor Simcoe, who was a despotic Tory Governor of Upper Canada. I have always understood that the ancestors of the hon. member for South Oxford were of the Tory party. I have always had a trifle of feeling against the hon. gentleman, if that were possible, on that account. But it would appear, from what was brought forward by the ex-Minister of Justice, that Richard Cartwright, the grandfather of my hon. friend, was not prepared to submit to the Tory Governor, Governor Simcoe, that he was, in other words, a Reformer at that time, and was not prepared to bow the knee to the Family Compact. If it be a crime to have opposed that Family Compact, if Richard Cartwright was a man upon whose name aspersions might be cast on account of his conduct during that period of Canadian history, he is in good company. I have no doubt that the ex-Minister of Justice, if he had pursued his inquiries a little further, would have found in the archives of Canada even more serious reflections cast against such men as Baldwin, Lafontaine, William Lyon Mackenzie and Louis Joseph Papineau. That Richard Cartwright should be classed with men of that kind, that he should have been a man opposed to the Family Compact, and not prepared to submit to them in every particular, may be in the eye of the ex-Minister of Justice, and of hon. gentlemen opposite, a reflection on that gentleman's patriotism and loyalty, but with the great Liberal party of Canada it will be an added ornament to the hon. member for South Oxford, that he should have had a grandfather prepared to stand up with Baldwin and Lafontaine, and William Lyon Mackenzie and Papineau, as against the Family Compact. I have had to listen to-day, for the first time since I entered this House, to an hon. member who, up to the present time, I had considered was an honourable gentleman, a member of this House with honourable instinct, make the most futile attack ever made since I have been a member of this House. The attack made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) on the leader of the Opposition was most unwarranted and most uncalled for. That hon. gentleman refused to accept the word of the leader of the Opposition as to what he had said in a speech delivered in Boston. I found great difficulty in understanding exactly what complaint was brought against the hon. member for South Oxford, and the leader of the Opposition, with respect to their speeches on the other side. It would almost appear that from the standpoint of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is a crime and misdemeanour for a Canadian statesman to address an American audience. I do not take that view, and, as the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford said, if there is anything to condemn let it be shown by what they said there. It is suggested that the remarks of the hon. member for South Oxford were so acceptable to the audience addressed in Boston that they applauded him, and one gentleman more enthusiastic than the rest addressed him as the future senator for Ontario. I understand that is a compliment to my hon. friend, because the Senate of the United States, differing in that respect from the Senate of Canada, is the most important legislative body there, and it is the greatest honour which can come to an American politician to become a member of that House. How can my hon. friend be blamed in any degree for any suggestions coming from the audience he addressed, except so far as he was able to make himself acceptable and his speech pleasing to them, I cannot see. During the course of the remarks made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) the hon. gentleman referred to something which he said he had heard. He could not tell where he had heard it, who had said it, or give any responsible person as authority for it; but there was in the country, he said, a very definite impression that there had been an agreement entered into between the Premier of Manitoba and the leader of the Opposition in this House, by which the Premier of Manitoba had purposely refrained from carrying out an intention which, up to that time, he entertained of settling the Manitoba school difficulty. The hon. gentleman did, upon pressure, I must admit, withdraw his statement with regard to the leader of the Opposition; but perhaps it may be as well, since the matter has been broached here, and since the hon. member for Halifax has stated that there was a very well-defined impression throughout the country that this was the case, to allude, briefly, to the matter. The leader of the Opposition said that he had had no communication whatever with respect to that matter. I may say, however, that the charge which has been made against Mr. Greenway and his government in the elections which have just taken place in Manitoba is just the opposite of that which the hon. member for Halifax has made against Mr. Greenway and the leader of the Opposition to-night, because it was charged during the campaign just closed that Mr. Greenway and the leader of the Opposition here were in a conspiracy, and that as soon as the elections were fairly over in Manitoba, and Mr. Greenway had been returned to power on his stand on the school question, he, Mr. Greenway, would, at the next session of the legislature, called for the 27th instant, introduce a School Bill, restoring to the Roman Catholics of Manitoba the privileges which they possessed under the Acts prior to 1890. That is the charge which has been made. That charge has been denied most explicitly by the Premier of Manitoba and his government. He has taken the position that so far as the Manitoba school question is concerned, it is his duty, and the duty of his government to act in that matter in the interests of Manitoba alone, without any regard to questions of Dominion politics, I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that that is the course which will be adopted in Manitoba. I am satisfied that in dealing with this matter the government of Manitoba will in the future, as they have in the past, deal with it from a Manitoba standpoint. The reason offered by the Opposition for this charge against the Government arose from statements that have been made by different members of the Manitoba government, and by the "Tribune" newspaper which is the leading Liberal paper of Manitoba, as to the attitude of the Manitoba government upon this school question. These statements were to the effect: That the government had been in the past and would be in the future prepared to do justice where any injustice was shown to exist either to the Roman Catholic minority or to any one else. I wish to show that that is still the attitude of the government there, because since the election which occurred on the 15th of the present month the following appeared in the "Winnipeg Tribune," which is, as I say, the leading Liberal paper of that province. It is not the organ of the government, because a Liberal paper cannot be the organ of a government; it is an independent newspaper which represents the opinions of the government probably to a large extent, but which specially represents the constituency to which it appeals. The "Tribune" says:

All friends of interprovincial harmony will still hope that some gleam of statesmanlike sense will now influence the actions of the Dominion Cabinet. It is not to be understood from the present attitude of Manitoba that the majority of her people have any hatred of Roman Catholics, or that, having them down, their wish is to keep them down. There is a good deal of misunderstanding on this point, and a good deal of nonsense has been talked. The real intention of Manitoba has no foundation in ill-will to any part of her population, but these intentions have so far had no opportunity to be manifested. The province has practically been on her defence for the last five years, and until the struggle to maintain what she deems her rights is ended, a dispassionate consideration of the grievances of the minority can hardly be expected. When, however, the threat of coercion is removed, as ultimately it must be, the sense of justice of Manitobans will be found as active as it is in any part of the Dominion, and a readiness will be shown to remove all just cause of complaint against our school laws.

Mr. Speaker, that is the attitude of the Government, and that is the attitude of the people of Manitoba. The statement that there is any conspiracy or any understanding between the Manitoba government and the leader of the Opposition here, to use the school question as a foot ball in Dominion politics is utterly unfounded. The charge that the leader of the Opposition and the government of Manitoba are arranging to keep the question in active politics for their own purposes, as well as the charge that there is pending an arrangement with the leader of the Opposition since the election, to produce an Act for the purpose of settling this question, are charges that are utterly false and untrue. The Manitoba government do not propose to lend themselves to any arrangement of that kind, and I am certain the leader of the Opposition here has never directly nor indirectly suggested that they should lend themselves to any such arrangement. The stand taken by the Manitoba government is not a stand taken by the Liberals of that province alone, but it is a stand taken by the Liberals and Conservatives of Manitoba alike, as was proven by the result of the elections which took place on Wednesday last. Their stand is this: they insist that the subject of education is one over which the province should have control. They intend to insist upon that principle and to fight for it in every legitimate constitutional way, but at the same time they insist that they are prepared to do justice if any injustice is shown. From the time that this question first came up, the Manitoba government have always manifested a disposition of that kind. When the remedial order was sent to them commanding them to restore the schools as they existed prior to 1890, in every particular, they took the only course possible to them. They refused to restore those schools as they existed prior to 1890, but at the same time they have coupled that refusal with the suggestion that they were prepared to join in any investigation into the real facts of the case that might be thought desirable by the Dominion Government, and that if any injustice were shown, they were ready to right it. That answer was sent some time in June last. It was then suggested in this House that the Manitoba government were prepared to compromise this question. I say, Sir, that the Dominion Government never had the slightest reason to suppose that the Manitoba government had any intention whatever to depart from, in the slightest degree, their answer to the remedial order. The suggestion that there was any likelihood of the Manitoba government making any compromise was a mere excuse put forward by the Dominion Government in order to gain delay for their own purposes. They knew perfectly well that the only possible way of approaching anything like the discussion of a compromise, was the withdrawal of the remedial order, and until the remedial order couched in such terms was withdrawn, it was quite impossible to consider the question of compromise, or to consider the making right of any injustice that might have been done. That being the case, it seems to me most important that this question should be approached from the standpoint of conciliation rather than coercion. That has been very well said by the leader of the Opposition. Until the Government of Canada are prepared to deal with the question from that standpoint, and to go into all the facts, as they did not do when they passed the remedial order, there can be no settlement of the question. The remedial order was passed before any investigation was made and without any knowledge on the part of the Government of Canada as to how things were up in Manitoba. The Government now propose to introduce legislation for the purpose of giving effect to that remedial order. At the present time I will not say anything with regard to that remedial legislation. My purpose in rising was only to refer to the story suggested by the member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) and to the other stories suggested with regard to combination and conspiracy between the leader of the Opposition here and the Government of Manitoba. It does seem to me, however, that it would be a great advantage in the settlement of this question if it could be arranged between two friendly governments. So far as the present Government are concerned, they have shown no special desire, in dealing with the province, to enter into any negotiations on a basis of compromise. They have taken the other course. They have taken the plan of deciding from the outset, without even hearing the case of Manitoba, that the province is entirely wrong, and that the only possible solution of the difficulty is to restore the old school system of 1871 as it existed when the statutes of 1890 were passed. Mr. Speaker, the province of Manitoba will never consent to that. If the old system is to be restored as it was before, it will have to be done by force; it will have to be done in such a way that the province cannot resist it constitutionally. I do not mean to say that the province will use force. They will be prepared to yield, if the constitution compels them to do so. But the question will never be solved in that way by the people of Manitoba. They do not believe that the old system was a proper system, either as the Catholic board or the Protestant board were constituted. They believe they had a perfect right to legislate on the question in the way they did; but, as the honourable Attorney General has said in public speeches, they do not by any means stand on the Act of 1890 as being an Act that cannot be altered or changed. They are prepared, on a proper case being shown, to make every wrong right, and to deal with the question in a spirit that will be proper and fair to the minority.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, might we not dispose of the question as to the adjournment of the House at this time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House for more than a very few moments; but I cannot allow that question to be put without saying a word or two with reference to the rather discreditable exhibition which this House saw this afternoon. It was a discreditable exhibition of personal feeling and rancour which, I am happy to say for Parliament, is seldom witnessed here. I refer to the language and the tone—I was going to use an unparliamentary expression, and say the insolence—used by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who I am sorry to see is not in his place. The hon. gentleman knew very well that he had made references to hon. members in this House and to their friends outside of the House, which references could not be permitted to go unchallenged; and I regret to say that, knowing as he did that they were to be taken up, he had not the manliness to take his seat in the House and listen to the reply. Sir, that hon. gentleman, not on one occasion, but on almost all occasions, with an arrogant insolence which vulgarly assumes a monopoly of loyalty—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I shall withdraw the expression if it is not parliamentary. With an arrogance, then, which vulgarly assumes a monopoly of patriotism, he tells this House time and again that one-half of our people, the Liberal party of Canada, led by my hon. friend, are not loyal to the Crown; and he keeps repeating this year after year, and attempting to prove it by what, Sir? By a quotation or an alleged quotation from a speech which he heard the hon. leader of the Opposition tell him four years ago and repeat a year ago, was a false quotation. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what can be thought of the conduct of a member of this House who, having been assured that a quotation which he professes to make from a speech of one of his opponents is incorrect and untrue, goes on year after year refusing to accept the explanation and repeating the quotation? Hon. gentlemen who live in the western part of Canada may not be aware of the fact that that hon. gentleman has made that speech—that false quotation—his stock-in-trade at every petty meeting held in Halifax, and generally in Nova Scotia, which he has attended. He trots out this alleged quotation on every occasion, although knowing that its correctness has been challenged and denied by my hon. leader. What is to be done with a gentleman of that kind? He comes here proclaiming his personal loyalty. Well, Sir, I have never heard it challenged. If a lady goes around from drawing-room to drawing-room protesting her virtue, or if a business man goes from board of exchange to board of exchange protesting his honesty, they simply give rise to suspicion; and so when a politician, in season and out of season, protests and proclaims his loyalty to the Crown, he leads people to suspect that there is some other motive animating him than loyalty. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman never replies to an argument upon the true issues which divide the parties in this country without taking refuge in this eternal patter and cry of loyalty—that which Dr. Johnson described to be the last refuge of a scoundrel. Now, Sir, I call the attention of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to the spectacle presented on this particular occasion. I ask my hon. friends, is this the time, here and now, when the Government of this country are calling upon all Canadians to sink for the moment their party differences in order to vote the necessary money to increase the militia and the defences of this country, and to stand shoulder to shoulder in the possible event of an invasion of the country—is this the time for a member of Parliament to proclaim to the world that one-half of the Canadian people are traitors? Sir, his lies and his slanders—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Or those lies and those slanders—I am not referring to any individual.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman said "his lies," referring to the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman to say "his lies and his slanders." If those words were made use of, they must be withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I believe they slipped from my tongue unintentionally. I meant to say, and I do say, those lies and those misrepresentations—because they were not the lies and misrepresentations of one man only, as will be seen when I finish my sentence—were used in the last election to carry the election for the Conservative party. The interests of the country were sacrificed then, as those gentlemen are frequently ready to sacrifice them, for party exigencies. There are many who, if they can gain a party triumph, will not scruple to sacrifice and ruin their country. At that time, when everything was in peace and quietness, party interests might induce some men who know the contrary to take such a dishonest and unjustifiable course. But I should think that now of all times it were desirable, whatever our party differences may be, that our loyalty to the Crown and to the country should be unquestioned; and I should have thought there was not a man in this Canadian Parliament who would have the meanness and the audacity to stand up and challenge the loyalty of one-half of the Canadian people. I repudiate the slander, Sir, with scorn and indignation. When the volunteers were called upon a few years ago to quell a rebellion in the North-west Territories, was there any difference in the loyalty of those who responded, whether they were Conservatives or Reformers? When our young men sprang to take their places in the ranks, did anybody stop to ask whether they came from the Liberal or the Tory ranks? No, they came because they were loyal to the country, and I tell the hon. gentleman who to-day slanders his country and its young men, that if this country were attacked from abroad by any foreigner, whoever he may be, he would find as much unquestioned loyalty in the Liberal party, as much stern determination to defend their hearths and homes, as much fierce desire and determination to live under and fight for the flag which we have lived under so long, as could be found in the party to which he belongs. Sir, the hon. gentleman not only attacked my hon. friend here, but with a lack of courtesy, which I was ashamed of, coming as I do from the maritime provinces, he refused to accept his explanation. Is there another hon. gentleman on that side of the House, who, when my hon. friend offered an explanation of an alleged statement made by him, would refuse to accept it? I say that he owes an apology to my hon. friend, and it would be becoming in him now to make it, and make it in a humble manner.

Mr. KENNY. Do you mean me?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, I am alluding to the hon. member for Halifax. He did not scruple also to attack a prominent Nova Scotian behind his back. Why did he deem it his duty to drag in the name of Mr. Fielding into the debate and pronounce his policy disloyal and dishonest?

Mr. KENNY. I rise to a point of order. The statement which I made was that the repeal agitation in 1886 was a dishonest and, to my mind, a disloyal policy. I said so in my own province and I repeat it here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman put no qualification upon it at all.

Mr. KENNY. Yes, I did.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) With the policy which was advocated then I have no concern. It may have been a prudent policy, or it may not. I was not a Nova Scotian, but I know this, that ever since Confederation, with the exception of a short disastrous period, the people of that province have kept at their head, fortunately for themselves, such men as Mr. Fielding and his colleagues. I know this, that ever since that province was sold into Confederation by the hon. gentleman's party friends, there has rankled a deep feeling of disappointment, and I know that if there is a suspicion of want of loyalty to the Confederation, that suspicion is entirely owing to the treachery which sold the constitution of Nova Scotia over the people's heads. In the province from which I come and in the other maritime provinces the people were consulted. They went in willingly, and there never has been, in town, hamlet or village, the suspicion of a cry asking that Confederation be dissolved. They are loyal to Confederation because their opinion was taken. But in the province from which the hon. gentleman comes the people were bought and sold without their leave being asked, and they would not be the descendants of the men they are if they did not resist and resent a treachery which took away from them their own constitution. But where was the disloyalty? Nova Scotia was a part of the British Empire before ever Confederation was thought of, its loyalty to the Crown was not changed because it merged its local independence in the Dominion of Canada. It remains a part and parcel of the Empire now as before, and if the political union which binds it to the other provinces were severed, as Mr. Fielding wished it to be severed, it would still remain part of the Empire, and where would be the disloyalty? I desire that Nova Scotia should remain a part and parcel of Confederation, the policy of repeal is not one I advocate, but where is the disloyalty? I say it is a most offensive and a most uncalled-for aspersion. The hon. gentleman took care to make the attack on Mr. Fielding behind his back. Sir, we have eulogies passed to-day on great and distinguished Nova Scotians who have gone to their long home. Mr. Fielding is not held up by his friends to have the versatility, genius, or brilliancy of a Howe or the oratorical qualities of a Huntington, or a Uniacke, but I say that in solid commonsense, in political foresight and sagacity, in business capacity, he is a peer of them all. I say more than that on behalf of a man whom I am proud to value as my personal friend, who has been my personal friend for years, whose loyalty, if such a thing has to be discussed here, is unquestioned in the minds of all the people who comprise Nova Scotia outside the hon. gentlemen opposite. I say that for the last twenty years in the capacity of First Minister, he has carried on the affairs of his province with a prudence and wisdom and sagacity which has hardly any parallel in provincial politics, and certainly has none in Dominion politics.

Mr. FOSTER. And he trebled the debt.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman wants to enter into a discussion about the debt, he had better confine himself to the debt with which he has saddled the country, and he will have all he can do to defend himself. I just rise for the purpose of saying a word on behalf of an absent man whom, if he had been present, the hon. gentleman would not have had the pluck to attack as he did. There is one distinguishing characteristic which Mr. Fielding has, and that is pluck, his political foes recognize it as well as his friends, and those who have met him as opponents on the public platform have reason to dread discussion with him either on Dominion or local politics. I may say to the hon. gentleman, who stands here a thousand miles behind Mr. Fielding's back and charges him with disloyalty, that I would like to see him down on a Halifax platform before a Halifax audience making the same charge. He dare not do it, because Mr. Fielding has a hold on the hearts and the affections of his people which few public men in this country can boast of.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. After the able speech of my hon. friend, the member for Queen's, P.E.I., I have but a few words to say with regard to the matter before the House. I deeply regret, as a member of this House and a Canadian, the turn which the debate to-day has taken. It is one that is disgraceful to this House and country. It would not be necessary for me to refer to it, were it not that I wish to point out the object of hon. gentlemen opposite in bringing up this discussion as it has been brought up to-day. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) was, I think, most unfair to the leader of the Opposition. I wish to keep within bounds because I have always held that gentleman in the highest respect, but I must say, that after to-night I do not think anybody more than himself will regret the line he has taken. Was it fair to make by insinuation charges against hon. members of this House? Now, then, the plan of campaign laid down by my hon. friend and those who agree with him, and those who cheer him, in certain sections of the country, is that the leader of the Liberal party and his friends supporting him are favourable to annexation, and disloyal to the British crown. Sir, cutting it short, and putting it plainly before the country, any sensible man can see the object they have in view. Now, I want to ask my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) and those associated with him, whether they agree with the line of campaign that is taken against my hon. friend the leader of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario. He knows right well, for he is a thinking man and a reading man, and he has listened to the speeches of his friends, and he knows that because the leader of the Opposition and his friends dare to criticise the Administration of the present Government, dared to differ with their policy, the answer is that they are unfit to be trusted with power; and in the province of Ontario he cannot pick up a leading Conservative newspaper, published from day to day, or any of the smaller weekly sheets published throughout the province, but he will find that they are calling the attention of the people to the fact that the leader of the Liberal party is a Roman Catholic, and, therefore, unfit to be entrusted with power. I ask the hon. gentleman whether he is prepared to say that he supports that policy? Is it not just as unfair and just as dishonest to support the attacks that are made upon the hon. leader of the Opposition in the province of Ontario, as it is for him if only by insinuation to question his loyalty, as my hon. friend has pointed out. There can be no other result but to make it appear to our neighbours across the line that one-half, if not more than one-half, of the people of his own province are disloyal to the British crown; because the men whom he denounced to-day are the leaders, and have the confidence of the majority of the people of his own province of Nova Scotia, as have the leaders of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario in confidence of the great majority of the people of that province. The hon. gentleman referred to the province of Manitoba and the school question, and I wish to take up that matter, because my name has been associated with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition with regard to this so-called story. I think I can appeal to the hon. gentleman's sense of decency, in order to show that it was most unfair to say that a certain story was in circulation which was got up to injure the leader of the Liberal party and those who follow him. Now, Sir, I say here upon my responsibility, without the slightest fear of denial from any person, and having been in close relations with my leader, I know it to be a fact, that he had no communication, directly or indirectly, with the Premier of Manitoba in relation to this matter, except on one occasion, and the result of that communication, I am not ashamed to own, to this House or to the country. He urged upon him, in the eloquent manner which is peculiar to him, the desirability, if possible, of removing the grievance that existed in that province, and keeping this matter out of Dominion politics. As a prominent Conservative said to me when he read a story in the "Mail Empire," published about the meeting in Montreal, that it was lacking so much in the appearance of truth that it could not possibly deceive any person, still the member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) went on to point out that the action of that government in bringing on the elections and taking the position they did, was caused by some arrangement between the government of Manitoba and the leader of the Opposition. Well, Mr. Speaker, I say here without even a chance of an insinuation of a denial, that there is not one word of truth in that story. It was only got up for the purpose of trying, if possible, to raise a prejudice amongst the people in this country against the hon. leader of the Opposition. Now, then, my hon. friend perhaps, knows that I have not given the whole line of campaign taken up by the Conservative press. Yes, he does know it, because he knows that in the province in which my leader lives, and is honoured and respected, the same plan has been adopted, in order, if possible, to raise a feeling against him because he was received with so much honour and enthusiasm in the English and Protestant province of Ontario, and, consequently, he could not be loyal even to his own people and to his own church. My hon. friends on both sides of the House, know that almost daily fierce attacks are being made upon him in the province of Quebec in order to mislead the people. Mr. Speaker, I think if I were to recite a little of the history of the Manitoba school question before this House and the country, that almost every sensible man, irrespective of party politics, would come to the conclusion that if my hon. friend has a right to charge any person or party in this country with bringing this question into Dominion politics and keeping it before the country at the present time, it would be his own leaders in this House, and his leader in the Government. If this is not true, it is strange the Government did not enter into negotiations years ago, with a view of settlement, in order to keep this question out of Dominion politics. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, whose sympathies would naturally be with his co-religionists in the province of Manitoba, who have laid their grievance before Parliament stood up on the floor of Parliament long ago, and pointed out to them a reasonable, fair and business-like way in which this question should be dealt with, but they neglected to take the advice, not only from him, but from some of their own friends supporting him. I would refer the hon. gentleman to some of the newspapers to-day on both sides of politics, especially those who are most ultra Tory, to show what they have to say with regard to the present Government and to their policy on this question. It is known to this House and to the country that I was associated with my leader when he dealt with this question in every province in this Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and was present at almost every important statement that he made; therefore I can speak with knowledge of what he said. I was not surprised to find sometimes extreme party papers taking up a cry for the purpose of injuring him personally, and, through him, his party, by making statements that were false and untrue with regard to his speeches in the other provinces. But this seems to be a part of the policy of the Conservative party. I was more than surprised to find hon. gentlemen in this House, if not directly, by insinuation, trying to make it appear that the leader of the Opposition had one set of opinions for one province and another set for another province. Sir, I can say that, having been associated with him and heard his speeches in almost every part of this Dominion, he never at any time could be accused of such dishonourable and improper conduct. I am proud to say, also, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe that those hon. gentlemen who are opposed to him in this House, really believe in their hearts that the hon. leader of the Opposition, in fighting political battles and in discussing questions of policy and administration, has ever been, to use a common expression, guilty of striking below the belt. Every man in this House and outside of it, irrespective of party politics, irrespective of creed and province, have always acknowledged and accorded to the leader of the Opposition the honour to which he is justly entitled. He would not hold the position that he does if he did not use vigorous language in his speeches; but I think no one, for a moment, either in the House or out of it, would ever accuse him of striking below the belt. I feel, Sir, that this policy, this line of conduct that has been adopted, and is being carried on by the press representing the party in power, and has even made its appearance on the floor of this House, will entirely fail to humbug the intelligent mass of the Canadian people. Sir, as one having hope in my country, and believing in our people, I feel that I have a right here to take my stand according to my own views of questions of politics, and to support what I may consider to be in the best interest of my country, without being accused of disloyalty, I think that my hon. friends in this House, and out of it, have a perfect right to be respected, no matter at what altar they worship, no matter what creed they profess. I say, Sir, that I believe this thing is having the contrary effect to that intended, and that the Protestants in Ontario are coming to look upon the hon. leader of the Liberal party as a high-minded statesman, as a man who places before them honestly and frankly the policy that he believes to be in the interest of the country, and that he condemns what he believes to be wrong in the policy and the administration of the present Government. And as to the success of their line of campaign in the province of Quebec, we have only to look to the results of the elections a few days ago. Even in the constituency of my hon. friend from Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Prior) we see the same indications of the favour in which the Liberal party is held. Sir, I will say that there is no public man sitting in the House of Commons who has taken more pains than the leader of the Opposition to acquaint himself with the people in every section of this Dominion, to acquaint himself with the resources of every part of the country. I say to his credit and to his honour, that he has, at great personal sacrifice, endeavoured to make himself acquainted with the conditions prevailing in every part of the Dominion. No other public man has taken so much pains to address the people frankly and boldly with regard to the public questions before us to-day. Sir, I believe that the appeals to prejudice that are being made in some sections of the country against the Liberal party and its leader, will be entirely without effect. I have not the slightest doubt that the people of this country look upon him as a man worthy of the position he holds, as a man who would not be guilty of any dishonourable act, a man who holds firmly and vigorously to the views that he considers to be in the best interests of the country; and never, either on the floor of Parliament, or outside, does he condescend to misrepresent those who may be opposed to him. I believe that the people of the various provinces will feel that the time has come when this policy of humbug and misrepresentation should be condemned, and that they will show that they look upon the leader of the Opposition as a man worthy to be the Premier of this country.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not intend to make a speech on the present occasion, and will only take up the time of the House for a moment or two. I must say that I was very much impressed with the remark that fell from my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), when he said that this was no time to accuse one-half of the people of Canada of being disloyal. I wish to say for myself, and I am quite sure I may say it of many of those who sit around me, that no thought could be further from our minds than that of accusing one-half of the people of Canada of disloyalty. I certainly did not understand, when my hon. friend from Halifax addressed this House, that he for one moment meant to insinuate, much less to state, any such thing.

Mr. KENNY. I said the contrary.

Mr. McNEILL. We would repudiate that statement with just as much warmth as any gentleman on the other side of the House. But we cannot forget, unhappily it is too true, that the leaders of the party opposite, only a few years ago, did support and press upon the people of this country a policy which, as my hon. friend has said, was described by the late leader of their party, the Hon. Edward Blake, as a policy of annexation in disguise and which, he said, moreover, was a policy of annexation under very disadvantageous terms for Canada. That is unhappily the case, and it is also unhappily true that the two gentlemen referred to, both of whom I respect very much, and the ability of both of whom I very much admire, nevertheless did make use of expressions on the other side of the line among our friends in the American Republic, which, to say the least of it, were most unfortunate. That the policy that these gentlemen pursued was such as I have said, cannot be gainsaid. That one-half of the people of Canada are not disloyal is proved by the fact that when the by-elections came on, and when the people came to understand the matter, it having been explained to them by Mr. Blake, when they came to understand what the real issue before the country was, they declared in trumpet tones that one-half of the people of this country were not disloyal, for they refused to follow the leaders of their party in the policy they were advocating at that time. Having said so much with reference to that matter, I just wish to say one word, as I am on my feet, so that I may not be obliged to rise again, in reference to my position as to one of the paragraphs of the Speech which has been placed in the mouth of His Excellency. I do not wish at all to precipitate a discussion on that question, but I think it right that I should take this opportunity, this very first opportunity, of defining what my position is in regard to that matter. So far as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is concerned, I can for once, to some extent, at all events, agree with his views. I cannot, however, go so far as my hon. friend from South Oxford went yesterday, when he declared that his course in this respect had been altogether consistent, and that it had been most clear, emphatic and explicit. The extent to which he laid down his policy, I think, is in the memory of us all. The words seem now to be ringing in my ears, in which the hon. gentleman told this House that he was not to be called upon to define his policy, that he was "not the adviser of the advisers of His Excellency." If he had defined his policy in a manner so clear and definite, why should he make use of such an expression as this? Mr. Speaker, it has been notorious throughout the constituencies of this country that the hon. gentleman had refused to define his policy; it has been notorious that he has not given the people that light and leading which every public man occupying the position he occupies, is, I think, in duty bound to give to the people in such an emergency as this. I think the people of Canada have just as much right to expect from the leader of the Opposition in Canada a definite declaration of his policy in reference to separate schools for Manitoba as the people of the United Kingdom had a right to expect from the leader of the Opposition there a definite declaration of his policy as to Home Rule for Ireland. If the Marquis of Salisbury had acted as the leader of the Opposition has done, if he had gone beating about the bush and refused to declare what his policy was on such a leading question for as many years as the leader of the Opposition did, I do not think he would to-day have been in power in England as the leader of one of the most powerful governments known for half a century in that country. But, on the contrary, he would have been the leader of a party which was humiliated and was in disgrace. I have said, however, that, while I to this degree differ from the course which the hon. gentleman has pursued, in some respects I agree with him. I think my hon. friend has to-day at last announced the right policy in respect to this matter. I believe that the proper course to pursue in respect to this question, which is straining this Dominion at the present time, is the statesmanlike British policy of conciliation and compromise, and not the anti-British policy of coercion and compulsion, as, I fear, we must describe the policy which has been enunciated on more than one occasion from these benches in this House. The government of Manitoba has, I understand, invited investigation and by doing so, it seems to me, it has opened wide the door for a friendly arrangement of the differences which, unhappily, divide the federal power from the province of Manitoba. I believe that if we meet the government of Manitoba in a friendly conciliatory, kindly spirit, we will find that the people there will go a long way to meet us in a similar spirit. But I believe, on the other hand, that if we attempt coercion, if we attempt to force wholesale down the throats of the people of Manitoba legislation which they utterly disapprove, we will land ourselves in difficulties the result of which no man can foretell. I believe it will be found that the descendants of those who successfully opposed the Spanish Armada and many another attempted encroachment on their liberties, will to-day, within the lines of the constitution, be found lawfully, patiently, quietly, but with a steady determination, fighting for what they deem to be their rights. And this is no time, a time when we want to marshal all the forces of the Empire together to defend the heart of the Empire, to strain the relations of the provinces of this Dominion with the central power. Moreover, as it has been said with such great force, by the hon. member for South Oxford, it is especially undesirable to attempt to do so in this dying Parliament, which no longer represents and cannot at all be supposed to have any mandate from the people. On the contrary, so far as my province is concerned, I am satisfied that the mandate is in the very opposite direction from that to which I have referred. It seems to me, also, a most weighty consideration that, in the view of many of the ablest lawyers in this country, we may now adopt a course in regard to this question which is irrevocable. And I say that to adopt a course in respect to this matter which by many of the best legal minds in this country is believed to be one that, if wrong, cannot be put right again, to adopt such a course in a dying Parliament and thus to deprive the people of their right to pronounce their opinion upon it before action is taken, is a most improper course; and I say here, from my place, that it is a course which, so far as I am concerned, I will most assuredly oppose with all the force and energy I possess, and by every means which the rules of this House enable me to pursue.

Mr. BORDEN. I suppose we should be very thankful to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McNeill) for having condescended to give a certificate of character to one-half the people of the Dominion of Canada. But that hon. gentleman could not bring himself, fair-minded as I believe he tries to be, and is in everything which does not affect his party, to extend that certificate of character to the leaders of half the people of this Dominion, and more than half the people, as they will very soon find out. Does any one suppose that the hon. gentleman believes that there is one word of truth in the statement which, I am sorry to say, he and many of his friends put forth to the people, to the effect that the leaders of the Liberal party are disloyal men? Why should he not go the full length of admitting that what he says to be true as regards the hon. members who follow those leaders is true in regard to the leaders themselves, and admit at once that they are as loyal as the people who follow them, and even as loyal as the hon. gentleman himself? No, that does not suit the political necessities of the hon. gentleman at this moment. It is one of the strongest proofs of the disastrous straits in which the Conservative party of this country finds itself to-day, that we should have been compelled to listen in this House to such a speech as came from the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. McNEILL. I rise for a moment to make a personal explanation. I do not think I have said that the leaders of the hon. gentleman's party were disloyal.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Mr. BORDEN. You did not say they were not.

Mr. McNEILL. That is for the hon. gentleman to say. I think I said they advocated a policy, and pressed it on the people, which by the late leader of the party was described as annexation in disguise. I think I also added, that among our friends and kindred on the other side of the line they had made use of certain expressions which were, to say the least, unfortunate and unhappy. I do not think I have said they are disloyal. If the hon. gentleman chooses to say that these facts prove them to be disloyal, I am not responsible for the facts.

Mr. BORDEN. Then, the leaders of the Liberal party, in the estimation of my hon. friend, were disloyal before because of their policy of reciprocity with the United States.

Mr. McNEILL. I have not said so.

Mr. BORDEN. Then, I do not understand the English language. The hon. gentleman said that our policy was annexation in disguise. I took down the words.

Mr. McNEILL. I said the hon. gentleman's late leader, Hon. Edward Blake, had said so.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman differs from my late leader.

Mr. McNEILL. Not at all.

Mr. BORDEN. He approves, then. Therefore, we get back to the point at which I started, that the hon. gentleman, using the words of Mr. Blake, said that our policy was a policy of annexation in disguise. He might as well admit at the outset that what I said was true. Diverting my attention for a moment from my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny), to whom I will return presently, I wish to say with reference to that: the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) told us that Mr. Blake stated that the Liberal policy is a policy of annexation in disguise. What is the policy of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) in 1891? He and his party, for the time being, forgot their National Policy, and they appealed to the country on a policy of reciprocity pure and simple; and the only distinguishing mark between the policy of the Liberal party and the policy of the Conservative party at that time was: that the Liberal party went a step further and was willing to include in a treaty between Canada and the United States manufactured articles in addition to natural products. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how it comes that it is perfectly loyal to bring into this country the cheap agricultural products of the United States to undersell the products of the farmers of Canada, and how it is disloyal to bring in a cheap mowing machine to enable the Canadian farmer to produce his crop cheaply. Will hon. gentlemen opposite explain wherein the disloyalty lies. According to them it is perfectly loyal and perfectly proper to bring in commodities to compete with the Canadian farmer in his industry, but when it comes to bringing in an article to interfere with the profits of the pets of this Government, the combiners, and the protected manufacturers, then, forsooth, we who advocate such a course, are a disloyal party. I desire, further, to call the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) to one difference between the appeal made to the people by the Liberal party and the appeal made to them by the Tory party in 1891. There was this essential difference: that while the Liberal party went to the country with a straightforward policy fully explained and based upon facts and truth, the Tory party appealed to the people of this country with a lie in their mouths, falsely informing the people that they had been invited by the Government of the United States to negotiate a treaty, and that it was desirable to elect a new Parliament to consider that question. I have here the letter of Mr. Blaine to Sir Julian Pauncefote, and the letter of Sir Charles Tupper, sr., to Mr. Blaine, in which Sir Charles admits that the statement made to the people of Canada by the Government of Sir John Macdonald in 1891, that the United States had asked this Government to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity, was utterly and absolutely without foundation. These gentlemen opposite are the loyal men; these are the men who abuse the prerogative of the Crown, and who abuse the privileges which they hold as servants of the people in order to snatch a victory and defeat their opponents. Now, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) was very much concerned this afternoon as to how the Liberals in this House would take certain observations which he said—and he had to misrepresent them as usual—had been made by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I tell my hon. friend (Mr. Kenny) that I am vastly more concerned for the humiliation which has been thrown upon my province by the speech which he made in the House this afternoon, and I tell him that he has lowered himself, he has lowered his province, and he has lowered this House by such utterances. The desperate straits to which the Tory party are driven are well illustrated by that speech.

That hon. gentleman we had all supposed to be a kind-hearted, honourable man, accustomed to the amenities of life and of Parliament, but we find him this afternoon deliberately putting words into the mouth of the hon. leader of the Opposition in order to make a case against him, in order to prefer a charge of disloyalty against him; and we further find him repeating the same tactics with reference to my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). And, although my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition again and again denied the truth of the quotation which the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) read, that hon. gentleman persisted in reading it again, and reiterating it, and absolutely refusing to withdraw it. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) stood upon the floor of Parliament and stated that the words which were read by the hon. member (Mr. Kenny) were words which were put in his mouth and which he did not utter.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) has unintentionally misrepresented what I stated. I said that the hon. leader of the Opposition, when he was in Boston on a memorable occasion, made use of certain language, and that he (Mr. Laurier) had stated that he refused to accept any interpretation of his speech except that which appeared in the Toronto "Globe." And Sir, in order to place myself right before the House, I read an extract from the speech, as it was handed to me hurriedly, which I understood to be that which appeared in the Toronto "Globe." The circumstances under which this debate arose were such as did not permit me time to gather that information myself, but I say that when I quoted the language of the hon. leader of the Opposition, I quoted from the Toronto "Globe," as I understood it, and from the only version of the speech by which the hon. gentleman said he would be bound.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, if you will pardon me, I will recall the facts to the hon. gentleman, which are not in the way he now recites them, because his memory is failing him, but in the way which they occurred to-day, and I leave him afterwards, and I leave the House to draw its own conclusions. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kenny) commenced by quoting a supposed speech of mine, delivered in Boston, from the report of an American newspaper. I told him that I would not be bound by that report, but that I would be bound by the report in the Toronto "Globe." Now, before I go further, I leave it to any man in this House, and especially to the leaders of the other side of the House, as to whether they will consent to be bound by the report of a speech which is condensed in a column or a half a column, when the full report of which extends over six columns. Is it fair, when there is a condensed report of one-half column and also a full verbatim report, to quote against an opponent the condensed and garbled report and not the full report? I pointed that out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kenny). Then, Sir, I must say for the hon. gentleman that he said: Very well, I will leave the report of the American paper, but I will take the rehash which was afterwards published in the Toronto "Globe." Sir, this is the basest insinuation that ever was made against an honourable man. That is what I called the attention of the hon. gentleman to, when he insinuated that after I had delivered my speech in Boston, I had deliberately gone further and made a rehash of it for the Canadian public. This is the insinuation which I resent as an insult that is intolerable in parliamentary life.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, I ask from you and from both sides of the House the indulgence to follow the hon. gentleman for a minute. The hon. gentleman has put in my mouth a word I have never used since I entered Parliament.

Mr. LAURIER. The word "rehash" is there.

Mr. KENNY. "Rehash" is not there.

Mr. LAURIER. It is there—I heard it.

Mr. KENNY. I said distinctly, that is my recollection of it, a "revised" copy of the speech.

Mr. LAURIER. No such word. We will see "Hansard."

Mr. KENNY. Well, we will see "Hansard": but at all events, I say most positively that I never used the word "rehash," and that I used the word "revised," which I think is the ordinary parliamentary term applied in this House. In the quotation which I gave, as my memory serves me, I gave two or three or four sentences from what I understand to be, and understood to be when I used it, the "Globe" report of the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. BORDEN. Well, Mr. Speaker, it does not matter very much whether the report was in the "Globe" or not. We have this fact, that the hon. leader of the Opposition has stated upon the floor of this House that the words read by the hon. gentleman and attributed to him as having been contained in a speech which he delivered, were not contained in any speech of his, and that he never used them. We have the fact, moreover, that, after that statement was made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman still persists in going on and insinuating that the hon. leader of the Opposition is disloyal and unworthy of the respect of the people of this country.

Mr. KENNY. In all fairness, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. KENNY. I can only speak with the consent of the House. What I was going to say was that the hon. gentleman is not fair in saying that I used language which the hon. leader of the Opposition did not use, because I read from the revised version of the speech in the Toronto "Globe," which the hon. gentleman said he accepted.

Mr. BORDEN. Now, Sir, what is the meaning of all this? Do hon. gentlemen suppose that the hon. member for Halifax is seriously exercised in his heart about the disloyalty of my hon. friend? Is that what is the matter? If the hon. gentleman would tell us what he honestly believes—a thing which I think he perhaps does not always do—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. BORDEN. Then, I take that back—which he always does. If the hon. gentleman would tell us that fully—because he does not always tell the whole of it—I suppose that is not unparliamentary—if the hon. gentleman would tell us what he believes about this subject, he would admit that he believes that the hon. leader of the Opposition is as loyal as he is himself. And surely nothing could be more loyal than that—than he thinks he is himself. Well, Mr. Speaker, what is the trouble? Whence these tears from hon. gentlemen opposite? What is the matter with them? I will tell you. Not that they are afraid that the Empire is going to suffer owing to the less loyalty or the want of loyalty of the leaders of the Liberal party—because the rank and file, it seems, are all loyal. It is not that: it is because the hon. gentleman sees that the hon. leader of the Opposition is getting deep into the affections of this country, and he wants, if possible, to discredit that hon. gentleman and the whole Liberal party thereby. But he will find his mistake. He will find, when the hour comes, and we hope it will come soon—the sooner the better—the people of this country from one end to the other, in spite of the slanders of his opponents, rallying around the banner of Wilfred Laurier, and putting him in the foremost place in the leadership of the Government of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I might suggest to my hon. friend from Halifax that supposing this kind of warfare is to be carried on, what may be the result if epithets and charges of this kind are to be hurled across the floor of the House?

Mr. KENNY. Well, you must not call us boodlers.

Mr. BORDEN. I never did. If any one were to say in this House that my hon. friend, who does really seem to be getting more and more loyal every hour of his life—if any man were to insinuate that his loyalty was in the slightest degree affected by the fact that he had a relative occupying a position of emolument in which he has $10,000 a year for a second term—I would be the last to make such an insinuation—or if any man were to stand on the floor of this House and say that the hon. gentleman is connected with an institution in the city of Halifax which, at a critical moment a year or so ago, by its good fortune in buying a large quantity of sugar just before the duties were increased, made one or two hundred thousand dollars, and to insinuate that the hon. gentleman's loyalty has been stimulated thereby, would it not be baseness itself? And yet, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman persists in his course, some day somebody may do that. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax devoted considerable attention, as he usually does, to my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He said that hon. gentleman had done a terrible thing; he had delivered a speech in the city of Boston. Now, Sir, it happens that I have here under my hand the report of the speech delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford in the city of Boston as it was published by the board of trade before whom it was delivered; and I suppose there cannot be any question of garbling or rehash here, because this is the authentic document put forth by that society. I find that among other things the hon. member for South Oxford made this statement:

Man for man you will gain quite as much as we will, and Canada does not come as a beggar, asking for the crumbs which fall from the rich man's table. Canada offers and Canada desires only a fair exchange and no robbery, and I for one am as anxious as yourselves that in such exchange you make dollar for dollar, because I know well that thus, and thus only, can any lasting and permanent arrangement be secured. Moreover, I believe, indeed I know, that free trade with us would be of great value to the entire northern portion of the United States, and trebly so to the people of New England and to the good city of Boston.

Now, I understand my hon. friend from Halifax to say that it would be a terrible calamity if we had reciprocity, although he was prepared to vote for it and was elected to support it in 1891. It would be a terrible thing, according to him, to have the trade of Boston increased although our own trade might, at the same time, be increased. He said the city of Halifax would suffer.

Mr. KENNY. By unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. BORDEN. He said that Charlottetown would suffer. Does not the hon. gentleman remember that, under the old treaty of 1854, the cities of Halifax, St. John and Charlottetown prospered as they never prospered before and as they have never prospered since. Yet the hon. gentleman will stand up here and tell us that if we had freer trade relations with the United States by which the city of Boston might benefit, the cities of Halifax and St. John and Charlottetown would suffer.

Mr. KENNY. Is the hon. gentleman in favour of unrestricted reciprocity?

Mr. BORDEN. The report continues:

Even as it is, your trade with Canada is not to be despised. Per head you sell more goods to Canada than to any other country. Absolutely we buy as much from you as France does, and more than any other country except Great Britain and Germany. I think, in fact, we stand third on the list of countries to which you export your productions, and we alone, 5,000,000, as we are, buy from you as much as 50,000,000 of Mexicans and South Americans do all put together. Surely, if we do this in the teeth of two hostile tariffs, it is no idle word of mine to say that you cannot measure or bound the possibilities which lie before both countries if only these artificial walls were thrown low.

And now, Sir, a few words as to our political future. I would despise myself, and you as true men would have a right to despise me, too, if I were to tell you that it was my purpose to advise my countrymen to offer themselves for sale to the best bidder or to barter their independence for trade privileges. But I will tell you frankly where we Canadians stand and what it is many of us do desire very sincerely. Ours is a very peculiar position. We are free to do as we see fit, and no British statesmen at this time of day would ever dream of attempting to coerce us. Now, we have our past history, as you have yours. We stand, in a fashion, midway between the two great English nations; we admire and respect the United States, and we also admire and respect the mother country of both of us as well. There are many among us who have long thought that the time has well-nigh come to heal completely the great breach which took place 120 years ago between England and her greatest offspring. We entertain no idle visions of political re-union or of a vast Anglo-Saxon empire, but we do think that, on certain conditions and for certain common objects, a firm and cordial alliance might well be created between the several nations which speak the English tongue, which should, humanly speaking, make it impossible that they should ever again come into hostile conflict; and we have further ventured to hope that the peculiar position of Canada, especially if close trade relations were established between her and you, might enable her to play some part in bringing about this consummation. Now, all this may prove only a devout imagination, but it surely is no unworthy one, and I do not hesitate to tell you that it is one which I greatly desire to see brought about.

Now, Sir, those are the words criticised by the hon. member for Halifax. Is there in them one word of disloyalty, one word at which the most loyal man of the British Empire could take alarm? Those are the words of a Canadian statesman uttered in Boston in 1891. I have under hand words uttered by a British statesman, the well-nigh leader of the British Government, the second in command. Mr. Balfour, in a recent speech, made use of this significant language:

War with the United States of America appeared to himself, and, doubtless, to his hearers, also, to be enveloped with the unnatural horror of a civil war, which, with any nation, is a terror to be avoided at all costs except dishonour. Beyond their common ancestry, language and civilization, he believed, he said, that the British people had a pride of race which embraced every English-speaking community in the world and an Anglo-Saxon patriotism.

It seems to me that in spirit this utterance of Mr. Balfour does not differ very much from the words uttered by the hon. Sir Richard Cartwright in Boston in 1891. Now, there was one point which I omitted to state with reference to these superloyal gentlemen who were so much alarmed that our policy of 1891 was disloyal. Have they forgotten that their leader in 1871 was prepared to carry out with the United States an arrangement for absolute and full commercial union with that country. And yet who would think of charging the Tory party with disloyalty, although they were prepared to go to the extent of adopting the United States tariff in 1871. Those hon. gentlemen prate of their loyalty. Is it possible that they are the gentlemen whose organ in Toronto, a few years ago, when the assertion was ventured by the Liberal party that the inauguration of the National Policy, with its high taxes, worked injury to the British connection, said: "If the 'National Policy injured British connection, 'so much the worse for British connection.'" The hon. gentleman from Halifax city referred to my hon. friend, Mr. Fielding, in connection with the repeal movement, but I need only barely refer to his attack because my hon. friend for Queen's (P.E.I.) has dealt with it pretty effectively. But it is only fair that I, coming from Nova Scotia and having taken some part in that fight should have a word to say. The hon. member for Halifax characterized the repeal movement in Nova Scotia in 1886 as dishonest and disloyal. Is it possible that he who thus characterized the movement in favour of repeal is the gentleman who stood on the platform in Halifax and said that he was bound to admit that Confederation had been a bitter disappointment and a dismal failure.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman is right. I said it had been a bitter disappointment, but I did not say that it was a dismal failure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was not sweetened at that time.

Mr. BORDEN. Several things have happened since then, and we have not heard the hon. gentleman talk of it as a bitter disappointment since some time ago. Is it to be wondered if this hon. gentleman, wealthy, occupying a high social position, having inherited a large fortune, with everything round him calculated to make him happy and comfortable all his life long—and who supported the Government which carried Confederation without submitting it to the people of Nova Scotia—is it to be wondered at if this hon. gentleman thought that Confederation was a bitter disappointment, that the hundreds of thousands of people of Nova Scotia who hated it for itself and hated it because, although supposed to be a free people, they were allowed no opportunity to say whether they wanted it or not, should feel keen disappointment? Is it any wonder that this thing should have rankled in the breasts of the people of my province and that this feeling of unrest and bitter disappointment, to use the words of the hon. gentleman, culminated in what is known as the repeal movement of 1836? The hon. gentleman talks about dishonesty, talks about disloyalty. Sir, he is the last man who should impute motives of dishonesty or disloyalty, after the exhibition we have had from him to-day. Dishonest How is it dishonest? Are the people of Nova Scotia dishonest because they object to having their constitution legislated away from them without so much as a “by-your-leave”? And when the man who is mainly responsible for that is being brought back from England to take charge of the Government of this country, is it any wonder that the old feeling is aroused, and has the hon. gentleman any right to apply the word “dishonesty” to that movement because that feeling manifests itself? We thought that we had representative institutions in this country. The Liberal leaders, years ago, fought hard for those institutions, and we supposed, until the moment Confederation was carried without asking us whether we wanted it or not, that we had responsible government in this country—that is, government according to the well-understood wishes of the people. Is it disloyal for the Government in a province to submit to the people of that province whether or not they are satisfied with the constitution under which they live? Anybody would suppose, from the language of the hon. gentleman that companies were being organized, that men were being armed to seek our freedom by force, and that disloyalty to Great Britain was involved. Sir, it was proposed to go to the foot of the throne and lay our grievances before Her Majesty the Queen and to proceed entirely upon the lines of constitutional precedent in such matters. Consequently, I say it is wrong, it is unjust, it is untrue—and if parliamentary usages allowed I would characterize it in stronger language—this imputation that the hon. gentleman casts upon the vast majority of the people of his own province. Now, it is not my intention, at this moment, to enter into a discussion of matters specially pertaining to the Address. This is a debate, as I understand, which has arisen upon the motion to adjourn the House, and I felt, coming as I do from the province of Nova Scotia, that it was my duty not to allow this incident to pass without expressing my opinions concerning the matters referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. CASEY. The tactics pursued on this occasion by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) who is practically the subject of the present debate, remind one of the trick often practised by street boys when they are having a faction fight. When one party is getting a little the better of the other, a boy of the weaker faction picks up a gob of mud and throws it in the face of one of his opponents. Then the whole party scuttles round the corner while the bespattered urchin is clawing his face clear of the mud. The hon. gentleman is imitating the tactics of the street gamin; he has scooped up the largest gob of the dirtiest mud he could find, and has slung it at these benches. And he has succeeded in securing the retreat of his party for this afternoon and evening, at least, from the subject of discussion.

But he has succeeded in something else which I regret even more than that. He has succeeded in giving the House a new conception of himself. We have never supposed that a gentleman so polished, of such high social connections, of such suave manner in his intercourse outside this House, would have such a contemptibly low idea of the duties of a member of Parliament as to pursue such a policy as he has pursued this afternoon. The hon. gentleman has taken to mud-slinging. He has lowered himself in the opinion of this House and of his constituents, but the only mud that will stick is that which will stick to himself.

So far as this talk about loyalty is concerned, no harm will be done by it to any body in Canada except to the hon. member from Halifax. We know what this is all about. We know, as the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden) has said, that the hon. gentleman is not worried about the loyalty of the Opposition or the maintenance of the connection between Britain and Canada. We all know that the hon. gentleman was partly talking through his hat, and partly for the pending election in Cape Breton. We know that the object of these tactics is simply a little electioneering dodge, if dodge is not an unparliamentary—

Mr. SPEAKER. It is unparliamentary.

Mr. CASEY. Electioneering plan then, to influence the electors of Cape Breton in favour of the great man who, though so strong in the sympathies of his fellow-citizens of Nova Scotia, seems to require assistance of this mud-slinging kind. That is the object of the whole rumpus, if “rumpus” is not an irregular word—

Mr. FOSTER. That is a compound word.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, “rum” and “puss.” We have heard a good deal about “pussies” lately, and no doubt the idea remained in the mind of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. Where the "rum" comes in the hon. gentleman can explain better than I!

I say this sort of tactics can do no harm in Canada, for we know it is only a "diversion" of the enemy. But, Sir, there is an audience that will absorb the hon. gentleman's muddy eloquence with avidity. There is an audience whom, if it is not addressed to them intentionally, it will, at least, reach as a matter of fact—I mean the hoodlums of Yankeedom, the mob of the cities in the United States, those who for one reason or another have a spite against England, and those who wish to plunder the hen-roosts of Canada. These form the sympathetic audience for such talk. These are the people who will greedily read the utterances of my hon. friend from Halifax; these are the people to whom the charge of disloyalty against the majority of the people of Canada—and I say majority advisedly—will be most welcome. He has made a speech to-day, he has made allegations—and those who have picked up those allegations and continued the debate on that side of the House are equally responsible with him—I say that he and they have made speeches and allegations which will be greedily devoured by that element in the United States which wishes to see the humiliation of England and the plunder of Canada.

For this reason these tactics, which would otherwise be merely contemptible and childish, have become markedly dangerous. In the present condition of the mind of the people of the United States, a firebrand thrown by the hands of a man assumedly loyal, a firebrand like this, may kindle feelings on the other side of the line that may lead to serious difficulties between the two countries. In the present crisis such tactics are disloyal to Canada, disloyal to Britain, are a treacherous undermining of the interests of Canada, and ought to be denounced, and will be denounced in the strongest terms by every man in this House and in this country who is a lover of Canada. I say, Sir, that language too strong cannot be applied to that sort of tactics, because nothing could more markedly injure Canada in the eyes of the world.

I am not going to recriminate. There is plenty of material for recrimination, there is mud lying as ready to our hands as it did to the hands of the hon. member for Halifax. Mud could be slung from our side also in regard to disloyalty. But I would not be guilty of such treason to my country as to insinuate that hon. gentlemen opposite are disloyal. I know they are not, however they may be misled for the time being into language of this kind, which in its results, has all the effect of disloyalty. I know that the men themselves do not mean to be disloyal to Canada, and, therefore, I will not recriminate.

But, Sir, this incident should be marked by such general condemnation, that never again, when the monopolists of this country, the combinesters of this country, the refinesters of this country, feel their craft in danger, shall they feel inclined to raise the cry of loyalty, and to declare that those who object to being oppressed by them are disloyal to Canada or to Britain. I think, perhaps, they have had a lesson on the subject this afternoon and to-night that will teach them to be more guarded in their expressions in the future; if they have not had it now, they will have it when they stand before a jury of their fellow-countrymen and are tried and convicted at the polls.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. leader of the Opposition has drawn my attention to the fact that I may have used the word "rehash." I was under the impression I used the word "revision." If I have used the word "rehash," I entirely withdraw it. I understood from the hon. gentleman last year or the year before, when this matter of the report of his Boston speech came up, that he was only bound by the report of his speech which appeared in the Toronto "Globe." That was satisfactory to me, and in order to put myself right with the House I desire to say, I find that in 1895 I quoted the hon. gentleman's speech directly from the Toronto "Globe." I had it not by me to-day, as I had not the slightest expectation that any such debate was coming up; but I rise simply for the purpose of withdrawing entirely and unreservedly the word "rehash." If used in the hurry of debate, I regret it.

Motion to adjourn (Mr. Langelier) negatived.

Mr. MASSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that a commission to assist the Speaker in the business of the House, the Commission on Internal Economy, has not yet been appointed.

Mr. FOSTER. No; I think it must have escaped attention. It should have been done the first week, but it will be attended to at the next sitting of the House.

RETURN ON SUPERANNUATION.

Mr. McMULLEN. In connection with the return the Minister has laid on the Table of the House regarding superannuation, he will remember that last year there was an order of this House for a return giving receipts and expenditures under the head of superannuation, from the inception of the Act down to the present time. The hon. Minister amended the resolution I presented to the House to meet some views he held himself with regard to the form in which it should be presented. That return has never been presented to the House, so far as I can learn it has not been brought down, and I would like to know from the Finance Minister if it is his intention to bring down at an early period in this session the return that the House has ordered last session in regard to superannuation.

Mr. FOSTER. It is my intention to bring it down at an early period. I shall charter a conveyance and have it brought very early next week.

GRAIN IMPORTED BY DISTILLERS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he can, from the returns made to date, lay before the House a statement of the amount of grain imported by each of the distillers of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that can be done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like very much to get this return at an early date, if it can be got without being moved for.

Mr. FOSTER. Properly it ought to be moved for, but I will see the Controller of Customs and have it facilitated. In the meantime, the hon. gentleman will just send a note of what he requires.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. RIDER. Can the Finance Minister inform us when we may look for the Auditor General's Report?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend may look for it now, it is under way. I do not think he will have to keep long looking before it will be down. I think the Auditor General is arranging it in sections this year, so that it can be fired off more quickly. I think we may have some sections of it next week, if you hurry up this debate on the Address.

REPORTS.

The Public Accounts of Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1895.—(Mr. Foster.)

The Civil Service List of Canada, 1895.—(Mr. Ouimet.)

Report of the Commissioner, Dominion Police Force, for the year 1895, under Revised Statutes of Canada, Chapter 184, section 5.—(Mr. Daly.)

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 20th January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Powell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session.

Mr. MASSON. Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure, indeed, in supporting the motion now in your hands, and the Address to which it refers. Although considerable time has been occupied in the debate on this Address, I claim the indulgence of the House for the privilege of saying a few words in respect to the main clauses contained in it. I would not pass over those references in the Speech which has so far received but little attention, but, at the same time, I shall not attempt to occupy the time of the House in speaking at any length on those clauses which do not appear to be of specially great importance at this particular session. I believe, Sir, that the country may very well be congratulated upon the evidences of increased activity in the various branches of commerce and industries. I was surprised to hear the leader of the Opposition receive this announcement in the Address with sneers and with doubts. While it must be admitted that, during the last few years, Canada, in common with the rest of the world, suffered to a certain extent from the wave of depression that commenced in our sister colonies of Australia and spread over the civilized world, doing greatest havoc, perhaps, in the United States and in the mother land, yet we must remember that Canada experienced but a small share of that disaster, although, indeed, her industries and commerce were, to a certain extent, checked. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to close their eyes to the fact that, within the last few months, within the last year specially, there has been a marked increase in our commerce, as denoted by our exports and imports. There has also been a marked improvement in our industries as shown by the employment of more labour, by our workmen making extra time, and by the increased orders received in our factories. All these signs of improvement, hon. gentlemen opposite choose to close their eyes to. To them it is no reason for congratulation. Their hopes seem to have rested upon the fact that Canada was suffering from hard times, that depression had at last reached her shores, and, on this wave of depression, hon. gentlemen opposite hoped, sincerely hoped, to ride into power. It is, therefore, with no feeling of congratulation that they notice these evidences of increased prosperity. But, surely hon. gentlemen opposite should have received with feelings of joy, the statement in the Address that His Excellency had met in the Northwest demonstrations of loyalty and good-will from the Indian population. Not only at the present time, but in times past, Canada has been able to congratulate herself that the Indian population has been loyal. However, the leader of the Opposition received the word loyalty, as applied to the Indians, with sneers, as if such a thing as loyalty was foreign to the Indian breast. Such has not been the record of Canadian history with regard to our Indians. We have been able to congratulate ourselves upon Indian loyalty, in contradistinction, be it remembered, with the experience of our neighbours to the south. I was, however, pleased to hear the leader of the Opposition admit that the North-west Mounted Police were a fine body of men, and were indispensable, and were doing good service. He agreed with that particular reference in the Address, but he did not leave the subject until he threw out a cue to his followers, which was readily taken up by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), by condemning the expense of that indispensable and efficient force. The announcement that the Imperial authorities have expressed a willingness to grant a substantial subvention towards a fast Atlantic service is also a matter for congratulation to the country, although it surprised me to see that hon. gentlemen opposite received it with feelings the reverse of grateful. This question has long been before the people of Canada, and in every part of this Dominion it has, from the outset, received a unanimous support. The good that such a fast line of steamers between Canada and the mother land would do to Canadian commerce, and would do towards filling up with population the vacant lands of Canada and bringing here a worthy class of immigrants, is so well known that it does not require to be commented upon at all. Still, hon. gentlemen opposite seem to look upon that scheme as impossible of accomplishment. The reference to the cable service with our sister colonies of Australia is also received by hon. gentlemen opposite with the same sneer. That such a cable service would be of great advantage, not only to Canada, but to the Empire at large, is an admitted fact. It seems to me, Sir, that those hon. gentlemen opposite, who, in times past, have shown no faith in their country, still cling to that want of faith, and declare, if not in words, by their actions and inferences, that such a thing is impossible for Canada to achieve. But the measures suggested to be taken this session for the extension and development of our trade in agricultural products with the United Kingdom are such as one would suppose, from the resolution on this subject which hon. gentlemen opposite voted for only last session, would surely be received with applause. Not so, however. On the contrary, any attempt by the Government to aid agriculture seems to them to be foolishness. A sneer is made at the aid given to the butter trade. It is not to be supposed that the Government are going into the greengrocery business in competition with the private trader. But what has been done in the way of developing the trade in cheese and butter in Great Britain, and protecting it from inroads from without, by branding our products in such a way that they will be recognized as Canadian wherever they go, and that our neighbours to the south will be prevented from gaining an unfair advantage from our good name, has accrued to the benefit of the agriculturists of Canada, and the agriculturists of Canada are, I believe, in favour of the Government going on with that good work. But, Sir, the one clause in this Address which has occupied so much time in this House and has called for so much debate—and it is not to be wondered at—is that which refers to the reason why some six months ago this session was promised, which is probably the main cause for calling Parliament together so early in the year. I refer to the Manitoba school question. That that question is a serious one—serious in more ways than one—must be admitted on all hands. It is true, some very learned individuals have written of that question as a very trifling thing, which any man outside of the range of politics could very easily settle. That may be, but it happens that people outside of the range of politics are not called upon to settle it. It may be said, and it may be said truly, that it would be well if Manitoba should settle this question itself. I echo that sentiment, and I say that the Greenway Government missed an opportunity of placing themselves on record as statesmen, when after the delivery of the judgment of the Privy Council, they did not at once readily set themselves to work to remedy the grievance. They had entered, honestly we will assume, upon what they called a reform. They had passed an Act, honestly we may say, which they considered for the benefit of the province of Manitoba. That Act had passed through the courts and had received from the highest tribunal in the Empire its interpretation, to the effect that it had caused a grievance to the minority, which grievance might be made the subject of an appeal to this Parliament. The law having been thus declared, it was certainly the duty of the Premier of Manitoba, at once, without waiting for any application to be made to the federal government or for any further proceedings whatever, to take the judgment of the Privy Council as his cue, and set himself to redress the grievance. Had he done that, even in a half-hearted way, in all probability, considering the difficulties surrounding the question, his remedy, no matter how trifling, might have been accepted on all hands. But instead of doing that, which any patriot, any law-abiding subject of the realm would naturally suppose to be the proper course for a man entrusted with the destinies of a new and growing province, he put the judgment of the Privy Council at defiance, and declared that Manitoba would have her own way. Now, so often has this matter been discussed that it seems almost useless to repeat the various stages through which it has passed. I will, therefore, content myself with barely repeating them, without dwelling on them at any length. Shortly after the establishment of the province of Manitoba, the School Act was passed allowing denominational schools. That Act was taken advantage of by more than one denomination, but especially by the Roman Catholics, who established separate schools under it, and these schools flourished for twenty years. The work that was being done in these schools, whether it was efficient or inefficient, was not the result of the Act, but the result of the administration of education in the province. The provincial government had power to interfere and refuse to grant public money to schools which were not doing efficient work. They had a right to make such regulations with that object; and no person, Catholic or Protestant, French or English, would for one moment have blamed any government for saying: Our public money is for efficient schools, not for inefficient schools. Therefore, whether the schools were efficient or inefficient matters not to the principle involved, for it is just as possible to administer two branches as one. But for some reason, which we may assume to be well-founded and honestly acted upon, the Manitoba government, by one stroke of the pen as it were, struck out all this legislation. Not only did they destroy the system, but they practically confiscated the property of the separate schools. That such an Act would create trouble in the province and cause the minority to consider themselves aggrieved, could not be disputed; and the highest court in the realm has declared that it has caused a grievance and such a grievance as is worthy of a remedy. After the passage of the Act, those dissatisfied with it took what to their minds was the speediest way of having it rendered ineffective: they applied to the federal government for a veto. The Act being considered by those in authority here as within the jurisdiction, or at least debatably so, of the provincial legislature, they refused to veto it. In so doing I think everybody at the present day will agree that they acted wisely at that stage; for the question was worthy of greater consideration than could be given to it simply on the question of applying the veto. One and perhaps the main reason for the Government here not vetoing the Act was that the people who were dissatisfied with it, immediately started proceedings in the courts. As that was the right course to take to have the question of jurisdiction thoroughly tested, the cases entered were allowed to proceed. They went on step by step until they reached the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England. The decision of that body, solemnly given, was that the legislation was within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature; that is, that by the section which corresponds with the second subsection of section 93 of our British North America Act, the provincial legislature had power to pass such a law. They then sought relief under the section which corresponds with the third subsection in the British North America Act, which provides that where these separate schools existed at the union or shall be established after the union, although the provincial legislature has power to interfere with them, there is the right of appeal against such legislation. Now, though that is an exceptional case in legislation, it is by no means an exceptional thing. For instance, the courts of our country have jurisdiction to try many cases in which, after they have tried them, their judgments are the subject of appeal. But, with reference to legislation, with reference to the dealings between the provinces and the federal government, this exceptional clause is the only case in which the right of appeal, as a right of appeal upon the merits, lies to the federal government and this Parliament. While it was decided that the right to legislate was conceded, as decided by the first Privy Council judgment, the right of appeal was still there and was taken advantage of. A petition to appeal was laid before the federal government, and a day fixed for its hearing. The Manitoba government was notified. How did the Manitoba government treat the notice? It stood strong on its rights; it had obtained one judgment upon one question, and would have had nothing to do with any further questions. It treated the notice with indifference and refused to attend, refused to take any part in the proceedings at all, so that the petition came to be heard before the Privy Council of Canada without any opposition from the Manitoba government. But so careful was the Government, under the direction of the late Sir John Thompson, that a reference was made to the Supreme Court to test every possible legal question that could be raised, and have an answer from that court before taking any action. A reply having been given against the minority, the minority asked leave to appeal to the Privy Council of England. There the Manitoba government was represented, and its case was argued by the best counsel obtainable—one who knew more of the history and details of this trouble, probably, than any other person in the world, and who went from Canada to take part in that argument. Judgment was given in favour of the minority, and the judgment not only declared that the case was a subject of appeal, but that there was a grievance, and that the minority were entitled to remedy. It was clearly the duty of the Manitoba government to immediately act upon that statement. What use was there in having the matter brought before the federal parliament when the Manitoba government knew exactly what the law was, knew what interpretation the highest court in the realm had placed upon it, and what remedy it had suggested—a remedy which would not interfere with the public schools of the majority, but would give the small minority of Manitoba the right to deal with their own affairs as they had done in the past. The Privy Council having decided that an appeal did lie, an appeal was then made to this Government. A great cry has been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, and even the leader of the Opposition has thrown out the hint that the matter was hurried through without sufficient time being given. I do not see in the records that the time given or asked for was objected to or insufficient. What was time required for? Was it to produce facts? Certainly not, because the official returns were there as evidence of the facts. Everything was there to show the position of these schools as they were in 1890. All the evidence necessary had been laid on the Table before the committee. It was not for the purpose of obtaining evidence as to the facts that the counsel asked for and was granted an adjournment. It was simply to prepare his argument—not to hunt up evidence, not to give additional facts or make additional inquiries. Therefore, the matter was fairly treated, and it is too late in the day for anyone on behalf of Manitoba to come forward and say that the case was hurried through and that further time was required to look up evidence and investigate. The case was heard before the Government of the Dominion, and then, during last session, we heard the complaint that the order given by the Government was arbitrary, that it was at least open to the charge of being arbitrary, that Manitoba was justified in applying that interpretation to it, and in decidedly refusing to do anything whatever under that order. A defiant answer was given by the Manitoba government. Upon the plea of harshness advanced in their behalf, this Government granted a further delay, and a new Order in Council was passed inviting proposals for a negotiation, and stating in plain language what would be satisfactory. There is no room to doubt what the reply of the Manitoba government was to this new Order in Council of July. We have listened to the very ingenious argument of the hon. leader of the Opposition as to what the issues were between the local Opposition and government in Manitoba and what position the people of Manitoba had taken. But I think we have far better authority in the statements made by the members of the Manitoba government themselves when they appealed to the people. In the opening of the campaign, a speech delivered by Mr. Sifton, and reported in the "Tribune" on the 2nd and again on the 3rd of January last contains the following language:

The school question has been before the people in various phases for six or seven years, but it is only within the last few weeks that it has been clear that there was to be a conflict. The Dominion Government has taken the position of forcing separate schools upon us, and we are determined that they shall not. This is our stand, and it is to ascertain the mind of the people on the question that we are now before you. Of course, everybody says that Manitoba is a unit on the question, but the way to ascertain this properly and constitutionally is to do what we have done, and apply to the electorate.

That statement, in which the declaration is made that the Manitoba government absolutely declined the proposition of this Government, was made by Mr. Sifton, a member of the Manitoba government, in the presence of his leader, Mr. Greenway. But if we wish to have Mr. Greenway's statement, we have it in his address over his own signature, published in the same paper. After reciting the Order in Council, which, he said, asked for the re-establishment of Catholic schools, and with reading which I shall not trouble the House, he goes on to speak of the Order in Council of the 27th of July:

As to the communication forwarded in pursuance of the announcement by the Dominion Government of the 27th of July last, inviting the Manitoba government to take such action as would remedy the alleged grievances of the minority, we did reply, definitely and positively rejecting the proposition to establish separate schools in any way, and expressed our intention to uphold our present uniform non-sectarian system.

Now, nothing can be plainer than that. But what is the question he says the electors are to vote on:

I ask you, in conclusion, to remember that the main issue upon which you are to pronounce is the only important one. Shall the people of Manitoba submit without protest to unjust and overbearing treatment? Shall provincial autonomy be practically abandoned? Shall our national system be destroyed? These are the questions, gentlemen, which you are required to answer by the exercise of your franchise.

Now, whatever may be the interpretation of the issue by the hon. leader of the Opposition, there is only one interpretation placed before the people by the members of that government. They admit that the order of 27th July invited them to remedy the evil, and they emphatically said they would not. The order of 27th July being received in that way, there was nothing left for the Government but to call this session of Parliament and carry out the promise they had made. I have traced the action of the Government but without dwelling at length upon the point, and have shown that step after step was taken with judicial care—care to ascertain what the legal position was, care to ascertain what the rights and privileges infringed upon were, and what remedy should be applied. But, while approached by this Government—in fact by successive governments—with all this judicial care, what has been the position of the Opposition? In such a unique question as this, a question outside the ordinary range of politics, a question of nobody's seeking, coming here neither at the bidding of the Government nor at the bidding of the Opposition, but arising under the constitution, the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite, their clear duty as citizens of this land, was to give their aid and assistance in finding a solution of the problem. But such has not been their course, no assistance has been given by them from first to last. They have assumed, or have pretended to occupy the position of disinterested lookers-on, but during the whole time, by their actions and their words, not as much in this House as in the country and through their press, they have been aiding those who were taking a stand against remedying the evil that has been declared by the highest courts in the realm to exist. The hon. gentleman says it was not for him to commit himself to any particular line of action, that he stood within the charmed circle of the Opposition and it was not for him to assist the Government. In ordinary political questions, perhaps it is not the bounden duty of the Opposition to assist the Government: but in national and constitutional questions of this kind, it is certainly the duty of every citizen to assist in keeping them out of party lines. But while hon. gentlemen opposite have been saying that they were not taking any part in this matter but merely disinterested lookers-on, several of their leaders have been able to talk on both sides of the question at the same time. They have been able in the most surprising manner, not only to make the attempt which many stump speakers might make of speaking on both sides, but the leader of the Opposition especially has been very fortunate in succeeding in the attempt. As the hon. gentleman has already taken exception to statements that have appeared in the newspapers as being correct reports of his speeches, I shall not charge the hon. gentleman with using any particular set of words. If I quote any words as being attributed to the hon. gentleman I quote them simply as appearing in newspapers not unfriendly to him, and I shall quote them not as his words, but as the words of the reporter who heard him. If I make any charge against the hon. gentleman it will not be for uttering these particular words or even for uttering any words that would justify the reporter in attributing to him these expressions, but for having stood quietly by while these words were published and commented upon day after day, week after week and month after month without contradicting them in the quarter where a contradiction would not meet with applause, but where the publication of them did meet with applause. Now, it may be stated that the hon. gentleman has contradicted in a more or less definite manner the statement which I am going to read. I find the best and strongest contradiction in the Toronto "Globe" of 30th September, where, commenting upon a letter received by Mr. Alexander Smith, Secretary of the Ontario Liberal Association of Toronto in answer to a letter that gentleman had written to the leader of the Opposition, the "Globe" gives this as a quotation from the hon. gentleman's letter, and I suppose he will admit that it is a correct one:

With regard to these offensive statements which are attributed to me by the Conservative press, I need not tell you that they are absolutely false. Those who know me, friends or foes, know very well that they are absolutely out of keeping with the language I have always made use of ever since I have been in public life.

Now, I do not intend to quote from or refer to any of the Tory newspapers. I have in my hand the file of "L'Electeur," which I understand to be the organ of the hon. leader of the Opposition. It is a paper published in the city of Quebec and circulating largely through some twenty constituencies, claiming to have a daily issue of 20,000 and to be the only organ of the Liberal party in these twenty constituencies. In "L'Electeur" of 3rd September, we find a report—no, I will not call it a report, because the hon. gentleman objects to his speeches being quoted unless the whole six columns of the speech are read—it is only a notice of a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman at Chicoutimi on 1st September. It has the black letter head of ordinary political news "Laurier at Chicoutimi. Cheered by four thousand people. Special despatch to L'Electeur:"

Chicoutimi, September 2.

Saturday was the greatest day ever seen in Chicoutimi. Our little town presented a charming aspect. Nothing but flags and banners everywhere floating in the breeze. Our streets were crowded with people. The whole country seemed to be here to welcome our eloquent fellow-countryman, whose name has filled the political world of recent years. Yesterday, four thousand persons were present on the arrival of the boat that carried the Liberal leader. The meeting began at 11 o'clock. It was opened by Mr. Savard, advocate and M.P., who read the address of welcome. Mr. Laurier replied in a two-hours speech,—

Quite sufficient to fill six columns, I have no doubt.

—reviewing all the questions now occupying the public mind: the fiscal policy, the wasting of the public moneys, and lastly the school question. The Liberal leader reiterated, amidst indescribable enthusiasm, his solemn engagement to re-establish Catholic schools on attaining power. The Conservatives were equally enthusiastic with the Liberals, and applauded frantically. "I know," says Mr. Laurier, "that I shall be called upon to carry out this undertaking, for the present Government cannot settle the question. How could you expect men who have taken an oath to stifle Catholic influence, to re-establish Catholic schools, which are the very source of that influence? Thank God, there are no Orangemen among us Liberals, and whensoever the people entrust to me the control of public affairs, I shall only need to appeal to the Christian sentiments of my supporters to induce them to render justice where justice is due."

Mr. LANDERKIN. Might I ask the hon. gentleman if the Government have not kicked the Orangemen out of their Cabinet?

Mr. MASSON. If the hon. gentleman will only give notice of his question, we will give him an answer. Now, as I said before, I do not charge that these are the words of the hon. gentleman; but what I do say is that they appear in a report printed in his own journal, appearing under his own eye, and remaining there to this day, uncontradicted, being the text of editorial after editorial up to the present day, relying upon the statement that the Liberal leader had entered into a solemn engagement to re-establish Catholic schools. The changes upon that text have been rung day in and day out for the last four months. Taking that speech as the morning lesson, they have preached on it in season and out of season, and proclaimed that the Liberal leader had entered into a solemn engagement to re-establish separate schools. They have also put forth quite a number of articles upon these words as their text:

How could you expect men who have taken an oath to stifle Catholic influence, to re-establish separate schools?

That has been read over and over again by the 20,000 subscribers of L'Electeur; that has been kept prominently before their minds, and has been done with the sanction and consent of the leader of the Opposition. Now it appears, Mr. Speaker, that these statements and these editorials were based upon the speech made upon that occasion to the admiring 4,000 people of Chicoutimi. The hon. gentleman used words that justified the reporter in sending forth that special despatch, and though he may not have used those exact words, he used words that meant the same thing. He used words, perhaps, far finer and grander and more embellished with flowery rhetoric, but they meant the same thing. It was not possible to send forth a six-column article, but the reporter sent forth the kernel of that speech, and the kernel is contained in that extract of which the two main features are, first, that the leader of the Opposition is under an engagement to re-establish separate schools; and, secondly, the question, how can the French-Canadians of Quebec expect men who have sworn to stifle Catholic influence, to re-establish separate schools? Who does the hon. gentleman refer to? Who is referred to by his organ as the men who have sworn to stifle Catholic influence? As a Protestant from Ontario I know of no such men. Where are the men who are sworn to stifle Catholic influence? What does the hon. gentleman mean by allowing such a statement as that to be put forth before the French-Canadian electors? What does he mean when he allows that same statement to be copied by the Tory press of Quebec, and objects when it appears in the province of Ontario? What does he mean when he speaks with regard to this "offensive statement." What is the offensive statement? Is it that these men have sworn to stifle Catholic influence? Is that what he calls an offensive statement? Is the offensive statement he alludes to the statement that he thanks God that there are no Orangemen among the Liberals? That is his denial, take it for what it is worth. I give him credit for the denial, and give him credit for publishing it in the Protestant province of Ontario. I also give him credit for the motive that tempted him to publish it, when I tell you that it is in a letter received by the secretary of the Liberal Association in reply to one sent to him. But it was not the fact that the hon. gentleman had made that statement, and had kept it before the electors for so long, that I was specially intending to deal with. I wished more especially to bring before the House the hon. gentleman's great ability in speaking both ways at the same meeting. Now, Sir, that same speech is elsewhere reported, at least noticed, by a friendly reporter of the Liberal organ in Manitoba, in the special despatches of the day. We find the same speech is specially despatched to Winnipeg and is there reported in the Liberal organ, in which Mr. Laurier, the leader of the Opposition, is referred to in these words:

He will stand upon the broad principle of provincial rights, and decline to interfere with this province beyond making a request for what he may deem the fairest of fair treatment of the minority under the circumstances. Mr. Laurier does not believe in separate schools; he is too advanced and liberal a thinker to endorse them.

There, the hon. gentleman who had spoken before the admiring 4,000 in Chicoutimi, was able to impress upon the minds of those who wished to see separate schools re-established, that he was under a solemn engagement to re-establish them; and he also had the ability to impress upon a friendly reporter who was there reporting for his friends in Manitoba, that he was not in favour of separate schools at all, that he was too advanced a Liberal thinker to endorse any such ancient affair as that. Such then is the ability of the hon. gentleman. It seems surprising to the ordinary mind that an hon. gentleman is able in the same speech, without even taking the trouble to deliver one speech in one province and another in a different province, to have such absolutely different reports. Such reports were issued in Manitoba, and the Winnipeg "Tribune" has harped on the line that the Liberal leader is not in favour of separate schools and will not re-establish them, while at the same time other journals claim he is pledged to re-establish them. However, this ability possessed by the hon. gentleman has been noticed before. I did intend to refer to some speeches delivered by the hon. leader of the Opposition in 1891-93 and 1895, but this House had such an excellent sample the other day that I need not go further back than the hon. gentleman's speech in this debate. Hon. members will recollect that the hon. gentleman endeavoured to convince the House that the issue between the Opposition and the Government of Manitoba was whether there should be modifications or should not, that the Liberals were in favour of moderation—which is the word used by the hon. gentleman—and the Opposition were not. Why the hon. gentleman should endeavour to establish such an issue in the face of the speeches of the ministers and the Opposition in the west is incomprehensible. However, the hon. gentleman has done so; he established the position to his own satisfaction, and no doubt persons hearing the matter discussed for the first time would be satisfied that the issue in Manitoba was, whether the Government should remain in power to remedy the evil, or whether the Opposition should come in and prevent a remedy being applied. I will quote a few of the words uttered by the hon. gentleman. He said:

The issue raised against Mr. Greenway by the Conservative Opposition was, that if the people of Manitoba wanted to keep their school system intact, they should not trust him (Mr. Greenway), because he might make concessions to the minority, but they should remove him from power, and elect his opponents to power.

Then, in order to prove that position, he took up speeches made by his opponents and quoted from them—and if any other hon. gentleman had selected two or three lines from speeches and a few lines from a newspaper article and had woven these together into a piece of fancy crazy work, the hon. gentleman would have denounced the result as a garbled report; however, such was given by him as positive proof that that was the issue before the elections. In order to show the great versatility of the hon. gentleman in argument, I will quote a statement made by the hon. gentleman when dealing with another phase of the same issue:

There was no issue between the two parties on this point; all agreed upon this, that the system of public schools should be maintained intact and inviolate.

There is a sample of the hon. gentleman's ability to make statements in the same speech that were of an entirely contradictory character. In the course of the hon. gentleman's speech he declared there was an issue—an issue that never did exist, an issue that cannot be proved by any record, an issue that the statements, both of Ministers and members of the Opposition, emphatically deny—and then the hon. gentleman wound up by stating there was no issue whatever, that all parties agreed on the point that the public schools should remain intact and inviolate. The hon. gentleman came here with a solution lately dreamt of, a solution without a detail. He came to the House with a reference, no matter to what, with something to cause delay, something to stave off the approaching day, something to keep this matter dangling before the people at the next election, something no matter what, a reference or a commission. It is not so long ago, in 1893, that the hon. gentleman said that there was only one point to inquire into—were schools of Manitoba Protestant or were they not? In 1895 the hon. gentleman asked himself the same question, for during the two intervening years he had not succeeded in finding out whether the public schools of Manitoba were Protestant or were not. But the inference he drew on both occasions was that if they were Protestant, then the minority were entitled to relief. Now, there is no question about the Manitoba schools being Protestant. They are Protestant in the minds of the Catholic population, they are Protestant in the minds of Protestant clergymen, and they are Protestant in the opinion of no less an authority than Principal Grant of Queen's College. Those schools were not made non-religious, as the author of the Bill intended them to be; but the influence of the Protestant majority and the Protestant ministers who assembled in Winnipeg at the time had an effect on the Act as it passed through its different stages, and it did not come out of the House as it went in, a measure for purely secular schools. That being the case, what else is there into which the hon. gentleman seeks to inquire? He apparently now seeks to inquire as to whether they are well conducted, as to whether they are satisfactory and efficient. Does any reasonable man ask whether separate schools established in sparsely populated districts come up to the requirements of schools in the more thickly settled districts? Everyone in Ontario knows well that in our rural districts those schools are not what town or city men would call efficient, unless it happens that the school in question is situated in a solid block where the residents are of one religion. There we have some good and efficient schools; but where the population is mixed, the alternate farms being occupied by Protestants and Catholics, the distance necessary to travel is too long to allow a sufficient number of supporters to establish satisfactory schools.

The result has been in Ontario that school after school has been established which within a few years has been closed. Some time ago certain amendments were made to the Ontario Separate School Act which gave a boom to separate schools and quite a number were established. But, notwithstanding the advantages given them, empowering them to collect taxes from parties who were not sufficiently anxious to support separate schools to take any action to put their names upon the roll, these schools have fallen away. It goes without saying, that except where the Catholic population is en masse separate Catholic schools cannot be efficient in the Manitoba rural districts. The farms in Manitoba would be larger in proportion than the average farms in Ontario, the population is more scattered there, and a child is not able to walk any further, so that consequently, in a given circle six miles in diameter, if the population is mixed, a separate and a public school cannot be supported. The Hon. Mr. Sifton raised another objection which I also wish to refer to. He said that nearly three times as much per head of the public money was paid to the separate schools as was paid to the public schools. I shall not quote his figures to the House, but the statement was that three times as much for each child was given to the separate schools, per head, as was given to the public schools. Was that the fault of the system or was that the fault of the administration? I certainly say that if they allowed such an inequality to exist in the distribution of the public money, it was the fault of the administration, because if the system can exist at all it should exist upon a fair ratio of distribution. That is also one of the objections taken by Principal Grant, who has written so many letters upon this question, and hon. gentlemen opposite have quoted portions of those letters which bear upon their side of the case. Principal Grant gives cases where the attendance at the Manitoba schools he visited amounted only to two, or three, or four or nine children. I must say that the worthy Principal cannot have travelled through many of the rural districts, especially in the back townships of Ontario, or he would have found exactly the same condition of things at the same time of the year. Even our public schools in Ontario in comparatively well-settled portions have a very small attendance, and that only of the little children, during the summer months. I myself recollect that last summer, passing along one of our best roads not over six miles from my own town, in a well-settled country with well-to-do farmers, I noticed that the children coming out of a school numbered only five. I asked the teacher was that the full attendance at the school and she replied: Oh yes, just now. This is berrying time and all the children are berrying. The fact that Principal Grant found only a few children attending school in some parts of Manitoba at that time of the year, actually proves nothing. The question arises, not only what the Government is to inquire into but what they have to propose. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has challenged us that the Government have been uncertain on this question, that they have not defined their position. Well, when the hon. the leader of this House (Mr. Foster) declared in July last that if Manitoba did not remedy the grievance, this Government would introduce and press to a conclusion legislation on the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order; I think that was definite enough. And, when at the by-elections the members of the Government proclaimed their adhesion to that statement, and when the Speech from the Throne reiterates the same statement, surely that pronouncement is definite enough. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) asks for the details of the Act he will have to wait until the Bill comes down. I have no doubt that he, like other members from the province of Ontario, will see that inefficiency in the schools is properly guarded against. One of the great causes of inefficiency in the separate schools in Ontario arises from the ease with which separate schools can be established. The small number of five heads of families can establish a separate school. They have not to apply for its establishment, nor have they to show good cause to some authority for its establishment, but they can establish it themselves. It will readily suggest itself to any intelligent mind that five is too small a number to have the power to establish these schools. It would be better in my mind if they had to apply to some responsible body and to show that they were in a position to maintain in an efficient manner a school of that kind. These five heads of families can establish a separate school, perhaps forcing those who may be unwilling to come into their scheme, and thus it occurs sometimes that these schools are poorly supported and inefficiently conducted. In our Protestant separate schools which can be established under certain circumstances, twelve heads of families have to apply to the municipal authorities, but they cannot themselves establish a school. So it is with the coloured people, twelve heads of families have power to apply to the municipality for a separate school but they cannot themselves establish it. That is in my mind a far better system than the other. The hon. the leader of the Opposition waxed rather indignant at the suggestion that he was in collusion with Mr. Greenway of the Manitoba government. Some of his followers did the same thing, and the Liberal newspapers throughout the country have apparently been carried away by the storm of indignation. In face of the denial of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), I do not for a moment wish to insinuate that there is any collusion between him and the Manitoba government; but the fact remains that on two occasions, shortly before important action was taken by the Manitoba government, a member of that government came east and had an interview with the leader of the Opposition. Perhaps it was only a friendly chat, but it nevertheless establishes that if there be no collusion there is at least a great friendship between them. Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to occupy so much time when I began, and I will certainly not occupy much more. There are, however, a few points, especially in the speech of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), which I think it well to refer to before closing. That hon. gentleman made the astonishing statement, the like of which we have never heard before, that the National Policy had not made the country or the farmers rich. There was never anything like that published in the "Globe" newspaper; and the hon. gentleman imparted a pleasant little variety to this debate on the Address by interlarding in it that astonishing statement. The hon. gentleman went further and said that the National Policy had made the farmers poor—that it had reduced the price of grain. Now, did the hon. gentleman give any proof of that? Has he any fact to support such a statement?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The National Policy did not prevent it.

Mr. MASSON. He said that the price of land had decreased since the National Policy was introduced. Has the National Policy anything to do with that? If it has, how is it that the same thing has happened, only to a greater degree, in the motherland, where there is no such National Policy? Is it our difficulty in getting into the great market of sixty millions to the south of us that has caused the decrease in the price of land? If so, why is it that the price of land has decreased in the United States in a far greater proportion than in Canada? Now, the decrease in the price of farm land is because farm produce has fallen in price in consequence of the great increase of production, owing to the large quantity of arable land brought under cultivation. A statistical writer, only two years ago, stated that the area of wheat-growing land had quadrupled in the last fifteen years, causing such an increase in production as to bring about, naturally, a decrease in price, the world over. Hon. gentlemen say that our markets have to fall or rise with the fall or rise of the world's markets. Why then charge the National Policy? The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says the National Policy has not prevented these things in Canada. I tell the hon. gentleman that, comparatively and relatively speaking, the National Policy has prevented them. The National Policy has done what its promoters promised, it has relatively increased the prices of farm products. The prices in Canada to-day, compared with the prices in the markets of the world, are higher than they were before the National Policy was introduced. Take any class of farm produce you like, and compare the markets of Toronto with the markets of New York prior to the introduction of the National Policy, and what do you find? That the prices were about 20 per cent higher in New York than in Toronto. How are they to-day? During the selling months of the year—October, November, December and January—they are higher in Toronto, on the average than in New York. How has that come about? Prior to the introduction of the National Policy, American produce coming into the market long before ours, glutted our market to such an extent that our farmers, first and last, had to sell in a glutted market. Compare the markets of Toronto with the markets of Chicago, and you will find the same thing. On the very day when the hon. member for North Wellington spoke—although I do not base the comparison on one day only, for the same is true of all the selling months of the year—what did his party organ give as the prices of farm products in the open market? The highest price paid for wheat in New York was from 67 cents to 68 cents, and in Chicago from 59 cents to 60 cents, whereas the highest price paid in Toronto was 76 cents, and the price paid at the farmers' wagons was from 70 cents to 74 cents, showing that in each case, whether in bulk at the car or at the farmers' wagons, the price paid was higher almost to the amount of the duty, at Toronto than at Chicago. What is the case with oats, in which the province of Quebec especially is so much interested? The highest price in New York was 23 cents, and in Chicago 19 cents, while in Toronto, at the farmers' wagons, the highest price was from 28 cents to 29 cents. Now, the National Policy has prevented the falling of these prices; it has done what its promoters promised—relatively increased them. The National Policy cannot make farm products dear when they are cheap the world over; but, relatively, it has increased, and is to-day increasing the prices of them. The hon. gentleman also complains that the National Policy does no good to the farmers. Does the hon. gentleman want the protection on farm products to be taken off? Does he want the 20 per cent on live animals to be taken off, and the herds of the United States to come into Canada to glut our market? Does he want the 1½ cent a pound on live hogs removed? Does he want the 3 cents a pound on fresh meat, or the 25 per cent on canned meats removed? Does he want the 4 cents a pound on butter, or the 3 cents a pound on cheese removed? Does he want the 10 cents a bushel on oats or the 15 cents a bushel on wheat, or the 40 cents a barrel on apples removed? Will the hon. gentleman tell the House and the country, or will he tell the farmers of his constituency, if he wishes to have those duties removed? Does he want free trade as they have it in England? Does he want a duty put on the articles which the farmers are forced to use? Does he want a duty put on uncompounded fertilizers? Does he want tea, coffee and sugar taxed in order to raise a revenue, as they do it in England? But, Sir, there is another subject not mentioned in the Speech that hon. gentlemen opposite wax very wrathful over. Where they bring it into the subject of this debate, I know not; but they have brought it in, and the very word sets them wild—they lose their heads at the sound of the name of Sir Charles Tupper. It is strange to see why all this furore should be made because Sir Charles Tupper has taken a portfolio in this Cabinet. He is blamed for a great many things, it would appear; but, boiling them all down, what do they amount to? He is blamed for having had too much faith in his country; he is blamed for having prophesied too great things of this country; he is blamed for having too much faith in its resources and in its rapid development. These are sins of which hon. gentlemen opposite have never been guilty. It is not too much faith in their country that they appear to have, but too little. Would to heaven they had more faith in their country, more faith in its resources, and more faith in its ultimate destiny. This, however, is summed down, nearly the sum and substance of his defects. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said he was a false prophet. Wherein did his false prophecies lie? He prophesied that the Canadian Pacific Railway would be built in ten years, and it was built in seven. Was he a false prophet in that respect? He prophesied that the building of that road would develop our trade with India. It has not only developed our trade with India, but with Australia. Was that a false prophesy? But regarding that same railway, hon. gentlemen opposite made prophecies as well. They prophesied that the Canadian Pacific Railway never could be built. Nevertheless, it was built. They prophesied that when it was built, it would cripple the resources of the country, and so injure our financial condition that we would practically become bankrupt. Well, the road was built, the resources of the country have not been crippled, and we have never been able to borrow money so cheaply. Even when there was financial crises in other countries, our Finance Minister was able to float a loan at the best rate ever obtained. They further prophesied that if the Pacific Railway were ever built, it would not earn its axle-grease. Well, it has been built and has made a better showing in earnings than any other road in Canada.

Mr. MASSON.

The hon. gentleman also put forth another astounding announcement—that the National Policy was not responsible for the good crops in Manitoba this year. I have no doubt that that surprised a number of his friends and supporters, and I have no doubt it will surprise his constituency to learn that he has been, after full and due consideration, led to make the announcement that the National Policy had nothing to do with the good crops in Manitoba. But I will tell the hon. gentleman what the National Policy has to do with. It has to do with the farmers of Manitoba getting better prices for their grain than farmers on the other side of the line similarly situated are getting. From the time they began to sell their grain in October until the present, the prices have been better on the Canadian side than on the other side of the line. The National Policy has helped in that respect. It has helped to develop the resources of the country and its trade. The building of the Canadian Pacific Railway has given to farmers the means of exporting their produce and of obtaining much higher prices than they otherwise would. I must apologize for having occupied so much time on a matter that has been so thoroughly discussed before, and shall not detain you any longer, but simply again express my pleasure at being able to support this motion and the Address.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not think that, with the time at my disposal, I will be able to follow the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) through the speech he has just delivered. There are a few points in it, however, to which I may direct the attention of the House for a few moments, and then I propose to go to the root of the question before us to-day.

In speaking of agriculture and the Agriculture Department, the hon. gentleman gave the Government credit for what they did last session regarding the butter trade. This is a very important matter, viewed as the hon. gentleman viewed it. Now, what did the Government do? They taxed the people, raised the money from the people, bought the butter, sold the butter, lost on the sale of the butter, and then taxed the people again to make up the loss. Is that good agriculture? Is that good business? Is that what the hon. member for North Grey desires to cultivate in relation to agriculture? From whom did they buy their butter? Did they buy it from the farmers of North Grey? Did they buy it from the producers of butter in the rural districts? No, they bought it from the traders. As far as I can understand, they bought it from a few sore-headed Tories in order to butter their heads and heal their wounds, and thereby they could afford, as it were, to carry on this trade, because they did not carry it on out of their own pockets. It is very nice to speculate with other people's money. The Government know that ; they have been doing that for a considerable number of years, and it is about time they should stop. I hope the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) will give me his assistance in putting a stop to this thing. I hope he will give me his assistance in putting a stop to further taxation on the people he represents, because his county adjoins mine, it is a portion of the great county of Grey, and we do not want to see any more burdens put upon the people of that county after those they have borne all through their history for the building up of enterprises in other portions of the country without receiving themselves any consideration from the Government.

Now, I believe the Minister of Agriculture is going to start a green groceries department. That will be another very important department. I hope he will carry that on better than his predecessor carried on the butter business. If he does not, it will result in further loss and taxation upon the people.

The Minister of Agriculture is about to take a wider range. He has told us that he is going into the wheat business, and is going to establish sheep experts. That is an important announcement, and I am surprised it is not made known in the Speech from the Throne. The Minister of Agriculture, backed up and aided by the members of the Government—not in any anonymous way at all, but openly and fairly—has announced to this House that he is going to appoint sheep experts. He intends to shear the flock entirely. I presume, when he gets these experts. He will not be satisfied with the tariff he has or the money he has spent, but will go on further spending the people's money and imposing further burdens.

What do the farmers want? Sir, they want the Government to let them alone. Give the farmers a chance. When the farmers, in competition with the world at the Chicago Exposition, carried off the prizes from all the world, what did that prove? It proved that our farmers, in an open market, can hold their own against the world, and they want the Government to give them that market if they can.

The hon. gentleman spoke about the Government keeping up the price of grain. Well, with the present prices of grain, I do not wish him much joy in his boast, because if ever there was a time when the products of the farm were low, it is the present, and has been the last seven years. The land of the farmer has decreased in value because his products have decreased in value. One is certain to follow the other. The Minister of Agriculture is here, and I am glad of it, as I wish to refer to what the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) said about the great things the duty had done for pork. There was a meeting in the town of Peterborough and the Minister of Agriculture was there. He was making one of the speeches for which he has become so renowned. A young man in the audience asked the hon. Minister if he would tell him why pork was higher in Buffalo than in Toronto. And what do you think was the answer given by this Minister of Agriculture, who is so deeply imbued with love for the farmers and proposes to do so much for them? His answer was: "Are you a Grit?" Of course it makes a great deal of difference to the farmers of Canada whether he was a Grit or a Tory. If the young man had said he was a Grit, no doubt the Minister would have tried to give an answer which would turn the laughter of the audience upon the young farmer. But the question nonplussed the Minister. He had not studied that branch of agriculture and was not able to tell why it was that pork was higher in Buffalo than in Toronto. Had he been asked almost any other question, he could have answered it, no doubt. Had he been asked about sheep, for instance, the Minister could have told him, for has he not his sheep experts at his elbow? Having said so much in reference to the speech of the hon. member for North Grey, I proceed to review what I consider the most important matter in connection with the Speech from the Throne, and that is the Government that produced it. The conduct and character of the Government are of vital importance. The Government is but a committee of Parliament chosen by us to do our work. We pay them fair salaries, and we want to see that they do their work well. When Parliament sits we have a right to review their public conduct and to say whether they are carrying on the affairs of the country in an efficient manner or not. When they bolt, if you will, or desert if you will, or become traitors—as the Premier said they did—if you will, we have the right to inquire into their conduct upon public ground, but upon public grounds alone. His Excellency's Address was read in the Senate on the 2nd January. I think it was the 16th of January before we reached the consideration of that Address. I do not know how to characterize the act of a government that is eternally preaching its loyalty when they mete out such treatment as this to His Excellency, the representative of Her Glorious Majesty, The Queen. They solemnly declared that they were united by their strong official oath to stand together as brothers, all for the good of Canada. They united upon the Address and His Excellency read it to the House at the opening of Parliament—and then they told His Excellency to wait until their differences were adjusted. What a spectacle! Seven of them took off their coats and asked His Excellency to hold them while they fought it out. This was the dignified position in which they placed His Excellency. His Excellency knew the capacity of their pockets, but he did not dare to search those pockets. No doubt he was afraid that he might find some more anonymous letters. Well, they fought it out. I tell you what it is, there is nothing to humble pride like poverty. An empty bag cannot stand upright. I knew that the deserters and bolters would capitulate. I was convinced of that from the first. Their emoluments being cut off, I knew their pride would soon be humbled. These men went out because Sir Mackenzie Bowell was not fit to lead them; and then they went in again although he was as unfit to lead them as he was before they went out. They appeared on many platforms last fall. The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Railways were at Smith's Falls and each of this glorious trinity proclaimed that the Conservative Government was being maligned by the Grits and the Grit press and by the independent press, in statements that there was disunion in the Cabinet. They declared there was not a vestige of disunion, but that the Cabinet was perfectly united. The Minister of Finance made that statement, if the "Mail and Empire" is to be trusted, and I do not suppose that he will contradict what it says. The Minister of Railways said the same thing, then the Minister of Agriculture came up and corroborated what the others had said.

Mr. CASEY. Anonymously?

Mr. LANDERKIN. No, not anonymously. They went to London and told the same story of the unanimity of the great Conservative Government and how the Ministers loved one another. They came back to the House and presented the statement to the House that they had bolted. I remember seeing the Minister of Finance. I think it was the morning after he and his six colleagues had left Sir Mackenzie Bowell, notwithstanding that an important measure was to be presented to the House, one upon which Sir Mackenzie had staked his political life, one that the Minister of Justice of that time had said he was prepared to die for. I saw the Minister of Finance coming up the walk and looking wistfully at his old department. He had his hands in his pockets as though he were trying to find out how much salary he had lost.

Mr. FOSTER. I was looking for car tickets.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have found that these gentlemen have seven principles, namely, five loaves and two small fishes. I thought the hon. Finance Minister that morning felt that he must go back to his wheel again. He had a wheel last summer and gave us a practical illustration of the old political saying about a fly on the wheel. Well, why did these gentlemen go out? And if there was good reason for them to go out, why did they go back? If they told the truth when they went out, what did they tell when they went back? Was it the retort courteous, or the lie circumstantial, or the lie direct? These are questions the people will ask, because if there is anything the people of this country look for in their public men it is that they shall stand upon the principle of truth, that they should be bound by that principle in their public utterances. If a member of the Government makes an untruthful statement, he should be compelled to forfeit his place. Now we will take and examine the members of the Government on their record, and we will see how they agree. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) has been telling about my leader having one speech for one section of the country, and another speech for another section. My leader is not responsible for what all the papers say, he is responsible for what he says himself. The Minister of Finance is responsible for what he says himself, and the Prime Minister is also responsible for what he says himself. Now, what does the Prime Minister say in reference to the buccaneers who left his Cabinet? He says:

Even in the present trying circumstances, I hesitate not to say, and to say it boldly—I would not have stated it had not such reasons been given to the House as to the cause which induced these gentlemen to leave the Government—that had I had that loyal support which every Premier ought to receive in the arduous duties incident to the governing of a country, such support as was given most loyally to my late chief, Sir John Macdonald, and Sir John Thompson, we would have been just as successful in carrying on the affairs of the Government as my predecessors, though not possessed of their measure of ability or political tact.

Now, again, in another place, we find that the First Minister stated in a speech a day or two ago:

The action of the seven bolters constitute the blackest piece of political treachery on record.

Then what does the Finance Minister say in his statement, read for himself and his colleagues:

Though with many misgivings, we agreed to enter the Government under Mr. Bowell, in succession to Sir John Thompson, we have, nevertheless, unitedly and loyally striven to the best of our ability to make it strong and efficient, and it has been with growing regret that we have seen our efforts result in a measure of success less than that for which we had hoped and striven.

They say they had misgivings. Now, I would like to know what the Minister of Finance meant when he said they had misgivings. I believe the Minister of Finance in his day has been a professor. He may have different meanings, he may have concealed by his statement what he really meant. I have an authority here on the meaning of the word, which I will read to him, and I invite him to give me his attention, and to tell me which of these meanings he wishes to give to the word "misgivings." I find by this authority that misgiving means "fear, timidity, diffidence." Was it that? "Want of confidence, fearfulness, solicitude, anxiety, care, apprehension, misgiving, mistrust, distrust, suspicion, qualm." Did he ever have one? "Hesitation, nervousness, restlessness, indisquietude, flutter, trepidation, fear and trembling, perturbation, tremor, quivering, shaking, trembling, throbbing heart, palpitation, ague fit, cold sweat, abject fear, mortal funk, heart sinking, despair, despondency, fright, affright, alarm, dread, awe, terror, horror, dismay, consternation, panic, scare, stampede, intimidation." Oh, he stampeded. And the object of these misgivings. It was "a bugbear, a bugaboo, a scarecrow, a hobgoblin, a nightmare, rawhide and bloody bones, fee-faw-fum." Now, will the hon. Finance Minister tell me about which of these he had the most misgivings? That would be a very proper thing to do. It is well for the House to know, well for the followers behind the hon. gentleman to know, and for the country to know, what was really the misgivings that he had in Sir Mackenzie Bowell's Government. Well, he entered that Government. He did not give his loyal support to the Premier. What would he do if he had another Premier? A man who has been a rebel once, will he ever be loyal again?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a conundrum.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is a conundrum. There is a newspaper here which will perhaps answer that conundrum, and I might as well read it to the hon. gentleman just now. It is a Conservative newspaper, published in my riding. It is opposed to me, and, I think, without reason. It is called the "Flesherton Advance." It heads its article "The Ottawa Fiasco," and says:

It was with feelings of relief that Conservatives read on Tuesday that a compromise had been arranged at Ottawa, and that six of the seven bolting Ministers had returned to their allegiance, thus raising the blockade which has been in progress for a week past. Yet it is with a sense of chagrin to many, as it is felt that men who have been guilty of the act that these men have, should be relegated to oblivion, and not allowed to resume the important functions they had previous to the difficulty. Had they remained at their posts in the hour of danger, and fallen like heroes, if need be, under the rock they have poised over their heads, their names would have at least been honoured; but to play the part of craven at the political moment, and invent so paltry an excuse as was put forth, is to draw ignominy upon themselves. Sir Mackenzie Bowell has acted the part of a hero, and is honoured for it both by friend and foe. His dogged resistance in the face of such difficulties as were placed in his path during the past week, will be gratefully remembered by his party, even should he sink back into senatorial oblivion. This whole trouble has been caused by personal ambitions running wild; and, while these "ambitious scions of a noble race" have been plotting personal gain, the country has been reading them, and all true Conservatives and honest men must have come to the conclusion that some who have held the highest places are not to be relied upon when patriotism is demanded; that some of these men are little better than mountebanks, and do not know what loyalty to principle means. Whatever the immediate outcome of the present condition of affairs may be, the time is nigh at hand when these individuals can be singled out and quietly retired into the list of discredited politicians who have dropped to the rear the few past years, and something better and nobler can be brought forth from the chaos of corruption and bickerings which has been too plainly apparent of late. We look to the Conservative party, too, to effect this purification, because it is a duty incumbent upon it to perform. It is, we hope, capable at least of something more noble and edifying than the distressing exhibition it has given us during the past week; if it is not, the editor of this paper, for one, is not proud of being called a Conservative.

That is the opinion entertained by a very able editor, who conducts a very nice paper, the tone of which might be improved, politically, if it would only change a little, although it has had a very fair tone lately. I know it has struck the right keynote, and has come down to hard rock. I noticed the other day in the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance on the Address that he said all governments had their troubles, that it was incidental to governments that they should have men who would go out and preach to the people that they were all united when there was nothing but discord in their ranks, and they were practically seizing each other by the throat. I believe in the days of Pharaoh they had trouble. Two of his officers came under his displeasure—I presume they must have had deficits in their departments. They bolted; but Pharaoh soon bolted them up in jail. On a festive occasion they were taken out of jail. One was restored to his office but the other was hanged. Pharaoh had no Governor General. If he had had such an officer, his chief baker would have probably received a letter from the Governor General and have saved his office and his baking; but there was no Governor General in Egypt, and, consequently, he had to lose his head and his office at the same time. Now, there is a circumstance in connection with that incident that gives hope even to people now. The people of Canada, out of the events of recent days, out of the treason and out of the treachery on the part of the Government, have been looking around for a leader, one to lead the people of this country out of the slough of despond into which they have been placed by this Administration, and they have found a Joseph in the person of Wilfrid Laurier. It would have been better for the people if the leader had come sooner, because he might have stopped the ruin and the destruction that has prevailed, and he might have preserved the name of Canada, which, as a Canadian, I feel has been dishonoured by the events of the past few days. I think the record of this Government is not one that will commend itself to the Canadian people. The policy of the Government is not Canadian, it is a narrow, restricted policy, a policy which has a tendency to cripple the resources of Canada, and not allow the energies of the people, who are the best people on earth, to have full play and secure that success which they have a right to expect they should achieve. But Sir Charles Tupper, hon. gentlemen opposite say, has great faith in this country. I think that is what the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) said. Sir Charles is High Commissioner at London, with a salary of $10,000 a year and pickings. He stated in Montreal recently that he would not resign the office—and so his salary goes on. He is also President of the Council, with a salary of $8,000 a year, and I presume his salary goes on. You would not catch a Tupper lose his salary if he could help it. I remember some few years ago Sir Charles occupied two offices, and was paid for both. He has come back now. He returned, first to break up the Government, and, after having broken it up, to galvanize the Government into life. But there is a somewhat serious phase to it. I saw Sir Charles the other day, but he inspired me with the thought that time is passing, and I was grieved to see the tottering form of the once robust Sir Charles scarcely able to wend his way around the streets, and I felt grieved that a person who had reached his time of life should come here to galvanize life into a party, and unite a party, one-half of which terms the other traitors, and the other half turns round and calls their colleagues incapables. To unite that party is a task more than Sir Charles Tupper is capable of performing. What is wanted is a Government that believes in this country, has faith in this country, and has faith in one another. What can be expected of such a Government, as the Minister of Finance said in his statement the other day. The hon. gentleman said the present Government had not had that measure of success they expected. That was, perhaps, the most truthful statement I ever heard the Finance Minister make. In every other speech made by the hon. gentleman he considered they had had more success than they expected. Reverting again to Sir Charles Tupper, I may say that there was published in the Toronto "Mail" some time ago an outline of Sir Charles Tupper's career, and, as it is in the "Mail," it will prove good reading for this House. It was published on June 9, 1891. I will not read all the article, because it is lengthy, but I will read portions of it, as follows:—

Mr. Edward Blake told us that the policy pursued of late years had done "worse, far worse," than injure our national prosperity. "It had left us," he said, "with lowered standards of public virtue, and a death-like apathy of public opinion, with a subservient Parliament, an autocratic executive, debauched constituencies, and corrupting and corrupted classes." Of the system which Mr. Blake deplures, Sir Charles Tupper has notoriously been the chief agent; all that is worst in it and has tended most to debase the national character is familiarly connected with his name, which may be said to be a household word of corruption. Nor has he, like his late chief, succeeded in convincing the people that, except when he is doing the dirty work of a political party, his hands are clean; or that, if he governed the nation, its honour, while it might be in danger from such exposures as that of the Pacific Railway scandal, would be secure against a deeper stain. His name is at this moment unpleasantly connected with a suspicious commercial affair in England, and, if the sentence of the arbitrators in the Onderdonk contract case next month should be against the Dominion, another sinister transaction will be recalled to mind. He will protest his innocence, of course, but his word, unhappily, is that of a man whose veracity is much impugned, and who does not scruple to use stolen letters. It is too evident what sort of scene would be opened by his accession to power. He is the prince of political cracksmen, no doubt, but we cannot afford to purchase ability, even of so rare a kind, at such a price as that of continued and increased demoralization. Of the members of the House of Commons who, the other night voted, under the party lash, that Sir Charles Tupper had done right in leaving his diplomatic post and violating the most sacred rule of the Civil Service, to play a most offensive part in an election, we will venture to say, that there were very few who did not feel in their hearts that he had done wrong. The manner in which he conducted the contest, by trying to fix upon half the community a charge of treason, and thus putting deadly enmity between them and the other half, showed that genuine patriotism could have no hold upon his mind. Nor was his course more sagacious than it was patriotic. The use of violent language against the Americans, which he in vain afterwards attempted to deny, ruined his chances as a negotiator at Washington, where, if he is received at all, it will be on the ground of international courtesy, and with a determination, which nobody can blame, not to play into his hands. His attack on the Grand Trunk was as gratuitous an act of folly as ever insolence, drunk with success, committed. It was doubly insensate, since he must have known that the Grand Trunk had the means of exposing his attempt to bribe its management. His subsequent performances—oratorical and literary—are of a piece with his attack on the Grand Trunk. After ostentatiously assuming the character of an impartial representative of the whole Canadian people and their common ambassador to Washington, he proceeds to show his impartiality by a most violent and slanderous attack on the party in Canada opposed to him, first in an American and then in an English magazine. His article in the "Contemporary," impudently accusing Canadian Liberals to the British public of conspiracy to subvert British institutions and annex Canada to the United States, considering his position and the nature of his duties, may safely be said to be unique in the history of the public service. The appointment of such a man as the head of the state would be not merely the inauguration of violence and corruption, unredeemed by any true wisdom or statesmanship; it would be the signal for a disruption of the community and for a moral civil war.

That is the opinion of the "Mail," the organ of the Conservative party at present, of the man whom they are now crowing so much about having come back to the country. Sir Charles Tupper is still at it. I understand that he promises again to build a bridge at Quebec. He promised that, I understand, in 1891. It does appear to me as rather singular how much reliance the Conservative Government places upon bridges. They built the Curran Bridge, and that was a very important matter for them. I believe they built some bridges in East Northumberland also, and now Sir Charles is promising to build this bridge at Quebec, in order to bridge themselves across the chasm they are likely to fall into. By the way, I forgot to mention the Minister of Finance's own bridge in York. I am told that, in connection with the late revolution in the Government, if I may so term a little insurrection of that kind; that, when the seven Ministers went out, there was great joy among the party, because some of them said that the country must be purged of these men and that new blood would be infused into the Government. The member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) went up to Toronto, looking for a leader. He went to the bench, I believe,—the story is not denied—looking for a leader, and he said: For God's sake, come and help us. We have no man in our party fit to lead us, so come down and help us in this crisis in our country's affairs. The member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) is a loyal man, as everybody knows. He is scarcely a constitutional authority in the House, although he is a professor, too, but it is a singular thing that I never saw a professor in Parliament who knew anything about the constitution. Some time ago the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) interviewed His Excellency the Governor General. He had no faith in the Government then, and it would appear that his faith has not increased since. He went to see the Governor General because he was afraid the Government had not statesmanship and foresight enough to look after the coal mines in Nova Scotia, and he was afraid some one would come along and fill them full of water. As the Ministers were not capable of distinguishing water from coal oil, he thought the Governor himself would have to come to his rescue. Well, on this occasion he went to Toronto, looking for a leader. I understand, that, when those members of the House who were willing to be sacrificed on the altars of their country went in to see the Premier, the bolters, or the traitors—but I will call them deserters—organized a bodyguard of their own near the Premier's door, and they waylaid every man who came out, and took him in charge, so that there was an exciting time for ten days. There was a judge sent for from New Brunswick. He came up, and, when the seven deserters knew he was coming, every one of them crept into their holes. Every single one of them, except one, went back, but then his father got into the Cabinet, and so he stayed out. Both salaries are secured to the father, so that it will be continued in the family all the same. Of course, you are aware, Mr. Speaker, that Sir Charles Tupper, sen., still retains the High Commissionership, while he is also Secretary of State. That, I am sure, is cheering and gratifying news to the family, and it will not be a surprise to the people who know the family. I do not know whether or not the New Brunswick judge is here but he was waylaid and kept over night in Montreal. The seven deserters had their pickets there, they had reinforcements stationed at every point. There is not a more loyal party in the world than this party, and so they guarded every entrance to the Council Chamber to prevent the Premier filling up his Cabinet. Then, the gallant major from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan); he approached the door, and they knew if he got in, he would soon throw them all out. Therefore, they organized to keep him out of the Cabinet, and they prevented him from getting a portfolio. The member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) was, I believe, willing to sacrifice himself. I do not know but that the member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) might have been prevailed upon, and the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) was quite well qualified, and was in the swim. But in all the party arrangements, and in all the Cabinet reconstruction, it is a singular thing that it never occurred to anybody to take in the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). His name was never mentioned in all the negotiations. It is a most singular thing that, with the talents which he enjoys, and which he knows he enjoys, and nobody knows better than he, it is a wonder that nobody ever pointed to him for this position of trust. Some time ago he had not so much faith in the Government as he has now. He did not believe in their policy, and he did not believe in their personnel. They had not what he calls the instinct of government about them. The other day, he told us that the Conservative party was a party with the instincts of government, and we know that he thinks that he himself has the instincts of government. I have an idea, judging from what they have done in patching up their Cabinet, that the only instinct about them is that of sticking together. It is true that they do not stick together on principle, for, if they went out because the leader was unfit or incompetent, then they must have gone back when the Premier was just as unfit and incompetent as when they went out. I think the late Minister of Justice is more to be justified for staying out than those who went back, because, if he held the view that Sir Mackenzie Bowell was not fit to lead, he was somewhat consistent in staying out. But then how he can consistently support that Government is something I cannot understand. I noticed the other night that he got quite violent. I did not know, when his portfolio was taken from him, that he would show violence so soon. I know that Tories out of office are apt to get violent, and sometimes disloyal. But I was surprised the other night to hear the violent statements the hon. gentleman made. He looked into the pedigree of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He searched among the archives, and he found that the great-grandfather of the hon. member for South Oxford was a loyalist and a true Briton, and that when the United States, where he was then living, rose in rebellion in order to secede from Great Britain, they found out that the great-grandfather of the hon. member for South Oxford was too loyal for them, and he left the country and came to Canada. I think it is well for the hon. gentleman to delve into the archives to find the antecedents of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; but I do not know that it would be well for him to search into the pedigrees of hon. gentlemen on the other side for three or four centuries. There are dangers to be apprehended in doing that. But it was a most signal triumph for the hon. member for South Oxford, when pursued by an opponent out of office and out of salary, to find his loyalty vindicated in such a remarkable way. I wonder why the ex-Minister of Justice brought forward that memorandum. He has perhaps patched the matter up with Sir Richard since; perhaps they are harmonized; because, if he had searched all last year, he could not have found a better tribute to the worth of the family from which Sir Richard has descended than that which he produced in the House the other night. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have detained the House probably as long as I should on this occasion. There are many things that ought to be discussed and that will have to be discussed this session; but this Cabinet reconstruction I consider is the most important. I think it should not be allowed to remain undiscussed. If the members of this House are true to themselves, if they are loyal to Canada, they will not support any Government which, upon the words of its own members, is shown to be united under false colours and false pretenses, whose members have been shown to be untrue to the truth, untrue to one another, and untrue to their country, and hence unfit to govern. It is the duty of every honest man in this House, whether he is a Conservative or a Liberal, to see to it that we have a Government so formed that its members will cordially agree upon the matters that come before them, and will have honour among themselves at least to be true to one another. I do not see the point of improving a Government that has a leader of seventy-three by proposing to replace him with another who is seventy-six. It seems a strange and startling thing to find a political party finding fault with one leader who has been straight so far as I know, and true to his party so far as I know, and proposing to supplant him because of his age, and then putting an older man in his place. It may be good politics for the Conservative party; but the Conservative party has to face the people and answer the statement which the Minister of Finance read to this House. They have also to face the statements made by the Premier to Parliament; and when the people of the country see the conflict between these statements, they will be convinced that one or other faction of this Government has lied to the people of this country; and I believe the people of this country will express their opinion that no member of this House, on either side, should give his support to a Government of which truth is not the foundation.

Mr. FOSTER. Question.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. CASEY. I should have supposed, Sir, that in a discussion of this kind, involving such important issues personal to members of the Government, there would have been a reply from the other side of the House to all that is said on this side. To be sure, those gentlemen whom we have been designating as bolters or wreckers have observed a policy—I might almost call it a conspiracy—of silence for a long time. But how it is possible for men with any vestige of self-respect left about them, with any knowledge, even, of what people expect still under the taunts which are hurled at them from this side of the House, is more than I can understand.

And it is not as if these taunts were the mere voice of party ill-feeling. They are not that at all. Not one of the hard things said from this side of the House, not one of the insinuations made against the character of these hon. gentlemen as Privy Councillors, as Ministers, as gentlemen, but is based upon something that has been said, either by their leader about them, or by one of them about the other. We have no need to manufacture or imagine hard things to say of them. Out of their own mouths they stand convicted. Under these circumstances I cannot imagine how they endure to be reminded of the things which their leader has said about them, or the things which they have said about each other, without attempting to wipe off a little of the dirt which they have thrown upon each other, even thus early in the session.

But whether they are afraid to speak, whether they think their case is so utterly bad that there is no use in saying anything about it, or not, it is the duty of the House to give some discussion to the important issues before it. We have to discuss at present, not only the subjects laid before us in the Speech from the Throne, but events which have occurred subsequent to the delivery of that Speech, and the general situation of the country.

As for the Speech itself, the most important question mentioned in it is that referring to remedial legislation. That is indeed the only subject that should have been brought before the House, this session, in the Speech from the Throne. This session was called for a special purpose, and is not one of the regular sessions which we constitutionally and ordinarily have. It was called as the result of a bargain, the result of a compromise, announced as such, across the floor of the House, between the English-speaking, and certain French-speaking, members of the Cabinet, on the subject of separate schools. The promise had been given that legislation on that subject would be presented and carried through last session, but that was found impossible, from the fact that the Cabinet were not able then, any more than they had been able since, to agree on the terms of the legislation which they were to propose. A crisis occurred, some of the Ministers withdrew; and in order to repair the breach temporarily, a compromise was made by which an extra session was agreed to be specially called, to discuss that question, and, as we supposed, and had the right to suppose, that question alone.

We have no right to discuss any other question this session because we are a moribund Parliament. We know that on the 25th of April next we shall be extinguished as a Parliament, and extinguished individually as members of this House, and we know that we ought not, in a sixth session, attempt to do any general or ordinary business pertaining to the duties of the Parliament of Canada. We were called for this one thing, and this one thing alone we should do.

We should not be called upon—as it seems it is intended to call upon us—to vote the supplies for a year which properly belongs to a new Parliament. We should not be called upon to endorse any new schemes, the effects of which may last through several succeeding years, when a new Parliament will be in existence. We have been called here to do this one thing; it should have been ready for us to do; the Bill should have been presented to us; our decision should be taken upon it; and then we should have the elections, in order that the people may judge between the Government and the Opposition as to what was done.

However, it appears to be the intention of the wise heads who planned the Speech from the Throne—and we do not know to what division of the Cabinet these wise heads belong—that it would be very well to take a snap vote of supplies this extra session, which might carry the Government on for another year without calling Parliament together again after the elections. The plan may have originated in the tortuous brain of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) himself. It may have seemed to him that it would be very convenient not to have to call Parliament together again after the elections, even should the result of the elections be unfavourable to the Ministry. He might have thought it would be very comfortable, notwithstanding a majority of a score or two returned against him in the country, to go on for twelve months without taking the sense of the House. That may be the plan, and developments may arise in regard to it, later.

But apart from these two things which have been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne,—one of which should not have been mentioned at all, and the other of which should be discussed in its proper place, when the Government have succeeded in deciding what they are willing to propose to the House about it—there are other important matters before us. I believe the most important things before us are those which are not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. That Speech did not tell us for example, what sort of people the Government of the day is composed of. It did not tell us what those people thought of each other, and yet those are very important matters for the people of this country to know.

That oversight in the construction of the Speech has been made up, however, too some extent by the hon. gentlemen themselves. They have confessed, later than the Speech, with regard to these points to which I have referred. They stand convicted out of their own mouths of having—seven of them—plotting for thirteen months against the man they were bound to support. They have been capable of thinking each other guilty of very atrocious crimes. They are, in a word, on their own statement, whether as regards their dealings with their leader, or as regards the opinions which individual members of the Cabinet seem to hold of each other, truly unfit, not only for positions in the Cabinet but for any position of trust. It is a very usual sort of recommendation to any young man who asks for a letter to enable him to obtain employment on a railway or in a merchant's office, to say that he is "fit for any position of trust." I am afraid that nobody who heard the statements made by these hon. gentlemen about each other could give any of them any such certificate as this.

As my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Landerkin) has pointed out, it is highly likely that these men will receive their punishment from their own party. That party is not fairly represented, when led by men such as these have confessed themselves to be. The bulk of the Conservative party throughout the country is composed of honest, upright men, who have confidence in each other, who have confidence in their neighbours, who do not call each other blackguards, or traitors, and whose conduct in their individual capacities will bear the light of day in every respect. Such men will not be content to be represented much longer by a Cabinet such as this.

I believe that they will punish them at the polls, and possibly the result may be that their party will have to go into opposition, and the longer those Cabinet Ministers are now kept in office, the longer will be the term of their opposition when the people have had a chance to pronounce on their conduct. The Conservatives themselves are well aware that the only chance of purifying their party and obtaining leaders who are fit to lead, men who can be respected, is to defeat their present leaders at the polls and send them into the cold shades of opposition. Then, whoever is able enough, and clean enough, to lead them back to power, will be their leader. The party has no leaders now. It is so poverty-stricken in respect to talent or character that it has to employ a public servant to rally together its broken remnants.

They have had to call in the hired man. I do not see how even these Ministers, who have put up with the other degradations they have suffered lately, can accept this. Let us take it for granted that the Premier was disposed of, that the knifing of Sir Mackenzie Bowell made him impossible as a leader. Was it impossible, even then, to find a leader in Canada? Why was not the Finance Minister chosen to be leader? We cannot think that it was on account of any "misgivings" on his part as to his fitness for the position. We do not believe it was for want of ambition on his part. His whole conduct for the last thirteen months goes to show that he was working to obtain the leadership himself. Why, then, did he allow it to fall into the hands of another? Was it impossible for him to command the confidence of his colleagues? It is for him to explain why he was passed over. Why was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) not chosen? Perhaps he must be left nameless in this discussion. But we know that his ambition in the line of leadership has been echoed in various newspapers throughout the country. Why was the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) passed over? I ask that very seriously, because a great many people throughout the country regard him as one who would most naturally, under the circumstances, be chosen to lead. Why was the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) passed over? Would he not have been acceptable as leader? I know no reason why he should not be so; it remains for his colleagues to answer. A controller, perhaps, was out of the question.

But, failing all these gentlemen, why should Sir Charles Tupper be chosen, of all persons in the world? It would take too long to review that gentleman's history in the public life of Canada. In fact, it is hardly necessary to do so, for his record is fresh in the memory of those who have been in active politics for ten or fifteen years, though it may not be known to the men who have come of voting age within that time. He cannot have been chosen because of any great confidence in his personal character as leader of a great party. Was he chosen because it was supposed that his judgment and temper were especially trustworthy? Hardly, I think, Mr. Speaker. Those who have sat with him in this House know that, so far as judgment and temper are concerned, he is certainly no improvement upon some of the Ministers whom he now oversteps.

The reason why he has been called upon has been made clear by the Conservative press all over the country. He was called upon because the Government are pinched for money. They know they will need a large sum, in order to stand the least chance of carrying the next election. They know they will require a lot of money to keep their own party solid in these elections, and they know that, even if they got the vote of every man who nominally belongs to their party, they could not win. They want a great deal of money—they want a "bar'l"—and expect to fill it.

Sir Mackenzie Bowell has not proved himself an adept in that part of the tactics to which this Government finds it so necessary to resort; he has not shown himself very skilful in sweating contractors and manufacturers. Sir Charles has been called upon, as an expert, the doctor has been called in to sweat the patient. The patient will be sweated; the money will be put up; the Government will stake their last cent on this election, with a result which there is no use boasting about beforehand, but I hope will be in the interests of the country at large, and not of the hoodling class.

Of course, it would not do for this gentleman, coming in as the virtual head of the party, to give this as the reason for his leadership or as the policy of the party. What line, then, is he taking? The line we have had quoted here to-day, as having been taken by him previously, that of accusing his opponents of disloyalty and treason, and boasting of the superior loyalty of himself and his party. That has been gone into already, but it cannot be made too clear. Such a cry as this comes with the worst grace from the mouths of men, who have confessed that they cannot be loyal for a few months to their own leader, or to the Government of which they form a part. But this is the class of people who raise the cry. Men who have been loyal only to their own salaries, accuse others of being disloyal to their country, and thereby feed the flames of foreign disaffection against Canada and against Great Britain.

But, as I said on a former occasion, I will not recriminate. I believe even the Ministers are loyal. That is quite a stretch of belief, but among the eighty or so of us on this side of the House, we can manage to believe even that. I have no trouble in believing it of the rank and file of the Conservative members in this House, and the Conservative party at large. Those Canadians who are of British descent are loyal to Britain by instinct and race. Those of French descent are loyal from conviction, and from the loyalty of their own nature, and their true-heartedness—loyal above all things to that Canada of which they were the first inhabitants, and of whose prosperity they laid the foundations. They showed their loyalty in the years when they were the vast majority of the people of this country, and when the defence of Canada rested chiefly upon their shoulders. No man can impugn the loyalty of the French race who knows the history of Canada.

After Recess.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair to allow us to refresh the inner man, I was referring to the accusations of disloyalty so freely made upon the other side of the House. I was referring more particularly to one of the races which inhabit the Dominion of Canada, that race which traces its origin to France. In continuation of these remarks, I may say that it is an insult to the whole French-Canadian race, an insult of the bitterest and most unpardonable kind, that our leader, one of the most distinguished French-Canadians who ever appeared in public life in Canada, one of the most distinguished Canadians of any race, should be subjected to the insults heaped upon him by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) and others on that side of the House.

I say it is an insult which the French-Canadian race will resent, because, in the person of the leader of this side of the House, many of the best qualities of that race are typified and exemplified. I do not believe that there is one French-Canadian who will not feel, that these attacks upon the leader of the Opposition are an insult to every man of that race in the country. Sir, those French-Canadians, those original Canadians, proved their mettle long before the British flag waved over the heights of Quebec. They could defend their homes and their country then against the Yankees, and against Indians, and when the flag of England was hoisted, they were as loyal to that as they had been to the flag of France.

He would be a poor coward, indeed, who would not fight to protect his home, and to protect those in it dearer to him than his own life. There is no ground to imagine that there is anywhere in Canada a coward of that kind. There are no copperheads, Sir, on this side of the House, no copperheads. I verily believe, when the day of need comes, on the other side of the House. Why, then, should these hon. gentlemen find pleasure in creating the impression abroad that there are copperheads in this country, that half the people in this country are disloyal and are traitors? What good can it do them? Ah, Mr. Speaker, they forget the harm they are doing their country, they forget the risk they are running of encouraging hostile feelings, and hostile action against Canada, for the sake of what they consider would be a little temporary advantage to their party. I believe even in that object they will be mistaken. I believe all this slinging of mud will befool those who sling it more than those at whom it is thrown.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite even go so far as to charge the leader of the Opposition with being opposed to arming the volunteers, and strengthening the defences of the country. You must remember, Sir, and the House will remember, that when he spoke with reference to this matter, which was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, he gave no uncertain sound with regard to it. The leader of the Opposition declared himself frankly and freely in favour of the best armament that could be secured for the volunteers of the country. There is no reason why he should do so. A very large proportion of those volunteers, I do not know but I would be right in saying a majority of them, are good supporters of his own, and of the principles we advocate on this side of the House. Whenever there has been need for volunteers, Liberals and Conservatives have sprung equally to arms.

But the Government would like to produce the impression upon the country that they are the only ones who care for the volunteer, and who wish to see him properly armed. Sir, in my own humble capacity, I have for many years urged upon the present Government the necessity of arming our volunteers with a modern and useful weapon. In his far higher capacity, the general commanding the forces in Canada, has for many years been urging the same thing upon the Government. And it is only now, at a moment when an election is imminent, when the votes of the volunteers will count, that we have a bluster and a blow about the needs of the volunteer, and the propriety of arming him with a good weapon.

How was it when we had an actual war on hand, during the rebellion in the North-west in 1885? Sir, the Government were as unprepared then as they are now. The troops were not armed with improved weapons; the troops were not supplied with good cartridges; the troops were not supplied with the ordinary comforts of camp life. These had to be, in many cases, provided for out of the pockets of friends, and out of the treasuries of different municipalities, which passed votes for their local companies or battalions. The Government was then, is now, and ever will be, unready, and unprepared to put a force in the field in efficient shape, until actual necessity comes upon them, and for some time after that necessity has come upon them.

We all remember how the gun carriages broke down. We all remember when complaints were made of the nature of the ammunition served to the volunteers there. When I made that complaint myself across the floor of the House, the then Minister of Militia (Sir Adolphe Caron) now the Postmaster General, had the coolness to tell me that he was quite aware that the ammunition was not good enough for practice at a target, but he believed it was quite good enough for shooting in the field? Why, Sir, in 1885, during the war in the North-west, we had a Minister of Militia who thought anything that would make a noise would do for shooting in the field, though good cartridges were required for accurate shooting at the butts. I sincerely hope, Sir, that the Hon. Mr. Desjardins, who has taken charge of the militia for the present, will prove himself a somewhat more practical Minister of Militia than the gentleman who preceded him some time ago in the same department.

Now, Sir, while we do not recriminate upon hon. gentlemen opposite on the subject of loyalty, while we admit that they are good citizens, we do say and maintain, and we have facts to prove, that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are fond of adopting Yankee politics, Yankee methods of procedure: their sympathies are Yankee in everything that is connected with the administration of this country. I do not say that they would like to join the Yankees, or anything of that kind; but they have, in a spirit of imitation, a spirit of weak, childish imitation, to put it at its best, adopted all that is worst in the practices and in the policy of our neighbours to the south.

When they believed, or professed to believe that a change of policy was required in 1878 to restore prosperity to this country, where did they seek for inspiration? Did they seek it in the old motherland, of whom they talk so proudly now? Did they seek for it in Imperial federation, of which Sir Charles Tupper is to be the Mahomet, the prophet, the only interpreter? Did they seek it in the writings of the greatest English authorities? Did they seek it in the practice of the British legislature? No, Sir, they went straight to Washington for their policy; and so foreign was this protective policy to everything that was British or Canadian, that they had to import a live Yankee from

Washington, bottle him up, and make him a member of the Canadian Civil Service for the time being, and set him down here in Ottawa to compile that policy for them. They imported a man belonging to the civil service in Washington, and set him with Mr. Fraser, secretary of the Manufacturers' Association, to frame an imitation of the Yankee policy of protection.

Where is the loyalty, the Britishness, if I may coin a word, of such proceeding? They talk of love and friendship for England; but acts speak louder than words. They sought their inspiration and their models for a new policy under a foreign flag.

Let me come down to a latter day, when this new Yankee policy had been in force for a dozen years or more, and see how they treated the resolution offered in this House for the purpose of bringing about better trade relations with the mother country. On 25th April, 1892, the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) moved a resolution, beginning with an "if" and a "when," and declaring that, "if and when," England gave us preferential advantages in her markets over foreign countries, we would be prepared to make reductions in duties on the main articles imported from that country. That motion was discussed at considerable length, and our dear friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny) vented his usual torrent of abuse on the leader of the Opposition for his Boston speech and other remarks, and he spoke of our connection with the mother country as a "tie which binds us in a love knot."

That was very fine and eloquent in the mouth of the hon. member for Halifax; but when the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) proposed an amendment, to which I will refer in a moment, we had an opportunity of seeing how far the practice of that hon. gentleman agreed with his words. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) moved:

That inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of the opinion that the present scale of duties upon goods mainly imported from Great Britain should be reduced.

How did the hon. member for Halifax vote? He voted nay; as did the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and his father, if he had been here, would have voted in the same way; and so also did the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and every one of the loyalists on the other side of the House who was present in his seat.

Did the hon. member for Queen's ask that we should give preferential treatment to Great Britain? No; but he said that the present National Policy was unfair to her export trade, and that, as Great Britain admitted our goods free, we should reduce the duties on such articles as are mainly imported from the mother country. But the loyal member for Halifax, my imperial friend from North Bruce, and my royal friend from Pictou, would not go a quarter of an inch in the direction of giving any privilege to the mother country. That is their practice as compared with their profession in the way of loyalty.

It is very regrettable that this Yankee system should have been introduced among us, a policy that was begotten by the makers of wooden nutmegs and nursed into its present condition of maturity by the Minister of Finance. Whether there is any relationship between the parent and foster father, I do not know. But it is worth while to consider what the effects of that policy have been on the United States itself. Let it not be forgotten that when protection is discussed in Canada we are usually told to look to the results in the United States and see how that country has prospered, and act accordingly.

I have before me the words of the United States ambassador to London (Mr. Bayard), uttered in a speech delivered in Edinburgh, on November 7th, 1895, in which he gives his impression of the effects of protection in the United States. Let it not be forgotten that these are not the utterances of a Canadian or of an English free trader, but of the representative of the most strongly protected country in the world, and the one held up as our model. That gentleman was addressing the members of the Philosophical Institution of Edinburgh, and his subject was "Individual Freedom, the Germ of National Progress and Permanence." After other remarks, he said :

In his own country he had witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of "state socialism" called 'protection,' which, he believed, had done more to foster class legislation, and create inequality of fortune ; to corrupt public life ; to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils ; to lower the tone of national representation ; to blunt public conscience, and create false standards in the popular mind ; to familiarize it with reliance upon state aid and guardianship in private affairs ; to divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause.

This is a notable condemnation by the official ambassador of a protectionist country. We have seen many of these results springing up among ourselves. We have divorced ethics from politics, we have blunted public conscience and created a false standard in the popular mind, and in proof of these assertions I need only refer to the events of the last fortnight. Mr. Bayard continued :

Step by step, and largely owing to the confusion of civil strife, it had succeeded in obtaining control of the sovereign power of taxation, never hesitating at any alliance, or the resort to any combination, that promised to assist its purpose of perverting public taxation from its only true justification and function—that of creating revenue for the support of the government of the whole people—into an engine for the selfish and private profit of allied beneficiaries and combinations called "trusts."

Have not trusts arisen in Canada ? Have we not seen the Government here making all sorts of alliances, resulting in all sorts of combinations, to secure the support of one interest or another ? Have we not seen taxation diverted from its proper purposes ? What did our Finance Minister say in 1894 when introducing his Budget ? He said :

The principal aspect in which the tariff is to be viewed is in respect of its effects upon the trade development of this country.

We find the same results followed in Canada as in the United States. But I must quote further from Mr. Bayard. He said :

Under its dictation individual enterprise and independence have been oppressed, and the energy of discovery and invention debilitated and discouraged. It had unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tended to commercial isolation, dangerously depleted the treasury, and sapped the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favour and largesse to special classes, whose support was thereby attracted.

Did we not have in 1894 clear proof of the truth of this last statement in regard to protection, when the manufacturers in Canada furnished a brief to the Finance Minister, a brief of what he should do in regard to the tariff in order to foster to the greatest extent their individual interests as manufacturers, a brief which he accepted, and gratefully acknowledged, and carried out ; a brief which those manufacturers boasted of having furnished him, and which they published throughout the country as a creditable action. Did not that show not only the debasement of public morality, but the sapping of the public conscience by schemes of favouritism to a special class ? Mr. Bayard went on to say :

This it had done so much to throw legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chaffers took the place of statesmen. Gradually the commercial marine of the United States had disappeared from the high seas, with the loss of the carrying trade and the dispersion of the class of trained seamen and skilled navigators.

Does not that sound very familiar to us, Mr. Speaker ? Has not the commercial marine of Canada declined since we adopted protection ? Let those gentlemen who represent seaport towns in the maritime provinces answer whether or not the commercial marine has declined ? Let them tell us whether the shipyards are not closed, and let them tell us whether our seamen do not have to seek employment in the ships of other countries ; men who used to be employed in vessels built and owned in Canada ?

They cannot deny it, Sir. If they throw the blame of this upon the introduction of iron instead, with wood as the material for ship-building, ask them why Sir Charles Tupper's grand scheme for the protection of iron, and the utilization of the coal and iron ore of Cape Breton, in smelting furnaces for the production of material to be used in Canadian ships, did not succeed? If there is any country in the world adapted for iron ship-building it is Cape Breton, where the iron and the coal and the flux for smelting are in juxtaposition. Sir Charles Tupper promised in 1887, that by reason of the duties he was then imposing, the ore would be smelted and the iron used in Canada for ship-building and all sorts of iron work. The result has been a total failure, and his promises have been belied in that respect, as much as they have been in regard to the lands of the North-west. Mr. Bayard continues, in reference to the decline of ship-building:

The exceptions which only prove the rule, were the few vessels lately built, and these only by making a breach by special contract in the general tariff and navigation laws, a reluctant confession of the impolicy and unwisdom of both, but an object lesson from which valuable instruction might be drawn.

Speaking of the special contract, he refers, as I understand it, to special provisions made for the admission of material for the construction of vessels in the United States, and for the admission to free registry of a certain number of steamships bought abroad. Said Mr. Bayard, continuing:

It was incorrect to speak of "protection" as a national policy,—

That, Mr. Speaker, is a very familiar word in Canada!

—for that it could never be, because it could never be other than the fostering of special interests at the expense of the rest,—

Why, Sir, you would almost think there was a Finance Minister of the same name as our own in the United States, one who fosters their interests as carefully and wonderfully as our interests are fostered in this country!

—and this overthrew the great principle of equality before the law, and the resultant sense of justice and equity in the administration of sovereign powers, which was the true cause of domestic tranquillity and human contentment. The value of "protective" taxation to its beneficiaries consisted in its inequality; for, without discrimination in favour of some one, there was no advantage to any one, and, if the tax were equally laid on all, all would be kept upon the relative levels from which they started; and that simply meant a high scale of living to all, high cost of production of everything, and consequent inability to compete anywhere, outside of the orbit of such restrictive laws.

Mr. Speaker, do not we find all that borne out by our own experience? Where do our manufacturers compete except where they have the advantage of our tariff—with the exception of one or two natural industries which did not require any protection in the first place? In reference to this point of Mr. Bayard's, that protection, to be of any use, must be unfair to some one. I refer the House to the language of our own Finance Minister, who, in 1894, said with regard to a protective tariff, that, as a matter of course, protective taxes did raise the price of similar articles produced in the country—and that if such taxes did not raise the price of these articles they were of no use to any one. Mr. Bayard proceeds:

But the enfeeblement of individual energies and the impairment of manly self-reliance were necessarily involved, and the belief in the mysterious powers of the state and a reliance upon them to take the place of individual exertion fostered the growth of state socialism, and personal liberty ceased to be the great end of government.

Now, Sir, that is a terrible indictment against protection by one who knew the inmost secrets of its working in the United States, by one who represented at a foreign court that country which had made such an awful failure of its attempts to foster, as it is called, its native industries. I do not believe that anything I could add to these remarks of Mr. Bayard's would increase their force.

Before closing my remarks, I must make one more reference to the general subject of remedial legislation, a reference which I think is required in justice and in equity. I wish to point out the patriotic, and sound, British, common sense action of the Roman Catholic population of this country in regard to that question. It was assumed on all hands a year ago, that the promise of remedial legislation by the Government of the day would secure for them the solid Catholic vote throughout Canada no matter what sins the Government might be responsible for in other directions. Events have shown since that time that the Catholics of Canada, be they French-speaking or English-speaking, refuse to have it believed that theirs is a "solid vote," which can be bought by any promise made by any Government. They refuse to let it be understood that they are what is commonly called "priest-ridden." They refuse to act otherwise than as good citizens of this community.

If they had been open to any influences of that kind to which I refer, the by-elections which have taken place since the issue of the remedial order would not have taken the course they did. I do not say that the policy of one party or the other in regard to the remedial order has caused the effect which has taken place in Montreal Centre, Jacques Cartier, Verchères, Antigonish, or anywhere else. But I do say that the result in these elections shows that our Catholic fellow-citizens are taking into consideration the whole conduct of the Government, uninfluenced by appeals to their religious feelings. They are taking it all of a piece. Here is a body, the great majority of whom are prepared to pronounce want of confidence in that Government, no matter what illusory promises they may make to them in this or any other respect. They do not believe in the honesty of purpose of the Government; they do not believe in the capacity of the Government to carry out what it promises.

They do believe in the common sense, the tact, and the good management of the gentleman who leads this side of the House, and whom alone they believe capable of settling this vexed question in a patriotic way. I am sure, Sir, that they have done themselves infinite credit by their action. I would go further than that. I believe they have not only done infinite credit to their own good sense, and self-restraint and patriotic intention, but I believe that their action in those by-elections, and the action they will probably take in the by-elections yet to come, will be the salvation of this country. It will save the country from the farce of such government as we have had for the last year or two, at any rate. It will save the country from the awful consequences described by Mr. Bayard as arising from protection in the United States which have not yet reached full maturity in Canada, but would, in few years, if that system were to continue.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, before this debate closes I would like to say a few words. In looking over the Speech from the Throne I find that we are congratulated "upon the evidence of increased activity in the various branches of commerce and industry." There is one important branch of industry in Canada which is in a very depressed condition to-day; I mean the agricultural industry. I have lived for the last fifty-two years as a farmer in Canada, and I have never seen that industry so depressed as it is to-day. Let me read a short statement to show how the income of the farmer has been reduced since 1882, the first year in which the report of the Ontario Bureau of Industries was published. In that year, 19,622,429 acres of land were occupied in the province, making 196,225 farms of 100 acres each. The value of all the field crops in the province in that year was $155,000,000, giving to each farmer with 100 acres an income of $789. When I take an average of the years from 1882 to 1892, I find that there were 207,815 farmers, with a total annual average value of field crops of $114,533,844, giving to each farmer during that time an average annual income of $551. In 1893 there were 219,407 farmers in the province of Ontario, and the value of all the field crops was $101,886,557, or $464 to each farmer. In 1894 there were 220,327 farmers with 100 acres each, and the value of all the field crops amounted to only $94,055,000, giving to each farmer only $426, or a reduction from 1882 to 1894 of $363. This is a very small remuneration, indeed. Then, most of the farmers with 100 acres of land to-day are compelled to have a certain amount of hired help during the summer, as it is impossible for a farmer in this climate of ours, with the rapidity with which the harvest comes on, to do the work of such a farm without hired help. Therefore, when we deduct $80 or $90 from this amount for a hired man during the summer, the farmer has very little left for himself. Now, I will offer another piece of evidence to show that the condition of the farmer in the province of Ontario is gradually becoming worse. In 1887 the mortgages on real estate in Ontario amounted to $74,954,076. At that time there was not a single farmer's chattel mortgage recorded. In 1894, the real estate mortgages amounted to $115,558,027, an increase of $40,000,000 in the seven years, or an increase of $6,000,000 annually. Now, this is a bad condition of things, but it does not show in reality how depressed the condition of the farmer is in the way the amount of chattel mortgages does. In 1894 the chattel mortgages in the province of Ontario amounted to $11,220,000, and more than half of this amount was recorded against farmers. We all know that as long as a farmer can increase the mortgage on his farm he is unwilling to mortgage his chattels; when he does that, it is his last resort; and within the last two years the chattel mortgages have increased more than they have ever done in the same length of time in the history of Canada. These facts and figures show that the farmer of this country is in very straitened circumstances indeed. Now, we have been told time and again that this is not the case. I have been told during the last twelve months that a bushel of wheat had just as much purchasing power in 1895 as it had in 1881 or 1882. In looking over my own accounts at home, I find that in 1882, on a certain piece of property I paid $93.12 of taxes. I find that during that year I was getting $1.25 per bushel for my wheat, so that 74½ bushels paid the taxes of that property. In the year 1895 the taxes on the same property amounted to $93.90, and with wheat at 62 cents a bushel, it took 155½ bushels to pay the taxes, or more than double the amount required in 1882. And yet we are told that wheat to-day has as much purchasing power as it had then. In 1882 I purchased a pair of boots, for which I paid $5, and 4 bushels of wheat paid for those boots. In 1895 I also purchased a pair of boots for which I paid $5, so that, with wheat at 62 cents a bushel it took 8 bushels and 8 pounds to pay for them. In 1882 I purchased a suit of clothes for which I paid $24, and, with wheat at $1.25 a bushel, it took just 19 1-5 bushels to pay for it. In 1895 I also purchased a suit of clothes, nearly the same quality, for which I paid $20, but I only got 62 cents a bushel for wheat, so that it took 32½ bushels of wheat to purchase that suit of clothes. And yet we are told that a bushel of wheat to-day has just as much purchasing power as it ever had before. Well, the dollar may have as much purchasing power, but it takes a very great deal more wheat to enable the farmers to get the dollar than in days gone by. There is no class in Canada on whom the National Policy has borne so hardly as the farmers.

With respect to the North-west Mounted Police, concerning which there is a paragraph in the Speech, I have been in the North-west and I believe that force is a necessity. It is necessary that we should have a certain number of Mounted Police there. We have not as many now as we had formerly, and as the country settles up the number may be further reduced, but that will have to be done very cautiously. The force ought to be kept in a very efficient condition because it has rendered good service.

I was amused in reading this paragraph :

I regret to say that the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor have declined to entertain favourably these suggestions, thereby rendering it necessary for my Government, in pursuance of its declared policy, to introduce legislation with regard to this subject.

This paragraph refers to the answer of the Manitoba Government to the Order in Council of July last. What is the declared policy of this Government with respect to the Manitoba school question? I understand that there have been disagreements in the Cabinet. We were told the other night by the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) that there are differences of opinion on that question, and I really wonder if the Government have yet any settled policy or if that policy has yet to be formulated.

We have been taunted by members of the Government and other hon. gentlemen opposite with the usual charge of disloyalty. I would ask whether these hon. gentlemen could not much better apply that charge to themselves. Is there any virtue in being loyal so long as everything is going along peaceably and quietly in the state, so long as there are no difficulties to grapple with? No, the time to test the loyalty of individuals is when any particular crisis takes place. If the Government of Canada be tested by that measure, it must be admitted that no more disloyal set of men ever held the reins of power in any country. We know that during the last session of Parliament three of them went out, we know that there was a disagreement then, and we were led to believe that it was with respect to the remedial order. Two of these bolters came back, and we never have been told anything in explanation of this whole business, but have merely had the report that one of the Ministers said he would not come back unless with the promise that a certain Bill should pass through the House at a certain time. That information we got from an interview with the Minister in question which was published in the Montreal "Star." Whether he ever got that promise we have never been informed, but he came back. We know that later on, since this Parliament has met, a further outbreak of disloyalty took place in the Cabinet. And I say that if disloyalty was ever shown amongst the members of the Government of any country, it is shown in a Cabinet which, after agreeing to submit a Speech from the Throne to the House, bolted and deserted their leader before that Speech could be discussed. For what reason they deserted him we have not been told, but it evidently was because they wanted to get rid of him as a leader. If they think that they have strengthened themselves in the country by the course of conduct that they have pursued, they will find that they were never more mistaken. I believe that Sir Mackenzie Bowell has drawn a very large amount of sympathy from the country for the manner in which he asserted his position. I am not posted in constitutional law, and as I am ignorant of what the real policy of the Government is, I shall leave this question to be discussed by others more competent.

There is another paragraph in the Speech :

Your attention will be asked to measures intended to provide for the better arming of the militia and the strengthening of Canadian defences.

The Opposition are satisfied with regard to that. If we are to have a militia at all it ought to be properly armed and equipped and made as efficient as possible, while having a due regard to economy.

We are asked to consider measures for the extension and developing of our trade and agricultural products with the United Kingdom and other markets. In this connection I shall take up what the seconder of the Speech from the Throne said on this point. He said that no body of men deserved better treatment at the hands of the Government than those who tilled the soil and that no body of men had got better treatment. That hon. gentleman is certainly not a farmer. Certainly he has not examined very closely the conduct of the Government with respect to the farmers. He does not apparently know that when the tariff suffered its last revision, the tariff committee of the manufacturers sent to the Government their own tariff resolutions, and the Government Bill was largely drafted in accordance with these resolutions. Not only the suggestions of the manufacturers but their very language was embodied in the Government Bill. And further, the manufacturers told us that what surplus funds they had they handed over to the Government in return for the very kind treatment they had received in the past and they hoped to dedicate that surplus in the future also to assist the Government. But can any one show what the farmers have got in the way of special legislation at the hands of the Government? We have been told, time and again, of a large number of articles of raw material from which the duty has been removed in favour of the manufacturers. Is there one article from which the Government have removed the duty in favour of the farmers? For a number of years, I and others urged upon the Government to allow us to get free corn in order that we might be enabled to feed our cattle cheaply; and finally the Government did remove the duty from the small quantity of sweet corn which we bring in for ensilage purposes. They also reduced the duty on a few of the agricultural implements only from 35 to 20 per cent. I believe, however, that that reduction is more illusory than real. I asked the Finance Minister at the time whether or not the Government intended to continue in the future the system they had followed in the past of having revaluation of agricultural implements made on their being imported from other countries. His answer was that they intended to continue the same system, and, therefore, the revaluation often annuls any benefits the farmer gets from this reduction.

What injury have we received on account of the failure of the Government to properly inspect cattle coming into the North-west? The scheduling of our cattle in the British markets has certainly done a great deal of injury to our trade with Great Britain. If the Government had had the inspection of cattle carried out rigidly, the probability is that the scheduling would never have taken place. Our sheep have also been scheduled. No longer ago than last session the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston) brought in a resolution with respect to the inspection of sheep, and showed the Government conclusively that there was a necessity to have a rigid inspection. I stated then that unless the Government appointed an expert, one who understood all the diseases of sheep, I had not the slightest doubt that our sheep would also be scheduled before long. I stated that while we might have good inspectors, it did not follow that these men were competent to inspect sheep, because those acquainted with cattle very often knew very little about sheep, and we required an expert to make a proper examination. The Government, however, did not pay attention to our suggestions to have sheep coming from the United States more closely inspected and prevent the shipping of any diseased animals to the British markets. Then we find that the farmer is at a disadvantage compared with almost every other class of the community. What is the reason that the manufacturers get a rebate of 99 per cent of the duties paid for raw material on all the agricultural implements that are exported? Where do these agricultural implements go to? They go to Britain, Australia, British Africa, the British West Indies, Newfoundland, Argentina, Central America, Chili, Denmark,

France, Germany, Holland and Russia. The farmers of all these countries can get these Canadian implements cheaper than can the Canadian farmers. And yet we are told by the seconder of the Address that no class of the community receive greater consideration at the hands of this Government than the farmers. The fact is that no class have been as hardly dealt with as the farmers have been. If they wish to deal with the farmers as they ought to do, why do they not accept the offer that has been held out to us by the United States government ever since the McKinley Bill came into force? Under the McKinley Bill certain class of implements is allowed to enter the United States free as soon as similar implements are allowed to enter free into Canada. Under the Wilson Bill that offer to the Canadian Government is continued. Looking back we find there was a time when the Canadian tariff statute had in it a reciprocity clause. This was the case with the tariff Bill passed in 1879. Under that Bill a large list of articles was given and it was declared that when the United States removed in whole or in part the duty upon any or all of these articles, the Canadian Government would reciprocate. Did they reciprocate? Not at all. They did nothing until 1888 and then, under pressure they took certain duties off. But this was allowed to continue only until 1890. Mr. McKinley himself stated in the house of representatives that, while the McKinley Bill was not a retaliatory measure, he could not forget the action of the Canadian Government in restoring to the dutiable list in 1890 certain articles which they had taken off that list under pressure two years before. In 1888 Sir Charles Tupper made the statement to the House that the Canadian Government were going to remove the duties on the goods which the American government had made free five years ago and said the Canadian Government had passed an Order in Council in which were these words:

—and the Canadian Government await the further action of the American government in the same direction.

Now, the American government have taken the duty off a large number of agricultural implements offering to allow those goods to come in free from any country that allows them a like privilege. Why does not the Government reciprocate and take the duties off these goods? The manufacturers could send their goods to the United States and compete in that market but for the American duties. We have nothing to thank the Government for in the small reduction in agricultural implements. They reduced the duty on binding twine from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent. But they would not have done that but for the action of the Patrons of Industry in establishing a twine manufactory at Brantford and the action of the Ontario government in manufacturing binding twine at the central prison. The Government is always ready to listen to the complaints of the manufacturers. In fact the manufacturers have come out with the plain statement that there never was a time when they had a greater influence with the Canadian Government than they had when the tariff was being revised in 1893. Further, they have stated plainly that it was at their instigation that the rebate of duty upon raw materials was given on goods sent out of the country. It is a gross injustice to the agricultural community that agricultural implements can be manufactured in Canada and sent to Australia and Argentina and other countries and purchased there cheaper than the Canadian farmers can buy them. And not only that, but, so far as the export of these implements to Australia is concerned, the Government has given a bounty of $125,000 to a line of steamships plying between Vancouver and the Australian colonies, enabling them to carry these goods cheaply, and the Canadian farmer has to assist through the taxation of the country, in sending these goods to Australia. And we have been told that the Government is going to engage a sheep expert at the Experimental Farm and to adopt a policy of encouraging the sheep industry. If they would cease to discourage the sheep industry it would be better than to give it a little encouragement while doing so much to keep it down. I was never so much astonished in my life as when I found by the report of the Intercolonial conference that the Minister of Finance had told the commissioners that the Canadian farmers were utterly unable—those were the very words—to furnish the meat consumed upon the Pacific slope, and that the Australian farmers could do a very large trade in bringing frozen mutton to the coast and British Columbia and could do a little in butter also. He admitted that this would displace the little butter that had gone from the province of Ontario. That has taken place. Butter is brought in from Australia to British Columbia and it is even brought into Ontario, and is competing with our butter in our own market. Think of the folly of a government telling the producers of foreign countries that they could bring in the products of which we have a surplus in this country, and then instructing the Dairy Commissioner to offer the farmers 20 cents a pound for butter to be exported to the British market. I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture is not in his place that he might hear what I am saying. The hon. gentleman stated that the Government had made money out of the transaction. The only detailed information we have had does not indicate anything of the kind. The Dairy Commissioner told the committee on agriculture and colonization that the last sale reported realized only 63 shillings per hundred weight. That is equal to 13½ cents a pound. Later we were told by the Secretary of State, now Minister of Agriculture that 175 packages had been sold in Manchester and brought 16 4-10 cents per pound, and 79 packages had been sold in Liverpool and brought 16 3-10 cents. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the range between the highest and lowest prices that that butter brought when put upon the English market, at the same time and almost under the same conditions, shows that a judicious selection of that butter has not been made. The fact that some of it was sold in the market within a few weeks or a few days of the other sales, and that one sale was 63 shillings and the other sales were from 85 to 90, shows conclusively that the experiment could not have the effect of giving the butter a good standing upon the British market. If you are going to place any line of goods upon the British market and wish to give that line of goods a good standing there, you must select an article of a uniform quality and an article that suits the market. The difference in price brought by this butter shows conclusively that it was not an article of a uniform quality, otherwise the difference in price would not have ranged all the way from 63 shillings per hundred weight up to 90 shillings. That is conclusive evidence, I think, that they did not make a wise selection of butter to be sent to that market. Now, we were also told that the farmers of Scotland to-day are working just as hard as the Canadian farmer. I do not see, Mr. Speaker, why the farmers of Scotland or of any other country should not work just as hard as the Canadian farmers. The farmers of Scotland are upon rented farms, and we know that in Canada to-day, while farming is very much depressed, the farmers of this country on rented farms have to work even a little harder than those who work their own farms. Let me say that the English farmer to-day is not usually a protectionist. I have seen seven or eight reports made by commissioners in different counties in Great Britain, and I find that while there is a considerable feeling with respect to protection amongst the farmers, yet a very large number of them declare that protection would not benefit them, that it would only benefit them for a short time, if at all, until their lease expired, and once their lease expired, the benefit would accrue entirely to the landlord and not to the farmer. One of the commissioners state that there are three different places in one county in England where they brought up and discussed the question of protection to their industry, and he says that the question was only brought up to be set aside. One farmer stated clearly that he would consider it childish to discuss the question of protection, that it was something they would never get. Another farmer stated plainly that he believed that protection in cattle and horses would benefit the British farmer, but protection in grains would not, and that the salvation of the grazer and the dairyman had been in the cheap grains that they had got from foreign countries during the last year or two. There is one commodity upon which I believe almost all the British farmers agree that there should be a protective duty, and that is the article of flour. While they were willing that wheat should come into the British market duty free, they are almost a unit in saying that there should be a duty upon flour, for the reason, among others, that the milling of the flour would afford employment to a large amount of labour. Now, we have been told that the Minister of Agriculture is going to enter upon a new experiment upon the model farm here, or upon some of the other farms, and that he is going into the production of horses of the proper class suitable for breeding and exportation to the British market. Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing above another that this Government should steer clear of it is the breeding of horses. We all know that within the last five years we have spent $30,000 for the purpose of encouraging the breeding of horses of a proper class in Canada; and I am convinced to-day that among all the animals bred from horses at the experimental station at Ottawa they cannot show one animal of special merit that has been bred there, and some of them are five years old at the present time and should be showing their good qualities if they have any. This $30,000 might just as well have been thrown into the fire as spent in the manner I have described, because I contend that even if the farmers did get these animals at a very cheap rate, they would be injured by the class of stock that would be raised. I hold that private enterprise in this country is doing everything that can be done in producing the best class of horses that can be raised in this country. We were told also that the English market for horses was increasing rapidly, that it had increased three-fold within the last three years. Now, let me say that the United States are certainly our best market for horses. In 1889, we sent 17,277 horses to the American market, and we sent 164 to the British market. In 1890, we sent 16,118 horses to the American market, and 125 horses to the British market. In 1893, we sent 10,660 horses to the United States, and 1,946 to Great Britain. In 1895, we sent 6,312 horses to the United States, and 7,123 to Great Britain. Mr. Speaker, upon these 6,312 horses that went to the United States market there was a duty of 20 per cent paid, whereas those we sent to Great Britain entered the market free. Will any hon. gentleman have the hardihood to stand up and say that if the duty was taken off horses going into the United States nearly the whole of the horses exported would not have gone to the American market? Therefore, I contend that is our best market for good horses. I may mention that a few days before I left home one of my sons sold a working team of horses to go to the United States for $280, and before they could cross the boundary line the purchaser had to pay 20 per cent duty.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman explain how we are going to get into the American market?

Mr. McMILLAN. We can get into the American market by paying 20 per cent upon the value of every animal that goes across, and it is found that it is only our best horses that are taken across, and that bring good prices, and upon these the duty has to be paid. Is the hon. gentleman so very ignorant of the conditions of trade between the two countries as to ask such a question? I thought he was better posted with respect to the tariff between the two countries. Now, we are told that our Government are going to stimulate the production of the class of horses that will take in the British market. Let me say that the class of horses that takes in the British market cannot be produced from such animals as we find at the experimental station here, and I believe that these animals are changed from year to year, so that we saw a fair sample. I would say to the Government: leave the breeding of horses alone, we have private individuals in this country who are stimulating that industry and bringing in a class of animals that will do credit to our farmers, and will be of great benefit to the country, such as blood horses, coach horses, hackneys, shires and Clydesdales: As for Percherons, they have gone out of date in the west; I do not know how it is in the east; but we have been supplied with some of those at the experimental farm. Now, so far as sheep are concerned, let me say that sheep raisers in the province of Ontario have brought that industry to a high pitch. We are told also that this Government are going into the business of raising sheep at the experimental farm in order to drive our own out of the market. I find that at the Intercolonial Conference the Minister of Finance stated that wool and frozen mutton would be brought in from Australia. If this should be done, the Australians would be taking away our natural market on the Pacific slope. And yet the Government tell us they intend to appoint an expert on the breeding of sheep for the experimental farm. This is an act of the greatest folly. They bought, for the purpose of the experimental farm, animals at very high prices, and yet, when certain diseases sprang up among them there was no officer on the farm who was able to discover their nature. Ontario farmers can understand they will never receive any benefit from experiments with animals conducted on this farm. The Minister of Finance told the House that, except for the tariff under the National Policy, our grains would be much cheaper than they are to-day. I have here a statement which I obtained last week from reports issued in the United States, and it shows the prices of oats, rye and wheat from 1882 to 1892. I have also obtained from the Bureau of Industry a statement of the prices in Canada for the same cereals from 1882 to 1890. The statement shows that the average price of barley from 1882 to 1892 in the United States was 34½ cents per bushel; in Ontario, from 1882 to 1890, the average price was 35 cents. The price of oats in the United States was 35 7-10; in Ontario it was 35 9-10. It must be remembered that a bushel of oats in the United States is only 32 pounds, as against 34 pounds in Canada. So the price of oats ruled higher in the United States than in this country. Rye, in the United States, averaged 38 cents; in Ontario it averaged 39 cents. Wheat was a little higher in Canada than the States; but let me say that the prices taken for Canada are those of Ontario, which do not give the basis of a fair comparison, when at the same we take prices in both the eastern and western portions of the United States. If we make a comparison of prices paid for agricultural produce all over Canada, I am convinced there will be very little difference in the rates as compared with the United States. The House was told by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) that while the National Policy had not put up the prices of grain it had kept them relatively higher than would otherwise have prevailed, the hon. gentleman adding that before the National Policy Americans sent in grain to the Canadian market. I have here a statement of the prices in Buffalo and Montreal for a series of years, as follows:—

PRICES OF WHEAT.

	Montreal.	U.S.
1881	$1 33	$1 11
1882	1 30	1 18
1883	1 14	1 12
1884	1 05	1 06
1886	0 85	0 87

The price in 1881 was that for the year after the National Policy went into operation. Thus it will be seen that while wheat in Canada was 22 cents higher before the National Policy went into force, it was absolutely lower than the United States after the policy had been in operation for five years. Where, then, is the benefit which our farmers are supposed to derive from the National Policy; where are the higher prices they were going to obtain for their grains? Let it be also remembered that these figures are taken from a report which has been prepared by our Government statistician, and no doubt they are correct. That our National Policy did not benefit farmers in other lines is shown by the following statement:

Mr. McMILLAN.

FARM PRODUCTS IN BUFFALO AND TORONTO, FEB. 26, 1895.

	Buffalo.	Toronto.
Cattle	$5 30	$2 80 highest.
do	4 00	2 00 lowest.
Hogs	4 40	4 30
Lambs	5 75	4 50
Sheep	4 50	3 50 best.
Barley (No. 1).....	0 63	0 50½
do (No. 2).....	0 61	0 47
Oats (No. 2).....	0 32½	0 32 to 34
do (No. 3).....	0 35
Rye	0 56½	0 43

In the United States a bushel of oats is only 32 pounds, and 34 pounds in Canada. I do not deny that there are times when grains may be higher in Canada than in the United States, this being especially true of Ontario. We can remember last year when we had oversold in Canada, that wheat rose to a high price. But was not the National Policy to a great extent, to blame for the shortage in Canada? If it had not been for this policy, wheat would not have been sent out of the country in such large quantities, for it is claimed by the Government that the carrying trade is stimulated as well as other branches of industry by the National Policy. The people of the West found they are able to ship wheat at lower rates on American than on Canadian bottoms, and they took advantage of the opportunity, although afterwards we had to import wheat and pay a duty of 15 cents per bushel to bring our own wheat back into Canada. I should like hon. gentlemen opposite to take a lesson from some leading political economist, and I wish they would study the question as to what market it is that regulates the price of grain. The Americans fully understand this question. They admit that the price of American wheat is regulated by that prevailing in the British market, and it cannot be supposed that the Canadian Government is able to do that which the American Government fails to accomplish. It is thus evident that it is sheer folly for hon. gentlemen opposite to endeavour to impress on the farmers of Canada that they are realizing great benefits as regards the prices of grain from the operation of the National Policy. I can remember well, before the National Policy, that the price of our wheat was much higher in Canada than it was in the United States, and it is a little higher to-day, but a very little indeed. Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by Americans, and I have seen the report on the subject, that a great deal of our grain, wheat, oats, and barley also, would go from this country to the United States as seed, because the generating power of our wheat is 15 or 20 per cent stronger than is the wheat of the United States. Any farmer who knows anything about his business, knows that, when a farmer can get grain that makes first-class seed, it will always command a very high price. Let us go back to the year 1890, when there was 20 cents per bushel duty on Canadian wheat going into the United States, and we find that the export that year amounted to 1,200,000 bushels to Britain. We sent 770,000 bushels that year to the United States, and on that was paid a duty of 20 cents per bushel. Will any gentleman say that, if the whole of our wheat could have gone into the United States markets free of duty, they would not have taken it all? I am perfectly convinced they would. Any one who has studied that question must know full well that it is sheer nonsense to talk about the National Policy increasing the farmer's profits. There is another argument generally used by the Government and their friends, to the effect that goods are cheaper under the National Policy than they ever were in the history of the world. There is an attempt made by them to attribute the cheapness of many articles to the National Policy, but that is all nonsense. I have a statement here, taken from the "Contemporary Review," which quotes English official statistics to show that in 1874 a spindle in spinning cotton made four thousand revolutions a minute, and in 1888 the same spindle made ten thousand revolutions. In 1874, one man could attend only one spindle, while in 1888 one man and two children could attend 2,500 spindles. On the old hand-loom one man could weave only from 42 to 48 yards per day, while in 1888 a skilled workman could tend six looms and weave 1,500 yards per day. Cotton goods which could be purchased from 1865 to 1869 at 3·41 pence per yard, in 1885 could be purchased for 2¼ pence per yard, a reduction of about one-third. Worsted stuffs, which from 1865 to 1869 could be produced for 13·41 pence per yard, in 1885 to 1889 could be produced for 8·99 pence per yard. The improvements in making iron have displaced 39,000 workingmen and reduced the cost of steel from £12 1s. 1d. per ton in 1874 to £4 per ton in 1887. A ship in 1883 that would cost £120,000 sterling, could be bought in 1888 for £70,000, and yet the hon. gentlemen tell us that it is because of the National Policy that we get goods cheaper than before. There is no market in which Canadians can sell to so much advantage as in the markets of the United States. During the last year, under the Wilson Bill, we increased our sales to the United States from $35,000,000 to $41,000,000, while our sales to Great Britain were reduced from $68,000,000 to $61,000,000. That same year our purchases from the United States increased from $53,000,000 to $54,000,000, and our purchases from Great Britain were reduced from $38,000,000 to $31,000,000. This shows conclusively that, if we had anything at all like a low duty, the United States is our best market. If hon. gentlemen opposite would examine the records within their reach, they would know that the statement I got last week proves that oats, taking the same weight, for the last ten years have been higher in the United States than in Canada. This shows that the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the effect of the National Policy on the farmers are very fallacious indeed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 21st January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VACANCY.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a notification of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the electoral district of Northumberland, N.B., by the appointment of Michael Adams, Esquire, to the Senate of the Dominion. I accordingly issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY-- INTERNAL ECONOMY.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, an approved Minute of Council, appointing the Honourable George Eulas Foster, Minister of Finance, the Honourable John Graham Haggart, Minister of Railways and Canals, the Honourable Joseph Aldric Ouimet, Minister of Public Works, and the Honourable Arthur Rupert Dickey, Minister of Justice, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 13th chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled: "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

Government House,

Ottawa, 20th January, 1896.

DEATH OF MR. BRYSON.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, it becomes my duty to say a very few words with reference to an event more than usually sad which has taken place within the last few days: I refer to the death of our colleague and co-member of this House, Mr. Bryson, who was the representative of the electoral district of Pontiac. The suddenness with which this bereavement has taken place makes it all the more sad for us who were his fellow-members, as well as for his family. It only seems a day or two since we saw him with us in this Chamber, occupying the seat yonder on which to-day lies the loving tribute of his fellow-members to what is now but his memory. Mr. Bryson was a young man, born, I believe, in 1849, and so had measured not nearly one-half of the usual span of mature and active life which falls to men. He was born in a family which had political associations and large business interests; and out of these he speedily grew into those diligent, careful and capable business habits, which made him particularly a man of affairs, and by which he conducted his business in a most prosperous and fortunate way. These also, I suppose, gave him a taste for public life, which found its fruition, so far as the arena of Dominion politics is concerned, in 1882, when he entered this House—the same year in which I myself and many of my colleagues who sit about me first became members of this House. It has always struck me that Mr. Bryson was a man of a particularly kindly and genial disposition. He did not seem to care for those sharp and quick encounters in which the asperities of political life are found, but always assumed a milder and calmer tone. He did not, however, lack in ability, and all of us who have heard him speak here in his unpretentious conversational way, know that his ideas and expressions, and the general trend and tenor of his sentiments in relation to political matters, were those of an able and reasonable-minded man. I am sure that I only voice what the hon. members of this House on both sides will endorse when I say that we desire to convey to his family an expression of our deepest regret and our sincerest sympathy. Events like this, happening as they do so suddenly, show us that there are things of far more importance, and truths much greater and more far-reaching than those which in the hurly-burly of political and business life claim so much of our attention. They make us think how little indeed is that span of human life which commences as it were but yesterday on the shoreless sea of an irrevocable past, and ends as it were to-morrow on the equally shoreless sea of a relentless future.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I also, on behalf of those who sit on this side of the House, beg to add my tribute to the memory of our departed friend. My hon. friend has said nothing too strong or too loving of him. Mr. Bryson was certainly one of the most respected members of this House. He had opponents, but he had no enemies. Indeed, I may say that in every opponent he had a friend. It adds certainly to the poignancy of death that a man whom we knew in such young, healthy and vigorous life should have been so near the fatal day. It is almost impossible to believe that one with a step so alert and with so much buoyancy of life should have been already under the shadow of death. Mr. Bryson was above all things a manly man, courageous, courteous, and conscientious. As my hon. friend has said, he seldom took part in the debates of this House, but whenever he gave expression to his views upon any question that arose, he always did it in a straightforward, manly, kind and gentle manner. His death is a great loss to his party; it is also a loss to those associated with him in other ways; and his political opponents feel the loss as keenly as the members of the party with which he was connected.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Powell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, one would suppose, from the appearance the other side of the House presented during the past week, that our constitution had been radically changed, and that Ministers of the Crown were no longer members of Parliament. We have had a discussion upon the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I think that during the two or three hours that that Address was being discussed yesterday evening, no Minister, except the Minister of Justice, was in his place on that side of the House. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen think that the observations addressed to the House and to the country from this side are not worthy of serious consideration. I do not know whether that is the reason for the course which they have recently adopted or not; or whether, in consequence of their retirement from the Government a few days ago, they also acquired the habit of leaving their seats in this House vacant, and that that habit has so far grown upon them that up to this moment they have been unable to overcome it. Sir, the hon. gentleman who moved the Address on behalf of the Administration gave to the House a speech of very considerable consequence, and which derives additional importance from the fact that the constitutional utterances to be found in that speech received the sanction and approval of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey). Sir, the hon. gentleman who moved the Address informed us that we had, under our present constitution, no longer any provincial autonomy : that, while it is true the provinces were endowed with the rights of self-government prior to the union, since the union those rights of self-government were merged into the authority of this Parliament, that because we had a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, there were no powers held by the provinces which were not held by them upon sufferance : and that because of this the House had an undoubted right to deal with one important question which was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and which was referred to in the answer. Sir, I do not know how far the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) is prepared to subscribe to those doctrines, but I do know that the hon. Minister, in the speech which he addressed to this House, commended the observations of the hon. mover of the Address, which observations consisted largely in the peculiar constitutional views I have mentioned. Sir, I do not understand our constitutional system to be as propounded by the hon. gentleman. We are, under the provisions of the British North America Act, federally united ; but if the hon. gentleman's views be correct, we have not a federal act but an incorporate union, and all provincial autonomy ceased the moment that union was accomplished. If I rightly understand our constitution, it is against the views put forward by the mover of the Address. It is a federal union that is established, and the provisions of the constitution relate mainly to the creation of a government and a Parliament which had no existence under the previous order of things. The declaration in the British North America Act is :

Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion, under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

That is their express desire. It was for a federal union. The provinces were to be united, but they were to be federally united. Their individual existence was not interfered with or destroyed by the creation of the union. And it is said, too, that it is to be a union similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. Now, it is not the old government of the provinces that is declared by this Act or that provision to be similar in principle with that of the United Kingdom. It is this new government ; it is this federal constitution, the creation, this government, which had no existence before. So far as the provinces are concerned, they already had governments ; they already had a parliamentary existence ; they already had constitutions in principle similar to that of the United Kingdom. And therefore it was not necessary to make any provision for them. In so far as any provisions exist for the provinces, those provisions relate to certain things required in consequence of the character of the union. There were three provinces before the union ; there were to be four after the union. And because of the dissolution of the union between Ontario and Quebec, which previously existed, certain provisions were necessary in their provincial constitutions which were not necessary in the case of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Now, if we look at the words of this statute, we see it states that the constitution of the executive authority in each of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, so subjected to the provisions of this Act, continue as they existed at the union. The legislature that existed in New Brunswick was continued after the union. The legislature that was actually in existence in the province of New Brunswick, its time not having expired, was authorized to continue to sit as the legislature of that province after the union. And so far as the provinces are concerned, there was no attempt or intention, by the provisions of this Act, to alter their constitutions or give them a different system of government from that which existed before. It is true that they were shorn of a portion of the powers they previously possessed. If that had not been the case, the federal creation could not have been called into existence. But when you look at the preamble, you will see that it is absolutely silent about the constitutions of the provinces, and relates solely to the constitution of the new government which was to exercise a jurisdiction over all the provinces as a unit. Now, it is also stated in this Act :

And whereas, on the establishment of the union by authority of Parliament, it is expedient, not only that the constitution of the legislative authority in the Dominion should be provided for, but also that the nature of the executive government therein be declared.

There are two things here stated as important to do which this Act sets out to accomplish. The one is that a legislature shall be provided for. You state how it shall be constituted and you state also what functions shall be entrusted to it ; but when you come to the Executive Government, there is nothing of the sort. The Executive Government is admitted to exist. It is assumed that it already possesses the powers which the Executive Government of Canada is to exercise. It is not called into existence by this Act, but it is declared by the Act that the Queen is the executive head, in whom is vested the executive authority of the Empire. Her Majesty exercises that authority in the United Kingdom upon the advice of her Ministers there. She exercises that authority in the various portions of the Empire, where no governments are called into existence, where no parliamentary institutions exist upon their advice, under the regulative authority of some statute or under the common law of the United Kingdom. But when you come to a province or a dependency in which parliamentary institutions exist. Her Majesty is still executive head. She is never divested of that authority, but the persons who accompany her and upon whose advice she acts, lay down their authority. It comes to an end when certain boundaries are reached, and a new class of advisers under the law or the local constitution are given to Her Majesty. Her Majesty's Imperial advisers assist her in exercising the executive authority and the prerogatives of the Crown within the United Kingdom. But when Her Majesty comes to any one of the provinces having parliamentary government, her advisers are not those who advise her at Westminster, but those within the province. And so when a new government was called into existence under the authority of this statute, Her Majesty was not given power that she did not previously possess, for executive authority was already vested in her; but when a new government was called into existence, it became necessary to declare the executive authority, and so we find that under the provisions of this statute it is declared that:

The Executive Government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared—

What?

—to continue and be vested in the Queen.

It was in Her Majesty before and it continues in Her Majesty still, but is exercised upon the responsibility of a new body of advisers. And so with regard to the provinces, the parliamentary government which they possessed was not altered in its character. The responsibility of Ministers to the Crown in the various provinces remains since the union as it existed before. The relation between the Crown and these Ministers after the union was precisely what it was before, and Her Majesty was the executive head of every province after the union as she was before. Look at the provisions of the statute. In whose name is the local legislature called? In the name of Her Majesty. Why in the name of Her Majesty? Because the two houses of the local legislature, or the one house, as the case may be, are the advisers of the Crown. If they were called to advise an executive officer created by statute as the head of the government, the legislature would be called in his name. And so with regard to appointments. If you look at the provisions respecting the legislature of Quebec, where the legislative council is continued, the members of that council are appointed in the name of the sovereign. Why in the name of the sovereign? Because they are the council of the sovereign, and not of an executive officer of the local government. And so they possess all the dignity and independence and authority within their own particular sphere, that belong even to members of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. There are cases which show the character of the provincial establishment. Let me refer you to a few of these—the Queen vs. Burah. Their lordships in that case say that the Indian legislature, which is certainly inferior to the representative assemblies of these provinces,

Has powers expressly limited by the Act of the Imperial Parliament, which created it, and it can, of course, do nothing beyond the limits which circumscribe these powers. But, when acting within those limits, it is not in any sense an agent or delegate of the Imperial Parliament, but has, or was intended to have, plenary powers of legislation as large and of the same nature as those possessed by the Imperial Parliament.

And so in the case of Hodge vs. The Queen, which arose in the province of Ontario since the union, their lordships say that:

It appears to their lordships that the objection raised by the appellants is founded upon an entire misconception of the true character and position of the provincial legislatures. They are in no sense delegates or acting under any mandate from the Imperial Parliament.

And further on in the same judgment, their lordships say that:

The British North America Act conferred powers, not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary, as ample, within the limits prescribed by section 92, as the Imperial Parliament, in the plenitude of its powers, possessed and could bestow.

That, Sir, I think, shows that the powers of any one of our legislatures under our federal constitution, acting within the limits of its authority, does not differ from the powers of any dependency of the Empire where parliamentary institutions are introduced. The character of the authority possessed by any one of the provinces of the Dominion has not been altered by the fact that they have been federally united. As they were at the union, or prior to the union, so they continue to be, their authority differing from what it was only in the extent of the power with which they are entrusted, but not at all in the character of the government or the legislature that exists under the constitution. It was often a subject of discussion prior to the American revolution, and, indeed, long after, whence the provinces of the Empire derived their authority. This question was incidentally dealt with from what may be regarded as the colonial point of view in the case of Keilly vs. Carson. But in a later case, Philips vs. Eyre, the Court of Exchequer Chamber fully recognized the plenary right and authority of the legislatures of the dependencies, both with regard to the nature of the authority, and with regard to its origin. Now, that judgment, which was delivered by Mr. Justice Wills on behalf of the entire court, after very full argument, sets out this proposition—that the Crown has, as a matter of common law right, the prerogative to issue writs and to call into existence in new colonies legislative assemblies. That the Crown had this power to create new constituencies and to issue writs for the election of members by those constituencies prior to the union of England with Scotland, is an undoubted fact. This power which the Crown possessed then in England, was a power which it continued to possess in the colonies. It issues writs, calls into existence legislative assemblies, and these assemblies derive their authority from the common laws, not as a matter of grace bestowed upon them by the Crown, but as a matter of right inherent in British subjects, who carry with them the common law wherever they may go. Let me read an extract from that judgment :

There is even greater reason for holding sacred the prerogative of the Crown to constitute a local legislature in the case of a settled colony, where the inhabitants are entitled to be governed by the English law, than in that of a conquered colony, where it is only by grace of the Crown that the privilege of self-government is allowed, though, where once allowed, it cannot be recalled. In colonies distant from the mother country to which writs to return members to the Imperial Parliament do not run, it is essential, both for the due government of the country in dealing with matters best understood upon the spot, and with emergencies which do not admit of delay, and also for giving subjects there resident the benefit of a voice by their representatives in the councils by which they are taxed and governed, that the Crown should have the power of creating a local parliament.

Showing that so far as local parliaments in all the dependencies settled by British subjects, are concerned, they owe their existence to the same law, and to the same authority, and by the exercise of the same prerogatives of the Crown, that called into existence the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Now, Sir, that rule applies to every colony that has representative institutions in the Empire. That rule applies to the provinces of this Dominion, and I shall be indeed surprised if the Minister of Justice undertakes to uphold and to defend the novel doctrines put forward by the hon. gentleman who moved this Address, and for a purpose that it seems to me that they do not effectually serve. Then the hon. gentleman made another observation with regard to the difference between our system and the American system. The hon. gentleman speaks as though those who undertook to uphold provincial rights are simply followers and disciples of those American statesmen who adopted the doctrine of what was called state rights. Now, Mr. Speaker, as this is a matter of some little importance, let me say that there is no similarity or analogy between them. The men who held to the doctrine of state rights were men who held that the federal government of the United States was simply a congress of ambassadors representing independent and sovereign states, entrusted by the voluntary act of those states with certain powers; that any one of the states might withdraw from the others, by withdrawing those representatives from that united assembly. Why, Sir, there is no person in this country who maintains such a doctrine. We on this side of the House have always been federalists. We maintain that the province has rights, undoubted rights, which Parliament ought not to invade; but we also maintain that Parliament has rights which are as independent of the provinces as those of the provinces are independent of us. Now, let me say another thing. The hon. gentleman has in his statement referred to what he calls the historical fact, that the men who advocated state rights are forgotten, and that the men who advocated the national character of the union on the other side of the boundary, are the only men whose names stand out prominently to-day; and the hon. gentleman mentioned amongst those, Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison. Now, Sir, these are the two gentlemen who founded the school of state rights. Mr. Jefferson declared that the constitution of the United States was simply an international department, or a foreign department for the administration of international affairs, that that was the strict interpretation of the constitution as to the power that was conferred upon Congress. Mr. Madison himself was the author of those celebrated state rights resolutions that were passed in the Virginia convention. Now, let me say a word or two here, and I think this is not inappropriate in this discussion, especially as the hon. gentleman who moved the Address referred to the matter. I think there is a mistaken notion abroad with regard to the constitution of our neighbours. It is assumed that the states were sovereign, and that the power of congress, the power vested in the central or federal government, is a power that arose from the surrender on the part of the states of a portion of the sovereign power vested in them. I say there is no warrant for such a doctrine. Look at the origin of the American federation. The various provinces that formed afterwards the states of the union, had a dispute with Great Britain, first, with regard to their exclusive right to domestic legislation, and second, with regard to their exclusive right to domestic taxes. They denied the power of the Imperial Parliament to tax. They maintained that the Imperial Parliament was in its nature a federal government so far as they were concerned, and ought not to interfere with their local and internal affairs. That dispute led to war. The colonies formed a voluntary organization unknown to the law, representing the people in the various states of the union. These men declared war against Great Britain. They carried on that war, they exercised the power of a sovereign state, they issued letters of marque, they established prize courts, they entered into treaties with foreign states, and they were ultimately recognized as an independent and sovereign government by the King and Parliament of Great Britain. Well, Sir, whence did they get their power? From the states? Not at all. By the success of their arms, and by the treaty made with the government of the United Kingdom, they had transferred to them the powers which belonged previously to the King and Parliament of Great Britain, and were never claimed by any one of the provinces which became states of the union. The war was a war declared by them on behalf of the colonists at that time, and they declared that the sovereign authority which was before vested in the King and Parliament of Great Britain passed to the people, not of each of the states separately, but of the people of the United States. And so the constitution did no more than this, it drew the boundary line between those powers which had been previously exercised by the states of the union when they were British colonies, and that power which was admittedly vested in the King and Parliament of the United Kingdom. That was what the constitution did. And by whom was that constitution framed? There was a government existing before, created by the articles of federation. There was a union formed years before the articles of federation were called into existence, created by the force of arms, and the constitution begins by declaring that We, the people of the United States, in order to establish a more perfect union, do so and so. And when we look at the 10th article of the constitution we find these words:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively or to the people.

That is, there was a residue of power neither vested in the state nor vested in congress, but remained in the people at large, and which no government was authorized to exercise on behalf of the nation. Look at these words: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution." Who framed the constitution? We, the people of the United States. The whole nation framed the constitution, and they say that the powers which are not prohibited to the states, or not conferred upon Congress, remain either to the state or the people, remain to the states where they are local in their character and were exercised previously by the colonies; remain to the people at large if they were powers previously vested in the King and Parliament of the United Kingdom. Here are powers delegated—by whom? By the people of the United States. And so no more preposterous contention was ever put forward than to say that the different states conferred on Congress the powers it possesses. Sir, I pass away from the observations addressed to the House by the mover of the Address, and I come to allude to the speech of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny). The hon. gentleman made a somewhat violent personal attack upon the leader of the Opposition and upon the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It seems to me that was a very ill-judged and ill-timed attack, that it was unpatriotic, ungenerous, and the charges which it formulated were altogether unfounded. Sir, I say it was an unpatriotic attack. Let us look for a moment at the position of Great Britain in her relations to the United States at this moment. We, Sir, are a portion of the British Empire, we maintain, and it is vital to us that we should maintain, that Great Britain is an American power. We are upon this continent to stay. We intend to exercise, under the aegis of the Imperial authority, the rights of self-government. We are growing not in the direction of maturing and of falling off from the United Kingdom, but growing in the direction of equality, and we propose to enter into permanent partnership in some form or other, determined by growth rather than by the fanciful opinions of statesmen or politicians, as to what the character of that partnership shall be. We are every day becoming in a larger and larger degree a sovereign power. We are exercising upon this continent international relations so far as they concern ourselves. We did so in the abortive treaty relating to our Atlantic fisheries; we did so in the treaty relating to the Behring Sea; and I have no doubt whatever, in a larger degree, and, perhaps, under well settled regulations in time as regards those matters which specially concern ourselves, the Imperial Government will be disposed to trust us as we are disposed to trust Great Britain, and she will permit us to judge with a larger measure of responsibility as to what our interests are in this regard. When you look at the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, you see that the United States have recognized Great Britain as an American power. They have recognized the British Empire as having on this continent an equal voice with themselves in the settlement of the erection and use of those great commercial highways in which the Empire, as well as the neighbouring republic is interested. And then when you look at South America you find that England is a South American power, but the United States is not; and it would be an extraordinary thing, indeed, if our neighbours were to assume to exercise supreme jurisdiction over this continent in disregard of those provisions of international law which regulate our relations. I say, then, that while we are devoted to the Empire, and I trust we fully appreciate our own interests in the matter, and our rights as an American power, and do so with courtesy towards our neighbours, it was an exceedingly inopportune time for the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) to attack the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) under the pretense that those hon. gentlemen were not just as loyal as he, or any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. It is important to us that we should present to the world our unity in this regard. We are one people so far as the maintenance of relations with the United Kingdom are concerned, and, that being so, it was in the last degree improper, it was ungenerous for the hon. gentleman to undertake to make the charges which he did. Sir, the hon. gentleman must remember this, that when he made those attacks he was injuring the country, he was not simply injuring the Liberal party. The Liberal party is too well established in this country, its interests in the country are too well known, its devotion to the public interests in the country are too well understood for the people to place any value upon such attacks as those made by the hon. member for Halifax; but we must consider the impression made abroad, made upon our neighbours, the fact that they expect to gain something by assuming that by using an arrogant tone, they will drive a certain portion of our population into the union sooner than take any risk. That is a danger which presents itself, and that is a danger which the hon. gentleman, by his speech, has undertaken to aggravate. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) also spoke upon this subject, and declared that the policy which the Liberal party adopted some time ago, and which so far as I know, the Liberal party has never abandoned—we believe in more intimate relations with our neighbours, and we still believe that a liberal measure of reciprocity would be a good thing and would not promote political union with our neighbours across the border. The hon. gentleman quoted from an address published by the late leader of the Opposition, to show that the policy of a large measure of reciprocity would necessarily lead to annexation, and the hon. gentleman thought that the opinion of the late leader of the Opposition upon a question of that sort ought to be taken as conclusive. If the opinion of the late leader of the Opposition is good against his friends, it is equally good against his opponents, and the hon. member for North Bruce seems to have altogether forgotten what Mr. Blake said in regard to the policy which the hon. gentleman himself, up to a very recent period, so zealously supported. Mr. Blake said :

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

The Canadian Conservative policy has failed to accomplish the predictions of its promoters.

That statement, I suppose, the hon. gentleman will not question. He continued :

Its real tendency has been, as foretold twelve years ago, towards disintegration and annexation, instead of consolidation and that maintenance of British connections—

12½

The hon. gentleman will surely accept that assertion.

—of which they claimed to be the special guardians.

Further on, Mr. Blake said :

It has left us with a small population, a scanty immigration, and a North-west empty still.

All three statements are true to-day, as they were when Mr. Blake penned them, and the hon. member, I am sure, will not question their accuracy. Mr. Blake continued :

With enormous additions to our public debt and yearly charge, an extravagant system of expenditure, and an unjust and oppressive tariff; with restricted markets for our needs, whether to buy or to sell, and all the hosts of evils (greatly intensified by our special conditions) thence arising; with trade diverted from its natural into forced and therefore less profitable channels; and with unfriendly relations and frowning tariff walls ever more and more estranging us from the mighty English-speaking nation to the south, our neighbours and relations, with whom it ought to be, and it was promised that we should be, living in generous amity and liberal intercourse.

Worse; far worse! it has left us with lowered standards of public virtue, and a death-like apathy in public opinion; with racial, religious and provincial animosities rather inflamed than soothed; with a subservient parliament, an autocratic executive, debauched constituencies, and corrupted and corrupting classes; with lessened self-reliance and increased dependence on the public chest and on legislative aids; and possessed, withal, by a boastful jingo spirit, far enough removed from true manliness, loudly proclaiming unreal conditions and exaggerated sentiments, while actual facts and genuine opinions are suppressed.

It has left us with our hands tied; our future compromised; and in such a plight that, whether we stand or move, we must run some risks which else we might have either declined, or encountered with greater promise of success.

That is the testimony which Mr. Blake gives in respect to the policy of my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill). I hope that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) will not discredit his own witness. I hope, as he has appealed to Caesar that he will by the judgment of Caesar abide.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman forgive me for a moment. I do not think that the evidence of Mr. Blake against his life-long political opponents, carries so much weight as it does against his political friends.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The testimony is with regard to principles and not with regard to men. It is a testimony with regard to the tendency and effect of those principles, and it is just as valuable and just as weighty in the one case as in the other. Now, Sir, the hon. Finance Minister undertook to show that the course taken by his Government in respect to the by-elections was justified because of the elections of Mr. Jores and Mr. Vail many years ago when the Mackenzie Government was in power. Why, in order that the hon. gentleman's testimony or illustration might have any value, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) ought to have looked at the writs. The hon. gentleman ought to have seen whether they were not issued upon the same day. The hon. gentleman forgets that he names the returning officer now, and, of course, there can be no election until a returning officer is appointed. When Mr. Jones and Mr. Vail were elected, there were returning officers appointed by the law. The writs were sent on the same day to the sheriffs, and under that law as in England, the sheriffs had power to name the day on which the elections should be held, and the day on which the nominations should be made. And, if they were not held on the same day it was because there was no concerted action between the returning officers. That is not the position the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is now in. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier), I think, gave Mr. Speaker notice of four vacancies at the same time, and I understand that Mr. Speaker issued his warrants for those four vacancies at the same time. But the Government had it in their power to give effect to these warrants. Before the writs were issued they had to name returning officers to whom these writs could be addressed, and if there was not simultaneousness in the elections, or if the elections did not take place at the same time or about the same time, it was because the hon. gentlemen opposite interfered. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) say that Mr. Mackenzie's Government interfered in the matter of the Vail and Jones elections? Not at all. They stood upon a different footing; the law was different. Then, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery issued his writ and the law operated independent of the Government; but in this case the Government interfered. They exercised authority over the returning officer. He is an officer of their naming and the hon. gentlemen took care to arrange the elections, as they thought, in the interests of their party. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) made some observations which I do not understand, and perhaps he will explain them when he comes to address the House again. He said of the hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition:

You saw him flagellate and lacerate the weakness, and the delay, and the vacillation of the Government.

I tell the hon. gentleman frankly that I do not understand what he means by "flagellating and lacerating the weakness, and the delay, and the vacillation of the Government." I could understand what would be meant, if the flagellation and laceration were of the Government, but how my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) could "flagellate and lacerate the weakness, delay and vacillation of the Government" I confess I do not understand and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will, no doubt, in time tell us. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) said further:

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

If there is anything that will make a family connection with the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), it is the use of strong expletives which have much of sound but little of significance, because they are based upon the spirit of invective.

Neither do I quite understand the meaning of this expression. I would have supposed, Sir, that if an expletive were a strong expression it would have something more than sound; it would have some real significance, and I do not know precisely what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) means by "making a family connection with the hon. member for South Oxford" (Sir Richard Cartwright). Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) pretend to say that we are going to enter into some martial relations with the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) because of his strong language, or what does he mean? I confess I do not know. Then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) attacked Mr. German. Now, I am not here to defend Mr. German. If Mr. German was guilty of bribery or corruption, or if his agents were guilty with his knowledge, he was justly punished. But the complaint made by Mr. German was: That the witness who gave testimony against him was a perjured witness, and Mr. German entered an action against that person for perjury. If I remember rightly, that man did not remain in the constituency to stand his trial, and Mr. German has since by a very large majority in that constituency, been returned to the local legislature, a fact which I hardly think would have taken place if the constituency believed the witness and did not believe Mr. German. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was rather bewildered. I must say, by the observations addressed to the House by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). That hon. gentleman made a somewhat violent attack upon the hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in reference to the use he made of the information contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns in respect to our exports and imports. He thought my hon. friend from South Oxford had acted most dishonestly in undertaking to institute a comparison between the periods existing before 1879 and those which followed. Sir, I am totally unable to follow the hon. gentleman in that respect. I think it is very important to institute comparisons between the imports and exports during different periods under different tariffs in order to form some opinion as to what influence the changes in the tariff have had on the exports and imports. The hon. member for Albert vigorously dissented; but what his objections were to the comparison I was totally unable to ascertain. The hon. member's speech reminded me a little of an observation I once heard Mr. Beck address to a gentleman in the Senate of the United States who corrected him for a false quantity. Mr. Beck said that he had not had the advantages of early culture that were enjoyed by the hon. Senator who had corrected him; but he had never listened to the hon. Senator without being reminded of an observation once made by Mr. Randolph of Virginia on a former occasion in reference to certain lands in Virginia, which he said were poor by nature and had been still further impoverished by cultivation. I give the hon. member for Albert credit for ability; but in the speech which he addressed to the House on this question, his criticisms of the figures given by the hon. member for South Oxford, it does seem to me, were wanting in logical force and accuracy. Now, Sir, let me say a word or two with regard to a paragraph in the Speech which so far no member of the Government has explained. It says:

The growth of population in the North-west Territories, as disclosed by the last enumeration, calls for additional representation in Parliament. A Bill for this purpose will be laid before you.

Now, Sir, I find that in the last distribution, that of 1892, based on the census of 1891, the number of people represented by each member is, on the average, 23,000. There are four representatives of the North-west Territories. The last census, I apprehend, is that of 1894. I do not know whether the Government are prepared to contend that they have a right to use that in the distribution of seats or not; but that census shows a population there of 73,506. According to the ordinary average, four representatives would be an adequate representation for something over 90,000 people; so that in the North-west Territories, according to that census of 1894, the population is short of the representation by 16,500. I am totally unable to understand how, with that fact before them, the Administration can seriously argue that the North-west Territories are entitled to additional representation. In British Columbia, in Manitoba and in the North-west Territories, a representation was given in excess of what the population would warrant, and in the case of British Columbia and Manitoba, and later in the case of the North-west Territories, the extra representation was confirmed by Imperial authority. There was also a provision that that representation should not be increased in the first two cases without an increase of population warranting it; and, as the Government state in this Address that the population does warrant it, we will require some further information on that subject. Now, Sir, I wish to call attention—for this seems an appropriate time to do so—to the commutation of the sentence of Shortis. Under the present instructions, which were determined after a good deal of controversy with the Colonial Office, it became the settled policy of this country, that, where Imperial interests were not concerned, in the commutation of a sentence or the pardon of an offender, the Governor should act upon the advice of his Administration. The rule prior to the adoption of that contained in the instructions first issued to Lord Lorne, was somewhat different, and I have taken the trouble to look at some of the cases in which this subject was discussed in the House of Lords. There was a case in which Sir Hercules Robinson had exercised the power of pardon. One Gardiner had been guilty of robbery—had, in fact, been a cattle lifter and had caused great annoyance to the population of a large district for a long time; and he was sentenced to the penitentiary for thirty-two years. Sir Hercules Robinson commuted his sentence on condition that he would banish himself from the colony, and that commutation was made the subject of discussion in the House of Lords. The conduct of Sir Hercules Robinson in that case was justified, nearly all those who spoke in the debate maintaining that it was a matter upon which the Governor should be entrusted personally with the exercise of the royal prerogative; that for certain purposes, in fact in all cases, he ought to take the advice of his ministers, but that in such cases, if he dissented from their views, he could act on his own responsibility. There was a double responsibility, said the Colonial Secretary—a responsibility to the Crown and Imperial Government, on the part of the Governor, and a responsibility on the part of the ministers to the country in which the trial took place. In the papers moved for, on the 4th of October, 1869, Lord Granville, who was Colonial Secretary, addressed a letter to the Governor of New South Wales, in which he said:

But, unless an Imperial interest or policy is involved, as might be the case in a matter of treason or slave trading, or in matters in which foreigners might be concerned, the Governor would be bound to allow great weight to the recommendation of his ministry.

And in 1871, the Earl of Kimberley, then Colonial Secretary, said:

The governor, as invested with the Queen's prerogative, is bound to examine personally each case in which he is called upon to exercise the power entrusted to him, although in a colony under responsible government he will, of course, have a due regard to the advice of his ministers, who are responsible to the colony for the proper administration of justice and the prevention of crime, and will not grant any pardon without receiving their advice.

Although he was not at that time, in every case, bound to follow the advice, he was, in every case, bound to take the advice. Lord Carnarvon, in a despatch addressed to Sir Hercules Robinson, said:

You will, I apprehend, have no difficulty in conforming to the clear rule laid down in your instructions, which are based on this principle, namely, that, on the one hand, the Governor to whom the Queen personally delegates a very high prerogative, cannot in any way be released from the duty of judging for himself in every case in which that prerogative is proposed to be expressed, while, on the other hand, he is bound, before deciding, to pay the most careful attention to the advice of his ministers, or that one of them who, in the matter under consideration, may be selected to represent his colleagues.

He further says :

On the one hand, the Governor will not be relieved of his responsibility to the Crown, and, on the other hand, the local government will not be relieved of its responsibility to its own Parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have seen in some of the Government organs reference made to the case of Lepine, as justifying the course which the Government have taken in this matter. That was a wholly different case. The circumstances were different, the rules and regulations, the responsibilities of the Ministers at that time were different from what they are to-day. The crime with which Lepine was charged, although tried in Canada, was a crime which was not committed in Canada. The crime of murder, with which he was charged, was committed in the territories outside of Canada, which, subsequent to the murder, became included in Canada. That being the case, the question was properly a question for Imperial consideration. It was a question with which the Imperial authorities had to do rather than the Canadian Government. The views of the Canadian Government were expressed and were well known. They were stated by Lord Carnarvon, in the discussion of this subject in the House of Lords. But the Governor General, as an Imperial officer, charged with the duty of exercising the royal prerogative, under those rules and regulations which I have read to the House, in respect to an offence which was committed under Imperial authority, and not under Canadian, did, as an Imperial officer, exercise the prerogative of mercy. Shortly after this whole subject was made the subject of discussion, and a new rule was agreed upon, so far as Canada was concerned. It was admitted that, with the exception of those cases I have named, the exercise of the power of pardon or commutation, the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, was to be upon the advice of the Ministers of the Crown in this country. Now, I am not saying that the pardon or the commutation of Shortis's sentence was an improper act. I am expressing no opinion whatever upon that subject ; but I am pointing out to the House, that so far as the Government of this country is concerned, it had imposed upon it the duty of saying whether the law should be carried into execution or whether the prerogative of mercy should be exercised. That was its constitutional duty. But it was reported—and these hon. gentlemen can say what foundation there is for that report—that the First Minister went to His Excellency and informed him not what the advice of the Government was upon the subject, but that the Government could not give any advice, because the Ministers were divided in opinion and could not agree. That was a statement he had no right whatever to make. Hon. members will recollect that that subject is discussed by Mr. Gladstone in his article on "Our Kin Beyond the Sea." Baron Stockmar maintains that the sovereign ought to be present in Council to hear the deliberations of Council, to take part in those deliberations, and to assist in coming to a conclusion, and Mr. Gladstone points out that the sovereign ought not to be present, ought not to know what the views of the Ministers were when the subject was under deliberation, that the duty of the Ministers was to advise the sovereign, and that they cannot give a discordant or divided advice. Their advice must be one, they must agree in opinion, they must state what their conclusion is ; and unless they do come to some conclusion, and do state what their opinion is, they have no advice to give. It is not their business, it is a total abnegation of their functions to go to the sovereign and say : We are divided in our opinion and cannot advise you. I say you are bound to advise the sovereign or retire from your places. You are confessing your incompetency, you are admitting that you are unable to discharge the ordinary administrative duties devolving upon you. That is what you do when you say you cannot agree upon an opinion. I am speaking now of what is reported, and I am speaking of this fact, that the hon. gentlemen, because of their differences, imposed upon the Governor duties that were outside of his instructions, and for which special instructions were given him by telegram. I am not denying that the Imperial Government could alter those instructions ; but I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this, that we are in a large degree governed by conventions, that one of the conventions of our constitution is that the exercise of the power of pardon in this country shall be upon the advice of the Ministers in this country, except where Imperial interests are concerned ; and the Government, by the course it has taken, has confessed itself unable to discharge that duty and incapable of giving that advice. That is the position these hon. gentlemen have taken. I suppose the Minister of Justice had that question before him. I suppose he discussed that question and reported to the Council upon it ; and if his advice were not acted upon, I do not understand, looking at his responsibility as a Minister of the Crown, he continued in the office after his report was disregarded. My hon. friend says that he went out, but whether on this subject or not, I do not know. My impression is that the hon. Minister of Justice remained after the discordant voices were heard in the Cabinet upon this subject.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I certainly did not go out on the Shortis question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman made some report and that report was not acted upon. Effect was not given to it. I repeat again that it seems to me a matter of surprise that the hon. gentleman should have been overruled on a question specially concerning his own department and his own duties by his own colleagues. It is admitted that he was so overruled in a matter where a life was in issue, and where the administration of justice might be, by the conclusion reached, seriously affected. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said all I intend to say with regard to this Speech from the Throne. It is not very extensive, but it is very intensive; and I have no doubt that it gives hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches as much anxiety as any Address that was ever submitted by the Government to Parliament. I hope the hon. gentlemen will explain this proposition for increased representation, and I hope they will explain how it was that they abdicated their functions and shirked their responsibilities in the Shortis case, and imposed an ungracious duty upon the representative of the sovereign in this country.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, in the opening of his remarks the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) called the attention of the House to the fact that there were not many Ministers present last night during the debate, and rather took exception to that fact. I may say that it was owing, unfortunately, to indisposition on the part of some of the Ministers that they were not present. And I wish to say to the hon. gentleman and to the House that it is not through any discourtesy to him that the benches on this side are so empty to-day. It is due to the fact that a number of the colleagues of the late lamented member whose death has been so gracefully referred to, have gone to attend the last sad rites over his body. I do not intend to follow the hon. member from Bothwell in the long dissertation he gave us upon the constitutional question of provincial autonomy raised by the mover of the Address in the speech he gave us a few days ago. I congratulate the mover of the Address upon the speech he made, and the manner in which he made it, and I think he is still further to be congratulated upon the fact that he has raised a point that has given the hon. member for Bothwell a good deal of thought and has occasioned that hon. gentleman taking up the time of the House in trying to refute the position taken by the mover of the Address upon the subject of provincial autonomy. I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, in the discussion of that subject, for the hon. gentleman is a Radical by nature, and has exceedingly radical ideas upon the constitutional law of this country. I have noticed that, in listening to his address, a number of constitutional authorities in this House have been overcome, and no doubt they will await the reading of his speech, as I shall before undertaking to deal with the points he has raised. But, in reference to the last matter the hon. gentleman spoke of, I think that when he admitted that he was dealing with the question upon public report only, it would have been in better taste if he had left the matter until the papers were upon the Table, when, with all the facts before him, he could have dealt with it in a more becoming way. I wish to touch upon what the hon. gentleman said concerning what he called the violent attack made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) upon the hon. member for South Oxford, and the leader of the Opposition. I would ask the hon. gentleman, who was present on that occasion, whether the hon. member for Halifax manifested any violence that would call for the scathing criticisms administered by the hon. member for Bothwell. We all remember that the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax were called forth by statements made by the hon. member for South Oxford. The hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) were naturally incensed, as no doubt were the members for Nova Scotia and the people of Nova Scotia at large, at the charge made by the hon. member for South Oxford that that province was the dry-nurse and the wet-nurse of the worst type of boodlers we had ever known in Canada. And the whole difficulty that arose between the hon. member for Halifax and the leader of the Opposition was as to the words that were used by the leader of the Opposition in the speech he made at Boston some years ago. The hon. member for Halifax had not the report of the speech at hand, but he quoted from memory what he understood was what the hon. gentleman had said. I notice that the hon. gentleman for Bothwell is far apart in his ideas as to our future connection with Great Britain from the leader of the Opposition, or, at least, as the leader of the Opposition expressed himself at Boston. If I remember rightly, the member for Bothwell said a few moments ago that Canada and the Empire were growing together, and that there was a permanent attachment between them. But we find that his leader, a few short years ago, as reported, not in the Boston papers, but in the Toronto "Globe," said:

Britain and Canada were, however, drifting further and further apart, and the time was coming when they must separate; but he was a British subject, and, as such, he hoped that, when the final separation came about, it would come in friendship, as a son leaves the house of his father to become the father of a family.

If those were the views of the leader of the Opposition then, what are his views to-day? If he believes that Great Britain and Canada are drifting further and further apart, he does not agree with the hon. member for Bothwell, because that hon. gentleman, along with the members on this side of the House, and the vast majority of the people, hold that the attachment between Canada and Great Britain is growing stronger, that they are growing closer and closer together, and not drifting further and further apart. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) had quoted the speech of Mr. Blake and had used the admission of Mr. Blake against Mr. Blake himself, and against the hon. member for Bothwell and other members of the party. No doubt the statement may be taken to be true in part and not true in the whole, and we take it that it was true in part.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We take it that it was true the other way.

Mr. DALY. That is where we differ. Leaving the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell, I come to consider the Speech from the Throne. I congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address upon the able manner in which they fulfilled their duty. There was a clause of the Speech which I thought the hon. member for Bothwell would have referred to, in view of the discussion last session when he and I were pitted against each other in debating the Government's Indian policy. It is gratifying to myself, as head of the department, as well as to the officers of the department generally, that His Excellency has seen fit to say a good word for us:

As to the work of the Indian Department, as a whole, the manner in which it is directed and administered appears to be very satisfactory.

That is the speech of His Excellency in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He prepared that Speech on the advice of his Ministers.

Mr. DALY. Undoubtedly; but we have to acknowledge the fact that His Excellency has been travelling in the North-west, that he met the Indians upon their reserves and visited the industrial schools; and no doubt the words used by His Excellency in the Speech can be found to be expressive of the views of His Excellency himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DALY. And whatever the present views of the hon. member for Bothwell, no doubt if he would take the same trouble of inspecting these schools and visiting these reserves he would share the views expressed in the Speech. I do not for one moment say that these words are the words of His Excellency, I do not wish to be so understood. They are the words used by His Excellency upon the advice of his responsible advisers. But no doubt if you were to ask His Excellency's private opinion it would be found to be the same as that expressed by every gentleman who has taken the trouble to visit the North-west and ascertain the facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Including the hon. leader of the Opposition himself.

Mr. DALY. I was coming to that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it right to quote His Excellency?

Mr. DALY. I am not quoting His Excellency. I do not seek to do so. But I say that any private person knowing the circumstances as His Excellency does, would speak as His Excellency did in the Speech from the Throne. We have the leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Opposition in the Senate, and a number of other Senators in opposition expressing the same views as His Excellency does here.

I have not the slightest doubt that if the hon. gentlemen from the other side of the House would take the opportunity of visiting our industrial schools they would come to the conclusion that the policy that has been adopted by this Government is the correct one. Sir, I do not see why we should view this Indian question from a political standpoint at all. It seems to me that our policy in the administration of our Indian affairs should be non-political, and on this ground we shall find that the policy this Government has adopted has been a successful one. I guarantee that if the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should be called upon to administer that department, he will make very few changes in the present mode of conducting its affairs, and I doubt if he would change the policy of the Government in that direction. I am also glad to see reference made to the Mounted Police. We have had discussions in this House last session, and previous sessions, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, with little knowledge of what they were talking about, have seen fit to attack that body, have seen fit to say that the Government are expending more money in the administration of the Mounted Police, or the conduct of that body, than was necessary. But I am glad to find, from testimony adduced in the Senate, and from testimony adduced by hon. gentlemen upon either side of the House who have had occasion to come in contact with that body of men, and who have had an opportunity of knowing what they are doing, that they have highly complimented the Mounted Police and the officers who command them. But, Sir, this session was called by His Excellency in pursuance of a promise that was made upon this side of the House last session, to take into consideration the question as to whether we should introduce remedial legislation in accordance with the action of the Government upon the judgment of the Privy Council, and, as I have just said, in accordance with the promise that was made by the leader of this House, and by the leader of the Government. Sir, that is a question that, I presume, will occupy most of the attention of the members of this House during the days that we shall sit here, and I am called upon to discuss this question now in view of certain statements that were made by the leader of the Opposition the other day, and by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). Now, the hon. leader of the Opposition referred the other night, I thought, in rather congratulatory terms to the supposed fact that Mr. Greenway had carried the country upon the school question, that the people of Manitoba were a unit upon that question. Now, Sir, I take exception to that statement. I do not admit that because Mr. Greenway has been able, as he undoubtedly has, to increase his majority in that House, the result was a declaration by the people of Manitoba upon the school question. It may be a declaration of the people of Manitoba upon one branch, or one feature, of that question; but I know the result does not indicate their minds, because, Sir, I am satisfied that the true issue was not generally discussed during the recent election. But advantage was taken by Mr. Greenway of the machinery that was at hand to get a snap verdict from the people, without giving them an opportunity to exercise their franchise, or giving them an opportunity of properly discussing this question. Why, Sir, if Mr. Greenway were in earnest upon this matter, if Mr. Greenway were the advocate of the rights of the people of Manitoba, as he contends that he is, why was it necessary for him to call the elections there so suddenly? Why did Mr. Greenway make up his mind to call the elections some months before it was necessary for him to go before the people again? More than that, Sir, was it necessary for Mr. Greenway and the members of his government, through their partisan enumerators and partisan officers, to disfranchise the people by wholesale as they did in the different constituencies of Manitoba? Why, Sir, I find by recent papers that I have received from Manitoba, that no less than thirty-nine names, all of which are published in the "Nor'-Wester," a newspaper published in Winnipeg, were handed to the registrar and to the officials in North Winnipeg, but not one of those names appear upon the list. Out of fifty-six names that were put in by Ogilvie & Co., of men employed in their mill, twenty-four were left off the list. Mr. T. W. Taylor, the Conservative candidate in North Winnipeg, resident over twenty years in North Winnipeg, a large employer of labour there, and a well known man—his name was left off the list. Mr. F. W. Thompson, manager for Ogilvie & Co.—his name was left off the list. In fact, out of 2,500 names of voters that appear upon the Dominion list and the local municipal list in North Winnipeg, 400 names were left off by the partisan enumerators. Now, Sir, it seems to me that such conduct as that does not indicate that Mr. Greenway and his followers were anxious to meet the people of Manitoba upon the school question, or upon any other question. He was anxious to snap a verdict from the people, and to get another lease of power for four years. In addition to those gentlemen I have mentioned, we find that a Conservative went to the clerk to see if another name was duly registered, and, at the same time, asked after his own registration. He found his name on the list, saw it there, but when the list was printed, his name was not on it, and he was, consequently, disfranchised. Another party went to the office twice with witnesses, and was told his name was on the list, but it did not appear. Four men went together to the registrar, two were put on and two were left off. The latter were Tories, of course. This same paper says:

In a terrace, containing four houses, in which lived two Grits and two Tories, the Grits were registered and the Tories were left. One old gentleman, owning his home, who has lived and voted in North Winnipeg for years—a good consistent Conservative—is left off the list, while his tenant, living in the other end of the same house—a Grit, of course—is registered.

Sir, these gentlemen and their officers have not done this kind of work in North Winnipeg alone. You will find it in Brandon, you will find it in North Brandon, you will find it in every constituency in the province of Manitoba. You find instances of it in Oak River, a rural constituency where the enumerators got in their work, and where I find that eighty-four names were left off that list. Some of those men had been residents for ten or twelve years, are large property owners and prosperous farmers, growing ten to twelve thousand bushels of wheat annually. This paper goes on to say:

Many of them, notwithstanding the fact that their names were on the old list, took the pains and trouble to see the registration clerk, and were told by him that their names were properly recorded, but, when the lists appeared, they found themselves disfranchised. A young man, who came up some few months ago on the harvesting expedition and stayed, has been duly registered. He owns no property, has never paid any taxes in Manitoba, is only here while a job is to be had, but he is a Grit, and that settles it.

And so, Sir, I might quote you, 'ad libitum,' cases that have been reported to me by our friends in Manitoba where Mr. Greenway's officers left names off the list, or cooked those lists, in order that they might succeed in getting their candidate elected. Now, Sir, the haste in calling the elections, and the ignoble way in which those lists were prepared, do not indicate that Mr. Greenway, and Mr. Sifton, and the other members of his government, felt safe or quite sure that the people of Manitoba were with them upon this school question or upon others.

Mr. McGREGOR. How about the acclamations ?

Mr. DALY. Now, Sir, I come to another feature of the case. We find that the Reform papers up there, as well as the Reform papers in the east, declare that our people were united upon this Manitoba school question, and that was the question at issue. I know it to be a fact, Sir, that in several constituencies the school question was not the issue, and I know, as a fact, that where it was the issue, the opponents of the Greenway government were elected. If you take Portage la Prairie, where an hon. gentleman who at one time occupied a seat in this House, no less a person than the present Minister of Public Works in Manitoba, the Hon. Robert Watson, was running against Mr. Cooper, mayor of Portage la Prairie. Mr. Cooper took a stand upon the school question identical with the stand taken by this Government, and we find that Mr. Watson was only elected by the narrow majority of eleven. And, Sir, you can take Lorne, take Woodlands, where Mr. O'Malley and Mr. Roblin, the leader of the Opposition were elected, you will find that the school question was discussed in those constituencies upon its merits, and Mr. Roblin was elected by a majority of 400. These facts indicate that wherever the question was properly threshed out and discussed, and the people knew what the true issue was before them, they gave their verdict accordingly. Now, what is the position that has been taken by our friends on the other side of the House, or rather by their press, and by Mr. Greenway and his party in Manitoba ? Their cry is, you must not coerce Manitoba. Hands off Manitoba. Well, Sir, it seems to me that in order to ascertain whether these men have a right to say that this Government is about to coerce Manitoba, or that any person desires to put hands upon Manitoba, we should have a thorough understanding of the question. Now it occurs to me that the school question is this : The highest court in the Empire has decided that the minority of Manitoba have been deprived of certain constitutional rights, and, this being the case, these rights should be restored, independent of any party or political considerations. Has this question been viewed from anything other than party or political considerations ? It seems to me it has not. I think I can prove to this House and to those who are listening to me that in the course of this trouble, from 1890 up to the present time, members, particularly those of the Liberal party, have been acting more from political motives than a desire to restore to the minority the rights that were said to be theirs by the judgment of the Privy Council. I take it that when the judgment came from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest court in the land, it was the bounden duty of the government of Manitoba, to accept that decision, to act magnanimously and restore those rights to the minority. For there is nothing in that judgment that impresses me for a single moment with the view that the schools should be restored as they existed prior to 1890 ; but, on the contrary, the judgment says that the grievance should be remedied by supplementary legislation, passed by the legislature of Manitoba, and if those men were desirous, as we find them now to be, judging by the expressions used by Mr. Sifton, for example, whose remarks were quoted by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) the other night, to do what was right by the minority, it was their duty a year ago to have passed supplementary legislation and remedied the grievance complained of by the minority, and not to have allowed the matter to have gone as far as it has gone. They should have acted before it became necessary for the minority to come here and appeal to the Privy Council of Canada under the law. What has been the position of the Dominion Government in this matter ? We find the Acts complained of were passed by the Manitoba legislature in 1890. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) insisted on disallowance. I give him credit for having taken the only consistent course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite on this question. He then insisted on the disallowance of the Acts, and I presume he insists on disallowance still. But we find that the hon. gentleman, in addition to the motion moved by him in this House, condemning the Government for not having disallowed those Acts, declared through the press and outside of this House that disallowance was the proper course which the Government have pursued. Now we find that hon. gentleman stating :

Had the Manitoba school question been settled four years ago, everybody would have been pleased. But the Ministers had not the courage to act.

The hon. gentleman also stated that he had read that the Government were going to send to the Manitoba government a communication containing the various judgments rendered by the courts. He added :

He had read that the Government were going to send to the Manitoba government a communication containing the various judgments rendered by the courts.

If the Government does that, the government of Manitoba will reply that they are a lot of impertinent people. I would do the same thing, were I in their place.

What has been the position of the Government so condemned in the past by the hon. member for L'Islet ? The Government did not disallow the Act ; on the contrary, the Government decided that this was a mixed question of fact and law and it should be determined by a legal decision, and they would not assume the responsibility. The first petition sent in by Archbishop Taché was in August, 1890, and upon that petition the Minister of Justice made a report on March 21, 1891, and in that report he recites the fact that the matter is now before the courts for adjudication. At that time, I think, the case had been argued in the Supreme Court and was awaiting judgment. The position the Government then took was the correct one, because if the Government had acted in accordance with the advice of the hon. member for L'Islet and disallowed the Act of the Manitoba legislature, the Manitoba government would have taken the position that they would have re-enacted it, and as often as it was disallowed it would have been re-enacted. What would have been the effect? We are even now charged with dangling the Manitoba school question before the eyes of the people for years. Would it not have been better that the question should be before the people all these years on a constitutional decision given by the courts rather than on the ipse dixit of the Dominion Government by disallowing the Act? It would have been wrong if the Government had disallowed the Act, as the people of Manitoba had stated they would have it re-enacted, and then the accusation would have been made against the Dominion Government that we had kept the question all these years before the public. The leader of the Opposition in his speech the other day quoted from a newspaper published in Manitoba to show that the Opposition in that province had changed their position, and that they were now charging the Greenway government with insincerity. The position of the Conservative party in Manitoba, or rather the Conservative Opposition in the local House, was very well defined at the sitting of that House in June, 1895. At that time—you may recollect, Mr. Speaker, the local House had reassembled—upon the reading of the resolution containing the reply to the remedial order, an amendment was moved by Mr. O'Malley, then leader of the Opposition. It was a very long resolution, and I am not going to read the whole of it, but what I will read will indicate to this House and the people of the country the feeling of the Opposition in the local House of Manitoba on this question, and after I have read it the House will come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution and supported it took proper ground upon this question, and if the local government had seen fit to act in accordance with its terms we should not have had the question before us to discuss to-day. After reciting the clauses of the judgment, the resolution goes on to say:

Holding the views thus indicated, and reaffirming our decision that we cannot accept the responsibility of re-enacting the provisions of the old law, we have to consider what provisions in the way of supplementing or modifying the existing law could be adopted that will, while securing the efficiency of our system of education in all schools and requiring all sections of the community to bear their full share of the burden of maintaining it, give reasonable relief to the minority.

In endeavouring to arrive at a solution of this question, we would respectfully submit that, inasmuch as the remedial order in itself, as we ventured to point out, is wide enough in terms to justify the minority in seeking practically a restoration of the old system as regards separate schools, it would be futile to pass a measure of relief unless the minority were prepared to accept it. It will be apparent to you that the minority might still apply to Parliament for the large measure of relief. We, therefore, submit that it is desirable that any action to be taken should be with the approval of Your Excellency in Council, as well as of the Catholic minority.

In this view of the matter, we venture to suggest that the system of education that prevails in Ontario may be looked to as furnishing to some degree, a basis for a system that might be adopted here. The provisions of that system in regard to the schools of the Roman Catholic minority are, of course, well known to you, but we may be allowed to indicate certain reasons why in our judgment, they may be taken as effecting a solution of the question here. It is well known that the system in that province has given general satisfaction, both to the Catholic minority and to the Protestant majority. As evidence of this, we would quote the language of the Hon. David Mills in the Commons in 1892, when discussing the Ontario system in connection with the establishment of a system of education in the North-west Territories.

Mr. Mills said at that time—and then they quote what the hon. member for Bothwell said.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What are you reading from?

Mr. DALY. I am reading a report of the proceedings of the local assembly in June, 1895, as reported in the "Nor-Wester." It says:

We also quote the following from the Toronto "Globe":—

"We advocate the Ontario system," says the "Globe," not because it is fixed by the constitution, but because we consider it to be a good system, embodying a satisfactory settlement of a vexed question. If this province were making a fresh start to-day, absolutely untrammelled by constitutional restrictions, we do not know that it could do better than to continue that arrangement without material change. We think the public schools are satisfactory, not only to the Protestant majority, but to every large body of Catholics who prefer that system of education."

The resolution goes on:

In submitting this view for the consideration of Your Excellency in Council, we beg to express our earnest desire to bring about a satisfactory settlement of the difficulty, and beg to assure you that we are prepared to make an earnest effort to bring about this settlement by supplementary provisions to the School Act of 1890, which will remove the grievance upon which said appeal was founded, and will modify the law so far, and so far only, as may be necessary to give effect to these provisions. Such legislation should provide for an equal standard of education in all schools and of taxation of all property of Protestants and Roman Catholics, so as to ensure taxation of all properties within each school district for the support of the school of that district, and, generally, to secure the efficiency of the school system of the province.

Now, Sir, I commend to this House and to every member of it, as to whether the position taken by the Opposition was not the true position, and as to whether it does not stand out in bold relief as against the position taken by the government of that province. We find that even before the appeal had come before the Privy Council and was discussed there, and as soon as it was known to the people of Canada that the decision of the Judicial Committee had been given, certain members of the local government had been interviewed and had given their views upon the subject. But, before I come to that, I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that during that same sitting of the legislature, Mr. Fisher, one of the members of that House also introduced a resolution. I will not weary the House by reading any more than the fifth and concluding clause of that resolution.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What year was that?

Mr. DALY. February, 1895; last year. This resolution I may say was moved by Mr. Fisher prior to the remedial order, and prior to the legislature having received that remedial order, and prior to its having adjourned, as you will remember it did.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) After the Privy Council judgment?

Mr. DALY. After the Privy Council judgment was known, but before the Privy Council of Canada had heard the appeal and before the remedial order had been made. Mr. Fisher's resolution concludes as follows:—

And, having regard to the suggestions of the tribunal referred to, that "all legitimate" ground of complaint would be removed if the present system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievances upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to those provisions, without a repeal of the present law, this House is ready to consider the grievances referred to, with a view to providing reasonable relief, while maintaining, as far as possible consistent with that object, the principles of the present Act in their general application.

Now, Sir, was that resolution agreed to by Mr. Greenway or his followers? Not at all. At that time apparently Mr. Greenway and Mr. Sifton had made up their minds that they would not recede one iota from their position on this question. They were not going to regard the judgment of the Privy Council in any degree whatever, and not only were they content with saying that, but Mr. Sifton moved an amendment to the motion of Mr. Fisher which reads as follows:—

That all the words after the word "While," in the original motion, be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:—"this House loyally submits itself to the provisions of the constitution, as interpreted by the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, it is hereby resolved that the exercise of appellate jurisdiction by the Governor General in Council in such a way as to lead hereafter to the alteration of the principles upon which the public school system of Manitoba is founded, will be viewed with grave apprehension. That an interference by the federal authority with the educational policy of the province is contrary to the recognized principles of provincial autonomy. That this House will, by all constitutional means, and to the utmost extent of its power, resist any steps which may be taken to attack the school system established by the Public Schools Act of 1890, which is believed to be conceived and administered in the highest and best interests of the whole population of Manitoba.

This, Mr. Speaker, was before the Privy Council of Canada had even heard the appeal and after the Judicial Committee had given their decision. Now, Sir, I think these gentlemen assumed a tremendous responsibility when they committed themselves and their followers to the doctrine laid down here, namely: that although they were aware of the judgment of the Privy Council, and that that judgment did not ask them to restore the schools of the minority as they existed prior to 1890, and before even the appeal had been heard by the Privy Council of Canada, and before the remedial order had been made; these gentlemen came to the conclusion that they have grave apprehension of this matter being heard by the Governor General in Council. It seems to me, Sir, that if they were as desirous as they have since expressed of relieving the minority of the grievances complained of, these gentlemen instead of taking that ground, would have taken the higher ground laid down by Mr. Fisher in the resolution of which I have read a portion. But they bade defiance, not only to the judgment of the highest court of the realm, but they bade defiance to the law as interpreted by that Judicial Committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What date was that resolution?

Mr. DALY. February 27th, 1895.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was Fisher's resolution put to the House?

Mr. DALY. Fisher's resolution was put to the House and defeated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What was the division—have you got it there?

Mr. DALY. Yes, I think I have.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Or was Mr. Sifton's resolution put to the House?

Mr. DALY. If I recollect there was Mr. Fisher's motion, and then the amendment by Mr. Pendergast to the effect that the schools should be restored as they were prior to 1890, and then the amendment of Mr. Sifton which I have read.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then the amendment from Mr. Sifton was an amendment to Mr. Pendergast's resolution that the schools should be restored.

Mr. DALY. No. Mr. Sifton moved "that all the words after 'while' in the original motion be left out."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was that an amendment to Mr. Fisher's motion or to Mr. Pendergast's motion?

Mr. DALY. To Mr. Fisher's.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I thought you stated just now it was to Mr. Pendergast's?

Mr. DALY. No; what I said was that Mr. Fisher's motion was first. Mr. Pendergast moved an amendment, and this is an amendment to the original motion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) An amendment to the amendment?

Mr. DALY. No; it reads: "That all the words after 'while' in the original motion be struck out."

Mr. LAURIER. What is the vote?

Mr. DALY. The vote stood 22 to 10, the usual opposition. The nays were: Fisher, Frame, Lyons, Pare, Hartney, Martin, O'Malley, Jerome, Armstrong, McFadden, and I think the majority of the English-speaking men who appear there have been returned at the late election. That was the position taken by the provincial government prior to their hearing before the Privy Council and prior to the remedial order. Sir, we find that the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) quoted the other night from the "Tribune" newspaper to show what the disposition of Mr. Greenway and his followers is in Manitoba to-day. He tried to show that Mr. Greenway and Mr. Sifton, the gentlemen who refused to receive the proposition of Mr. Fisher as indicated in the resolution I have read, now assume a different position towards the minority in Manitoba. The member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) prefaced the quotation from the Winnipeg "Tribune" by telling this House that it was not an organ. Of course that would bring a smile to the face of any one who knows anything about Manitoba politics, because if there is an organ in this country which belongs to any government, it is the Winnipeg "Tribune," which belongs body and soul to the Hon. Mr. Greenway. Here is what the "Tribune" says, defending the present ideas of Mr. Greenway and Mr. Sifton, according to the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg the other night:

All friends of interprovincial harmony will still hope that some gleam of statesmanlike sense will now influence the actions of the Dominion Cabinet. It is not to be understood from the present attitude of Manitoba that the majority of her people have any hatred of Roman Catholics, or that, having them down, their wish is to keep them down. There is a good deal of misunderstanding on this point, and a good deal of nonsense has been talked. The real intention of Manitoba has no foundation in ill-will to any part of her population, but these intentions have so far had no opportunity to be manifested. The province has practically been on her defence for the last five years, and until the struggle to maintain what she deems her rights is ended, a dispassionate consideration of the grievances of the minority can hardly be expected. When, however, the threat of coercion is removed, as ultimately it must be, the sense of justice of Manitobans will be found as active as it is in any part of the Dominion, and a readiness will be shown to remove all just cause of complaint against our school laws.

That is a complete change of position on the part of the Winnipeg "Tribune," and on the part of Mr. Greenway and his followers: because we find that this same Winnipeg "Tribune" on the 27th March, 1895, published a long article in a contrary strain. When I read some extracts from that article, hon. gentlemen can compare them with what I have just now read as quoted by the hon. member for Winnipeg, and judge whether the people of Manitoba have any desire (according to the "Tribune"), to put the Roman Catholics down and keep them down. Here is what the Winnipeg "Tribune" of the 27th March said:

The remedial order has been read in the legislature. We are asked to restore the school system that was in operation previous to 1890. Let Quebec and Ottawa rest assured that the restoration will never be made. Manitoba has too keen a sense of justice, too much regard for truth and equity, to recognize as a religious aristocracy an element of its population by no means the most worthy. As a civilized people attempting to realize in a measure the ideals of the nineteenth century, Manitoba will not silently submit to the preposterous demand that they should turn back the wheels of progress three hundred years. They will stubbornly refuse to supplant modern civilization by mediaevalism. This whole question is not a quarrel between Manitoba and the Dominion; it is not even a quarrel between races and creeds; it is a struggle as to whether the ideals of the nineteenth century or the ideals of the dark ages shall prevail.

Why does not the Roman Catholic Church out with the truth at once? Why not advance the real reason for discontent? Rome is not in accord with the spirit of the age. It is wedded to a dead past. Mediaevalism cannot, or will not, coalesce with modern thought. In place of the Act of 1890 what substitute is offered? We are asked to set creed against creed, and race against race, to break up the unity that should exist, to mutually support each other in wrong-doing, to make the state the teacher of religious truth, for, when Romanists and non-Romanists combine their wealth, and then draw from the joint fund, it is clear as day that each is a partner in the work of the other. How can any Romanist, believing the Protestant schools are teaching errors, conscientiously support them, and how can any Protestant, believing that the religious teaching of the Catholic Church is false, agree that a portion of his taxes should be devoted towards the support of such teaching? No. Any one who has the least sense of justice, any one who is patriotic even in the slightest degree, any one who believes that all citizens are equal in the sight of the law, and that what is good enough for one is good enough for all, must stand by the Act of 1890. And this is our answer to Quebec. We shall not allow the state to support religion; we shall not allow the church to control the state; we shall not return to the civilization of the dark ages; we shall not recognize Rome as better or in any way different from others; we shall hold to the principle of equal rights for all, and that principle shall be dearer to us than confederation itself.

This same paper, the Winnipeg "Tribune," said of the hon. leader of the Opposition:

He stands upon the broad principle of provincial rights.

—and that—

He does not believe in separate schools; he is too advanced a Liberal and a thinker to endorse them.

And this is the paper, the organ of the Greenway government, quoted by the hon. member for Winnipeg. I ask hon. gentlemen who have listened to these quotations, whether these people have been sincere in this matter, from the time of the judgment of the Privy Council was rendered up to the present moment. Now, we find that a change has not only come over the dream of the "Tribune," but a change has come over the dream of Mr. Sifton, the Attorney General. Here is what Mr. Sifton said in a speech during the recent campaign:

We are prepared to consider any changes in method that will make it acceptable to the Roman Catholics. We will do anything in reason, anything that will not compromise principle.

Again, he said:

Anything in reason, if we can settle this matter without compromising principle, then we will do it, but not otherwise. If there is any change that can be made in the religious exercises that will make them acceptable to all parties, if any change can be made in the time they are held, or other like changes, we are prepared to consider them.

The Brandon "Sun," a Liberal organ, also says:

Let it be shown that the Manitoba School Act attacks the conscientious convictions of Catholics, and we will join in demanding its amendment or correction.

These people sing a different tune now from what they did in the days when they were talking in the strain of that quotation from the "Tribune," from which I have read. But, Sir, we find that this statement of Mr. Sifton is made in the face of a declaration made by his leader in his address to the electors of the electoral division of Mountain. In that address Mr. Greenway declared:

Mr. DALY.

A similar statement was made about the same time in the Senate by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the Premier of the Dominion. From the utterances of the members of the Dominion Cabinet, and from the facts known to all who have watched the controversy, it is clear that nothing short of a separate denominational system of schools will be accepted as an adequate measure of relief.

To the communication forwarded in pursuance of the above announcements by the Dominion Government of the 27th of July last, inviting the Manitoba government to take such action as would remedy the alleged grievances of the minority, we have replied, definitely and positively rejecting the proposal to re-establish separate schools in any form, and expressing the intention to uphold the present uniform, non-sectarian system. As the federal parliament is about to be asked to legislate upon this subject, it is of the utmost importance that the views of the electors of the province should be clearly and unmistakably expressed.

Thus, we find, from the statement of Mr. Greenway, that there was a determination on the part of his government not to re-establish separate schools in any form, and to uphold the present uniform non-sectarian system. It seems to me that that is not in accord with the spirit of the declaration made by Mr. Sifton and that made by the "Tribune," but is, on the contrary, on a par with the position taken by Mr. Greenway, Mr. Sifton, and the other members of his government from the beginning. Now, I want to quote to members of this House, not the statements of the leader of the Opposition, not the statements of politicians or of the Roman Catholic hierarchy; but I want to go outside of this House and take the views of men and newspapers who view the question from an independent standpoint. I take it that it was the duty of the local legislature to be guided and influenced by the government at its head, and if that government had guided and influenced that legislature in the way that all right-minded people thought it should have done, we would not to-day be called upon to consider the question of remedial legislation. Before any action was taken by the Dominion Government on this question, a local independent paper called the "North-west Baptist," gave utterance to the following sentiments:

The Privy Council, without determining what rights of the Roman Catholics have been invaded, clearly indicates that there is a case for intervention on the part of the Dominion. Let Manitoba recognize this decision. We are a part of the Empire. We cannot antagonize Great Britain or even the Dominion, when the Dominion's authority in such a matter is established by the highest court in Great Britain. There ought to be a readiness on the part of Manitoba—we mean the provincial government—to be a party in discovering where our legislation has wronged our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, and, upon discovering, willingly make every endeavour to do them justice.

But have the Manitoba government ever sought by their actions to discover where this legislation is wrong to the minority?

Not in the slightest degree. On the contrary, they took the firm stand from the beginning that they were determined not to alter their course, come what might. In addition to that independent opinion I will quote from a very able article in the Toronto "Globe" on the 4th March, 1895. This is what the "Globe" says

Our conclusion, then, is, that the question will be best decided, not by the Government or the Parliament or the people of the Dominion, but by the people of Manitoba, in the light of justice and of the best interests of the province. In the endeavour to arrive at a wise and just decision, we believe that they can derive material aid from the judgments of the Privy Council, not, we repeat, as infallible oracles, but as the honest efforts of able men to settle a question of right and wrong. We deprecate outside interference in confidence that the majority of the people of Manitoba will be just, will regard so their very strength as an obligation to be scrupulously just, will be generous rather than be in peril of falling short of complete justice; and in confidence that they understand the conditions and requirements of their young and growing community better than we outsiders can possibly do.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you agree with that?

Mr. DALY. I agree with every word of that. I say that none could better understand the position, of the minority or what is required to remedy their grievances than could the legislature of Manitoba, and if the legislature of Manitoba had been guided by the Government to conduct this matter on the lines indicated by the "Globe" and laid down by the North-west Baptists, the question would have been decided months, even years ago, and would not have been thrown into the political arena for the purpose of exciting political passion and securing party advantage. I will show further, by other quotations which I am about to make, that from the moment the judgment of the Privy Council was given, Mr. Greenway and his Ministers decided not to recede from the position they had taken. Our hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, also made an effort to get these gentlemen to come to a proper sense of their duty. He said at Morrisburg:

I would approach this man Greenway with the sunny ways of patriotism, asking him to be just and to be fair, asking him to be generous to the minority, in order that we may have peace amongst all the creeds and races which it has pleased God to bring upon this corner of our common country. Do you not believe there is more to be gained by appealing to the hearts and souls of men, rather than by trying to compel them to do a thing?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DALY. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear." Did Mr. Greenway—the gentleman whom our hon. friend asked us to approach in the sunny ways of peace—did Mr. Sifton or Mr. Cameron, or any member of the Manitoba government, show any disposition to respond to an appeal of that kind, in the amendment which they moved and carried to the resolution of Mr. Fisher that I read a short time ago. No, Mr. Speaker, they did not. Approach these gentlemen in the sunny ways of peace—whom are we to approach? Men who gave a decided opinion on this subject before they were ever called upon to give one? There can be no question as to their desire to show how obstinate they clung to the position they had taken. On the 30th January, 1895, both Messrs, McMillan and Sifton were in Toronto, when the substance of the judgment had been given in the press, and these gentlemen were interviewed. Here is what these gentlemen said, whom we are asked to approach in "the sunny ways of patriotism." The Provincial Secretary, Mr. McMillan, said:

The decision is not unexpected. Our counsel advised us that the remarks of their lordships during the argument indicated that the appeal would be allowed. The decision does not affect us in the least. The people of Manitoba know what kind of school system they want, and any attempt on behalf of the Dominion to override their wishes in the matter of remedial legislation would be so much time thrown away.

There is a declaration before these gentlemen were ever called upon by this Government for an opinion, even before we had received the full text of the judgment of the Privy Council. Mr. McMillan declared that any action upon our part would be simply thrown away. Mr. Sifton, the Attorney General of Manitoba, said:

The decision makes no difference to us. We have established a common school system for all, and we will maintain it. The Manitoba government was bound to have one efficient school system for all, and would treat all alike, and cared little whether the Dominion passed remedial legislation or not, as they had taken their stand, and it was a constitutional one, and they were perfectly satisfied.

These are the gentlemen we are invited to approach on the "sunny ways of patriotism." The effort would be as futile as the attempt to extract sunbeams from a cucumber. Mr. Sifton was again interviewed in January, 1895. He said:

"If such right of appeal be granted by the decision of the Privy Council, then, practically, the immediate effect of the decision will be that the Dominion Government has legal power to restore the educational privileges which the Catholics of Manitoba enjoy under the provisions of the former School Act."

"And how will the provincial government take that?"

"The provincial government will not take it at all."

"There will be a deadlock, then, between the Dominion and provincial governments, if the former decides to interfere with our existing school Act?"

"If they undertake to interfere with the legislation in any way, shape or form, there will be a deadlock, certainly. The province will resent any interference with provincial rights."

"What form will the resenting of such interference probably take?"

"Can't tell. We don't know yet that there will be any interference. I don't think the Dominion Government will trouble us. It is a difficult nut for them to crack, but I do not think they will undertake to make any change in our provincial laws. Practically, this is on similar lines to the old system of disallowance. We said that we had a right then to build railways with our own money on our own land, without the consent of people who dwelt in the other provinces. It was a purely local matter, and I consider that the question of religious education is equally a local matter, and that the people of Manitoba know what kind of schools they want, and will see to it that they get them."

Such expressions of opinion coming from these gentlemen indicate clearly that they were determined from the outset not to budge in the slightest degree from the position they had taken, notwithstanding the decision of the Privy Council.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman giving the dates of these respective quotations?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It might be desirable to have them.

Mr. DALY. I am very desirous they should get on "Hansard," and I have given you the dates. The "Empire" correspondent in Winnipeg called on Mr. Greenway who was ill, on the 29th of January, 1895, and Mr. Greenway sent out this message:

I don't believe the Dominion Government will dare to interfere with Manitoba school law. If it does, there certainly will be trouble. The Manitoba government will strenuously resist any interference. We shall stand by our school law.

That statement was given out when the telegram came announcing that the Judicial Committee had decided in favour of the minority. Mr. J. D. Cameron, at the same time, who was also notified of the decision and who is the Provincial Secretary, replied:

The attitude of the government is pretty well known, and will not be modified. Any interference on the part of the Dominion Government will be resisted to the utmost within constitutional limits. The decision is to be regretted, because it reopens the question which it was generally supposed was finally settled. In any event, the decision is nothing more than a hollow victory for the appellants.

In this way Mr. Cameron and Mr. Sifton and Mr. Greenway spoke of the decision of the highest court of the realm. Why, it seems to me that any person reading that decision can come to no other conclusion than that his lordship who gave the decision and their lordships who concurred in it never supposed, for one moment, that they were dealing with men who would declare themselves on the lines taken by Messrs. Sifton and Greenway. Their lordships supposed that when they laid down certain rules and lines, these men would act in accordance with the judgment of the court. They did not suppose that the matter would ever come to appeal under section 22 of the Manitoba Act. They did not suppose that these men, as soon as they were in receipt of the judgment, would move the amendments they did in the local House, would not express themselves as they did, but on the contrary would have passed the legislation supplementary to the legislation of 1890 that would remove the grievances of these people. But we find that not only were these the statements made by members of the government, but they actually put words of defiance into the mouth of the Lieutenant-Governor. We find in the Speech that was read from the Throne by the Lieutenant-Governor, before the appeal came on before the Privy Council, these words:

Whether or not the demand will be made by the federal government that the Act shall be modified, it is not the intention of my government in any way to recede from our determination to uphold the present system.

Now, what did this Government do when this matter was brought before it? We have been told that we intend to "coerce Manitoba." We have been told that we intended to "take Manitoba by the throat." We have been told that our remedial order was couched in drastic terms. But we fail to find that in the discussions in the local House or in the press these gentlemen have seen fit to refer to the Order in Council accompanying the remedial order, nor have they seen fit at any time to refer to the memorandum sent by this Government in 1895 to the local government. I think that, if we read this thing dispassionately with the desire to be fair, we shall come to the conclusion that this Government had no desire to coerce Manitoba, but simply desired to carry out the law as it appears in the statute-book and interpreted by the highest court in the land. What the Government said in this Order in Council of 19th March, 1895, was as follows:—

And the committee also recommends that Your Excellency in Council do further declare and decide that for the due execution of the provisions of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act," it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid should be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which would restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which would modify the said Acts of 1890 so far, and so far only, as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) hereinbefore mentioned.

And later on in this same Order in Council we find the following:—

In the opinion of the committee, "The Manitoba Act," as construed with regard to the present case by the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, so clearly points to a duty devolving upon Your Excellency in Council that no course is open, consistent with both the letter and the spirit of the constitution, other than that recommended. To dismiss this appeal would be not only to deny to the Roman Catholic minority rights substantially guaranteed to them under the constitution of Canada, but, in truth, such a course might involve the declaration on the part of Your Excellency in Council that this provision of the constitution for the protection of the rights of certain of Her Majesty's subjects in Manitoba should not in any case be acted upon; and further, the committee do not perceive upon what principle, consistently with a declaration that effect is not to be given to this appeal, the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority in Quebec or Ontario could invoke the corresponding provision of section 93 of "The British North America Act," in case of any provincial Act or decision affecting their rights or privileges.

If Your Excellency should see fit to approve of the foregoing recommendation, the committee desire to state that it follows that refusal or neglect on the part of the legislature of Manitoba to enact remedial legislation which to Your Excellency in Council seems requisite, will confer upon Parliament authority to enact such a law. In this connection, it was urged by counsel on behalf of the province, that, should Parliament legislate under these circumstances, its enactment would be absolute and irrevocable so far as both Parliament and the provincial legislature are concerned.

The committee, without necessarily adopting this view, observe that section 22 of "The Manitoba Act" may admit of that construction. The committee, therefore, recommend that the provincial legislature be requested to consider whether its action upon the decision of Your Excellency in Council should be permitted to be such as, while refusing to redress a grievance which the highest court in the Empire has declared to exist, may compel Parliament to give the relief of which, under the constitution, the provincial legislature is the proper and primary source, thereby, according to this view, permanently divesting itself in a very large measure of its authority, and so establishing in the province an educational system which, no matter what changes may take place in the circumstances of the country or the views of the people, cannot be altered or repealed by any legislative body in Canada.

These are the important portions of that Order in Council. They showed upon the face of them what the duty of the Manitoba legislature was. But, with the full responsibility resting upon that legislature, these men refused to entertain the order in the slightest degree. If you look at former portions of it you will find quotations from the judgment, of which I have given a summary, and one of which I may now give in full:

It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

Now, Sir, reading that, as they must have done, any one in the legislature who was desirous of doing what was right, who was desirous of settling the question could say to himself: The highest court in the land has decided that these people have a grievance. We have appeared before the Privy Council of Canada, and have argued our case, and the Privy Council has decided that they are obliged to require us to carry out the conditions of that judgment. Although these were not our views, and although we have combatted them up to this time and have taken our present position, yet, as Canadians, in the interest of peace and good government, with the desire to carry out what we are directed to do by the highest court in the land, we will sacrifice any ideas of our own that we had upon this question, we will sink self interest in this matter and we will advise our friends in the local legislature to adopt the lines of the judgment and, by legislation supplementary to that of 1890, we will remove the grievances of these people. But we find that in the discussion that has taken place on public platforms and in the press a great deal has been made of the alleged inefficiency of the Roman Catholic schools prior to 1890. That is the ground taken by the local government. They say it would be wrong to the people themselves to restore these schools as they existed. Now, if the local government had ascertained in 1890 that these schools were inefficient, it was their duty to make them efficient, and if they had not sufficient power to do so they could have got the power from the legislature. But do I find that in the discussion that took place on the introduction of the Bill by the present member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) in March, 1890, the question of efficiency was mentioned? I have read the reported account of the speeches of the hon. gentlemen who introduced the Bill, the Hon. Mr. Smart and the Hon. Mr. Sifton, and I find no reference whatever to the inefficiency of the schools. On the contrary I find this in the speech of the present hon. member for Winnipeg, who introduced the Bill, as reported in the "Free Press" on March 5th, 1890:

The Government's action had not been determined because they were dissatisfied with the manner in which the affairs of the department are conducted under the system, but because they were dissatisfied with the system itself.

It was the system they wanted to get rid of and not its inefficiency, and we do not need to go further than the same debate to find a further explanation, and I commend this to the attention of the leader of the Opposition and that of his friend the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Martin said:

"It is proposed to imitate the example of New Brunswick and do away with the monstrous evil of separate schools." He anticipated that, if they once dealt with this evil, they would not be called upon to deal with it again. They would be able to say to the people of all nationalities: If you want a home where religious liberty is fully recognized, come to Manitoba.

So, it was to wipe out the monstrous evil of separate schools, it was because they were dissatisfied with the system itself that the Acts of 1890 were introduced and passed, and not because these schools were inefficient. But, Sir, we find that the leader of the Opposition had also given his views upon this question. But before I come to that I may say that we are aware of the fact that the member for Winnipeg who sought to do away with this monstrous evil of separate schools, coolly and quietly declared to the people of the country, with the Acts of 1890, which he passed to wipe out this monstrous evil, standing on the statute-book from 1890 to 1894, when he wrote his celebrated letter, that the action the Government committed at that time inflicted rank tyranny upon the minority against whom those Acts were directed. This, Sir, is the hon. gentleman with whom the leader of the Opposition delights to consort, this is the gentleman to whom the leader of the Opposition, no doubt, looks for his chief support from the province of Manitoba. I ask him to define his position upon this question of separate schools, as from his utterances on this question it is not easy to know where he stands. Does he look upon separate schools as a monstrous evil? I do not think so, because we find the hon. gentleman has made several statements on this question, and we know that he does not look upon separate schools as a monstrous evil. Now, Sir, we find that the leader of the Opposition, in 1893, I think it was, spoke as follows in the House of Commons:

If the statement is founded on fact which is made by His Grace Archbishop Taché, and which is repeated in all the petitions coming from the Roman Catholics of Manitoba, that under the guise of public schools, Protestant schools are being continued, and that Roman Catholic children are forced under that law to attend what in reality are Protestant schools, I say that the strongest case has been made for interference by this Government.

Now, we have not ascertained since whether the hon. gentleman has made it his business to find out whether these schools are Protestant or Catholic, or whether the strongest case has been made out for interference by the Government. We do not know exactly what the hon. gentleman's conclusions are in that matter. We find, however, that the hon. gentleman visited the city of Winnipeg, and there met a large number of his co-religionists; he met a great number of people who were interested on behalf of the minority. He was interviewed by these gentlemen, and he got certain light from them, he got certain knowledge from them, but whether the facts or the knowledge that he got from them have changed his position, I have failed so far to learn.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DALY. Just previously to your leaving the Chair, Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock, I had quoted from a speech made by the leader of the Opposition in this House in 1893, in which he declared in terms that after reading the petition of His Grace Archbishop Taché, he had come to the conclusion that the schools that had been inflicted upon the minority in Manitoba, were Protestant schools, and if that was the case, he would use his best endeavours to have the wrong remedied. Now, Sir, we find that in September, 1894, the hon. leader of the Opposition visited the province of Manitoba, but we have not yet ascertained whether during that visit, although he was waited upon by a deputation of his co-religionists, he received any additional light or any additional facts in relation to this question. Sir, hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House have complained that the leader of the Opposition has been very indefinite in all his public utterances on this question ever since its inception; and I must say, without at all desiring to reflect upon that hon. gentleman, that I have read a great many of his speeches, a great many of his utterances on this question, and I have failed up to the present time to ascertain where the hon. gentleman stands. But, Sir, it will not be long, it will not be many days, before we will have an opportunity of placing that hon. gentleman where he will have to say what his true position is on this matter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many days?

Mr. DALY. I would not like to anticipate the hon. gentleman's pleasure, but it won't be many days. Well, Sir, we find that at the first appearance of the leader of the Opposition in Winnipeg, he made a speech upon this Manitoba school question, and I think, after reading his speech, from which I will quote, that the House will come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman's statements on that occasion were as indefinite and void of meaning as they have been on other occasions. He said there:

And as soon as I came here a letter was handed to me asking me to express my views upon the Manitoba school question. Sir, I do not need to be reminded of that subject. (Applause.) I would not be worthy of the name of man if I were not able to speak my own mind to my countrymen. Whether I speak in the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec, or the province of Manitoba, I am a Canadian. (Loud applause.) I believe in the principles of the Liberal party, and by these principles I will abide. In Winnipeg I will speak upon that question also ; but, Sir, can we say as much of the Canadian Government which is at Ottawa to-day ? The legislature of Manitoba passed an Act in 1890, the Catholic minority refused to abide by that Act, and they appealed to the Government at Ottawa. What answer to that appeal have they received since 1891 ? The Government at Ottawa dilly-dallied with that question, they gave promises on every side, but except these they never gave anything to anybody. Well, Sir, I believe it is the duty of every man to express his opinion as a man upon these subjects. In a country like our own, where there are men of different religions, it is impossible to speak language which would please everybody. It is impossible, if you speak your honest mind, the honest opinion of your heart, to please everybody, but I believe it is possible to use language which will appeal to the honest opinion of every man. Instead of appealing to passions and prejudice, you must appeal to those great principles of liberty which have made the Liberal party the party of reform, of progress and freedom. It is upon this principle that I stand. (Cheers.) I am a firm believer in provincial rights. (Renewed cheers.) In the Dominion House of Commons I have stood up for the authority of the provinces. When I took up the petition of my fellow-religionists of Manitoba, complaining of the legislation of the Government of Manitoba, I asked myself. What is the complaint ? I took the petition of the late Archbishop Taché, a man who, I believe, was revered in this province by friend or foe. I took up the petition of the Archbishop and those who signed it with him, and the complaint which was made was that the Government of Manitoba—I speak here in the presence of the members of the Government—had adopted legislation which, instead of imposing public schools upon the minority, imposed upon them Protestant schools, and that they were bound to send their children to Protestant schools. On the other hand, the Government of Manitoba denied the statement in toto. They did not admit that the legislation had that effect. They did not admit that the legislation was to have the effect of sending Roman Catholic children to Protestant schools. I said to the Government : Here is a simple question of fact. You have to determine whether the statements are true or not ; but instead of doing that, they went on appealing to the courts and evading the question. I did more. I said then—I say it here now—if the complaint of the Catholics were true, that Catholic children had been forced to attend Protestant schools, if that were true it would be such an outrage upon the rights of conscience that no community would permit it. I said upon the floor of the House of Commons : Prove to me that the complaint of the Roman Catholic minority is true, that their rights are outraged to this extent, that, instead of sending their children to schools where there is no religious teaching, they are forced to send their children to schools where there is religious teaching, and I will be prepared to go before the people of Manitoba and tell them that such legislation should not stand. I have nothing else to say in Winnipeg that I have not said on the floor of Parliament, in Quebec and elsewhere.

Now, I ask any hon. gentleman who understands the English language, to take that extract I have read from the speech of the leader of the Opposition in Winnipeg, and to take out of it one single definite statement, one idea that could convey to the ordinary mind what that hon. gentleman's position was upon the school question. He surrounds the statements he makes in this House with so much verbiage that it is impossible for any one to obtain the slightest communication as to what position the hon. gentleman occupies. On the occasion in question, he was waited upon by a deputation of co-religionists, and, according to the report published in the "North-western Review," September 12, 1894, the following occurred :—

Mr. Powell then handed the written statement just read to the Hon. Mr. Laurier, who, resuming his seat, asked if any of the members present were desirous of supplementing by their remarks any of the facts alleged.

Mr. J. J. Golden at once arose and said that there might be a possibility of Mr. Laurier's being misinformed on this question. He said that Mr. Laurier might be led to believe that the schools are Protestant only where the majority are Protestants, and, as for instance in St. Boniface, that the schools could be favourable to Catholics. Mr. Golden went on to show that even in constituencies where Catholics were in a majority the schools were bound by the same rules and regulations as the schools of Winnipeg, the same text books were used, &c. Mr. Golden dwelt at length upon many other features of the School Act.

Mr. Laurier then said : " Many of those things on this topic are new to me. Don't you think you ought to lay your complaint before the present Government, and not before me ? "

Mr. Golden.—" We don't think so. "

Mr. Laurier.—" You honour me much. "

Mr. Golden.—" You, as leader of the Opposition, hold the key to this matter. "

Finally, after a brief discussion, Mr. Laurier said : " That is bringing me to where I will not follow you. This would be carrying us into politics, which I want to avoid. Your policy is to acquaint the Government of your state of the case. This I would advise you. I have but one policy ; it is the same in Manitoba as in Quebec, and I have expressed myself openly upon it. Your case is as strong a one as can be given. This is my only answer. "

The hon. gentleman stated that he had one policy in Quebec and the same policy in Manitoba. I have been trying to ascertain what that policy is ; other hon. members to whom I have applied have been trying to find out, but they have not found out yet. We cannot ascertain his policy in any statement made by the hon. gentleman. He makes general statements ; but when he came face to face with gentlemen who could give him the facts, he said, " This would be carrying us into politics, which I want to avoid. " The report continues :

Mr. N. Bawlf next addressed the Liberal leader and said that, when this present School Act went into force, the Catholic schools were wiped out, both the Catholic and Protestant schools ; Catholics should have got a proportionate representation on the board.

" When our schools were wiped out, " Mr. Bawlf said, " we had no debts whatever, and yet we were turned over to the Protestant school board and forced to share in their debt, amounting to $200,000. In order to break the camel's back, they have passed an Act whereby our very schools are taxed. And we are compelled to keep up the collegiate institute. If the law is what they say, if the state of their schools is such as they would lead us to believe, why do they insist on having a collegiate institute?"

Mr. Laurier.—"These are new facts to me upon this question. Were I in power, and you were to present me with such grievances as those, in my official capacity, I would ask an answer from the Manitoba Government. There are two sides to every question. You have stated your side. At present I am not in power, and have no authority to deal with your grievances. The only thing I can do is to give the facts as I know them to be, whenever an opportunity should arise. At present I am powerless to alter an iota."

Mr. T. D. Deegan.—"In the event of the present Government showing any inclination to deal favourably with us on this question, would Mr. Laurier aid the Government in that alternative?"

Mr. Laurier.—"If, after investigating the facts, I have found them to be as stated, I would act as I said yesterday. On all occasions I would be glad to impart the knowledge which I possess on this question. It is a question of facts, not one of law."

The hon. gentleman remained some days in Winnipeg, and had the opportunity to ascertain the facts. Has the hon. gentleman made a statement on any platform, or told the people anywhere that he has investigated the facts, or is in a better position to give more definite opinion on the question than he has given in the past? I trow not. We find in the present debate, the hon. gentleman has made utterances which are equally indefinite, and show that he is as much at sea on this question now as he was when he delivered addresses in Winnipeg in September, 1894. The hon. gentleman said the other night:

There is but one way to approach this question: we must approach it in the very terms of the Act itself, and apply the remedy in every case as the circumstances of the case shall warrant and justify. That is the position I have taken all along. This question came twice before this House for discussion—once in 1893 and once in 1895. I maintained the same position on those occasions.

The hon. gentleman is correct; he maintained the same indefinite position he has always maintained. The hon. gentleman further said:

I have maintained it in Ontario and Quebec; I have maintained it with friend and foe; I maintain it now. And, Mr. Speaker, I go further. Whatever may be the course taken by the Government upon this question, the day will come, sooner or later, when the position I now take must be taken by the Government of Canada, no matter who may be at the head of affairs.

That would be a very fine explanation of the hon. gentleman's present position if we only knew what position he occupied in the matter, if we could get the hon. gentleman to announce something definite, if we could find any definite statement made by him on the question, even if we could find it with a small-tooth comb. I should like the hon. gentleman to assist us to find such a statement. In addition to the hon. gentleman's speeches at Winnipeg, we find that he made other utterances equally indefinite. The hon. gentleman spoke in Montreal, and, according to a report published in the "Globe" of February 19, he said:

I am glad to leave for a moment the domain of political economy and to discuss the subject which interests particularly the people of Montreal, the Manitoba school question. I have spoken already many times on this question in the House of Commons, in Toronto, in Winnipeg, in Victoria. Let me tell you that I would have much more pleasure in discussing this matter in Winnipeg or Toronto than at Montreal, because while here I feel the sympathy of public sentiment, there I experienced the pleasure that one feels in fighting for a good cause. I have spoken frequently on the Manitoba schools, but have not yet succeeded in satisfying the Conservatives. The more I discuss it, the less satisfied they are. It is because I have taken the stand of a statesman and a patriot that I have not succeeded in pleasing them, and I do not expect to please them this evening.

I wish the hon. member for Grey would again refer to the little book from which he read yesterday in regard to synonyms, and would look up the word patriot, and would give us an idea as to its meaning, in order to throw light on the position taken by the leader of the Opposition at the time he made this statement. The hon. gentleman further said:

This question is not a new one. It came up in 1893 before Parliament, when the Government, after having made a first reference of it to the courts, found themselves obliged to confront it. They sought again to refer it to the courts, and they succeeded. I then declared in the House that the question was not one of right, but of fact. I took up the petition addressed to the Government by the Bishop of St. Boniface, the much regretted Monseigneur Taché, in which he declared that, under the pretext of introducing public schools into Manitoba, Protestant schools were in reality established. I asked the Government: Why refer this question to the courts? If these are Protestant schools, never in a free country should such an outrage be allowed. That declaration I repeated, I have repeated, not once, but five or six different times, in Ontario. I repeated it only fifteen days ago in Toronto; but the Conservative newspapers asked, Why does not Mr. Laurier go further?

The hon. gentleman has repeated that statement, and he will doubtless continue to repeat it; but what sense is there in continually repeating the declaration that he learned, after reading the petition of the late Archbishop Taché, that the schools were Protestant schools, and the hon. gentleman never took the opportunity, when in Winnipeg to ascertain whether such was the fact or not. The hon. gentleman has taken since 1893, when he made his first statement to the House, up to the present time to ascertain whether, as a matter of fact, these are Protestant or Catholic schools. An hon. gentleman across the floor said

"hear, hear," when I quoted the words of his leader that the question was not one of law, but of facts. There is no doubt that it is a question of law and of fact, and that was the reason that the questions were referred to the Supreme Court under the Blake Act, in order to get a decision from the court as to the facts in dispute, and as to what the law was, and it was not until that Act was passed, based on the resolution introduced by Mr. Blake, that the Government could obtain a legal decision on the facts and the law. If hon. gentlemen will read the judgment of the Privy Council, they will find the facts ascertained and the law laid down. In addition to the speech made by the hon. leader of the Opposition at Montreal and Winnipeg, we find that during his tour through Ontario, the hon. gentleman made other speeches, for instance, at Merrickville, on which occasion he declared his policy in more definite terms than he had done previously. The report says :

"There is not a man in the audience," exclaimed Mr. Laurier, in an outburst of eloquence, "but who would be glad to see the Catholic schools restored by the legislature of Manitoba." This was said at the Merrickville meeting, which, according to the "Globe's" report, was a specially enthusiastic demonstration, where "cheers went up for Mr. Laurier from a thousand throats," and where "there was not a dissentient voice amongst the shouts of approbation with which the Liberal leader's declaration of policy was received."

Now, Sir, is there any difference between the position taken by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) and by gentlemen on this side of the House, as defined by the hon. gentleman at Merrickville? The hon. gentleman there said for the first time in any of his public utterances, that he would be glad to see the Catholic schools restored by the legislature of Manitoba. What has the Dominion Government been seeking to do? Has it not been striving to get the rights of the minority restored by the legislature of Manitoba? Yes, Mr. Speaker, in every movement made by this Government from the inception of the case up to the present time there has been an effort on our part to have the rights of the minority restored by the Manitoba government, and it is because that government, friends and allies of the hon. gentlemen opposite, have refused to grant the necessary legislation to remove the grievances of the minority that this House is placed in the position it is to-day and will have to grapple with the question here. At Renfrew the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) said :

I choose conciliation as my motto. We must have peace in this country. We must have harmony. We are, above everything, Canadians, whatever may be our religious beliefs, whatever be our opinions. If we want to build up this nation, we can do it only by every one of us individually making a sacrifice, upon the altar of our common country, of something of our own opinions and prejudices. If the question is approached in this way, I think it is easy of solution, but, if it is approached in any other way, I see nothing but strife and discord for the future in this land of ours.

My object in making that quotation is, that I trust it will be read by his Liberal friends in the province of Manitoba and that it will sink deep into their hearts. If they had taken the advice uttered by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) at Renfrew, and the advice given by others equally prominent in the affairs of this country, we would not be dealing with this question in this Parliament as we are. In addition to this statement the hon. gentleman's organ "L'Electeur" of Quebec writes :

Mr. Laurier has pronounced himself boldly and has vigorously reproached the Government for not having interfered more promptly.

Now, I fail to find in any utterance made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) in this House that he has attacked the Government for not having interfered more promptly. On the contrary, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has taken three or four years to ascertain certain facts which he could ascertain in a few hours at Winnipeg; facts which indeed were given him by the deputation. And yet we find that the hon. gentleman is as indefinite upon the question now as he was at any time previously. Mr. Speaker, there is another feature of the case I would like to address myself to. We are charged with coercing Manitoba, and we are told that we are endeavouring to force separate schools upon Manitoba against its will. Now, Sir, I think I have shown from the quotations I have made from the Order in Council covering the remedial order, and from the quotations from other documents I have read, that there has been no attempt, or no thought, or no idea, upon the part of this Government to coerce Manitoba or to force separate schools upon it. But we find from the statements I have quoted that the government of Manitoba have been unwilling to listen, not only to the representations made by this Government, but unwilling also to listen to the declaration made by the judges of the highest court in the land. I had read in some newspapers that Mr. Greenway, or some of his colleagues, have said that they have never been approached on this question by those most deeply interested, namely, the minority in Manitoba. Let me point out that on the 12th September, 1894, a short time after the visit of the leader of the Opposition to Winnipeg, a deputation waited upon Mr. Greenway and presented a petition to him. Here is the report taken from the North-west "Review:"

Yesterday, the Catholics of the province assembled at St. Mary's church, and at 3.30 in the afternoon marched, two by two, up St. Mary's Street, then up Kennedy Street, and to the government buildings. Nearly 1,000 people were in line. Having arrived at the parliament house, all entered the legislative chambers.

Mr. Greenway did not keep the people waiting very long, for at four o'clock, sharp, he came in with Messrs. McMillan, Cameron and Watson. Mr. N. Bawlf, on behalf of the Catholics of the province, read the petition, which is as follows:—

“To the Honourable the Premier and Members of the Government of Manitoba.

“We, the undersigned Catholics of the province of Manitoba, do respectfully present :

“1. That we are unable, from motives of conscientious convictions, to participate in, or derive any benefit from a system of education as now carried on, under the Public School Act of 1890 and amendments thereto.

“2. That the heavy pecuniary sacrifices with which Catholics throughout the province have been burdened, in consequence of said laws, for the last four years, even through the financial stringency of the present time, must remove any doubt as to the earnestness of their feelings, and convince your government of the gravity of their grievances.

“3. That, without sharing your petitioners' religious convictions that the taxation of Catholics for schools, acceptable only to Protestants, is most oppressive and unfair, your government must feel that they can no longer, in their own conscience, carry on the system the result of which is injustice and oppression.

“4. Therefore, your petitioners, as free-born British subjects, do enter their formal and solemn protest against this unfair treatment at your hands ; and do respectfully and earnestly pray, that your government take into their serious consideration the grievances of the Catholics of this province, and do pass such legislation as may be necessary to remedy such grievances to their full extent, and to assure to the said population the full respect of their rights and conscientious feelings, the use of their school taxes, of their legitimate share of the public money voted for educational purposes in this province ; and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.”

The petition was signed by nearly 4,000 people.

Mr. Greenway replied as follows :—

“Mr. Bawlf, and gentlemen of the delegation, on an important matter of this kind, involving the question of the government policy, in order to avoid misapprehension, it is better to give an answer in writing. At an early meeting of the government we will lay this matter before them, and as soon as possible we will give our reply.”

Here was an effort made by the people themselves, without the assistance of the courts, who waited upon the Premier in September, 1894, and respectfully asked him to remedy the grievances under which they laboured. But we find that a deaf ear was then turned to their representations. In addition to this, upon the charge that we have endeavoured to coerce this government and that we have not approached them in the sunny ways of patriotism mentioned by the leader of the Opposition, I have only to call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1894 a petition was signed by Cardinal Taschereau and by all the Archbishops and Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Canada, addressed to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, asking that the grievances under which the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba and the North-west laboured, should be removed. We find that this Government, by a report of His Excellency in Council dated the 26th July, 1894, which was transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Manitoba, to be laid by him before the legislature, concluded as follows :—

The committee beg to observe to Your Excellency, that the statements which are contained in this memorial are matters of deep concern and solicitude in the interests of the Dominion at large, and that it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and religious belief and practice ; and the committee, therefore, humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hope that the legislatures of Manitoba and of the North-west Territories, respectively, may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.

I would ask even the gentleman who uttered these memorable words, whether that was not appealing to those gentlemen in the “sunny ways of patriotism ?” But do we find that those gentlemen are willing to be approached in that way ? No, Sir. Remember, it was in July, 1894, before the judgment of the Privy Council and before the issue of the remedial order, that this appeal was made by the Dominion Government to Mr. Greenway and the legislature of Manitoba asking them, in these kind and conciliatory words, to take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints set forth in the petition, and if possible, to give satisfaction, and to lay this request before the legislature. Sir, from that day to this that memorandum has never been laid before the legislature of Manitoba, and that body is still ignorant of its existence except from its publication in the blue-books of this House and the newspapers of the country. The government of Mr. Greenway did not consult their masters ; but those gentlemen, whom we are asked to approach in the sunny ways of patriotism, made their reply, which was to the effect that they had no desire or intention to recede from the position they had taken in this matter. They say :

The questions which are raised by the report now under consideration have been the subject of most voluminous discussion in the legislature of Manitoba during the last four years. All the statements made in the memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor General and many others, have been repeatedly made to and considered by the legislature. That body has advisedly enacted educational legislation which gives to every citizen equal rights and equal privileges, and makes no distinction respecting nationality and religion. After a harassing legal contest, the highest court in the British dominions has decided that the legislature, in enacting the law of 1890, was within its constitutional powers, and that the subject of education is one committed to the charge of the provincial legislature. Under these circumstances, the executive of the province see no reason for recommending the legislature to alter the principles of the legislation complained of. It has been made clear that there is no grievance, except that it be a grievance that the legislature refuses to subsidize particular creeds out of the public funds, and the legislature can hardly be held to be responsible for the fact that their refusal to violate what seems to be a sound and just principle of government, creates, in the words of the report, dissatisfaction amongst Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada.

The government and legislative assembly would unitedly resist by every constitutional means any such attempt to interfere with their provincial autonomy.

So that these gentlemen, by the solemn declaration of an Order in Council, dated, Executive Council Chamber, 20th October, 1894, when there were present the Hon. Mr. Greenway, Mr. McMillan, Mr. Sifton, Mr. Watson and Mr. Cameron, declare, almost seven months before the decision of the Privy Council of England was rendered, that the government and legislative assembly would unitedly resist by every constitutional means any such attempt to interfere with their provincial autonomy; and we find that they are as good as their word. They say in their declaration that there is no grievance, while the highest court in the realm says there are grievances; and in spite of that they refuse to carry out the request made to them. Now, I have made the statement before, and I make it again without any fear of contradiction, that this whole movement on the part of Mr. Greenway and his followers, has been from its inception a political movement; it has been used for political purposes, and no other. Their position on the question is indefensible, when you look at it from the standpoint either of the constitution or of common sense, or from the standpoint of men having the responsibilities of government on their shoulders. Men removed from the sphere of politics altogether have given their views upon this question. We had it declared in this House not over two years ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg at that time, Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, that the legislation which was introduced in 1890 was brutal and butcherly. The Rev. Dr. King, in a very able review of the case delivered before the Presbyterian Synod of the North-west, maintained:

There has been great absence of wisdom and conciliatoriness, a degree perhaps even of injustice and harshness wholly unnecessary, in the way in which the change had been introduced.

Principal Grant on the same subject, said:

The government of Manitoba made a great mistake, and the onus lies on them to make concessions.

Then, we find the Rev. Peter Wright, of Portage la Prairie, formerly an Ontario teacher, speaking as follows:

Let us make it as easy as possible for our representatives to be not only fair and just, but noble and generous. Encourage them to look into the alleged grievance. If it exists let them see about the remedy in a spirit as broad and generous as is compatible with the cardinal principles of our institutions—equal rights and privileges to all.

And after a reference to the manner of settlement that some propose—the abolition of all religious exercises from the schools—he proceeds:

Will the Catholics then call our schools godless? Well, let them have the privilege of preparing religious exercises after their own ideas, as distinctly Catholic as they please, so long as the teaching is not subversive of civil obligation—and let these be used in every school where the trustees so determine, in lieu of the present religious exercises, and with the same limitations as to time and attendance.

Here are three statements made by learned divines of the Presbyterian Church. I could supplement them with similar statements made by the divines of other churches, calling on the government of Manitoba to meet this question manfully and rightfully and try to restore the rights of the minority and remedy their grievances. But, Sir, we find that every appeal made to them fell upon deaf ears; and they stand to-day as firmly as they did in 1890 when the Bill was introduced by the member for Winnipeg. In politics, Sir, we find very strange bed-fellows; but I cannot for the life of me understand how the hon. leader of the Opposition can take to his bosom the member for Winnipeg as one of his chief supporters, remembering the part he has played in this matter of the Manitoba schools. Why, Sir, I picture in my mind a meeting on the celebrated Champ de Mars in Montreal, with the hon. leader of the Opposition present as the central figure, and upon the platform with him the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) and the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). While the audience are gathering the member for West Ontario in his dulcet tones sings that noble song which was so dear to the hearts of all Reformers in 1891:

Ontario, Ontario!
The tyrant's heel is on thy neck,
Ontario, Ontario!

And while that song is being sung by the hon. member for West Ontario, the member for L'Islet is going about among the audience distributing oranges—Bowling oranges. Then the hon. leader of the Opposition, with mighty mien, approaches the audience, and, lifting in his hand a glass of sparkling St. Lawrence water, says: "Monsieur Martin, mon cher ami, salut"; or as they used to say in old days, "here is to our merry meeting." "Yes, compatriots, on this historic spot I desire to introduce to you my friend, Mr. Joseph Martin, the member for Winnipeg, a gentleman who is one of my strongest lieutenants. It is true, gentlemen, or ladies and gentlemen, that Mr. Martin has made certain declarations on the school question; it is true that he is the author of the School Act of 1890, about which we have had so much trouble and discussion; it is true that when introducing that Act in the Manitoba legislature he made a speech in which he said that he wished to wipe out the monstrous evil of separate schools." Now, we may have our own ideas on separate schools, but my friend Mr. Martin says they are a monstrous evil, and it was under that conviction, that he introduced his legislation. He desired to wipe them out, but none the less do I now commend Mr. Martin to you. And this same member for Winnipeg is the gentleman, who, after he had subjected yours and my compatriots and co-religionists in Manitoba to all the troubles and trials caused them by the Act of 1890, has come to the conclusion that this same Act which he placed on the statute-book has subjected them to rank tyranny." Of course it will be pretty hard for the leader of the Opposition to explain the fact of Mr. Martin being on the same platform with him. But I will leave that task to him and his supporters in Quebec. It is a most extraordinary position we find to-day. We find the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) standing shoulder to shoulder in the hope and expectation which has filled their breasts for years that they may come at last across to the Treasury benches; and in this hope and expectation the leader of the Opposition is willing to ally himself to a gentleman who has declared that the separate schools are a monstrous evil, and that he trusts they will never be restored to the minority of Manitoba. And yet we are told that these gentlemen are statesmen. And we are told, forsooth, that our Government is coercing Manitoba. Sir, it is not we who are coercing Manitoba. I have proved that from the very inception of the school legislation in Manitoba, the gentlemen who introduced it, who followed it up, and who resist any attempt to have it interfered with, have but one idea, and that is to keep that Act intact upon the statute-book just so long as it will suit their political prospects. If these men had acted as British statesmen, as patriots, as Canadians, we would not be in the position in which we are to-day? We are charged with coercing Manitoba. Who has coerced it? I have shown that long before the remedial order was made, when the resolution was introduced into the Manitoba legislature by Mr. Fisher, calling upon the legislature to meet the views laid down in the judgment of the Privy Council, that resolution was met by an amendment moved by the Attorney General, and seconded by the Provincial Secretary, and was defeated by a large majority. By that amendment, the legislature of Manitoba declared that they would not recede from the position they had taken. Even after that, I showed by interviews with these gentlemen, which I quoted—interviews with the Provincial Treasurer, the Provincial Secretary, the Attorney General, the Premier himself—and by quotations from the speeches of these gentlemen, that these men stood firm on the one ground alone and would not recede one iota. Why, if they had listened to the judgment of the Privy Council, if they had listened to the utterances of the Toronto "Globe," which I read to-day, if they had listened to the advice of the North-west Baptists, if they had listened to the Rev. Dr. Grant and the Rev. Dr. King, and to the opinion and views of other men who are not in politics—if they had listened to the views of those men, patriots and Canadians—they would have met the condition of things by at once yielding to the judgment of the courts and not have obstinately clung to their irreconcilable position. We find that those men, instead of being open to conciliation, have refused all along, from the very inception of this difficulty to the present time, despite all the efforts of this Government to conduct the matter on strictly constitutional lines and make the slightest concession. After the government of Manitoba had been called upon, from time to time, to have itself represented by counsel before the Privy Council and the tribunals, they refused. They were quite willing to let the thing go as it might without their being properly represented. In addition, we find that the counsel who conducted the case on their behalf, said before the Privy Council of Canada that no matter what order was made by the Privy Council, the Manitoba government would not obey it. They put on record before that Council their spirit of defiance, and continued to show the same defiance in reply to every appeal made for justice to the minority. They showed it in answer to the appeal which the four thousand made to the Premier of Manitoba in 1894; they showed it in answer to the appeals of the different gentlemen whose utterances I quoted; and they were no less obdurate when appealed to by this Government through its Orders in Council in July, 1894. In the same spirit of defiance with which they met those appeals, they answered the remedial order. This question is one that was thrust upon this Government. It is a question which was forced into the arena of Dominion politics through no fault of ours. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have the courage of our convictions. We have taken a stand on this question and will carry out our pledges and promises. Instead of being charged with coercing Manitoba, I say that Manitoba is being coerced by the very men whose defiant utterances I have quoted here to-day. If a condition should arise, through any legislation that may be passed by this House, which would place this country in an unfortunate position, I blame those men, and history will endorse my opinion. On my responsibility, as a Minister of the Crown, standing here as a Canadian and a British subject, I say that it was never contemplated by the court which delivered the judgment that the government of Manitoba would not, as soon as it read that judgment, put itself in accord with the spirit and the principles of our constitution, and take the course which should be expected of British subjects and Canadians. In a few days this House will be called upon to discuss the Bill, and hon. gentlemen in this House and the people of the country will hold the provincial government of Manitoba responsible for the necessity which exists for passing this legislation.

Mr. FORBES. In view of the importance which this question has assumed, it would be unbecoming for me to be silent, and, therefore, I will beg the indulgence of the House for a short time while I touch several of the points referred to in the Speech from the Throne. I do not propose at this stage to enter upon an extensive discussion of the Manitoba school matter. I am gratified to learn that the Government intends to bring down its Bill, when we shall have a fair field to discuss the whole thing on its merits. I shall, therefore, not dwell very largely on that matter, but merely refer to it briefly when I reach it in its place in the Speech from the Throne. This debate has assumed considerable importance, and, I think, rightly so by virtue of the fact that the very sentiments expressed in the Speech from the Throne are, to a large extent, contradictory of the facts, as revealed to us by the records of the Government. We find that after His Excellency had addressed the hon. gentlemen in the Senate and the House of Commons, he announced that this special session was called for a particular purpose, and started out by saying that he "congratulates us upon the increased activity in the various departments of commerce and industry." I would like to be able to concur entirely in the views thus expressed, but, having in my mind the records of the Government, brought down and laid upon the Table of the House, it is impossible for me to do so. In saying this, I do not imply any reflection on the position held by His Excellency, who is in no way responsible for the Speech, but for which, primarily and lastly, his advisers, the Government of the day, are directly responsible. If we turn to the first and only reference to commerce, we will find that the position of Canada to-day, as regards her commerce is far from being one of any great prosperity compared with former years, and compared with the great resources she enjoys. The returns brought down show that, as compared with other countries having less natural resources, Canada does not do herself justice. In the last returns, which are for the year ending 30th June, 1895, we find that the aggregate trade for the year, on the basis of goods for consumption alone, amounted to $218,891,000. In the previous year, the total was $230,618,000, so that there was a decrease in 1895 of about $12,000,000. Again, take the total trade on the basis of total imports and exports, and we find that the total in 1895 was $224,420,000, as against $241,000,000 in 1894, a decrease of about $16,000,000. As compared with the year 1893, the decrease was about $23,000,000. I fail to understand, therefore, upon what ground the Government formulated that section of the Speech from the Throne. Let us examine the returns of imports and exports to ascertain our position as regards the question whether the trade of the country is in our favour or against us. I assert boldly that all sound economic writers uphold the principle that the trade of a country is in favour of a country when the imports are in excess of the exports. When the reverse of this is the case, the country must be exporting goods and getting no return. In 1893 the balance of trade, on the principle I have stated, was in favour of our country to the extent of $9,000,000. In 1894 it was in our favour to the extent of $6,000,000. But in 1895, the last year of which we have the records, we find that the exports were $113,638,000, and the imports $110,781,000. There was a balance of trade against Canada of almost $3,000,000. We are forced to the conclusion that something or other, whatever we may choose to call it, is operating against the industries and against the progress of Canada. Without any hesitation, I would attribute the result to one cause alone, and that is our fiscal policy. Let us look at still other returns which afford us a fair means of judging whether the statement is justified that there is "evidence of increased activity in the various branches of commerce and industry." Let us turn to the shipping interest. In this we find the true reflex of the condition of the commerce of the country. I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence furnished by the official returns is conclusive proof that this great industry of Canada, and particularly of the maritime provinces, is gradually but steadily decreasing. In 1873 the three maritime provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island—I confine myself to these because the shipping interest is of more importance to them than to the other provinces—the total tonnage was 716,469 tons. In 1878 it had increased to 943,783 tons, an increase of 237,314 tons. At a valuation of $30 per ton, this would mean an increase in the wealth of Canada of $7,113,420. At that time we had a low tariff, a tariff imposed for the purpose of raising revenue and giving only such incidental protection as might happen to the interests affected, but not in any way intended to restrict trade, particularly the export and import trade. Therefore, between those dates the shipping, the most important industry in the country, possibly excepting agriculture, grew and developed as I have shown. In 1893 the tonnage of the maritime provinces had fallen from 943,783 tons to 573,319 tons, a decrease of 370,264 tons, which, at the same valuation of $30 per ton, would mean a loss of $11,108,220 to the Dominion. From 1878 to 1893, we had a high tariff, the very object of which is to restrict exports and imports as well. Such a tariff must operate most injuriously upon the great shipping industry of the country. In 1894 the province of Nova Scotia lost, in addition, in that one year alone, 41,868 tons of shipping, equal to $1,206,040, and in 1895 she suffered a further loss of 36,308 tons, equal to $1,089,240. When that retrograde movement has been going on for a number of years past, and when, in addition, we find from returns laid upon the Table that we have lost, during the last decade over 1,250,000 of our population, taking into consideration the natural increase and the immigration which has cost us so much, and when you find these evidences of the unsatisfactory state of our industries corroborated by the reduced exports and imports, we cannot but conclude that something is wrong in the management of our affairs, and that Canada's prosperity is not what we have a right to look for. It is not too much to say that the condition of affairs in Canada to-day is one of absolute stagnation and decay, calling for the careful attention of our statesmen. In view of the facts I have quoted, I condemn that part of His Excellency's speech concerning "increased activity in the various branches of commerce and industry." I say it is a shame, in view of the condition of affairs, that these gentlemen not only seek to mislead the people by their own words, but they actually use the official position of His Excellency to give authority to their statements, and publish them throughout the length and breadth of the land. Sir, I ask the condemnation of all good thinking people upon that. Now, let us proceed a little further and see how they have made matters better, if they possibly could do so. But, in fact, I think we will find, as we proceed, that while they started out on the dangerous edge of a bog, they have only sunk themselves deeper into it as they progressed. The next clause refers to the North-west Territories and British Columbia.

Mr. FORBES.

In particular I notice the mining enterprise in British Columbia.

Now, Sir, if the Government ever promised anything to the people of Canada, it was that their policy which is in force to-day would tend to increase and develop the mining industries of this country. What do we find? We find a bare reference to the mining enterprises in British Columbia, a new colony, a new province, a province blessed by nature with some of the greatest resources the world has ever known, a province which we welcomed to the Dominion of Canada, a province which is a beauty spot within the limits of our nation. But because enterprising foreign capitalists have come in and uncovered the earth, and shown the great resources there are in that province, we are told, forsooth, that the mineral resources of the whole country are showing signs of progress and increased activity. As a matter of fact, the mining enterprises in eastern Canada have not shown that activity which they should have shown. We have in the province of Nova Scotia the finest deposits of gold, coal and iron in the world to-day, equalled only by those which you will find in British Columbia, superior to these you will find in the United States; and I say that they ought to be fostered by a judicious system of legislation that will develop them and make them a source of revenue, to a large extent, to the governments of this country, as well as a source of profit to the citizens of Canada. But what do we find? A clause is put into our tariff, and I believe it was inserted when the Act was supposed to be revised in 1894, for the purpose, among other things, of encouraging mining operations in Canada. It reads as follows:

Machinery, mining, and smelting, imported prior to May 16th, 1896, which is at the time of its importation of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada, free.

Now, Sir, the Government have violated in principle and in letter that section of the tariff. There is a large and well-developed industry in iron, coal and gold in Nova Scotia, and special machinery of various kinds, is used and is necessary. The manufacturing industries of Canada have not yet reached that perfect state where they can produce the best class of mining machinery, hence that clause is put in there for the purpose of letting in mining machinery free, to aid and assist the mining enterprises of Canada. But we find the Government of Canada, in league again with the hidden foes of the great interests of Canada, the manufacturing industry, the combines and monopolists—we find the Government of Canada in league with them; and when a piece of mining machinery is necessarily bought abroad because it cannot be obtained in Canada equal in quality to that which the mine owners would like to use, and which is absolutely necessary for the development of our mines, we find the Government exacting an excessive duty upon that imported article; it deliberately imposes a serious tax upon the mining industries of the Dominion for the purpose, not of getting a revenue which might be derived therefrom, but for the ostensible purpose, and for the real purpose, too, of aiding and assisting the combines and monopolists of Canada, although it has been represented to them over and over again that machinery equal to that which can be got abroad, is not and cannot be made in Canada. Petitions have been presented by the mining societies in Nova Scotia, as I am aware, and representations have been made to the Government, delegations have waited upon them, but without avail. No satisfaction can be obtained, the only and the invariable answer is: We will take it into advisement. That means that they will consult with the manufacturers of similar articles in Canada, and if it can be shown by these manufacturers that their interests are affected in any way, then, forsooth, taxes are imposed upon the imported article, and the mining industry must bear the burden. Sir, the coal industry of Nova Scotia did not reach that pitch of development last year which we fondly hoped it would, and I dare say the vicious taxing system of this Government had considerable to do with it. Yet, in spite of all that, we find the Government asking His Excellency the Governor General to express the thanks of the Government to the Houses of Parliament for the increased activity in the mining resources of the country. Again, I must take exception to that clause, and say that the facts as deduced from the blue-books and the returns laid upon the Table of this House, do not warrant that statement at all. Now, we come to another clause, number four in the Speech, where we find reference is made to the industrial schools on the Indian reservations in the North-west. Sir, I have nothing to say but approval of those industrial schools, and approval of the way in which the Indian question is handled in Canada. I cordially approve of the generous way in which the North-west Mounted Police handle the Indians out there. The industrial schools which have been started for the benefits of those wards of the Government, are wise in their inception, and are doing a good work. If they are only operated in the best interests of those poor Indians, they shall have my support, and they should have the support of every true Canadian. Clause five refers to the North-west Mounted Police. Clause six refers to the special cause for which this special session of Parliament has been called, namely, the Manitoba school question. It points out that:

Immediately after the prorogation of Parliament, my Government communicated through the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba with the Government of that province, in order to ascertain upon what lines the local authorities of Manitoba would be prepared to promote amendments to the Acts respecting education in schools in that province, and whether any arrangement was possible with the Manitoba Government which would render action by the Federal Parliament in this connection unnecessary. I regret to say that the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor have declined to entertain favourably these suggestions, thereby rendering it necessary for my Government, in pursuance of its declared policy, to introduce legislation in regard to the subject.

That, Sir, is the great bone of contention between parties in this country. It is the great subject upon which this Government has got to exercise all its brains and all its power. It is the shoal, it is the quicksand, upon which they are going to fall to pieces. They will fall purely and simply because they started out wrong. They started out with a braggadocio which one would expect to see only in a highway robber when he is fully armed and equipped with all the modern instruments of warfare. Sir, the Government are going to fall simply because they have not the confidence of the people of the country, and they do not know how to get the confidence of the people of the country on that question. If they had started out where they are to-day by asking Manitoba what she would do by expressing their wish that a spirit of investigation and conciliation might govern their legislation on this subject, the question might not have assumed the strained condition in which we find it to-day. But the Government of Canada started out most hastily when they found they had obtained a verdict from the Privy Council in England in their favour. They started with a loaded blunderbuss to blow off the head of the Manitoba government, to crush provincial autonomy to the wall; they proceeded to act on the old antiquated theory of the Conservatives since federation, that they would attempt, and would succeed if they held power long enough, to deprive the provinces of their provincial rights and centralize those powers in the Federal Parliament and Government of Canada. The Liberal party has always opposed the usurpation of the rights of the provinces. I was astonished at the remarks made by the mover of the Address. No doubt he had received the suggestion from the Government before he proceeded to show that there was no such thing as provincial autonomy, that the proper way to govern this country was to wipe out the provincial governments, and particularly to sweep away those questions over which, according to the constitution, the provinces have jurisdiction, and centralize all powers in the central government. It is with that desire in their hearts and minds that the present Government has drifted into the position which we find them occupying to-day on the Manitoba school question. If it had been the acknowledged policy of the Government to have allowed

Parliament to run its full life and to have gone to the people only when the term of Parliament had expired, I do not think we would have ever had the remedial order of March last placed on the records of this country. The ex-Minister of Justice never would have drafted and carried through Council that celebrated order. At the time he got the order accepted by his colleagues in the Cabinet it was intended to hold the general elections at once, and before holding a session. It was intended to go to the Catholics with the declaration that the remedial order spoke in plain language for separate schools; and at the same time it was the intention to appeal to the people in Protestant sections with the plea that the order meant nothing but the transmission of the judicial decision from the Privy Council to the government of Manitoba. Undoubtedly that was the intention of this Government when the order was passed. But the first indication of disloyalty to the Premier was exhibited on that occasion. The majority of the members of the Cabinet took the ex-Minister of Justice by the throat and compelled him to withdraw his resignation; they compelled him to do so although he had forced the order through the Privy Council; of course, I do not know the details, but it is well known in one part of Canada. In Antigonish and Verchères the matter was explained in one way by himself, and his colleagues in the Cabinet explained it another way in Haldimand. We find that the Government, through its Protestant members there, are afraid to go to the country on the policy formulated. It was decided to hold another session of Parliament before appealing to the people, but they did not possess the nerve to bring down a Bill on the lines of the remedial order, and they misled the people for political gain. They announced that they would drive through Parliament during the present session a Bill on the lines of the remedial order. They adjourned Parliament last year with the solemn promise given to this House by the leader of the Government and by the Premier in the Upper Chamber that when the next session was called the chief and only business before Parliament would be to pass remedial legislation. Yet, forsooth, where is the Government Bill to-day? We are practically in the dark as to what the Government intend to do on this subject; they are hoping and trusting and praying that another bolt will occur in the Cabinet, or that some person may die, or that something may happen so that the Government will not be called upon to pass a remedial Act, and not be compelled to go to the country on this issue. During two hours and a half this afternoon the Minister of the Interior debated the remedial legislation proposed to be brought down to this House, but he discussed it from an abstract point of view and not on details. He endeavoured to prove to this House and to the country in one breath that there are no facts which require investigation, and in the next breath that all the facts have been investigated; in the third place, that the Government of Canada to-day does not intend to coerce Manitoba; and in the fourth place, that if Manitoba does not do what is required, she will be coerced. These are the whole points of the speech delivered by the Minister of the Interior on the subject this afternoon. I could gather nothing further from it—it was first he would and then he would not; and as I listened to the speech I was convinced that the policy of the Government on this question is absolutely one of wrongdoing, that they intend to violate one of the most sacred principles of our constitution, and deprive the provinces of rights which were given to them in letters indelible at the time they came into the confederacy; I was satisfied of this when I heard the Minister read newspaper clippings and express his own opinions that it was safe and safe only for the confederation to adopt the legislation proposed by this Government. I do not hesitate to say that if it were established upon evidence before us that a wrong has been done, there is not a citizen in Canada who would not be prepared to give fair and equal justice to his comrades of any faith or creed in this country. No speech has been made on this question, nor is there a single record among the records laid on the Table of the House to convince me that there is a sufficient injury and wrong done to the Catholic minority in Manitoba to override the constitution and to warrant us in driving out of the constitution of this country the great principle of provincial autonomy. We only require to look at the condition of affairs in Manitoba and the history of this question from its inception to see that the policy of the leader of the Opposition, as laid down in this House some years ago is the correct one, and the only one which any free citizen and patriot in Canada should adopt. The statement was made by the Minister of the Interior, that the petition of the Archbishop of Manitoba submitted to the Privy Council of Canada, established the fact that the Roman Catholic children of Manitoba are compelled to attend Protestant schools, and to accept Protestant teaching against their conscientious convictions; but we find that this statement is denied by the records of the Manitoba government, and how can it be said that the facts are settled and determined so that we can come to a fair decision on the case. That alone, which I take as an excerpt from the statement of the Minister this afternoon, is enough to convince hon. members that it would redound with fatal effect to the Catholics generally in Canada if we allowed such an Act as the Government propose to pass through this House. It is stated by the Minister of the Interior that Manitoba has never shown a spirit of conciliation in this matter, and has never attempted to meet the federal government in any degree, not even half way, in order to have this question settled. The facts, as set forth by the hon. gentleman's colleagues and friends do not concur with this statement. We have in the "Nor'-Wester," newspaper published by the Conservatives and supporting the Opposition to Mr. Greenway's government, this statement :

The Hon. Mr. Sifton in his speech at Douglas on 31st December last, as reported by the Winnipeg "Daily Tribune," said :

We (the government of Manitoba) are prepared to consider any changes in method that will make it acceptable to the Roman Catholics. We will do anything in reason, anything that will not compromise principle ; and again, anything in reason if we can settle this matter without compromising principle, then we will do it, but not otherwise. If there is any change that can be made in the religious exercises that will make them acceptable to all parties, if any change can be made in the time they are held, or other like changes, we are prepared to consider them.

Well, Sir, if it is the conscientious scruples of the minority, that the Greenway party and the Liberal party—or we will say the Greenway party alone—are attempting to trample upon in the province of Manitoba surely that can be settled without coercing Manitoba ; surely that can be settled without passing an Act of this Parliament compelling the people of Manitoba, at the point of the bayonet, to give separate schools, to divide public lands and public moneys, and to upset the whole system of education in that province, which is yet a young province, and which may be forced out of confederation or compelled to take up arms. Since the general elections they have returned the Greenway government by 33 majority, in a House of 40 members. Surely some men can be found on the Government side of the House able to grapple with this question. I know there is none of them on the other side able to grapple with it as the leader of the Opposition can, but surely some of their Conservative friends can throw some ray of light on the darkness in which they have involved themselves. Why do they not attempt to conciliate Manitoba. Why do they not submit a draft of the Bill they propose, and ask Manitoba if she will consent to it, if she will accept it, before laying it on the Table of this House ? There is no evidence of any attempt at conciliating Manitoba on the part of the Dominion Government. They met Manitoba with a gun loaded to the muzzle. They were compelled by public opinion to withdraw the charge in that gun, but they hold it ready to fire again at the provincial autonomy of that province. Sir, if they trample upon that great sacred right of a province of this Dominion a wave of indignation will go westward to British Columbia and back again to the province of Nova Scotia. If there is a province in this Dominion which would seriously protest against the action of this Government in trampling upon provincial autonomy, it is the province of Nova Scotia. That province has its birthright stolen from it without the consent of the people, and the subject is tender to them. Within the limits of Nova Scotia all classes and creeds are treated in the same generous and fair spirit on the question of education. But let it not be said to them that this Parliament of Canada will coerce the people of Manitoba or the people of any other province. Sir, if they do, it will never be forgotten to the last generation of the Tory party in Canada, should it live a hundred or a thousand years. This is a matter which in my opinion should be thoroughly investigated. Upon the evidence which may be adduced I am prepared to lend myself as an unbiassed juror, and if any facts be found in favour of the Roman Catholic minority or against their best interest to-day, I am ready to decide upon these facts. I am not in a position at the present time to decide fully and conscientiously on the limited facts which we have before us. I cannot come to any honest conclusion upon the question in the absence of such facts as might be gained by an investigation. It is mere child's play for hon. gentlemen opposite to talk about the question as they do. Imagine a Minister of the Crown, the Minister of the Interior, reading newspaper extracts extending over the last three or four years, as to what newspaper editors have said, as to what biased persons have written, and as to views on the question expressed by enthusiastic people in favour of this party or that party. Why should Manitoba be coerced on such statements as that ? Not one of these statements, can the hon. Minister attempt to say, have been established as absolutely correct and true. They are the mere "ipsi dixit" and "obiter dicta" of persons who are not versed in the facts of this important case. This question should be approached in the sunny ways of patriotism. I repeat that it can only be settled by an investigation, and after that, by conciliation. I have faith in the people of Manitoba, and particularly in the patriotism of the minority of that province and their numerous friends in other parts of Canada. We have it upon record to-day that the province is a unit as against coercion and against the proposed legislation by this Parliament. The Conservatives of Manitoba who opposed the Greenway government at the last election proclaimed from every hustings that Greenway, the Liberal Premier of that province, was selling Manitoba to the French Catholics, to the Roman Catholics, and to the Hierarchy of Manitoba. The organ of the Conservative government in Manitoba has on the other hand said that the Greenway party stand upon the principle that the British Privy Council laid down in the judicial decision which they gave upon the Act of 1890, namely, that the Act of 1890 was within the jurisdiction of the province of Manitoba. With that fact found by the highest legal tribunal in the British Empire, why should it be said that Manitoba, at the dictation of the Government of Canada, should recede from the rights which the constitution of the province entitled it to. It is quite true, and I admit as a lawyer, that we should as a nation and as a Parliament, be bound by the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on any legal point. But, Sir, when it is found that the Privy Council distinctly laid down that Parliament is not legally bound, and is not constitutionally bound to give that full measure of relief which the remedial order of the present Government says the Roman Catholic minority is entitled to; what are we to say? With that fact before me, and with the fact that the decision given a year before holds the Act to be thoroughly constitutional, I scout the contention of this Government that they are acting constitutionally in forcing this Act upon Manitoba. There is no evidence whatever to entitle them to come to that conclusion. They have purely a judicial power. They have no perfunctory act to perform. They have not the right to say to Manitoba: if you do not accept the judicial opinion of the English Privy Council we will force it upon you. They have the right simply to say: It has been laid down by the highest court in the Empire that we have the power to hear both parties on this question, now let them come before us, let them come with counsel as they have done, let them come before us in Parliament by their representatives as they propose to do this session, let them further than that say: If it is absolutely necessary in the interest of justice or in the interest of the minority that we should appoint a commission to investigate, let us appoint that commission. Even if it should take one, two or five months for that commission to investigate, and even if necessary dissolve this moribund parliament and appeal to the people of Canada. I contend that the necessity of the occasion and the importance of the matter, command that the Government of Canada should hesitate before it shall pass an Act without obtaining that information which would enable this Parliament to come to a righteous and well matured conclusion. I judge from the remarks of the Minister of the Interior that the Government does not know where it stands upon this question to-day. That hon. gentleman started out against coercion and he wound up by advocating coercion if necessary; he started out by declaring that he had all the facts, and wound up with the statement that we did not have the facts we ought to have. Mr. Speaker, there are a few more clauses of the Address to which I would like to make a few references. One is the clause in reference to a Fast Atlantic steamship line:

I am happy to inform you that the representatives of my Government, and the suggestions of the Ottawa conference respecting steamship communication, have resulted in an announcement by the Imperial authorities of their willingness to grant a substantial subvention towards the Atlantic portion of the scheme.

Sir, I take that to mean that a fast Atlantic steam service is to be established between England and some port in Canada, and that from the extreme western portion of Canada in British Columbia a submarine cable is to be laid across the Pacific to Australia. I admire the boldness of the Government in bringing forward the project for a fast Atlantic line. I heartily approve of anything that tends to develop and increase the trade and commerce of this country. All that is required is that this be done in a proper and judicial manner, and that we exercise our privilege of voting money to aid these great undertakings in the true national spirit of developing our nation and natural industries only—not in the jingo spirit, merely for the sake of capturing votes. The only Atlantic service from which Canada has derived a benefit in the past is that which has been given by the Liberal party. The hon. members who represent Halifax in this House have done nothing during this Parliament to stop the delivery of passengers and freight at an American seaport. It is to be hoped that a part of the policy indicated in the Speech from the Throne will be to bring this fast Atlantic line to some Canadian port. Of course, I think that there is no port superior to our Nova Scotia ports. Those ports are the nearest to the mother country, and our ports are open at all seasons of the year, so that it would not be necessary to change the port at any season. On this subject I reserve further discussion until the Government's proposition with regard to the proposed subsidy is definitely before Parliament. With regard to the proposed cable across the Pacific Ocean, it would be well for Canada to have it; but I think that is a matter entirely for the consideration of the Imperial Government, and Canada should not be asked to spend one cent upon it; and I trust that if the Government have made any provision for that in their Estimates, they will strike it out. Then, we are told in the Speech that our attention will be asked to "measures intended to provide for the better arming of our militia and the strengthening of Canadian defences." This is a peculiar clause, and when we find attempts being made by Canadian statesmen to set up a sort of jingo policy based upon it, I for my part must deprecate it. I find that Sir Charles Tupper, the new Secretary of State, on his way east, when asked as to the Conservative platform, said that "it was going to be enlarged so as to include closer trade relations with the mother country and the betterment of the defences along the Canadian border." You will see, Mr. Speaker, that that differs from the statement in the Speech from the Throne. Why the Secretary of State should have said this, unless he was authorized to do so by his Government, I fail to see, unless to make it appear that Canada was anxious, and publicly anxious, to insult the American nation. If the hon. gentleman intended to say that Canada was hostile to the American people, that Canada intended to cut off all communication with them and to arm herself against possible inroads from them, it is of a piece with the jingo spirit which animates hon. gentlemen opposite when they parade their loyalty, carry it on their coat-sleeves, and constantly talk about it on the floor of the Canadian Parliament. It may be that the clause put in here is for the purpose of catching votes for the Conservative party. For my part, I say it would be absolutely ridiculous to establish a line of fortifications along the Canadian border. If the clause means simply that we are to be asked to provide a sum of money to furnish superior arms for our militia, I agree most fully with that statement. I believe, in the words of my honoured leader, that it would be little short of butchery to send the Canadian militia out to do duty armed with an antiquated weapon; and if such is the condition of the force to-day, it is a reflection upon the Government of Canada that it should have allowed such a condition of affairs to remain so long. I believe the proposal to properly arm our militia will meet with the approval of both sides of the House. There are some other sections in the Speech to which I would like to make reference, but time is pressing. There is one, however, to which I wish in particular to take exception:

You will also be asked to consider measures for the extension and development of our trade in agricultural products with the United Kingdom, and other markets.

This does not harmonize with the clause referring to the strengthening of Canadian defences, if that refers to a series of defences along the frontier of Canada. It is quite right that we should make efforts for "the extension of our trade with the United Kingdom and other markets." We have always been desirous of extending our trade with other countries, and we are to-day willing and anxious to develop our trade with the other portions of the British Empire, and particularly with England; but whether or not Great Britain will adopt the principle of preferential trade with the colonies, we can never secure by any act of this Parliament. But if we intend to adopt such a policy towards England, there is only one way in which we can show our sympathy with the sentiment expressed by His Excellency, that is, by throwing down the barriers which tend to restrict our trade with England. Yesterday, I believe, the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) addressed the Board of Trade in Montreal. I am informed by the newspapers that he touched upon this great question of preferential trade within the Empire, and, as an evidence of Canada's willingness to participate in that policy, quoted a resolution which he said had passed the Canadian Parliament. That resolution was as follows:—

Inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada free of duty into her ports, this House is of opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain, should be reduced.

I am surprised to learn that the Secretary of State quoted that resolution to the Board of Trade in Montreal, and said that it expressed the opinion of Parliament to-day on the question, and was an evidence of Canada's good-will to meet the British Empire half way upon the principle of preferential trade. Sir, it is a fact that the hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.) (Mr. Davies) in 1892 submitted that resolution to Parliament. But the Government, the National Policy party, the party of restrictionists, voted down that resolution, and it failed to pass. Yet, if we are intending to do all which lies in our power to facilitate and carry out the great principle of preferential trade, or of increasing our trade with the mother country, why could we not have done the least in our power in that direction by passing this resolution which the hon. Secretary of State thought we had passed. It was wrong for us, then, to refuse that resolution, and wrong for us to-day to speak of adopting a policy of preferential trade in the Empire while, at the same time, carrying out no policy and doing nothing on our part to aid the scheme. I find, on looking over the reports further, a report of the Executive Council of Upper and Lower Canada, passed in 1865, at which board the late Sir John Macdonald sat as a member. The following minute was passed:

They (i.e., the Committee in Council) cannot err in directing the attention of the enlightened statesmen of the great Empire, of which it is the proudest boast of Canadians, to form a part, to the connection between material prosperity and political contentment, feeling that they appealed to the highest motives of patriotic statesmen, viz., the desire to perpetuate a Dominion founded on the affectionate alliance of a prosperous and contented people.

We have in that minute of council, this principle enunciated that material prosperity and political contentment go together. But that principle is at variance with the policy of the Government to-day, as exhibited in their policy of antagonism to the United States. It is a serious thing for us to consider as a commercial people, whether material prosperity and political contentment cannot and should not go side by side to-day as it was said they should go in 1865. If we are to develop our trade with the mother country, and with our sister colonies by a system of preferential treatment within the Empire, is it not equally important for us to foster a condition of political contentment with our great neighbours to the south? While the proposed policy of preferential trade within the Empire should go on and progress towards a conclusion satisfactory to all the colonies, including ourselves, I say that Canada must not make the mistake of acting against the interests of Great Britain and her sister colonies, or the also fatal mistake of throwing herself against her own interests and antagonizing our commercial friends and interests in the United States.

Sir, before I sit down I would like to make a reference to the statements which were made by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) with reference to the public men of Nova Scotia. I do most thoroughly agree with him that Nova Scotia has produced bright and shining lights in her public life. The Howes, the Uniackes, the Johnsons, the Huntingtons and the Youngs are men of whom Nova Scotia may be proud. But, Sir, I know of no more complete vindication of the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford in his caustic references to the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.) than the speech of the hon. member for Albert, when, in referring to the many public men of note which Nova Scotia had produced, he (Mr. Weldon) deliberately omitted the name of Sir Charles Tupper, Bart. It was to him alone that the hon. member for South Oxford referred. He cast no slur, in the language I heard him use, on the public men of Nova Scotia. His reference to Nova Scotia producing the highest type of a boodler was confined to the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), and was backed up by evidence which he produced, from statements of A. W. McLellan, Tupper's colleague, and from the Government paper, the "Mail and Empire." I shall not prolong this debate further. I would not have risen to take up the time of the House except for two purposes. First, that, in my humble opinion, the statements made by His Excellency in opening Parliament are not based upon facts and are contradicted by the reports brought down to Parliament which I have examined. The statement in particular concerning trade and commerce is not correct, and I feel it my duty to call the attention of the House to it. Secondly, I desired to make a few remarks and put myself on record as early as possible with regard to the great question of the Manitoba schools. I shall reserve any further remarks on that subject until the Bill is laid before the House, and I trust that the Address which the hon. member for Westmoreland has moved in reply to the Address with which His Excellency opened Parliament will pass the House; and while I do not agree with the sentiments expressed by the mover, I join with the mover and seconder in thanking His Excellency for having opened Parliament and advised us in the way he did.

Mr. NORTHROP. The debate which has followed on the motion of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) has taken so wide a range that there is hardly any topic within the range of Parliamentary inquiry, to which one could possibly refer, that one might not very well say was urged in reply to some of the observations of hon. gentlemen opposite. Yet it seemed to me, with all due respect for those who have already spoken, that in one of the first sentences which fell from the lips of the hon. leader of the Opposition in opening the discussion, the keynote was struck which better expressed the relative position of the two parties with regard to the questions now before the House and country, than whole volumes of discussion could do. In referring to the Speech from the Throne, the first clause of which was a natural and proper clause, expressing gratitude for the bounteous harvest with which Canada has been blessed, the leader of the Opposition expressed his surprise in a sarcastic, almost sneering way, that the Address contained no reference to the National Policy. There is the key-note to show the distinction between the two sides of the House. We on this side, bend to no one on the other side in frank and grateful acknowledgment that all good gifts around us come from heaven above. We are ready to acknowledge our gratitude for these good gifts and to confess, that without the blessing of the Giver of all good, the labours of the husbandman would be in vain. But, at the same time we know that the old adage is true which says that Heaven helps those who help themselves; and, while we are thankful, as has been so well said, for the bounteous harvest with which the country has been blessed, we know, and gentlemen opposite know as well, that the harvest would have been thirty millions of bushels less but for Manitoba and the North-west. And we know also that if gentlemen opposite had their way and had carried out the amphibious policy that they advocated when in power and had constructed a line whereby, partly by rail and partly by water in the summer and partly by sleds and generally not at all in the winter, the products of that far country would have been brought to the sea, the harvest would have been thirty millions bushels less than it was. And we know that when the Conservative party restored to power had made arrangements for a railway and the railway company had exhausted the means they had been able to raise, in the construction of the road and found it necessary to return to Parliament and ask for a further loan, the Conservative party took its life in its hands, and, though fought with bitterness by gentlemen opposite, decided to grant that loan. Gentlemen opposite declared that that loan would never be repaid, but, in fact it was faithfully, honestly and promptly repaid, and the Canadian Pacific Railway constructed to that far land is one of the means which has brought about that bounteous harvest for which we return thanks to Heaven. When we listen to gentlemen opposite discussing political questions, I confess that the impression on my mind—and I say it with all frankness—is that they are trying hard to keep up their own courage by the arguments they use. The other night we heard the hon. member for King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden) learnedly discussing limited reciprocity as against unlimited reciprocity; and to save his life he could not see why a person favouring limited reciprocity should not be quite enthusiastic about unrestricted reciprocity. There again we have a singular suggestion of the lines dividing the two parties. Gentlemen on the other side are wedded to the idea of reciprocity. There seems to be some charm about the very name, so that they are ready at all times and under any circumstances to fall down and worship reciprocity. Now we are not in favour of reciprocity nor are we opposed to it. We flatter ourselves that we know enough about it to know that no person can judge of the effect of reciprocity unless he takes the articles to which it is to be applied one by one or class by class. We know that there are some articles in which, beyond all peradventure, it would be better to have reciprocity. Let me quote the case of barley as an instance. I suppose there is not a man in Canada but would hold up both hands in favour of reciprocity in barley. We have other articles, such as some of our manufactures, in respect of which it is perfectly certain a large portion of the people would think our trade would be injured by reciprocity. Then we have another class of articles, such as corn and coal as to which, in one part of the country reciprocity would be considered desirable while in another part it would be considered undesirable. And so we see that the Government that wishes to justify itself to intelligent men must consider all these articles and the various circumstances of every case with which they are called upon to deal. They must not fall down and worship an idol, even though it be called reciprocity, but must sit down and consider as business men in which articles reciprocity would pay and in which it would not pay, and even if we must lose on some to try to make a gain on others, and so try to have a balance in our own favour and secure such a bargain as would be fair, reasonable and profitable. Hon. gentlemen opposite have a peculiar way of expressing their views in this House. I was surprised to hear one of the leaders of the Opposition refer to the theory of protection in England and sneeringly turn to this side of the House and inquire whether that would be a good thing for us in Canada. It seems utterly impossible for these hon. gentlemen to fix their eyes on the country they are asked to legislate for. They have been so accustomed to cast their eyes on another country that they cannot fix their eyes upon the country really interested in any particular case. There is not a man in the Conservative party who would advocate protection in England for the benefit of Canada. It would be a different thing if the members of this party were in England and were called upon to consider it from the standpoint of England. We might then prefer to see it introduced there. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite, who, one would think, must be aware of this distinction, quietly discuss this question as if the only question was for us to say what would be the effect upon Canada if protection were adopted in England. In fact, one cannot help thinking the gentlemen opposite are somewhat like the hon. member for South Oxford, an ex-Finance Minister of this country who so touchily denied that he had ever supported commercial union. I am bound, of course, to accept his statement, but I think I am at liberty to say that, if he never advocated commercial union, he disguised his thoughts so successfully that everybody in this country and the people in the old country and the United States thought he supported commercial union, and that he even went so far that he thought he supported it himself. I am sorry, the hon. gentleman who has been here during the evening, has just left the Chamber, because I think that evidence can be given to satisfy even him that though, as I admit, he never did advocate commercial union, other people were justified in believing, however mistakenly, that he did. I have here a touching little work entitled "The Commercial Union Hand Book," published in 1888 by the Commercial Union Club established in the city of Toronto. This book contains the constitution of the Commercial Union Club of Toronto. It says:

This association shall be designated the Commercial Union Club—

And it gives the objects of the association, one of which is:

—to improve the trade relations and develop the industries of Canada by securing unrestricted reciprocity of trade between this country and the United States.

So this commercial union club, founded in Toronto and publishing a pamphlet or series of pamphlets to promulgate their doctrines, though calling themselves the commercial union club declare in their constitution that they are in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. Looking into this work I find that that which was thought best calculated to set forth the views of the club, because they give it the place of prominence at the very first of the book, is a speech by the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright, K.C.M.G., in the House of Commons on the 14th March, 1888. In looking through the speech I find that the hon. gentleman has again and again laid down his views as to what the true policy of this country should be. I find on page 15, for example, that he advocates the attaining of perfect free trade with the people of the United States. I find that on page 17 he says :

It is scarcely necessary for me to insist on the enormous advantage which unrestricted trade with the United States would be for us.

And so on through his speech again and again he is appealing for perfect free trade or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. But when I look further in this work, I find a speech delivered by John Charlton, not he of Michigan, of whom we have heard so much even in this House, but John Charlton, M.P. for Norfolk. Looking at his speech on page 131 of this precious work, we find that he first proceeded to explain the meaning of the term commercial union, and he then went on with his argument and proceeded to show that Canada would derive from unrestricted reciprocity certain advantages, showing that the terms commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity were synonymous. I then find this gentleman appealing to the farmers' institute, and they seem to have captured the farmers' institute, so far as one could judge. On page 165 I see that the executive committee of the farmers' institute of Ontario issued a circular in the following words :

That this executive committee do now proceed to take steps to form an organization in each electoral district or county in which farmers' institutes have declared by vote in favour of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, with a view of promoting the same between Canada and the United States.

In the advice which accompanies this circular, they urge their friends to take immediate action, and to form commercial union clubs, not only in every electoral district, but in every township if possible. I find a special declaration which the farmers are asked to sign :

We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, are of the opinion that it is necessary for the agricultural community and those directly interested in agriculture, to unite firmly and cordially to promote their interests, and by so doing to help every other legitimate interest in the country, since successful agriculture is the principal basis of true Canadian prosperity. Unrestricted free trade with the United States would be the greatest attainable boon for the farmers of Canada at the present time. We are further of the opinion that the necessity is so urgent that men should sink minor differences and agree upon united action to obtain the desired unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union.

I find in going through this work—I will not occupy your time in quoting—but again and again the terms are used synonymously, continental free trade, unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union. Now, Sir, I find a singular thing. In looking at an article on page 115, I find that Mr. Longley, Attorney General, I believe, of Nova Scotia, very strongly, of course, advocated this policy, and in advocating the policy, he had occasion to answer some objections urged to it, and the first was that it would lead to annexation. His answer was :

This must be considered from two standpoints—that of those who are rigidly opposed to political union with the United States, and those who are not. Belonging to the latter class—

Those who are not opposed to union with the United States—

And believing firmly that the interests of the Dominion of Canada are more identified with the continent of America than with any other portion of the world, this bugbear has no terrors for me.

Further on, at page 120, the same Mr. Longley says, in discussing this objection that it will tend to separate Canada from the British Empire :

I wish, above all things, to be frank in the discussion of this vital question, and, therefore, I am compelled to admit that there is a large basis to this objection.

I find, too, that Mr. Goldwin Smith, who was one of the principal movers in this club, and who, I believe, was a president of the club, he too in this same work, page 199, avows that he was in favour of union between this country and the republic to the south. He says :

I wish to be perfectly frank upon this, as upon other points, and not to leave it to be said hereafter that anything has been held back. It is my avowed conviction that the union of the English-speaking race upon this continent will some day come to pass.

Then he goes on to show why. Now, Sir, I think it is a little extraordinary that a gentleman who poses before this House as a descendant of the noble United Empire Loyalists, and rather claims credit for it, should be found in such company as we have found him, and that his speeches should be of such a character as have been quoted. We cannot blame him for having his speeches published, but we can blame him for making speeches of such a character that they would be published in such a handbook as this, in which the principal leaders of the movement openly avow that this policy is in the interest of Canada, and they think the interest of Canada is annexation to the United States. The leader of the Opposition, in some speeches delivered by him through the country, which are gathered together in an interesting little volume I hold in my hand, a volume which I am sure will meet with the approval of the hon. leader of the Opposition, edited, no doubt, by a friend, Mr. Ulric Barthe, and dedicated to Ernest Pacaud. There is every evidence of its genuineness, and every reason to believe that the ideas set forth here are those of the leaders of the Liberal party. In this little work I find the leader of the Opposition defining, according to his idea, what the policy of the Liberal party was, and he told us it was continental free trade, pages 563 and 564. I will not occupy the time of the House in reading all the quotations. The hon. gentleman pointed out why we could not have a commercial alliance with Great Britain. At that time he did not think of having free trade as it is in Great Britain. He pointed out why we could not have it, and he says :

If there is any man who believes that any such alliance between Canada and Great Britain can be formed upon any other basis than that of free trade, which prevails in England, that man is a "Rip Van Winkle," who has been sleeping, not only for the last seven years, but for the last forty-four years. Why, Mr. Chairman, the British people will not to-day go back on the policy of free trade which they have adopted, and Canada is not in a position at this moment, with the large revenue which she has to collect, to adopt any other tariff than a revenue tariff, at best.

So he goes on to say that continental free trade is the proper policy for this country. But I find this gentleman, Mr. Goldwin Smith, who, whatever faults he may have, is at least a scholar, at page 245 of this little work, sums up the meaning of these three terms, "commercial union," "unrestricted reciprocity," and "continental free trade," in this sentence :

"Commercial union," "unrestricted reciprocity," "continental free trade" are three different names for the same or nearly the same thing. For my own part, I preferred "continental free trade," but this was discarded because it seemed to threaten protectionists with the adoption of free trade as a general principle. "Unrestricted reciprocity" as a watchword was somewhat cumbersome. Thus we slid into "commercial union," which is, perhaps, more accurate, in this respect that it includes community of fisheries and of the coasting trade, which forms part of the scheme.

Now, Sir, those having been the views advocated by the hon. member for South Oxford, it is not surprising that he was invited to the famous banquet in the city of Boston in 1891, of which we have heard so much, and as to his utterances at which there appears to be such a difference of opinion. The other evening the hon. gentleman, in this House, refused to be bound by the newspaper reports, but said he would stand by the report of the Boston Merchants' Association. This book was obtained from Boston, so that we have authority for the statements the hon. gentleman made that night. Before referring to his statement, perhaps, one should, in justice, say that the hon. gentleman may have been a little flurried that evening, although he is somewhat accustomed to public speaking, for he was received with such encomiums as, I venture to say, no Canadian, no British subject, from the earliest times to that unfortunate night, ever received in any foreign land. He was introduced by Mr. President Lane. After reference had been made to the excellent policy which these gentlemen were advocating, which was commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity, the president went on to say :

Our Liberal friends, Fielding and Longley, of Nova Scotia,—

Mr. Longley is the annexation friend whose utterances I quoted a moment ago :

Our Liberal friends, Fielding and Longley, of Nova Scotia ; Davies, of Prince Edward Island ; Mercier and Laurier, of Quebec ; Cartwright, of Ontario, and hosts besides look to us, the people of the United States, for "the sign by which they shall conquer. "Shall we deny them?"

No wonder the hon. gentleman was probably a little flurried and excited when he arose to address this enthusiastic and friendly gathering. After he had described in glowing terms the advantages to the United States to be gained by the adoption of the policy he was advocating, he used these words, which are practically the same as quoted by the hon. member for Halifax the other night, and which I only give now since the hon. member for South Oxford himself appealed to this little work as the authority on the subject, so that after quoting from it, there can in future, I presume, be no manner of doubt as to the language actually used by the hon. gentleman that night. He said :

As to who on your side would profit most, I cannot speak as to the future. But in the present I take it the immediate gainers would be first, the whole northern belt of states which adjoin the Dominion of Canada, and, second, and especially, the group of north-eastern states, of which your good city of Boston may fairly be called the commercial capital. The advantages of your position for securing a very large part of our trade are great. You own, as I have said, much of our mineral wealth.

Many of our chief trade routes centre here. You are the natural shipping ports, especially in winter, for very large sections of our territory. You lie within easy distances of our chief cities, and of the most populous portion of our Dominion. In one word, given free trade with Canada, and you rise at one stride from the position in some respect of a frontier city, with no great extent of trade territory secured to you, to that of a central entrepôt with the practical monopoly of a great region behind you, whose commerce no man can take away from you.

It is hardly any wonder that when the feelings of our American friends had been excited, and naturally they must have been by this speech, utterance should have been given to this feeling in the legislature. In this little book there is the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, delivered in 1888, in which he refers to :

The two distinguished members of Congress, Mr. Butterworth and Mr. Hitt, both Republicans, both opposed to the party of Mr. Bayard and President Cleveland, introducing Bills, one of which is almost substantially on the lines of the resolution I have placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, the other of which goes further than I think it would be judicious or wise to go.

This is not very severe condemnation; one is substantially on the proper line, and the other goes further than it would be wise or proper to go.

But both in the direction of free trade and unrestricted reciprocity with Canada.

I have here the resolutions; but I am embarrassed in selecting the motion to which the hon. gentleman refers. Mr. Butterworth unfortunately introduced two resolutions, Mr. Hitt introduced one, to be found at page 29 of "Reciprocity Reports, Bills and Resolutions, 1888-91." On that page we find Mr. Hitt's resolution, and it is a strong commercial union resolution. There is no fencing on unrestricted reciprocity—it is introduced as "the following resolution to promote commercial union with Canada." If that is not the other, it is a resolution approved by my hon. friend, for it is one introduced by Mr. Butterworth. If the hon. gentleman chooses to take Mr. Hitt's resolution, I am willing to leave it there, and the resolution is to promote commercial union. If the hon. gentleman takes Mr. Butterworth's resolution, I must point out that there are two resolutions under Mr. Butterworth's name, one of which is found at page 39, and the other at page 175. At page 39 Mr. Butterworth, I observe, introduced a "Bill to extend the trade and commerce of the United States and to provide for full reciprocity between the United States and the Dominion of Canada," and at page 175 he introduced another resolution—this friend of Canada, admired so much by the hon. member for South Oxford—and I should like to take the time of the House for a few moments to call attention to this resolution or Bill. I venture to say that never in any civilized assembly was such an act of discourtesy, such a shamelessly impudent act proposed as this Bill by the friend of the hon. gentleman, Mr. Butterworth. It is a Bill authorizing the President to negotiate with respect to the unity and assimilation of the United States and Canada, or one or more provinces thereof. Perhaps Mr. Butterworth went a little further than the hon. gentleman would have gone; but I think even stronger language might have been used under parliamentary or any other etiquette. The Bill recites:

Whereas, the resources of the two countries supplement each other, and the arteries of commerce, both natural and artificial, are so interlocked and mutually dependent upon each other that they ought to constitute a single system, to be one and inseparable; and

Whereas, the commercial relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada are and have been strained and unnaturally cramped, and in a measure paralyzed, owing to the inability of the two governments to establish such a system of international trade and commerce between them as is essential to meet the requirements of the situation (and so on);

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to invite negotiations looking to the assimilation and unity of the people of the Dominion of Canada and the United States under one government, such unity and assimilation to be based upon the admission of the several provinces of the Dominion, or any of them, into the union of the states upon the same terms and equality with the several states now composing the Union,—

Great Heavens, here is generosity!

—and the assumption by the United States of the indebtedness of the Dominion of Canada, or a just proportion thereof, and such equitable terms and conditions as justice to the high contracting parties may demand.

I venture to say in the face of this reception in the United States of the policy which the hon. gentleman and his friends have been advocating for so many years it is not curious that Hon. Edward Blake, late leader of the party, published his famous Durham letter, to which reference has been made so frequently during the last few days. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House any longer in discussing the trade position of hon. gentlemen opposite, but since I have mentioned the name of Mr. Blake I will call attention to an argument used this afternoon with respect to his letter. From this side of the House an hon. gentleman called attention to the most damaging admissions affecting hon. gentlemen opposite contained in that letter, and I was surprised that an hon. gentleman occupying the high position of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), whose legal attainments and constitutional lore we all respect and admire, should have been led this afternoon to gravely discuss this question in the manner in which he did discuss it. He is a lawyer—had he been a layman there might have been some excuse—and he must have known in his own practice, as it is known in the practice of every lawyer of experience, the great difference between admissions coming from your own witness in the box or admissions made by a witness on the other side. Every one knows that tenfold weight is attached to the admissions of a hostile witness. Yet here is the late leader of the party opposite, who was heralded as the saviour of this country, a gentleman whom I agree possesses one of the brightest minds ever born in Canada, occupying the position he did as the leader of the party opposite, declaring in a most touching letter, in which you could almost see his heart break, because deprived of the goal of his life and driven from the life he esteems so much, that as an honest patriot he could not take part in the advocacy of the policy that he believed meant amalgamation with the United States. Yet the hon. gentlemen opposite see no difference between the force of evidence given by a member of their party or by a member of our party. They say : You believe what Mr. Blake said about us, why should you not believe what he said about yourselves ? Let me reverse the position. Hon. gentlemen opposite as a party expressed pride in the Hon. Edward Blake and believed what he said. We never asked the country to believe Mr. Blake's statements ; but they have asked the country again and again to believe his statements, and they themselves have professed to believe everything he said, with this one exception to which I have referred. If they believed for years what he said, why did they refuse to believe what he said in regard to this particular policy adopted by the party ? Let me read a portion of Mr. Blake's letter, because we cannot fail to see how Mr. Blake's heart was wrung when he sent in his resignation to the electors of Durham. He wrote :

There is much to be done and much to be prevented at Ottawa ; and, while deeply sensible of many shortcomings, it yet seems reasonable to suppose that the experience of all these years has made me less unfit than formerly for your service.

This is the sphere which offers the best prospect of usefulness to my country during that short remainder of life in which I would fain labour for her, as remembering that the night cometh when no man can work.

I have been anxious, then, to retain the seat with which the habits and interests of my life are interwoven, and to the duties of which I had arranged to devote the bulk of my time.

A renomination for West Durham would be my greatest prize ; the severance of our connection will inflict a bitter pang.

And so this hon. gentleman resigning the seat which to him was the prize of his life, abandoning all future political ambition rather than be forced to support the policy proposed, could say to hon. gentlemen opposite : Surely if you love your country as you profess to do, surely if the sole object of your policy is to promote the interest of the country and its welfare, when you not only find the Conservative party, but gentlemen on the south of the line entertaining the same idea, as well as the people in England, and even your own late leader declaring that such a policy would lead to annexation ; how was it that even if the party opposite believed the policy they advocated would not have such a result, they were willing to run such a risk as to pursue a policy that might result in annexation. A question was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne which it is advisable and necessary that any one attempting to discuss the Address should refer to—the Manitoba school question. I fully recognize that no question has come before this House which is more embarrassing to hon. members, which is more interesting to the community and which is more momentous to this country than this same question of the Manitoba school law. I must confess, Sir, I felt pained and humiliated this afternoon when the speaker who preceded me (Mr. Forbes), after describing the braggadocio way in which the Government had approached Manitoba, after describing the sunny way that should have been adopted, after referring to the attempt to interfere with provincial rights, after telling us that the Government last year had not the nerve to bring down the Bill which they wanted to bring down, after telling us that the Government should have made a proposition to Manitoba, and if they did so all would have been well, after he had so clearly shown in which way his bias ran, entirely on the side of Manitoba and thoroughly against this Dominion Government ; then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Forbes) very gravely suggested that he would offer himself as an unbiased juror to take evidence to investigate the facts of this case. He went further : so generous was he that he was willing to allow even four or five years, for this bright intellectual commission, of which I have no doubt he would be a shining ornament, to report. Well, Sir, I cannot help thinking that if he gained information in days to come at about the same rate and with the same accuracy he has gained information within the last four or five years, that commission would require not five years, but four or five hundred years before it could make up its mind to give an intelligent report. Sir, it is rather humiliating,—and at the same time it shows the difficulties of this question—that a gentleman, by profession a lawyer, should discuss this question in a deliberative body such as the House of Commons of Canada in the manner he has done. Some of his remarks were such as to lead one to think it impossible that he ever had even read the judgment of the Privy Council. He told us for example—he was a generous man, he was willing to do what was right between the parties—he told us, that if it were established that a wrong had been done there is not a single Canadian throughout the length or breadth of the land who would not be ready to right that wrong. It may be a question of opinion whether a wrong has been done, but I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Forbes), if there is a difference of opinion as to whether or not a wrong has been done, where is the tribunal which is to decide it ? We have the decision of the Privy Council, and let me ask the gentleman who so confidently suggested a commission, does he expect that this House could select a commission which would be more able to deal with this question than was the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Now, Sir, I venture to say that this question, although a very embarrassing and perplexing one, can be put in a nutshell as to its main facts. There are certain facts which cannot be disputed, and these facts being granted, there is very little room left for difference of opinion as to what should be done. I was rather pleased to find from certain remarks made by the hon. the leader of the Opposition that he is practically in accord with the Government in the line that they propose to take in regard to this question. It may be in the memory of hon. gentlemen of this House that in the year 1891, this matter was referred to the courts. At that time the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) supported the Government in this reference to the courts, and it evidently seemed to the leader of the Opposition that the member for East Durham should have opposed any such reference, and therefore speaking in regard to the question then before the House, giving his own views of the situation, he described the attitude of the member for East Durham as a very unwise one, and I take the liberty to give to the House his reasons for so thinking. In the "Hansard" of 1893, page 1981, the hon. the leader of the Opposition spoke as follows:—

Sir, what is the question that is referred to the Supreme Court? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) tells us that he approves of that reference. If he approves the reference to the Supreme Court, does he forget that that reference is to decide whether or not the Government have the power to interfere with the legislation of Manitoba?

There is no doubt at all, Sir, that that was the question:

If, in his opinion, the Government should not interfere with the legislation of Manitoba, why, in the name of common sense, should there be a reference to the Supreme Court at all?

And I agree with the leader of the Opposition. If the Government were satisfied that under no circumstances should they interfere with Manitoba, I say not only was there no necessity to refer the case to the Supreme Court, but I say it would have been a most exasperating contempt of this House, and it would have been a most impudent proceeding on the part of the Government to put this country to the expense, and to put the people of this country to the anxiety of this long and weary suspense, if they, from the beginning had made up their minds that no matter what was the result there would be no interference. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) continued:

Not only should there not be a reference to the Supreme Court under such circumstances, but I say—

That is "I the leader of the Opposition" say:

—that the reference to the Supreme Court under any circumstances is most dangerous, because, if the Supreme Court should decide that the Government have the power to interfere with the legislation of Manitoba, and the Government should not obey the legal mandate which they themselves have sought, there would be a powerful and a rightful agitation in some parts of the country against the Government.

So Sir, I say I am pleased to find that we have the leader of the Opposition on record in support of the attitude of the Government. The Privy Council having decided that the Government have power to deal with this appeal, and the Act stating clearly, as the judgment of the Privy Council showed, that the Government only had power to hear the appeal if this wrong had been done; I say, Sir, that the leader of the Opposition is thoroughly in accord with the Government as to the principle—although of course as we expected, he lags a little way behind because all the facts have not yet caught up to him. Suppose we would for a moment consider the contention of the leader of the Opposition that this matter should be referred to a commission; what in the name of common sense would the commission have to do. This case has been threshed out before the courts for four years, and with the exception of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Forbes) who last spoke, I would be inclined to think there was not a man in the whole Dominion who did not know what the facts of the case were.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I am glad to see one gentleman respond with a "hear, hear," who does understand the question?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps you could tell the House, because no one on that side has told us yet, what the issue between you and Manitoba is?

Mr. NORTHRUP. When the time comes and when the Bill is before the House, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) can rest assured that we will be then in a position to discuss details which we need not discuss tonight. Then for the first time he will find light dawning on him. I am surprised that during all these weary years the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) was so blindfolded—and there is none so blind as he who will not see,—that not a single ray of light entered upon him. Now, Sir, supposing a commission were appointed, as asked by the leader of the Opposition, that commission would be nominated to investigate something. Is not his opinion about that the same as was his opinion about the reference to the Supreme Court? If it were found that there was anything wrong, would he be willing to right it? Would it not be an extraordinary thing for members of this House to vote for a commission to ascertain if there was anything wrong, when they had already made up their minds that they would not right that wrong if it did exist? Surely the leader of the Opposition, being in favour of a commission, believes that if there are wrongs he is prepared to right them. It seems to me, Sir, that when hon. gentlemen opposite appeal to this House and appeal to the country in the strains which we have heard to-night, we on this side have ample reason to complain of the unfair way in which the case has been presented by them. The last speaker (Mr. Forbes) referred in dulcet tones—no I do not think he ever referred to anything in that way—to the cry of provincial rights and the coercing of Manitoba. I wonder if the hon. gentleman ever took the trouble to read the Manitoba Act at all. I wonder if he ever noticed that while there are certain rights given to the legislature of that province in regard to which they can adjudicate, as well as certain other rights are given to this Parliament with regard to which it can adjudicate, and while each of those parliamentary bodies is supreme in dealing with matters within its own sphere, there is one single peculiar subject which stands on a different footing from any other subject. And while I would have thought that the mere reading of the statute would have been amply sufficient for a legal gentleman like my friend, it convinces me that he did not read the judgment of the Privy Council, for they very fully and exhaustively go into this matter to show, as they say, that this cry that it interferes with provincial rights, is, to use their own term, fallacious. The judgment shows there can be no interference with the rights of Manitoba if this House acts within its allotted sphere, and if this House goes beyond the sphere allotted to us, then the legislation is ultra vires and it can very soon be annulled by the courts. Whatever disposition is made of this matter by this House, I claim, that those who say we are acting in contravention of provincial rights are not doing their duty by the people of this country, and not doing their duty by the minority of Manitoba who appeal to them for relief. Sir, there is one matter which I might ask your pardon for referring to, because I would have thought it so simple that every member here would be in accord with regard to it, and yet there does seem to be differences of opinion as to the position we occupy in this House in dealing with this or any other matter. We hear members continually speaking of their position here as if this member was the member for South Oxford, and that one the member for North Grey, and as if they represented only those ridings, and were to be governed only by the feelings of the people in them. I venture to say—and I think the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will bear me out in this—that there is no warrant whatever for such a theory of parliamentary government. The real truth is that to the constituencies is left the trust of selecting the representatives, but, once these are selected, they take their seats as representatives of the people of Canada. So that every member of this House sits here representing the minority in Manitoba as fully as the man elected by their suffrages, and is as much bound to do his duty to them and to all the people of Canada, irrespective of what part of the country he comes from or what particular electors send him here. It is well laid down that the reason a man is elected by a particular constituency is that he is supposed to be better acquainted with their needs, and can look better after them; but, at the same time, in regard to all legislative matters coming before this House, he represents every man in this country. Therefore, I say that in dealing with this important question, dangerous as it may be, we are bound, every one of us, to be true to ourselves, true to our country, and true to those who send us here; we are bound to bring to bear upon it the best judgment and intellect we can command, and honestly and fairly do what seems to us right, in the interest of our country, be the consequences to ourselves what they may. I know that in dealing with this question, different gentlemen will look at it from different points of view; but I lay it down broadly that the real ground from which we are to view it is that we are here to act in the interests of our country. So acting, we are to bear in mind certain principles that are to be applied. There is an old saying, which was true many years ago, and which I have no doubt is equally true to-day—that righteousness exalts a nation. A nation no more than an individual can afford to be guilty of a breach of faith, or guilty of dishonesty in its dealings between parties. If it is, it will have to pay the penalty, and a heavy penalty. We can approach the solution of this question from one of two sides. If we 215 members of this House come to its consideration, each one trying to secure simply such a solution of the difficulty as will leave him safe in his seat, regardless of other considerations, I venture to say that endless trouble will come to this country. But, on the other hand, I believe the people of this country respect the man who tries to do what is right. I believe they would rather see a man go wrong, while endeavouring, according to his best lights, to do right because it is right, than to see a man trying to do right in a feeble, halting way, because he thought his action would pay. Looking at the question in that light, how does it arise in the first instance? People discuss it as if this House had passed the Manitoba Act in the same way as we pass Acts of Parliament day by day. No greater mistake could be made. The judgment of the Privy Council settles that point. Their lordships say:

The terms on which Manitoba was to become a province of the Dominion, were matters of negotiations between representatives of the inhabitants of Manitoba and of the Dominion Government. The terms agreed upon, so far as education was concerned, must be taken to be embodied in the 22nd section of the Act of 1870.

So that at that time Manitoba was not part of this Dominion, and we could not make it so. That is a point which cannot be too much impressed upon the people of this country. We have heard a great deal of the rebellion of Manitoba against the Dominion of Canada in 1869. There was no rebellion against the Dominion. The Dominion at that time had no right to take possession of that country, and the troops were not sent there to make it a part of the Dominion. They were sent there to preserve law and order in that portion of Her Majesty's dominions. The Dominion of Canada could not and did not obtain possession of that country until it sent representatives here, until the Dominion mutually agreed with them upon the terms of union. Having done that, we can do what the Privy Council, by their judgment, could not do. They could only look at the intent of parties to the union as that intent is expressed in the pages of the Act: they could go no further. We can go further; we can go behind the Act and consider the circumstances and conditions under which it was passed; and we have only to look at the debates of that day to find that separate schools existed and were intended to continue. Now, personally, I am not in favour of separate schools; I do not like them. I think it would be better if all the children of this country could be brought up together in one kind of schools. But in the same way I think it would be better if all people went to one church; but the difficulty is in deciding which church it will be. There have been many people in different ages of the world who had that same idea, and some of them tried to carry it into effect; but a dismal failure they made of it in every instance. While I am not here to defend separate schools, I think there is a question before us far and away beyond the question of separate schools. I think the greater question by far is whether the honour of Canada is to be maintained. While I do not believe in separate schools, I would sooner see a separate school in every township of this Dominion than to see the plighted faith of my country broken and her honour tarnished. The hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) stands up in this House and asks how this Government can pretend to interfere with Manitoba when the Privy Council held the Act of 1890 to be intra vires. One might well suppose the case of the minority to be hopeless when a legal gentleman would dare—and I use the word advisedly—to address this House in terms like that. Did he not know—if he did not, he could not have read the judgment—that the single point decided in the Barrett case was whether the Public Schools Act of 1890 prejudicially affected any right or privilege which the Roman Catholics by law or practice had in the province at the union. It was held that it did not affect any such right or privilege, and, therefore, the Act was valid. But the appeal which we are called upon to consider could not have arisen if the Act had been invalid, for then it would have been upset by the courts. This appeal arose from the subsequent proceeding founded on the validity of the Act; and when the minority asked for a remedial order from the Dominion Government, the government of Manitoba protested and declared that if the Dominion Government presumed to act in accordance with the petition of the minority, their act would be ultra vires. The Dominion Government accordingly said: We will send the question to the Privy Council first. So it was that the case went to the Privy Council, for that body to decide whether or not this Government had power to act; and I submit that under the decision of the Privy Council the Dominion Government had power only if the rights and privileges had been infringed upon. An argument was used last session in this House, and it has been repeated again this session, that we are not bound by the decision of the Privy Council to act. One word as to that. I think discussions frequently arise in regard to a word which is used in two senses. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) last year made a clear and incisive legal argument to show that this Parliament was not bound by the judgment of the Privy Council, and I must say that I agree with him in the sense in which he used the word "bound." He used the word legally in the same way as it would be used in the case of a man bound to pay a note; that is in the sense that the courts have power to make him pay whether he will or no. But there is no power which can compel this House to do what is right. We can do what is wrong if we see fit; and in that sense we are not legally bound by the judgment of the Privy Council. Let me submit a parallel case which will illustrate my idea of the way we are bound. If the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) were in my part of the country, and if a client was to come to my office and say to me: this hon. gentleman came into my store with a friend, who wished to buy a suit of clothes, but whom I was unwilling to trust, and the hon. member for Queen's said: Give him the clothes, and if he will not pay, I will—merely making a verbal promise. If my client asked me whether the hon. member for Queen's was bound, I would say most certainly he was. Not that I was ignorant of the provision that no man can be held to a verbal promise of that kind; but knowing the hon. gentleman from Queen's, and knowing that he would not take advantage of a quirk such as that, and that even if the case were brought into court, he would defend himself on some reasonable ground and not raise such an objection as that, fatal though it was, I would feel perfectly warranted in assuring my client that the hon. member for Queen's was bound and that he was perfectly safe. So, in this case, we are not legally bound in the way that we can be forced to legislate on any particular line, but we are morally bound, we are bound in honour, and that, in my humble judgment, should be a far higher and more invincible bond in such a Chamber as this than the mere legal liability to have the judgment enforced. I must apologize to the House for the time I have taken. I had no intention of taking so long a time, but this is a subject on which I feel very strongly, for it does seem to me there has never been such a subject in this country on which people will talk apparently very learnedly without knowing anything under the sun about the matter in question. I have full confidence that when the people come to understand the true question submitted to them, they will rise to the question, and will say that it is the duty of this House to keep its plighted faith, no matter what the consequences may be. It would be an unworthy and humiliating argument to address to the House, and I do not address it in the hope or desire of its having any influence here, but merely to show one of the results that might follow through a body such as ours failing to do its duty in such a case as this, assuming for a moment that our duty is to grant a measure for remedial legislation. I am not committing myself to any particular piece of legislation. I would be false to my constituency if I pledged myself to support any Bill that might be introduced, and I shall wait until the measure is laid on the Table before pronouncing myself with regard to it; but I am simply giving expression to the general principle that where there are wrongs they ought to be righted. But in such a question as this the people of the country are interested in this way. Assuming that we refuse to deal with it, and supposing, as is quite possible, and as was pointed out by the hon. leader of the Opposition in a speech which presented the circumstances under which the original clause crept into the Confederation Act—a speech I would advise every member of this House to read, a speech made by the hon. leader of the Opposition in 1891, which will repay perusal by any one, in which he pointed out what action the people of Quebec might take—supposing they were to abolish the Protestant Board of Education. They have, beyond question, the legal power to do that, and if they did to-morrow, all the Protestant dissentient schools in Quebec would be under the control of the hierarchy. Everybody would admit that that would be contrary to the faith plighted at Confederation. Every one would admit that of all men in this country the most deceived and betrayed would be the Protestants of Quebec, and if they came to this House asking to have the rights granted to them by the British North America Act restored. Imagine the position we would be in if we were obliged to say to them: you are right, the rights guaranteed to you by the constitution have been taken away, we ought to be in a position to right these wrongs, but unfortunately last year we laid down the principle that we would not interfere with any province, and therefore, admitting that our duty is to right these wrongs, we have so tied our hands that we cannot do so. What would be the effect to this country if such a thing should happen? We have a country which we are trying to build up, and every one knows it can never attain the future it is evidently destined for except by promoting harmony and union among the various classes and creeds which compose it. I do not wish to enter upon such a vexed question as that, but the House being small to-night, it seems to me we are speaking as if in a small family party. We very often hear the cry that this is a Protestant country and all that sort of thing. Well, the census shows that 5-12 of our population are Roman Catholics, and 7-12 Protestants, including atheists, Jews, Gentiles, and all outside Roman Catholics. Looking at the question, practically, not as Protestants or Catholics, not as French or English-speaking Canadians, but from the proper standpoint of Canadians, how are we ever going to build up a country such as this if we are to have 5-12 on the one hand, and 7-12 on the other hand eager to grasp each other by the throat? We might as well give up the task at once and realize that we cannot become a nation but must be swallowed up inevitably and absorbed by some other people. We might as well destroy ourselves and make the best bargain we can with Mexico, or Guatemala, or Venezuela, or some other more civilized country rather than have the five-twelfths and seven-twelfths of our people ready to get at each other's throats. Because I feel this is the one great question that has arisen since Confederation which is likely to bring about this terrible result, and because we cannot accomplish our destiny unless this animosity be made to disappear. I have kept the House much longer than I had any intention of doing.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 22nd January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, certificate of the election and return

Of Malcolm Colin Cameron, for the Electoral District of West Huron, Ontario.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Malcolm Colin Cameron, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of West Huron, Ontario, introduced by the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright and Mr. McMillan (of Huron.)

THE BANKING ACT.

Mr. JEANNOTTE (Translation) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 12) further to amend the Act respecting Banks and Banking. He said: The title of the Bill is very short and self-explanatory. The object of this Bill is to amend the Bank Act, to the effect that henceforward no director of any bank shall borrow from the bank a higher sum than that of the paid up shares of the capital subscribed by him. Such is, in substance, the whole Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Powell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, I intend confining my remarks almost exclusively to the subjects referred to by His Excellency the Governor General in his Speech from the Throne. One of these was his congratulations to the country that the commissioners who had been appointed to delimit the boundary of Alaska had already reported to their respective governments, and that in a short time action would be taken by these governments on the report, when I hope this vexed question will be finally settled harmoniously between the respective governments. Another question referred to is the abundant harvest we have had during the last year, and for which the Government express their gratitude to God. I think we have great reason to be grateful for the great number of blessings we are receiving every year outside of the harvest as well. We have great reason to be grateful that we have such a grand country of which we are so proud. We have reason to be grateful more particularly that the people in Manitoba and the North-west Territories have had their efforts so abundantly blessed by Divine Providence and are rejoicing in abundant crops. Reference is made in the Speech from the Throne to the development of the mining interests of British Columbia and to the visit of His Excellency the Governor General to that province, I think we should be grateful to His Excellency for taking so deep an interest in this country and more particularly for the interest he takes in British Columbia, where he has invested a large amount of money for the purpose of testing the cultivation of fruit, thus stimulating that industry. I had an opportunity last fall of visiting the Coldstream estate belonging to His Excellency, and was highly gratified with what I saw there. Several hundreds of acres are under various fruit trees, such as apples, pears, apricots and various small fruits, giving employment to a large number of men in the section in which the estate is situate; and I must say that these people all bore the highest testimony and spoke with the highest respect of the efforts which His Excellency was putting forth for the advantage of that province. One thing which struck me more particularly in British Columbia was that it is a province containing a vast amount of wealth, that it had vast storehouses of wealth which only required a key to open them. One of these storehouses is its mineral deposits, another is the vast wealth contained in its forests, and a third its teeming fisheries. While admiring that province on account of its enormous wealth, I could not but think that this Government had adopted a very bad policy for the development of those interests. When we consider means for increasing the wealth of the country we are forced to the conclusion that the efforts of the Government should be directed to the development of the country along the lines of its greatest natural productiveness. If we followed this policy we should seek to develop the mineral interests, the fishing interests and the lumbering interests of British Columbia. In order to accomplish this we must have two things especially—cheap capital and cheap labour. Dear labour is one of the drawbacks of which they complain in British Columbia. Many large employers of labour find it necessary, in order to hold the market in which they sell, to employ a large number of Chinese. The reason is that white labour is so dear, and the reason why white labour is dear is that living is dear in that province. And it is just here that we see the application of the National Policy. Our Government has been pleased to impose very high duties upon the absolute necessities of life, so that, before these necessities reach the consumer, they are very high in price. Then the labourer must be recouped with higher wages than he would otherwise require. If it were possible for each of these labouring men in the mines, in the lumber woods or in the fisheries to save $50 a year by reason of the cheapening of the necessities of life, the working capital of the province would be increased by a very large amount and more men could be engaged in developing the resources of the province than can be employed under present conditions. Let me point out what the people of that province pay in duties upon the actual necessities of life. I have a few figures here, compiled from the Trade and Navigation Returns, and if I am wrong in any point and if a British Columbia member should succeed me in this debate, I trust he will point out to the House my mistakes. I find that the people of that province pay $149,000 in duties on breadstuffs alone. On meats of all kinds they pay $29,000; on butter and cheese, $12,400; on vegetables, $13,000; on fruits, $40,200; on furniture, $4,000; on coal oil, $29,000; on woollen clothing, $19,600; on cotton clothing, $14,700; on rubber clothing, $3,000; on boots and shoes, $7,300; and on rubber boots and shoes, $4,400. Every hon. gentleman will see that the articles here enumerated are absolute necessities of life. On these twelve classes of goods, the British Columbia taxpayers paid into the Dominion treasury no less than $325,600 last year. And, Mr. Speaker, you must bear in mind that the duty is only one part of the expense. The people of British Columbia consume far more than they import from abroad. The increased price upon the articles either imported from Eastern Canada, or produced in British Columbia, which increase is caused by the high duties, if added to this $325,000, would make a sum of nearly a million dollars, to be paid by the eighty or ninety thousand people in British Columbia upon the necessities of life. According to my way of thinking, it would be well if all these duties, or at least as large a proportion of them as is consistent with the raising the necessary revenues of the country, were reduced so as to place at the disposal of the workingmen of British Columbia cheaper goods. If this were done they would be able to compete to better advantage with Chinese labour. It is impossible to bring the white man down to the standard of living of the Chinaman. But the cheaper you make means of living which the white man needs and must have, the better he is able to compete in the market with the Chinaman. We very well know that the National Policy in no way benefits the great industries of British Columbia. It cannot protect the mining interests, because the product of the mine are exported to other countries. The National Policy can in no way protect the fishing industry, because the fish are exported to foreign markets to compete with fish from other countries, probably produced under more favourable conditions. The lumber interests cannot be protected because no lumber comes in to compete with the British Columbia product. But what would be the effect of cheap labour? Cheap labour means cheap production, and cheap production means more trade, and more trade means more development and more development means greater prosperity, which prosperity would diffuse itself throughout the whole population. Now, the hon. members from British Columbia know very well that when they sell the products of their mines, especially coal, they have to send that coal into other markets. They must overcome the embargo which is imposed upon our coal in the country to which, mainly, it is exported. And though we are not to blame for the duty the other country imposes, it is wise for us to afford such facilities as will enable our coal producers as far as possible, to overcome the difficulties imposed upon them. Out of 650,000 tons of coal exported from British Columbia to other countries, about 20,000 went to other countries than the United States. In competing with the coal of California, Oregon and Washington, it would be a great boon to the coal producers in British Columbia if the labour were cheapened. The same thing is true of lumber. British Columbia is a great producer of lumber, for the province is blest with magnificent forests. I understand that they export lumber to many foreign countries; they send it all the way to Australia, to China and Japan, and even to Africa. Is it not important, if the lumbermen of that province are to compete in these far-off markets that they should be afforded every facility to produce as cheaply as possible. A large proportion of the fish taken in British Columbia are sent to the English market, there to come into competition with fish produced under more advantageous conditions—labour being cheaper and the place of production nearer the market. I do not think that any member from British Columbia will take exception to the principles I have laid down. Of course, I met farmers in British Columbia, and they are protectionists, just as are the farmers in England. The farmers in British Columbia do not produce enough to feed the people there, and the higher the duty and the greater the impediments in the way of producing breadstuffs, the higher price the people of the valleys are able to realize. They call that in British Columbia a "valley policy," but when you speak to these gentlemen with regard to the interests of the whole country, they say that what is wanted is freer intercourse with other nations. I have no doubt but that the two hon. gentlemen who are looking at me so intently will agree with me in every statement I make in this respect. Now, Mr.

Speaker, passing from British Columbia, I come to another question which has been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, namely, the reception which His Excellency received when he visited the Indian reservations. I was very much gratified and pleased to learn that the Indians are loyal. I suppose, from the Conservative standpoint, they are even more loyal than the Liberals of this country. But I am pleased that the Indians are loyal, and why should they not be loyal? The great Queen whom His Excellency represents here, has always taken a deep interest in the Indians in all parts of her dominion; our noble Governor-General here takes a deep interest in them also, and, as being a representative of that noble lady who sits upon the throne of England, we could not but expect that they should treat him loyally and heartily; and I am glad to hear that they are in that spirit. Then there was a reference made to the condition of the Indians, to their schools, and to their attainments. Now, I am very much gratified that the Indians have been attended to by the Government. The Government must bear this fact in mind, a fact which they do not always acknowledge, and I hope that I may have the ear of the Minister of the Interior just at this point. He has sought to make this country believe that if the Liberal party were in power, the Indians would not be attended to as well as they are attended to now. He said yesterday that if the Liberals came into power they would not change the present policy. Well, it may be so. I do not find fault so much with the policy of the Government in connection with the administration of that department as I do with their extravagance, and with the cost which their administration has entailed upon the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, you know, I think, that I have brought this question before the House on previous occasions, and I have pointed out that the objection of the Liberal party to the administration of the Department of Indian Affairs is, that in the past, at least, they have expended more money than was necessary to accomplish the ends which they have accomplished; and we gave this fact, that for every 46 cents of money expended upon the Indians, 54 cents are spent among the officials; in other words, out of every 100 cents spent by the Government in the Department of Indian Affairs, 46 cents go to the Indians, and 54 cents are expended among the officials. Now, this is wholly and entirely different from the expenditure of the Liberals when they were in power. Of course, we had not to deal with these Indians at that time, but we dealt with the Indians of British Columbia; and out of an average of $25,000 expended every year during the regime of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, all went to the Indians, with the exception of $6,000, showing that 75 cents out of every 100 went to the Indians then, instead of, at present, 46 cents going to the Indians out of every 100. It is with the administration of the department that we are finding fault, it is with the extravagance of the department rather than with the policy of the department, because we are all anxious that this country should deal fairly by the Indians, because all they had has been taken from them by this country. Now, leaving that matter, I come to another question which has been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and that is the Mounted Police. I met a number of the Mounted Police when I passed through that country, and I must say they are a noble looking body of men. They appeared to be well equipped and well dressed, and were neat and cleanly in their appearance. But we do not find any fault with that, of course. We have said in the past, and we still say, that the Government has been too extravagant, has spent too large a sum, that the officials in connection with that department receive too much, that a large proportion of the money that is paid by the people of this country does not go so much to the benefit of the Police as to fill the pockets of the officials. You will remember, Sir, that when the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was at the head of the Government, there was probably more need of a Mounted Police than there is today. The people were more scattered, they were not grouped together as they are today, and therefore, they were not able to protect themselves as well as they are in 1896. But, during that time, all these difficulties were overcome, and Mr. Mackenzie administered the police force of the Northwest Territories efficiently, with about one-half the money now expended. Let me give you the figures exactly. Last year there was expended $646,000; and the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, during the last year of his ministry, spent $335,000. So you will see that this Government spends about double the money, and the efficiency and the greater number do not counterbalance the increased expenditure over 1878. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words upon another subject mentioned in the Speech from the Throne; I shall endeavour to speak, weighing well the words I use, upon the Manitoba school question. It is, in my opinion, one of the most important questions that have come before the Canadian Parliament for settlement since Confederation. I think that if ever there was a question in regard to which men required to study well their words, and to study well their actions, this question requires the exhibition of those qualities. If this question is not settled right, it will continue to be a cause of irritation throughout the length and breadth of this country for a great many years; therefore, we should consider, apart from political leanings, apart from prejudice, apart from the support of any party, what is best to be done, in order to settle this question properly and amicably.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

ably. The state of this question, at the present time, as I understand it, is as follows:—In 1871 the local legislature of Manitoba, in its first session, passed a law establishing schools for the different denominations in that country. Among those denominations, as I understand, were the Roman Catholics on the one side, and the Episcopalians, the Methodists and the Presbyterians on the other side. It was deemed wise by the legislature of 1871 that special privileges in regard to education should be extended to all those classes. Those privileges were continued to be extended to them until the year 1890, when the same legislature deemed it its duty to withdraw those special privileges that had been granted to all denominations alike, and to establish, as they say they have established, a national system of education, which they say is just and equitable to all classes of the community. Now, the Minister of the Interior said last night that those privileges were conferred upon the minority by the constitution. I think he made a slip when he said so. In 1871, as he will remember—and if I do not construe his words aright, he is in my presence and he can put me right—it was the local legislature that gave these special privileges to the various denominations. The constitution of 1870 is entirely silent in regard to what kind of schools there should be; and so you see, Mr. Speaker, that the privileges were extended, not by the constitution, but by a legislative enactment of the first legislature of Manitoba. But the constitution made this provision, that if the privileges enjoyed by any party or any class under the local legislature, in regard to education, were taken away from them, they had a right to appeal to the Governor General in Council for redress of grievances. You know, Sir, that this last point was contested in the courts, and was finally settled by the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in their judgment, in which they set forth that the minority had the right to appeal, and that if the Governor General in Council felt disposed to interfere in the matter, they had jurisdiction to interfere and to remove the alleged grievance. That is the position in which the question stands now. It is held by some parties to the controversy that the judgment of the Privy Council determined the action of this Government, and that the constitution made it imperative upon this Government to interfere. I think they have given up that contention. If not, I think it will be well for me to read a statement made by Lord Watson when the question came before the court, in order to show that the whole matter as to interference or non-interference, is at the discretion of the Government. If the Government wish to interfere, the Privy Council said, you have power to do so; and if you do not wish, you need not do so, for action is entirely at your discretion. Let me read the statement made by Lord Watson when the question was before the court. I hold in my hand a copy of the Manitoba school case, the proceedings of the court in England, and I find on page 193 Lord Watson is reported as having spoken as follows:—

I apprehend that an appeal to the governor is an appeal to the governor's discretion. It is a political and administrative appeal, and not a judicial appeal in any proper sense of the term; and in the same way, after he has decided, the same latitude of discretion is given to the Dominion Parliament. They may legislate or not, as they think fit.

That is the opinion of one of the Lords of the Privy Council, and it shows that there is a discretionary power with the Government; or in other words, it is entirely a matter of policy, and it is claimed on the part of Manitoba that every scintilla of evidence procurable in the case, both with regards to facts and law, should be obtained before any step is taken by Parliament. One of the hon. members said last night that all the facts were brought before the Privy Council in England. Everybody knows as well as I do that all the facts were not brought before the Privy Council. All the facts bearing on the legal side of the issue were brought before the court in England, but there are a hundred and one facts on which hon. members on both sides of the House are speaking every day, upon which no one member possesses fuller knowledge than another. One party makes one statement and another makes a statement exactly the opposite, and what we want to know in Parliament, which is the jury in the case, is an official statement of the facts, and not what one party or the other simply asserts. Let me show the House that hon. members do not at all agree as to the facts. One party to the case makes the following statement: the separate schools were inefficient. How can we know that they were inefficient? I have no personal knowledge of the condition of the schools there. Has any hon. member opposite more personal knowledge than I possess? Another contention made is: the teachers were improperly educated. Again, it is contended: the schools were not properly inspected. Again: the schools were not kept open a reasonable time each week, month or year. Again: the education of the children in the schools was greatly neglected. Again: the national schools are fair and just to all parties. Again: the school property has been justly settled. These are the contentions put forward by one party to the controversy. Is there any hon. member who can testify from personal knowledge that these statements are true or false? Well, then, if hon. members cannot testify whether those statements are true or false, is it not plain that it is necessary to institute some proceedings whereby we may place on record testimony on the points, so that the people when called upon to adjudge this case, or, in other words, to act as the jury to settle the matter, will be in possession of the evidence. What argument is based on these contentions? Manitoba submits this argument, and it is a plausible one: special privileges were granted to the minority in 1871; they have so abused those privileges that it is right and just and in the interest of the country and in the interest of education to withdraw those special privileges. Of course if the contentions are false, the argument falls to the ground; if the premises are wrong an argument cannot be built upon them. The other party to the controversy declares that they can prove that all those contentions are wrong, and, therefore, the argument has no effect. What does the other party say? This is the other side of the question: the separate schools were well-equipped and conducted. An hon. gentleman, speaking in this House last year and representing the minority, said that the separate schools in that province were as well conducted as the Protestant schools. Is there any person who can give personal testimony as to which of the two parties is right? Then, again, another contention is that the curriculum of the separate schools is as high, and the teachers are as well qualified as Protestant teachers. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), speaking last year, made the statement that the separate school curriculum was higher and that a greater number of subjects were required than in the Protestant schools. I again ask whether there is any hon. member from Quebec or Ontario who can rise and state from personal knowledge which of the two contentions is the correct one? Again, a further contention of the minority is this: the schools were kept open as required by law, and the education of the children was not neglected. Last year the hon. member for Provencher declared that the separate schools were kept open according to law, and during as many days on the average as the Protestant schools. A further contention of the minority is: the property of the separate schools was confiscated by the legislature, and a great injustice done to the minority. Who can testify from personal knowledge as to this point? It was asserted that the arrangement in regard to the school lands was just and equitable to all the parties. The other party to the controversy states directly the opposite; and are we going to be called upon to decide upon this question when we have not sufficient information or personal knowledge as to which of the parties is correct. The minority further contends: the schools are Protestant, and, therefore, it is unjust and unfair to ask the children of the minority to attend them. If that be a fact, then there is an injustice done to the minority and it should be corrected. But the other party asserts; they are not Protestant schools, they are non-sectarian, and have been acknowledged as such. The late Archbishop Taché wrote a pamphlet containing nearly fifty pages in which he sought to establish that they were Protestant schools. I ask any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, can he testify from his own personal experience that he has the knowledge upon which he can decide that one party is right and the other party wrong. Why should we be called upon at this juncture to decide this important case in the absence of so many facts and points of testimony? Sir, what do the Manitoba people ask us to do in the face of these contradictory statements? We are told in Mr. Greenway's answer to the first remedial order. He said, that he believed the Government were not in possession of all the facts, and I doubt very much if they are in possession of all the facts. He told them further, that if they were not in possession of all the facts, they had not the basis upon which to come to a proper conclusion, and he suggested the following mode of procedure. Mr. Greenway writes:

We believe that, when the remedial order was made, there was not available then to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools. We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order. Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall cheerfully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.

Now, Sir, could there be anything more just than that? Could there be anything more reasonable than to ask this Government who are attacking the institutions of Manitoba and charging that the local government dealt unfairly with the minority; to ask them to appoint a commission of their own choice, send the commission out to get the entire facts which the Manitoba government are ready to lay before them, and to take testimony under oath so that the people of this country may be able to judge properly from it. In the face of that fair and honest request, this Government have refused to grant that commission, and we hear them every day in this House say that they are in possession of all the facts, when the truth is they have no personal knowledge of these facts at all. Again, Mr. Greenway said: That the facts thus gathered by the commission would form a foundation upon which in all probability a reconciliation would be brought about and a final settlement made. Notwithstanding that invitation, we have yet to hear that the Government of Canada are willing to give the people of Manitoba who are on trial, an opportunity of clearing themselves. Suppose, Sir, I was charged with a crime and that I was placed at the bar and a jury empanelled to hear my case. If I claimed from that court and jury an opportunity to place before them all the evidence bearing upon the alleged offence with which I was charged, in order that I might show there were surrounding circumstances and conditions which would justify my action; is there any court or jury in the world that would refuse to allow me to put myself in the best position before them? It is just the same with Manitoba in the present instance. They claim that certain charges have been made against them, and they are prepared to submit the whole matter to an impartial commission which will gather evidence and place it before the Parliament of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why we should not interfere at this particular time. This Parliament, as was pointed out a day or two ago, does not represent the electors of this country to-day. We were elected on lists prepared in the year 1888. Those lists are now nearly seven years old, and hundreds and thousands of electors who were on them then are not on them now, and hundreds and thousands who were not on the lists at that time, are on the lists at the present time. Therefore, in deciding an important question like this which bears so heavily upon one of our provinces, which assails the autonomy of that province and attacks its educational system, does not every gentleman here honestly think that it would be well to submit the whole case to the electors of this country and to ask their judgment upon the facts, when the facts were before them. If that were done there would be a decision on this question which would be far more just than can be given by this moribund Parliament during the present session. I would advise the Government—although I do not think for a moment that my advice will be taken—to appoint a commission to investigate the whole matter, to place the evidence upon record before the people, and ask them to decide whether it is in the best interests of the whole country to interfere or not to interfere. I venture to say that if this Government and its supporters coerce Manitoba without a full investigation of all the facts, the time is not far distant when the Government will regret the day; when the minority will regret the day, and when the whole country will regret the day that remedial legislation was passed in this House to coerce Manitoba under the present conditions. Sir, if a remedial law is passed in this House it will be the final settlement of the whole matter. In a few years that law will become inapplicable to the new conditions of a new country, but there is no power on earth that can modify or change it. This being a final settlement, the Federal Government cannot amend it, and the local legislature has no power to amend a federal law. As a large number of the people of Manitoba are opposed to the operations of remedial legislation of that kind, the condition of the Roman Catholics in Manitoba will be far worse than if they threw themselves upon the generosity, and the justice, and the magnanimity of the majority in that province, as they do in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. If there has been any injustice done to the minority, they had better press their claims upon the Manitoba legislature. Sir, in the present condition of our knowledge of the facts I am not in a position to give my ipse dixit upon this question. My anxiety is that the whole matter should be fully and completely elucidated and the evidence placed before the Parliament of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I think probably I have said enough on the Manitoba school question. You, Sir, know my opinion and my intention. I trust that every member of this House—although I can hardly hope so,—will vote against remedial legislation, at least this session, until all the facts are known and until every scintilla of evidence is obtained. Then in the future, after all the evidence is before the people, and after the people have an opportunity of expressing themselves upon this great political question—because it is a political question,—we will be in a position, not to take the ex parte statement of this one or that one, but to look to the evidence and ascertain the true facts. We will then be in the same position as a jury would be, to bring in a verdict of guilty or not guilty as the evidence may warrant. Now I come to another question to which reference is made in the Speech—that is, the condition of the militia of this country. We are told that it is the intention of the Government to make provision for the better arming of the militia and to strengthen the defences of the country. Well, I am sure that there is no man more willing than I am to do all that is possible to place the militia on a war basis if necessary. I am perfectly willing to vote money enough to place them in an efficient condition, and I think there is not a single member on either side of the House who will refuse to do that. But we have been granting large sums of money for many years towards the maintenance of our militia, and I ask, has that money been properly expended? Have the Ministers of Militia adopted any special reform with a view of putting the force on a proper basis? I think not. There were some severe charges made against the department some years ago by men in a position to speak with high authority on this question—men who had nothing to say against the Government as a Government. I do not know whether they were Reformers or Conservatives—but men who spoke on behalf of the militia and with a full knowledge of its condition. Now, I would like to know something about this. I do not see the Minister of Militia here. I think he is in the other House. And just here let me say that the Government have been changing the Minister of Militia too frequently. How is it possible for a man to enter the Militia Department, introduce reforms for the purpose of making the militia efficient, and carry out those reforms, if several months afterwards he is replaced by some other man who knows nothing at all about the militia? About the time the present Postmaster General left the office of Minister of Militia, the militia was described as being in a very wretched condition. The chief commanding officer, from England, who had no object other than to point out to Parliament that the militia required their direct and instant attention, made a report on the state of the militia in 1891; and what did he say? Now, it is worth while listening to this, because I am addressing a good many militiamen, and I am not giving any personal information of my own. I have no personal information on the matter at all; but when I find such statements as those made in the report of Major General Herbert, I am constrained to come to the conclusion that the militia has been mismanaged, and that a great deal of the money expended on it has been wasted. Here is what he says in his official report of 1891:

The rural corps are very deficient in instruction; but their organization is still more defective. Money is spent for instruction by officers incapable of imparting it. The arms and equipments are, for the most part, obsolete.

I have no personal knowledge of the matter, and I ask, is that true? Will any of the Ministers present who have more knowledge than I have, say whether that is true or false? If it be false, the Major General should have been condemned for putting such a paragraph in his report. If it be true, the Government are to be condemned for not bringing the militia to a higher state of efficiency. If they had not money enough to do so, they should have come before this House and asked for money to give the force a proper equipment. Was it proper to appoint officers not capable of imparting instruction, and to spend upon such offices the money of the taxpayers of this country? It was not. That state of things went on for four years. During that time we had one or two more Ministers of Militia. The present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba then became the head of the department. I suppose he went to work to introduce reforms, but he was only in the department a very short time when he was removed. Then we had as Minister of Militia the present Minister of Justice, and I believe he was the right man in the right place. I believe that last year he went through the whole militia department from one end of this Dominion to the other, and consulted different militia authorities in order to ascertain the needs of the force. But now, at the end of a year, he is removed from that position and placed in another, and at present we have a man at the head of the department who knows no more about the militia than I do, and I was never in a militia corps in my life. More than that, instead of being in this House to answer any questions that may be put concerning his department, he is sitting easily in another House on a red-cushioned chair. Now, there were some charges made by a man who I am sure did not desire to throw any obstacles in the way of the Government improving the militia, who had experience in the force for many years, and who wrote a paper on the subject; and you know, Mr. Speaker, that when a man writes a paper to be read before an institute, he weighs every word he uses and every opinion he expresses. Here is what Colonel R. H. Davis stated in a paper which he read before the Militia Institute in the city of Toronto in 1895, four years after Major General Herbert had made his report:

We have no corps fit to take the field, nor organization for a campaign, nor stores to supply it. The Militia Department knows nothing about the rural militia, and cares less. Then, darkness and ignorance, or worse, have prevailed for years. The country well knows, and the department should know, that the militia is not only disorganized, but demoralized.

Is that true? I do not know whether it is true or not; and I ask, in the absence of the Minister of Militia, if any of the Ministers who have the facts at their disposal will get up and say whether it is true or not. If they do not, we will expect an answer from them at some future time, when the Estimates are under discussion. That is not all. I have a statement here from another high authority. The Militia has an organ called the "Military Gazette," which discusses questions relating to his department, and is the mouthpiece through which the militia officers of Canada speak to the country and to the Government. In the issue of that paper of January, 1895, the following is found:—

The militia has never been in a worse condition than it is to-day. Ignorance, incapacity and systematic neglect are the prominent characteristics of the present militia system.

Is that true? If all these statements, made before the country by high authorities are true, how can the Government come to this Parliament and ask for more money to place the militia upon an efficient basis? If they are not true, it is the duty of the Government to deny them, and to deny them upon authority. If they are true, it is the duty of the Government to acknowledge them and to see that they do better in the future than they have done in the past. Now, the militia, instead of improving, is getting worse. In 1891 the following were the charges made by Major General Herbert:—First, deficiency of instruction;

second, defective organization ; third, incapable officers ; fourth, obsolete equipment. You will suppose that these faults would have been corrected, but at the end of four years the following charges are formulated against the militia :—First, that it is demoralized ; second, that it is disorganized ; third, that it never was in a worse condition ; fourth, that darkness and ignorance have prevailed for years ; fifth, that the Militia Department knows nothing about the rural militia and cares less ; sixth, that there is no corps fit to take the field ; seventh, ignorance, incapacity and systematic neglect characterize the department. Now, if these hon. gentlemen were loyal, our militia would not have been left in that inefficient condition, but would have been placed on the highest level of efficiency on which we could afford to place it. If sufficient moneys were not voted by Parliament, hon. gentlemen opposite should come to Parliament and say so. But you will notice, in all these charges brought against the efficiency of the militia, not a word is said about too little money being voted. All the fault found is with the ignorance, incapacity and systematic neglect of those having control. I hope that the hon. gentleman who has this department to manage will endeavour to give satisfactory reasons to the country for its inefficiency, and show, if possible, that that inefficiency is a thing of the past, and that the spending of money among officers incapable to impart instructions is a thing of the past. If it be shown that there is not sufficient money voted to make the militia effective, there is not a gentleman on this side of the House who will refuse to vote what is necessary. Now I come to another question to which reference is made in the Address. It is a very important question. I do not know whether I shall express the sentiments of my own friends on this question, but I have strong convictions upon it, and intend giving expression to those convictions this afternoon. I refer to the fast line of steamers. In the Speech from the Throne mention is made of England's contribution to the enterprise. I am still of the opinion that this proposed enterprise is a waste of public money, without a reasonable expectation of an adequate return to the taxpayers. We have at present a fairly equipped steamship line crossing from this side to the old country. That line has given satisfaction to the people for many years, and there has been no particular fault found with it. The present lines are more than capable of doing the business across the Atlantic. The average number of passengers who cross every year is only one-third the capacity of the steamers that carry them. Therefore, it is not to supply sufficient accommodation that the fast line of steamers is sought to be established. Even if the fast line were established, nine out of ten passengers would go on the slower lines. A large number of people who go to England are not able to go on the most expensive line, and would rather go over as cabin passengers on a slow line than as steerage on the fast line. We also know that the majority of passengers who leave Canada to visit England during the season are not particular about getting to Liverpool twenty or twenty-four hours before they would on a slower line, and, therefore, you will find that a large portion will still patronize the slower lines. Canadians who wish to go to England during the winter will certainly not take a long railway ride to Halifax in order to get on a steamer there, simply because it belongs to a Canadian line, but they will go by rail to New York in twelve or eighteen hours, and then take a steamer equal, if not superior, to the one at Halifax. I have no doubt that if I were going to England in the winter time and went by New York, I would find a good many Liberal-Conservatives on the same train with me, leaving their own fast line behind, and taking the line most convenient. But we are told that this fast line is going to be of great service in carrying freight to the old country. If we only look into that statement for a moment, we will see its fallacy. True, it will carry some freight. But we are told that it will carry immigrants. This we were told by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson). Does the hon. gentleman think that immigrants are going to choose the most expensive line to travel by, one that will charge double the fares of inferior boats ? Then, we are told that our butter, eggs, cheese and other articles will go on these steamers. What great difference will that line make ? The other steamers have cold storage accommodation just as the fast line will have, and the only difference will be that the fast line steamer will probably reach the English market twenty-four hours sooner. But, in that case, the slow vessel might strike the high market, and the fast vessel the low market. Where is the advantage ? I hope that those who reply will point out what their opinions are on this particular point. Again, those who ship by the fast steamship line will have to pay more freight. The average cost of a trip of one of these swift boats to England and back is estimated from fifty thousand dollars to sixty thousand dollars. Therefore, you must understand that the cost of a slower boat, going three or four knots an hour less would not be more than one-half. And it is reasonable to suppose that it would carry freight, passengers and make the same provisions for their accommodation as the fast line does, at one-half the rates charged. So that I do not see any advantage that can accrue to the exporters of farm products by the establishment of this line. Are we supposed to make provisions for the few passengers that come from the United States or from Australia, or from this country, and who want to go by the fast line ? Are we to make contribution for those from the taxpayers of the country? If they want a special line of steamers, let them pay for it out of their own pockets, and not out of subsidies voted by the Canadian Parliament. We are told, again, that our business interests require this line. Well, we have carried on business for many years and, I think, very successfully. I think we have the reputation all over the world of being as sharp in business as other people. It has never been shown that we have lost any money by not having swifter steamers. If we have business requiring particular despatch, we have the cable at our disposal. When we require goods from the old country, we very frequently order them months before they are required, so that for these there is no necessity for this fast line. Again, Mr. Speaker, we have more ships upon the ocean than we have traffic for. I hope you will pay particular attention to some figures I have taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns indicating that our vessels even now, are not fully employed. The number of vessels entered in ballast in the port of St. John last year was 743—that is, that many ships came into the port of St. John in one year without any cargo; and there were 332 that left the port of St. John without any cargo. In the port of Halifax there were 51 ships entered from abroad without cargo, and 18 ships left the port in ballast. In Quebec, 115 ships entered the port without cargo, and 63 had to leave in the same condition. Even in the city of Montreal, that great port occupying the most advantageous position in our country for the trade of the west, the commercial metropolis for this Canada of ours, no less than 39 ships came in from various countries without cargo, and 3 ships left the port without cargo. Let me give you the figures for the whole Dominion. Entered inwards in ballast at all the ports of the Dominion in 1895, 7,040 ships; outwards, 7,118. Does not that indicate a terrible condition of our trade and commerce? And yet it is proposed that we shall pay $750,000 a year for ten years, and $500,000 a year for the next ten years to establish a line of steamers to compete with these vessels that are not getting sufficient cargo to pay a reasonable profit, either on the inward voyage or on the outward voyage. Because of these facts, and many others that I could give you, I intend to oppose that proposition when it comes up. The next point in the Speech to which I draw attention is that referring to the condition of our trade and commerce. The country is congratulated upon the "evidence of increasing activity"; not upon the increased activity, but upon the evidence of it. I am very glad to learn that there is that evidence. I am glad to know that there are a few rifts in the clouds of adversity through which come some rays of light. It is yet too early in the year for us to prophesy. The rifts may close up, but I hope that they will widen, and that we may have more light at the end of the year than we have at the present time. But we know what the commerce of last year was, and the figures show that it has fallen off very largely. Let me give a few figures of our trade with the various countries with which we dealt. I would like to know if the Ministers are satisfied with the condition of things these figures indicate. Is it not enough to prophesy in glowing terms that we are going to be rich. We can better consider the trade of the current year when the year is finished. In 1894 we had an aggregate trade with Great Britain of $107,000,000. In 1895 that trade fell to $92,000,000, a decrease of 32 per cent. I would ask some of these gentlemen who have been striving to make Great Britain our market to say what has been the cause of this falling off. I suppose they will say that it is because of the failure of the crops in Canada. No doubt that is the cause, to a large extent. But what, then, have they to give as the reason why our trade with the United States has increased from $84,844,000 in 1894 to $95,932,000 in 1895, an increase of 8 per cent? Does not that completely answer the argument so frequently used that the United States is no market for Canada, that that country produces so many articles of the same kind as are produced here that the American market can never be worth anything to us? But the figures show that, notwithstanding the high tariff wall between this country and the United States, notwithstanding that our trade is decreasing with almost every other country with which we deal, our trade with the United States is increasing. Will any of these gentlemen who went into North Ontario and made speeches with regard to the United States not being the market for Canada explain that, here where they can be answered? I emphasize this point in order to give an opportunity to hon. gentlemen who may succeed me to answer the question, why it is that our trade with the United States is increasing, while there is such a decrease in our trade with England, into whose markets we can send everything we produce free of duty. Then take the case of France. In 1894 we had a trade with that country of $3,082,000. In 1895 that trade fell to $2,921,000, a decrease of 5 per cent, and this notwithstanding the French treaty. But I suppose the French treaty had not come into full operation in 1895, and the figures may be partly explained upon that ground. Our trade with Germany in 1894 amounted to $7,888,000, but in 1895 that trade amounted to only $5,421,000, a decrease of 31 per cent. Our trade with Spain showed a reduction of 2 per cent; that with Portugal, a reduction of 8 per cent; that with Italy, a reduction of 18½ per cent; that with Holland, a reduction of 38 per cent; that with Belgium, a reduction of 44 per cent. Even our trade with Newfoundland, one of our sister colonies, a colony with which we should trade very largely, showed a reduction of 15 per cent. Our trade with the West Indies increased. The hon. Minister of Finance went to the West Indies a few years ago and spent a good deal of money and a good deal of time on the trip. We have established between these islands and the ports of St. John and Halifax two lines of steamships which are largely subsidized by this Dominion. If there is any part of the world our trade with which ought to increase, it is the West India Islands, for they produce many things that we require, and we produce many articles, the necessaries or comforts of life, which are much in demand there. Our trade with the West Indies increased 22 per cent last year. Our trade with South America fell off 29 per cent. Now consider our trade with China and Japan. We remember the predictions that were made a few years ago of the large increase in our trade with these countries, particularly when the Canadian Pacific Railway was completed and two beautiful steamers were placed upon the route between Vancouver and Yokohama. We were told then that this trade would go forward with leaps and bounds. Has that prediction been fulfilled? Not at all. We find this last year that our trade with that far-off country has been reduced by 5 per cent, and with Switzerland, by 6 per cent; while our whole trade has been reduced from $230,619,000 to $218,819,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw attention to this fact. These figures do not prove anything against the National Policy, nor do they support it. But hon. gentlemen last year, and among them the Finance Minister maintained that increase of trade between this country and other countries indicated the stimulus which the National Policy gave to the various industries of this country. Now, if the National Policy accomplished that last year, why has it been a failure this year? You see, Sir, how many false arguments are used, how many unfair opportunities are taken to make everything tell in favour of the National Policy. One hon. gentleman speaking last night—and he spoke very well, but his arguments were not very conclusive to my mind—actually maintained that the exceedingly large crop, the magnificent crop, the abundant crop of Manitoba, was indirectly owing to the influence of the National Policy; and while the Government expressed gratitude to God for the abundance He had sent to the people of Manitoba, this hon. gentleman tried to steal away from the gratitude that God was getting, and give a part of it to the National Policy. Now, Sir, it is a fact that the trade of this country has increased largely over the trade in 1875-76-77. But why has it increased? Is it because of the National Policy? We have half a continent now peopled that was unsettled in 1874-75-76. We have now produced in Manitoba 30 million bushels of wheat, 30 million bushels of oats, barley and pease, and other cereals, by people who were not in that country in the former period; and that volume of trade, that volume of production, has been thrown into the great stream of exports that has been flowing from this country to other countries. Yet there are hon. gentlemen who stand upon the public platform and say that this is all owing to the National Policy. Would they come down to details, and show us wherein the National Policy has stimulated our exports? No, Sir; on the other hand, I say the National Policy has been a drawback. It has been a stumbling block, it has been a high fence against the interests of Manitoba. If the people of that province had less taxes to pay and a fairer opportunity, with the beautiful climate they possess, with the wonderfully fertile land that they own, and with the energy and pluck and skill which distinguish them, the province of Manitoba would be far more prosperous than it is to-day. Sir, there is no denying that fact. What we want to do, Mr. Speaker, is to lessen the burden of taxes upon those western people, to give them a chance, to give them as good an outlet as possible by which they may take their products into the markets of the world; and if that is done, it will be a speech on immigration which will far exceed in results the speeches and the literature that are sent to England in various forms. But if we continue the application of the National Policy to these new provinces, rest assured that the development of British Columbia, and the development of the North-west Territories, and the development of Manitoba, will be retarded. Therefore, I am opposed to the National Policy as applied to those provinces, and I maintain that it has produced results the opposite of those which its framers promised us. There is no country, in my opinion, so great as this country. We Liberals sometimes are accused of defaming our country. Sir, I challenge any man to put his finger upon one paragraph, one line, one sentence, in which any member of the Liberal party decried this country. We say that British Columbia is a great province, we say that all the provinces are great, but what we complain of is that in the endeavour to develop those great interests and open up those great store-houses of wealth, the Government have used a key that does not fit the lock, and consequently they have not been able to open up those storehouses of wealth. If the Liberal party were in power they would adopt a policy of developing those resources of wealth, of increasing our trade. Now, Sir, I want to refer briefly to the promise which has been made by my hon. friend who is looking at me, the Minister of Agriculture. He says that he is going to introduce a policy by which the farmers of this country will be largely benefited. I hope he will have every aid and every help that every man in this country can give him, but I hope at the same time, that the farmers will not again be deceived. They have been deceived, and badly deceived. For the last seventeen years the farmers of this country have been waiting for what has been promised them, they have been waiting for some of the advantages of the National Policy. But I have never yet met a farmer who would, speaking apart from political leanings, speaking upon the broad principles of what he believed to be right, stand up in an audience and say that the National Policy had put one dollar into his pocket. I hope, however, they will be able to say so, after my hon. friend has formulated his policy, after he has crystallized it into practical shape, and placed it upon the statute-book. But don't let it remain there, Mr. Minister of Agriculture. Let its practical effects be felt, let the farmers feel it in their pockets and in their everyday operations, let them realize that the policy is bringing to them increased prosperity and increased prices over and above what they would receive had this policy never been inaugurated. If you inaugurate a policy that will in any way benefit the farmers of this country, no class of the people will be more grateful than the farmers. Now, Sir, I want to say in conclusion, that the farmers of this country have been waiting, and waiting and waiting, and now they have come to the conclusion that they will not wait any longer. They are tired of waiting, and they are going to put gentlemen into power who will give them something more quickly than after a period of seventeen years. In a few months, when my hon. friends opposite will go before the electorate of this country, and particularly before the farmers of this country, the farmers will ask them this question: How is it that, according to your own figures contained in the census of 1891, the manufacturers of this country have made 25 per cent profits upon their invested capital, whereas the farmers, under the influence of this so-called National Policy, have not made one farthing, not one farthing. Take the manufacturers of Ontario; allow them 10 per cent on the wear and tear of their capital, and they made 25 per cent net. From the milliner who conducts her business in a little town to the large manufacturer in the city, every one of them, from low to high, made 25 per cent net upon their capital. Do you believe it? Let somebody say whether they believe it or not.

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Well, then, if you believe it, is it not a wrong principle to exact high taxes from the farmers who have not made one solitary cent upon their capital, and make them pay high prices for all they consume, in order that you may give the advantage to parties who have made 25 per cent upon their capital? Then, there is another side to that question. If they did not make 25 per cent, then all the figures of the census lie. The Government must take one horn of the dilemma or the other. If the figures in the census are correct on this point, then each manufacturer, from the milliner up, has made 25 per cent upon their invested capital. The other alternative is that the figures are false, and if the figures are false, then what satisfaction is it to hear the Minister of Agriculture, or the Minister of Finance, or any other gentleman, stand upon a public platform and quote from the census to show the wondrous development that has taken place in the country, when you acknowledge that your own figures are not applicable to the very parties to which they are intended to apply? I conclude my remarks by thanking hon. members for the courtesy they have shown to me while I have addressed them.

Sir JAMES GRANT. Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate on the Address the subjects under consideration have already been frequently gone over. However, there are some points that I wish to touch upon briefly, although I am thoroughly aware of the fact that at no time has a more comprehensive, instructive or promising Speech been presented to this House than that which has been brought down on the present occasion. Its first important sentence is with respect to the bountiful harvest. We are very much gratified indeed to learn that throughout the length and breadth of Canada this year we have had a remarkable harvest. That is largely owing to our climatic conditions, to the fertility of our soil, to the improved implements and machinery. Our agricultural colleges and agricultural schools, and emissaries that the Canadian Government are now sending to every part of the Dominion are instructing our agriculturists in the practical principles to be carried out in farming, and they have proved to be largely the means of securing a bountiful harvest. We in Ontario fancy we have all the best agricultural lands, we also believe that the province of Manitoba has magnificent areas, but I find here a very striking fact, and it is one which is worthy of recognition, and it is this, that even in British Columbia there is a very fine area of farming lands. Touching on the Kootenay region, Capt. Hamilton, who is now in that country, speaking of its capabilities, says:

I was talking of Kootenay, and he told me of the capabilities of small farms even in that district of rocky, mountainous character. He ranches and mines, but he is staying in Victoria for a little change just now with his wife. Three millions of dollars, said he, is a low estimate of the output of the West Kootenay district during the past year. The district comprises the mining camps of Slocan, Trail Creek, and Nelson, and this amount will probably be more than trebled next year, for last year but one smelter was in operation, and two more are nearly completed.

It is extremely gratifying to think that this great region, formerly described as a "sea of mountains," has any area of agricultural land in it at all. When we look at other paragraphs in the Address we find, in speaking of British Columbia, the next sentence adverts to the mineral products of that country. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that at no time in the history of Canada has more remarkable development taken place in that province than during the past twelve months. I think it must be a source of gratification to the people living on the Pacific slope to be aware of the fact that the Government has taken steps in the right direction by appointing a representative from that province to guard over their interests in this Dominion of Canada. I am glad beyond measure that the hon. gentleman has arrived here, and we are perfectly satisfied from the knowledge he possesses of that country, its capabilities and requirements, and his thorough acquaintance with the people, that he will do everything in his power to advance the best interests not only of British Columbia but of the Dominion as a whole. I find with respect to the Kootenay region a statement in a recent English journal of a most remarkable development which has taken place, and it has been placed on record in no less a journal than the "Canada Gazette" in London. It states:

A West Kootenay newspaper gives the following as a list of companies incorporated since January 1st, 1891, to carry on mining enterprises in West Kootenay. It is difficult, if not almost impossible, at present to make a complete list, but the one given will give some idea of recent activities. The list includes forty-four companies, with total capital of $32,000,000 odd, the capital of the companies ranging from $100,000 to $25,500,000.

And still, Mr. Speaker, we are told that the people of Canada are leaving this country and are going to the neighbouring republic. Only a few days ago the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) said the country was retrograding, in fact was going to the dogs. Is that an evidence of it? Very far from it. We know perfectly well, on looking into the history of the country, that it is really making remarkable development. The leader of the Opposition paid a visit a short time ago to the Pacific slope, and when there he did not fail, with the great erudition he possesses and the power of eloquence he is known to inherit, to describe very graphically the resources of the province and to congratulate the people of the country on their progress and development. But at the same time, did the hon. gentleman say a word about the Conservative party, that they were largely instrumental in bringing about this result, that they constructed the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that when that company was attacked on the floor of the House the Government came forward in a manly way with public assistance, and gave an extra grant when the company was in trouble and might have become almost bankrupt. And if this had not been done, where would have been the Canadian Pacific Railway to-day? May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, who opposed that grant to the road? Did not hon. gentlemen opposite? When I had occasion to introduce a Canadian Pacific Railway Bill twenty-two or twenty-three years ago I was criticised and looked upon as not being in possession of the right ideas with respect to the development of the country. But has not the road accomplished great results, has it not built up a great country, has it not developed remarkable resources, and has it not convinced the civilized world that there are not five millions of people to be found in any portion of the universe who have done more during the past seventeen years than the people of Canada, led by the Conservative party? Did the leader of the Opposition, when visiting the Pacific slope, and speaking about the Dominion, say anything about the line of steamers the Government have established, with the assistance of a grant from the Government of New South Wales? No; he had not a word of encouragement to give to the people or to those in charge of public affairs. He knows, however, as well as I do what the Liberal party has done. I am not here to convince him on that point. He is thoroughly impressed with the fact, and if he does not recognize it and acknowledge it, he mentally admits that the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada has done more for the development of the country than ever was accomplished by any body of men on the floor of this House. I wish to make one or two observations in regard to British Columbia. We have there a magnificent country. We have there fisheries unsurpassed. We know perfectly well the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the hon. member for Pictou, when in charge of the fisheries of the Dominion, conserved the public interests more than any other man has done. He guided and directed the people with a view to the protection of the fisheries. We know from the history of the past that even in tributaries flowing into Lake Ontario there was an ample supply of salmon. Where are those fisheries to-day? The supply is fished out. How is it with the salmon fisheries in Scotland? Rivers that abounded with salmon fifty or a hundred years ago have as large a supply to-day as then. And why? Because the laws of Great Britain have been carried out in their entirety. If the late Minister made enemies in British Columbia, if any man engaged in the salmon fisheries felt so disposed towards him, what was the reason? It was because he thoroughly and fully intended to guard those fisheries and preserve them to the people of British Columbia as well as to the Dominion; and forsooth, notwithstanding that fact, the leader of the Opposition, I heard it stated, led the people there to infer that if the Liberal party came into power, they would regulate the law so that the fishermen might fish out the Fraser or Skeena or other tributaries, whose fisheries to-day give a large revenue not only to British Columbia but the Dominion at large. With respect to Indian industrial schools, I am very much pleased to find, from the statements contained in the Speech, they are making gratifying progress. There is nothing that tends to elevate and improve a community as much as education does, and Canada is not backward in this respect. We find that our Dominion spends annually about $12,000,000 for the education of 1,000,000 children, fitting them for citizenship. We have built 16,150 public schools, we have 14 universities, 41 colleges, 300 high schools; we have over 3,000,000 volumes of books in our libraries for the improvement of our intellectual power and about $1,208,000 are annually expended on books and stationery. In view of this, it is very desirable that the copyright laws should be looked after and put into operation at once. In connection with this question of education there is one very important point I wish to dwell upon. It is my opinion that those who have charge of education in the various provinces of this country, where we have a large agricultural population, should take care that the education is of that character which will not drive our people away from the farms, but will tend to keep them there. This is an age in which we require education to be of a thoroughly practical character. It is an age of specialism. It is an age in which a man can never know too much of the subject in which he is directly concerned. But, when our young people in the rural districts became educated in everything that does not pertain to the cultivation of the soil, or the raising of cattle, the young men and young women leave the farm, take to some of the learned professions, come into our cities and towns, and becoming dissatisfied with their lot make their way to the United States or somewhere else. Education should be of a thoroughly practical character and should be confined as much as possible to those subjects in which the young are directly interested. There is nothing more injurious than educating the common sense out of the people, instead of educating common sense into them. Look at this House and look at this country, and see who are the men who made this great Dominion. They were self-made men, men who educated themselves, men who commenced with very little, men who did not desire to occupy their father's shoes until they fitted them, but who were willing to grow up with the country in proportion to the development of the country. If we educate our young people to cultivate the soil, we will be educating them in an honest industry calculated to forward the material interests and prosperity of the Dominion as a whole. Mr. Speaker, I wish for a moment or two, to refer to the fast lines of steamships. When this subject was brought before the House

some time ago, on a resolution introduced by the Finance Minister, we know that notwithstanding the character of this great project it was opposed by our friends of the Liberal party. They said: Oh, forsooth, the idea of bringing a fast line of steamers up the St. Lawrence, why they would run aground; they could not run fast enough, and the navigation is not equal to the occasion. But the late Minister of Marine (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) pointed out that the report of Commodore Bayfield, and the report of Capt. Gordon who had spent many years in investigating this subject proved beyond a doubt that fast steamers could navigate the St. Lawrence as well as they could the Atlantic, and that there could be no impediment in that direction. Sir, I approve very highly of the remarks addressed to the House by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), when he said that a steam service to be efficient, must come from a non-tidal port to a non-tidal port. This fast Atlantic service is attracting very great attention at the present time. In the motherland they are thoroughly alive to the vast advantage England has derived from the improvement in her mercantile marine. I find in a recent work by Henry Fry, the following very remarkable statement:—

Fifty years ago, England controlled one-third of the carrying trade of the high seas; but now it controls more than one-half, or literally possesses 56 per cent of the carrying power of the world. Its tonnage of vessels increased from 3,310,000 tons in 1840 to 10,330,000 tons in 1892, or 210 per cent. The increase, as naturally would be expected, is mostly in favour of England. Taking the world's cargoes, according to port entries, to be, in 1892, 230,190,000 tons, England carried 115,020,000 tons, or 461 tons per seaman.

England has advanced in the most remarkable manner through not being afraid of development in that direction. Do you suppose that England would have the magnificent connection she has to-day with the outside world in commerce, if it were not for her mercantile marine? She never was afraid to undertake an enterprise of the character now proposed by Canada, and for that reason the Right Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, one of the most progressive statesmen of the present age, when the subject came before the Imperial Parliament offered to give us half the amount contributed by Canada, that is, half of $750,000 annually. That is because the people of England know that Canada must have a fast line of steamers on the Atlantic. Canadians are not going to be retrogressive instead of progressive. The hon. gentleman from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) has got hold of the wrong idea. We have a fast Pacific steamship service now; we have a railroad service from the Pacific to the Atlantic, but what we want in addition is a fast Atlantic service with England to complete the circuit. When this last link is completed the communication between India, China, Japan, Australia and South Africa will eventually pass through Canada to England instead of going via the Suez Canal. Do you suppose for one moment that people are not alive to the importance of passing through this Dominion with its advantages from a climatic point of view, instead of passing through that hot and arid and dry atmosphere of the Suez Canal which is enough to stifle the energies of any individual? I would ask our farming community if they are not in favour of this fast steamship service? Do they not wish to have their products delivered in the English markets as rapidly as possible? The more rapidly you can bring your canned and frozen products and agricultural products of every kind into the markets of England, the more perfect will be their state of preservation and the greater will be the demand for them. Rely upon it, the day is not far distant when we will have that fast Atlantic service to build that great oceanic and interprovincial trade of this country which will make Canada the centre of the trade of the world, and advance the prosperity of the labourer who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow. If our trade is developed in that way, the entire material interests of our country must be advanced. Again, we know that by carrying out this project we will show that we are a progressive people. When any great scheme for the advancement of Canada is propounded in this House by the Liberal-Conservative party, no matter how good it may be, no matter how well it may tend towards the advancement of the country, it is quite enough for the Conservative party to propound it, in order to have antagonism raised against it so as to try and thwart the idea of the Canadian people that the Conservative party is the progressive party in this country. In connection with this fast service, let me speak of the Pacific cable. That cable is going to be an accomplished fact at no very distant time. Was ever a public more excited than were the English capitalists within the last few days, and why? Because the Aden-Zanzibar cable was fractured, and those who have invested millions of dollars in South Africa could not receive any intelligence from that country, and even the British Government could not get its messages sent over. Rely upon it, Mr. Speaker, the time has now arrived when the people of England are aware of the important fact that to centralize British power, and to protect the Empire, both at home and abroad, lines of communication must be constructed across British territory, and deep in the great seas where they cannot be attacked by an enemy. Our fellow-townsmen here, Mr. Sandford Fleming, has been one of the most energetic individuals in Canada in agitating for the construction of the Pacific cable. The subject was brought before the people of England by the Right Hon. Mr. Stanhope, in 1887, and when the conference took place at Ottawa a few years ago, the whole subject was formulated and placed before the country in a tangible shape. The Pacific cable is a matter of vast importance, and I am sure that in a short time we shall have it in operation, as well as our Atlantic steam service. These two great links in the chain of communication between the various parts of the empire the Liberal-Conservative party will have been successful, not only in propounding, but in carrying out. With reference to the improvement of the militia and the defences of Canada, I am very much pleased that a paragraph has been introduced into the Address on this subject. For the last few years there has been, I think, too great a disposition towards economy in dealing with our militia; but I think that now those who have charge of the finances of the country are waking up to the importance of placing the militia in a thoroughly efficient condition. In the ordinary affairs of life, we cannot get on without life insurance. The militia service is our national life insurance, protecting individuals and the country, and it should be placed in such a condition of efficiency as to be ready for any emergency that may arise. I do not for a moment anticipate that any difficulties are likely to arise in this country. We live alongside of a great neighbour; we admire its people, and their great prosperity; there is no antagonism between Canada and the United States, and I do not believe there will be in the future. At the same time, this country ought to provide for its own protection. We have been talking for years about improving our militia, and now that the revenue is increasing, it is high time that the militia of Canada should be placed upon a foundation of perfect efficiency. I believe the Lee-Metford rifle is to be introduced. That is not because there is any special necessity for it just now. That idea was propounded many years ago, and it is only now being carried out. Before closing my remarks on this subject, I desire to say a word or two about a great officer who has been connected with the militia force the most of his life, and who has just retired. I refer to Deputy Adjutant General Powell, a gentleman who has grown gray in the service of the country, and who, during the many years that he has discharged the duties of his responsible office, has given entire satisfaction to the department, I believe, as well as to all the people of Canada. When a great officer whom we have known so intimately, and who has taken so active a part in maintaining our militia force, is retiring on his laurels, it is only right and proper that his great services should be publicly acknowledged. A word now with reference to the North-west Mounted Police. That is a very fine organization; I had the pleasure of seeing it on more than one occasion, and I must say that it has accomplished a great work, and is now doing a great deal of good. At the same time, we know that the population of the North-west is increasing, and the time cannot be very far distant when a militia organization will be introduced there similar to what exists in other parts of Canada. We know, also, that the Indians are being educated; they have their industrial schools, and they are engaging in agricultural pursuits. At the exhibition which recently took place at Regina, it was amazing to see the evidences there displayed of the advances made by the Indians in agriculture, and in civilization. Considering these facts, the time cannot be far distant when the North-west Mounted Police may be safely reduced in number, and the principle of economy applied to it. I am glad to find that the revenue of Canada is increasing; if we look at the returns, we will find that such is the case. As one of the leading financial journals says:

The public finances are in a satisfactory state. In the five months ending with November, the revenue exceeded the expenditure by $3,335,642, whereas, in the corresponding period of the previous fiscal year the surplus was only $1,555,017. The same ratio of improvement, continued down to June next, will cause the deficit of 1894-95 to disappear. The improvement in the finances, moreover, has been accomplished as well by a reduction in expenditure as by an increase in revenue.

If the hon. Finance Minister has one fault at all, people say he is too economical. Although he is doing his best to save the people's money, we sometimes think he is going a little too far in that direction, and that is why I spoke out last year in regard to expending more money on our militia service. But I am glad to see that this paragraph has this year been introduced into the Speech from the Throne, which must have been done with his consent, otherwise it would not be there. As each man grows older his intellect widens. I have no doubt that this step towards improving our militia force will receive the encouragement of the force and the endorsement of the people of Canada generally. The population of Canada is said not to be increasing. Now, that is a great mistake. We know perfectly well that the population of Canada is increasing, even in the North-west. The population of our country has made as good progress as could reasonably be expected. A hundred years ago, there were not more than 200,000 people in Canada, while there were 3,600,000 people in the United States. How is it that they have made such progress, and we have not? Because we occupied a mere strip of territory, and were cut off from our great North-west until the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, while they had their fertile plains open to them, without any insurmountable barrier to get over. If we look back upon the history of our country, we shall find that the people of Canada have made as much progress by their skill, their energy and their indefatigable industry as any people in the world. Look at the financial condition of our people—the deposits in the banks, the success of our insurance companies, and the railways we have built—16,000 miles of railway by five millions of people. We have built, in Canada, more railways, according to our population, in the same length of time than they have built in the United States. We have no reason for discouragement whatever. We know perfectly well that our population is only about one and a half individuals to the square mile, whereas in Ontario it is about ten to the square mile, and in the United States twenty-one. If we go on in the same ratio as we have been, we will, before the end of the century, have thirty millions of people in this country thriving, comfortable and happy. What more could we possibly expect? Rely upon it that when we have coming in here a combination and infusion of elements from the various nationalities in the world—and it is this combination of elements and nationalities that makes a country great; this it is what made Great Britain great and enabled her to attain the position she has attained—our future will be greater than we can possibly have any idea of at present. I find in the "Canada Gazette" of London, an article by no less a person than the Hon. Senator Perley, which must be very encouraging. Speaking of mixed farming, he says:

The first principle to adopt is to raise on the farm all the food that is required by the family that the soil of the farm and the climate of the district will produce. That done, there is little to buy in the grocery line, as in any of the thirteen years I have been in the country a farmer could raise his bread, meat—the best of all kinds—butter, milk, cream, poultry, eggs, together with almost every vegetable—nearly all his living.

Practical observations such as these from a Canadian agriculturist, a gentleman sent by Canada to represent it at the great Chicago Fair, are worthy of being carefully noted. And that great fair itself was particularly encouraging to this Dominion through the magnificent exhibit which our country made and the many prizes which our people carried off and which adorn the firesides of many of our agriculturists. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that Canada is going back. Why, Mr. Speaker, if we look back thirty or forty years and make a comparison, we find that our advancement has been very great indeed. We are to-day a united people joined together by railways, by steam communication and telegraphic communication and everything required to promote the advancement of our country, whereas thirty or forty years ago we were separated, we knew scarcely anything of each other, and had not the understanding and the conception of each other's requirements which we now have. It has taken many centuries for European Kingdoms to have attained to arrive at the degree of progress which we have, although we have only been a Dominion for half a century. If we cannot boast of great advancement in science, literature and art, still we have men in Canada who have achieved world-wide reputation in these lines. If we cannot boast of great ancestry in this country, if we cannot go back hundreds of years as the English people can, still every man in this Dominion stands on his own merits, and is proud to stand by his country and promote everything that will tend to build up the material interests of this Dominion of ours. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that we are retarded in our progress by the National Policy. Could any policy have done more for the country than the National Policy has done? I do not intend to expatiate on this subject as that would take up too much of your time. All that I need do is to point to our high chimney stacks, to our factories in every direction, to our agricultural products, which are being seized upon by the leading countries in the world, to our manufactured products, to our cloth which is now finding its way into Germany and even competing with the best products of England, to the various materials which we are now exporting to Australia and New Zealand. In every line the National Policy is advancing the best interests of the country, and I defy any one to say anything to the contrary. In conclusion, I wish merely to advert very briefly to the Manitoba school question. No subject has occupied more the attention of the House during the last two or three sessions than this intricate question. That question has been submitted to the high court of England. It is rather singular that the hon. leader of the Opposition, who expects to be First Minister—but whose prospects of attaining that office are still very remote—should have, as his warmest friend in this House, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), who introduced the legislation establishing separate schools in Manitoba. That hon. gentleman wants to procrastinate; he wants a commission. Why? Is it because he does not understand the subject, or that those to whom is entrusted the legislation of this country do not understand it? Not at all. He merely wants to put the matter off a little longer; he wants to be able to tell his French compatriots: you do not know anything about the separate school question, it is not right for you to do anything about it, the hon. member for Winnipeg is against taking any action, he is my political friend and supporter; and when he introduced the Bill to do away with separate schools, do you imagine for a moment that I am going to legislate to restore them? Now, we know that our constitution requires the protection of minorities in Manitoba as well as in Quebec. It is based on protection through and through, and it is our duty to carry out the principles of our constitution. If a vote be taken, I am satisfied that those who are opposing the proposition will find, when they have thoroughly considered it, that something will have to be done. They will find that our French compatriots are not going to submit to this question being put off any longer and will insist upon what they are entitled to. We know that the French nationality is a great nationality. We know that it has contributed to the prosperity of Canada from the days when the aborigines paddled their own canoes up the majestic St. Lawrence. We know that it has worked shoulder to shoulder with the Anglo-Saxon in building up this country; and if to-day we are a happy, contented, and prosperous people, it is because we are all working together as one, no matter what our nationality or creed. We ask for nothing but equal justice to all classes of the community. We do not want any procrastination in the matter. When this question came up some years ago in this House, the leader of the Opposition taunted the Government with procrastination on this subject: You will not push it forward, you are doing nothing with regard to it; you are not according to my French compatriots the justice to which they are entitled. And, forsooth, when the Government takes the responsibility of formulating a policy and trying to settle this great question which it is so necessary to settle, they are told that they are moving too fast. They have declared that the Manitoba government should settle the matter and have afforded them every opportunity to do so. But that government would not touch it, because they think that it is only the legislation that has been introduced and carried through by the hon. member for Winnipeg, (Mr. Martin) the right-hand man of the leader of the Opposition, that should stand as the law in this matter. When this question comes before them in a tangible form, the people will declare whether the policy of procrastination is right and proper when we have a matter of law to deal with. And when we place on the statute-book the law which should be carried out in its entirety, and when this great question is settled and when the people come to understand it, they must not have occasion to say that we were behind-hand in extending equal rights and equal privileges to all classes of the community. This is the great aim and object that the Conservative party of Canada has in view and is determined to see carried out in its entirety. One more point I wish to advert to—the changes that have recently taken place in our Administration. The little thunderstorm has passed over, and the air is clear again. The change had common-sense behind it. What the Government wanted was more power to their elbow—and they have got it. At no time in the history of the country have the Opposition felt more agueish than they have done since the advent of Sir Charles Tupper to the Cabinet. The history of that gentleman is thoroughly understood. He has taken an active part for many years in the affairs of this country and has been instrumental in moulding the legislation not only of his own province but of the Dominion. No man has accomplished more in promoting progressive legislation than the hon. the Secretary of State. In England, for years past, he has taken an active part in affairs as High Commissioner, and it is well known that no great project has been placed before the people of England with reference to Canada that he has not advocated in the most strenuous manner. So much has he done that the power and ability of the man are recognized not only in Canada and in England but throughout the civilized world. His co-operation in great movements has frequently been asked. Consider, for example, the address delivered by him a few days ago on the subject of preferential trade before one of the finest assemblies ever gathered in the commercial metropolis, the great city of Montreal. It is true that we lost Montreal Centre, but let me tell gentlemen opposite that if that election were to take place to-morrow, the Conservative party would carry the constituency by a majority of hundreds of votes. And why? Because the people there know that never was a more impressive or instructive address placed before this country than that recently delivered upon the subject of preferential trade by the Secretary of State. Its arguments were sound and impressive; in all its details it was practical, not theoretical, and it tended directly to the development of all our industries. Not only the merchants and manufacturers but the farmers who have so much to sell abroad will endorse that address, and they will say that the little cloud that came over the Conservative party has completely passed away and that there is as great a future in store for us now as there ever was. I am satisfied that when the next general elections take place the people of Canada will not record their votes against their own interests. Canada never was so progressive as she is to-day. Look in any direction and where will you find a people enjoying the comforts and privileges we enjoy, where will you find a people making the progress we are making in education, science, literature and industry? There is no country that has a greater future before it than Canada. At no time in my life have I felt greater pleasure than I have felt at the addition of strength to the Government. That Government will receive the endorsement of the Dominion and will continue its commendable work of developing and building up this great country.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say a word upon the subject before the House. But, a few evenings ago, when I was absent from my seat for a few minutes, the hon. Minister of Finance saw fit to say something about the hon. member for Montreal Centre. Let me read from "Hansard" the words of that hon. gentleman. Speaking in reply to Mr. Laurier, he said:

Mr. FOSTER. And so my hon. friend, feeling the prickings of conscience, feeling that he has been found out as a poser of magnificent proportions in the distance, when the fact has been brought home to him that he herds with disqualified men who have been driven out of public life by the courts, says, granted, but of some of you the same may be said. Where was his candidate in Montreal Centre in the last by-election that he talks so much about.

Mr. LAURIER. I ask the hon. gentleman's pardon. He will have to apologize to the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane).

Mr. FOSTER. Will he? What for?

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, because the sentence given against Mr. McShane was reversed by the court of appeal.

Mr. McMULLEN. Take it back.

Mr. FOSTER. I will proceed, if my hon. friends on the other side will be quiet. I was proceeding to say, where was the candidate for Montreal Centre at this last by-election?

Mr. CASEY. At the head of the polls.

Mr. FOSTER. At the head of the polls, and a candidate with a record which is written in the evidence and the decisions of the courts—such a record and such evidence that the staunchest Liberal paper in the English language in the city of Montreal—

And so on and so on. Mr. Speaker, I came here to listen to the distinguished gentlemen who represent the people of this Dominion on both sides of the House. I thought I would bide my time as a humble individual, and did not suppose for a moment that an hon. gentleman who had been for such a long time a member of the House and who occupied the high and honourable position of Minister of Finance of this Dominion would go so far out of his way and would, in an uncalled-for and an unwarrantable manner, insult me and the people of Montreal Centre who have sent me here. He has said, in effect, that I was disqualified. I desire to tell him that I was not disqualified; and I wish to tell him this, that though, in my life, I may have violated some provisions of our strict electoral Act, let me ask, Sir, how many hon. gentlemen are there in this House who can say that at some time or other, when working hard for a friend, they have not stepped beyond the line, and done something which that Act condemns? I desire to say also that I was acquitted by the Court of Appeal of the province of Quebec, presided over by one of the most distinguished men who ever sat on a bench in our country. I mean the late Chief Justice Dorion, and with him, Mr. Speaker, there were sitting these distinguished judges, whose names I may mention, Judge Church, Judge Cross—these three judges have passed away, and I hope to a better place—Judge Bossé and Judge Doherty. These distinguished judges unanimsly acquitted me of any charge ; and yet, Sir, I am told by the hon. Minister of Finance that I am disqualified, in a sense, and unworthy to sit in this House. Mr. Speaker, does he suppose that the people of Montreal Centre, a people amongst whom I was born and I have lived since my boyhood, do not know me far better than he does ? I have occupied positions of honour in my city. I have been an alderman for twenty long years, I have been a representative in the Quebec legislature for fourteen long years, and I have been elected to that position unanimously two or three times. I have also been mayor of my city, and not only have I received the largest majority that has ever been given to any man, but on one occasion I was elected mayor of Montreal by acclamation. And yet, Sir, the people of Montreal Centre are now told that they have sent a man to Parliament who is disqualified, and unworthy to fill that high and honourable position. Let me tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fester) that in the last election I had to resist the combined efforts of two Governments. Seven Ministers of this Cabinet were in the city of Montreal speaking almost every day and night. What they said against me politically, I care not, for I carried the election. In carrying on the election I said not one word against the distinguished gentleman, Sir Wm. Hingston, who opposed me ; neither did I speak an unkind word of any one who worked against me. But I cannot say the same thing of the Ministers of this Government who came down and remained in Montreal day after day. We had the hon. Minister of Public Works, a gentleman whose name will always stand high in the history of this country as the commander of the 65th regiment in the North-west rebellion. We also had another distinguished gentleman, the Postmaster General, who, along with his supporters, did everything they could to crush and defeat me. That hon. gentleman visited every railway company, every manufacturing company, every office and every other place where he thought he could get a vote, and where he could use any influence against me. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but even religion came over the spirit of his dream, and one Sunday he came to St. Patrick's Church. I am glad he came there, I do not think he goes to church a great deal, but there he heard a beautiful and most eloquent sermon, and the people wondered who was the gentleman with the eye-glass. The following Sunday he went down to good old Griffintown, and to good Father Strubbe's church. He sat there in the pew, and heard another beautiful and eloquent sermon. I hope these sermons will long live in the memory of the hon. gentleman, and that he will become a better man politically.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the efforts these Ministers made to defeat me in the city of Montreal were the most desperate ever made against any one. Not only did they use the wealth, the power and the influence of two Governments to defeat me, but they enlisted the aid of the monopolists, and on the day of election, they had an organized band of telegraphers at almost every poll to swear through every dead man and every absent man they could hear of to vote against me. Sir, I stood upon the platform of the people, and I had with me the distinguished gentleman in whose ranks I serve as an humble soldier, the high-spirited Laurier, the man who, according to the hon. gentleman who just spoke, will one day be Premier of this country, a gentleman whose every act is above-board, whose record is pure. We hope, as the hon. gentleman who just sat down (Sir James Grant) says, that he will one day lead this country, that he will direct its legislation in ways that are pure and honest. Mr. Speaker, we are told by the Minister of Finance that I am a man unworthy to represent the people of Montreal Centre in the House of Commons ; but the people of Montreal think differently. Montreal is a great city, the greatest in the Dominion. I was supported by a large number of the members of the Board of Trade. The members of the Corn Exchange, the best doctors in the city, the leading lawyers, the leading notaries, and greatest and grandest of all, the solid workingmen, the bone and sinew of the city, all voted for me. Sir, I did not intend to say so much, but let me add that while I hold a seat in this House, I hope I shall never utter one word that will hurt the feelings of anybody. I sat in the Quebec legislature for 14 years, and I left it with the respect of every member of that House ; and I hope that when I leave this Parliament, I shall leave it with the respect, not only of my friends, but of my political foes. It will be my endeavour always to act in a straightforward and honourable manner, as befitting the representative of one of the divisions of that great city. I desire to say to the hon. gentleman before I sit down, that I have always been faithful to my friends. I have stood up for them when I knew I would be knocked down. I have always been true and faithful to my political friends. I have never been called a renegade or a traitor, and I say it ill-becomes that hon. gentleman who thought fit to go out of his way to attack me, to use the language he did. I tell him that the people of Montreal Centre will remember him ; and I call upon every friend of mine—and I hope that the "Hansard" and the press of this country will take note of it—I call upon every friend of mine to remember that a man who has been a renegade to his party, a man who has been called a traitor by his Premier, has thought fit, because he believes there were very few of my race in this House, to charge me wrongfully with being disqualified. Sir, I tell him that these words will never do him any good. I hope that every friend I have throughout this Dominion will remember the words used by the hon. gentleman in reference to one who came into this House with the intention of faithfully performing his duty to his constituents and to this country. I repeat, Sir, that he will one day regret having used those words against the member for Montreal Centre.

After Recess

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, I am sure we were all very much pleased this afternoon to listen to the manly and honest vindication of himself by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane) against the charge which had been preferred against him by the leader of the House. Those explanations and that defence were very satisfactory to my mind. They completely disproved the charge the hon. gentleman preferred.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the charge, please?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I regret that the charge was made. It was that he had been disqualified by the courts, and that he was a boodler.

Mr. FOSTER. Quote the charge. It was misquoted this afternoon, and the hon. gentleman is proceeding on a misquotation to-day. If the hon. gentleman will take the "Hansard" and read what I said, he will have a basis on which to proceed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have read the "Hansard." The hon. gentleman said the member was a boodler and had been disqualified by the courts.

Mr. FOSTER. I said no such a thing. I do not think it is fair to put words in my mouth which I did not use, when not a few feet from his mouth the hon. gentleman has the very words I used.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The words reported to have been said by the hon. gentleman were, that the member had been disqualified by the courts.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman cannot read that statement.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I can read it. The hon. gentleman cannot deny it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. McSHANE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not stating what the hon. gentleman said, but what he is reported to have said.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the leader of the House disclaims having used the words, the House must accept his statement.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not disclaim having used the words. But what I want particularly to call the attention of the House to is, that whether he used this expression or that expression, what he attempted to do was to leave the impression on the minds of hon. members that the hon. member for Montreal Centre had been guilty of offences which had induced the courts to disqualify him, and that it was an act discreditable on the part of Mr. Laurier, leader of the Opposition, to associate with that hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I should like to put the matter straight as to what I did say. I did not deny the statement made this afternoon, for I did not think it necessary; but as the hon. gentleman has taken the matter up, I do think it necessary. I made no charge against the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane). I did make a charge against the leader of the Opposition, and I was proceeding to prove it, and what I said with respect to the hon. member for Montreal Centre was this:

I will proceed, if my hon. friends on the other side will be quiet.

Probably before I read that part of the statement, I should read what I said previously. In speaking of the hon. leader of the Opposition, I said:

—he has been found out as a poser of magnificent proportions in the distance, when the fact has been brought home to him that he herds with disqualified men, who have been driven out of public life by the courts, says, granted, but of some of you the same may be said.

Then I go on, after having instanced the case of Mr. German, and say:

Where was his candidate in Montreal Centre in the last by-election that he talks so much about?

Then there was some interruption. After that I go on and say:

I will proceed, if my hon. friends from the other side will be quiet. I was proceeding to say, where was the candidate for Montreal Centre at this last by-election.

Mr. Casey, interrupting, replied, at the head of the poll. I then continued:

At the head of the polls, and a candidate with a record which is written in the evidence and the decisions of the courts—such a record and such evidence that the staunchest Liberal paper in the English language in the city wished, and prayed, and put its wish in its columns almost daily, that the Liberal candidate might be defeated for the credit of the Liberal party.

If there is any quarrel, it is with your own Liberal papers, not myself. I simply spoke of this hon. gentleman's record as a record and evidence which was in the courts, and to which exception was taken, and to which prominence was given by several papers, among them being the Montreal "Witness."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is perfectly evident the hon. gentleman wants to explain away what he said. It is perfectly plain to any one who reads the report that if it does not bear out the obvious meaning which an independent party will put on it, he should withdraw it and put other language in its stead. What the hon. gentleman said, after referring to a sentiment which the leader of the Opposition had uttered, was :

That in the United States of America, when a man had been declared guilty of corrupt practices, he was driven out of public life entirely by the force of public sentiment.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman continued :

My hon. friend has foregathered over and over again with men who have been unseated and disqualified for corrupt practices.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He proceeded :

My hon. friend's memory is short in this respect, too. There was a man in this House of the name of German, who represented a constituency in the Niagara peninsula, and who was disqualified for seven years. Not many months afterwards, my hon. friend stood on a platform with this same disqualified gentleman, and sang a paean of praise in reference to the sterling qualities of Mr. German.

Mr. LAURIER. Will my hon. friend permit me ? There was a man disqualified in the province of Quebec under precisely the same circumstances as Mr. German, and he was raised to the Senate by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. And so my hon. friend, feeling the prickings of conscience, feeling that he has been found out as a poser of magnificent proportions in the distance, when the fact has been brought home to him that he herds with disqualified men who have been driven out of public life by the courts,—

Mr. FOSTER. Which I proved a moment before.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—

—says, granted, but of some of you the same may be said. Where was his candidate in Montreal Centre in the last by-election that he talks so much about ?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. Then I go on and speak of the candidate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman spoke of a man disqualified by the courts, and asked where was the candidate from Montreal Centre. The report proceeds :

Mr. LAURIER. I ask the hon. gentleman's pardon. He will have to apologize to the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane).

Mr. FOSTER. Will he ? What for ?

The hon. gentleman was able to make the charge in an indirect way, for he had not the manliness to make it direct.

Mr. FOSTER. I made it direct, and I proved it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If so, there was no occasion to interrupt me just now.

Mr. FOSTER. That is unfair. I did so by citing the case of Mr. German.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Did the hon. gentleman not mean to refer to the hon. member for Montreal Centre ? If not, I ask him two questions : When interrupted in the course of his speech by the leader of the Opposition, who called attention to the fact that he would have to apologize to the hon. member for Montreal Centre, why did not the hon. gentleman say that he did not refer to the hon. member for Montreal Centre ?

Mr. FOSTER. I will give the hon. gentleman an answer. It was because I did not propose to say what I did not mean. After it had been said in the first instance, I decided to dispose of it ; I intended to say what I did say in regard to the member for Montreal Centre, and I said it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman cannot escape. The hon. gentleman was not speaking of a man—he spoke of two individuals, and he spoke of them by name, and he spoke of disqualified men whom the leader of the Opposition should be ashamed to associate with, and the only two names he gave were Mr. German and the hon. member for Montreal Centre.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to correct the hon. gentleman again. The hon. gentleman said that before I used the word in regard to the member for Montreal Centre that I spoke of disqualified men by name. I deny it, and it cannot be found on the record.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said the hon. gentleman spoke of disqualified members, after he had spoken of the member for Montreal Centre.

Mr. FOSTER. Did I, and by name ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You spoke of the member for Montreal Centre.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman's misrepresentation just now was, that he said that before I spoke of the member for Montreal Centre I spoke of disqualified men by name. I did not—I spoke of Mr. German.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, Sir, if he can crawl out of that hole, if he says that in naming an hon. member by the county he represents and not by his Christian and surname he did not refer to him ; if he wishes to escape by saying that, it is a miserable and contemptible hole to crawl out of.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want to escape. I did not mention the member from Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has distinctly stated that the Hon. Mr. Laurier had stood on the platform with this same disqualified gentleman, referring to Mr. German.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I did.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And he went on distinctly to say that Mr. Laurier had associated with disqualified men.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I did.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Distinguishing between a gentleman who singly was disqualified, and others who were disqualified, and the only other name he referred to was the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane).

Mr. FOSTER. That is not so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was told by the hon. leader of the Opposition that he would have to apologize, and he did not apologize.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The member for Montreal Centre came here to-day, and in a manly and straightforward manner, called attention to the fact, that while a single judge in the Superior Court disqualified him, that no sooner was the case brought before the Court of Appeals, than that court, composed of five judges, representing all classes of politics, unanimously determined that there was not a vestige of ground for maintaining the charge, and reversed the judgment of the court below.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Order; we want the truth. If that statement is correct, as made by the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane), he has put his position right, a position which was asserted in the public press for many weeks, but which was not asserted directly, although indirectly it was, by me here, in quoting the position taken by the Montreal "Witness." I made no positive statement with reference to the hon. gentleman from Montreal Centre. If his statement is correct, he has set himself right.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) adopted the substance of the charge. He now says that Mr. McShane has cleared himself, or, if he has he ought to be satisfied. But, if Mr. McShane has cleared himself that is not the point I am addressing myself to. The leader of the House has not cleared himself.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, he has.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The point I am leading up to is this, Sir. The Finance Minister, more than any other gentleman, because of the official position he occupies as leader of the House, if, in the heat of argument he stumbles into a false position and is guilty of slandering one of his fellow members, he should be the first man in this House to make a respectable apology. That apology is due yet from the hon. gentleman, and unless he does rise up and apologize to the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane) he will be held, in the minds of a great number of men, to be a slanderer of the worst kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should not use the word "slanderer" as applied to an hon. member of this House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If Mr. Speaker tells me that I must not use the word slanderer, I shall, of course, withdraw it. I was speaking of the esteem and repute in which any hon. gentleman would be held in this House who makes a charge against a fellow member, and not only fails to substantiate it, but has the disproof placed in his hands by the member himself, and then fails to make the "amende honorable."

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) will allow me; I say that I did not make any charge.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen will please allow me to say what I wish to say. I made no charge. I quoted that which was current report, which was quoted in different papers all through that election contest, and which was one of the foremost charges and arguments in the press in the contest which took place in Montreal Centre. I quoted that here. I gave my authority for it as the Montreal "Daily Witness." I made no direct charge against the hon. gentleman (Mr. McShane) at all, nor did not intend to. That hon. gentleman has to-day made a statement, and, after he had made it I said: That statement, so far as the hon. gentleman is concerned, must clear him if that statement be a correct one, and the hon. gentleman says it is. If I had made a direct charge I would be the first to take it back, after the statement was made, but I did not do it, and I am not going to allow myself to be put in a false position.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman can take his own course.

Mr. FOSTER. I intend to.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Of course he intends to. I may tell him that it is generally understood amongst gentlemen that there is no more shameful and no more shameless way of attacking your adversary, than, instead of making a charge against him directly, to say: I have seen you called a thief and a robber in the public press of this country. Sir, if I made a charge against one of my opponents in the heat of argument, and I found out afterwards that that charge was without the shadow of foundation, if I found out that the Appeal Court of the country had declared it to be without a shadow of foundation, if the person against whom I made the charge met me face to face and complained bitterly that this charge, coming from my lips was doing him damage, I should be the first one to apologize, and the first one to withdraw.

Mr. FOSTER. So should I if I had ever made the charge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) does not see fit to apologize; he does not see fit to withdraw. If he did not adopt the language he quoted, let me ask him, what motive prompted him to quote it in this House? Why did he quote a slander in this House if he did not quote it with the intention of adopting it? Why did he appeal to his followers behind him, and point the finger of scorn at my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition who, he said, associated with gentlemen of that character? To-day he intensifies the evil of the wrong which he has done to an hon. gentleman who sits in the same House with him, an hon. gentleman who has made a full, frank and complete explanation, and he refuses to make a public apology or withdrawal. I leave the hon. gentleman to his own reflections, and I undertake to say that if he polls the gentlemen of the House who sit behind him, they will tell him he has but one course to take, and that is to apologize. Now, Sir, permit me to turn away from this subject which I did not suppose would occupy more than a moment or two. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Sir James Grant) who addressed the House to-night congratulated the country on the recent changes in the Cabinet, and referred to the little disturbances which proceeded those changes. He rather congratulated the country upon these disturbances, too, because they had given us a strong Government, practically led by a man who is going to lead the Conservative party to victory. The hon. gentleman (Sir James Grant) is well satisfied with the explanations made to this House by its present leader, and by the gentleman whom he has supplanted, the hon. Postmaster General. I have had an opportunity of expressing my personal opinion as to the character and truthfulness of these representations, and as to the view which the country held respecting the representations themselves, and respecting the men who made them. I do not propose to go over the same ground. I do not propose, either, to trouble the House with the opinions of anybody outside who might be called a party man, because we all know that, more or less, our party prejudices and feelings lead us sometimes to form extreme and partisan opinions. But, Sir, if you will permit me, I will read the opinion of one of the most independent papers in Canada, a paper which, I believe, boasts that it does not belong to either party, and a paper whose record for some time past gives good ground for the boast which it makes. The Montreal "Star," of the 16th of January, referring to the recent Cabinet disturbance on which the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) congratulated the House this afternoon, speaks as follows:—

MAGNA EST VERITAS ET PREVALEBIT.

Ananias is dead. Saphira is dead. Munchausen (if he ever existed) is dead. But the Government at Ottawa still lives, and the breed is in no immediate danger of extinction.

These melancholy reminiscences are suggested by the official explanations made in the House of Commons yesterday by Sir Adolphe Caron, with reference to the recent ministerial strike, lock-out and resumption of work.

There are features about that explanation which compel public admiration. Upon that utterance alone Sir Adolphe might be elected president of any fish and game club.

It was colossal! Magnificent! Heroic! Superb!

The people of Canada expected to be taken into the confidence of the Government.

They were taken in!

There is an island in Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, known as Jerry Island, and which it is the fashion for the bluenoses to offer as a prize to the biggest liar in the province. The Government ought to declare that island for the general advantage of Canada and take it.

Nobody has a better claim just now.

The Ministers have been setting a good example by accepting each other's explanations on various subjects lately, and we are bound to accept their explanation.

We are required to believe that the seven retired but repentant Ministers resigned their portfolios because they had conscientious scruples about violating the constitution by leaving Mr. Angers's chair at the Council table empty, and that the Premier has taken them back again because, after reconstruction, he has come to the conclusion that this cause was not sufficient to justify the resignations.

We repeat, we are bound to accept the explanation—otherwise we might have some lingering doubts.

And if we accept it (as we are bound to do), we cannot very well hereafter refuse to accept any statement bearing the ministerial brand.

The explanation thus frankly accepted effectually disposes of the theory that the Ministers resigned because they found it impossible to carry on the Government without a Solicitor-General.

Unfortunately, there are difficulties about reconciling this explanation with the explanation of the Hon. George Eulas Foster to the effect that the seven bolters resigned because they found that their venerable leader suffered from moments of weakness for about twenty-four hours a day.

Are we equally bound to accept that statement?

In view of the evident fact that the old man has come out of the scrimmage most conspicuously on top, we think not.

Oh, fie, George Eulas Foster!

Beware, George, of the exceeding fibfulness of little fibs.

To think that you should represent yourself and your associates as actuated by disloyalty to your chief, when you were all actuated by jealousy for the purity of the constitution.

No, George! We must accept the explanation made by Sir Adolphus.

That was no petty fib.

There was nothing petty about it.

I thought, Mr. Speaker, that that explanation of the "Star" was so excellent that it ought to be embalmed as an answer to the congratulations which the hon. member for Ottawa offered to the House this afternoon.

Passing away from that, I wish to say a few words on the Address, and my remarks to-night shall be very short. We have had some observations made on those paragraphs in the Address which relate to the militia and the Mounted Police. In that connection references were made by my hon. leader to the recent war-scare, and the language he used has been challenged in this House. But I venture to say, Sir, that there has not been a sentiment uttered on either side of the House which commanded more general assent than that uttered by my honoured leader—that if we were to have a militia at all, and he greatly hoped we were, we should not send them out with old weapons such as they are now armed with, to be murdered in case of war, but that we should arm them with the best arm that money could secure. That sentiment was received, I think, with general approval on both sides of the House. I will not dwell on this military aspect of the case at any length. I do not feel myself qualified to advise the Government as to the manner in which the militia should be organized. We had read us to-day by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) the report of the late Major General Herbert upon the present condition of our militia, and I must say frankly that that condition is not one which can give satisfaction to any one. I am pleased to see that there is a universal feeling on both sides of the House that these defects and evils should be remedied. We are prepared on both sides of the House to grant the necessary money for that purpose. We have been voting money, for years past, and voting it reluctantly, because of the general impression prevailing, not only in military circles, but outside of them, that the money has been wasted. But we are willing to vote the same amount, and double it if necessary, for our militia service, provided the Government are prepared to come down with a fairly well-considered scheme and to show us that our money is going to be put to good use. Sir, the recent war scare will have one good effect at least: it will show the world that while we have our own internal troubles and feuds and dissensions, when it comes to a matter affecting Canada's external relations, her people are one. On national questions we can close up our ranks and stand shoulder to shoulder. We in this country desire peace above all things. The horrors of a war between Canada, Great Britain and the United States are simply unspeakable. One cannot dwell upon such an idea for a moment without horror, and I am pleased that the evidences of the existence of a war cloud are rapidly passing away. But while we are prepared to do everything that is honourable to avoid the horrors of a fratricidal war, I do not think there is a man in Canada who is prepared to yield to dishonour to avoid that trouble. We are a part, and an integral part of the British Empire; we are proud to be a part of the Empire, and we propose to remain a part of the Empire; and if the passing trouble does nothing more than satisfy our neighbours to the south, and any doubters elsewhere, that the heart of the Canadian people, from British Columbia to Nova Scotia, beats in unison with that sentiment, then, Sir, it will not have been in vain. If attacked, we would show in a practical way that we value our political institutions, that we value our country, and that we value our homes. At the same time, I believe that one united prayer will go up from the minds and hearts of all Canadians that the horrors of this anticipated war may be avoided, and that the two great countries which heretofore have worked in unison for the promotion of peace and civilization will continue to do so in the near future. I believe myself, although I do not go so far as my honoured leader, that there is a very widespread feeling of love and affection among many classes of people in the United States for Canada and for the British and Canadian people. I admit there is a class, and a large class, who entertain other feelings, and I think perhaps they are the noisiest class; but we know that when the first flush of passion and anger had exhausted itself, there welled up from the hearts and bosoms of the better class of American people the feeling that blood after all was thicker than water, that England had done nothing to merit the extreme language which had been used by America's chief magistrate towards her, that her course on this, as on other questions, was a dignified and manly one, and that, so far as Canada was concerned, she at least was perfectly free from the expression even of a sentiment which could cause anger on the part of our American neighbours. We hope and trust that this war cloud will pass away; but if it should not, and if the horrors of an invasion ever should be thrown upon us, I believe there would not be any appreciable section of the people who would not willingly rise and cheerfully sacrifice health, strength, and property in defence of their homes and hearths.

I wish to say a few words on a question which is paramount in the minds of most people in this country. I refer to the question of education in Manitoba. That question has, I think, wisely been relegated by the constitution to the several provinces themselves for legislation and settlement. There are provisions in our constitutional Act limiting the extent of the powers of the several provinces, particularly Ontario and Quebec, guaranteeing to the minorities in those provinces certain rights and privileges, and I am pleased to know that now as heretofore, and I hope always hereafter, there is not and never will be any question arising as to the absolute integrity of those limitations and the absolute right of the minorities in these provinces to the privileges which have been granted them by the constitution. But I say it is a happy thing that this question, which is peculiarly a local one, has been left by the constitution to the people of the several provinces themselves, and I say so speaking from the practical experience of a good many years. Sir, we have gone through this agitation in the maritime provinces. It is now nearly thirty years since our Free School Act was introduced in Nova Scotia, and very nearly twenty years since similar Acts were introduced in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. At the time of their introduction, they gave rise to acrimonies and bitter quarrels, they gave rise to many fears, doubts and qualms, the minority thought there was a disposition on the part of the majority to trample on their rights and privileges; and I recall these facts to-day for the one purpose of drawing attention to the fact that while there have been a few hitches here and there, a few disputes on minor points here and there, speaking generally, the system of education which has been adopted in those three provinces, has, after the lapse of twenty years in the one case and thirty years in the other, given general satisfaction. I do not mean to say that there might not be a few little points here and there which may be improved. I do not say that there may not be a few minor matters on which there may be small points of complaint, but I do say most unhesitatingly that in the three provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to-day, the practical manner in which the school question has been worked out by the people themselves leaves no room for complaint on the part of any minority. I am pleased to know to-day that in neither of those three provinces can any appreciable section of the people be found to lay a complaint, here or elsewhere, that their rights in this matter are not fully recognized and allowed. That is an object-lesson which should not be lost sight of, because you must remember, Sir, that when those provinces began to legislate on this subject, the greatest fears were expressed by the minority that in the then near future their rights would be trampled upon. We know that so strong was that feeling in the minds even of members of this House that application was made, time and again, to this House to interfere for the protection of those rights and privileges. Parliament was called upon to exercise the power which, it was alleged, our constitution gave it of overriding the local Acts of education, in the province at least of New Brunswick. I venture to-day to appeal even to those gentlemen who some years ago asked Parliament to interfere, to bear me out in saying that no greater a calamity could have happened to the maritime provinces than would have happened if their counsel had been listened to. Sir, the broad common-sense and generous feeling of the majority of these provinces enabled them to work out this question and to solve the difficulties in a manner which commands our admiration of to-day, and I hope and trust that in approaching the similar question of the administration of the education laws in Manitoba, Parliament will show as strong common-sense, as much shrewdness and stern determination to keep within the lines of the constitution, as it did twenty years ago in reference to education in the maritime provinces. Now, how do we stand with reference to this Manitoba school question? My hon. friend who spoke on the other side last night, (Mr. Northrup) made—I do not use the term offensively,—a pleasant but rather sophistical speech. He complained of the gross ignorance which seemed to exist in the minds of individuals who ought to be informed as to the real merits of the case. From his standpoint, he may think that gross ignorance exists, but I think, after all is said and done, that the salient points are few and very simple. I do not think I will go beyond the bounds when I say that each of the judgments of the Privy Council, the highest court in the Empire, was received with unbounded surprise by the majority of the legal profession in the Dominion. For my own part, I have no hesitation in saying that previous to each judgment of the Privy Council I personally had formed a different opinion. But we are not going to discuss what the law ought to be, because we are bound by the judgments. And what do they successively prove? They prove in the first place, that the Act of 1890, which was believed by so very large a majority of the people of the Dominion to be unconstitutional, is constitutional, strictly constitutional, offends in no respect against the constitution, and that the system of education which it brought into vogue is legally and constitutionally proper. So far so good. I venture to repeat again that that judgment was a surprise. Well, when that judgment was delivered, everybody supposed, rightly or wrongly, that the question was settled, and I will venture to say that there are few lawyers in this Dominion who ever believed that the appeal which was taken from the Supreme Court of the Dominion to the Privy Council would have the result that it did. Sir, there is no use in talking of what might happen. We have got to deal with facts as they are. The Privy Council has decided that while the Act was constitutional, still the questions put to it by the Privy Council of Canada must be answered in this sense and this sense only, that if the allegations contained in the petitions alleging grievances on the part of the minority, were true, then there was a right of appeal to the Parliament of Canada. That is the substance, the totality of the judgment that they delivered. They did not determine that any fact was true, they heard no evidence upon any fact. They were not—

Mr. AMYOT. They had the admissions of the parties all the time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. friend will pardon me, but I think I am stating the case correctly. I desire to state the facts and the law, as I understand them, with complete accuracy. Their lordships had before them certain petitions which had been, in the first place, presented to the Privy Council of Canada, alleging that under the second subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act rights and privileges that had been accorded to them by the legislature of Manitoba after Manitoba became part of the union, had been prejudicially affected by the legislation of Manitoba in 1890. The Privy Council of Canada, under the Blake Act, asked the court to determine whether, assuming the allegations in these petitions to be true, there was a right of appeal to the Privy Council of Canada. That was the question. The Supreme Court of Canada determined that, assuming these allegations to be true, there was no right of appeal. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of Great Britain decided that, assuming these allegations to be true, there was a right of appeal. And that was the only question decided by the Privy Council. Now, when people talk about the reasons which the Privy Council gave for reaching that conclusion, and when they begin to quote this opinion and that opinion, this dictum, and that of the Privy Council upon matters which the Privy Council were not called upon to decide, they are going wide of the mark. I admit that the opinion of such a learned body, if only a dictum, is entitled to very great respect; and, as a lawyer, I, for one, am prepared to accord a large modicum of respect to the opinion of such a distinguished judicial body. But I wish to bring home to the House the fact that the question put before the Privy Council was this single, simple question: Has the Privy Council of Canada the right to hear the appeal, assuming the facts to be as stated in the petition? They decided in the affirmative; they said: You have the right to hear the appeal. That being determined and conceded, what was left? Did that in any way bind the Privy Council of Canada? Did that in any way offer an indication to the Privy Council of Canada how they should decide? My hon. friend the leader of the House waxed very merry the other day over the position which he alleged the leader of the Opposition took on this question. The position taken by the leader of this side—I say it with respect—seems to me a constitutional, solid, sound position. He said that there was one class of men who held that, though the Privy Council had the right to hear the appeal, in no case should that appeal be granted; there were others who held that the Privy Council, having the right to hear the appeal, should grant the appeal, as a matter of course, in every case; but there was a third body who held that the granting or withholding of a favourable decision to the appellants should be determined by the peculiar circumstances of each case. Well, Sir, to my mind, as a layman, and as a lawyer, too, that seemed to me a very plain, simple, frank, straightforward, common-sense view. But my hon. friend the leader of the House waxed very merry over it and said: This is the hon. gentleman's policy. Now, if he had read a little deeper, if he had consulted the Manitoba Act itself, he would have found that the policy which the leader of the Opposition was laying down was in the identical words of the statute itself. What power have you in this Parliament? Have you power to grant all that is asked, or have you power to refuse all that is asked, or what is your duty in the matter? Your duty is neither to grant all nor to refuse all. Your duty, as the leader of the Opposition has said here and elsewhere, is to grant or to withhold as far only as the circumstances of each case require. If my hon. friend will turn to the statute he will see that these are the very words of the statute itself—"and in every such case, and so far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws." So you will see, Mr. Speaker, that the policy laid down by the leader of the Opposition was laid down in language so carefully chosen that he took the words of the statute itself. But though he exercised such extreme care and caution, and framed his policy in the language of the statute, my hon. friend the leader of the House waxed merry and asked the House to look upon this man with contempt. What have we to say, he asked, to such a policy as that? Sir, it is the only policy that will work out a satisfactory solution of the question. Now, what course did the Government take when that appeal came before them? I have not said a word in fault-finding with the Government up to the time they commenced to hear that appeal. But I have my complaint to make. I am not sure whether that complaint has been made before. I say they did not treat the matter fairly or liberally, or with a sincere desire to reach the solution without plunging this country into a racial and religious war. And upon what do I base that opinion? I say that any ordinary body of men who were called upon to hear an appeal of that kind, depending upon whether or not certain statements made were true, the first duty which devolved upon them was to ascertain whether those statements were true in whole or in part. How, in the name of common sense, could they come to a conclusion as to whether the appeal should be granted or not unless they were satisfied that these statements were true in whole or in part when the granting of the appeal must depend upon the extent of which they found the statements to be true? If they found them to be wholly true, they might grant the whole appeal; if they found them to be true in part, they might grant the appeal in part. But even though they found the statements to be true, it did not follow that they were bound to grant the appeal, as has been alleged again and again by gentlemen on the other side of the House. Not at all. The question is much greater than one coming before an ordinary judicial tribunal. If there is one fact that has been settled by the decision of the Privy Council more clearly than another it is that the appeal the Privy Council of Canada were to hear was a politico-administrative appeal, an appeal to be determined by them as the political officers of His Excellency and in no sense as a judicial court. Therefore, I say that when these gentlemen came to hear the appeal, if they wished to hear it and decide it upon principles which would command the favour of the people of Manitoba and the people of the Dominion at large, they were bound to take measures to ascertain the correctness of the statements made in the petition. I arraign these gentlemen because they made no attempt whatever to ascertain the truth of these statements. I re-read only this morning the arguments before the Privy Council of Canada on hearing that appeal. What took place? The petitions were read, affidavits were put in in support of the allegations contained in the petition. Counsel for the petitioners made his statement. A gentleman whose name, I think, was O'Donohoe, appeared on behalf of some of the inhabitants of Manitoba and himself to represent that he did not agree to the truthfulness of the statements made. He then made his statements. The gentleman who appeared for Manitoba claimed the right to reply to the affidavits Manitoba had put in. And for fear that the time required to obtain the affidavits to make the reply, would delay the hearing too much, the gentlemen who put in the affidavits withdrew them from the court altogether; and, notwithstanding their withdrawal from the court, I find them printed in full in the official document which was put before the country. Although the counsel for Manitoba was not permitted to reply to the affidavits made, and although the affidavits were absolutely withdrawn from the court by Mr. Ewart, who presented them, still, Sir, they are published to the world as the evidence upon which this Privy Council proceeded when they gave their judgment in this matter. Well, we have the judgment they gave, and I am not going to question for a moment, whether it is legal or not, whether it is right or whether it is wrong. I am calling attention to one fact only, and that is that while these gentlemen were engaged on one of the most solemn and momentous occasions of their political lives, and when they were called upon to take, with prudence and care, every step which led up to the final conclusion they reached, they took no step whatever to ascertain the truth of any of the statements on which they claim to base their decision, but decided solely and alone upon the legal aspect of the statutes which were repealed by the Act of 1890. Now, Sir, that is not right. I say if it was not possible to bring down evidence from Manitoba and hear it before the Privy Council, it was quite possible to send a commission up to take evidence there. I say that for them to attempt to decide the case without hearing the facts, was, it seems to me, an evidence of a desire, or an intention, to come to a foregone conclusion. I cannot justify it, I cannot excuse it, I cannot understand it; and I have never been able to justify, or excuse, or understand it, from that day to this. Now mind you, Mr. Speaker, the judgment which these gentlemen were coming to was a judgment on which the future action of Parliament was to be based. Nobody will contend that this Parliament can act in the dark. Nobody who understands this question will pretend for a moment that we would dare to legislate without knowing what the facts are. And still we are told by this Government that although they made no inquiry at all, either by sending a commission to the spot, or by hearing evidence down here by affidavit, or orally, or otherwise, they are going to recommend to Parliament to take the matter out of the hands of Manitoba, and pass a law here which will be the law of Manitoba for all time to come. Well, Sir, I charge against the government that they were guilty of conduct which is indefensible in that regard; I charge upon them that they acted hastily; I charge upon them that they came to a conclusion which is unjustifiable, because they had no evidence upon which to base it. What took place, then? Sir, when they came to the conclusion that, on the evidence of the statutes, on the face of them, there was a grievance so great that there could be no doubt about it, and that there should be a remedy in the manner which was suggested by clauses "a," "b" and "c" of the remedial order, what course should they have taken then? Why, Sir, it seems to me that there was but one honest course to take; they should have gone to the people and placed before them their conclusion, and asked for a mandate from the people to carry it out by legislation. Why, Sir, when we were elected in 1891, was there a man in this House, on either side, who had a mandate from his constituents to give a vote upon this question, one way or the other? Not one. Yet I say this appeal was heard in the dying hours of a dying Parliament, it was heard at a time when, ordinarily, Parliament was about to be dissolved; and when the Privy Council came to a conclusion, as they did, involving a radical change in the educational laws of a province, and involving their asking Parliament to assume a responsibility which Parliament never assumed before, and to force upon the province of Manitoba a new educational law different from the one they had themselves adopted, then, I say, there was but one course, and one only, open to them, and that was to go back to the people from whom they obtained their powers, and lay the matter before them, and let a new Parliament be elected to carry out the remedial law. Sir, I believe, rumour has it, at least, that the late Minister of Justice advised that course, and went so far as, if not to resign, to threaten his resignation, if they would not adopt that course. But he thought better of it afterwards, and went back to the Cabinet. I say he missed a great opportunity on that occasion; he missed the opportunity of showing that he was animated and controlled by a statesmanlike idea; he missed the opportunity of showing that he was determined that in a matter of this kind, vitally affecting the interest of a great province, the people at large, as well as the people of Manitoba, should be consulted. Well, Sir, we have now been called here to legislate. We have Manitoba resenting the conclusion, we have Manitoba up in arms against the remedial order. We have Manitoba holding out the olive branch to this House in this sense. The hon. gentleman smiles.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I smile because the hon. gentleman says the people of Manitoba were at the same time in a state of war, and holding out the olive branch.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, they were. They have held out the olive branch, and you have rejected it. The hon. gentleman himself believed they held out the olive branch, because he asked Parliament to postpone the passing of remedial legislation inasmuch as he detected in the answer from Manitoba the desire to come to a conciliatory conclusion. Well, Sir, what did the Manitoba government do? The Manitoba government said: You have made your remedial order without full knowledge of the facts. If you had had the full knowledge of the facts, you would not have made this remedial order, and we ask you to appoint a commission to examine the facts. The only conclusion an outsider could derive from such a request on the part of the Manitoba government, was this, that if a commission was appointed, it would offer a means, a happy means, a means which would be received with joy by a large majority of the people of this country, of settling this question on an amicable and friendly basis. I approve, my whole heart goes out to the proposition that a commission of some kind should be issued to take evidence upon this momentous question, and that for two reasons: First, because I deem it impossible for any legislation to emanate from this House which will be good in itself, or effective in itself, unless a commission to give us possession of the facts is first issued, because, otherwise, we will legislate in ignorance; and secondly, and above all, because I believe the issue of such a commission would open the way for a settlement on amicable and conciliatory lines between the Dominion and the province of Manitoba. I say there is no man who desires peace, order and good government in Canada, but would approve of such a policy of conciliation, if such a policy of conciliation can be reached. But, Sir, what are we to do now? The hon. gentleman complains of me saying that Manitoba at one moment was at variance with this Dominion, and the next moment that she held out the olive branch. They are not at all inconsistent. The olive branch is contained in the statement made by them that the remedial order must have been made in ignorance of the facts, and asking that a commission should issue; the variance is contained in the statement that until a commission does issue, and until we get possession of the facts, we need not hope that they will legislate in the way the remedial order desires. Now, Sir, I think the time has come when, instead of taking the people of Manitoba by the throat, we should try conciliatory measures. An hon. gentleman who spoke last night on the other side of the House talked about our being bound in honour to legislate now. Why are we bound in honour to legislate now? Bound in honour, if I understand him aright, not only to legislate now, but to legislate on the lines of the remedial order, up to the remedial order, up to the full extent of the remedial order. Where did he get his authority for that? We are bound, as the Act says, to legislate "in every such case, and so far only, as the circumstances of each case require." We are bound, in determining how far the circumstances require, to know the circumstances; and I stand here to-day to challenge the fact that there is any man on either side of this House who knows the circumstances of this case so fully as to justify him in imposing a mandatory, a compulsory, law upon Manitoba. Sir, you ask me to legislate, coming as I do from the maritime provinces, with reference to a state of facts existing in Manitoba. How can I do it? I hear the Attorney General and the Premier of Manitoba alleging one thing to be true; I hear those who petitioned this Parliament, alleging the contrary to be true. How am I to judge between them? How am I to legislate between them? Mark you, Mr. Speaker, when we legislate, in the opinion of very many men of the highest attainments, we are legislating irrevocably. Our legislation is not, as it very often is in legislatures and in Parliament, merely tentative. We cannot wait to see how it will operate for a year or two, and then amend it, or withdraw it, or repeal it altogether. If we legislate now, that legislation may be for weal or for woe, irrevocable. Sir, I ask hon. members, with that terrible responsibility upon them, when the law tells you that you shall never legislate except so far only as the circumstance of each case require, and no further, am I right in saying that you are assuming an unfair and a cruel responsibility if you legislate upon circumstances of which you know nothing. Sir, I do not know—I am here to confess ignorance—I know what the law of Manitoba was, and I know what the law of Manitoba is now; but the thousand and one points as to how that law at present bears upon the different classes of the community there, as to whether the communities are grouped together or mixed up, whether they desire themselves the legislation you are going to force upon them or not, whether it will be for the well-being of the country or not, whether it is for the peace, order and good government of Canada or not—all these things I do not know, and cannot know unless evidence is taken from the people who know about the facts. If hon. members had the evidence before them, if such evidence had been taken before the remedial order was made it would be something on which to proceed. But such evidence has not yet been submitted to this House, and if legislation is to be introduced, as we are informed it is about to be, then, in ignorance of the facts, I am asked to do that which I will feel the full responsibility of their act will also decline to do. The hon. gentleman says he is bound in honour to adopt this course. Where did he find his honour involved or that he was bound in any way? In every sense are the representatives of the people bound in honour to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada. The hon. gentleman is bound, when he assumes to exercise this extraordinary power, this unique power, this irreversible power which this second subsection vests in us, to make himself acquainted with the facts and circumstances of the case and the opinions of the people upon whom he is about to impose that law. We have never yet dreamed, under the most trying circumstances, of exercising the power which undoubtedly is vested in this Parliament, after a remedial order has been passed, of remedying a grievance of the minority in the matter of education. I am not here to say that we do not possess that power, or that we should not exercise it. I am not here to say that full and ample justice should not be done. Very far from it. I hope that full and ample justice will be done; but before I am asked to pledge myself to an irrevocable and irreversible law and impose on the people of a province an educational scheme which they themselves have declined to accept, I must be absolutely certain that I am doing right to the people I represent, and to the people upon whom I am imposing that law. Sir, justice must be done, and I trust there is no man on either side of the House who, if convinced that a wrong has been done—I care not whether he believes in separate schools or not, for that is not the point—that rights guaranteed under the constitution have been taken away, and it is for the order, peace and good government of Canada and in its general interest that they should be reimposed, would not scruple to take the responsibility to so act. But there are many considerations that must be weighed before that is done. In the first place, particularly and above all things, we must possess a knowledge of the facts; and in the second place, action must be taken by a Parliament fresh with the mandate of the people. Sir, I stand here before a moribund Parliament, which should have been sent to the people long since, before a dying Parliament, in its dying hours, and I am asked to pass a law which cannot be reversed, and in which if a mistake is made, it cannot be rectified. If we were passing a mere tentative measure, if we were passing, as we do every year, a law which we could amend in the following year or in subsequent years, as the circumstances require, it might not require so much care, prudence and time for its consideration; but when we are called upon to exercise a unique power, a power in regard to the educational system which is opposed by the people on whom it is intended to impose it, when we are asked to pass it in a dying Parliament and in its dying hours, without having made an investigation into the facts, do not let the hon. gentleman tell me that this action is proposed from a sense of honour, because there is no honour, no justice and no fair-play which could justify such conduct. I say that this is an arbitrary, unique and irresponsible power. I believe in an honest attempt to settle this question by conciliation. God knows there are enough racial and religious difficulties in this country already. I do not think any man on either side of the House wants this question dragged forward on the hustings at the next elections. We want to settle it, if we can, by conciliation. If this could be done, it would be settled as the maritime province education question was settled, for all time and to the general satisfaction of the whole people. But if it is settled by force, it must be remembered that force is no remedy, the case of Ireland has proved that a long time ago. If it is settled by force, and if you impose on the people of Manitoba your view as to what you consider to be the law, and do so without accepting their offer to have an investigation, in God's name do it, but do not do it under the false idea or claim that you are complying with any demand of honour, for there is no honour in it, but there is simply dishonour and injustice. I have gone into this matter more fully than I intended to do, for I rose hurriedly without intending to go into it at length, but I have of course thought out the question pretty thoroughly from time to time and thought out the course which I should take. I may say, I commit myself to no decision one way or the other.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) won't laugh when he hears me.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Excuse me.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I commit myself to no decision one way or the other as to whether there is a grievance or not, until I ascertain the facts by a properly constituted commission of inquiry. There may be a legal grievance; I do not deny that. But I do not admit by any manner of means that because there is a legal grievance I am called upon in this Parliament to rectify it. I believe that if there is a legal grievance it ought to be rectified by the legislature which created the grievance. I believe it can be rectified by the legislature which created the grievance. I have evidence that it will be rectified by the legislature that created the grievance.

Mr. FOSTER. Give us the proof.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, if you give them the opportunity which they have asked from you. If you give them the opportunity they have asked from you of giving evidence upon the facts which you say constitute the grievance. I do not believe there is a man who doubts, that if a fair, honest commission were chosen to-day, not of party men, but a fair, honest commission, and sent out to Manitoba, and they heard the evidence of the Manitoba government upon this alleged grievance and the evidence of those who say they are suffering under it, and made a report upon it; I do not believe there is a man who doubts that the Manitoba government would do justice in the premises. Why should they not, Sir? Are they different men from us? We in the maritime provinces do justice there. They, in Manitoba are our brothers, our relations sprung from the same stock, animated by the same ideas, saturated with the same literature, worshipping at the same altars, reading the same papers and books, and controlled by the same feelings and passions. Why should they not do justice as we do? Is there anything peculiar to Manitoba? Give them a chance.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. DALY. We have given them a chance for five years.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I charge the hon. gentleman to-day, and those who act with him, that if evil passions are aroused, if racial and religious passions are aroused, he and his friends are the men who aroused them.

Mr. DALY. They will be aroused by just such speeches as you are making.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My speeches are not calculated nor do I desire to raise the slightest amount of passion or feeling at all.

Mr. DALY. You seem to be very passionate yourself.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not passionate about it. I am dealing with this question, Sir, more in sorrow than in anger. I can tell the hon. gentleman I do not wish it in the arena of politics at all; but I want those men who by the constitution primarily have charge and control of the question, to be allowed to deal with it. I say that when you took them by the throat with that remedial order without hearing a scintilla of evidence, and said to them you must amend your education law by enacting therein clauses a, b and c, you turned your back upon conciliation and you embraced coercion and made it your friend and brother. I say that even now it is not too late. No advantage will be taken upon this side of the House, now—I think I am able to speak for my hon. friends—if you consent even at this late hour to issue a commission, and after the facts are before us then let us go into an inquiry as to how far we should legislate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman say that the Opposition are a unit as to that offer?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have not consulted every one of the Opposition.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not ask that in an unfriendly way. I simply wish to know.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I believe I am speaking the minds of the Opposition when I say, that they desire above all things that this matter should be settled by the province of Manitoba, that it should be settled in a conciliatory manner, and that a commission should issue in response to the invitation of Manitoba as the first step to obtain that settlement. God forbid that a word which I should utter would invoke racial or religious feeling on this matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) is mistaken. The thought is furthest from me. I say we will not take any advantage of it if they will come down at this late hour and propose a commission. I believe I speak for my hon. leader when I say, it will have its hearty and unanimous support. We will go for it one and all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. An hon. gentleman behind you shakes his head.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, there may be one or two. I do not know how the Opposition is to speak except through its chief, any more than the Government. I can speak for myself and I can on this occasion speak for a great many others with whom I am accustomed to vote and act, and I say our one and earnest desire is that some steps should be taken by which this question would be settled in a conciliatory manner without resorting to force. How are the Government acting to-day? Are you going to legislate in the interest of those people who complain they have a grievance? Are you going to remedy the grievance by passing a compulsory law in this House? You know that when you pass your law, it will be waste paper if it is passed against the wishes of the people. Pass your law if you will, force it by a majority on the statute-books, and it will not be worth the paper on which it is written unless it be endorsed by the wishes of the people. You may pretend that you are acting in the interests of the minority of Manitoba, and you may pretend that you are trying to remedy the grievance under which they labour, but I tell you, if you try to remedy it by forcing at the point of the bayonet a law through this Parliament and endeavour to carry it out afterwards in Manitoba against the will of the people, you are defeating your own object, and hon. gentlemen opposite know it. You may obtain a paltry party triumph. You may go to the polls and gain a wretched party victory; but the object you have in view—if it is the object—of giving to those people rights they have been deprived of, will be frustrated by your own acts, and you cannot help but know it. The people rule in this Dominion and any law which has not their fiat can never be carried into effect. You have the greatest opportunity now of uniting political parties of both sides on one general policy; a policy the object of which is to ascertain the real facts in dispute, with the object in the first place of inducing Manitoba to remedy the grievance if there is one, and if they refuse, then we will have men who have returned from the people with their mandate upon this subject and let the House then do justice in the premises though the Heavens should fall.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before dealing particularly with the observations which have fallen from the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) I would ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to a subject touched upon by several hon. gentlemen in this debate, and introduced to some extent by the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman spoke with reference to the relations existing between England and the United States of America, and this is a subject which, perhaps after all, is uppermost in the minds of the people of this country at the present moment. I desire to join those in this House and those out side of it who express the wish that there should be a happy and peaceful solution found of the difficulties which have arisen between these two great English-speaking nationalities, and in that solution there are none more directly interested than are the people of Canada. I desire at the same time to join with those who say, that there is not in Canada to-day any difference of opinion as to where the best interests of Canada lie in this dispute. Whatever may have been the political actions of individuals, or the expressions of opinion in time past, regarding the connection that exists between this country and the mother country, I have no doubt that of leading individuals who favoured views dangerously approximating to those of annexation, or political union, there are very few in this country who would to-day dare to use the arguments that were used on behalf of the Liberal party in 1891.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Let there be no mistake, Mr. Speaker. I do not mean to say, any more now than I did then, that the Liberal party of this country are a disloyal party. No individuals have spread that idea more industriously than Liberals themselves—the idea that they had been so charged. But it is an extraordinary fact, so far as I have been able to follow public discussion, that no one has been able to give the statement of any leading public man in Canada, in this House or out of it, to the effect that the Liberal party as a party were disloyal. Our boast on this side of the House, and the legitimate boast of the majority on the other side, has always been that Canada is firmly and ardently attached, not only to British institutions, but to British connection; and it was because of the value that is placed upon that bond, and upon all that it implies, that, including Mr. Blake, the Conservative party in 1891 endeavoured to point out the dangerous tendency of the arguments used in favour of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity or continental free trade. They endeavoured to impress upon the minds of the people, and they did it successfully, that a policy that involved discrimination, a stiff and hard discrimination, against the mother country on the part of Canada, could not be adopted in this country without threatening the connection between Canada and the Empire. Now, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition spoke of the feeling in the United States as being friendly to England. I have no doubt that among certain classes, perhaps the best informed classes, in the United States, there is that feeling; and that is fortunate for England, fortunate for the United States and fortunate for Canada. But the hon. gentlemen knows—and it is not rash for me even at the present moment to refer to the fact—that in that country there is an element that is decidedly hostile both to England and to Canada. That it has not been able to make itself actively felt so as to produce a state of war is a fortunate and grand thing on which we can congratulate ourselves and every one concerned. But, Sir, it becomes my duty at this moment to point out that in that dangerous and misleading campaign of 1891, so desperate were the efforts of some hon. gentlemen opposite that they did encourage, as I conceive, the idea in the United States that there were a large number of people in Canada tired of British connection, and ready to throw that connection to the winds; and if any one in this House or in this country ever did anything to stir up an unfriendly or unkind feeling in the United States, both towards Canada and towards the mother country, it was the hon. leader of the Opposition, whom I see in his place to-night. I want to remind that hon. gentleman, and I want to do it as calmly as I can, of the dangerous part which he, occupying an important position in this country, played at a particular time. He not only did what was injurious to the good feeling that should obtain between the countries concerned, but he misrepresented, as I am ready to show, his own immediate country, Canada, and the Empire of which Canada is a part. In proof of that I will refer to a speech which the hon. gentleman made at St. Thomas in 1888, at a time when there was not that friendly feeling existing in the United States towards Canada which we would desire.—when, in fact, we were threatened with dire penalties and severe punishment because we did not feel ready to yield our rights for the benefit of the people of the United States. When I read a portion of that speech, I think the hon. gentleman will see that it was not only calculated to place Canada in a very unenviable position in the eyes of the people of the United States, but if it was likely to produce any effect on the councils of the United States, that effect would have been most injurious to this country. The hon. gentleman said: he would be compelled to do so by the unfriendly action of the Canadian Government. If we are met with this state of things with which we are threatened, it is due to the vicious policy of the Canadian Government in the administration of the rights secured to us by the treaty of 1818.

The President only asks to retaliate. Why retaliate? Why, Sir, because, in his judgment,
SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What hon. gentleman says "hear, hear?" I would like to know what hon. gentleman now supports that statement.

Mr. LAURIER. Everybody.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Nobody except the leader of the Opposition seems anxious to make himself notorious as to that.

Mr. LAURIER. Even Sir Charles Tupper had to take backwater for what your Government had done.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We may perhaps leave Sir Charles Tupper out of the discussion at the moment. I would be curious to hear the name of some hon. gentleman who would applaud the statement which I have read from the hon. gentleman's speech. He goes on:

If the Canadian Government had followed a more friendly course, there would not have been an unfriendly feeling to-day.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have the hon. member for South Oxford nailed.

The United States would never have contested those rights, if the rights had been asserted in a friendly manner. It was not so. Those rights had been asserted in a harsh manner. Time and again, in the year 1885, American fishermen were arrested for trivial offences. Nothing, Sir, could be more offensive to those people, when they came to the British port and found themselves arrested, their vessels detained for the simple violation of Customs laws, which, in all probability they did not know. It is no wonder that their hearts were bitter, and that they made complaint at Washington. If, on the contrary, the Canadian Government had administered our laws, as they conceived them under the treaty, in a friendly manner, there could not have taken place what has taken place.

Then, later on in the speech he said this—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Better read it all.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am reading a considerable portion of it:

Sir, I say this—and this is a fact to which I call the attention of my fellow-countrymen to-day—it is high time we should reverse the policy we have been following towards the United States for the past twenty-five years.

That, mark you, under a threat from the United States—

For the past twenty-five years it has not been altogether hostile to the United States, but it has never been altogether friendly. It has not been such as to bind us to those on the other side of the line, who speak the same language and have the same ability with us.

When they were in the great struggle which they had to undergo some twenty years ago, to preserve the unity of the nation, when they were engaged in that most expensive war, which lasted four years and which taxed all their energies and courage, and which cost them millions of lives, what sympathy did they receive from their brothers in England or in Canada? Not the slightest. I shall give the authority of the statement.

I shall give you the authority of a statesman equally as important as that of the hon. gentleman opposite, in a short time, to the contrary, and will then ask you which opinion you approve.

I am ashamed to say for my country, for the civilized world, when the Americans were engaged in such a struggle, the civilized world did not rise to sustain them with the hand of friendship. Of those who favoured the cause of the North and championed that of freedom, of those who favoured the cause in England, the names of John Bright and Richard Cobden were about the only names in that day, ever in the foremost ranks of civilization and freedom, openly to declare for freedom; and in this country, among the public men of that day there was one man, and only one man, who was always foremost in the ranks of freedom, who openly declared his sympathy with the North—George Brown.

One short extract further and I will show the hon. gentleman why I have ventured to read so much to this House.

We had disputes with them on that treaty of 1818 with regard to the fisheries. Instead of adopting a friendly attitude, the Government did everything to annoy them. Is it any wonder, then, that they have been refusing to maintain those friendly relations which would be to their interests and our interests? Again, I say that it is high time we reversed our policy towards the United States. After all, blood is thicker than water. Those who live on the other side of the line come from the British Isles, as most of us do. We have the same literature and the same language. The time has come when there should be closer relations. Let us remain as we are, politically, but let us agree that it would be for their benefit and for our benefit that there should be no Customs laws, but that we should exchange our produce from one side of the line to the other.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite do not applaud that sentiment? They threw over that policy no later than June, 1893. Mr. Laurier continued: "This is the policy of the Liberal party." Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have short memories. They applaud that sentiment. But I will say this that while they are applauding to-night—this is in 1896—at that time when there was excitement from one end of Canada to the other, when no one knew what would follow that message of the President of the United States, there was not one gentleman opposite who, if my memory serves me right, dared to repeat or re-echo one single sentiment of the speech I have just read. But the Liberal organ read a lecture to the hon. leader of the Opposition which he took so much to heart that he himself remained silent the rest of that campaign and never repeated the sentiments he had expressed at St. Thomas and which, after a long lapse, he ventures to-night to again agree to. This was the argument of the "Globe" which, I think, commended itself to the people at large in this country at that critical time. Said the "Globe," in a leading article on the 29th of August of that year:

Till Mr. Laurier disposes of the arguments by which we yesterday maintained this opinion, we must, with all deference and good will to him, maintain that he is wrong in alleging that the fisheries policy of Canada has been unfriendly to the United States.

Again, "Globe" says:

What could Ministers do but stand on the Convention of 1818? There was no other guide for them after the Americans had denounced the fisheries clauses of the Treaty of Washington and had refused to negotiate.

And in article after article during that month that paper most ably vindicated the position of the Canadian Government, and said it was the duty of Canadians, one and all, to back up that Government while it stood for Canadian rights. But that St. Thomas speech was made in Canada. That speech was made by the hon. gentleman in the face of his fellow-countrymen. I desire, however, to call particular attention to the utterances made by the hon. gentleman in the United States, and my point is that these sentiments which he expressed were not calculated to promote a friendly feeling on the part of the people of the United States either towards Canada or the mother country. I am not at the moment able to put my hand on the "Globe" report of the hon. gentleman's speech, and I desired, as the hon. gentleman has been so very sensitive about that speech delivered in Boston, to obtain an authentic copy. The speech was to this effect at any rate, and the hon. gentleman will correct me if my recollection be wrong. It was on the lines of part of the St. Thomas speech in which he attacked both England and Canada, no doubt, amid the plaudits of the gentlemen who were at this banquet, for their conduct towards the United States during that terrible war; and I want to bring out, in strong contrast, the patriotic stand taken by Joseph Howe at a time—not when the memories of either the people of the United States or the people of Canada had faded—but at a time when there was very hard feeling indeed against Canada altogether unjustifiable. Now, the reference of the leader of the Opposition, I have. After all, I find under my hand, and I recollect well that in 1888 the hon. gentleman in this House said:

Let the tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I ever say an unkind word of England.

Now, in 1891, I do not know what condition the hon. gentleman's mouth was in, but this is what he said :

In my opinion, the conduct of England, of Canada, toward the United States during the war was a disgrace to the civilization of England, of Canada. The American people could fight their own battles ; they required no help ; but when they were engaged in the supreme struggle for the life or death of this great nation ; when they were fighting for a cause as great, as holy, as ever engaged the devotion of men ; when they had reason to expect the outspoken sympathy of those nearest to them, it was galling that Southern privateers could be built, manned and equipped in England with the tacit connivance of the British Government, to destroy American commerce on the high seas ; it was galling that rebel refugees could find shelter in Canada, and there, with impunity and without provoking condemnation, plot abominable crimes to help secession.

That is the "Globe" report of the speech the hon. gentleman made to foreigners in Boston in 1891. I ask him does he think that these utterances aid in the cultivation of a friendly feeling on the part of the United States towards Canada. I ask him if these facts are historically true.

Mr. LAURIER. Do you deny them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I deny them absolutely. I am able to deny them on the authority of a man who knew more about the condition of affairs in the United States, in England and in Canada at that particular time than either the hon. gentleman or I do. Joseph Howe was a man who, whether in Canada or in the United States was always British, British through and through. He did not seek to win cheap applause by abuse of his country in a foreign land, but in 1865, at Detroit, when meeting hundreds, if not thousands, of the leading citizens of the United States, enraged with England and with Canada because of the false statements made regarding these countries during the war, he told them the truth with regard to the actions of Great Britain and Canada. This was the manner in which at that time he refuted these libels, these slanders upon his country and upon the British North American provinces. Said that great man in his own eloquent and inimitable way :

Everything of which complaint could be made has been the act of your own rebellious people, in violation of the hospitality and right of asylum everywhere extended to them on the soil of Great Britain and her dependencies. I make these remarks in no spirit of anger or of excitement, but to show how unfair it is to hold any government or people responsible for the actions of a few evil-disposed individuals, as well as how natural it was for sympathy to be aroused in the minds of people on one side or another.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

And again :

It is something to be able to say that, during the four long, disastrous years of war just ended,—

I call the hon. gentleman's attention especially to this—

—not a single act of which complaint could be made has been committed by a Canadian. Notwithstanding the false reports that were circulated, I do not believe there was a single intelligent citizen, of my province at least, who did not believe that the capture of the 'Chesapeake' off the coast of Maine, by rebellious citizens of the United States, was nothing less or more than an act of piracy. And so of the St. Albans raid. The Government of Canada acted most promptly and nobly in connection with that affair, and has repaid the money which rebellious citizens of the United States had carried into their territory from the states banks. As to their harbouring the rebels and extending to them the right of asylum, is there a single American here who would have his government surrender that right ? There was not an Englishman, nor an Irishman, nor a Scotchman, nor an American, who would not fight three wars rather than give up that sacred right.

These were the words of that eminent man, spoken at a time when the facts were within the recollection of the people who heard and read them. His words were spoken in defence of his country. For what purpose was the hon. gentleman's statement made in Boston in 1891 ? But, while Canada has been misrepresented by such speeches as have been made by many Liberals, I again say that if the hon. gentleman thought that he was voicing the feelings of an appreciable portion of the people of Canada he was reckoning without his host. The people of Canada have at all times, as a people, been most loyal to the British Empire. I do not suppose there is a part of the Empire so firmly attached to it or determined to maintain the connection as the portion in which I stand. Now, what service did Sir Oliver Mowat render to his party ? What was it that induced Sir Oliver Mowat to come to Ottawa to attend the convention, the famous convention of 1893. I have my reason for believing, having read the hon. gentleman's speech, that he came here to stamp out the pernicious doctrine of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Not only do I believe that he came here to do it, but I believe that he did it, for from that day down to this we have not heard the hon. gentleman speak of unrestricted reciprocity, except to explain it as something of the past.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has not read my speeches as carefully as he ought to have done, especially my speech at Sarnia.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman finds me dropping into unparliamentary language, he will change his opinion. I intend to read some choice extracts from his speeches. Sir Oliver

Mowat came to strike down a policy that was absolute ruin to the Liberal party, a policy that was described by Mr. Blake in his famous letter as having the tendency towards political union with the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to give the hon. member for South Oxford proof that I do read his speeches. Whenever I desire to know what would be good policy to advocate in this contry, what would be a benefit for my fellow-countrymen, I endeavour to find out what the hon. gentleman for South Oxford has had to say on the given subject, and then I form a conclusion exactly the opposite of his. Let us see what this descendant of the Loyalists said of his countrymen before Sir Oliver Mowat taught him a lesson which he finds it exceedingly difficult to learn. In 1888 the hon. member for South Oxford, addressing this House, used the following language :

To tell you a profound secret, Mr. Speaker, which I trust will not go outside the walls of this House, I have never been able exactly to understand the very deep obligation under which the people of Canada lay to England.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear ; the obligation is quite the other way.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER—

In point of fact, I rather think that the obligation is the other way.

This evidently was a carefully prepared speech.

I do not think, Sir, that, although we have cherished, I hope we will continue to cherish, the most friendly feeling towards the parent state, I do not think, for my part, that we are under any deep debt of gratitude to English statesmen, that we owe them much, unless, perchance, it may be the duty, as Christian men, to forgive them for the atrocious blunders which have marked every treaty, or transaction, or negotiation that they have ever had with the United States, where the interests of Canada were concerned, from the days of Benjamin Franklin to this hour, not excepting the first and second Treaty of Washington. I say there is no man here who does not know, that from the very first hour the United Empire Loyalists took possession of Ontario and held it for the British Crown, down to this year 1888, there never has been a time, except, perhaps, during the short paroxysm of the American civil war, when the people could not have greatly benefited their material interests by throwing in their lot with the people on the other side.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Now, the hon. gentleman approves that statement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes ; every word of it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I say that Sir Oliver Mowat proved to the satisfaction of the Liberal convention that that was a heresy ; he proved to the members of the Liberal convention, and I think largely controlled the minds there, that all along the lines, from the day when the United States obtained their independence, Canada had made relatively as much progress as the people to the south of the line. He came there, he used those arguments, and, from that moment, as I say, the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite has changed. Let me, however, give one more reference to the hon. gentleman from South Oxford, showing what the hon. gentleman offered Canada in 1891. He said :

Instead, for instance, of the National Policy, we offer a clear-cut, rational policy, we offer a clear-cut, rational, plain and distinct policy. We say, the only way you can redress the mischief you have done, the only way you can give our people a chance, the only way to increase our population, the only way in which you can make atonement to the farmers for the over-taxation you have wrung from them for these many years, is by obtaining reciprocity with the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And the hon. gentleman now applauds that sentence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly I do.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But that is not the doctrine of the Liberal party to-day, that is not the doctrine that any hon. gentleman opposite proclaims to-day, but it is the very doctrine which that hon. gentleman at Halifax and Charlottetown said was the best way to prevent reciprocity ever being obtained. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the hon. gentleman's argument and language to the effect that this country is dependent upon the United States, has not tended to create that friendly or respectful feeling towards Canada on the part of the people of the United States, that is so much to be desired. Those are misrepresentations, I believe, of the spirit of the Canadian people, of the facts of the industrial position of Canada. Those are sentiments that hon. gentlemen opposite wish had never been uttered ; those are sentiments, I am glad to say, and I congratulate them upon it, that they seldom utter to-day. Now, then, I will give a little further attention to the hon. member for South Oxford. The hon. gentleman has been an amusing and an interesting study to many other gentlemen besides myself ; I do not know, however, if much profit has ever come out of a study of that kind. But I desire to call his attention to the extraordinary position he has ventured to adopt towards the province to which I am so proud to belong. That province needs no vindication at my hands. I would insult the pride of that province were I to defend it from the fruitless attacks of the hon. gentleman from South Oxford. He sought recently to induce the House to believe that an attack which he made this session, was not so much upon a province as upon an individual. The hon. gentleman has a hard task before him. The hon. gentleman, indeed, will have, not only to explain his utterances this session, but he will have to explain several other references in the same direction. I wish to put these choice and unadulterated slanders of my native province in a group, if I can. I wish to put them so that the hon. gentleman may, in his own time and in his own fashion, give such an explanation as he may be able to give. The hon. gentleman, in 1888, was guilty of using certain language which I will quote, in respect to the province of Nova Scotia. He may have forgotten it, but the people of that province have not. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was speaking at the moment, and he was accounting for the beating which the Liberal party had received in the maritime provinces, and he spoke of Sir Charles Tupper as follows:—

His own personal qualities and long public life might possibly have induced his return, but I doubt that he would have had a corporal's guard at the back of him.

The hon. gentleman was referring to corrupt means which he charged had been used to obtain the support of those provinces. Sir John Macdonald said: "What a corrupt lot to be bought in that way." The hon. member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) interpellated: "Well, our public records show it. Why, they offered themselves to us, but Mr. Blake was too honest to buy them." Was he referring there to an individual or to the people of the maritime provinces? Then, again, who has forgotten that hon. gentleman's reference to those provinces after another general election, after the general election when the Liberal forces were so completely routed. In a letter, indicating thought and deliberation, not in a speech made in the heat of passion, in which the hon. gentleman often indulges, he wrote as follows:—

Our opponents are a thing of shreds and patches, ragged remnants of half-a-dozen minor provinces, the great majority of whom do not even act on any principle, save and except a good share of boodle for themselves and the sections or the constituencies they respectively represent.

Again he writes:

And who knows the popular feeling in those very provinces is opposed to our policy, but we know that railway subsidies approve too much for the virtue of the majority in many instances.

Again, acting on this, I am told the sum of $50,000 has been sent down into a constituency now open in that province.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very glad to know the figure which it is expected to cost.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman expressed, as I have said, the greatest contempt for the people of Nova Scotia. Later on the hon. gentleman visited Almonte. Sir John Thompson and I had spoken there the night before, and in December, 1891, as reported in the Toronto "Globe," this is the manner in which the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred to my province:

It was fortunate for us that the demands of Quebec, great as they were, have not been one-quarter in proportion to their population of the demands of Nova Scotia. Probably $60,000,000 of our debt was due to the necessity of incorporating and pacifying Nova Scotia. Sir Richard then told them what an expensive luxury the Intercolonial Railway was, with its heavy annual deficit. He challenged the competency of these Nova Scotia gentlemen to teach Ontario what her needs were, trade and otherwise.

Again, the hon. gentleman is reported to have said:

Coming to deal with the loyalty cry, Sir Richard reminded the audience that the two Ministers who had addressed them last night came from a province which had petitioned the Crown for permission to separate from the union, and yet they undertook, forsooth, to lecture others on loyalty.

These statements would not amount to anything, and no one would pay the slightest attention to them except for the prominence which has been given to the hon. gentleman by the leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) knows, whatever his opinion of Nova Scotia may be, the opinion in Ontario as to the difficulty which he has met in obtaining a seat at various times in this Chamber. Why, the hon. gentleman was a burden to any party that had to carry him. He has told us that he has twice bought one of the finest counties in the province of Ontario. But notwithstanding that fact, the people apparently would not stay bought, if they had the honour of being represented by the hon. member for South Oxford. Finally the only place his feet could obtain a resting place was one of the hived constituencies, so-called, of the province, the electoral district of South Oxford. And now he has run amuck with the large majority there, as each succeeding election comes on, as is well known, and the overwhelming Liberal vote is vanishing under the weight of the hon. gentleman. Instead of abusing hon. members on the Treasury benches for treachery and treason and all sorts of horrible things, I expect the hon. gentleman to keep the promise which he made in the county of Oxford not long ago. The air, he said, was to ring with the names of the traitors in the Reform party who were endeavouring to stab him in the back. I venture to think that the abuse which the hon. member for South Oxford has poured on the heads of present and absent opponents on this side of the House shows that he is endeavouring to atone for that fearful blunder which he committed in exposing the position of the Liberal party, and indicating that treachery and treason could find a place in its ranks. At last in the struggle between Patrons and Liberals the hon. member for South Oxford cried out in his agony to the leader of the Opposition, and that genial leader came forward to heal all the troubles and sores in the party and unite them together, and beg them to take the hon. gentleman. And how did the leader of the Opposition do it. He did it in such a way as to render the remarks of the hon. member for South Oxford important. Those insults to my province for the first time require to be noticed, because the leader of the Opposition, endorsing him as he did, has to a large extent become responsible for the unfailing hostility of the hon. gentleman to the maritime provinces. What do hon. members think the leader of the Opposition said about the hon. gentleman? It is almost impossible to credit his remarks. Yet it is reported in the "Globe" that the leader of the Opposition, while he did not refer to anything done by the hon. gentleman for the country, told the people that the hon. gentleman was to be his Finance Minister when he came into power. That was the inducement held out to the people of South Oxford; but the leader of the Opposition went so far in his endorsement of that hon. gentleman as to say, "we, his colleagues, all love him." Even the hon. member for South Oxford smiles at that expression. I believe there is as much love for the hon. gentleman on this side of the House as on the other, and in the maritime provinces, of course, he is idolized. So much for small affairs.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman had better continue to speak of small things.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no Latin quotation for the hon. gentleman, but I will not leave the hon. gentleman alone. He spoke of lions—he called them something else; at all events, he referred to lions, and I wish to refer to the lion he had in mind:

"Methought he bore him in the thickest troop
As doth a lion in a herd of neat;
Or as a bear, encompass'd round with dogs;
Who, having pinch'd a few, and made them cry,
The rest stand all aloof, and bark at him."

The leader of the Opposition, in his contribution to this debate, referred to a statement which he said I made to the representatives of the New York press. I do not think I made a statement to the representatives of the New York press—I do not discuss Canadian politics with reporters in the United States. But I told a representative of the Montreal "Star" what I considered the victory in North Ontario meant. I am told by the leader of the Opposition, or it is suggested, that I counted without my host in thinking that the triumph of the hon. member meant the triumph of toleration over bigotry. I am not of his opinion: I have seen nothing on the part of the representative of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) to lead me to change the view I entertain of the significance of his splendid victory. But if I wanted authority for believing that the gentleman was prepared to vote this session for justice to the oppressed minority of the province of Manitoba, my authority sits behind the leader of the Opposition. The member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was in that riding. His speeches were reported in the "Globe," and time and again he said to the electors there that in voting for the present member they voted for the policy of this Government on the Manitoba school question, and he read the statement of the leader of this House delivered in this Chamber. So if there has been a mistake, let the hon. gentleman deal with his supporters in regard to it. I listened with some surprise to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to-night on the subject of the Manitoba schools. I was interested to a great extent, because I do not know that the hon. gentleman has ever since 1890 given vent to so many opinions on this subject as he has done to-night.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I spoke on nearly every hustings in the maritime provinces.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but I am speaking of the hon. gentleman's utterances in the House. The hon. gentleman is the maritime province leader of the Liberal party, and is therefore one of those to whom we specially look for opinions on public questions in order that we may deal with them. It is significant that while the remedial order was adopted last session, and while the policy of this Government was propounded last session, and while there was abundant opportunity for the consideration of the attitude of the Government, that hon. gentleman did not attack the position of the Government and did not suggest what he says now is the only sensible and rational way to deal with that important question. I do not think the hon. gentleman did himself justice to-night in his treatment of that subject. He talked, for instance, as to the great regret he feels that it is a political question, and the desire he entertains that it should be removed from the political arena. What has he done? What has any one of the gentlemen behind him done to assist the Government in a calm and dispassionate treatment of that question or to remove it from the political arena? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) knows that his leader has occupied many and different positions upon this subject. The hon. gentleman knows that this idea of a commission is the last refuge of the leader of the Opposition in regard to a question which he thinks is so disturbing. Has the hon. gentleman

(Mr. Davies) forgotten that from the first hour this question came before Parliament, that, contrasted with the varied and changing attitude on the opposite side of the House, there has been one consistent line of action on the part of the Government of the day. Whether under the present Prime Minister or the late Prime Minister, that hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) knows that every effort that reasonable men could make to deal calmly with this question has been made. He knows too, that every effort has been made in the line of the pledges and the promises of the late Sir John Thompson. In the year 1893—I take it no one in this House will dispute this fact,—every one believed that the decision on the last appeal to England would be adverse to the Catholics, because many eminent men at the bar were of the opinion, and some are now, that the first judgment of the Privy Council in Barrett's case, made it impossible for the Privy Council to sustain the appeal in the second case. But whether that be so or not let us be fair and let us meet the facts squarely in the face. Speaking in the year 1893 in Toronto in the presence of nearly the whole of his Cabinet, Sir John Thompson, on being asked what would be his policy on this difficult question, with great courage, stated clearly the course he intended to follow and he took all the risks that might attach to it. Will the House allow me to refresh their memory by referring to Sir John Thompson's address at that time. He was speaking in Toronto, in the most important Protestant centre of Protestant Ontario; and I do not think that even the leading organs of the reform or Conservative party quarrelled with the attitude he then assumed. This is what he said:

I want simply to impress upon you this: that, candidly and honestly, we intend to be guided in that matter simply by the constitution, as it will be expounded by the highest authorities that can be got to expound it.

And in this House during the session of 1893, Sir John Thompson said:

When the questions which surround her (referring to Manitoba) case have been decided by the courts, there will be no suspicion on the part of the province, that, either from religious or political antipathy or sympathy her legislation has been interfered with or her rights invaded; and, when the hon. member for L'Islet challenges me, as he surely had no right to challenge me, to state in advance what the policy of the Government would be, if such and so should happen, I tell him that the answer I can give him now, and the answer I shall be able to give him if that event should happen, would be this: that the province of Manitoba is a constitutional province, and that, whether it be in the hands of legislators opposed to us, or in the hands of legislators in sympathy with us, we have every reason to believe and to rest assured that she will obey the dictates of the highest tribunals in this Empire as to what the constitution is, regardless of consequences, regardless even of the displeasure of the majority, if the decision should be against the majority; and that, so far as the disposal of this appeal is concerned at any rate, the minority must bow to that decision, and the Federal Executive will advise His Excellency accordingly.

There was the policy clearly defined. Whether that decision of the Privy Council was to be mandatory or advisory, whether its legal effect might be considered to be by lawyers; there was the statement of the leader of the Conservative party of 1893: that whether it was in favour of the Catholics or the Protestants it would be the guiding star of his Government, and that has been our position from 1893 down to this very day. And how have we been met by the Liberal party of Canada? Why, this advice which is now said to come from a desire to eliminate this question from the political arena, this advice which is supposed to be for the benefit of the Government, comes to us for the first time in the year 1896—although the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) says that in the maritime provinces during recess he gave vent to that idea, and so did his leader. But his leader has condemned in advance that very policy which he now enunciates. The leader of the Opposition is no believer in commissions. Only a short time ago, the leader of the Opposition said in Toronto, that commissions were but a subterfuge to shelve difficult questions, that commissions were attended with great expense upon this country and simply enabled a political party to shunt and defer awkward and delicate public questions. Now, with that introduction to the policy of commissions generally, how can we accept this advice of the leader of the Opposition? It is tendered to us not only at the eleventh hour, but tendered to us—and mark this I pray—when our position has been so taken and defined, that if we desired to accept the suggestion it is impossible for us honourably to do so. Before we were committed up to the hilt we obtained no such advice. Before we had taken a position from which we dare not retreat if we would, we were offered no such friendly assistance from the Liberal party. Now, the suggestion of a moribund Parliament, the suggestion of a commission, and the suggestion of ultimate justice by the legislature of Manitoba, are very freely and generously offered by hon. gentlemen opposite. From what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) said to-night, it occurs to me that not only has he forgotten the discussions which have taken place in this Chamber, but that he has not read very carefully the report to which he referred, because he says that the decision of the Privy Council only established a right of appeal on the part of the minority in Manitoba. What is the hon. gentleman's position in regard to that decision generally? Is it mandatory or advisory? If it is only advisory, according to these gentlemen who argue that way he will see that it established nothing in the sense in which he referred to it. But whichever way you take it, it establishes more than that there was a right of appeal. The hon. gentleman surely must know that it establishes that grievances did exist, and that the minority in Manitoba were suffering from the grievances contemplated by the Act which gives them the appeal. Surely he knows that the opinions of these eminent members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council went further than that; and that they not only said that these grievances had been established, and that the right of appeal had been established, but that they pointed out how the grievances should be redressed. And with the pledge from our leader, with the statement in advance as to why we sought the court, with the object of the Act under which the appeal was prepared and the case heard, hon. gentlemen will quite understand that if any part of it is valuable the whole is valuable. For instance, if it be advisory none of it is binding. I have given my opinion long ago in this House that it was advisory—the whole of it, every bit of it—and that if you want to take no action upon it, technically you may. If you want to throw it into the waste paper basket, so to speak, you may do so. This Parliament is free to legislate or not to legislate; but when you speak of the value of that decision and refer to it, as every one seems to refer with respect to that part of it which establishes the right of appeal, then I say: Why halt there? Having consulted those men on a question which was clearly legal in all its important bearings, why pick out only one part of the decision? We go for the whole of it, for every line of it; and it is a fortunate thing for the people of this country that this important and difficult question has been so well and satisfactorily solved, as it has been in England, outside of our own political arena. But the hon. gentleman went on to say that the statute referring to our powers of legislation indicated that we should legislate only so far as the circumstances of the question required. But, again, I refer to the decision, and I call his attention to the fact that the circumstances have been solemnly and effectively put before that tribunal. Looking at those circumstances, and recounting them all in terms, the law lords given their opinion—to put it as favourably to the hon. gentleman's view as possible—as to the manner in which we could legislate so as to remove the grievances which they decided existed. The hon. gentleman said he had no fault to find with the Government up to the time of the appeal. Well, I again call his attention to the position of the Government when that appeal was made. At that time the position of the Government was defined. The appeal was made on a pledge given that we would be guided by the judgment of the Privy Council, and the hon. gentleman said he had no fault to find with our position. Now, the hon. leader of the Opposition is on record, for in that same year he said that if the Government were appealing to the courts, and if they should not act as the courts decided, then a rightful and powerful agitation would arise in this country.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman agrees that I am quoting him correctly. Then I ask him in all fairness if there is any other course that we can honourably take? If we are following the judgment of the Privy Council, how is it that to-day he ventures to offer us another policy—a commission—when after telling us in 1893 that if we did not do as the courts directed, a rightful and powerful agitation would arise against us? Now, the hon. gentleman says that the counsel for Manitoba claimed the right to reply to certain affidavits. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman in his references to that incident, which took place before the Privy Council for Canada. I will give him the exact account as reported, because it is an important statement, and under the circumstances it is necessary that it should be put correctly before the House and the country. But I am glad the hon. gentleman referred to that investigation, because it offers a complete and absolute answer to the position which hon. gentlemen opposite are now assuming, that further inquiry is necessary in regard to this subject. Let me explain myself before the hon. gentleman smiles, because I say this in all seriousness, and I am submitting it to the judgment of the House. He must recollect that two of the parties in this House are satisfied as to the inquiries—the third party and the Government. The Opposition want further inquiry; they desire delay; they desire, as I believe, to shove this question over the general election. But the hon. gentleman who argued this case for the Government of Manitoba does not ask for further inquiry. He does not think it necessary to press for further facts or an opportunity to adduce further facts; and any one who will read his arguments as counsel for Manitoba before the Privy Council of Canada will find that he not only put before them all that was necessary for the purposes of his case, but he never suggested that there should be a commission or any other form of further investigation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He is satisfied with things as they are, I suppose.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all. He says that under the facts as they stand, no action should be taken by Parliament; and in Cardwell he opposed most hotly the position of gentleman opposite of seeking a commission on this question, as entirely unnecessary. There are facts in his judgment sufficient to drive the question out of Parliament altogether. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to mark this important fact, that the Manitoba government were given repeated opportunities of being heard, and yet never sought directly or indirectly, as I believe, any opportunity of investigation except for one purpose. They told us that unmistakably. First, they said, before the decision of the Privy Council was given, that there were no grievances on the part of the minority—there was no room for inquiry on that subject. Secondly, after the decision they gave us two answers, in both of which they say unmistakably that the only purpose for which they would join in a commission of inquiry was to convince us that they were right. But they have said, in every statement that has come to this Government or that has been published, that under no circumstances will they change the school law of the province of Manitoba. Now, I do not quarrel with them for taking that position; they have the absolute right to take any position they please—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman excuse me? I understood him to say that the counsel for Manitoba, for whom, of course, I am not concerned, made no application for an inquiry into the facts. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to page 3 of the report where the counsel for Manitoba says:

Although it is plain enough that the province does not intend to obey any remedial order that may be made, at the same time it is desirable there should be no conflict, and, consequently, in order that I may show to this Council, if possible, that the Council ought not to interfere, I require to have a minuter knowledge of the old school system and of the practical working of the present system, than I am able to afford now, and it was impossible for me, with the time at my disposal, to have mastered the subject. I am not going to answer the personal observations of my learned friend; I hope personalities will be kept out of the contest. I appear here as counsel for the Manitoba government, I do not appear as a public man; and I desire to present the case without regard to any other considerations than those affecting the province. It is a matter affecting the province only, and I have not been able to acquaint myself sufficiently with the practical working of the late system as contrasted with the working of the present system.

He asked for delay.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must treat me a little more fairly. I do not mean to intimate that he desires to treat me unfairly; but I had not forgotten that, and I was coming to it. But I was pressing on the attention of the House the position of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in his political capacity as well as his position as counsel for Manitoba, and I am confident that I am right—that before the people of this country, particularly in Cardwell, his position was that no commission was necessary, that the people had the facts and were ready to pass their judgment one way or the other. I do not wish to misrepresent him or any other hon. gentleman. But with reference to that hearing, remember the attitude of Manitoba. Manitoba, acting as, no doubt, she felt herself justified in doing, refused to enter into any arrangement or have this matter investigated by the courts. She declined to be represented at the first hearing, declined to be represented in the Supreme Court of Canada when the question was referred to that court, and sent a counsel to the Privy Council of Canada—we certainly have some rights, not as a party but as one of the institutions of the country, to be treated fairly and to form opinions upon what is solemnly said before us—sent counsel there to tell us that while they were prepared to press upon us that we should not pass a remedial order, the Manitoba government would not obey any order that we might make. That was the position they took, and I do not think they shrink from it now. But it does not lie in the mouths of those who sympathize and act with the Manitoba government, to upbraid us for not going more thoroughly into the matter. We gave the Manitoba government every opportunity of being heard. Delay was sought, as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has shown, by their counsel, and delay was granted, as the hon. gentleman did not explain. Their counsel was heard. The inspector of schools was present at the hearing, every one who desired to address us was heard, and the counsel for the Manitoba government thanked the Privy Council committee for the patience with which it had listened to all he had to say on the subject. What was the line of his argument. It showed that he held the same opinion then as he holds in his political capacity. It showed that the facts were all plain and beyond question, that all the necessary and essential facts were before the people and the Government of Canada, and that the case of the government of Manitoba stood upon facts which were well known and understood. When the hon. gentleman for Queen's (Mr. Davies) says there is such a necessity for inquiry, so many things to understand—the position of the various races and the different religious bodies, and so forth—I refer him to his leader. His leader had not that opinion, at any rate, at one time. His leader was not of the opinion at one time that there were so many things to investigate. In 1893, the leader of the Opposition told this House that the only fact to investigate was whether the schools are in reality Protestant schools; and in Victoria, B.C., in Sept., 1894, he told the electors that the only question to be considered was whether the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba were forced to send their children to Protestant schools. That was the only question. Does the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) want a commission to investigate that fact, if it be the only one? The hon. gentleman will not do me the favour of answering, and he has the right to decline, but I ask him the question, though I will not press for a reply, because, no doubt, he has come to the conclusion which his leader reached in 1895. In 1893 there was only one fact to investigate, but in 1895, when this idea of a commission was entertained by the leader of the Opposition, he ran the facts out in order to make a commission appear necessary. Instead of saying there was only one fact to be investigated, as he said at Victoria, B.C., he said in Morrisburg, in 1895, that there were many things to investigate. These things he summed up under four heads. First, the position of affairs; second the relative strength of the population; third, the distribution of the population; fourth, how far the pretensions of the minority may be met without encroaching on the rights of the majority. Those are the facts as expanded; but why is it the hon. gentleman advocates a commission? I have suggested—perhaps I am not doing the hon. gentleman justice, but it is the idea which I seriously entertain—that it is simply a policy to throw this question over the general election.

Mr. LAURIER. Oh, no.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This statement of the hon. gentleman, as reported, somewhat confirms that idea. At Victoria, B.C., in September, 1894, the hon. gentleman was not anxious to give his views. He entrenched himself further within the lines of Torres Vedras. He said:

The desire to get him to express an opinion was but a trick to get him to commit himself; in which event, if he sided with the Catholics, he would antagonize the Ontario Protestants, and, if he upheld the Protestants, he would be antagonized by the Catholics. But he was too old a bird to be drawn into the trap.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was before the appeal was heard at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That was in September, 1894. I do not see the difference in regard to the attitude. It is clear that the leader of the Opposition did not wish, at any time, to antagonize the Protestants or the Catholics, and I am giving that statement of his as accounting for the attitude he now takes, when he can call to his side, not only such gentlemen as the representative from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), but the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), who are both as far apart as the poles, on the merits of this question. But as Liberals they will all go for the commission, and they will not, in that way, they hope, antagonize the Catholics or the Protestants. I promised to refer to the statement which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) made, which I think, is an erroneous statement regarding the affidavits. These affidavits were put in by Mr. Ewart, and were read. Mr. McCarthy, who represented the province of Manitoba on that occasion, objected to these affidavits unless he were given the right to reply; and Mr. Ewart, seeing that this would involve delay, agreed to withdraw the affidavits entirely from the consideration of the court. But the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) is too old and able a counsel to pretend that because that incident was so considered and so dealt with it should form no part of the records. The minutes, the transactions before us, required that all that took place in that Chamber should be brought to the attention of this House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman mean the House to understand that in any court of record in the world, when an affidavit is offered in evidence and afterwards withdrawn, it appears as part of the records?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman did not do me the favour of listening until I had finished. I say that every one knows that the hearing which took place before the Privy Council of Canada was of such a character that it was but preliminary to the hearing before the great council of the nation, and that this House was entitled to be seized of all information that we were seized of, and, in fact, to have a correct and accurate statement of all that took place.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What I complained of was that Mr. McCarthy made a specific application for leave to answer the affidavit, Mr. Ewart objected that such a course would cause delay, and then asked to be allowed to withdraw the affidavits, and Sir Charles Tupper then said: We will consider them withdrawn. They were then withdrawn. Mr. McCarthy had no opportunity of putting in, as he said he would do, affidavits in reply, and yet you are bringing down that record for our information with these affidavits that were withdrawn.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is hardly fair to me, because I am interrupted constantly in the middle of my argument. I do not altogether complain of it, but I merely mention to the hon. gentleman that I put that view to the House, and am endeavouring to meet him. The hon. gentleman surely does not think that anything material can hang upon the fact that these documents which came to us have also been permitted to come to the knowledge of the House? The hon. gentleman knows that if these documents were material the House would very speedily be put in possession of any answers there might be to them. But the point I wish to press upon the House is that these documents became absolutely immaterial to the merits of the case; they form no part of the judgment. What took place shows that they were not considered important by the counsel on either side. Mr. McCarthy, for instance, said :

The conclusion of my argument is, that I want an opportunity of answering these affidavits. That is my application. My learned friend made nine arguments, four of these are based partly upon affidavits, three of them altogether upon affidavits. Now, it never entered into my head that this matter could be determined upon affidavits.

The counsel for Manitoba takes a different position from that taken by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). He scouts the idea that affidavits were required on one side or the other.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think you ought to do him the justice to finish that sentence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

If it is to be determined upon affidavits, they cannot be produced upon one side only, and, of course, an opportunity must be afforded me of answering these affidavits by others.

That is the view the court took, as you will see by what was said a little later on. Mr. McCarthy says :

I certainly do not think I had any right to do more than to point out, as I did, that it was irregular. I do not know anything about what this Council will do. It seems to me, if the matter was to be discussed upon public grounds, as provided by Mr. Blake's Act, to which reference was made, in any question of fact to be tried, the reference should have been made under that Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think that it is fair for the hon. gentleman to stop there.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I must ask permission to make my argument as I see fit. The hon. gentleman knows that the House has already indulged me by allowing me to read copious extracts from these documents, and I do not like to ask too much liberty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the hon. gentleman—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Very well, let the hon. gentleman read what he desires.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman read the whole paragraph except this line :

Without reading the affidavits, I do not know how anybody can determine the matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is absolutely immaterial in my opinion. The hon. gentleman thinks it material, and he has had the opportunity of putting it before the House. The matter was settled in this manner. Sir Mackenzie Bowell said :

The Council has decided to request Mr. McCarthy to proceed with his argument upon points of law, and upon such points of historical interest as he may desire to submit ; but they will give reasonable time afterwards to produce affidavits in reply to those produced by Mr. Ewart. But no affidavits of any new matter can be produced. Mr. Ewart can be heard upon them upon a subsequent day, to be fixed at the end of the argument.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Then Mr. Ewart said :

Allow me to say, that that would throw the matter over so late that it would be impossible that anything could be done this year ; and rather than that should happen, I would withdraw the affidavits and rest the case upon the other material.

Mr. McCarthy.—I can not object to that course.

So that all the grievance that remains in regard to the question is that these papers form part of this record. But, in view of the serious questions that remain to be discussed, surely that is a very trifling offence. No member of this House will be misled by what he sees in the affidavits which, counsel say, form no material part of the case presented. There has been ample opportunity since that argument—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There has been ample opportunity to have answers laid before this House through any hon. gentleman, and no hon. gentleman would refuse to present them if asked by any one interested to do so. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have already stated that Mr. McCarthy did not ask to put in evidence upon the merits of the case, and the facts before the Privy Council in the record were never challenged. This case went to the Supreme Court of Canada and from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council in England with the material facts relating to the subject in dispute. These facts were not challenged by counsel on either side, and from their opinion, and it is for that reason that that opinion has become so valuable to us in the solution of the question at the hands of the Privy Council. Now, the hon. gentleman has spoken about going to the people. He has said that we have not a mandate to deal with the subject and that this is a moribund Parliament. Well, Mr. Speaker, there was a time, and not very long ago, when I myself would have preferred that that course should be adopted. But I did not hear, last session, any suggestion in that direction from the hon. member for Queen's.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was not consulted.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman was not consulted. But probably certain facts will influence him as they influenced me to change his opinion. The hon. gentleman and I agree that this Parliament has complete jurisdiction in the subject matter of remedial legislation, that we have the constitutional right to deal with the matter and to deal with it before dissolution. But the reason he suggests that there should be an appeal to the people, and the reason I once thought that that would be the better course was that the question was of so peculiar a character that the solution of it at the hands of the people might be more satisfactory than by Parliament passing an Act and then the Government responsible for it putting their case before the electorate. But our course, in such a matter, must depend upon the condition of the public mind. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that, shortly after the remedial order was adopted and when there seemed to be an exhibition of a dangerous sentiment in various parts of Canada in regard to it, a remarkable change came over the minds of the people of this country as the result of at least four by-elections that took place. The hon. gentleman knows that there were elections in Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia—three different provinces. And, whether the Liberals were returned or whether the Conservatives were returned every man came to Parliament approving of remedial legislation and of the remedial order adopted by this Government. The leader of the Opposition was throwing up the lines of Torres Vedras; he was busily engaged in hiding his opinion from the public. In the county where I was busy, the hon. gentleman who succeeded in winning his election claimed that the Government at Ottawa had done nothing more or less than their duty in adopting that remedial order and that they were not entitled to credit for such an act; that, in fact, it was disgraceful on their part to claim support because of it. And no one will contradict me when I say that the position taken in the province of Quebec was the same, and that my genial friend who succeeded in Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) took that position. At that time there was an extraordinary sentiment in the country in favour of doing justice to the minority and in favour of this remedial order. The question having been before the country practically since 1890—that is previous to the general elections of 1891—all the arguments that the hon. gentleman would now conjure up have been greatly weakened, and there is no doubt that there is a question not only that we ought to settle but, one which if not settled, I fear, will create in Canada and in England a feeling that the Canadian people are not strong enough or have not sufficient sense of justice and fair-play to do their duty and do it at the proper time. The hon. gentleman used two expressions, I think, most unfortunate in his argument to-night, when he spoke of taking the people of Manitoba by the throat, and suggested that instead of doing that, we should resort to conciliatory measures. Now, why use language more violent than the people or the members of the legislature of Manitoba, use? They have not resorted to those expressions. They have, in the strongest way, indicated their objections to legislation in this Parliament in the direction of the judgment of the Privy Council of England, and they have intimated to us that under no circumstances will they change their school law. But they have not gone into a frenzy over the matter, nor have they talked about our exercising towards them a policy, so far as I understand it, of coercion, or of taking them by the throat. Is it fair, no matter what view you may take of this question, so to characterize the action of gentlemen who are endeavouring to exercise the proper jurisdiction of the federal parliament? We have as much right to legislate on the lines of that remedial order as the people of Manitoba have to deal with any question relating to schools, and that proposition the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) will not deny. No lawyer in this House who approves, as he does himself, of the remedial order, as I understand him, will deny that we are seized of a complete jurisdiction over the subjects within the terms of that order, as the Manitoba legislature is seized of jurisdiction over any question pertaining to the interests of the people of that province. Therefore, the hon. gentleman is unfair, and it is a weak political argument, in my opinion, to press upon us that we are attempting to coerce any one. What we are attempting to do, Mr. Speaker, is what we think to be our duty; what we are attempting to do is to carry out the advice of the Judicial Committee of the Queen's Privy Council; and under those circumstances, if we go no further than we are advised we ought to go in the direction they have pointed out to us, I think we are fairly defended from such a charge as has been brought against us. The hon. gentleman wants to know also how he, coming from the maritime provinces, is to know how to legislate for Manitoba. Well, let him speak for himself. There are other subjects with which we have to deal every session, there are other subjects in the British North America Act that by no means indicate plain sailing all along the line. This is a subject practically added on to the powers, or to the list of subjects, in the British North America Act that are given to this legislature to deal with it. If an hon. gentleman in this House has no information that will enable him to deal with it satisfactorily, of course he must do the best he can in order to obtain that information before the time comes. But what did he indicate in this House to be the information that he requires? The hon. gentleman is well versed in connection with the subject of school laws. The hon. gentleman occupied a high and honourable position in the legislature of his native province, and had much to do with a school Bill there. I venture to say that he has carefully considered every conceivable question that has anything to do with this subject, years ago ; and I will do him the compliment to say that I believe he is well equipped to deal with this question, or any other question concerning schools. But at any rate, he has not indicated to-night the particular difficulty under which he labours, he has not indicated any important facts that could be obtained by the commission which he has proposed. If hon. gentlemen be really serious about this commission, why have they allowed this long time to elapse without giving us a more concise and clearer idea of the important facts that we ought to be in possession of ? The hon. gentleman would not be able to satisfy this House that the points he mentioned are not accessible and easily obtainable before the Bill to be introduced here, is considered or discussed. I have no doubt myself that the Government will be thoroughly able to give all the important information that is required in order to an understanding of the facts, and the application to Manitoba of any clause in the Bill it may introduce, otherwise it will be impossible for the Government to pass a Bill through this House. Let hon. gentlemen who are in favour of remedial legislation tender us their good efforts to make complete such remedial legislation, and instead of moving amendments of embarrassing the Government in the introduction of that legislation, let them facilitate the introduction of the Bill, and then we will be only too glad to scan carefully every line and every clause of the Bill. If the Government is not able to satisfy the House that that legislation is practicable, that that legislation will redress the substantial grievance that has been asserted to exist, and has been proved before the Judicial Committee, I certainly will not vote for the measure. But the principle of remedial legislation commends itself to me, and I think, from what the hon. gentleman has said, it ought to commend itself even to him. Now, he gave us for a time some hope in regard to his attitude when he spoke of justice for the minority. He admitted that we had jurisdiction to deal with the subject, and he hoped that full and ample justice would be done, and then all the hopes of the advocates of remedial legislation were dashed to the ground because he said there were very many things to be considered before justice ought to be done. How long are these people to wait in Manitoba ? How long can you fairly expect them to be patient ? The minority, the small minority, if you like, has shown extraordinary patience through the long and serious trial to them. How many years will the hon. gentleman suggest should now intervene before he is willing that justice should be done to these people ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who is responsible for the delay ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Let us not look at the past. We are talking of action this session, and hon. gentlemen opposite say they are prepared for further delay. It does not lie in their mouths to talk of past delay when they propose now that the delay should continue. Our position is a difficult one, I grant you, and it has been embarrassed by the delay since last session. But it was for a good purpose, it was to sound to the very bottom every hope or expectation that some people had, that if Manitoba were given a few months more delay, the Manitoba government and legislature would settle the question. That time was irksome, no doubt, to the minority. That delay injured the Government, no doubt, and gave birth to suspicions that the Government were not sincere. Nevertheless, the Government lived through it all, and I believe they will do their duty this session, and see that justice is done, and well done. But the hon. gentleman, in speaking to-night reminded me of his leader's utterance at Renfrew. I think it was at Renfrew where the hon. gentleman suggested that after all every minority had a grievance, and that the place to redress these grievances was in the legislature of the province, and his suggestion was then that the minority must look to Manitoba for redress. I rather think that was the idea the hon. member for Queen's had in his mind when he said, after all these statements, that he was in favour of full and ample justice, but that we were to bear in mind he was not committing himself to-night to an admission that a grievance had been established. Do I do him any injustice ? Because it was a most extraordinary statement, if I heard him correctly, towards the end of his speech, after admitting that we had jurisdiction.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You heard me say that I thought a legal grievance had been established, but I drew a broad distinction between a legal grievance and a grievance which this Parliament must necessarily remedy.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman corrected me, and the reason why I called attention particularly to the matter was that I did not wish to misrepresent him. But when the hon. gentleman says there is a legal grievance, but that he does not wish to be committed to the fact that there is a real grievance, I find it difficult to distinguish between one and the other. Can the hon. gentleman tell the difference, for I plead ignorance ? If a legal difference has been established, in what way is there not a real grievance established ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said a legal grievance was established. Does it necessarily follow that this Parliament must at once intervene and remedy it, or must the local parliament do it ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is another question, and is not the one with which I was dealing. If, however, I have understood the remarks of the hon. gentleman, I am glad, because I noted at the time that he was guarding himself against what I thought was an admission that any grievance had been established. The hon. gentleman, however, admits that there is a legal grievance.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Which gave the right of appeal.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What did the law lords say? The hon. gentleman will save time if he states that the Lord Chancellor has gone further than he is willing to go. But what does the judgment of the Privy Council say? The hon. gentleman has referred a great deal to their having said the right of appeal is established. They said a great deal more than that. The law lords stated in their decision :

The sole question to be determined is, whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only toward the support of Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctly Protestant in their character.

Could the Lord Chancellor go further in order to show that not merely in the opinion of the Privy Council had a right to appeal as indicated, but that a grievance of the most serious character had been established to their satisfaction. Again :

The appeal is given if the rights are, in fact, affected.

Again :

It is notorious that there were acute differences of opinion between Catholics and Protestants on the education question prior to 1870. This is recognized and emphasized in almost every line of these enactments. There is no doubt, either, what the points of difference were, and it is in the light of these that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act of 1870, which was, in truth, a parliamentary compact, must be read.

Does the hon. gentleman want a commission to inquire into that further? There is a compact, and there is a compact broken, according to the decision of the Privy Council. Are we to talk of a legal grievance as distinguished from any other grievance? Is it not a grievance when we are told by the highest judicial authority in the Empire that a parliamentary compact requires the restoration of the position occupied before 1890? Yet the hon. gentleman says he has hope that full and ample justice will be done. What justice could the minority expect from the hands of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), I venture to ask? Then the hon. gentleman has great faith in the local legislature of Manitoba doing justice. The leader of the Opposition will admit with me that in the last election the Manitoba government took its stand upon resisting the suggestion of this Government that they should legislate in order to remedy any of the grievances of the Catholic minority of Manitoba. We have had their message through their Council, that they will not act. We have had references in the Speech from the Throne to the effect that they will not change or abate their position. What does the Minute of Council, dated 20th October, 1894, inform us? Does the hon. member for Queen's hope that the Manitoba legislature can and will remedy the grievance of the minority? This is the conclusion of that minute :

The questions which are raised by the report now under consideration have been the subject of most voluminous discussion in the legislature of Manitoba during the past four years. All of the statements made in the memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, and many others, have been repeatedly made to and considered by the legislature. That body has advisedly enacted educational legislation which gives to every citizen equal rights and equal privileges, and makes no distinction respecting nationality and religion. After a harassing legal contest, the highest court in the British dominions has decided that the legislature, in enacting the law of 1890, was within its constitutional powers, and that the subject of education is one committed to the charge of the provincial legislature. Under these circumstances, the executive of the province see no reason for recommending the legislature to alter the principles of the legislation complained of. It has been made clear that there is no grievance, except it be a grievance that the legislature refuses to subsidize particular creeds out of the public funds, and the legislature can hardly be held to be responsible for the fact that their refusal to violate what seems to be a sound and just principle of government creates, in the words of the report, dissatisfaction amongst Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada.

The minute concludes :

The government and legislative assembly would unitedly resist by every constitutional means any such attempt to interfere with their provincial autonomy.

Some will say that that was before the last decision of the Privy Council in England. But we had their answer to the remedial order. Then, in order to exhaust all hope, another communication was sent. The olive branch was held out, and some persons have very severely criticised our action in again approaching the Manitoba government, feeling that, perhaps, we had not yet exhausted every reasonable hope in seeking a satisfactory solution of the question at the hands of the legislature in Manitoba. We communicated to them by the despatch of last July, asking them if they would do anything short of the terms of the remedial order, and their answer has come back, and there is no uncertain sound about that answer. Their answer is frankly, that their decision is not changed, that their decision is, that they will resist by every constitutional means any action in regard to education taken outside of the floors of the parliament of Manitoba. Mr. Speaker, I would suppose—indeed I would like to suppose the contrary—but it does seem to me idle to suppose that a remedy for the grievances is possible at the hands of the legislature of the province of Manitoba, and that therefore, unless we act, no action will ever be taken, and these grievances will go unredressed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) will agree with me, I think, on one thing, although we differed on many things to-night. He will agree that when he ventured to say that his party was united in reference to a policy for further delay, or in other words, in advocating a commission to further inquire, that negative answer to that was not long in coming. He was cheered and applauded in certain periods of his speech, but there was a very significant silence when the hon. gentleman ventured to speak on this particular question for the members of his party behind him. One hon. gentleman, in my own sight, gave so significant a contradiction to that sentiment that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) will discover later on, if he has not already discovered it since his speech this evening, that his party and those who usually act and vote with him are not by any means united on the policy of further delay. And, Mr. Speaker, prophetic utterances are perhaps worth very little, but I at this moment believe, as I have before said, that even the leader of the Opposition will yet this session find it right, find it manly, and find it in the interest of Canada as a whole, to support the Government of the day, if that Government bring down to this House a Bill that will remove the grievances of the minority in Manitoba; grievances which have been established to the satisfaction of the highest tribunal in this Empire.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 23rd January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to present a motion to which, I suppose, there will be no objection :

That the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended to Friday, 7th February next, and for presenting Private Bills to Friday, 14th February next.

This is made necessary by the length of the debate on the Address, the committees to deal with private Bills not having been organized. I hope the hon. leader of the Opposition will find it convenient to bring this debate to a close soon.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION.

Mr. MARTIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 22) further to amend chapter seven of the Revised Statutes of Canada, being the "North-west Territories Representation Act." He said: In introducing this Bill I desire to make a few remarks, as the subject is one of very great importance indeed to the Liberals of the North-west Territories. The Bill proposes to undo the legislation enacted by the House in 1894, which altered the North-west Territories Representation Act—that is, to undo it so far as it effects a change in regard to the voters' lists. It will be remembered that in 1894 the hon. Minister of the Interior introduced a Bill for the purpose of establishing vote by ballot in the North-west Territories in the coming general election. These provisions were, of course, supported on this side of the House. There had been a good deal of agitation in the North-west Territories in favour of the ballot, and, of course, the Liberals were very strongly in favour of extending to the North-west Territories the law that was in force in other parts of Canada. During the discussion of that Bill the question of the voters' lists came up in this chamber and the condition of affairs in the North-west Territories was thoroughly explained. The Bill did not seek to alter matters at all with regard to the voters' lists. The Bill was passed by this House and sent to the Senate, and the Senate did a very unusual thing, it undertook to make a most material change in the law with regard to elections for this House. I suppose that never before since Confederation did the Senate assume to do such a thing as change the law with regard to elections for members of the House of Commons. But in this case they made a most vital change, a change which simply means that, at the coming general elections the Government of the day have the power to nominate and elect representatives of the four constituencies in the North-west Territories. That is to say, this amendment makes it impossible for any opponent of the Government to get his name upon the voters' lists unless the officer appointed by the Government is willing that his name should be there. There is no opportunity for the voter to learn whether his name is upon the list or not unless it appears upon the first preliminary list that is made up. The amendments came back to the House of Commons and were passed in this House without any discussion or any explanation whatever; they were passed through in such a silent and secret way that even the "Hansard" reporters did not discover that they had been before the House for consideration. I find that, according to the journals, the Senate amendments to this Bill came up for consideration on the 26th June, 1894, and were agreed to without any amendment. In the "Hansard" of 26th June, 1894, there is no reference whatever to the North-west Territories Representation Act, and while, no doubt, the hon. Minister of the Interior must have moved that the House go into committee on these amendments, there is no record of it whatever. As I say, the thing was done in such a way that there was not a single member of the House, unless he had some notice of it from the Government, who knew anything of this most vital, this most momentous change having been made. I must say that I was entirely ignorant of it, and I fancy that no members of the House were aware of it, apart from those coming from the Territories who had inspired this, and who had taken this means of having it done, of having the amendments made in the Senate, in a body that had nothing to do with this question, taking good care that no explanation should be made of the matter in this House, taking good care that no opportunity should be given to members of this House to show how outrageous the change was. They no doubt knew that this was going through the House, but I fancy, apart from those few interested ones, and apart from the members of the Government, no member of this House had any idea that any such change had been made. I myself heard of it during the dying hours of last session. It appeared that in making the changes, the hon. Minister of the Interior had overlooked some minor matters which also required to be changed, and in 1895 he brought in a Bill to correct those minor defects, and it was upon the discussion of that Bill, and in fact only after that Bill had passed its second reading, had gone through committee, and was ready for the third reading, that some members on this side of the House discovered, upon looking into the matter, that this vital change had been made. A very strong appeal was made to the Minister of the Interior not to force the amendments through, but he paid no attention to that appeal, and he placed on the statute-book the most outrageous piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, that has ever been enacted by this House of Commons, and I think in saying that I am saying a good deal. However, I intend to prove every word of it, because I say that the legislation is not any clearer or more definite than if the House had passed a section and added it to the North-west Territories Representation Act, providing that the Government of the day should have the power to nominate and elect for the four constituencies in the Territories, such men as they thought proper to represent those four constituencies. Now, in order to justify that statement it will be necessary for me to show, and I shall do so as briefly as I can, just what the law was prior to 1894, and what the law is to-day in regard to this matter. Prior to 1894 there was a voters' list in the Territories. But that voters' list was really of no account, because on election day it was possible for any person otherwise entitled to vote, to get his name added to the voters' list by the deputy returning officer; and the only object, as explained by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) when we were discussing that Bill in 1894, of having a voters' list at all, was to save time, by preventing the necessity of swearing every one that came up, and to make it possible to poll all the votes at a particular polling division. Apart from that, the voters' list was of no use whatever. I myself believed at that time that it did not matter at that time particularly, because there was always the right for a voter whose name had been omitted from that list, to have his name added to the list by the deputy returning officer. Now, that list is prepared in this way: Section 28 of the North-west Territories Representation Act, as amended by chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1888, provides that the Governor General in Council may appoint enumerators for each polling division, and if he does not do so, the returning officer, with the assistance of any justice of the peace, or notary public, and two electors, is obliged to appoint these enumerators. That is, instead of having, as we have in the Dominion Franchise Act, a revising officer for the whole constituency, an enumerator is appointed for each polling division when an election comes on. These enumerators, of course, are only appointed in case of an election, and they proceed to their duties as soon as the proclamation is issued for the election. Section 29 provides that the enumerator, as soon as he is appointed, shall take an oath of office and proceed to make the list. The enumerator is appointed by the Government, and in default of an appointment by the Government, the returning officer is obliged, with the assistance of a justice of the peace and two electors, to make the appointment, so that there must be an enumerator for every polling division. It may be that an enumerator may act for more than one polling division. Then he goes on, by section 29, as amended in 1888, and compiles the list. Then by section 30 :

Each enumerator shall complete, date at his place of residence, and sign the copies of the voters' list, or lists, as aforesaid, eight days before the polling day ; two of the said copies for each polling division he shall forthwith post up in two of the most public places within such polling division, and the other he retains for revision.

Now, that section remains as it was. He completes the list eight days before polling day, and posts up two of these lists in two of the most public places. Then section 31 is the section which provides for revision, and I shall read that section to the House, and ask what protection there is to any one in a revision conducted under the provision of this section :

If any enumerator, at any time after posting up any voters' list, and before the polling day, is fully satisfied, from representations made to him by any credible person, that the name of any qualified voter has been omitted from the voters' list of the polling division to which such voter belongs, he shall add such name to the copy of the list in his possession, below his own signature, and shall attest such addition by his initials ; if the enumerator in like manner is fully satisfied that there is on the list the name of any person who is not qualified as a voter in such polling division, he may draw erasing lines through such name and write his own initials opposite thereto in the column for remarks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in this voters' list, that is all the protection there is. Eight days before the election day this man completes a list, he posts it up in two places, and then, by the Senate amendment, if at any time up to within two days of the polling day, that is six days after it is posted up, and during those six days, he gets any credible person to tell him that there is a name that ought to be on the list, he may put it on ; and if any credible person informs him that there is some name on the list that ought to be struck off, he may strike it off. That, Mr. Speaker, is all the protection there is to the opponents of the Government in these four constituencies, in the case of an election. Eight days before the election day the list is made, made by a man appointed by the Government. Anybody, Tom, Dick and Harry, the most disreputable man in the community, if they like, they can appoint. There is no restriction as to whom they may appoint. They may send in non-residents, the hon. Minister of the Interior may take some of the characters that the party keep down here—I do not know that they have got so many up there—they may send them into the Territories, one for each polling division, and ask them to make a list eight days before election. That list may have four names on it, it may have one name on it, possibly he may not find a single voter in the constituency, or it may have twenty names on it ; there is no limit. He is obliged to take no application. No elector has the right to go and make a statutory declaration and have his name put upon the list. The agent of the Government may conduct himself without the slightest restriction or limitation. He can put on every Conservative. This man goes into the polling division, and he can go to the candidate and ask him : Do you think you have any supporters in polling division No. 5 ? If so, give me the names of those supporters. And having got the names of those supporters, he puts them upon the list. Then he posts it up eight days before election day, and during six days an elector, if he could not find out where the list was posted up, because there was no means of telling where it was posted, for all the Act says is that it must be posted in two of the most prominent places—and in many of the polling divisions of the Territories there is no polling place, except possibly a post office, and in some cases there is no place that you could call the most public place except at the corner of a fence, according to the meaning of the Act—the elector could go and ask to have his name put on the list. But the official can laugh, and say, "I will put your name on the list," but he need not do it. There is no means of finding out whether the name has been put on the list or not until the man goes to vote on election day, and if the name is not on the list, there is no possible remedy, because after the list is completed two days before polling day, it is absolutely final. Section 46 of the Act provides that every voter shall be entitled to vote whose name is on the voters' list, and if a man is not on the list he cannot vote. I should like to ask politicians whom I see around me on both sides of the House if they would want anything better—if they were prepared to use it, but I do not suppose any hon. member of this House would do so, although candidates to the next House might take advantage of it—to use than a snap of that kind with which to carry an election. It simply means that the Government has the power to nominate and elect those four members.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). That is taking a leaf out of the practice of the local government in Nova Scotia, by which they disfranchised electors.

Mr. MARTIN. On this side of the House the Franchise Act of the Dominion has been very much opposed. It has been opposed for this reason, that we do not believe it is right for the Government to appoint an officer of their own to make up the voters' list. But let me refer to the protection there is under the Franchise Act so far as getting names on the list is concerned. Section 15 of the Act provides that the revising officer shall on 1st August prepare to commence to make his list. He continues to make up that list up to 1st October. I am taking the Act as it is at present; it has been changed in regard to time, but there has always been an opportunity to add names during the two months of September and October, when the revising officer is supposed to be in his office ready to take applications, and in fact he is bound to take them if they are properly sworn to and placed before him. Every elector in the constituency has the opportunity of knowing that, according to the law, on 1st August—it was in 1894 when the general list was made up—the revising officer in each constituency commences to prepare the list. On 1st October the list is closed. It is immediately printed. It is then posted in various places; copies are sent to the defeated candidate, to the sitting member, to the different officials throughout the constituency, and every man can see, if he will take the trouble to go over the list and examine it, whether his name is on the list. If he finds that his name is not on that list, a reasonable delay is granted in order that he may get his name placed there, because after the list has been posted the revising officer holds the court of revision, which must be held at least five weeks after the closing of the list. Note the difference in time. Weeks and months in the one case; days, hours and minutes in the other. Then any person whose name is not there may put in his appeal, if he gets it in within two weeks before the day of revision. He goes there and gives his evidence and after all these proceedings have taken place the judge gives notice that he will make up the list finally, and both parties have a right to be present. So far as time is concerned, an opportunity is given, under the Dominion Franchise Act, for both sides to be present, and to find out what is going on. These are not the objections made by the Liberals; the main objection taken is to the great power exercised by these revising officers and their appointment by the Government. But in the Territories there is no protection of the kind afforded by the Dominion Franchise Act. There is nothing done until the election almost comes on, and the first the electors know what is going on is eight days before the day they are called on to vote. Many of them may be away, you can never count on having all the electors in the constituency during the eight days preceding an election. But that is the only chance given them. If they can find those two public places where the lists are posted—because there is no provision for sending the lists to any one, even to the defeated candidate, and the people have no means of finding out anything in regard to it, for the enumerator has no office and there is no means of finding him—names may perhaps be added. But the list may be made up in Toronto, so far as the law is concerned, and indeed there is nothing in the law to prevent the preparation of the whole list for the Territories in an office in this building. All that is necessary, so far as the Act is concerned, is to get some one to put up the lists in two places in each polling division in the Territories. But if that is not done, there is no penalty for failing to do it. Eight days before the election the lists are stuck up, and then for six days an elector (and the House will remember that polling divisions in the North-west are frequently larger than a county in Ontario), if by some chance he learns that the list has been posted in some place, may travel fifteen or twenty miles, and he may find that the list has been torn down in the meantime. In fact, the enumerator himself may tear it down immediately after he has put it up, for there is nothing in the law to prevent it. The list having been printed and published throughout the constituency, there is no possibility of the elector being able to get his name placed there. In this case what is the provision? The provision is that he could go and ask the enumerator to have his name on; that is all. The enumerator is not bound to put his name on, and if he does not put his name on the unfortunate elector has no means whatever of finding out that it has been left off; except that he goes on polling day, and after having driven again fifteen or twenty miles he finds that this enumerator has obeyed the instructions he received from those who appointed him and has not put his name on the list. Mr. Speaker, can it be imagined that a Government boasting of their strength as this Government has done during all these years, deriding the Opposition for their ill-success at the election, with a majority in the House at the time they passed this Act of 55 or 60; can you imagine this Government being reduced to the extremity of passing an Act of Parliament for the purpose of stealing from us four seats in the North-west Territories, in a part of Canada which has never yet returned a Liberal to Parliament? The Minister of the Interior had been up in that country and he had driven through it. He found that the prestige of the Government had gone, and that the people there were only waiting the opportunity of voting against the Government representatives, and so he came to the conclusion that unless he passed some Act of this kind, every member from the North-west Territories would be a supporter of the leader of the Opposition. But even then you would have thought that the Government would have some honour and some decency in the matter, and that if they were prepared to pass an Act of this outrageous character they would have had at least the decency to explain in the House in a manly, straightforward way, that they did intend to steal these constituencies and give us an opportunity of discussing and objecting to it. But, no; the Minister introduces the Bill without a word. He puts it through the House and then he gets somebody in the Senate, a body which has nothing to do with the matter, to sneak in these amendments so vital and so important, and he brings it back here and puts it through without the slightest word of explanation. The hon. gentleman referred in another debate to the Manitoba Act in regard to the elections. Let us look at the Manitoba Act and see if there is anything in it like this: That Act provides that the voters' lists shall be made up from time to time when the Government sees fit, and that when the voters' lists are to be revised a general proclamation is to issue appointing a registration clerk for each electoral district in the province. That proclamation fixes the day for the closing of the lists, which day shall be not less than four weeks from the date of the proclamation. During these four weeks every elector has an opportunity of sending to that registration clerk, a sworn declaration showing that he is entitled to vote, and if the registration clerk does not put upon the list every one of those persons who furnishes him with a proper declaration, he is subject to a heavy penalty. After the lists are closed they are printed and circulated. Copies are sent to defeated candidates at the previous election, to the sitting members, to every mayor, councillor, alderman and reeve in the constituency and to every postmaster. They are put up in every school house, and every post office, and every municipal office, and then there is a revision. A revising officer is appointed who must be either a judge or a barrister of at least three years standing. These lists must be published and posted up at least thirty days before the day appointed for the final court revision. Then, every one has an opportunity, just as they have under the Dominion Franchise Act, of putting in their appeals, as long as they get them in five days before the day for the final revision. Then an open court is held, and after that the list is completed and is published. Twenty-five copies are sent to the defeated candidate, twenty-five copies to the sitting member, and two copies to every municipal officer in the province. These are also posted up in the most public way all over the province. Therefore, under the Dominion Act and under the Manitoba Act, which the hon. gentleman criticized in another connection, there is the most ample opportunity for every man to get his name upon the list, unless some of the officers commit a fraud. But, in the North-west Territories, I say that there is no opportunity, there is no possible chance of a man getting his name upon the list unless the enumerator is willing to put him upon the list. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is well known by the Government, and also, I think, generally in this House, that the North-west Assembly is composed very largely of Conservatives. I shall, with your permission, Sir, read a resolution which that body passed upon this very subject; a subject, it is true, that was not particularly within their jurisdiction, but a subject in which each one of them was interested as a citizen of the Dominion, and one in which they felt there was such a strong public interest in the Territories that they were justified in passing this very forcible resolution in regard to the matter. The following resolution was moved by Mr. Insinger, and passed unanimously:—

Whereas under the "North-west Territories Representation Act" the requirements for electors in the territories to be allowed to vote at Dominion elections differ from the requirements for electors in the provinces, inasmuch as they are not based on the provisions of the "Electoral Franchise Act";

And whereas, though immediately before Dominion elections in the Territories lists of voters are to be made by enumerators appointed either by the Governor in Council or by the returning officer, conjointly with any two justices of the peace, or with one justice of the peace and a notary public, or with any one of them and two electors of the electoral district, yet, till the passing of the Acts to amend the North-west Representation Act in the years 1894 and 1895, all electors having the qualifications of such were allowed to vote independently of the fact, if they were on such list of voters or not; And whereas in all elections in the Territories, both territorial and Dominion, the principle of allowing a voter's name to be put on the list up to the moment of voting prevailed up to 1894;

And whereas such principle was reaffirmed by the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories in their "Territories Elections Ordinance" of 1894, in which, moreover, the assembly did not think it advisable to make provisions for either voters' lists or lists of voters; And whereas experience at the general election for the assembly held in the year 1894 showed such system to be admirably adapted to the needs of these sparsely-settled territories;

And whereas by the Acts to amend the North-west Representation Act, passed in the 57-58 year and 58-59 year, Victoria, the list of voters made by enumerators will have the same force as a voters' list prepared under the provisions of the Electoral Franchise Act, and all such persons as are not on such list of voters will be excluded from the right to exercise the franchise ;

And whereas such lists of voters do not offer the same safeguards to the rights of electors as do the voters' lists in the provinces, inasmuch as

- (1) They are necessarily hurriedly prepared by enumerators between the time of the receipt of the writ for election and a week before the day of polling ;
- (2) The time allowed to electors or their agents to ascertain if their names are on such list is, taken in connection with the distances generally to be travelled in the territories, and with the fact that no fixed residences are appointed for such enumerators, insufficient for the purpose ;
- (3) The enumerator is the absolute judge of the right of an elector to be on such list, and he can put on or strike off names till within two days of the polling day without notice from or to such electors ;
- (4) There is no appeal from the decision of the enumerator either to a revising officer or to a judge :

Therefore, in the opinion of this assembly, it is desirable that the "North-west Territories Representation Act" be further amended so as to either adopt the system provided for in the "Territories Election Ordinances," or to bring into effect the provisions regarding voters' lists of the "Electoral Franchise Act."

Among the members of the assembly who supported that resolution, which recapitulates very well the different points which I have alleged against this outrage, is Mr. Haultain, who is the Premier of the Territories, and the nominated candidate on the Government side for the constituency of Alberta at the present time. In fact, it was at his suggestion that it was proposed that the law should be re-enacted as it was before. What the assembly ask for is one of three things—first, that the law should be re-enacted as it was before ; second, that the Territories Franchise Act should be adopted ; third, that the Electoral Franchise Act of the Dominion should be brought into force in the Territories. Of course, it is quite out of the question to attempt, at this late day to bring into force the Dominion Franchise Act for the coming elections ; so that the recommendations of the assembly narrow themselves down to the others—either to have their own Franchise Act, or to have the old Act as it was. I understand that it is suggested as an objection to the Act as it was passed that it afforded more or less opportunity for fraudulent voting. Now, whether there was opportunity for it, or not, I can say truthfully—and I think the members from the Territories will agree with me—that there has not been, to any appreciable extent, any fraud in elections there. There has been no complaint on the floor of this House, so far as I have heard, from members representing constituencies in the Territories, of the law working in that direction. There is no doubt that it is a very crude law. It is certainly not a law that should be allowed to stand ; but the law that has been substituted for it will bear no comparison with it whatever. If the Government came to the conclusion that there was too much opportunity for persons swearing falsely that they were entitled to vote, they should, in 1894, have applied the Dominion Franchise Act to the Territories. Not having been prepared to do that, they cannot be allowed to use this flimsy pretext for the outrage they committed. I am glad to notice that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) apparently takes the same view of the Government's conduct as I do, because he has also introduced a Bill into this House, which has received its first reading, in exactly the same direction as mine. My Bill proposes to put the law back as it was before, that is, to re-enact section 44 of chapter 7 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows :—

The deputy returning officer shall, while the poll is open, if required by any elector whose name is not on the voters' list, administer to such elector oath number one in the said form P ; and such oath having been taken, the deputy returning officer shall at once cause such elector's name to be added to the voters' list, with the word "sworn" written thereafter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the hon. Minister of the Interior whether the Government committed this outrage of their own accord, or whether they were asked to do so by any member from the Territories in the House at the present time. We may take it for granted, that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) did not request or advise the Government to do so, because he comes here and asks to have the same changes made that I am asking for. I do not suppose that the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) would request the Government to make a change in this direction, because he has been discarded by his party in his constituency, and another man substituted for him as the candidate for the coming election. So far as the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis) is concerned, I am sure I am quite safe in saying that hon. gentleman would never be a party to such a disgraceful attempt to steal constituencies. Then, the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) is the only member left representing a North-west constituency. I do not know—I should imagine that hon. gentleman would scarcely be guilty of forwarding or asking for legislation the effect of which must be to give him a most unfair advantage over his opponent. The Government have always expressed themselves as being confident of the result of the elections in the Territories, and I would ask hon. members supporting the Government from other provinces what they think of their expression of confidence when they are reduced to extremities such as this. Will any one believe that they have any confidence whatever in having the slightest particle of a chance in any one of these constituencies, if they are obliged to put through this House in such a secret way, without any discussion or explanation, without any chance of their opponents knowing what they were doing, a Bill of this kind—an Act which allows men nominated by themselves to go into a polling division and make up once for all a list from which they may exclude every likely opponent from being a candidate, and from which list there is no possible appeal. Why, Mr. Speaker, I fancy that, outside of the Government, and outside of any member from the Territories, if such can be found, who has urged and supported legislation of this kind, there is not on the other side of the House a single member who will justify and support the Government in keeping upon the statute-book such an outrage as this. This is the last session of this House; it can only last a certain time; and, so far as I am concerned, if my voice does not give out, I will certainly, so long as I am able to speak, stand up here day after day and protest against this iniquitous outrage, and prevent, so far as my efforts can, the Government getting on with any business whatever until—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are perfectly correct.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not in order; he is threatening the House with opposition.

Mr. MARTIN. I withdraw my threat.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Allow me for one moment on a question of order—it is always the rule that the redress of grievances should precede supplies.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not understand the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) to take that position. I understood him to threaten that he would not allow the business of the House to go on unless this particular statute to which he referred was amended.

Mr. MARTIN. You certainly, Sir, understood me quite correctly, and as I find I am out of order, I withdraw the threat; but I shall take every parliamentary means in my power to compel the Government—there is no use appealing to this Government, I have lost any idea of that kind; I do not think there is any use appealing to their honour or patriotism or fairness—but I say that I will use my right as a representative here of taking every parliamentary and legitimate opportunity of insisting that this wrong shall be made right before this session is over. And I would like to hear from the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) any justification of this amendment which he put through this House without the slightest explanation. I have been in the Territories since last session, after the people had learnt of this amendment. They had no knowledge of it before last session. I have conversed with gentlemen there on both sides of politics, and was requested by them to ask for this change in the law, and I am satisfied that the hon. Minister of the Interior has few, if any, supporters in the Territories who will justify him in this attempt to take away from the people their right to vote. If the hon. gentleman's policy is acceptable to the people there, let him depend upon that alone. Let him go before the people with his policy; let him give us the opportunity of getting our names on the list; let him give us the right to vote—and then if he is supported by the people, all right; if he is condemned, let him take his condemnation. But let him not attempt to get away from the votes of the people; let him not attempt to hide his iniquity in a parliamentary election of members for those four constituencies. It is an outrage which has never been perpetrated even in this House of Commons, and I am satisfied it could not have been perpetrated here, if the members had known what was suggested to them, and what was being enacted.

Mr. DALY. In answer to the very furious attack made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), it seems to me that it is well for the House and you, Mr. Speaker, to be put in possession of the facts, and not take for gospel what the hon. gentleman has said. He has seen fit to impugn the honour and patriotism of this Government, and my own personal honour in this matter, not only as a member of the Government, but as a member of the House, because he declared that I had sneaked through this House a clause in the Bill which came from the Senate. What are the facts? They are that in 1894 I introduced into this House a Bill to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act. That Bill went through this House and had its third reading. I ask if the hon. gentleman will find upon record that he took any part in the discussion of that Bill, during its three readings. He will find that he did not. He will find that he did not give any attention to it.

Mr. MARTIN. It had not this clause in it.

Mr. DALY. Did you, or did you not read the Bill?

Mr. MARTIN. I did.

Mr. DALY. So we have the hon. gentleman on record that he did look at the Bill and knew what it was when it went through the Senate. The hon. gentleman has accused me of going to the Senate and getting the members of that chamber to put in this clause, and conniving with them in doing a wrong to the North-west Territories. I tell the hon. gentleman and this House that I never spoke to a Senator, or anybody else, with reference to this Bill after it left this House and went to the Senate; and I was just as ignorant as the hon. gentleman is that the clause was put in the Bill by the Senate repealing clause 44 until the Bill came back to this House. When the Bill came back here, I pointed out to members of the North-west Territories the changes made by the Senate, because there was more than one change, and I was told by these gentlemen that the changes had been made at their solicitation.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman give the names?

Mr. DALY. The hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) was the gentleman who informed me, and he told me the reason was that in the last elections held in the North-west Territories this clause 44 gave rise to the committal of perjury by a number of people, who had their names put on the list without any right. What does clause 44 say:

The deputy returning officer shall, while the poll is open, if required by any elector whose name is not on the voters' list, administer to such elector oath number one in the said form P; and such oath having been taken, the deputy returning officer shall at once cause such elector's name to be added to the voters' list, with the word "sworn" written thereafter.

I should like to know if that provision does not admit of the statement made by the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Macdonald) to me that it opened the door for wrong-doing? The hon. gentleman told me that in his own electoral division, there were 150 names put on the list under the provision of that clause, which would not have been there if the men whose names were on had not perjured themselves by taking the oath. The hon. gentleman went further. He did not only charge me with having connived with some one in the Senate in order to have the clause added to the Bill, but he said that the Bill was not discussed in this House, and that it went through silently and in an irregular manner.

Mr. MARTIN. I said as to the amendments.

Mr. DALY. I am talking about them. The hon. gentleman said that there is nothing in the "Hansard" about this particular amendment. He will not find in the "Hansard" anything about the amendments to the Bill, but he will find them in the Journals of the House. Look at the Journals of the 26th June, 1894.

Mr. MARTIN. I said they were in the Journal, but that there was no mention in the "Hansard" about any discussion.

Mr. DALY. On page 349 of the Journals of the House you will find, by a division that took place in the afternoon, that the hon. member for Winnipeg was present when the amendments went through, or that, if not present, he ought to have been. He was in the precincts of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman say that on the page 349 of the Journals of 1894 the particular amendment to which my hon. friend objects is found?

Mr. DALY. Yes; and I call the attention of the House to the proceedings that took place on that day, so that we may ascertain whether or not these amendments were sneaked through or whether there was anything irregular in the manner in which these amendments that came from the Senate were put through this House. We find that four petitions were presented; we find that a Bill from the Senate, intituled "An Act respecting the Speaker of the Senate," was, according to the Orders, read a third time, &c., and then we find that the House, according to order, proceeded to take into consideration the amendments made by the Senate to the Bill intituled "An Act further to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act," and that the same were read as follows. There was not one amendment only, but half a dozen, and these were read to the House in the usual way, and they were passed through in the usual way. I want to call the hon. gentleman's particular attention to the fact that they went through in the afternoon, so that there was no excuse for his not knowing all about them. He may be frequently absent during the evening, but these were read in the afternoon, and, besides, they were on the Order paper, so that the hon. gentleman has no excuse for not knowing about them. And they were on the Orders of the Day, so that the hon. gentleman's attention was called to the matter. Moreover, those amendments were all spread out upon the Journals of the House, as follows:—

Clause A.

Section eighteen of the said Act is hereby amended by adding thereto the following subsection:—

"3. The returning officer shall not receive the nomination paper of any member of the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories.

Clause B.

Section thirty-one of the said Act is hereby amended by adding after the word "and" in the second line thereof the words "two days."

Clause C.

Section thirty-two of the said Act is hereby amended by striking out the words "on the day" in the fifth line thereof and replacing the same by the words "two days."

Clause D.

Section thirty-three of the said Act is hereby amended by leaving out all after the word "division" in the sixth line thereof.

Page 2, line 26.—After "Territories" insert "and the application provided for by the subsection added to the said section by section eleven of chapter nineteen of the Statutes of 1891, shall be made to the said court in banco."

This is the amendment the hon. gentleman objects to. These amendments were agreed to by this House. Now, Mr. Speaker, this was done in broad daylight when, I presume, the hon. gentleman was in his seat in the House. The Votes and Proceedings show that during that afternoon or evening a division took place, and the hon. gentleman's name is recorded in the division. So the hon. gentleman was in the House or within the precincts of the House when these proceedings took place. Had the hon. gentleman paid the attention to his legislative duties that he ought to have paid, he would have known of these amendments, for he had the same notice of the amendments that I had. When these amendments were made I went into them to ascertain the effect of them, because, as I said before, they were made without my knowledge. When my attention was called to the fact that section 44 was amended, I went to the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald), who, I think, was the only representative from the North-west Territories about at the time, to ascertain what the facts were, and he explained to me why the amendment was made in the Senate. So the hon. gentleman's charge that I was responsible for that amendment falls to the ground. That amendment was made by the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill in the Senate on the advice of the representatives in that chamber from the North-west Territories. I would be quite willing to leave the matter there but the hon. gentleman goes further. He seems to wish to make a little cheap popularity by frequent clap-trap discussions of this matter. The hon. gentleman would give the members of this House to understand that by that simple amendment we have changed the position of voters in the North-west Territories and that the provisions he has read were new. He seeks to impress the people with the same idea, for in an interview with the hon. gentleman in the Winnipeg "Tribune," which was sent to me, the impression is conveyed that there is something new about it. Why, Sir, the Act the hon. gentleman has quoted is one of the Acts of 49 Victoria. Ten years ago that Act was passed in this House. So if any injustice was inflicted upon the people of the North-west Territories, it was inflicted upon them by the

Mr. DALY.

House of Parliament of which many hon. gentlemen still in the House were members.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And opposed it.

Mr. DALY. I do not know; I have not looked up the debates of the House of that time. At all events this is the law. Since then two elections have been held, and I fail to find that any of the charges made by the hon. gentleman have been borne out. I fail to find that either the newspapers or candidates in the elections have complained about the way the enumerations were made up. I was through that country in an election campaign in 1887. I saw those lists there, prepared, as they were, under the statute and I never heard any complaints, and we were associated day after day with gentlemen representing the Opposition. No discussion at all took place in reference to the way the lists were being made up.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They were made up to the day of the election, which cannot be done now.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The hon. member for Winnipeg says that under the amendment, if names are not on the list two days before the election they cannot be got on at all. Under the old law persons could swear in their names on the day of the election. That is the real charge. If he rested the charge there, I would be satisfied. But he goes further and makes the charge against the Government that we are seeking to disfranchise the electors of the North-west Territories by a law that he would give us to understand was passed in 1894 or 1895. But the enumeration lists are made up under a law passed ten years ago. What are its provisions? They were made to suit the peculiar conditions and requirements of the North-west Territories. It was well understood by Parliament that it would not do to apply the provisions of the Franchise Act to the North-west Territories. The most suitable law under the circumstances was passed. In discussing the provisions of the Act the hon. gentleman sneers at the idea of the Governor General appointing the enumerators, and says that disreputable men might be appointed, that disreputable men might be sent up from here. I think the hon. gentleman reflects severely upon the people of the North-west Territories. Does the hon. gentleman give us to understand by the charge he makes that disreputable men prepared the lists for the late local elections in Manitoba, I do not think that the hon. gentleman would like to admit that the men who prepared the lists in North Winnipeg and Brandon City and North Brandon were disreputable men. Yet I produced evidence the other day to show that hundreds of men were disfranchised by their names being left off the lists. In this case the Governor General will do just as he has done in the past—he will appoint men fit for the position.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He will appoint men whom he is advised to appoint.

Mr. DALY. Who advises the Attorney General at Winnipeg to appoint the enumerators under the Manitoba Franchise Act? Do they appoint any person opposed to the Government or do they appoint their own friends? I do not wish the House to understand that we are going to appoint Grit enumerators; I do not think the hon. gentleman expects us to do so. But we will appoint men capable of performing the duties assigned to them. I wish to call attention to the fact that these enumerators have to take an oath, and have to prepare their lists under the sanction of that oath. If the hon. gentleman could produce evidence that, in the elections of 1887 and 1891 enumerators were appointed who proved derelict in their duty, if he could show that people were disfranchised as he has given the House to understand, there might be something in his argument. But I defy him to produce the slightest proof that any person has complained, directly or indirectly, of the preparation of the lists in 1887 and 1891. The hon. gentleman does not give the same credit that I do to his political allies in the North-west Territories. He has had no experience of those gentlemen. I want him to understand that they are alive and that they have their organizations. I speak of what I know.

Mr. MARTIN. It did not make the slightest difference in 1887 and 1891, because they could get their names on the lists on election day.

Mr. DALY. Why, Sir, I have been engaged in contests up there, and I do not think the hon. gentleman took part in them, and it seems to me that no man ever fought harder to get their names upon the list and to elect their candidate than did our Grit friends in Eastern and Western Assiniboia, and the other constituencies. This Act, as it is now amended, does not give any advantage to the supporters of the Government as against those who are opposed to the Government, because the enumerator is bound to take their names. The only conclusion I can arrive at, when hon. gentlemen say, "Oh, oh," is that they have a different experience in preparing the lists to what I have. Are we to understand that those gentlemen know about how those lists are prepared, and that they do not do the square thing when they prepare the lists?—because that is the inference I draw from the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. I take it that a man who is sworn to do his duty, will do it, and any opponent of this Government, has, under the provisions of the Act, the very same chance of getting his name upon the list as does any person who is a supporter of this Government. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman sneered at the enumerators that would be appointed by the Governor General in Council, and shortly afterwards he came round and said that of course he could not object to the Governor General appointing the friends of the Government. Well, all that the Act presumes is that the Governor General shall appoint men who are fit to make up those lists. Now, what does all this amount to? It amounts simply to this, as I said before, that the conditions of that country are not such as to admit of our extending to it the provisions of the Franchise Act. In 1894 I introduced a Bill into this House for the purpose of extending the ballot to the North-west Territories, and in that Bill certain changes had to be made in the North-west Territories Representation Act, but those changes did not affect materially the mode of the preparation of those lists, other than the amendment which was made in the Senate in repealing clause 44. I think the hon. gentleman will have to make out a considerably stronger case than he has made to-day to prove to this House that any electors in that country will be affected in the slightest degree by the changes that have been made in the Act, because so far as the appointment of enumerators is concerned, and so far as the preparation of the lists is concerned, they will be prepared as they were in 1887, and as they were in 1891, and prepared under legislation that was passed in this House some ten years ago. So how could the hon. gentleman, or how can the legislative assembly, in the petition the hon. gentleman read, say that by the Act that was passed last session or the session before, we seek to disfranchise by wholesale the electors of the North-west Territories? Sir, the hon. gentleman threatened, but he had to withdraw the threat, that he was going to keep this House here until such time as he accomplished his purpose. I want to say to the hon. gentleman that we do not fear his threats. We are just as desirous of giving to the people of the North-west Territories a full franchise as he is. The hon. gentleman says that I went through that country and saw the people, and in consequence of my visit I came to the conclusion that if the provisions of the law remained as they were we could not expect to get the same representation. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that I do not fear the verdict of the electors of the North-west Territories.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You do not show any signs of it.

Mr. DALY. I do not show any signs of it in the slightest degree. I want to say to the hon. gentleman that remarks such as his are very stale. We heard in 1887 that the whole North-west representation was going to be opposed to this Government; we heard in 1891 that the whole North-west representation would go against this Government. But as the North-west people did in 1887, and as they did in 1891, the North-west people will do in 1896, and the hon.

gentleman will find that we will have a solid representation here supporting the policy of this Government the same as we had in 1891 and 1887.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For "this Government," substitute "the Government," and you will be right.

Mr. DALY. Well, for the Government of the grand old Conservative party, not a Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite, because I am sure the hon. gentleman will be a considerable number of years older before he sits upon the Treasury benches, notwithstanding his own inclination to get there. Now, Sir, I say to the hon. gentleman that the charge he made against me that this amendment was made by my conniving with the Senate, I have proved to be untrue. More than that, I had no thought or idea, when agreeing to the amendment that was made in the Senate, that it would affect in the slightest degree the franchise of the electors of the North-west Territories; more than that, the thought never occurred to me, and has never occurred to me, nor will it ever occur to me, until the last ballot is cast, that the North-west Territories will give any different verdict from the one they gave in the elections in 1887 and 1891.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has pointed out, in the speech which he addressed to the House, the very serious objections that lie against the law as it stands at this moment. He has also pointed out the possibility of disfranchising a very large number of the electors of the North-west Territories under the provisions of the law as it is. What defence or answer has the Minister made to that? Why, the hon. Minister says that the law as it stood before these objectionable amendments were made, worked satisfactorily, and he gives that statement as an answer to the argument of my hon. friend that the law was changed for the worse.

Mr. DALY. I said with the one exception.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, the hon. gentleman did not say that he was prepared to take away that exception, the hon. gentleman did not say that he was prepared to remove any of the objections which the hon. member for Winnipeg made to the law as it at present stands. The hon. gentleman did not say one word that can be regarded as an argument in defence of the amendments that were made in 1894 in the Senate, and which were allowed to stand in his measure of last session. Sir, if he looks at the facts as they are stated, what do they disclose? In the first place, the very objectionable condition of things exists, which the hon. gentleman says is to continue, that the Government, who stand as one of the parties on trial at an election, are to be the persons who are to appoint all the officers, who are to create the machinery under which their trial is to take place. Sir, there is no analogy between the condition of things that exists in Ontario and the condition of things that exists in the North-west Territories. The hon. gentleman said that we appointed Grits to office where an opportunity occurs. Why, Sir, has the Government of Ontario—and I take that as an illustration—provided for the appointment of their own friends under the Franchise Act for the preparation of the voters' list? Has the Government of Ontario provided for the appointment of the returning officers who are to hold the elections, when those elections take place in that province? No, Sir, the Government of Ontario provided by statute that certain officers, some of whom may be their friends and some of whom may be their opponents, are the persons under whose authority and responsibility the elections are to be held; but they also provided that the preparation of the voters' lists shall be in the hands of the municipality, the members of which are elected by the people who represent both parties, and the final appeal is to the county judge, that is, when a new appointment takes place, by the Government who sit here. Now, look at the condition of things in the North-west. The hon. gentleman says that they take care to appoint no Grits, and he says His Excellency makes the appointments, and therefore they will be proper appointments. Sir, the hon. gentleman might as well refer to the Lieutenant-Governor as a conclusive answer to the character of appointments everywhere. His Excellency, it is true, makes those appointments, but he does not choose the men. The men are chosen by the hon. gentlemen; they are named by the hon. gentlemen, and it is upon their responsibility that the appointments are made. The hon. gentleman may appoint in the North-west, as he or his friends have done elsewhere, bankrupts to office in elections, where it is known that if improper conduct takes place, no prosecution can be successfully had against them. That is the position which the hon. gentleman and his friends have practically taken, and he has referred us to His Excellency, whose name ought never to have been dragged into a discussion in this House, as a guarantee that the appointments will be all right and proper.

Mr. DALY. I rise to an explanation. I do not see why the hon. gentleman should state that I brought His Excellency's name into this discussion. I mentioned the name of the Governor General as given in the Act, and a child understands that it means the Governor General in Council. I never mentioned the name of His Excellency.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see, when he reads the report of his speech, that I am not misrepresenting him, and that I am not stating what he did not say on this occasion. What is the objection made by my hon. friend? It is, that by the alteration of the law it placed in the hands of the enumerator or revising officer, where there is one, power to disfranchise a portion of the population. Under the law, as cited, if a man's name is excised improperly, he could go before the enumerator on the day of polling, he could swear that he was entitled to have his name on the list, he could have it placed on the list by the enumerator, and he could thereafter record his vote. Can he do that to-day? If his name is left off the list, or struck off the list, can he go and vote? Everybody knows that he cannot do so. And the hon. gentlemen, by changes made by the Senate in a law affecting this House, know the position of the matter is this: that the party stands in a wholly different position from that which he occupied before. Why, an unscrupulous enumerator or an unscrupulous revising officer would not undertake to excise a name from the list, or leave it out after promising to place it there, if he thought that the party on the day of election would find a fraud had been practised, and he could still have his name placed on the list and still record his vote. There would be no motive under that provision of the Act for improper and fraudulent conduct. But does it stand so to-day; is that the position of the question at this moment? No. If a revising officer or an enumerator leaves a name off the list, and tells the party that he is entitled to vote, and that he will place his name on the list, and the man goes to the poll and finds his name not there, is he entitled to have his name on the list and have it then and there recorded? No. He will be told that he should have come and had his name added two days before. The opportunity is taken away; the temptation to fraud is created for the first time, and the list will be not only improperly made but it will be full of defects, and errors, and omissions, which cannot be corrected. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) has said the position of the North-west is peculiar, and that he cannot apply there the law as it exists in the older provinces of the Dominion. I do not dispute that such may be the case. It may be necessary to make special provision for the conditions existing in the Territories; but those should be rational conditions, and they should be such as to secure the rights and privileges of the electors, and not be framed for the purpose of taking them away. That is the condition of things now existing. Men will lose their right to vote—the number of voters will be diminished. On whose representation are enumerators or revising officers appointed? Upon the representation of the candidates which support the Administration, upon the representation of gentlemen who for the time being are sitting in this House, in so far as they become candidates again. Is not every officer so appointed friendly to them, and though the emolument may be small, nevertheless in that country it may be important, and be sufficient to place those officers under obligations to these men. Will they not undertake to promote their interest? Will they not feel that in looking after friends of the candidates and neglecting applications made by opponents, they are not doing an improper act? They may feel it is none of their business to see that names of persons hostile to the Administration are placed on the list. Was the condition of things such that the list would be full and fair, and the election an honest and free expression of public opinion? At all events, the evil has been enormously aggravated. Under the pretense of having an innocent provision added to the law, serious injustice has been done to a large section of the population, and power is given to effect serious frauds against which no remedy can be applied. You may prosecute a man elsewhere, if he has property which you can seize or reach, for the misconduct, but where you require no security of any kind, where you attach no penalties of any sort, the House should be specially careful to guard the interests, rights and privileges of the electors of the North-west; but you destroy every guard, you throw down every barrier that stands as an obstacle to fraud and wrong-doing, and the result is that hon. gentlemen opposite have created a state of things under the law that will prevent a free and full expression of the opinion of the electors in that country. That is a condition that should not exist. It is not creditable to this House if it permits it to stand; and it was an indignity to this House, that such matters which specially concerned its own rights and privileges and the representation of the people there should have been dealt with primarily in the Senate and not in this House of Commons. It is clear to any one who takes the trouble to look at the law that the law is seriously defective, that the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) should be made, and that full opportunity should be given to have as full and complete a voters' list in that country as can be prepared under the circumstances, and that an honest and fair opportunity should be given to the people to elect those candidates whom they prefer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the importance of the subject is such as to justify me in calling the attention of the House to it for a few moments longer, although I am free to admit that the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me (Mr. Mills) has presented it quite as forcibly as I can hope to do, and I only plead as an excuse for my observations the great importance and serious character of the Bill before the House. I am absolutely certain in my own mind that if hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House would give time and attention to the question before it for a few moments, they would all agree that injustice has been done. I am not going to discuss the ancillary point, as to whether the Minister of the Interior was or was not responsible for the change made. He said he was not, and we accept his denial. We start out with the fact that an Act was passed ten years ago for the preparation of voters' lists in the North-west Territories. The circumstances of the country are exceptional, and every hon. member will at once recognize that it was rather a crude scheme which was proposed and suggested, but still it was one which practically worked pretty well. The Minister of the Interior pledges his own experience in the House and his responsibility as a Minister, that the Act passed ten years ago worked passably well in two elections and that he for one never heard any complaint about it.

Mr. DALY. About the preparation of the lists.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The House will understand that my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) is simply seeking to put the Act in the same position as it was when the Minister of the Interior said it worked so well. The Act vests arbitrary and extraordinary powers in the enumerators. An opportunity is given to those persons whose names are omitted, or to those who think names are improperly on, to go to that enumerator and to have the omitted names put on or the wrong names taken off. There is large room even there for arbitrary and improper conduct on the part of the enumerator. There is large room for partiality and bias and prejudices to exhibit themselves. There is room there to make a list which may favour one side much more than the other. But, there was a clause inserted in the Act as it existed before the amendment which was intended to prevent, if possible, and to overcome that evil. That clause was, that if anybody was improperly struck off the list who was a duly qualified voter he could on election day take the oath that he was qualified, and be entitled to vote, even if a partisan enumerator left him off.

Mr. SPROULE. You cannot do that in any part of Canada.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is right, but the hon. gentleman will see that the Electoral Franchise Act of the rest of Canada was not applied to the Territories, that a special law was made for these Territories alone, and that that law as it formerly existed, while vesting extraordinary powers in the enumerator, had one security to the qualified voter, namely, that if his name was by accident or design omitted he could on election day vote on taking the oath. Now, why was that provision struck out? The Government did not advise that it should be struck out; nor did the Government bring a Bill to this House and ask that it should be struck out.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

It was not discussed in the House of Commons, but an amendment—not setting out what the object of the amendment was—but simply mentioning among the clauses that were to be repealed “clause 4” was inserted by the Senate. No human being unless he followed the legislation of this House most closely, would ever discover what the object of that was. He would have to get the original North-west Territories Representation Act, and the amendment, and read over section 44 to see what the clause was, which they were seeking to eliminate from the Act. Who asked the Senate to do that? Was there a petition from any one in the North-west Territories; there was none presented to this House. What right has the Senate—legal and technical right it may have had—to amend Bills passed by this House providing for the representation of members here? I submit it is not fair that Bills which pass this House providing for representation in this House, should be amended in the Senate; unless it is on occasions where some important omissions have been made and they are solicited to do so by the Government or by some person promoting the Bill. This amendment was slid in and no one knew anything about it. But we need not discuss by-gones here to-day. The question is: That a great evil having been committed are we prepared to remedy it? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) asks us to assume that all the enumerators will do even-handed justice. He knows well, and every member of this House knows, that of the two or three hundred revisers appointed to revise the lists throughout Canada, with all the security given by the fact that many of them are judges and lawyers, it takes an immense deal of time and money to make even an approximately accurate list. In the North-west Territories you have no revision at all, but suddenly, after the writ is out the enumerator is asked to make a list. He posts that list. One of his friends goes to him and asks that his name should be put on, and he can arbitrarily refuse to do it if he likes, or he may tell the man he will do it and when the man turns his back, he does not do it. There is no security to the voter. There is no court held, no means of compelling the enumerator to put it on. The one and only safeguard the electors had was, that if their names were omitted by the enumerator, they could go to the polls on election day and by pledging their oaths exercise their right to vote. The Minister of the Interior says that that provision worked admirably well, and he challenges criticism upon the practical working of that Act. I am willing to accept his statement that the Act as it did stand worked practically fairly well, but what we are seeking to do now is to put back that safeguard and put the Act where it was before the Senate foolishly amended it, we propose to restore the security to the electors which they formerly had, and which they are now deprived of. If hon. gentlemen find that the Bill proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) has the unanimous endorsement of the North-west Assembly, then I say the last vestige of opposition to the proposal should vanish. Why, Sir, I hold in my hands a resolution which was moved in the North-west Assembly by Mr. Insinger, which after reciting all the circumstances calls attention to the fact that this Act, passed in 1894, practically made the voters' lists final as fixed by the enumerators and excluded from the right of the franchise every man whose name was not on that list two days before the election. The resolution gives the following reasons why the Act as it now stands does not offer the same safeguard to the rights of electors, as the voters' lists in the provinces do. It says:

And whereas such lists of voters do not offer the same safeguards to the rights of electors as do the voters' lists in the provinces, inasmuch as,—

- (1) They are necessarily hurriedly prepared by enumerators between the time of the receipt of the writ for election and a week before the day of polling;
- (2) The time allowed to electors or their agents to ascertain if their names are on such list is, taken in connection with the distances generally to be travelled in the Territories, and with the fact that no fixed residences are appointed for such enumerators, insufficient for the purpose;
- (3) The enumerator is absolute judge of the right of an elector to be on such list, and he can put on or strike off names till within two days of the polling day, without notice from or to such electors;
- (4) There is no appeal from the decision of the enumerator, either to a revising officer or to a judge.

After giving these cogent and to my mind unanswerable reasons why the amendment made by the Senate is an unfortunate amendment which should be rectified at the earliest possible moment, the resolution winds up with the following:—

Therefore, in the opinion of this assembly it is desirable that the "North-west Territories Representation Act" be further amended so as to either adopt the system provided for in the "Territories Election Ordinances," or to bring into effect the provisions regarding voters' lists in the "Electoral Franchise Act."

That system of enabling a man to vote on election day by pledging his oath when his right to vote is challenged prevails in other provinces outside of the North-west Territory. In the province from which I come, in all the local elections, if the right to vote of any duly qualified elector is challenged, he can, by taking the necessary oath, poll his vote, and it has been found to work practically very well. The neighbours all around know whether the man is qualified or not and if he perjures himself he can be punished. In this case, Sir, you have the whole North-west Assembly, irrespective of politics, invoking the aid of this House to restore to the electors of the North-west the rights and privileges which they possessed before the Senate amendments took them away. My hon. friend (Mr. Martin) has proposed a Bill to carry out that wish. I was glad to hear from the remarks of the Minister of the Interior, that he has not yet made up his mind to oppose the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Martin), that he has not made up his mind yet, that he will not restore to the electors the privileges and rights which they possessed before. It boots not, Sir, to cite the fact that in Manitoba, as the hon. gentleman said, or in Nova Scotia, as another hon. gentleman said, there are evils existing in the electoral laws. We have nothing to do with that. If wrong was done elsewhere, it does not justify wrong being done here; two wrongs do not make a right. We are dealing with the fact that a grievous wrong has been committed—a wrong capable of being used by improper officers to such an extent as to almost disfranchise a majority of the electors in any one district. It is a wrong that would not be tolerated in any part of Canada outside of the North-west Territories, and, if I know the men there, from what I have seen of them, they are not the men to tolerate it, either; and when we have the whole North-west Assembly entering a public protest against that wrong, and asking Parliament to remedy it, I say that it is time that we should rise to the occasion, irrespective of party feeling or party affiliation, and determine that the wrong shall be rectified at the first opportunity. My hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was called to order for threatening to obstruct the business of this House unless this were done. His words were stronger than the rules of the House justified, but nobody doubts that the action he proposed to take would have been justified by the facts. Is it not absolutely intolerable that four districts which send members to this House should be absolutely and entirely in the hands of the nominees of the Government? Why, Sir, the fact only needs to be mentioned to excite horror, surprise and indignation; and I am satisfied that hon. members, if they calmly and coolly consider the matter, will repeal the ill-advised action of the Senate, and place the electors of the North-west in exactly the same position they were in before the Act of 1894 was passed.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, some days before the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) arrived here, and before I had any knowledge that he intended to move in this matter, I went to the Clerk and gave him a sketch of a Bill dealing with this matter; and as soon as he told me that the Bill was prepared, I gave notice that I would move for leave to introduce it. I think, Sir, that a great deal more has been made of this than there was any reason for.

Mr. MULOCK. What direction does your Bill move in?

Mr. DAVIN. It moves in the direction of repealing the legislation of 1894 and 1895, and reviving the legislation of 1886. My hon. friend from Winnipeg was most unjust in the strong attack, as it seems to me it may be called, which he made on my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior. If ever a man was innocent, my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was innocent of introducing this clause. After I have calmly laid before the House what the law was, and how the change came about, I rather think the House will see that a great deal more has been made of this matter than was necessary. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was quite right in saying that in 1887 and in 1891, the law, as it was passed in 1886, worked well. In my own constituency I did not hear a single complaint against the working of that law. But that was not the case in some other constituencies. In the constituency of my hon. friend from Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald), I have been told by him and by others, 107 names were sworn on the list improperly. In 1894 certain gentlemen from the North-west who took an interest in politics, and were strongly impressed that a wrong had been done by those unscrupulous persons swearing themselves on the list, urged that a change should be made in the direction which the reform of the law took in 1894; and an amendment to that effect was placed in my hands when the Bill of 1894 was passing through the House. I read the amendment at that time, and while I did not take such a strong view of it as is taken by hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-day, I came to the conclusion that it was undesirable to make such a change, and I did not move in the matter. I know I never brought it to the attention of the Minister of the Interior. That is all I know about it. When the Bill came down, it appeared that those gentlemen who were interested in the matter had moved in it in the Senate, and the change had been made there. Now, Sir, the change that was made is simply this—that instead of a man having the power to go on the day of election and make an affidavit that he has the qualification entitling him to vote, he can have his name put on that list up to two days before the election, by appealing to the enumerator, should it prove not to be there.

Mr. MARTIN. I beg pardon. There is no such provision. It is quite impossible to get his name on the list unless the enumerator is willing to put it there.

Mr. DAVIN. I think my hon. friend is wrong. Up to two days before the election he can appeal to the enumerator, and have his name put on the list.

Mr. MARTIN. Suppose the enumerator refuses?

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend does not understand the men in the North-west Territories. No enumerator there would behave in that manner. I quite agree that a critic, looking at the legislation as it is, might very properly see ground for alarm; but, knowing as I do the districts and the people, and the public criticism under which the enumerators would act, I do not apprehend any such dangers as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) anticipate; if I did, I would have moved in this matter before. But, Sir, there are persons in the Territories who do think there is some danger, and I grant you that a check on the enumerator has been taken away. Under the circumstances, I am inclined to think that it is not worth debating in this House for five minutes. I do not believe that the change which my Bill and that of the hon. member for Winnipeg contemplate will affect a single vote in any constituency. But if there is any feeling on the eve of election amongst any portion of the community—I do not care what side of politics they belong to—that a check on the enumerator had been taken away and that somehow the elector was put in a worse position than he was in before, it is not a matter we should quarrel about in this House, and the best way is to get rid of all cause for alarm.

Mr. MULOCK. I congratulate the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) on the tone of his remarks, and I only rise now to supplement something that fell from the lips of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and I would ask the attention of the hon. Minister of the Interior for one minute. It appears that the Bill complained of was passed through this House without much, if any, publicity. I think we may admit that its conditions were not known to the public intended to be affected.

Mr. DALY. Is the hon. gentleman referring to the Bill or to the Senate amendments?

Mr. MULOCK. I am speaking of what became of the Senate amendments.

Mr. DALY. They came down in the day time and were discussed in the day time.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not referring to anything which occurred in the House. What I say is that the people of the North-west Territories learned nothing of this proposition until it was incorporated in the statutes, and we have evidence now that the people of the Territories are in favour of a return to the old law, or, at all events, against the continuance of the present law. The opinion in the North-west Territories is against the law of 1895. That is proved by the unanimous resolution of the North-west Territories legislature, and also by the remarks of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). It is probable also that if other hon. gentlemen representing the Territories were to give the results of their knowledge of public opinion, they would corroborate what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg. My hon. friend from Queen's has suggested that, under the circumstances, it is the duty of the Minister of the Interior to place no opposition in the way of the measure proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg. I go further. I think it is his positive duty—not a merely negative one—to make this a Government Bill. It was through the Bill which the Minister of the Interior introduced that the law got tangled up as it is, and it is his duty, as a member of the Government, to adopt this proposed legislation with the view of having the law framed so as to meet public opinion in the North-west Territories. We all know that a private member can scarcely expect to get a public Bill through this House, and I would venture to say that despite all a member can do, there is not the slightest chance of a public measure introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg, or, for the matter of that, by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, becoming law. The only way by which this wrong can be redressed is by action on the part of the Government, and I therefore rise to suggest to the Minister of the Interior that it is the duty of the Government to undo their mistake by seeing that the proper safeguards are secured to the electorate before the election of 1896 comes on. If they do less than that, they will fail to do an imperative duty devolving on them. This discussion, this waste of public time, occasioned by hasty legislation, is an illustration of the manner in which, of late years, important measures affecting Parliament and affecting the public has been allowed to go through this House. We have seen, every session, important legislation put through at the last days of the session when there was scarcely a quorum present. We have seen millions of dollars voted away on bonuses. We have seen most important pieces of legislation put on the statute-book when but a small percentage of the people's representatives were here in Parliament.

Mr. McLENNAN. They should be here.

Mr. MULLOCK. I admit that, but the circumstances are such that many hon. gentlemen find it impossible to remain there. I was not one of the absent, because I took exception, in 1895, to the very clause which has been the subject of discussion to-day.

Mr. DALY. I want to relieve the hon. gentleman from any responsibility on his part, and other hon. gentlemen on that side from any responsibility on their part, through absence from the House. These amendments were agreed to one month before the session closed. The session did not close until the latter portion of July, and these amendments were agreed to in June, one month before the session expired, and, according to the records of the House, every member of the Opposition must have been present, because they all voted on a division. There was, therefore, no snap division by the House.

Mr. DAVIES. How is it, it was not known?

Mr. DALY. I do not know. It is for you to explain that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman never explained.

Mr. DALY. I had not the opportunity. I do not know that I was in the House when the Bill went through.

Mr. DAVIN. I spoke to Sir John Thompson on the subject, who had charge of the Bill.

Mr. DALY. I was absent from the House at the time.

Mr. MULLOCK. No; the hon. gentleman was in the House and took part in putting through the amendments from the Senate. This House prorogued on the 22nd July, and the Bill was put through on the 26th June, that is twenty-three days before prorogation. The hon. gentleman will remember that the session of last year was called at probably the most inconvenient period that could have been selected. It was called at a time when we should have been proroguing instead of convening. In the month of June, the attendance was slim, and the early part of July there were many days when scarcely a quorum was present. Towards the close, there were times when there were not over twenty members present out of the two hundred. While there was not such a limited attendance when these amendments were passed, still, the attendance was very small, indeed, and the law which got embodied on the statute-book had not the sanction of the majority of the people's representatives in Parliament. It was unknown to the people who were to be affected, and certainly a most irresistible case has been made out for the repeal of this measure.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to say a few words in reply to what has fallen from the hon. Minister of the Interior, because he resents the suggestion which I made that he is to blame for the law as it now stands. If only such matters as occurred in 1894 were in issue, I would be quite prepared to accept his statement; but my charges against him were not based on what happened in 1894 alone, but upon the fact that this amendment was brought to his attention last session, in 1895, when he was asked to make this wrong right. He himself was then obliged to introduce a second Bill to this House in order to correct some trifling errors in his Bill of 1894, because, strange to say, the Bill of 1894, while providing that no one could get his name upon the list on election day, provided that notices should be stuck up in the polling division notifying the electors that they could apply to have their names put upon the voters' lists, even on the last day, so that the hon. gentleman was obliged, on account of this inconsistency and error in his 1894 Act, to come again in 1895 and ask to have the change made. It was only when the Bill came up for discussion, and only upon the third reading of it, that members on this side learned of the change that was made in 1894. And a very strong appeal was then made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to the Minister of the Interior to right the outrage that had been perpetrated. More than that, I went to the hon. Minister in his seat and discussed the matter with him and urged him very strongly, as a matter of fair-play to the Liberals in the Territories, not to insist upon this change in the old law. But he took a firm stand, and said it was the policy of the Government to insist upon the Act as it had been amended. So I think the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was not justified in finding fault with me for putting the case against the hon. Minister as I did. The hon. Minister assumed the responsibility of the change at that time, and he defends it to-day. And for what purpose? What other purpose can there be than that I suggest? It is admitted, it must be admitted by everybody who considers the matter, that, under the law as it is at present, it is possible for the most gigantic frauds to be perpetrated in these elections. As I have said, it is possible for the Government to elect every member for the North-west Territories in the next general election, through the operation of this changed law. The hon. Minister, of course, repudiates the suggestion that he intends to do any such thing. If he has no such intention, why, then, does he take the power to do it? He offers only one reason, and that is that, in 1891, under the old law, certain frauds were perpetrated. If that is all, let him make some change which will right the wrong he speaks of, without taking the power to inflict this great wrong upon us. Surely, he can remedy one without causing the other. Let the hon. Minister take any course he likes, but I am going to protest, as I said before, against the Government taking into their hands the power they have under this Act. And I hold the hon. Minister of the Interior wholly responsible for it. I think I was quite justified, after the stand he took in 1895, in assuming, as I did, that his action in 1894 was taken advisedly, so that the House would not understand the change proposed. He says that the amendments were made in the Senate without his knowledge. I accept his word upon that point. But, when those amendments came before the House, surely, as a matter of fair-play, he should have explained to the House what the changes were. He stated that he had explained the changes to members from the North-west Territories, but, when I pressed him for the name of any hon. member to whom he had explained these changes, the only name he could give was that of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald), who has not had a word to say in defence of the changes then made. I could not believe that the hon. member for East Assiniboia would suggest this change. For what interest could he have in the elections? As I said before, he has been discarded by his party, he is of no further use to them. He made a very vigorous fight for the nomination, but he failed. Now, if it be true that, before these changes, outrages in the way of men falsely swearing their names upon the lists, is it not an astonishing fact to find that the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories, in their local elections adhere to the system we have abandoned? Under the law of the Territories any person can get his name on the list by going on election day and swearing that he is a British subject and is otherwise entitled to vote, just as, prior to 1894, a person could do in Dominion elections. It is hardly necessary for me to refer again to the absurd and childish argument of the Minister of the Interior in support of his plea that this change would do no harm. His argument was that the old law worked well, and, therefore, the new law would work well. The hon. gentleman must surely think there is neither sense nor reason in this House. In effect, he says that there is no difference between a list that means nothing and a list that is final and binding. When a list is made up which binds nobody, who cares what becomes of it or how it is made up. But if, in the meantime, you change the law so that the list, instead of being, as the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says, a mere list for convenience, to save time on election day, and make that list final and binding, surely you effect a complete change. You could perpetrate any fraud you liked in 1887 or 1891 in keeping men's names off the prepared lists, and we did not need to care, because we had privileges under the Act which countervailed all that wrong. But, if you attempt to perpetrate a fraud in 1896 which the Act gives you the power to perpetrate, we have no protection. The only course of safety is to have this vile iniquity purged from the statute-book. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) says this Bill cannot pass. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope it will pass. The hon. member for North York appeals to the Government in favour of the Bill. We tried that in 1895. But in 1895, unfortunately, when we first learned of this wrong, the Government business was done, and we had no chance of emphasizing our appeal effectually. We are in a different position at this time, Mr.

Speaker. I do not care whether my hon. friend's (Mr. Davin's) Bill passes or whether my Bill passes; but I ask and demand of the Government of the day the righting of this wrong. As I have already said, if they have no intention of doing us this wrong, let them relinquish the power to do it. I make the demand at the instance of the people of the North-west Territories. They are alarmed about this matter, and they have shown their alarm in the clearest possible way by a resolution passed by an assembly which, as I said before, is composed largely of Conservatives. The hon. member for West Assiniboia will agree with me in that. It is true that, among the members of that assembly, are the Liberal candidate for Alberta and some other Liberals. But I know a great many of them, and I think I am quite correct in saying that there is a considerable majority who are supporters of the present Government. Mr. Haultain, as I said before, the Premier, is the Government candidate in Alberta; and these gentlemen with one voice have condemned this outrage in language as strong and as clear as any that I have used to-day. They have pointed out the possibility of great wrong being done, and they have asked to have the law changed back into its old form, or else into their local Franchise Act, but it makes no difference for the purpose of the people which is done. I may say that I got a letter this day from a member of the legislative assembly urging me not to overlook this matter, to be sure and bring it up, and endeavour if possible to have the wrong made right. I again say that if this House does not at this session change that law, the prediction of the hon. Minister of the Interior will, no doubt, be fulfilled in the elections which will take place in 1896, and there will, no doubt, be four members returned supporting the Conservative party in the North-west Territories. I have no doubt about it, it is too clear for argument. I do not think that the Liberals would put up candidates, I do not think we will be able to find four men foolish enough to risk $200 under circumstances such as these. The Conservatives will get every seat, and possibly by acclamation. But, Mr. Speaker, if they will give us a fair chance up there, if they will repeal this iniquity and give us an equal chance with them in the election, I think the issue will be different. I may be right in my prediction that we will get the four seats, or the Minister of the Interior may be right in his. But there will be some equal chance for us, there will be some opportunity for a fight; whereas under this Act we have no chance and no opportunity. As I said before, it will be entirely useless for us to attempt to fight under the circumstances. Therefore, it is my duty, as the only representative of Liberal opinions, or the nearest representative to the Territories of Liberal opinions, to demand in this House that a change be made. While the hon. Minister of the Interior may take the stand, and his colleagues may support him in it, that he is going to take into his hands this enormous power for fraud, I doubt very much whether the members in this House supporting the Government on their general policy, will support them in any such outrageous proceeding as this. If there is any possibility, under the rules of the House, of bringing the matter to a vote, I shall certainly obtain a vote of the members upon this question. I hope when the occasion comes hon. members will see that the people of these four constituencies in the Territories have a fair chance to go to the polls and deposit their ballots, whether they happen to be in favour of or against the Government of the day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to prolong the discussion which my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has initiated, although I feel bound to say that I have failed to hear one single argument from the other side of the House in the slightest degree justifying the assumption of the monstrous power—and I use the word advisedly—which the Government have, without the real knowledge of the House, taken to themselves. The thing smacks of fraud of the grossest possible description. But what I want chiefly to call the attention of the House to, is this: As I understand it, this confusion has arisen, or the ignorance of the House has been caused, in no small degree, by the very mischievous practice which prevails in our legislation of repealing a clause by number, without giving full details of the clause that is repealed. I have over and over again protested against that practice in this House. I hold that it is the most slovenly possible legislation, when we are dealing with important subjects like this, to say you repeal such and such a clause, number so and so, of such and such an Act. Not one man out of fifty in the House knows anything about the matter in general when it is introduced in that fashion, still less, when it is introduced in the shape of an amendment from the Senate. Such a practice ought to be prohibited, I think, by a rule of this House; at any rate, the Government in particular ought to be exceedingly cautious not to allow any legislation which passes through their hands, to be conducted in such an exceedingly slipshod fashion. I hope and trust that my hon. friends will get an opportunity of testing the sense of the House on this question, because I myself am of the opinion that if this thing had been fairly presented to the House, the members on both sides would have refused to accord to the nominees of the Government any such power as that which appears to be given to them; and I trust that my hon. friend will take exceedingly good care that a test vote be obtained on this subject before we are much older.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Powell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Whatever results may follow as to the political future of this country from the events which have recently taken place in this House and in this city, I think it will hardly be denied that this result will, at any rate, be clear, that a very serious blow has been dealt, and a very disastrous effect has been produced upon the political morality of the people of this country, as well as upon the condition of things existing in this House. I do not think that at any time, within my knowledge of parliamentary affairs, at any rate, have we had the standard of propriety by which we are supposed to be governed, so entirely lost sight of as it has been lost sight of during the time that has elapsed since the 9th of this month. But be that as it may, we have now arrived at a condition of things, in which, I think, it is possible to adopt a different method of action. We have at last a Government, a Government such as it is, a Government composed of gentlemen who are not only entirely at variance with each other, whose only bond of union is a mixture of personal motives and party interests—it is hard to say which predominates—who profess allegiance to a chief, who certainly presides but does not govern, and whose term of office, even in the precarious position which he now occupies, is entirely dependent upon the convenience of those gentlemen, who, I think, at some loss to his own reputation, after their conspiracy against him, he was weak enough to take back into his councils. I say we have a Government, although it is not after all constitutionally constituted, according to the theory of the Minister of Finance, because it still lacks that important functionary, a Solicitor General. But I suppose the advent to its councils of the gentleman who was last admitted to it, must be taken as sufficient to countervail all the other defects. Now, Sir, I am not anxious to throw any discouragement upon the hon. gentlemen who seem to imagine that they have gained a great deal in the change that has been affected; but I think they will find the results will be far other than they expect. Sir, the Conservative party in this country—I speak rather for a very considerable proportion of that party which includes in it some of the best men of that party—have come to the conclusion that the policy which has been in power for so many years, is one which they can no longer support, and one which they will no longer support. The very fact that the man who is most responsible for the condition of things to which they object is the man who is brought in to strengthen it, is a reason why they will not give it the support which, under other circumstances, they might give it. Sir, I say we have a Government, and having a Government which has, I believe, a numerical majority in this House—although, I think, that numerical majority, if it were measured by the degree of confidence which they have in the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, would be exceedingly small—but having that Government, perhaps, it would be as well for us now to undertake the business for which we were called together. Especially when we consider that the period of time during which this Parliament can last, is short, and that the people of this country will shortly have an opportunity to pronounce upon the policy of those who now occupy the Treasury benches, and as the position of things, I think, is now pretty well understood throughout the country—perhaps, I say, it would be just as well if we were now to undertake the business for which we were called together. If we were to allow the bones of our grandfathers and great-grandfathers to rest quietly in their graves, and if we were to shut up our scrap books and abstain for a time from the delectable enjoyment of one side proving the other to be entirely disloyal and the other side proving their opponents to be entirely dishonest—if we were to abandon that entertaining process for a time, we might get down to the business for discussion. When we come to consider the Address we find in it a great deal of what may be termed padding. I do not think there is anything in the condition of the North-west Police or in the condition of the Indians to call to special reference in the Address, except for one or two reasons; either, in order to make what I call padding, or else to adopt the extraordinary hypothesis of the Minister of the Interior, and announce to the House that these were the personal opinions of His Excellency, and it was the right and proper thing to put them in the Address. One would be surprised at that, were it not for the fact that we have had so many extraordinary specimens of the hon. gentleman's ideas of ministerial responsibility, it is hardly possible to tell what next they might suggest. Those hon. gentlemen could not make up their minds with respect to the great question to which reference was made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) the other day. If they could not make up their minds on a matter of that kind, where not only great constitutional questions were involved, but where the life or death of a man was in issue, we could hardly expect that they would be able to decide anything more important than the condition of the Indians and the North-west Mounted Police. I was exceedingly pleased to hear the leader of the Opposition speak as he did in regard to the North-west Mounted Police. I have taken a good deal of trouble at different times to follow the actions of that body and to ascertain their condition and how far any changes were required, and also how far it was possible for the country to dispense with their services. But I am quite convinced of this, that what is so often considered as a reason why the North-west Mounted Police should be reduced in number and the expense of the force thereby diminished, namely, that this reduction might be achieved because there is an increase in the population of the country, is no reason why the force should not be maintained, at all events, at its present strength. The very fact that there is a more numerous body of white settlers, constantly brought into intercourse with the Indians, is a strong reason why the police should be maintained at their present satisfactory state of efficiency. There are roaming over the prairies immense herds of cattle. These are constantly encroaching on the Indian reserves, and were it not for the watchfulness of the police, who are constantly patrolling the country, we should have conflicts between cowboys and Indians over the slaughter of cattle which actually takes place and which would inevitably result in very serious disaster. If a white man's family were in a state of starvation we would not think it a very serious offence if he took a steer or a calf to feed them, and if we are prepared to make that excuse for a white man, surely we must judge still more leniently the Indian, who having been deprived of his source of food supply by the destruction of the buffalo naturally looks upon cattle roaming over the prairies as the most convenient substitute for that food supply which he has lost. The presence of these cattle on the plains has undoubtedly introduced another and important element of danger. The hon. gentleman for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) in the course of his remarks said something respecting the industrial schools, intimating that there had been a great deal of extravagance. Perhaps there may have been. I think if the secret history of the transactions in the North-west from the time of its first settlement was printed and published, it would be found that many things have transpired that would bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every one who has had anything to do with such transactions, and it would make many members of the Conservative party regret what has been done. However that may be, I think at the present time the affairs of the North-west, especially with respect to the Indians and the police, are fairly and honestly administered, and so far from there being a surplus of money or extravagance practiced with respect to the industrial schools, I consider, having had the pleasure of visiting some of them last season, that the only difficulty was not that they had too much money to spend but that they had too little. There may have been extravagance in some sections of the department, but I am not speaking of that matter; at all events so far as the schools are concerned and anything connected with the children and their teaching and anything connected with the direct administration of the schools themselves, want of money rather than too much money has been the trouble in those cases. Another paragraph of the Address which I was exceedingly pleased to see was that relating to the militia. The leader of the Opposition seems to think that there was a lingering taint of jingoism in that very modest and innocent paragraph. So far from that being the case, I hold that His Excellency the Governor General might have very properly, acting fully in accord with the sentiments of the people of this country, have expressed in positive terms, and not merely by implication, the wish, the desire and the determination of the people of this country to stand by the Empire under existing circumstances and under all dangers that might possibly arise. The arming and re-equipping of the militia is a matter that must have been undertaken under any circumstances. It was just as necessary a year ago as now; it has been necessary any time during the last ten years. So far as that is concerned, it is doing what any nation under the same circumstances would do. Something was said to indicate the idea that the extremely delicate susceptibility of our American neighbours might be offended if we adopted measures for self-defence. It has been suggested that such action might be looked upon as a menace and threat. But we must consider the classes with which we have to do in that country. The leader of the Opposition said, and I hope he said truly, that the educated classes, the poets and historians, and I think he might have added the bankers and moneyed men, were opposed to war. But unfortunately we know from experience those are not the classes that govern the republic of the United States, and the mere fact that President Cleveland thought it worth while to endanger his European reputation, to bring his country to the very verge of war in order that he might accomplish a political or party purpose, shows how great and imminent the danger was. If there was no great population to be influenced by such considerations, it would not have been worth while to issue the measure. View the matter as you will, either as a serious attack on his part on Great Britain, or view it merely as a political operation, the result remains the same—the fact of having done so proves that a large and important element can be influenced by such considerations, and that fact in itself is one of great danger to this country. If we have to take into consideration the feelings of those men to whom the leader of the Opposition referred, we would be perfectly safe in making reasonable preparations for defence, because we would be doing what they would approve and what they themselves would do under similar circumstances. So far as the other element, what we may call for the sake of distinction the jingo element, is concerned, I think people of that class are as likely to be discouraged by the fact that we are prepared to meet invasion, as encouraged by allowing them to entertain the idea that they can have a holiday excursion into Canada without danger to themselves and without loss. Dealing with this class of people, whose opinions, I think, only were concerned in this matter, I say it is far better, and far safer, and far more wise, and far more prudent, to let them understand that any machinations on their part will be met, not only by determination, but also by preparation and by resolute and determined action. It is far better to do this than to lead them to suppose that we are either so indifferent or so careless, or so cowardly, that they can walk over the frontier at any time it pleases them. As regards that view of the case we are perfectly justified in what the Government proposes, and we need not be at all uneasy about making all reasonable and necessary preparations. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said a good deal about the condition of the militia, and he quoted as his authorities the report of General Herbert some four years ago, and the address delivered by Col. Davis a few months ago. Well, Sir, I think the report of the General was rather severe, and I think the remarks of Col. Davis altogether unwarranted. The General undoubtedly was in the main correct. He was correct so far as our arms and accoutrements and equipments are concerned; but I think he spoke too strongly altogether so far as our organization is concerned. And as regards my friend Col. Davis, he is one of those gentlemen who always take a pessimistic view of everything. He is exactly the opposite of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant), who views everything through the most roseate spectacles. Col. Davis is a man who has always taken the greatest possible interest in the active force of which he is a distinguished officer, but I venture to say that if any one applied to Col. Davis's own regiment the remarks which he has applied to the force in general, he would resent it most bitterly. I say further, that if you were to tell Col. Davis he could not put his regiment in the field fully fit for service in the course of three days, he would think very badly of himself and his men. His remarks must be taken with a great deal of allowance as being a view of the case which I do not think the condition of things justifies. But, after all, it just comes down to a question of expense, and this House must be prepared to expect a very large demand from the Government. I am only afraid that the Government will not ask as much as is necessary to accomplish the object, and as much as I believe the people of this country are willing to pay. The arms and equipments of the active force will alone cost a very considerable sum, but what will be a still greater expense, if the country is to be defended, will be the necessary outlay upon field artillery and heavy guns. If the work is to be done effectively, done, I hope, once for all, at any rate during the lifetime of the present generation, it can only be done at a very considerable expense, and one which this country must be prepared to bear. I am glad to learn from gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House that any reasonable and necessary expenditure in that direction will be heartily supported by them. I may say, Sir, that so far as the expenditure of the Militia Department is concerned, so far as it has recently been concerned, so far as it was concerned under the gentleman whom I am sorry to see is leaving that department just as he was beginning to learn something about it and showing an ability to deal with it: so far as the expenditure is concerned under his regime, there has been no expenditure of which this country need complain. I do trust that in the expenditure of the large amount which will be necessary there will be exercised the prudence which we have a right to expect. It is rather a matter of congratulation to us that in dealing with this matter we shall be dealing with the Imperial authorities, and there can hardly any question arise as to whether we are paying the right amount for anything we purchase from them because all these things are regulated by order, the price of everything is known, and it is scarcely possible that anything improper can be done in carrying out such arrangements. Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question which has occupied so much the attention of this House and for which we are specially summoned to meet, I have also a word to say. Sir, I am not oppressed by these difficulties and perplexities that seem to weigh so heavily upon the minds of certain hon. gentlemen. Viewing the matter as I do, my course is perfectly clear. I do not want a commission to tell me how to act, for I have quite determined that I will not act. My ground is this: I say that we are not called upon to settle this question. I say the question has been settled: settled by the authority which has the right to settle it, and I say it is our duty to leave it in the hands of those to whom it properly appertains. And when I hear so much about the rights of minorities, I meet that by saying that minorities have no rights except such as they enjoy in common with the rest of the fellow-subjects of Her Majesty. It is this theory about the rights of minorities which gets us into a great deal of our troubles and difficulties.

What justification is there, in dealing with the people of this country, for treating them and legislating for them as though they were divided into two hostile camps or into two different communities? What right have we, by our legislation, to recognize either a Roman Catholic population, or a Protestant population, or a population of any denomination whatever. I say that the minority, either in Manitoba or Quebec, have no rights except such as they enjoy in common with all the rest of the Queen's subjects. Speaking of the province of Quebec, we have thrown in our teeth the old worn-out argument which has been refuted a dozen times over: that the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec, as regards the subject of education, stands upon the same footing as the Roman Catholic minority in the province of Ontario. Well, Sir, it is hardly necessary to again refute that statement, because every one who has taken the trouble to investigate the subject knows that the so-called separate schools in the province of Quebec are not sectarian schools, and there would be no hardship were every Roman Catholic in Quebec compelled to attend these schools. But it would be a totally different thing if that Protestant minority were compelled to attend what are called the public schools in Quebec, because then they would be compelled to accept sectarian teaching, which, of course, they would not be willing to do. It is just as well to dismiss from our minds that argument which has been so often made use of. I deny that there is any sort of analogy between the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec as regards education, and the Catholic minority in the province of Ontario. Taking my own argument that minorities have no rights other than those I have referred to, I say it would be a gross violation of their rights as British subjects to compel the minority of Quebec to attend the public schools there. It is simply as a matter of justice that they are allowed to have schools in which the dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church are not taught. There is no privilege about that. But when you ask us to give the people of Manitoba, or of any other province, the right to have sectarian education apart from that of the rest of the population, then you at once violate the rule, and you do not give a right but a privilege. There is no question of rights concerned in it. You establish a privilege. The trouble that lies at the bottom of our difficulties is this granting privileges under the name of rights. There is no right about it. We all stand here on the same footing as regards the law, and the constitution, which declares that there shall be no state church, and no interference with the religion of any one. Then the last resource is, that they fall back upon the constitution. Well, Sir, to use a slang expression of modern times, it makes me tired to hear the Minister of Finance talk about the constitution. Why, there is not a single principle involved in the constitution which that gentleman and his colleagues have not violated over and over again, when it suited them to do so. I should like to know how they could more signally have violated the constitution in regard to the constituency of Cardwell? They kept, for three years, a man sitting in this House who had the promise of an appointment in his pocket, and the vacancy kept open for him. Was not that a most direct violation of the Independence of Parliament Act? Why, if the man had held the office, and at the same time sat in the House and enjoyed the salary, it would be merely extending the thing a little further, because the principle in both cases was virtually the same. They talk about the constitution. They can regard the constitution when they have a political object to serve, but otherwise the constitution weighs very lightly upon their consciences. Holding these views, Sir, I have no difficulty in dealing with this question. I have no difficulty in saying that I will oppose remedial legislation. I do not agree with my hon. friend on my right (Mr. McNeill) that a commission is necessary, because I say I am not going to act; and if I am not going to act, I do not want a commission to tell me how I ought to act. I am relieved from that perplexity. I say this question belongs to the people of Manitoba, and I am not going to take it out of their hands. But I do agree with that hon. gentleman in opposing any attempt on the part of the majority in this House—if it proves to be a majority—to force on the people of Manitoba legislation which they say they will not accept. On this question there will be ample opportunity for further discussion when the Bill comes down, if it ever does come down, as I suppose it will. There seems to be considerable difficulty about that Bill. We know enough about it to know that it is not yet settled. Here we have been sitting since the opening of the House on the 2nd of January, and yet we are told, on semi-official authority, that the Bill is not yet settled—that the details are not settled. Why, Sir, the whole value and interest of the Bill depends on the details, and if the details are not settled, you might as well say that there is no Bill. Whether we shall have another ministerial revolution before it is brought down, we cannot say; it is hardly worth while to speculate on what may happen in the future. As the hour for adjournment is approaching, I do not propose to deal any further with this question. What I say is simply this, that, being perfectly free as to my course with regard to the question, and my resolution being to oppose any measure of legislation on the subject, I am not troubled with perplexities about commissions or anything else. I see no difficulties in my way. I shall simply oppose any attempt on the part of this Government to interfere with Manitoba in the exercise of its constitutional rights. Holding this view, I shall oppose to the uttermost, as fully and as strongly as the rules of Parliament will permit, any attempt on the part of this House to force legislation upon Manitoba.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. TARTE. Mr. Speaker, the first ministerial crisis of the season, being at an end, we are now invited to answer the Speech from the Throne. I beg to assure my hon. friends opposite that they are under a great misapprehension when they state that we are disappointed at the result of the skin-deep troubles that have taken place recently between the Ministers. The Government, as it is to-day, is, from an electoral standpoint, the best Government that could be desired. We like to have them as they are. The country will not suffer long at their hands. They claim that they have been greatly strengthened by the last crisis. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) used the words "immensely strengthened." Well, Sir, I hope that, at any rate, they have been strengthened to such an extent as to be able to go on with the affairs of Canada. We have not been convened as a Parliament to witness the quarrels and wrangles of the Ministers. Two new Ministers have been added to the Administration—Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Alphonse Desjardins. They are not new men; they are known. Sir Charles Tupper is an old parliamentary hand. It was rumoured that he would do us the honour to test the feeling of the city of Montreal. We heard that we were going to lose the services of the eminent gentleman who now represents Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), and that Sir Charles Tupper would run as a candidate in that division. I am sorry to say that he has changed his mind. Montreal West would have been a fair ground on which to test public opinion. It is a great division, inhabited by bankers, business men, and labouring men. He has changed his mind; or rather his friends, I suppose, have decided that it was not safe for him to test the feeling of the city of Montreal; and they have been prudent, because I venture to assert that Sir Charles Tupper would have been defeated just as badly as Sir William Hingston was defeated. He has gone to another province, his native province—to Cape Breton. He has gone where, if I may be allowed to say so, his friends hope that coercion may be used. Coercion seems to-day to be the first plank in the platform of our ministerial friends. In Cape Breton there is a strong element of workmen employed in the mines, and our hon. friends rely on coercing those men. I hope that their object will be defeated. Mr. Alphonse Desjardins, as I have said, is not a new man; he was for years a member of this House. My hon. friend from Pictou, the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said the other day that Mr. Desjardins had been chosen because he was a member of the Senate. My hon. friend has a short memory. Mr. Angers' portfolio was vacant since the 8th of July last, and during the intervening six months it was offered to at least half a dozen of people. It was offered to Mr. Chapleau repeatedly by the First Minister himself, and even by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) who, in former days, did not think so much as he seems to think now of Mr. Chapleau. The portfolio of Mr. Angers, having been declined repeatedly by Mr. Chapleau, was offered to Mr. Flynn, a member of the Quebec Administration, who also declined. It was then offered to Mr. Pelletier. Those three gentlemen are not members of the Senate. Mr. Pelletier declined, under circumstances of which we are all aware. And if the county of Charlevoix is not represented to-day in this House, it is because it was left vacant in order to supply a constituency in which Mr. Pelletier might run as a Minister. But the results of the election in Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier upset all his calculations, and so he, too, declined that portfolio. I venture to assert—and I do not think I will be contradicted by any one of my hon. friends in the Conservative ranks—that in the whole province of Quebec there is not a single county in which a member of this Administration could be elected; and that is the reason why a member of the Senate has been chosen to take the vacant portfolio. But we have been told by the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) that the recent troubles had been productive of this good at least, that remedial legislation was now safe. I must admit that when I heard the statement I was a little surprised. I had heard it stated so many times by Ministers of the Crown, members of Parliament, I had seen it stated so many times in the ministerial press that remedial legislation was safe, that I was surprised to hear it had become safe only since the return of the seven members of the Administration who had gone out on strike. Is it because remedial legislation has become so safe that they returned? Is it because Mr. Desjardins was tricked into entering the Government? Because I hear, and I would like to be told that I am wrongly informed, that when Mr. Desjardins accepted the portfolio, the seven members—six of whom have since returned—were then out. He was tricked into entering the Cabinet, and being in it when the six bolters came back, he stayed in. Is it on account of that fact that remedial legislation is safe? Nobody will believe it. Outside those walls there is nobody who believes the statement which was read to the House the other day. Outside this House people say : It is not because the portfolio of Mr. Angers was vacant that the seven Ministers went out. Certainly public opinion says : It is not because Senator Desjardins entered the Cabinet that the six bolters came in after him. What is believed outside these walls is this : We know what took place. A great crisis, a great danger, came on the Government. The Ministers had made up their minds that the First Minister was not a fit man to lead them, and they had arranged among themselves that Sir Charles Tupper was to be their Premier. A caucus was to be held, the whole thing was arranged ; but there appeared in the Toronto "Mail" one day the warning that nobody could tell what might happen ; and the bolters and their friends read up their parliamentary law and discovered that perhaps His Excellency might feel constrained to send for the leader of the Opposition. Then they made up their minds to swallow everything they did not like before ; they made up their minds to take back just as much water as was necessary—and then they are back again. Previous to that crisis they had lost the confidence of their friends. That confidence they have not yet recovered. I shall not trouble the House with reading many newspaper extracts, but I cannot resist the temptation to read an extract from a newspaper of Montreal, which is known as the most important French paper in the province of Quebec, and it is a Conservative paper called "La Presse." After having expressed its satisfaction that foreign countries do not pay more attention to our internal affairs, because, if they did, they would look upon us as a lot of savages, that newspaper goes on to say :

Sir Richard Cartwright made a speech, or rather, he made a lecture on parliamentary law, which places in its true light the conduct of the strikers in the Cabinet. Sir Richard pointed out the base conduct of those politicians who, after preparing the Speech from the Throne, went back on it, and gave up their positions, at the very moment when that Speech and the measures it propounded were about to be discussed by Parliament. This matter, however astonishing it may be, has caused no astonishment to "La Presse." We have always expected some coup of this kind from Hon. Mr. Foster since the matter of the French Treaty. The Hon. Mr. Foster has gone back on the Speech from the Throne that was prepared with his co-operation, precisely as he went back on the French Treaty prepared by his Government. He has gone back on Sir Mackenzie Bowell just as he went back on Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper. In these two matters Hon. Mr. Foster has shown himself as he is, and what he is is not either agreeable or pleasant.

"Rejouissant" is the French word.

Those who have followed him and conspired with him are no better than he, and have no more claim upon public confidence.

The "Catholic Register" also published an article on the subject, from which I will extract only a few words :

Will Sir Charles Tupper—for he is now virtually Premier of Canada—attempt to pass a Remedial Bill ? Will he stake his success upon that issue after what has taken place within the Government ? With the intentions of the Government henceforward honest men can have little concern. They are discredited, in a ridiculous position before the country. It would be absurd to expect anything definite from them. This is the view we expressed last week, and all that has occurred since has helped to confirm us in our opinion. They have lost every claim to confidence, every right to public trust. They have lost all the instincts of statesmen, even of average politicians. The only characteristic that still clings to them is their dogged pertinacity to retain the fruits of office. We do not apply these remarks to all the members of the Government, for we know not for how long or how short it may be until another crisis arises as important as the one now announced over. But the deserters of last week are, for the moment, in control of the policy of the Conservative party, and, as they are men unworthy of confidence, and equal to any species of political villany it is they who must now be judged and condemned.

Is it possible that we may have another ministerial crisis in a short time ? We know nothing about it ; but I hope, for the sake of the country, that these forebodings may not be realized. I hope that in a few days we shall have before us the ministerial measure which has been the cause of so much trouble, I mean the School Bill. Before entering upon the discussion of the school question, I wish to say a few words as to the position in which we are placed, politically. We are a confederation, composed of seven provinces. Under the Confederation Act there was a division of powers. The Dominion was allowed certain rights and powers, while certain rights and powers were given to the provinces. The provinces received the exclusive right to deal with educational matters, with the proviso that, under certain circumstances, where the minority were dealt with in an unjust manner, the central power might interfere. Sir, I hold it to be a dangerous heresy to say, as the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has said, that on the Manitoba school question the Dominion Parliament has as much right as the Manitoba legislature had. I say again that that is a dangerous heresy, and, in the name of the province of Quebec from which I come, I protest against that doctrine. It would be a most dangerous doctrine to assent to here. The Dominion Parliament have rights in the matter—there is no doubt about that—but those rights are limited, as they are conditional. Applying these principles to the Manitoba school question, I shall proceed to an examination of the question itself. From 1870 to 1890 there existed in Manitoba a separate school system. I am not here to say that that system had given entire satisfaction. But that does not affect the case as it is before us to-day. In 1890 the legislature of Manitoba, by a nearly unanimous vote, abolished the then existing system and adopted certain school laws. The minority protested. There was an immediate request for the disallowance of the Bill. My hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), Archbishop Taché, and Mr. Bernier, who was then superintendent of education, signed a petition for the disallowance of the Bill. Complaints were made. That petition was not entertained, those complaints were not listened to; and, on the 19th March, 1891, the then Minister of Justice made a report concluding with the recommendation that the school laws should be allowed to go into operation. In 1892 the legislature of the North-west Territories adopted ordinances which, as a matter of fact, practically disposed of the separate school system. The minority, especially the religious leaders of the minority, protested and asked for the disallowance of the Bill. The whole episcopacy of Canada joined with them and asked for the disallowance of these ordinances. Complaints were made, petitions were sent in. These complaints and petitions were not entertained, and again the then Minister of Justice made a report concluding with the recommendation that the ordinances should be allowed to go into operation. In 1894 the legislature of Manitoba enacted other school laws, or rather, amended its school laws of 1890 to give them greater strength. Again, Sir, there were petitions for the disallowance of those laws. Petitions were sent by the Roman Catholic Episcopacy throughout Canada. They were unanimously signed. I must immediately state, speaking for myself, that I did not sign them. I had previously signed another petition asking for disallowance, but there was something in these petitions with which I could not agree. Then we had a report from the Minister of Justice deciding that those enactments should be allowed to go into force and operation. The Government took upon themselves to consent that these laws should come into force. I do not say that they are responsible for the entire policy followed by the local legislature of Manitoba, but they are to a certain extent responsible for the laws that are to-day on the statute-book of that province. They had full power to disallow those laws, but they did not do so. If the Government had any desire to use that right of disallowance, they could have availed themselves of the advice of the Supreme Court. When Mr. Blake, in 1890, offered to the House the resolution that was acted upon in 1891, he explained in the House that he did not intend to apply his resolution only to the right of appeal, but the object was that the law which might be enacted later on, could also be used so as to allow the executive Government at Ottawa to apply to the Supreme Court for advice in case of disallowance. The resolution read as follows:—

It is expedient to provide means whereby, on solemn occasions touching the power of disallowance, or of the appellate powers as to educational legislation,—

The words "touching the exercise of the power of disallowance" are in the resolution, and the law which was enacted in 1891 is based on that very resolution, and covers the very same ground. The Government, then, if it had any desire to exercise the right of veto, could have availed themselves of the law which they themselves had placed on the statute-book. They thought that it was better to allow these laws to go into operation, and the right of veto was not exercised. And yet, Sir, on how many occasions of less importance has that right of veto been exercised. I am always surprised when I hear members of this Parliament express their disgust, if I may so speak, at the exercise of the right of veto. Not very long ago, even the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) called for the exercise of the right of veto in the matter of the Jesuit Estates Act, and he was supported by a certain number of members of this House, and by a large body of public opinion. Yet that Jesuit Estates Act was altogether a provincial matter. The rights of nobody had been taken away. The province of Quebec had simply disposed of moneys which were its own, as it thought proper to do. But now we are told that the exercise of the right of veto would have been a radical remedy. That is true, but I want to know if what we are asked to do to-day, is a less radical remedy. Suppose that the School Act of Manitoba had been disallowed, we are told that it would have been enacted again. That may be true, but the people of Manitoba, the majority and the minority, would have had time to think over the matter. The laws might have been enacted again, they might have been amended, probably they would have been amended. But by not disallowing those laws, this Government consented that they should come into operation, and they have been in operation for the last six years. We have allowed the province of Manitoba to establish within its own territory a school system. We have not disallowed their laws, and they are now in full force and operation. We have done more than that, we have referred the question to the courts of justice, and what has been the result? The result is that the laws enacted in 1890 have been declared constitutional by the highest court of the Empire. Therefore, we are face to face with that combination of things, a condition that we cannot ignore. The laws have not been disallowed, but they have been declared constitutional, within the province of Manitoba, by the highest court in the Empire. Sir, I cannot help thinking, I cannot help saying, referring again to the right of veto, that if the legislature of the province of Quebec had taken away the rights of the English minority in that province in the same way, that law would have been disallowed. But I do not wish to recriminate, I only wish to state the facts as I believe them to be true. Sir, the position, as I have described it, does not alter the main fact that the minority has a grievance. The Privy Council, the highest tribunal of the Empire, has admitted and declared that the minority has a grievance. That court has left with us, as it was bound to do, the responsibility of dealing with the matter, and applying a remedy. What has the Government done to remedy that grievance? Immediately after the judgment of the Privy Council was received, they issued their first remedial order, on 19th March, 1895; and a month after that order was issued, there was a ministerial crisis. What more did they do? They issued on the 27th of July a second remedial order, and it was so inexplicable to the public that when the Postmaster General visited the good old city of Quebec and was interviewed by a newspaper reporter, and asked if there was any truth in the rumour that a new remedial order had been issued, he denied positively that he had knowledge of any remedial order. Nevertheless, the remedial order had been issued. Parliament was called on the 2nd of January. The Speech from the Throne was read by His Excellency. In that Speech it is pointed out that a Bill for remedial legislation would be submitted. A second ministerial crisis followed that announcement. I have stated these facts because I have come to a conclusion, which I am sure is shared by all persons who have carefully thought over the position. All these crises, all these vacillations on the part of the Government have led the people and the government of Manitoba to believe that they had with them the majority of the Ministers of the Crown. There has been crisis after crisis, there has been difference after difference between Ministers of the Crown. What did these hon. gentlemen say outside of Parliament? We all remember the celebrated speech which the ex-Controller of Customs, whom I am glad to see in his seat, delivered on 12th July last. He stated to a newspaper not very long ago that before delivering his speech he showed it to the Prime Minister.

Mr. WALLACE. I deny that statement.

Mr. TARTE. I read it in the papers.

Mr. WALLACE. I never saw such a statement in the newspapers.

Mr. TARTE. I read it myself; nearly every member of the House read it. It was published in the Toronto "World," I think, and not contradicted until to-day. At all events I am very glad, indeed, for the sake of the Prime Minister to know that the Controller did not show the speech to him. But the speech was made, and the hon. gentleman remained a member of the Administration, as Controller of Customs. The hon. gentleman visited Halifax and attended a large Orange convention, and there also he made a speech. At that time he was Controller of Customs, and the speech was to the same effect as that which he delivered on 12th July. The hon. member remained a member of the Administration. What took place during the recent elections? The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) made a speech at Cannington on 19th November last, at which the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture were present. The present member was asked what course he would take on the school question. His answer was:

All I ask is to let me first see the measure before I am asked to support it, before I am asked to say whether I will support it or not. Let me know first what the Government proposes. I do not believe they have yet agreed as to what their policy is going to be.

His colleagues were present, and they did not say a word. What did the hon. gentleman say at another meeting held while the Ministers were in the riding? He was present at a meeting on 26th November, at Longford Mills, at which Mr. Edgar was present. I read from the report:

"You are the Government candidate. Will you support the Government Bill?"

Mr. McGillivray.—"I will not be pledged, and the Government is not pledged."

The people and government of Manitoba were led to believe, as I have said, that they were receiving support and co-operation at the hands of the Dominion Government. Sir, what was the campaign conducted by the "Mail" during the last six months? The leader of the Opposition and myself have been every day accused of wishing to coerce Manitoba. The Manitoba government, thinking they were supported by members of the Administration, and encouraged by them, made up their minds to appeal to the electorate. I was surprised to hear the Minister of the Interior make light of the elections in that province. It seems to me that a responsible member of the House should not, on such an important occasion, make light of the verdict just rendered. We are face to face with a grave crisis. The people of Manitoba have practically pronounced themselves a unit on this question. Certainly, I do not agree with the verdict which has been rendered, but whether we agree with it or not, the verdict is there. In what position are we placed to-day? The laws of 1890 and 1894 have not been disallowed, and they have been declared constitutional. The majority of the people of Manitoba are in arms against interference from this Parliament; the minority are clamouring for redress and for justice, and the public opinion in this Parliament and in Canada is deeply divided. This is the result of six years of vacillation and unsound policy. What are we going to do? The Government has announced a policy. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has said what is true, that the Government have not yet agreed on the Bill they are going to propose to this House. They know it, and their friends know it. The Parliament of Canada has rights, but those rights are limited and conditional. We have no precedent to guide us in this important action; the only precedent we possess is one by which we cannot be guided, but one by which we can be, to a certain extent, enlightened, and that is the New Brunswick school case. I will recite in a few words some of the circumstances of that case. In 1871 the New Brunswick legislature adopted certain school laws. In the session of 1872, Mr. Renaud first brought the question before the House of Commons on a motion for documents, and several speeches were made. Among the speakers were Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier. As I said: we cannot be guided by this case altogether, but certain opinions which were expressed then may be of great use to us now. Sir John Macdonald was asked at the time to disallow the law, and he said:

As the officer primarily responsible on such subjects, he could only say that he had taken uniform care to interfere in no way whatever with any Act passed by any of the provincial legislatures, if they were within the scope of their jurisdiction. There were only two cases, in his opinion, in which the Government of the Dominion was justified in advising the disallowance of a local Act: First, if the Act was unconstitutional, and there had been an excess of jurisdiction, and second, if it was injurious to the interests of the whole Dominion. In the case of measures not coming within either of these categories, the Government would be unwarranted in interfering with local legislation. In the present case there was not a doubt that the New Brunswick legislature had acted within its jurisdiction, and that the Act was constitutionally legal and could not be impugned on that ground.

And further on he said:

If the legislation was bad, if it bore on them unjustly, that injustice pressed at the polls would force the legislature to do justice. They had, in his opinion, a just cause, for it was for the interest of education that, if a large body like the Catholics of New Brunswick desired a separate school system, they should have it, but it could only be obtained by working for it. An important body like that, holding the balance of power, could force upon the legislature a separate school system. They might not do it this session, but they could afford to wait, as the Catholics of Ontario waited, and the moment a law was secured, then they were protected by the provisions of the Confederation Act, and no power of the local legislature could ever deprive them of it. It would be a wonderful mistake in the Catholics of New

Mr. TARTE.

Brunswick, and they would be throwing away their case, if they upheld the Act lately repealed as being sufficient for their purposes, but it was a matter for them to decide, and it was not for Canada to dictate what the legislature of New Brunswick should do. The Government of the Dominion could not act, and they would have been guilty of a violent wrench of the constitution if, because they might hold a different opinion, they should set up their own judgment against the solemn decision of a province in a matter entirely within the control of that province. The constitution, which had hitherto worked so easily and so well, could not survive the wrench that would be given if the Dominion Government assumed to dictate the policy or question the action of the legislatures of the different provinces on subjects reserved by the British North America Act to those legislatures. Sir, I do not intend to be bound by the doctrine laid down in the speech I have just quoted, but in view of the great importance of the question we have to decide now, I thought it well to put the opinions of such high authorities before this Parliament. Well, the New Brunswick school question continued on. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) brought up a motion for the disallowance of the Bill and there was a vote upon it, but the first time his motion was not acceded to. The Government of the day headed by Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier accepted the motion made by Mr. Colby, asking the legislature of New Brunswick to remedy the evil themselves. Time passed on and the legislature of that province declined to act. What took place then? In the session of 1873, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) brought up the question again and asked for the disallowance of certain enactments which had been made by the legislature of New Brunswick in 1872. His motion carried by a majority of 35 in the House, in spite of all the efforts of Sir John Macdonald against it. Although the Government had been ordered by the House to act, it refused to advise His Excellency that the law should be disallowed, and the whole question was referred to England. It is very interesting to-day to read the answer that was given at the time by Lord Kimberley in the name of the Imperial Government. The Imperial Government took a view which is scarcely credible at the present time. I will only read part of the answer which is dated "Downing St., June 30th, 1873." After having recited what took place in the House of Commons his lordship goes on to say:

That these Acts of the New Brunswick legislature are, like the Acts of 1871, within the powers of that legislature. That the Canadian House of Commons cannot constitutionally interfere with their operation by passing a resolution such as that of the 14th of May last. If such a resolution were allowed to have effect, it would amount to a virtual repeal of the section of the British North America Act, 1867, which gives the exclusive right of legislation in these matters to the provincial legislatures. That this is a matter on which you must act in your own individual discretion, and on which you cannot be guided by the advice of your responsible Ministers of the Dominion.

Well, Sir, that is a pretty strong view of the powers of a provincial legislature, and it is the reason why I am surprised to see a man in the position of the Minister of the Interior making light of the verdict which has just been rendered by the people of Manitoba. As a French-Canadian, as one of the minority, I say that that verdict, and that the appeal to the courts of justice by which the laws have been declared constitutional, are the worst blows we have received. But, in spite of all that, the minority have a grievance, a great grievance, and we have to deal with it. Again, I ask, what are we going to do? The Government have told us that they are going to bring down remedial legislation. We do not know yet what that legislation is going to be. Nobody knows it; the Ministers themselves do not know it. What system of education are they going to give to the province of Manitoba? We in Quebec are having a great fight these days on educational matters; and, speaking with a full sense of my responsibility, and with a knowledge that my words will be reported, I say for one that I do not wish for the establishment in Manitoba of the Quebec system. Men of the stamp of Senator Masson and others, men of large experience, are trying, day by day, with the greatest efforts, and in the face of the greatest difficulty, to improve a system which has worked disastrously to our detriment. There is something good in our system—there is no doubt about that; but there is a great deal of bad also; and I appeal to any liberal-minded man, let him be a Conservative or a Liberal, to be a witness with me that our educational system in Quebec needs a great deal of improvement.

Mr. DAVIN. Explain.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Order. Go on.

Mr. TARTE. I am prepared to explain. I am just going to explain. I have no objections to questions being put to me either.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not say that hostilely.

Mr. TARTE. I am sure of that. We are here to discuss a most important question; we are here to discuss it freely; and, so far as I am concerned, I will not be coerced by any power under the sun of God to vote for anything of which I do not approve. We are going to legislate on a provincial question in this Dominion Parliament. We have an undoubted right to pass legislation. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, knowing the difficulties of this question, knowing the great interests at stake in Manitoba, knowing the great interests at stake in the whole Dominion, has asked for an inquiry.

He has been answered in a hostile spirit. He has been told that no inquiry is necessary—that all the members of this Parliament know everything about Manitoba. Mr. Speaker, I am in communication with the French population of Manitoba as much as any other Frenchman in this House. I have been a newspaper man for the last twenty years, and my paper has had and has today a large circulation among the French people; and I tell you one thing: give an inquiry, appoint a commission of this House; bring down before us the real representatives of the minority, and you will receive advice that will surprise you. The legislature of Manitoba has deprived them of their rights—there is no doubt about that. They had the right to separate schools and the right to the official use of the French language, and the legislature has deprived them of these rights. But, Sir, as I have said, we have been to a certain extent a party to that deprivation. You have allowed the laws for that purpose to go into force. By your own action, your own fault, those laws have been declared constitutional; and now we are called upon to make laws. This is the position; this is the real state of affairs. I ask any hon. gentleman who does not want to make of this question a vote-catching question: Is he prepared to say that he is fully equipped and fully informed to make a law for the legislature of Manitoba? Even if we were ready, even if we were fully informed, what have we to lose if we get a committee of the House? Have we anything to lose if on Monday next we appoint a committee of the House to inquire into this question? This Parliament has been convened to deal with the school question. By our appointing a committee of the House, the minority will not renounce any right which they have. The judgment of the Privy Council will still stand as it is. Have we anything to lose if we go on too quickly? I ask my hon. friends from the province of Quebec to think of the question? What is the position today? The people of Manitoba have expressed their determination to resist us; they have declared that they will fight to the bitter end any legislation we might enact. I think they have been wrong in doing so, but they have done so. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice said the other day what is true; he said, the minority have waited very long, and you should not ask them to wait any longer. He is right in that; I quite agree with him. But I want to know if it is not just as sure as the sun shines, that if we pass a remedial law today, Manitoba will fight that law for years and years. For the last five years we have been litigating; we have been before the courts of justice. Now, suppose that a committee of this House, composed of members of both political parties, is appointed to avoid that dangerous conflict. This is the point which I desire to make. Suppose that all parties are brought here before us to discuss their differences, what harm can be done? The work of that committee could be done in a month. In 1874 there was a committee of the House on the amnesty question. If I remember right, it lasted a month, and it gave satisfaction to all. Well, I call the attention of the House to the suggestion that I am now about to throw out. I do not intend to renounce any right that we now possess; the nomination of a committee of the House cannot injure anybody; and in my estimation it can greatly serve our own purpose, speaking from a Roman Catholic and a French-Canadian point of view. The Government are well aware—and I call the attention of my hon. friends from the province of Quebec to the fact—that they are going to be abandoned by twenty-five or thirty of their English-speaking supporters. A newspaper, which is in the secrets of the Ministerial party, said so a few days ago, and I am very much afraid that it said truly. Then suppose the Government brings down a measure, it will expect to have that measure carried by the vote of the French Liberals in this House. The Government is throwing upon our French-speaking population, and members of the House, a tremendous responsibility. The Government is dividing again this country on religious lines. What would be said the day after the remedial law was carried by the support of the French-speaking members of both political parties? The province of Quebec would be branded as desiring French domination. We would be accused of dominating Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. DUPONT. Do not be afraid of it.

Mr. TARTE. There are men who are not afraid of anything. I know that my hon. friend is a courageous man. I, too, am not afraid of it; but when it can be averted, let us endeavour to avert it. My hon. friend who has been in the political arena for years and who reads the newspapers of the other provinces must know very well that it has been for the last ten years, the war cry in the province of Ontario, especially that the province of Quebec is endeavouring to direct and dominate everything. The "Mail" especially has used its best efforts during the past ten years to prove that our province is seeking to rule all the others. I say again, if we can avert any such issue as that, is it not better to do so? If we can avert years and years of litigation, is it not better that we should do so? I would not say what I am saying to-day if, by the appointment of a committee of the House during this session, I thought that I was injuring any right of the minority, but, again, I ask my hon. friends from both political parties: What harm can be done? This Parliament has been convened to deal with the Manitoba school question. Why should we not take next month to deal manfully and courageously with it once and for all? What harm could be done by bringing here together, under our eyes, the members of the Manitoba government and the representatives of the minority? We are after all in this case their judges of last resort. What harm could be done by having them here and trying to adjust all their differences? This question cannot be postponed. I am not one of those who ask to postpone it. On the contrary, I want to deal with it; I want this Parliament to deal with it, and we can deal with it during this very session. Let those who think that I am wrong consider the proposition that I am now making, before they decide. All the wisdom in the country cannot be on the one side. The ablest men sometimes make mistakes, and it seems to me that the proposition I am now offering is a good one. Some of my hon. friends may be tempted to make light of it. I beg them to reflect. The Government, deserted as they are, by a great number of their supporters in Parliament and abandoned by a large portion of their ordinary supporters out of Parliament, are unquestionably in a difficult position. I think that they brought the difficulty on themselves, but none the less they are in great embarrassment. They cannot bring down to the House a Bill which will satisfy the minority. Let my hon. friends in the province of Quebec ask themselves this question. The minority in Manitoba cannot do much if they have no money. Is this Government going to ask for money from the federal exchequer in order to equip and maintain schools in Manitoba? They will not do it. Is it in a position to oblige the Manitoba government to give money for the same purpose? Has it the power to do so? It has not. There are certain things our Government can do. It can pass a law which would not be enforced for years; it can pass a law dispensing Roman Catholics from the obligation of paying the school tax; it can pass some kind of a law. But would it not be better to bring the parties together and try to obtain from the Manitoba government the pledge that it will give to the minority the grant which the minority is entitled to receive, the money which it is necessary it should have. If the minority have no money, what can they do? We cannot oblige the province of Manitoba to give them a grant of money, and without a grant they cannot have schools. I may have spoken longer than I expected.

Mr. FOSTER. In the interests of clearness, may I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. TARTE. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What does he propose that that committee of the House shall do? There are three things that it might do. To that committee might be referred a Bill. Or the committee might be instructed to prepare such legislation as the hon. gentleman thinks necessary. Or the committee might be appointed to investigate the matter and report to this House. I would like to know what is the hon. gentleman's thought, because he has not expressed it so clearly that we have understood what it is that he really means.

Mr. TARTE. I am quite prepared to give my opinion. Of course, I speak for myself alone. My own opinion is that a committee of the House should be appointed, composed of those furthest apart. They should not investigate the right to redress on the part of the minority, because that right cannot be questioned, in my opinion; it is absolutely certain that there is a grievance and that there is the right to redress that grievance. These points I would not ask any committee of the House to consider, for they have been already adjudicated upon. But the government and the legislature of Manitoba have adopted certain laws, and the Roman Catholics of Manitoba have complained of those laws, saying that those laws deprive them of such and such rights; they say that they cannot send their children to the schools because they are sectarian schools. This question is to be investigated. Let us bring the government of Manitoba, by its members, here.

An hon. MEMBER. Suppose they won't come.

Mr. TARTE. If they will not come, we will deal with them.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Coerce them.

Mr. TARTE. It is useless to speak of coercion. It is a nasty word, and a nasty policy. The time has not come to use it, and I hope it will never come. I do not consent to believe that if this Parliament, which is the master of the position after all, invites these gentlemen, who have differences, to come before us, saying: Now, gentlemen, you have not been able to agree so far, what are the differences between you that the differences will not be arranged? The minority will state, officially, if I may say so, what they want; the Government will state, officially, what they can give, and what they cannot give. And if they cannot agree, we must judge, and then we can draft a Bill. There are important facts in this case, facts that although a Roman Catholic and in communication with representatives of the minority, I do not know all about. For I know, Sir—and I make the assertion upon my responsibility and upon my honour—that the minority are not united upon what the school law should be. My hon. friend the leader of the House knows that he cannot undo the school law which exists. He does not wish to do so, I think. The Government could not be permitted to do it, for the law was not disallowed in time, and it has been declared constitutional. If we pass a law to-morrow for the minority of Manitoba, who can tell that a great number of people in Canada will not immediately address themselves to the Imperial Parliament and ask that that law be vetoed. My friends from the province of Quebec should think over the question before declining the proposition I am now making. Let them understand me well: I have the same interest as they have, I have the same feeling as they have, and I think that I may fairly claim that I have carefully and conscientiously thought over the question. A month of inquiry, not on the right of the minority for the redress of their grievances, but to get a just view of the facts and to bring those who differ together before the Bill is drafted, can surely do no harm. For, after the Government have come down with a Bill, it might be too late. What has the Government itself to lose by this proposal. They will have the hearty co-operation of this side of the House. We do not wish to make political capital out of this question. No political party has anything to gain by it, but Canada has a great deal at stake. We know that public opinion is profoundly divided; are we going to divide it more profoundly? Whatever may have been our opinions in the past, whatever I may have said or whatever my hon. friend the leader of the House may have said, the question is there confronting us. We are called upon to make a law, to make a law for a province upon a question of education, a question that belongs exclusively—as a cardinal principle—to the provincial legislatures. Who can say that in a short time the English minority in Quebec will not come here and ask that laws affecting education in that province be made by this Parliament. Sir, George Etienne Cartier, in 1872—I have not time to read his speech—warned the people of Quebec against the danger of causing this Parliament to interfere in a dangerous way with the school laws passed by the legislature. Mr. Speaker, I have expressed my views to the best of my ability. I do not know whether I have answered fully the questions put to me by the leader of the House, and if I have made myself thoroughly understood. I want an inquiry before a committee of the House during this session, and legislation during this session.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I had not intended to address the House upon this subject during the present discussion. The discussion has taken a pretty wide range, and, so far as the Manitoba school question is concerned, I thought that I could best express my opinion in the debate on the measure itself. But I feel forced to say a few words in this House to-night, owing to the peculiar circumstances of the case, owing to the peculiar features of the discussion, and the turn it has taken. I asked myself, while the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, was speaking, is it true that he and his party, from the leader down to the youngest member thereof, and the organs of that party, have been creating, so far as they could create, and I am sorry to say with some measure of success, a feeling of doubt in the country as to the sincerity of the Government in the pledges they made to this Parliament and to the country? There is no longer any reason to doubt it. The hon. gentleman's whole speech is an assertion, that everything they have said was to mislead the public, and now he is face to face with a remedial measure, and he feels uncomfortable on that account. I do not under-rate that sentiment which he expressed, and the fear, if it be well founded, to which he gave expression, that it would be a misfortune from his point of view, if remedial legislation being introduced into this Parliament, it should only be carried by a French vote, and the cry would go up that there was French domination in this country. Sir, I hope there will be no reason for any such cry. Is that the fear of the hon. gentleman, or is it a fear that there is a crisis between him and his Ontario friends?

Mr. TARTE. Do not be afraid about that.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No, I am not afraid; nor am I afraid of the other result either, for the simple reason that we have given the best proofs of our sincerity. We have the hon. gentleman himself on record that he will not give his vote in such a way as that it may be construed into French domination, and that when that remedial measure comes up, he will be true to the ground he has taken in his paper, that this Parliament has no power to legislate. Sir, through his whole speech to-night can you point to any one thing, is there anything that you can gather from the remarks of the hon. gentleman to-night, to show you exactly where he stands on this question? Hon. gentlemen opposite now speak of a commission, or an inquiry, of summoning the local government and the minority there to come down here and give evidence before a committee. Very well. The point is that he thinks these gentlemen ought to be brought here in order to give us information. Surely he does not want any more information. He has had them running backwards and forwards for the past year in connection with his party. Those gentlemen have all the information they can need on that subject. Then he says, is this Parliament prepared to pass an educational measure for the province of Manitoba? They cannot do away with the school law. Whoever talked in this Parliament or in the country of doing away with the Manitoba school law? Not a member of the Government, not a member supporting the Government in this House, not a newspaper supporting the Government in this country ever spoke of doing away with or injuring the principle of the school law. Look at the judgment itself. Look at the means pointed out by the Privy Council by which to remedy that grievance. It says that the law need not be interfered with, that it is a good law, adopted to the requirements of that country, so far as its general principle is concerned, but that certain amendment might be made by the legislature itself, just sufficient to restore the rights of the minority in regard to separate schools, and that the measure itself would be as perfect as ever in its application to the majority. Therefore, on this point I think that the hon. gentleman has expressed a fear that is unfounded. Sir, I trust that we shall not divide on this question in such a manner as that it may be said that it has been decided by the province of Quebec, or by the province of Ontario, or by any other province; but I hope, if there is to be a division at all, that we shall divide as representative men, giving our votes conscientiously, in the best interest of our country, in the interest of peace, in the interest of the maintenance of the honour and dignity of our country under the constitution under which we live. If we divide upon it from that point of view, there will be no danger for the peace of the country, but it will be assured thence forward. The hon. gentleman quoted the New Brunswick school case. I would like to know from any hon. gentleman in this House, what parallel there is between the two cases. I would like to know what it has to do with the Manitoba case at all. Why, Sir, if I wished to quote the New Brunswick case at all, I would quote every word that was said upon it to strengthen my argument, and the ground I take now in the Manitoba case. The difference in the two cases is simply this, that in New Brunswick, the minority had enjoyed separate schools up to 1871, the schools were then taken away from them, and a system of common schools was established by the law passed that year. The minority who had enjoyed, for, I do not know how long a period before that, the privilege of maintaining their separate schools all through the province, felt they had been unfairly dealt with; they felt so because they believed their rights were guaranteed to them under the constitution. They thought the privileges they enjoyed at the time of Confederation would be continued to them, and when those privileges were taken away, they came to this Parliament. The hon. gentleman has quoted the Rt. Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. He says that he might have quoted Sir George E. Cartier, and so he might. What did they say. They said they believed that the law was constitutional within the jurisdiction of that legislature, and that we had no right to interfere with it upon that ground. Their contention was supported by the Supreme Court of this country, and was confirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest tribunal to which they could go. And that being so, we were thrown out of court, we had no case. That is not the case with Manitoba. The hon. gentleman quoted Sir John A. Macdonald on that question, and I dare say he quoted him a little further than he intended; but he went on to read where Sir John pointed out on that occasion that a minority might, as in New Brunswick, for instance, if such a case arose, exercise their patience, being a third of the population, and the time might come when the legislature there would give them their rights, and these once being given—and the hon. gentleman quoted those words, but he stopped very suddenly—these once being given, no Parliament could take them away again. It is because that very case did arise, as shown in the quotation which the hon. gentleman read to this House, that very circumstance did arise in Manitoba. In confirmation of the pledges given before 1870, the legislature of Manitoba, of its own free will, not by the coercion of the Dominion Parliament, not by outside pressure, but freely exercising its powers under the constitution, passed a law giving rights to Protestants and Catholics, in respect to religious instruction in schools, to a greater extent than they had in any other province. Those rights they enjoyed for 20 years until, unfortunately, men came into power who thought more of votes than they did of principle. They undertook to do, what? To do as they did in New Brunswick, establish a non-sectarian system of schools? Yes, if we are to believe the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) they did undertake that, that was their policy. They believed that they could unite the whole province upon that policy. But in order to point out the bad faith of these hon. gentlemen carrying out their programme, let me call your attention to the facts. They did not establish a system of non-sectarian schools. They departed from that system. They began by declaring that the separate schools should disappear, and that they should be replaced by non-sectarian schools, giving no religious instructions whatever. But, Sir, when the strong Protestant sentiment—which I believe in this country is largely in favour of the recognition of God in the schools—when representatives of that sentiment came to Mr. Greenway and his government, he counted noses and said, I can tread upon the Catholic minority and deprive them of their rights, but I must give religious teaching in the schools of the Protestant majority, and he gave it. Sir, there is the difference between the two cases. The claim of the Catholic minority in Manitoba is based upon the rights secured to them under the constitution as interpreted by the judgment of the highest court in the realm. In New Brunswick the courts decided they had not those rights; and there is the difference. We have heard a good deal, too, about the commission which is talked of by the leader of the Opposition. When that ground was first taken by the Liberal party I was surprised, because I believed that at that time the hon. gentleman was looking forward to final action, if necessary, by this Parliament in case of refusal by the Manitoba government, recognizing that this Parliament has the power and it is its duty to exercise that power for the relief of the minority. If not, why should there be any clause there? The clause was put there for a purpose. It was put there to satisfy the minority in every part of the country, a Protestant minority it was at that time, it has been changed to a Catholic minority now, but that makes no difference. I only wish to God it was a Protestant minority to-day that I might speak more forcibly and claim in thunder tones that justice be done, which I feel more delicate in asking for a Catholic minority. I say I thought when the hon. gentleman first enunciated that policy involving the appointment of a commission of inquiry, it was because he was not satisfied that a grievance existed and he wanted fuller information; but I soon found, that his party at least abandoned that position. I hope I will not be offensive to any hon. gentleman, but I will as a matter of duty state clearly what my convictions are, not from a desire to attack any hon. gentleman, but to state the matter as I understand it, and my observations are of course subject to correction. At that time, to speak of a commission was to throw the question overboard so far as the minority was concerned, it was to rely upon the legislature of Manitoba to redress the grievance and do justice to the minority. If the leader of the Opposition had a guarantee in his pocket and could produce it before this House, from the government of Manitoba, stating that in twenty-four hours from this time they would amend their law and re-establish separate schools, not acquiescing in the remedial order, I say that would be no remedy, that it would be no settlement of the case, that they could kick it aside three months afterwards, if they thought it had not worked well. There is only one way under the constitution to settle the question. I admit the gravity of it, and I admit that a great deal of ill-feeling has been created in this Dominion on this question, but the hon. gentleman himself must know that he and his party share a large amount of responsibility for that ill-feeling. The hon. gentleman states that even in Manitoba the minority do not know their position, they have not been represented here, they have had no one to speak for them, and the hon. gentleman added, that he is in communication with them. Now I can understand his position in regard to the people there. We can now better understand the hon. gentleman's action in his own province. The tactics followed by hon. gentlemen opposite were pursued because they saw not only on their own side of the House a party split in two on this question, but they saw there was some difference of opinion between members of the Conservative members on this side of the House.

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." No one ever disputed it. It is not likely in a large, strong and old party, such as the Conservative party, that on every measure we can agree unanimously to a man, but the party, as a party, the Government as a Government, has taken its ground on the constitutional question, and intends to stand or fall by it. That is plain enough.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then the hon. gentlemen opposite do not want the Manitoba legislature to remedy this grievance?

Mr. COSTIGAN. We have expressed over and over again how anxious we are that the Manitoba legislature should remedy it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman said it would be no use, that they would kick it over in three months.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes, in view of the answer we got. I will tell the House why we got that answer, why Mr. Greenway and his government are so strong in refusing to abide by the judgment of the Privy Council. It is because they find in the Parliament of Canada a party of men who will rise and say that the rights of this Parliament should be sacrificed. Is there any Canadian representative man who will stand up and say that the rights and constitutional powers of this Parliament should be second to those of any other Parliament in the country?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It will depend on the subject.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It will depend upon votes—and that matter is unfortunately being too much considered in this question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) All the votes in the House could not give you jurisdiction.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will not take up much of the time of the House, but when I am interrupted I will take my time, and when the interruption ceases I will proceed. I do not want to be personal, I do not want to be cruel to hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not want to go back and give a full statement of the history of the New Brunswick school question. I will, however, ask the hon. gentleman who sat down (Mr. Tarte) why he did not give the full facts, because at that time he was working with us, if I remember rightly? At that time he was a Conservative, he was one of the men from Quebec.

Mr. TARTE. I supported Sir George Cartier.

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Mr. COSTIGAN. At that time the hon. gentleman did not belong to the Liberal party; but he found in 1875 the policy had been reversed, and we got kicked out from this Parliament by the Liberal party. He was, however, fighting side by side with me on that question.

Mr. TARTE. With Sir George Cartier.

Mr. COSTIGAN. But the hon. gentleman did not choose to give all the facts. This is not a question of legislation upon separate schools for Manitoba, and from the first day I have repudiated that argument. The hon. gentleman asks, how are you going to deal with this question, how are you going to establish separate schools there? The hon. gentleman says that certain conditions existed before 1890 when the Act was repealed, and he was not going to say they were satisfactory. I agree with him on that point, because we have nothing to do with it, and it has no bearing on this question. It is not a question of re-establishing separate schools in Manitoba; it is not a question as to whether separate schools should be re-established there, or whether separate schools are best for this Dominion, or as to how far the hon. member represents the ideas of the people of the province of Quebec on education. I think he will find that he does not represent the majority of the people of Quebec so far as educational institutions are concerned, because I was present myself in Chicago when the highest compliments were paid to the educational system in Quebec by men of authority. But that is aside from the issue. The hon. gentleman need not have gone into that at all. This is simply a question of right. In this instance it may be separate schools or the giving of religious instruction. Whatever it was, that was taken away, and that which was taken away must be given back. Call it separate schools, religious teaching or whatever you like; it is a right given to the people of that province under the constitution, no more and no less. I trust in any case that the minority will not demand its pound of flesh, that their demands will be within the lines of the judgment and will not exact the last farthing. What this Parliament can do and what the country will expect hon. gentlemen on both sides to do is, not to appoint a commission or to bring down people from Manitoba here. The hon. gentleman and his party have already indicated that the session is limited in time, they have already indicated to us that we will have to fight for supplies necessary for the country's business, and if there is a commission of inquiry, then a remedial Bill cannot be introduced. No doubt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) wants to go to the people of Quebec and make good his promise that no remedial measure would be carried this session. I am sure, even if he were able to make good that promise, given perhaps in good faith, but evidently given as it now appears without full knowledge of the facts, he should admit that his judgment of the Conservative party and the Conservative Government was too severe, and that the Conservative Government is made of different materials from those of which he thought it was composed. To-day he finds the Government in this House standing on the pledges they made to the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite may be able to defeat us and change from that side of the House to this, but let them defeat us like straightforward men. Let them defeat us fairly on the policy we have introduced, but do not let them use a two-edged sword as they have been doing. Do not let them have their friends hunting in pairs throughout this country. Do not let their Catholic friends go to a Catholic district and tell the Catholic people: "Don't trust that Tory Government, which is under the influence of the Orange lodges, for they will never give you remedial legislation." Do not let their Protestant friends, as they are doing down in the east now, go to the Protestant people and say: "Are you going to stand up and see the Tory Government coerce that little province of Manitoba? Rise in your might and come to the rescue of Manitoba." That is the kind of attack the Conservative Government have had to meet when they ventured to stand by the constitution. Well, Sir, the Conservative Government will fight the battle out, and the country will judge—not to-day, perhaps, but before long of their policy. Before long the verdict of the people of the country will pronounce that the Conservative Government are doing their duty in the best interests of the country, and in the best interests of peace and harmony between the provinces and the Dominion. Sir, if you establish the fact that the constitution is not going to be recognized, if you establish that the majority in a province has a perfect right to rule within its limits whether it be constitutional or not, if you establish the right of a majority in any province to override a clause of the constitution that is there to prevent injustice being done, then, Sir, you destroy all sense of security in this country, all sense of security on the part of the humblest as well as the highest individual in the land. There is one safe course for the Government and for this Parliament to pursue. That is: stand by the constitution whether you be Liberals or whether you be Conservatives, stand by the constitution and keep faith with the people to whom these pledges were given, whether these people be Protestant or Catholic. That is the best way to accomplish the highest needs of the country. That is the best way to restore peace, and that is the best way to bring about the most desirable and lasting results. Mr. Speaker, just before I sit down I want to say that on this school question there are a large number of the people of Canada who are easily misled. They are people who have the highest desire to cast their vote and to give their support in favour of what is right, but they have been misled by the false cries which have been raised throughout the Dominion. One cry is that we are taking Manitoba by the throat. Well, Sir, it is not dignified, nor do I think it is in the interests of the peace of this country that hon. gentleman should—even if they don't care for the Bill which shall be brought down, or even though they oppose that measure—it is not, I say, in the interest of the peace of the country that they should raise such a cry. No good can be done by the utterance of such sentiments by any hon. gentleman in this House. Their effect is to fan the feeling of opposition and antagonism that we know exists in Manitoba, but which, I believe, is limited even in that province. Sir, I have as much confidence in the people of Manitoba complying with a reasonable measure that will be passed here, as I have that the Liberals in this House will themselves acknowledge that the pledges given to the people by the Government were given in good faith and will be carried out.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, although I have already spoken in this debate, I will claim the indulgence of the House to be allowed to give a few words of answer or explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the rules of the House do not permit the hon. gentleman to speak again.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. LAURIER. Sir, I never concealed from myself the difficulties which were in the way of the Government in arriving at a settlement of this question which now lies in their hands. On more than one occasion I have tendered my humble advice to the Government that for the purpose of carrying on the great duty that was in their hands, they should issue—I will not say a commission of inquiry—but that they should have an inquiry into the facts, whether by commission, or by a committee of this House, is not material. Sir, I am sure there is no man in this House, whatever may be his proclivities in favour of separate, or common schools, who does not desire to approach this question so as to give substantial justice to whom justice is due, so as to preserve the constitution of our country; and above all things so as to maintain peace and harmony among all the races that live in this Dominion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. Very well, we are all agreed upon this. Sir, what is the situation at the present time? We have a most peculiar constitution. We have, you may say, a most arbitrary constitution in one way. Upon an important question, upon the question of education, the sovereignty of the province is abridged and there is an appeal to the Government at Ottawa given to the minority which feels aggrieved. This is an exceptional disposition in the constitution. I do not know that in all the federal constitutions in the world you will find such a provision as that. I was, I believe, among the first to point out that this provision had been introduced at the instance of a gentleman who at that time represented the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec, Sir A. T. Galt. Of course the provision was not introduced for the province of Quebec alone but for all the provinces. The minority in the province of Manitoba has taken advantage of that provision in the constitution and has made an appeal. It is now settled by the judgment of the Privy Council, the highest judicial authority in the realm, that the minority has a grievance which gives them the right of an appeal, which gives them the right to come to this Parliament and to put their grievance before it and have it decided. This is what has been decided by the judgment of the Privy Council. Now, Sir, when this judgment was rendered, I am free to say as my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) said yesterday, that it was a surprise to the majority of lawyers in Canada. I must say that on that point I differ from my hon. friend. The judgment of the Judicial Committee did not surprise me, because coming from the province of Quebec myself, and being more familiar perhaps than other persons in other provinces upon this question, it seemed to me that there could be no decision given other than rendered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on that occasion. This disposition was placed in the law for a certain purpose, that is to say, that if in matters of education the minority feel oppressed by the legislation of the majority, they can come to this Parliament to seek redress. Now, Sir, that is the law and that is the present position of affairs. What, therefore, is the Government to do? What is the position which they have to take? That is the question at issue. I say to my friends opposite—they know it as well as I do—that the one thing which they have to overcome in the way of remedial legislation is the great aversion which in this country, after some twenty-five years experience of our constitution, exists against having local legislation reversed or annulled by the supreme power of the federal parliament. That is the feeling which exists upon that side of the House and upon this. It is not so much a question of separate schools, it is not so much a question of public schools; but it is the great aversion that exists on the part of the people, that the Parliament of Canada should override the will of the majority of the people in a province. Because, Sir, there is not a man in this House whether he be a Conservative or a Liberal, whether he be a Protestant or a Catholic, whether he be in favour of separate or public schools; there is not a man in this House who would for one instant imagine that the legislation passed in Manitoba in 1890 which deprived the minority of their schools, was so imposed with a view of doing a substantial injustice to the minority. The majority had different views from the minority, and I venture to say that there was not a man in that majority who imagined that by passing that law he was doing a substantial injustice to the minority. You have, therefore, this question before you at the present time. You propose to legislate. Well, you must first of all overcome the feeling of repugnance which exists in the minds of the electors of this country; how are you going to overcome it? There is only one way: it is by bringing the facts before the people and showing them that there has been a substantial injustice done—such an injustice as would shock the sense of right of every man in this House. If this can be done, a great step will be taken towards effecting a peaceful solution of this question. I ask the hon. gentlemen who have determined to interfere, who have admitted the principle of interference, do they not see that they would have strengthened their hands immensely if they had had a preliminary investigation as to the character of the legislation which has been imposed upon the minority in Manitoba?

Mr. FOSTER. Is not the law on the statute-book?

Mr. LAURIER. The law is on the statute-book; but what is the answer to this? Let me give to the hon. gentleman one of the answers given by the people of Manitoba in the contest which took place in that province a few days ago. One of the papers supporting the Greenway government stated this:

Let it be shown that the Manitoba School Act attacks the conscientious convictions of Catholics, and we will join in demanding its amendment or correction.

Here is a reason why an inquiry would have been useful. There is an immense difference, my hon. friend knows, between the conscience of those who are in favour of separate schools and the conscience of those who are in favour of public schools. The man who upholds the system of public schools does not conceive the extent of the injustice which is inflicted on the conscience of Roman Catholics when they are deprived of their schools.

Mr. FOSTER. Would the hon. gentleman cure that by a commission?

Mr. LAURIER. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. The only way to cure that is by missionary work, prolonged for a thousand years, probably.

Mr. LAURIER. I have a better and a wider faith in the conscience of my fellow-countrymen than that. What is the argument which you hear from the majority, as any man who has been in Manitoba knows? You are told this: Why should the Roman Catholic minority find fault with our school system? We do not impose upon them any different schools from those which we impose upon ourselves. We do not want Godless schools; we want to have religious education in our schools. We have schools which Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians and Anglicans can accept; why should not the Roman Catholics go to those schools as well? The answer of the Roman Catholic to that is this—and it is an answer which a commission would have brought out—that the Roman Catholic Church attaches just as much importance to doctrinal tuition as to moral tuition. If these views had been brought before a commission, it would have gone a long way towards solving this difficulty in the minds of the people at large. These are some of the reasons why an inquiry would have been useful. There are other considerations also—I cannot, at this moment point to them all, but I have pointed them out on different occasions. The inquiry would have shown the distribution of the population.

Mr. FOSTER. The census shows that.

Mr. LAURIER. No; the census does not show that. It shows the population, but it does not show how the population is grouped. For instance, in the county of Provencher, the population is compact; the census does not show that. Then, the inquiry would have afforded an opportunity to meet argument with argument. Does not my hon. friend admit that with such an inquiry it would have been far more easy to bring the question to a solution than it is by the method which the Government are adopting? I know very well that the Government are not bound to have a commission. They can go on with their legislation, I admit; but my hon. friend knows that he and his colleagues have been struggling for more than a year to prepare a Bill which would be acceptable even to the different members of the Cabinet, and I do not know that they have succeeded even yet. But if they have succeeded in framing a Bill to the satisfaction of the fourteen or fifteen men who sit in the Cabinet, he knows that they had to struggle a long time before they completed it. Well, Sir, the same difficulty which existed in the Cabinet exists in the whole population of the country. I repeat what my hon. friend said a few moments ago: I do not, for my part, care to make any political capital out of this question; and I tell the hon. gentleman opposite—who, I am sure, wants to settle it in a way to maintain peace and harmony in this country—if the commission served no other purpose than to maintain peace and harmony in the country, does he not think that it would be worth while, at least, to try it, rather than to have the discord which has already existed too long on this question? This is one of the many reasons which I should think should have compelled the Government to take that course. They are not bound to do it. They may, perhaps, solve the question without an investigation, simply by placing a law upon the statute-book; but if they do, they know very well that the feeling of injustice would not be solved, as it might be solved, otherwise. At the present time, all the sympathies of the public are with the minority in Manitoba. My hon. friend knows that; I know it as well as he does; but he knows very well that if a Bill is passed in this House granting to the minority in Manitoba a system of schools which might not be repugnant to them, but which would be so to the majority, then it will be the majority that will have the sympathies of the public. For my part, I do not want to see such a state of things. I want to have, as far as possible peace and harmony between all the races and creeds of this country. Well, Sir, the legislation which is to be introduced is to be upon lines which are altogether new in this country, and not only in this country, but in every country; and though my heart is strongly with the minority—and I have never disguised my sentiments on this matter—though I see no reason whatever why the minority in Manitoba should not be as well favoured as the minority in Ontario or Quebec—I have said that on the public platform everywhere, and I say it here also—though I recognize this, and feel that it would be the duty of the Government as well as of the Opposition to give justice to the minority; yet I want to have that done on terms that will satisfy the public conscience as far as it can be satisfied; and the more light there is thrown upon the question the better it will satisfy the public conscience as far as it can be satisfied; and the more light there is thrown upon the question the better it will be for all parties concerned. These are the reasons why I venture to suggest once more that it would be better for all parties concerned to take the course I have proposed than any other course.

Mr. LARIVIERE. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take any part in this debate. All my hon. friends will admit that during the five years that the school question has been before the House, I have very seldom risen to speak upon it, trusting all the time that the good sense and liberality of the members of this House would induce them to deal fairly, honestly and judicially with the rights of the minority in Manitoba. I do not want to arouse any feeling and would have preferred to wait until the House was about to deal with the question in a fair and just way. However, after listening to the speeches made by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) and the hon. leader of the Opposition. I deem it my duty to rise and offer some remarks on what those gentlemen have said. I shall not go into the history of the school question, but I shall look back some four years, and remind this House that after going through the courts of Manitoba and the Supreme Court of Canada, the school case was taken to the Privy Council in England, and that tribunal, although the Supreme Court of Canada had decided unanimously in favour of the contention of the minority, reversed that judgment. As a representative of the minority, at least as one of them, I made it a point to study our constitution and find out the best means of protecting the rights which I was entrusted to protect as their representative. At that time, it was suggested that the appeal which was before the Privy Council of Canada by the minority, should be submitted to the Supreme Court in order to find out whether we had the right to put in our appeal or whether the Privy Council had the right to hear that appeal; and knowing that whatever might be the decision of the Supreme Court, that question would be taken again to the Privy Council in England, I had serious doubts, after the decision which had been already given in the first instance in the same case, as to what the result would be, and therefore I would not be a party to asking that that case should be again submitted to the courts. And I myself, in 1892, suggested that as the Supreme Court had unanimously decided in favour of our contention and as we had against that the judgment of the Privy Council reversing that first decision, there was a conflict of opinion between the two highest tribunals before which the case should be tried, and therefore it was reasonable to some to express doubt as to what the real case was. On the one hand, the judges of the Supreme Court were supposed to be better posted on our constitution and our laws than the Privy Council in England. On the other hand, the Privy Council in England, with their knowledge and with the case as it was put before them decided in a different way, so that it left to this Parliament the duty of interpreting the law which was contested. It rested with this Parliament to decide whether, in framing the Manitoba Act, our intention was to grant separate schools for all time to come to the province of Manitoba or not. It was a question, as I said at the time, of interpretation of the constitution; and as each of the tribunals, which so far had the case before them, had given a directly opposite interpretation, it rested with this Parliament to decide what the constitution meant. In the month of October, 1892, I happened to be in the city of Ottawa, and speaking to a number of my friends on our school question, I was induced to allow myself to be interviewed by the correspondent of the Toronto "Mail" and to express my opinion as to what should be done in order to arrive at a solution. I will now read to you this interview which took place four years ago, and which was sent as special correspondence to the "Mail" from Ottawa, dated October 18th:

Mr. LaRivière, M.P., for Provencher, who is the only French-Canadian representative of Manitoba in the House of Commons, has been in the city for several days. He says that he is here on no political mission, and that he has not talked with any of the Ministers on the Manitoba school question. Speaking for himself, however, and, in doing so, speaking for the French-Canadians in Manitoba, Mr. LaRivière gave your correspondent his views of that question and the proposed reference to the Supreme Court, which, as foreshadowed by the Government organs, will be recommended by the Cabinet committee which has in charge the consideration of Archbishop Taché's appeal, to obtain a decision upon the question whether or not, according to the terms of the Manitoba Act, the Federal Government can interpose with remedial legislation for the relief of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba.

"That reference to the Supreme Court, which the Montreal 'Gazette' talks of," he said, "can do no good whatever. Not the slightest effective progress towards solving the problem can be made in that way. I will tell you why. The proposed reference to the Supreme Court will only be in avoidance of the real difficulty. It is true that subsections 2 and 3 of the Manitoba Act provide for an appeal to the Governor General in Council by the minority of the people of the province, whose rights have been taken from them, but, if the decision of the Privy Council in England is a true and just judgment, then I do not see how we can appeal to the Governor General in Council, because the Privy Council declared that there was no right taken from us. Going to the Supreme Court now can do no good at all. The Privy Council in England has decided that we have no rights which were invaded, then what could the Supreme Court judges do but repeat their former judgments, and, if they do decide that there was room for remedial legislation, the Roman Catholics of Manitoba will not accept anything in the form of a grant as compensation."

"Do you mean," Mr. LaRivière was asked, "that they would refuse to be benefited by the setting aside for their use of a portion of the school lands?"

"Yes, emphatically," he said. "We are not begging. We will not sacrifice a principle for a mere pecuniary consideration. We will not barter our vested rights for a temporary indemnity. I know of no remedial legislation which can do any good except an Interpretation Act. Anything else is only a subterfuge to gain time."

Mr. LaRivière then explained himself as follows:—"It is not true, as I see it reported in some papers, that I want any change in the British North America Act or the Manitoba Act. These two, which must be taken together to explain each other, are our inviolable safeguard, our Magna Charta. Now, the British North America Act expressly provides that separate schools existing in any province prior to Confederation or established after Confederation, shall remain for ever thereafter. That is the spirit and the letter too. The Act, while it does not impose the separate school system where it does not exist, protects it where it does, in Ontario and Quebec, and provides for its permanency if existent at Confederation or established afterwards in any province, with no exception. The delegates from Manitoba who assisted at the arrangement of terms of union, made it a clause in their bill of rights that the new province of Manitoba should have Roman Catholic separate schools. This was a fundamental principle, a cardinal condition of Manitoba's entrance into the Confederation. Before the annexation of Manitoba the Roman Catholics, the Presbyterians and the Anglicans each had their separate schools in the old colony of Assiniboia, or the Red River settlement, as it was called, and to these schools the government of the colony granted public money. We contend, then, that, under the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act, the separate schools we had prior to Confederation cannot be abolished by the legislature; and if such an interpretation of the Manitoba Act, as that we have now, can be given by the Privy Council in England, it only proves that the wording of the Act is faulty. Its spirit is all right, and we should have an Interpretation Act passed by the Federal Parliament setting the wording right; an Act similar to that which the Federal Parliament passed in 1872 with reference to the powers of the Lieutenant-Governor, when it was found that the clause defining those powers was not clearly worded. An Act was passed here in Ottawa, explaining the clause, was confirmed by the Imperial Parliament. Why should Manitoba be standing in an exceptional position among the provinces on this school question. If it was not the intention of the framers of the Manitoba Act to secure separate schools to Manitoba, what was their intention? Why should the clause about the schools be there at all, if it meant nothing? It was plainly intended that separate schools should be safe in Manitoba, and that being so, the Roman Catholics of Manitoba cannot consent to be satisfied by any such solution of the difficulty as the setting aside of a portion of the school lands to indemnify them for their losses under the regime of Mr. Martin, which deprives the Catholic section of the Board of Public Instruction of $14,000 in the bank, of its further share of money voted for school purposes, and of all school property formerly under its control. The only way out of the difficulty is by an Interpretation Act. There is no use in going to the Supreme Court again. Further reference to the Supreme Court, or even remedial legislation, short of an Interpretation Act, will be no better than the disallowance of the Martin Act would have been in the beginning, for, after the exercise of the federal veto, the provincial legislature would have gone on re-enacting its law. We know the spirit of the two Acts. If the wording of this one clause does not satisfy these gentlemen of the Imperial Privy Council's Judicial Committee, we must make it right."

Mr. LaRivière was asked how he thought that should be done. "A committee of the House," he replied, "made up of members from both sides, should be appointed to investigate the setting of the terms of union, to look into the records, and use all other possible means to ascertain what was promised, what was asked, and what was understood to be granted. Then, when the facts are known, how the question is to be settled will be plain; and it is a question which all good citizens want to settle in accordance with justice. Why," Mr. LaRivière exclaimed, in a final outburst, "protection of separate schools is a cardinal principle of Confederation. If a majority had the right to do away with them, then the Protestant majority in Ontario, or the Catholics in Quebec, could abolish the separate schools in those provinces; but they cannot. Then, Manitoba, it would seem, is the sole exception in this respect out of all the provinces, and why? Where is the clause in the British North America Act, or in the Manitoba Act, making her an exception?"

During the conversation, it may be added, Mr. LaRivière, who was for six years a member of Mr. Norquay's government, in which he was Provincial Treasurer, said that Mr. Norquay and his colleagues deliberated together upon the question whether they had the power to establish public schools such as are established by the Martin Act, and they decided that the only interpretation they could give to the constitution was, that they had not the power to so interfere with the existing school system.

Well, Mr. Speaker, of course the circumstances are changed. When I had that interview, the position was such that we did not know what would be the outcome. After having been taken from court to court without any success, I took upon myself the responsibility of suggesting the appointment of a committee to investigate the case and arrive at some solution. But to-day the position is quite different. In spite of our apprehensions, when the case was taken to the courts the result was far different from what it was in the first instance. Nevertheless in order to show the consistence of some of those who have taken part in this debate, I wish to read to this House an article which appeared in one of the Montreal papers a few days after the interview I had with the correspondent of the "Mail." This is dated the 2nd November, 1892, it is from "Le Canadien," a newspaper then published in Montreal, and this article is signed by a party whose name I will give later on. It is headed:

Away with subterfuge.

I translate it:

It seems certain that the Dominion Government have resolved to "take into consideration" the appeal of the Manitoba Catholics—pursuant to their promise, as embodied in the report of the Minister of Justice to the Governor General. Sir John Thompson is to be congratulated on such a step. It was high time to know whether public affairs in this country should be managed in the future according to the constitution and the law of the land. That there are to be found in our midst ignorant, fanatical people numerous enough to make a fuss and stir up bad feelings, I am quite willing to grant. Still, on a close inspection of our ranks, it will be found that there are in Canada a majority of citizens regardful of the rights, creeds and liberties of their fellow-citizens. Such a majority would not be long in coming forward, in standing to their opinions and rallying around the political men having the moral courage to take the solid position of equal rights for all.

The Ontario Tories, for some time past, have been attempting to frighten the Government. Sir John Thompson has no occasion for dreading them. Should they provoke a crisis, they will have to pay for it. Let us not lose sight of the fact that the party led by Mr. Mowat has successfully fought against them on the separate school question.

Away, therefore, with such subterfuges as those proposed by Mr. LaRivière, whose political course has proved so fatal to the French interests in Manitoba.

To appoint a committee of the House in order to inquire into the circumstances which have accompanied the passing of the Manitoba Act: such is the suggestion offered by the member for Provencher. Who is there that is not aware of those circumstances?

Do not the official papers contain as clear a statement as possible of the history of the case?

Instead of demanding justice, Mr. LaRivière lends a hand to the Ontario fanatics in taking the means of "shelving" the question. Let it be well understood that he is doing that job on his own account. We are most positive in making that statement. In Manitoba wherever he has made known his scheme, it has been condemned with one voice. We feel it our duty to caution the friends of the French cause against his manoeuvres.

The constitution is explicit: it is the province of the Governor General in Council to take the initiative, to give a decision, to pass on his decision to the Manitoba government and ask them to do justice. Should the latter decline to do justice, then, and then only, begins the right of interference and action by the Canadian Parliament.

The reference to the Supreme Court, which has been alluded to in some newspapers, is another scheme concocted to shelve the school question and the rights of the Catholic minority. From the Supreme Court the matter will be carried up to the Privy Council.

Do not Parliaments, which are the supreme authority, possess the incontrovertible power to make laws to redress the decisions of the courts?

In this case, no decision was reached on the appeal of the Catholics to the Privy Council, an appeal which has been held in suspense for some time.

Besides, what is the good of all this scheming and intriguing? Who would dare deny the fact that the intention of the Act of 1870 was to constitute in the province of Manitoba a school system modelled after the Ontario and Quebec systems?

The statute in question was enacted by the Parliament of Canada. For twenty years past the Manitoba legislature submitted to the law.

In 1890 they unrighteously repealed the law, to the detriment of a portion of the population.

And yet, we see writers who set up for wise men, we see members of Parliament, politicians, who gravely tell us: "We keep on this question the very same stand we took on the Jesuits' Estates Bill: we will no more interfere with the Manitoba affairs than we did interfere with the Quebec matters." These words betray either ignorance or absolute insincerity.

When drawing from the provincial cash-box money wherewithal to settle the Jesuits' estates claim, the province of Quebec evidently remained within the strict limits of its right and jurisdiction; and the Canadian Parliament had no business to interfere here; while, in this case, the constitution specifically invests the Governor in Council and Parliament with the power to protect minorities, should their rights and privileges in educational matters have been infringed upon by the provincial legislatures.

Mr. LARIVIERE.

This is signed by J. Israel Tarte, member for L'Islet, who says, as you have heard, that the reference of the school question to a committee of this House, would be shelving it in order to avoid arriving at a solution of the question. That was in 1892, only two years after the passing of the school Act; and to-day, four years afterwards, the very same gentleman who has accused me of making that suggestion of a reference to a special committee with the object of shelving the question, comes before this House and suggests the very same committee I suggested four years ago, but under very different circumstances. It is to be remembered that at the time we had lost our case, and it was reasonable to expect that we might lose it again. But, Sir, after having been dragged from court to court, after having spent a large sum of money to defend our rights and privileges, after having secured a judgment granting us our request, acknowledging that we have been deprived of our rights, and intimating to the legislature of Manitoba and to the Parliament of Canada that those rights must be restored to us: what do we find? We find these very gentlemen who, four years ago, condemned what I then suggested, now, when this question is on the eve of being closed, now, after we have gone through all the proceedings that are indicated in that article signed by the member for L'Islet, we find these gentlemen, who dare not vote on the merits of the case, who are afraid to cast their vote either for or against the cause of separate schools, trying to shelve the question, resorting indeed to a subterfuge in order to avoid giving an honest opinion on this question. The member for L'Islet is unauthorized to say that the minority in Manitoba are not a unit as to what the school law should be. The minority in Manitoba are a unit as to what the school law should be, that is, they are a unit in demanding that their rights should be restored. We are willing that all the necessary provisions may be embodied in that remedial Bill, within our powers, of course, and that provisions should be made that our schools should be good schools, even better than the schools we had before if possible. We are willing that our schools should be subject to inspection: we are willing to accept any reasonable clause in that school Act that will give us the schools we have always claimed to have, and give us even better schools, if those we had can be improved.

Motion (Mr. Sutherland) to adjourn, negatived.

Motion (Mr. Powell) for an Address to His Excellency, agreed to.

Mr. OUMET moved:

That said Address be engrossed.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

DEATH OF PRINCE HENRY OF BATTENBERG—ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to present a resolution to the House to-night, and I do it to-night because the event which calls this action forth is one which happened a day or so ago, and it is well that what action is taken by this House should be taken promptly. It has reference to the death of Prince Henry of Battenberg, son-in-law of the Queen. What I propose to do is to move an address to Her Majesty with respect to the sudden and lamented death of the Prince. I do not propose to make any extended remarks at this time ; I do not think it is necessary to do so. The address and the unanimous action of this House will be sufficient testimony of the sincerity of the regret we feel that our beloved Queen in her advanced years has to suffer another added to the many bereavements which in her long life she has sustained. Without further remarks, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Laurier :

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty :
Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty with renewed assurances of our attachment to Your Majesty's Person and Crown.

The intelligence of the death of His Royal Highness Prince Henry of Battenberg has deeply touched the hearts of the people of Canada : We speak in their name, as well as in our own, when we humbly tender you the expression of our earnest sympathy in the affliction which has deprived Her Royal Highness the Princess Beatrice of a Consort, and Your Majesty of a son-in-law, a young Prince enjoying the happiest prospect of a long and useful career.

We pray that the God of consolation may comfort Your Majesty and long preserve You to Your people.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That said Address be engrossed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency, in the following terms :—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir John Campbell Hamilton-Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen ; Viscount Formartine, Baron Haddo, Methlic, Tarves and Kellie, in the Peerage of Scotland ; Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, County of Aberdeen, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom ; Baronet of Nova Scotia, &c., &c., Governor General of Canada, and Vice-Admiral of the same.

May it please Your Excellency :—

We, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, have resolved to send an Address of condolence to Her Majesty :

To express the profound sorrow of the people of Canada on the occasion of the death of His Royal Highness Prince Henry of Battenberg, and to tender Her Majesty on their behalf the expression of the earnest sympathy in the affliction which has deprived Her Majesty of a son-in-law, a young Prince enjoying the happiest prospect of a long and useful career.

We beg to approach Your Excellency with our respectful request that you will be pleased to transmit the said Address to Her Majesty in such a way as Your Excellency may see fit.

REPORT.

Trade and Navigation Returns for the year ending 30th June, 1895.—(Mr. Wood.)

Mr. FOSTER.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to call the attention of the Government to a matter of some consequence to the House, and I may observe, in order to prevent any doubt about the matter, that I will probably conclude with a motion. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have now been in session for something very nearly a month, and we have not got the Auditor General's Report yet. I am quite aware that the statute does not require that that should be brought down imperatively until the 31st January, or thereabouts ; but I do contend that it was the special duty of the Government to have taken special care that when they summoned the House for the 2nd January, every reasonable exertion should have been made to bring down the Auditor General's Report at the same time. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that if this has not been done, it is probably largely due to the very absurd parsimony which induced the Minister of Finance, in opposition to our remonstrances, to refuse the requisite clerical aid to the Auditor General last year. Anyhow, as I say, we have been here a month, and we have not got the Auditor General's Report. Now, Sir, this document which we have before us, the Public Accounts, is practically of no sort of use to us for the purpose of ascertaining how the public money has been spent. We can make no progress, either in preparing ourselves for a proper discussion of the Estimates, or of the Budget, until we have the Auditor General's Report ; and I must say that it seems to me to be trifling with the House that the Government have not had that report prepared and brought down on the 2nd January. However, Sir, this is one of those cases in which the sin is apt to bring its own punishment, and if it be true, as I hear, that my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) for the purpose of impressing the Government of the day with the importance of attending to the Auditor General's Report, has serious thoughts of reading that document to the House when it appears. I think that the hon. Minister of Finance will see cause to regret that he did not give my friend the Auditor General those $500 we asked for. Now, I have made a little calculation as to which I am open to correction. I rather think that the report contains about 5,000 pages, more or less, being rather more than less. My hon. friend from Wellington is a zealous and persevering man, but I do not think that he can get through with more than ten pages, with appropriate comments, in an hour, and if he has to read the report to the Minister of Finance, it will take 500 hours which, at ten hours per day, would equal 50 days. Surely, if the Minister of Finance is anxious to expedite business, I advise that he cause that report to be brought down at once so that my hon. friend may be quick about getting through with his task. Whether my hon. friend will hold it to be his duty likewise to have it read in French, I cannot say, but I hope not.

Mr. FOSTER. The leader of the third party can have it read in French.

Mr. DAVIN. We will order a coffin for him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You had better order coffins for yourselves, I think. Now, Sir, I know that the Ministers, in a general way, are only flies on the wheel, and but ordinary flies at that, and we do not expect much from them. But, Sir, we have been lately going into matters of pedigree in this House, as my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) knows, and my attention has been called, by a valued correspondent in the maritime provinces, to the fact that there has been a material change in the flies on the wheel, and that we have lately been visited by a Hessian fly on the wheel in the person of the Secretary of State, in point of fact, something like the true, real and original Hessian fly. Sir, we have always known, as the Minister of Agriculture will find out when he has been a little longer in his place, that the Hessian fly has been quite an important factor in the agriculture of this country. There are some who contend that the Hessian fly was really a blessing in disguise to the agriculturists, that it made the farmers sit up, that it cured them of their lazy fashion of growing wheat year after year on the same plot of ground. There are other eminent authorities who say that the Hessian fly is rather a proof that the system of cultivation pursued was vicious and demoralizing in the extreme. Now, I won't decide, the Minister of Agriculture may, between these differing authorities; but I will say this, that both these authorities are agreed that the appearance of the Hessian fly is a sign that a radical change of system is required. Now, under these circumstances, I really think that I ought to conclude, though I will not insist on it, with a motion that the House do adjourn until the Auditor General's Report is brought down, and we can apply ourselves intelligently to the discussion of the business before us.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose my hon. friend does not mean that motion seriously?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I mean that we must get the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you mean to adjourn if you do not get it to-day?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I do not know that I would press that.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the hon. gentleman had better withdraw his motion. The hon. gentleman, I think, has earned the thanks of the House for this valuable rehearsal which he has given us. I would suggest that he reserve the Te Deum. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is quite mistaken in saying that the delay in the Auditor General's Report was due to ill-timed parsimony of the Government in not granting the Auditor General additional clerks. If the hon. gentleman's memory was as good as his invective he would know that the point of difference between the Government and the Auditor General, or rather between the hon. member for Bothwell, representing the Auditor General in this House, and the Government, was in regard to the promotion of three clerks, and not as to the addition of three clerks. So parsimony hardly enters into it as a sufficient reason for delay. The hon. gentleman let the Government out completely when he said it was their duty to use all possible diligence in having the Auditor General's Report brought down. The Auditor General is an officer of Parliament; he gets up his own report in his own fashion. He prepares a very voluminous report, and I have asked him very frequently to push its completion forward as rapidly as possible. His report is not yet ready, although, I believe the major part of it is in print, and I think the Auditor General told me that it will be ready next week. I asked the Queen's Printer the reason of the delay, because I thought it might be delayed in the printing office. The answer given by the Queen's Printer is as follows:—

With respect to the Printing Bureau, re Auditor General's Report: no delay can possibly be charged on it with respect to this report. On 13th January every line of copy in the Bureau was set, and no further copy was received until four days afterwards, namely 17th. During all that time the equivalent of 357 pages were standing as proofs uncorrected. The copy began again to come in on the 17th, and it is being advanced with all possible despatch. There are, at this moment, standing in type the equivalent of 330 pages. It is not possible for us to say when this report will be published, as that depends entirely on the officers of the Auditor General, as to when they will read the proofs and sign them for printing, and when they will send the rest of the copy.

That is the statement given to me by the Queen's Printer. The hon. gentleman's remark about the Government simply trifling with the House in relation to this report was uncalled for, and is not based on facts, as the short statement I have made shows. I hope the hon. gentleman will receive the report early next week, and I am sure he will use his good offices to prevent the House from entering upon that dreary and almost interminable period of listening to the reading of it by the hon. member for North Wellington. We generally get a good deal of the report in the course of his comments, and I am not sure that the reading of long pages from the report would not be as interesting as are sometimes the hon. gentleman's comments; but, at the same time, I think it would be very hard and wearing on the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Five hundred dollars were refused the Auditor General, or, at all events, that sum was deducted from his contingencies.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but I have yet to learn that the loss of $500 caused the delay.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly it helped to do so.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think hon. members of the House, particularly those on this side of it who take an interest in discussing public expenditure will at once admit that the Auditor General's Report is the most valuable production laid on the Table of Parliament annually. I quite admit that in past years I have made very extensive use of that particular book in criticising public expenditure. The Minister of Finance had occasion more than once to note the fact that I largely use it, and I suppose he would prefer that I should not use it so frequently.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. McMULLEN. The public expenditure is a very important matter. The people realize this, and I contend it is impossible for any member of the House intelligently to criticise expenditure without having under his eyes the Auditor General's Report. No doubt the Finance Minister hopes to deliver his Budget speech in a short time, and then he will ask the House to go into Committee of Supply; but, in order to do so, I contend that it is necessary that members should be supplied with copies of this report, and have been in possession of copies for a few days, so as to make themselves familiar with its contents. The Minister of Finance has stated that the Auditor General has prepared a very voluminous report during recent years. That is quite true, but I do not think it has been too voluminous; I think every page has deserved the attention of hon. members who examine and criticise public expenditure. If I could make a favourable impression on hon. gentlemen opposite as to the necessity of curtailing expenditure, I would be prepared to spend fifty days in reading over the items in the report, for it would be time well spent. When the Auditor General last year asked for a small additional vote in order to be able to conduct the duties of his office efficiently, it was a mistake on the part of the Government to refuse that application. If the amount had been granted, the probability is that the Auditor General's Report would have been on the Table of the House to-day. If this had been done, more money would have been saved than by the parsimonious treatment extended to the Auditor General in refusing to grant that assistance. I hope the report will not be delayed as long as the Finance Minister has indicated. If it is not brought down until the end of next week, the discussion of public accounts cannot be properly proceeded with until fifteen or twenty days from now. The Opposition have important duties to discharge, and the country is looking to hon. members on this side of the House for a close criticism of public expenditure, and if the Government throw difficulties in the way and delay the presentation of the Auditor General's Report we shall assuredly let the people know with whom the responsibility lies. I hope the report will be brought down as quickly as possible, and that a statement promised with respect to superannuation system will also be laid on the Table.

Mr. FOSTER. The statement with respect to superannuation will be ready on Monday, and no doubt that will give the hon. gentleman occupation for a few days.

THE EXHIBITION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN. From remarks which I have read as having been delivered in another place, I gather that no arrangement has been made for placing in the Estimates a sum of money to meet claims in respect to the exhibition that was held in the Territories. There are a number of my constituents who are owed money for work done, and I hope that the member of the Government in charge will press on the Finance Minister this matter so that he may see that the necessary provision is made. The Lieutenant-Governor, I learn from the highest authority, is an official of the Government of Canada, and he occupies an exceptional position as Governor, and the Territories are in an exceptional position. I am sure neither the Government or Parliament would wish to see men who have done work for that exhibition, poor men who have comparatively large sums due them, out of pocket. I do not think it would be creditable, and I hope the Minister of Finance will make provision in the Estimates for paying these people.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), that as he quite knows—and if it has escaped his memory he can refresh it by looking at the wording of the item—all that the Government proposed to the House to be responsible for was the sum of $25,000 towards assisting in carrying on that exhibition. It did not suppose and did not intend, that anything more should go from the Dominion Treasury than simply that assistance of $25,000. It appears from reports that more has been expended, or if more has not been expended, that there are liabilities outstanding for which the claimants are pressing for payment from some source. It is quite admissible, I admit at once that men who performed services or gave supplies or the like of that should not be kept out of their money. The first thing, however, to do is to see that these accounts are very thoroughly investigated, and they are now being thoroughly investigated. Whilst the Dominion Government does not admit any responsibility for over-expenditure, after the accounts have been thoroughly investigated we will have an opportunity of talking about it again.

Mr. LAURIER. I understood that this money which was voted last year was to be spent under the authority of the Government of the North-west Territories, and not under the authority of this Government at all. I understood that the sum of $25,000 was placed at the disposal of the government of the Territories.

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, under whose authority was the money spent?

Mr. FOSTER. The vote was really in the nature of a subsidy. It was $25,000 which was given by this Parliament in aid of carrying out the exhibition in the North-west Territories. If I remember right, the expenditure of that money was, by Order in Council, put in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories under certain checks as to the signing of drafts and the like of that. It was divided into two parts, one part to be used for the payment of prizes and the other for the expenses of the exhibition. It was not put in the hands of the North-west Government, as a government, but it was expended under the authority of the Lieutenant-Governor with the proper precautions for the signing and counter-signing of cheques.

Mr. LAURIER. As an officer of this Government.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt the Lieutenant-Governor is an officer of this Government.

Mr. LAURIER. He has rendered the accounts, I suppose.

Mr. FOSTER. They are now being investigated.

Mr. LAURIER. Are we to understand that he actually expended more than was put into his hands?

Mr. FOSTER. What is understood is that there are claims over and above the amount of money which was made up by this $25,000 and by other sources of revenue; claims still unpaid and for which the amount of money made up of the $25,000 and the other sources of revenue is not sufficient. That is the claim.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that the Lieutenant-Governor Mr. Mackintosh has accounted for the expenditure of the $25,000, and that much more money has been expended.

Mr. FOSTER. There are claims for more than that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The statement of the hon. gentleman is not so full as it ought to be. The House last session appropriated $25,000 for this purpose. There exists a government in the North-west Territories who are the advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor. If I rightly understand the statement of the hon. gentleman, this sum was not placed at the disposal of the government at all, but was placed at the personal disposal of the Lieutenant-Governor. Then, what were the checks on the Lieutenant-Governor in that regard? I cannot understand that the exhibition in the North-west Territories was wholly under his management or that he controlled it. I suppose that the government who were his advisers had something to say in regard to that matter; but if they had not, then the matter is wholly under the jurisdiction of this Government, and for which this Government are responsible. The Lieutenant-Governor is simply their officer for the discharge of certain duties on their behalf, and the government of the Territories who were capable of forming an opinion as to what ought to be done, have been given no voice in the matter at all.

Mr. FOSTER. The whole matter will be more clear for discussion when the papers are brought down. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) is not quite right. The government of the North-west Territories is not the same for instance as the government of Manitoba or any one of the provinces, and as I understand it, the exhibition was carried on by what you might call a voluntary association. There were certain sources of revenue, amongst others, a grant of the North-west legislature and one from the town of Regina, and the entrance fees and all the like of that, which made up the general revenue. This association carried on the exhibition and paid the expenses and became responsible, I suppose, for the liability. The amount of $25,000 was voted as an aid by this Government, and the expenditure of that was placed under the Lieutenant-Governor, with proper checks for countersigning.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Was he more than the cashier for the voluntary association?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know. I suppose he was the president of it.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to say a word with regard to this matter. I have moved for the papers and when the motion comes up I shall go more fully into the matter.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that this matter can better be discussed when the papers are brought down.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to say a few words to show what a gigantic affair this has been. The Dominion Government gave $25,000, the local assembly gave $5,000, the city of Regina gave $10,000, and after that the local assembly gave an additional grant of $5,000, making a total of $45,000, which is all gone. In addition to that, there was the admission money, entrance fees and everything of that kind. This association, as I understand, consisted entirely of one man, namely the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories. He was the association, he was in absolute control of everything, and they are still in debt to an amount which at any rate is $8,000, and I do not know how much more. I may say that there is a great deal of feeling in the Territories with regard to the manner in which this exhibition has been conducted and with regard to the condition the affairs are in at the present time.

Mr. MACDOWALL. In reply to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) I would state in a few words, that the exhibition was most successful. It was very large. I believe the list of exhibits was about four or five times the number at the provincial exhibition at Winnipeg in Manitoba. It was the first exhibition held in the North-west Territories. All the buildings had to be erected, everything had to be initiated, and if the association, however it might have been composed, did get a little behind in funds, I think it would be a generous act on the part of this House to overlook that, seeing the very great success of the exhibition and the advantages which the Territories have derived from it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to ask if the investigated claims are for expenses incurred by the direct order of the Lieutenant-Governor himself, or for expenses incurred by the committee of management, if there was such a committee?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend's question exemplifies the difficulty we are under in discussing this question at the present time. These accounts are just now being gathered and investigated, and the claims as they come in are being tabulated. So that we are not in a position to discuss the claims or answer that question until the investigation is concluded.

Mr. MARTIN. Then I understand that the Government would like any person who has an account against the exhibition to send it in to them in order that they may check it over.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government does not ask any one to send in any account.

Mr. MARTIN. If you have not the accounts, how can you investigate them?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The whole of this discussion is entirely out of order. I frankly confess that a part of the discussion arose from my allowing an hon. member to ask a question; but I had not the slightest idea that it would lead to such a discussion as has arisen, particularly in view of the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has a motion on the paper for a return in reference to this subject. The discussion on that motion cannot be anticipated.

Mr. CASEY. Referring then to the original subject of discussion, the delay in the Auditor General's Report, I think it ought to be pointed out that, although the delay in the printing may be due to the delay in sending in copy from the Auditor General's Department, it does not follow that the fault of this latter delay lies with that department. The Auditor General has to work with material sent to him by the Finance Department. He must get vouchers and all sorts of papers from that department before he can complete his report, correct proof, and sign it for printing. It is very much more likely, according to our experience, that the delay has arisen from the slackness of the Minister of Finance in furnishing the Auditor General with the necessary material, than from any slackness on his part in dealing with it.

My hon. friend the Finance Minister cannot mention this matter without showing the feeling of soreness which he always gives evidence of when the Auditor General is mentioned. He takes pains to assure us that the Auditor General is an officer of Parliament, and not an officer of his department, and he says it always in a tone of voice that indicates his regret that such is the case. It would be much more pleasant for the Minister of Finance if the Auditor General were under his orders instead of being an independent officer of Parliament, not subject to any control by the Ministry of the day.

But I am not at all sure that my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) need have been worried about the lateness of the presentation of this report. For one reason, it is scarcely within the limits of possibility that the Government can contemplate asking us for a supply for some considerable time to come. We must not forget that we are called for a special purpose. We must not forget that the Government asked for five months' delay for the purpose of introducing a certain Bill. We cannot forget, either, that the Government press throughout the country has been attacking the Opposition for continuing the debate on the Address at such length. They have been telling us that that debate should have been finished long ago, in order that the Government might have a chance to introduce the remedial Bill. I do not, for my part, see why they could not have introduced the Bill at an earlier stage. But, at all events, their press has been attacking us for obstructing the introduction of that Bill. We have been given to understand, especially by the French newspapers supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Government were aching for the opportunity of introducing the Remedial Bill; and, when that is introduced, it will probably furnish sufficient occupation to this House for a considerable time before we can touch the question of supplies at all.

Still further, it seems to me impossible that this Government can think of asking the House for supplies, until they have ascertained that they possess the confidence of a majority of this House on that Bill, which is the especial policy of the Government for this extra session. We cannot think that they will be so recreant to all constitutional principle and practice, to all the theories of responsible government, as to ask us to vote money until we know whether they possess the confidence of this House or not; and we cannot know that, until the Remedial Bill is introduced and goes to a second reading. I read to-day in "L'Evenement," the organ of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas), that the divisions amongst the Conservatives at Ottawa are increasing all the time—that a new party has been formed, with the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), and the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) at its head, to oppose remedial legislation. Another Conservative paper stated that at least fifteen or twenty supporters of the Government, and probably more, were certain to vote against that Bill, while the Government majority in the House only amounted to 38 or 40. It is quite impossible that a Government so situated, which has made one particular Bill the sole ground of its appeal to this House and to the country, should have the effrontery to ask us to vote it millions of dollars, when we do not know whether or not it has the confidence of its own supporters, even, in regard to it. I am sure that before the Remedial Bill is introduced—and we are told that it will not be introduced until after Sir Charles Tupper is elected in Cape Breton, whenever that may be—and before its second reading is carried in this House, we shall have ample time to consider the Auditor General's accounts.

Motion withdrawn.

DRAINAGE ON RAILWAY PROPERTY.

Mr. CASEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 3) concerning drainage on the property of railway companies. He said: This Bill, Mr. Speaker, is very simple in its provisions, which are as follows:—

Whereas it is expedient that municipalities and land owners should have ample facilities for drainage on and across the lands of railway companies within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada; and whereas legislation concerning watercourses and drainage is within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces; and whereas doubts have arisen as to whether railway companies within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada are subject to such provincial legislation: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, declares and enacts as follows:—

1. Notwithstanding anything in any Act of the Parliament of Canada contained, every railway company within the legislative authority of the said Parliament is hereby declared to be subject, with respect to all lands, whether covered by road-bed or not, owned, occupied or used by it in any province, to all Acts of such province concerning drainage and watercourses as applied to railways.

The reason why I introduced this Bill is that in carrying out schemes of township drainage, and in carrying out drainage by individuals holding lands contiguous to railways, great opposition has been met with from the different railway companies, to the passage of the necessary drains across their lands or under their road-beds. This has been more especially the case, perhaps, in western Ontario, where the country is comparatively level, and where the necessary drainage for farms has to pass across the different railways in order to get an outlet. Some of the railways have raised very great difficulties in the way of such drainage. I may say that the Grand Trunk Railway in particular, in the county I have the honour to represent, has been in the habit of charging a rental for the right of drainage across their lands. I am told that that company is receiving thousands of dollars of rent annually on that portion of its road west of St. Thomas, for the mere right of drainage across its property—a right which the farmers in the townships concerned would have enjoyed, free, if that property had been in the hands of anybody else but a railway company—and a right for the enjoyment of which they would not have to pay rent, if these railways had been under the jurisdiction of the provinces, instead of this Parliament.

The legislature of Ontario has passed a very elaborate Act, dealing entirely with the question of drainage and watercourses, crossing the property of railway companies. I shall not go into its provisions in detail for they do not affect the principle of this Bill; but I may say that the Act provides the greatest security against any damage being done to the permanent road-beds of the railway companies. It provides for arbitration, on which the railways will be represented by their engineer, and on which the other party will be also represented. It provides for an easy and cheap means of deciding what the party who wishes to drain his land should pay for the privilege, or the expense, of cutting a drain across the railway's property, and how much, if anything, the railway company should pay towards the cost of such drain.

Now, while these railways were under provincial control, they were subject to any laws made by the provincial legislatures. They would be subject to this drainage law among others ; but when this Parliament saw fit to declare that these were "railways for the benefit of Canada" and assumed legislative control over them, the railways set up the defence, in all cases where parties sought to drain across their property, that they were not subject to the provincial Drainage Act. I am informed that cases in connection with such drainage have gone into the courts, that the court of first instance has held, in some of the cases, that the companies, being Dominion railways, were not subject to the provincial Act, and appeals, I believe, are pending in some of these instances. But I have not heard that any case has been appealed to the Supreme Court or to the Privy Council in England ; so that the point has not been definitely settled whether these companies can claim exemption from their ordinary obligations as property owners, in consequence of their being Dominion railways.

This Bill simply proposes to remove those doubts, and to provide that, so far as drainage is concerned, all railways in Canada shall be subject to the laws of the provinces through which their lines extend. Whether they be Dominion railways or not, they shall be put on the same basis as other property owners in that respect. I have said that the province of Ontario has enacted special legislation with regard to drainage across railway lines, saving all proper rights to the railways. I am not aware that any other province has similar legislation ; but under this proposed Act, in a province where there is no such legislation, these railways would remain subject to Dominion legislation with regard to drainage. The Bill only provides that the railway companies shall be subject to provincial laws, where such exist, respecting drainage and watercourses as applied to railways, and not to general drainage acts.

I am sure that this Bill will recommend itself to the common sense of the House. I do not think it was ever intended, when this House assumed authority over these railways, that the people who owned lands adjoining should be put in any worse position than they were in before, or than they would be in now, if the railways had not been taken charge of by this House. I think the proposition will commend itself to every one, that the provincial legislatures know better what sort of legislation in regard to drainage is suited to their peculiar circumstances than this House. I think it will be admitted that there should be no distinction, as regards that point, between a railway company and any other owner of property, and I have great hopes that the House will adopt the Bill.

Last year, when I made a motion with regard to the inspection of locomotive boilers, the Minister of Railways objected to our taking any action, on the ground of lack of jurisdiction. He claimed that the inspection of locomotive boilers rested particularly with the provincial Parliaments. I was glad to hear him make that statement, because it affects the case now before the House. If legislation with regard to the inspection of locomotive boilers is particularly within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, surely legislation with regard to drainage, which is especially given to the provinces by our constitution, should be held to be within their power, in regard to railways as well as everybody else. I hope the Government will either see fit to adopt this Bill, or at all events, not to oppose it, and take the sense of the House fairly and squarely upon it. And, if that is done, I am sure that all who represent farming constituencies, at all events, will find it their duty to support the proposed legislation. This is, above all things, a farmer's Bill, because it is farmers, either in their individual capacity, or as ratepayers of municipalities, who are almost entirely concerned in this question. I hope that that great class of the community will receive due consideration from this House.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know whether this Bill, if it becomes law, will remedy the grievance complained of by the farmers or not. But I do know that it is most desirable that some law should be enacted that will enable us to understand whether the authority in regard to this question rests with the province or with the Dominion. There seems to be a conflict of opinion upon that subject to-day. If it lies with the Dominion, it is utterly impossible, judging from past experience for either municipalities or private individuals to enforce their rights and to compel the railway company to allow lands to be drained across its road without paying a consideration, or signing some private agreement with the railway company which would be very onerous to the individual or the municipality signing it. This subject is frequently discussed in municipalities ; I know I have from time to time heard it raised in my own district. But no solution of the difficulty has ever been proposed in these discussions. You are practically unable to drain land to-day when the drain must cross the property of a railway company, for the railway company will not allow it. The question as to the authority in the matter is the first difficulty. Some say : Appeal to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. But if you appeal to that body you will appeal in vain, because the railway companies are always too powerful to allow of an individual or municipal corporation getting redress. If the matter were placed under provincial law we should know better what to do, because we know the law as regards drainage and watercourses. It would be much easier then for municipal councils and those engaged in the execution of the law to know how to remedy the grievance and prosecute an appeal in case of the refusal of the railway company to consent. We give these companies great power. We make extensive corporations and give them great franchises, including the power to take away the rights of the municipal corporations or individuals. And having given away these franchises, we are unable to do anything with the companies we have created. Even if the municipality wishes to cross a track with a highway it is met with the objection that this is private property and permission to cross it is withheld. In such a case, appeal must be made to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and there every objection is raised by the railway company, and so many difficulties thrown in the way that it is practically impossible for a private individual or weak corporation to gain what the public interests require. For these reasons, the plainer we make the law in the interest of the private individual, the better for all concerned, for without that, we can get no redress. In my part of the country, this question has been raised many times. There are extensive tracts of land requiring to be drained, but if the railway companies are applied to, they refuse to allow drains to cross their property. If you apply to the municipality, their answer is: We do not know where the authority lies, whether in the province or in the Dominion, and we do not want to go to the expense and trouble of prosecuting a lawsuit to establish our rights; therefore, we rest under the grievance. We should make the law plain, so that private individuals and municipal corporations could be secured in their rights. If this Bill is not considered strong enough or plain enough, I think it is the duty of the Government to introduce some legislation that will give the municipal corporations greater control and enable them to prosecute cases under the provincial law so that they may be able to provide the drains which are so necessary in the interests of the people in the various municipalities.

Mr. DICKEY. I think that both hon. gentlemen who have spoken are quite right in saying that this is a subject that is attended with a great deal of difficulty. You have on one hand a railway company incorporated by this Parliament and having a great trunk railway running through the country and doing a very valuable work, and, as a rule, making very little money out of its franchise. On the other hand, you have the private owners and municipalities deeply interested in the question of drainage across the railway company's property. The problem of reconciling these two rights—for both are rights demanding consideration—is one of very great difficulty. Now the hon. mover of the Bill proposes that this Parliament shall renounce all jurisdiction in the matter, and leave it to the local legislature. For my part, I would not, at present, feel justified in accepting that as a solution of the difficulty. The hon.

gentleman who introduced the Bill has referred to the legislation in the province of Ontario. That legislation may be, and probably is, of a very high class. But the hon. gentleman must remember that there are various provinces in the Dominion and that you will have to face not one only, but a number of sets of laws on the subject. So you will have railways in different parts of the country subject to different requirements.

Mr. MULOCK. They are now subject to different laws in some respects.

Mr. DICKEY. Not as to this subject.

Mr. MULOCK. Not as to drainage, but as to other matters.

Mr. DICKEY. Then, very likely, the provinces will find it convenient to delegate this power, if it is given to them, to the various municipalities; and, while there may be something in what has been said that the railway companies have a very high standing before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, I think all will admit that they do not stand very well with the municipalities, and there would be a good deal of difficulty in getting impartial justice there. Again, where drainage is required across a railway track, each case must stand upon a different footing, for each has different degrees of merit, and it is practically impossible to deal with them under any general rule. A great deal must depend upon the opportunities of getting drainage in another direction, the facilities for providing the drainage through railway property, and other considerations that will readily suggest themselves. And so each case will require special consideration, and it should be expert consideration, it seems to me, that is, the matter should be decided upon the advice of engineers. I do not see how it is practicable for municipalities to offer the services of engineers to investigate matters of this kind. It must not be forgotten, either, that when a railway is located, part of the damages which it causes to proprietors of land severed by the railway, is a compensation for this very question of drainage.

Mr. CASEY. Oh, no.

Mr. DICKEY. I think so. Then there is another consideration, and that is the consideration of safety with regard to the railway itself. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council which deals with this matter, deals with it from the standpoint of the joint interest, on the one hand, the interest of the railway to preserve its franchise without undue interference, and on the other hand, to allow reasonable facilities for drainage. Their order in each case is accompanied by precautions as to the manner in which drains shall cross the railway, and in that way secures the safety of the public in travelling over the railway. Of course, it is quite proper to say that it is in the interest of the railway to make a drain safe, and that no doubt is the case ; but the municipalities as such have no knowledge whatever of what is required in order to provide for the safe construction of a drain.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him—I must ask him not to wander away from the municipalities. It is not proposed by anybody to leave it to the municipalities, but to make these railways subject to such laws as exist in the different provinces specially referring to this matter, and making provision for drainage across the railway.

Mr. HAGGART. The province of Ontario gives that right to the municipalities.

Mr. CASEY. No, it does not.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think it is necessary for us to discuss that right, because it is quite evident that they could depute this power to the municipalities, and they probably would, as a very evident way of disposing of the question. Now, there is another consideration, and that is whether it is wise for this House to renounce a jurisdiction of this kind which will form a precedent. Take, for instance, the question of fencing. Nothing could be more purely local in its character than the question of fencing, and yet the railway legislation of the Dominion Parliament deals with that, and the Railway Committee of the Privy Council deals with it. The crossing of highways, the speed with which trains are to run through towns, and all local matters like that, which could very well be said to come within local jurisdiction, are regulated by the legislation of this Parliament. So that looking the whole subject over, and considering that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council has facilities for investigating cases of this kind which municipalities could not have, and considering that on any application, we would be quite ready to send an officer to any point in Canada to investigate a prima facie case of damage of this kind, it seems to me that the machinery there is better than anything likely to be provided by a municipality. I am not saying at all that the legislation of the Dominion as it stands now is all that it should be, I do not at all express that opinion. I admit that my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) may be quite correct in saying that proper facilities are not given in that direction, but that is not the question at issue here. The question at issue here is not whether those facilities cannot be improved, but the question is whether we shall refrain from improving our own legislation, and hand the jurisdiction over to another power over whom we have no control whatever, and whose action in the matter no person can foresee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If we have jurisdiction here at all.

Mr. DICKEY.

Mr. DICKEY. I think there is no doubt about our jurisdiction. I am not at all denying the local jurisdiction, I do not propose to say that the local legislatures have not jurisdiction. I think, however, there is no doubt about our jurisdiction, and with deference I should say that the proper course for this House to pursue, and the most consistent with its own dignity, is to keep the power within ourselves, to make such changes in the legislation as we may deem proper.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to a question which was raised by the Minister of Justice. There is no doubt that in granting the franchise to a railway company we may attach any conditions we think proper. It is perfectly true, too, that we may attach conditions with regard to drainage, if we see proper, there is no doubt about that. But apart from that altogether, if a railway company acquires property or land in running through a province, I do not know under what principle of law it could be argued that that railway company holds its lands free from any of the burdens or obligations which the law of the province imposes upon any other proprietor. The railway company goes into a province under the jurisdiction of the laws of the province, and it comes within the boundary of those laws, assuming the province to keep within its sphere of legislation,—as much as any other individual. Now, take the Parson's case, where insurance companies were incorporated by this House : I think that was the class of cases referred to. It was there held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that those companies going into a province and acquiring property or doing anything else, must conform to the laws of the province. For instance, we might authorize a railway company, because we are authorized to incorporate railway companies, to acquire real estate, but we could not say that they shall hold that estate under a title different from what the law of the province may require from any other individual. Here is a natural watercourse—and all these are under the jurisdiction of the province—crossed by a railway ; this House could not, in creating a railway corporation, say that the railway company shall have a right to close the watercourses along its own line ; it would have no right to say that. There are cases decided in the province of Ontario where it has been held that a railway company is liable when it interferes with a natural watercourse and damages have been obtained against it, if it interferes with the facilities for drainage where there is no natural watercourse. I think in many of the cases it has been held, that in giving compensation for the land, that matter must have been taken into consideration. But if a province says that, in the case of every land holder, the law which provides for the drainage of a territory can apply to such, I do not know any jurisdiction or any authority on the part of this House to say that a railway company shall be an exception to that rule. I do not see how you could maintain provincial authority if you could set up a right of that sort, because you might, in granting a franchise to a railway company, flood tens of thousands of acres, and interfere with the possibility of cultivation altogether. I do not say what this House might do if it were a proprietor of the railway itself, or if the country were proprietor. I am not going to discuss that, though it is my impression that even in that case the power could not exist. But in the case of a railway corporation, you incorporate it to conform to the law of the province through which it runs, that is, so far as that law is within the purview and jurisdiction of that province. I do not at all dispute that we might attach any conditions in the franchise to a railway company that we might see proper, and that we could release it from those burdens which we here impose, because we can do so in the case of any other company we might incorporate, but we can't release it, from the duty of rendering obedience to the authority of the laws of each particular province through which the line may pass.

Mr. HAGGART. If there is anything in the hon. gentleman's argument, there is no necessity for this Bill. In that respect, I agree perfectly with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I believe when a railway company acquires a franchise it is liable for all damages it may cause to a municipality or individual. If it erects a bridge, and, owing to the piers, adjacent lands are flooded, the company is liable for damages. This Bill appears to be intended to apply to some purposes that were not contemplated in building railways. It is intended to apply to a general system of drainage which it may be found necessary to carry across railway tracks. Every facility is, however, offered by the Dominion Government at the present time to secure the object which the hon. mover of the Bill has in view. Application may be made to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. This may be done even without any expense to the individuals or attendance at Ottawa, because an application may be forwarded, and if a prima facie case is made out an officer of the department is sent to the place to ascertain if it is necessary the drainage should be made, and if it is necessary, he reports what proportion of the expenditure should be borne by the railway company and what part by the municipalities. I should like the hon. gentleman to suggest any easier mode of accomplishing the object he has in view. The objection to the Bill is that it gives provincial authorities the right of legislating on a matter that is within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament. Perhaps there would not be much harm if the local government legislated in regard to the matter in question. But if they were given the right, the provincial government might transfer it to the municipal authorities, and a reeve and council might act to please farmers along the line of railway. It might drive drains across the railway every hundred feet apart, for which, of course, there would be no necessity: they might, indeed, make such arrangements as would injure the rights of the railway company. This is a power which should not be given to the provincial authorities, which might limit franchises for undertakings granted with the sanction of this Government and within its powers.

Mr. SPROULE. Can you get a drain across a railway company's property now?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes. If necessary, an application can be made under the amendment of 1888.

Mr. MULLOCK. It provides only in case of municipalities. How about the case of individuals?

Mr. HAGGART. The municipality acts in cases of individuals who seek to cross a railroad.

Mr. CASEY. No.

Mr. HAGGART. If it is desired to cross a railway, the municipality acts. If it becomes necessary that an individual's property should be drained, he makes application to the municipality.

Mr. MULLOCK. There is no provision requiring a municipality to act for an individual.

Mr. HAGGART. If it was in the interest of the municipality that drainage should be carried in that direction, the municipality would have power to make application to the Privy Council. If the municipality did not think the building of the drain was of sufficient importance of course they would not make application. The hon. gentleman does not suppose that we could legislate for every individual, or give means for passing across or under railways if such was in the interest solely of an individual. It is carrying the principle far enough if we allow a municipality to make application, as it would do in all cases when more than an individual's benefit was at issue.

Mr. MULLOCK. I think the Minister has somewhat misunderstood my interruption. The Act to which he refers is only with respect to a municipality applying to the Railway Committee. Is there anything in the Act which enables an individual to secure drainage for his own private property; where no highway or public easement is affected? I am not aware that there is. If I am correct, then the Minister's argument does not meet the grievance referred to in the Bill, although I am not saying that the remedy proposed is the proper one.

Mr. HAGGART. The Act goes further and allows an individual to make application to the Railway Committee. The Act says :

The Railway Committee shall have power to inquire and determine any application, complaint or dispute respecting any highway or street, ditch or sewer, water, gas or other pipes or mains over and through lands owned or occupied by the company.

Mr. MULOCK. The point I made on a former occasion I renew now. Taking the contention of the Government that an individual sufferer is obliged to get relief through the tribunal provided by the Railway Act, he is obliged, either in person or by some one else, to make his grievance known at Ottawa. This law extends from ocean to ocean, over 3,000 or 4,000 miles of railway, with ramifications running from a short distance to hundreds of miles in a northerly direction. If every citizen was perfectly familiar with the railway law and with the step he has to take, namely, to write a letter, to get his grievance remedied, well and good. We know that theoretically every citizen is supposed to know the law, but as a Parliament we can hardly bind farmers and small property owners by any such law, if we can adopt one less cumbersome. What is involved in the case of an individual having his property injured? Parenthetically, I would say that I do not agree with the Minister of Justice that damages paid for land on expropriation include any possible damages to property by flooding of water or otherwise. The argument of the Minister of Justice was that the money given at the time of the purchase embraced damages at that moment unknown.

Mr. DALY. That was what the member for Bothwell said.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice raised that point and I am answering him. Take the average land owner who is selling land to the railway company before the railway is constructed and his mind does not look into the future or anticipate the flooding of his property. I extremely doubt if, as a rule, the question of damages enters into the consideration of the parties when the purchase money is being fixed. If it does enter into consideration then, of course, the landed proprietor has no right whatever to drainage. I wish to address my remarks more particularly to the Minister of Railways. I say that the present system by which each individual is obliged to apply for redress to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council at Ottawa, is an insufficient remedy. It is cumbersome, expensive and unsatisfactory, and it often results in an individual bearing the evil he suffers rather than fly to others he knows not of. I would suggest that some more simple scheme should be devised. I do not say at this moment what that scheme should be, but I will submit for the consideration of the Government whether it would not be possible to select a local tribunal: for example, the county court judge of the county in which the land is situated. He could hear the matter, and either dispose of it or receive communications and transmit them. With a railway system extending three or four thousand miles in length it is unreasonable that the citizens should be compelled to communicate with the Privy Council and suffer all the delays, and perhaps expense, involved. The simple rural inhabitant, not knowing perhaps that the Minister of Railways will treat the matter in the off-hand way he intimates, and which, no doubt, he does, will shrink from making the application. If he employs counsel, the expense will perhaps override the advantage he derives, and so he suffers without getting redress. The present system is unjust and demands a remedy.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) seems to forget one very important thing which is done at the inception of a railway. No one will gainsay that at the inception of a railway all properties through which it passes must be properly drained at the expense of the company, or damages must be paid for not draining. The remedy, if a remedy is needed, will simply be necessary for additional drainage that was not contemplated at the time. No hon. gentleman can successfully controvert that contention. All railway companies under the law of this Parliament are compelled to properly and effectually and thoroughly drain every part of the land over which they go, or they must pay the compensation necessary at the time.

Mr. CASEY. Will the hon. gentleman give me the reference to that in the Act?

Mr. TISDALE. It is under the different provisions of the General Railway Act, and any one who has looked into that Act will see it. We all know that the general franchise is clothed with that responsibility.

Mr. CASEY. Could the hon. gentleman refer me to any particular section of the Act where that is expressed?

Mr. TISDALE. It is in the General Act. I think almost every hon. gentleman has been in a locality where a railway has gone through, and he knows that the railway company is liable for the damages. There are liabilities of that sort imposed at the very inception of every railway company.

Mr. CASEY. I know they do not do it.

Mr. TISDALE. If they do not it is the fault of individuals. There might be some improvement in the law, no doubt, but this state of facts lessens the arguments against the present law. Hon. gentlemen seem to forget that the Railway Act of 1888 was the combined wisdom of this House, and of the Railway Department, and the Royal Commission which had been appointed to inquire into railway matters. That royal commission after the best consideration and after hearing evidence, recommended that this, among other things, should be left to the Railway Committee. I am inclined to agree with the royal commission that the present procedure was the wisest and fairest and cheapest. I have been a practising lawyer for a good many years, although I am not now, and my experience was, that when it was left to the local tribunals, and a farmer went into the question of drainage he never knew where it was going to end. The lawyers took it from court to court and in trying to enforce his views, he often loaded himself with lawsuits which cost him half as much as his farm was worth.

Mr. MULOCK. They drain the farmer instead of the land.

Mr. TISDALE. The present tribunal is a cheap tribunal and the system has worked successfully. I am satisfied it will be a fair tribunal whichever party is in power. It leaves the responsibility with those who for the time being have the confidence of the nation and are charged with the responsibility of seeing that the rights of individuals are properly attended to. The only objections to it comes from one or two men who are actuated by personal considerations and personal disappointments in not being able to enforce their alleged rights in certain neighbourhoods. The question has been before Parliament a number of times before. The very subject which the hon. gentleman from Elgin (Mr. Casey) brings forward here, was twice thrown out last year by the Railway Committee. A similar Bill was passed in the Senate, and afterwards referred to the Railway Committee of this House, and was thrown out almost unanimously by that committee. This is a very strong point in favour of leaving the matter as it is at present. It would ill-become either the dignity or the legislative capacity of this House to concede that in granting franchises we will not maintain our rights. We should not blindly say that for all time to come, any legislation passed by any province in this Dominion will bind us in a matter within our jurisdiction, and with reference to a franchise which we took the responsibility of granting.

This is an unanswerable point. I am not saying that there may not be some improvements in the drainage; but if that is true, then let us have a Bill on the proper lines, and I for my part shall be most happy to consider anything of that sort on its merits. But I think that hon. members, when seized of the importance of the matter, will agree that it would be improper and unbecoming to the dignity and common sense and good judgment of this House to pass a law giving franchises to the extent to which we have a right to do, and at the same time to say that for all time to come the railways holding those franchises shall be liable to local interference from all the legislatures of this Dominion extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There seems to be no doubt that on this matter this Parliament possesses jurisdiction; but whether the matter is under the exclusive jurisdiction of this Parliament or that of the local legislature, is admittedly a disputed point. As to that I have nothing to say. The object of this Bill is simply to remove that doubt, and to bring the matter of drainage under and through railways within the jurisdiction of the local legislature. Now, it seems to me that this is a Bill which ought to pass this House. No one can settle questions of this kind so well as those who are on the ground; and the local legislature in each province is certainly more competent to decide them properly than the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. With all due respect to what the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) has said about the decisions of that committee, I maintain that they are very expensive, and in a great many instances most absurd. They are very expensive, for this reason, that if you want to carry your appeal before that committee, it is absolutely necessary for you to engage able counsel. The railways are, of course, represented by the ablest counsel in the land, and unless you are also represented by able counsel to rebut the arguments of those men, you simply have no show at all. I know of cases that have been very improperly decided by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, resulting in heavy burdens being thrown upon municipalities which should never have been put on them. Through the western part of Ontario this matter is a very serious one. When railways were first built there, the lands through which they ran were comparatively unsettled and undrained. The lands have since improved, settlers have gone in, and now it is necessary that the lands should be drained. Yet it is almost impossible in the western part of Ontario—I speak with a knowledge of the facts—to get drains under the railway lands. You may appeal to the Railway Committee; but who is going to bear the expenses of that, which is a large expense? The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) says it does not cost a cent. It does not cost anything to appear before the committee; but the expense of sending witnesses and counsel and preparing maps and plans is a large expense—in many cases so large that the municipality would rather suffer the grievance than apply for a remedy. This matter, it seems to me, can be adjusted by leaving it to the local legislature. I do not see why a railway company that owns land in a municipality should have different rights from those of others who own lands there. My lands are subject to the laws of the local legislature, and why should not the lands of the railways be so too. I admit that the railway companies require protection as well as anybody else; but their rights would not be prejudicially affected at all by leaving this matter to the local legislature. That body has a deep interest in the development of this country and in the welfare and progress of the railways throughout the country; and surely it would be as much interested in seeing that justice was done to all parties as the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Besides, it would have this advantage, that it would have a knowledge of the facts obtained on the ground which could not be obtained by men who come from all parts of the Dominion. I therefore think that this Bill should become law, and I do not see why the Government should object to it. Surely it will relieve them of a great deal of responsibility, trouble, and no doubt unpleasant work, while at the same time it will meet the views of all who are interested much better than the present system.

Mr. OUIMET. It seems to me that, in looking at this Bill, we should bear in mind two very different interests that may be affected by it. The first interest is what I would call the private interest; that is, the right of property in the lands owned by the railway companies. I cannot see very great inconvenience in allowing the province to interfere with that right of property, which to a certain extent may be considered as private or civil property. But this would imply interference with the roadbed of every railway which I would call public property. We must remember that every railway is a great highway used for transportation what I would call accelerate and dangerous transportation. The interference with the roadbed may produce very grave results, if made without the supervision of the proper authorities. This is the reason why any interference with the Dominion highways must be looked after, and why these highways must be subject to the responsible authority of the Railway Department. No interference with these roads should be allowed except by the authority of the Railway Department and the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. This interference alone renders impossible the passage of this Bill. It would decentralize the authority responsible for the safety of the travelling public. For that reason, if no other, this Bill should be rejected. As has been said, every facility is given individuals, as well as municipalities, to have drains pass under the road-beds of the different railway companies, by applying to the Railway Department. No expense is incurred except the expense of writing to the secretary of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and in no case that I know of has the Government ever refused to consider an application of that kind, even when not supported by counsel. No good results can come from the adoption of this Bill, and the greatest evil may follow from it. Under the circumstances, I do not see how this House could approve of a measure which would be certainly a permanent danger to the security of the travelling public.

Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must express my surprise at the views just stated by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet). Does he pretend to say that the lives of the travelling public will not be as carefully looked after, under the supervision of a local legislature as of that of the Dominion Government? Does he pretend that the Dominion Government are the only safe guardians of the public?

Mr. OUIMET. I say that the safety of the public lies in having only one responsibility, and the danger lies in the division of that responsibility.

Mr. CASEY. This Bill proposes to remove that division.

Mr. McMULLEN. In every province the local government would be responsible for the proper and prudent use of the powers conferred on it by this Bill. Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean to insinuate that the Executive of each province would be incapable, and that to give them this responsibility would endanger public safety. Surely he does not mean that it would not be safe to allow the local governments to deal with the railway companies in this matter of drainage, and that the only safety for the public lies in this subject being dealt with exclusively by the central authority in Ottawa. I contend that the hon. Minister's argument is fallacious, and not at all just to the local governments of this Dominion. This is an exceedingly important Bill, deserving of the serious consideration of this House. The Minister of Railways has said that any one desiring the construction of a drain across railway property may apply to the Privy Council. My esteemed friend behind me has pointed out pretty clearly the expense and inconvenience of such an application. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) says he can apply by letter. But that letter would have to be accompanied by some additional proof that the drain was required, and the railway companies always have their counsel present to oppose the application.

Mr. HAGGART. Would not that be the case, anyhow?

Mr. McMULLEN. Would it not be more convenient for a person in my riding to present his case in the city of Toronto than the city of Ottawa? Is it not more trouble and expense to come all the way to Ottawa, when personal appearance must be made either by counsel or by the property owner himself, than it would be to go to the city of Toronto. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) appears desirous to keep the entire railway system of the country under the control of the central authority. I do not know whether the railway companies have earnestly solicited the Dominion Government to be their guardians and protectors from the expenses which might be put upon them through the local governments passing drainage Acts under which they might be compelled to allow drains to cross their lines in greater numbers than at present. This is a question of growing importance. During the time that the country was being cleared, and before the people began to turn their attention to drainage, the question was not so important as it is now, and it is becoming more important every day. I submit that the greatest facilities should be given to the municipalities and to the farmers and property owners to secure drainage for their lands where it can be secured with the greatest convenience and cheapness. By this Bill we will give the local governments the power to deal with this as with all other Bills. Under the present law, when a man is going to construct a drain, he has to comply with two sets of laws—first the Drainage Act of Ontario, which applies to every portion of a drain which does not go on the property of the railway company, and then with the Dominion law the moment he touches the property of any railway whose charter is under the control of the Dominion Government—the Dominion Government has to be satisfied before he will be allowed to build that drain across the railway. Would it not be better that the entire drainage of lands, both across railways and elsewhere, should be relegated to the provincial authorities? In this way the question of drainage would be under the one control, and the drainage of lands would be much facilitated. I heard the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) say that railway companies are compelled to drain lands when they construct their railways. Well, Sir, they are simply compelled to drain land immediately adjacent to the line they are building. They are compelled to provide an outlet so as not to accumulate water that will become an inconvenience in the construction of the road-bed or to those who are immediately on the right or left of the road. If another man has a property at a distance requiring to be drained and there is not convenient outlet that can be made use of cheaply, it will enable him to cross the railway company's lands. Many cases are now arising in which it is necessary that the drains should cross the railway tracks. But the moment the drain reaches the railway company's property, the municipal system and the drainage laws of the province are superseded, and the person requiring the drain must come to Ottawa and make application for the privilege of making a drain across the railway company's tracks. It would be much better if the whole matter of drainage were relegated to the provinces, and let the province laws control the railways in such cases as well as the municipality. This is becoming a matter of more and more importance every day. In the district where I live, and in the district of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule)—to whose remarks I listened carefully—and throughout the whole of western Ontario it has become of the greatest importance that facilities should be given for the drainage of lands. Farmers should not be hampered and hindered by an expensive modus operandi that will postpone and frustrate the completion of drains that may be of the greatest benefit to large numbers in the community. The Bill proposed should be given effect to at once. The local governments and municipalities should be left to deal with this question.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). After an experience of twelve years in municipal life in Ontario, I have the best reasons for knowing that there is great difficulty in many cases in getting land drained on account of the railroads. I was astonished to hear the Minister say that the purchasing of the right of way included any damages that the land might sustain. Such is not the case. You can come on them for that afterwards. There is great need of a law to simplify the procedure in such matters. At present the farmer must bring an engineer to have a survey made of the locality, and then he must have plans and profiles made before he can go before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council; and, moreover, he must have counsel. A Bill should be passed allowing the whole matter to be dealt with in some such manner as is now done in Ontario in the case of property under provincial jurisdiction. The Minister of Railways and Canals said that a private individual could not carry a drain across a public highway in Ontario. That is quite true. It is also true that an individual cannot take a drain across his neighbour's property. The procedure in such cases is this: The person who requires the drain notifies the owners of the land he proposes to cross that he requires an outlet. They meet and consult upon matters, and if they cannot come to an arrangement the person requiring the drain notifies the township council. Each township council has its engineer. In our locality we have a regularly licensed provincial engineer for every municipality. The engineer examines the locality and apporitions the expense to be borne by each. The work is then done under the engineer. I do not know that exactly this system would work in the case of carrying drainage under railways, but I am sure that some simpler system is required than that which makes it necessary for a farmer to come before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I know localities where they have attempted time and again to make drains under railways, but have not been able to succeed down to the present time on account of the large cost required under the present procedure. Where but one farmer is interested, the expense is altogether too great. There is no use in saying that a farmer can go before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council without incurring considerable expense in preparing plans and profiles, and even assessments of the different properties affected. A Bill such as that before the House would be of great benefit to the rural districts, not only of Ontario, but every other province.

Mr. FOSTER. After having listened to this discussion, it strikes me that the subject is one which seems to involve differences in treatment in different provinces. I have a suggestion to make. I think we should read the Bill a second time 'pro forma,' and refer it to the Committee on Railways. That committee, it seems to me, can discuss the matter more profitably than we can.

Mr. CASEY. I accept the suggestion with this counter-suggestion: that the Railway Committee will have its hands full in dealing with private Bills, and, as this is not a private Bill, it should rather, I think, be sent to a select committee of five or seven members.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Railway Committee has not so much work to do this session as it sometimes has. If that committee wishes, it can have the Bill considered by a small sub-committee.

Mr. LAURIER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) will take my advice, he will accept the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Finance, which, I think, is a very reasonable one. The Railway Committee is composed of experts in these matters, and will be able to give the Bill better treatment than a special committee could.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. CASEY moved:

That the said Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL RATE OF INTEREST.

Mr. MULLOCK moved the second reading of Bill (No. 8) respecting interest. He said: The principle of this Bill is a very simple one, and I am sure the measure will commend itself to the judgment of the House. Many years ago, in 1859, I think, Parliament fixed the legal rate of interest at 6 per cent. At that time the current rate of interest was considerably in excess of 6 per cent—perhaps 9 per cent. The rate fixed by Parliament was, therefore, about one-third less than the current rate. Since that time a change has taken place in the value of money, and to-day, I think, I am quite within the facts in saying 6 per cent is the average current rate. Money is procurable at much less than 6 per cent, and I doubt if, in ordinary dealings between man and man, a higher rate than 6 per cent is now given as a matter of agreement, except in rare cases. I have suggested 4, because it is about a third under the current rate of 6 per cent, and 6 per cent was years ago about a third under the then current rate, so 4 per cent is about a third under the current rate of to-day. The only doubt in my mind is as to whether, instead of its being fixed at 4 per cent, we should not fix it at 3 per cent to-day. However, I am prepared to hear suggestions in that direction, but not wishing to be unreasonable, I have endeavoured as nearly as possible to adopt a scale in harmony with the scale adopted in 1859. It seems to me in the public interest that the legal rate, that is, the rate provided by law in the absence of an agreement, should not at least be in excess of, or even equal to, the highest going rate between parties. Six per cent to-day, the legal rate, is an excessive rate for the law to impose in the way of damages or fine upon a debtor. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron.)

Mr. FOSTER. As it would be impossible to finish the discussion of this Bill before six o'clock, and I am going to propose that the House adjourn at six. I would suggest to my hon. friend that the debate on this Bill be adjourned. The discussion will certainly take longer than the time between now and six o'clock. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. MULLOCK. Of course, I will accede to the hon. gentleman's request. I suppose that we will have plenty of time to discuss all these Bills.

Mr. FOSTER. Lots of time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the House should make that suggestion compulsory, that is, make a legal rate beyond which a contract should not extend.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON PROHIBITION.

Mr. FLINT (for Mr. Casey) asked:

What has been the cost to date of the Royal Commission on Prohibition, specifying the amounts for expenses and salaries of commissioners, reporting and printing?

Is the amount so stated final?

Mr. FOSTER. The expense of the Royal Commission on Prohibition up to date has been $82,813.41; the expenses of the commissioners, $6,724.36; salaries of commissioners, $13,775; reporting, including expenses of reporters, $8,914.09; printing, $29,846.05. The amount as stated above is, I believe, final.

CANADIAN SHEEP IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. CASEY asked :

What steps have been taken by the Government to prevent the scheduling of Canadian sheep in Great Britain ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. When information was cabled by the High Commissioner to the effect that cases of scab had been found in sheep carried by Canadian steamers to England, the Minister of Agriculture caused instructions to be conveyed to the veterinary surgeons of the department to make an inspection of each animal before embarkation as quickly as possible. Such instructions were carried out, and none but healthy animals were allowed to go forward.

IMPORTATION OF SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

Mr. RIDER asked :

Whether there has been admitted into Canada, free of duty during the year 1895, any alcohol, or spirituous liquors of any kind, of American manufacture ? If so, under what statute or regulations ? For what purpose, and in what quantity, has it been imported during the period named ?

Mr. WOOD. There have been no spirituous liquors imported free of duty.

WHARF AT MAGOG, P.Q.

Mr. RIDER asked :

1. Whether the Government has acquired by purchase or otherwise any property at Magog, province of Quebec, for a public wharf ?

2. Of what does the property consist, and what are its specifications and dimensions ?

3. Where is it situated, and from whom was it purchased ?

4. Does it connect with a highway or street ?

5. When was the purchase completed ? What was the price paid ? How was the payment made ? If by cheque, to whom was it made payable ?

6. In what state of repair is the wharf, and have any repairs been made thereto by the Government ?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. Yes. 2. The property consists of a wharf 420 feet in length by 24 feet in width, for a distance of 322 feet from the shore, the remainder or outer end being 40 feet in width, with a storehouse situated on the outer end of the wharf. 3. The wharf is situated in the bed of Lake Memphremagog, and along the shore thereof in the town of Magog. The wharf was purchased from Messrs. C. C. Smith & Co. 4. The wharf connects with a street immediately west of the Canadian Pacific Railway station, which street leads to Main Street. 5. The purchase was completed on 7th August, 1895, and the price paid was $2,500. The payment was made by cheque from the Department of Finance, payable to E. B. Longtinton, the agent of the Minister of Justice, and C. C. Smith & Co. 6. The wharf is in a fair state of repair, and no work has been done on it since the purchase. It is reported that $250 would place the wharf in a complete state of efficiency.

CHARLES CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. MULOCK asked :

1. Did the Government commute the sentence of one Charles Chamberlain, convicted of perjury, personation, or both, and sentenced to serve a term of imprisonment in the Manitoba penitentiary ? If so, why ?

2. What was the length of such term of imprisonment ? How much was served ? When did the prisoner begin to serve it, and when was he set at large ?

Mr. DICKEY. Yes. Charles Chamberlain had been convicted of perjury. The sentence was reduced on account of special services rendered by Chamberlain to the penitentiary, whereby a large sum of money was saved. The sentence was three years, and two years were served. The sentence dates from March 14, 1894. He was discharged December 21st last.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that two years had been served ?

Mr. DICKEY. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. And the sentence was dated 14th March, 1894 ?

Mr. DICKEY. There are reductions allowed.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman add this ?

Mr. DICKEY. That is included, of course. It means that a year of his sentence is taken off. He was set at large on 21st December.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it would be convenient to add the nature of the services. I would like to add that question.

Mr. DICKEY. I will give you that.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Has the Department of Public Works caused a survey to be made of the breakwater at Tignish, Prince Edward Island, during the season of 1895, as promised by the Minister of Public Works in the sessions of 1894 and 1895 ; and, if so, has a report been made ?

Mr. OUIMET. An examination of the breakwater at Tignish, P.E.I., was made during the session of 1895, and a report has been submitted.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Is the Department of Public Works aware of the fact that the Tignish Breakwater, Prince Edward Island, is in a dilapidated condition and liable to be carried away at any moment by storm, &c. ? Has the department taken steps for the immediate repair of said breakwater ?

Mr. OUIMET. The department is aware of the fact that the breakwater at Tignish, P.E.I., is in need of repair. The department has not taken steps for immediate repairs to the breakwater, owing to lack of funds.

KILDARE STATION POST OFFICE.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Has a postmaster been appointed at Kildare Station, Prince Edward Island, in the place of Avit Perry, deceased? If so, who is he, and, if not, how are the duties of that office managed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Avit Perry does not appear to have been postmaster at Kildare Station at any time. The postmastership of Kildare became vacant in August, 1895, by the resignation of Marguerite Poirier, who was then postmistress. John B. Gaudet was appointed postmaster in her place.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT PETERBOROUGH.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

1. Has the collector of customs at Peterborough resigned or has he been removed from office?

2. Is there a deficit in his accounts? If so, what is the amount of such deficit? Is the Government secured by bondsmen? If so, what are their names, and are they responsible persons for the amount of their respective bonds? When was the last audit made of the accounts of the collector of customs at the port of Peterborough?

3. Did the collector receive permission from the Government or department before leaving for Chicago, where he is now said to be domesticated?

4. If there is a vacancy, has an appointment been made, and, if so, who is the present incumbent?

5. Has the late collector been paid the full amount of his salary each month during his term of office?

6. When does the Government or department expect a report of the investigation at present being made?

7. How long has the Government or department known that the affairs of the custom-house at Peterborough have been conducted practically without a responsible head?

Mr. WOOD. 1. Mr. Clementi has been removed from the office of collector of customs at Peterborough. 2. There is a deficit in his accounts; the inspector telegraphs me that it will be in the neighbourhood of $3,000. The Government is fully secured. The bondsmen are Mr. James Stevenson and Mr. Robert Rowe. The port of Peterborough was last inspected on the 14th September, 1894. 3. The collector was not granted leave of absence before leaving for Chicago. 4. Mr. Rufus Stevenson has been appointed collector. 5. The late collector has been paid his salary up to the 31st December last. 6. The inspector wired me that he would not be able to make his full report before next week. 7. The Government were not aware that the affairs of the custom-house at Peterborough have been conducted without a responsible head. As soon as information was received of the incompetency of the collector, a man was appointed as acting collector in charge of the port.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is that Mr. Stephenson who is Collector at Chatham?

Mr. WOOD. No.

PIERS AND BREAKWATERS AT PASPEBIAC.

Mr. BERGERON (for Mr. Joncas) asked :

Whether petitions have been presented to the Government asking for the construction of piers and breakwaters at Paspébiac, in the County of Bonaventure, with a view to making at that point a harbour of refuge? If so, by whom were the said petitions signed?

Mr. OUIMET. Two petitions have been received by the Department, one in February, 1882, through Mr. Beauchesne, then M.P., signed by Rev. Cyprien Larrivee, Messrs. Charles Robin & Co., LeBoutillier Bros., the Mayor and Councillors of Paspébiac, and 184 others, asking for the construction of a public wharf at Paspébiac. Another petition was transmitted by Mr. Georges Romeril, agent for Messrs. Charles Robin & Co., on the 1st of June, 1891, asking that necessary works be constructed at Paspébiac to make it a harbour of refuge. This petition was signed by Messrs. LeBoutillier Bros., Georges Romeril, Rev. Mr. Larrivee, and 113 others. Letters were subsequently received to the same effect from Mr. Romeril on the 8th of January, 28th of November and 26th December, 1894, and from Messrs. Robin, Colas & Co., on the 28th March, 1894.

BAIE DES CHALEURS RAILWAY.

Mr. BERGERON (for Mr. Joncas) asked :

Whether letters or petitions have been forwarded to the Government, urging them to take the necessary steps to secure the ownership of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, with a view to making it a branch of the Intercolonial?

Mr. HAGGART. The Gaspé Board of Trade have asked the Government if any application had been received from the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company or the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company for an extension of time for the completion of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, and they further ask that the charter be cancelled, and that the road be taken possession of by the Government, and made a feeder of the Intercolonial Railway. I understand eighty miles out of the 100 miles from Metapédia to Paspébiac have been constructed, in aid of which the Government has granted a cash subsidy of $620,000, which has been paid, the Government holding as security for the completion of the balance of the 100 miles contracted for,

Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company bonds to the face value of $200,000.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness) asked :

What quantity of "hard-pan," so called, was removed by D. McDonnell and Cameron, sub-contractors under Sims and Slater, on the Cape Breton Railway, east of Grand Narrows :—

- (1) On section from station 1 to 106 ?
- (2) On section from station 210 to 250 ?

Mr. HAGGART. I have not the information asked for, just in the form desired, but the records show that whilst Messrs Sims & Slater and their sureties conducted the work on section No. 2 of the Cape Breton Railway, the following quantities of what has been termed hard-pan was excavated: From station 1 to station 106, 19,273 cubic yards; from station 210 to station 250, 5,460 cubic yards.

SUPREME COURT REPORTS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (for Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) asked :

Has the Government taken any, and what, steps to have the reports of the Supreme Court published with less delay than they have been in the past, and to ensure that the reports, when published, will contain the judgments of the court up to the time of publication ?

Mr. DICKEY. Yes. The Minister of Justice has given the following directions to the reporter :—1. Cases in which judgments are pronounced should be immediately reported with the written opinions of the judges which are handed down at the time. No report is to be delayed by reason of any opinion not having been handed down at the time judgment was pronounced. 2. When a case is in type the reporter should send to each judge, if so desired, a fair proof in galley of his opinion, but no delay exceeding eight days can be authorized for the perusal or correction of such proof by the judge. 3. Where it is announced at the rendering of judgment that no written opinion will be furnished by the court or any member thereof, a synopsis of the case should be reported. 4. Cases already decided, but which stand unreported awaiting the delivery of written opinions, should be immediately reported with the material available unless within ten days the opinions are handed down, in which case, of course, the opinions will be reported.

TOBACCO IMPORTATIONS.

Mr. JEANNOTTE asked :

1. How many pounds of foreign tobacco entered Canada in 1895 ?
2. What was the amount of excise duty levied on the said tobacco ?
3. On how many pounds of Canadian tobacco did the Government collect duty ?
4. The amount of the said duties ?

5. How many officers of excise are employed in collecting the said duties ?

6. What is the amount of salary paid these officers for the year 1895 ?

7. What is the amount of money expended by the Government in the way of salaries to secure the collection of such duties for the year 1895 ?

Mr. PRIOR. 1. Raw leaf, 12,422,326 lbs.; manufactured tobacco, 178,167 lbs., which includes cigars, cigarettes, snuff, and 359 lbs. of raw leaf samples which paid duty. 2. The amount of excise duty levied and collected on tobacco manufactured in Canada from foreign leaf during the fiscal year 1894-95 was $2,974,025.59, the duty being collectable on the manufactured product and not upon the raw leaf. 3. 544,244 lbs. 4. $28,896.10. 5, 6 and 7. This information cannot be given with any degree of accuracy, as officers have different classes of surveys under their charge, and even a reasonably fair approximate estimate of the salaries and expenditures in connection with the collection of duties on a specific article is impossible.

QUARANTINE REGULATIONS.

Mr. BENNETT (for Mr. Smith, Ontario) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to remove the quarantine regulations between Canada and the United States ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Correspondence is going on in connection with the cattle quarantine, but that correspondence has not reached the stage when it would be wise to make any announcement in this House. Speaking generally, I may say that the Government are fully aware of the importance of the subject, and no time will be lost in taking such steps as we believe will be in the best interests of the Canadian cattle trade and of Canadian trade generally.

CABINET RESIGNATIONS.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Fauvel) asked :

To how many gentlemen was the vacant portfolio in the Cabinet, caused by the resignation of Hon. A. R. Angers, offered, and by whom was it refused ?

Mr. FOSTER. The vacant portfolio in the Cabinet caused by the resignation of Hon. Mr. Angers was not offered to any person except and until it was offered and accepted by the present Minister.

LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR DEWDNEY.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Martin) asked :

Whether it is true that Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney, of British Columbia, interfered in the recent election in Victoria by wiring the Premier as to Col. Prior's position in the Cabinet ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not true that Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney, of British Columbia, interfered in the recent election in Victoria by wiring the Premier as to Col. Prior's position in the Cabinet.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Did he wire ?

Mr. FOSTER. He did wire.

PASPEBIAC WINTER PORT.

Mr. BERGERON (for Mr. Joncas) asked :

Whether the Government have sent to Paspébiac, in the county of Bonaventure, an engineer, with instructions to ascertain the possibility of making a harbour of refuge, or a winter port at that place ?

If so, at whose request was he sent, and what instructions did he receive ?

Mr. OUMET. The department has sent an engineer to Paspébiac, in the county of Bonaventure, with instructions to ascertain whether that harbour could or not be used as a winter port. This engineer was sent at the request of the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway Company. His instructions are to map out the formation of the bord ice, its thickness, keep record of maximum and minimum temperature, and all other details which will enable a conclusion to be arrived at. He is also instructed, while in the locality, to visit several other ports on the Baie des Chaleurs with the same object in view.

GASPE BASIN AND GRAND GREVE MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. BERGERON (for Mr. Joncas) asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a daily mail service between Gaspé Basin and Grand Grève, in the county of Gaspé ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. An application for a daily mail service between Gaspé Basin and Grand Grève was made by L. Z. Joncas, Esq., M.P., on the 20th inst., and it was referred to the inspector for report on the same day.

STE. ANNE DES MONTS MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. BERGERON (for Mr. Joncas) asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a daily mail service between Ste. Anne des Monts, in the county of Gaspé, and Matane, in the county of Rimouski ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. An application for a daily mail service between Ste. Anne des Monts and Matane was made by L. Z. Joncas, M.P., on the 20th inst., and it was referred to the inspector for report on the same day.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER, BART., HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Mr. CASEY asked :

1. At what different dates has Sir Charles Tupper been appointed to the office of High Commissioner at London, and how long did he hold that office under each appointment ?

Mr. FOSTER:

2. For what period, or periods, since his first appointment as High Commissioner, has he held office as a Minister of the Crown, and for what departments, giving date of beginning and end of each such period ?

3. What leave of absence was granted to him from his duties in London, and for what purpose, when he last came to Canada ?

4. Has he resigned his office as High Commissioner in the employ of the Government of Canada, and if so, when ?

5. If not, is he still in receipt of a salary or other emolument or allowance as such High Commissioner ?

6. If he has resigned, has any one else been appointed High Commissioner, and if so, who ?

7. Is any business now pending, or are any Canadian interests at stake which require the presence of a High Commissioner in London ?

8. Has the attention of the Government been called to statements in the press to the effect that Sir Charles Tupper is to hold the double offices of Secretary of State and High Commissioner ?

9. Is their intention that he shall continue to be High Commissioner while a member of the Cabinet ?

Mr. FOSTER. 1. (a.) Appointed High Commissioner, without salary, 30th May, 1883 ; (b.) Appointed High Commissioner, with pay, &c., 24th May, 1884 ; (c.) Resigned office as High Commissioner, January, 1887 ; (d.) Appointed Acting High Commissioner, without pay, 7th March, 1887. (e.) Resigned Acting High Commissioner, 6th July, 1887 ; (f.) Appointed High Commissioner, with pay, 23rd May, 1888 ; (g.) Resigned High Commissioner, 15th January, 1896 ; (h.) Appointed Acting High Commissioner, without pay, 15th January, 1896. 2. (a.) Appointed Minister of Finance, 27th January, 1887 ; (b.) Resigned as Minister of Finance, 23rd May, 1888 ; (c.) Appointed Secretary of State, 15th January, 1896. 3. Summoned to Canada by Premier's cablegram, 2nd December, 1895. 4. Resigned as High Commissioner, 15th January, 1896. 5. No. 6. Appointed Acting High Commissioner, without salary. 7. All business is regularly attended to by the officials in London, with approval from here. 8. No. 9. Is Acting High Commissioner for the present.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CABINET.

Mr. DAWSON asked :

Whether the seven Ministers who recently resigned and who have (all save one) returned to the Cabinet, are now satisfied—

(1) That they have secured the formation of a Government whose Premier commands the confidence of all his colleagues ?

(2) That they can satisfy the Liberal-Conservative party that its strongest elements are now at its head ?

(3) That they are now able to impress the country that it has a Government which is united and has power to govern ?

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid this question is dictated rather by curiosity than by a desire for real information, and that I cannot answer it to the hon. gentleman's satisfaction. And, to prevent waste of time, I think I may say that the same remark applies to the next question.

Mr. DAWSON. I am very anxious the Government should answer this question, therefore, I will inquire :

Whether, at the time they re-entered the Government, the following members of the Cabinet :—

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster),

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey),

The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart),

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives),

The Minister of Agriculture (Dr. Montague), and

The Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood), informed Sir Mackenzie Bowell that they re-entered his Government with many misgivings, but that they will nevertheless continue their loyal and united efforts to make it strong and efficient ?

Mr. FOSTER. I must give the same answer to that as to the preceding question.

THREE RIVERS HARBOUR.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. Langelier) asked :

1. What disposition has been made of the Three Rivers Harbour debentures authorized by chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1892 ? Have the said debentures been sold, and if so, at what price ?

2. Have the Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners paid to the Government the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, as required by the Act of last session ?

Mr. FOSTER. We have been advised that $40,500 of the debentures referred to have been sold at 94. The Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners have paid to the Government the sum of $15,000, as required by the Act of last session.

INSPECTOR OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES FOR THREE RIVERS.

Mr. RIDER (for Mr. Leduc) asked :

Is the Government aware that the position of inspector of weights and measures for the district of Three Rivers has been already a long time vacant, by the death of Mr. Olivier, who held that post ? If so, is it the intention of the Government to appoint an inspector for that division, during the present session ?

Mr. PRIOR. The matter is under consideration.

THREE RIVERS HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation) (for Mr. Langelier) asked :

1. What has been the total cost, up to 31st December, 1895, of the Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners' operations ?

2. Whether there are claims outstanding for work performed or for properties purchased, and if so, what are those claims ?

3. What is the annual revenue, and what are the annual expenses of said Harbour Commissioners ?

4. Whether the Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners are in debt to the Government ? If so, for what amount, and what steps have been taken to obtain payment of such debt ?

Mr. OUMET. (Translation.) The total expenditure of the Three Rivers Harbour Commissioners, up to 30th June, 1895, was $150,164.77. There is no such outstanding claims as those mentioned in the second paragraph of the question. The annual revenue of the Three Rivers Harbour Commission of 1894, reached up to $7,164.02, and the expenses, $2,367.84. From the 1st January to the 30th June, 1895, the revenue was $1,872.34, the expenditure being $1,222.40.

Mr. FOSTER. As to the fourth part of the question, I beg to say that on the 31st of December last, the commission, after paying $15,000 on account of interest, owed the Government for loan, $81,760.97 ; arrears of interest, $17,589.25 ; arrears and interest thereon on account of sinking fund, $9,335.65 ; and there is a sum of $800.22 at the credit of the sinking fund.

MARSH NEAR WALPOLE ISLAND.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) asked :

Whether the marsh, or any portion of it adjoining Walpole Island has been leased or sold to parties in Windsor or in Detroit, or to any other parties, and if so, at what price ?

Mr. DALY. 1. No sale of any portion of the marsh adjoining Walpole Island has been sold by the Dominion Government. 2. It has been leased. 3. Part of it has been leased to the Walpole Fishing and Shooting Company, of Toronto, at a rental of $250 per annum ; part to John S. Hendrie of Hamilton and Charles H. Nelson of Toronto, in trust for the St. Clair Flats Shooting Company, at a rental of $700 per annum for the first half of term, and $800 per annum for the remaining half ; and part to John Maughan, Z. A. Lash and E. R. C. Clarkson, of Toronto, in trust for the St. Anne's Island Shooting and Fishing Club, at a rental of $650 per annum. All these leases were made some years ago.

ADJOURNMENT—TRANSIT OF AMERICAN CATTLE.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the House adjourns I desire to ask a question. In this morning's "Citizen" it is stated that the Government, having despaired of being able to remove the scheduling of Canadian cattle seeking to enter Great Britain, had arranged for the admission to St. John of American cattle in transit to Great Britain. If any such permission has been given, I would ask the Government to lay upon the Table at the earliest moment the Order in Council and all other papers bearing on the subject.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Government will be very pleased to lay on the Table, perhaps on Monday, the papers in connection with the matter which the hon. gentleman has referred to.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Might I inquire of the Minister whether the Order in Council giving his permission has been passed?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman will see on Monday exactly what has been done.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 27th January, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CUSTOMS ACT, 1894.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 23) in further amendment of the Customs Tariff, 1894.

Mr. FOSTER. Explain.

Mr. McMULLEN. The intention of the proposed amendment to the Act is simply to erase the word "human." Of course, corn is used for human as well as for animal food. I will give full explanations when the Bill comes up for second reading.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked :

What is the amount collected for wharfage dues at the Tignish Breakwater, Prince Edward Island, during the season of 1895?

Mr. OUIMET. The total collections for the past year amounted to $73.96; the commission thereon amounted to $18.50, and there was remitted to the department the sum of $54.46.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAITS—BORINGS FOR TUNNEL.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Have any borings across the Straits of Northumberland, from Cape Traverse, Prince Edward

Mr. MULOCK.

Island, to Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick, been made during the season 1895? How many borings have been made since Engineer Palmer gave up the work? Have sufficient borings been made to enable the Government to decide intelligently on the feasibility and the cost of building a tunnel across the Straits? What amount has been paid for borings across the Straits up to date, giving the separate amounts for each year?

Mr. FOSTER. The amount expended in 1891 was $1,650.28; in 1892, $25; in 1895, $6,248.16, giving a total of $7,923.44. Several borings were made across the straits during 1895. I have not here the exact number made since Mr. Palmer left the business of boring at the straits, but I will get that information. With respect to the next question, I propose to have a map placed on the Table which will give information as to the course of the borings so far.

STEAMER "ALERT."

Mr. LANGELIER asked :

Whether the steamer "Alert" has been sold? If so, when, to whom, and at what price; has the purchase money been paid, and, if so, when?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. The "Alert" was sold on 2nd July, 1895. 2. The purchaser was J. B. Lantelum, of St. John, N.B. 3. The price for which the vessel was sold was $4,155. 4. The purchase money was paid on the 4th July, 1895, and the proceeds of the sale, after payment of expenses, has been forwarded through the usual channel to the Admiralty for the credit of the Imperial Navy Fund. The amount remitted to the Admiralty was £814 4s. 7d. sterling.

FISHING BOUNTIES IN DIGBY, N.S.

Mr. BOWERS asked :

1. How many cheques issued to fishermen in Digby County in 1894, endorsed by the late fishery officer and used by himself, have come to the notice of the Government?
2. Have the Government taken any steps to ascertain whether the claims put forth of parties not receiving their cheques were correct?
3. If so, what conclusion was reached?
4. Has the Government re-issued new cheques to those parties who were thus defrauded by one of their officials?
5. If not, why not?
6. Is it the intention of the Government to see that no loss shall be incurred by these parties who have not received their bounties?
7. If so, when will the fishermen thus defrauded receive new cheques?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Eighteen bounty cheques issued to fishermen in Digby County in 1894, bearing the initials of the late fishery officer as witness to the mark of the payee, and also bearing that officer's usual signature, have come to the notice of the Government, but as the department has not full evidence that the amount of these cheques was appropriated by the officer, the case requires and is receiving further investigation, pending the result of which definite replies to question from 2 to 7 inclusive would be premature. There is, however, sufficient evidence to justify legal proceedings against the officer in question and his sureties, and they have been ordered through the Department of Justice.

REFUND OF LICENSE MONEYS—NEW-FOUNDLAND.

Mr. FLINT asked :

Has the Government of Newfoundland settled the claim of the Dominion for refund of license moneys collected from Canadian fishermen in 1890-91 or 1891-92 ? If so, how much money has been paid over to the Dominion Government in pursuance of such settlement ? When does the Government expect to pay the same over to the claimants in Canada ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries undertook to recover back from the Newfoundland Government fees collected in 1890 from the Canadian fishing vessels under the Bait Act. Legal proceedings were instituted through the Department of Justice, by a local law firm. The net amount received by the Dominion Government up to date is $3,970.04, and is made up as follows :—

License fees paid by 32 vessels....	$ 4,327 50
Interest allowed by court on above.	501 09
	$4,828 59
Deducted by Government solicitors for legal expenses	$1,246 62
Less amount already advanced	398 00
	848 62
	$3,979 97
Less exchange at ¼ p.c.....	9 93
	$3,970 04

The Government has under consideration the question of assuming the payment of the law costs, and if it is decided to do so, it will be necessary to ask Parliament to provide the requisite amount, which will be slightly in excess of the sum of $848.62, stated above, as there are still a few unrecovered license fees in respect of which action is proceeding and further expenses will accrue. The net amount has been placed to the credit of the Receiver General in special account, and as the payment of the legal expenses is now under the consideration of the Government, it is not deemed advisable to make any distribution until that question is decided, which will be at an early date.

BUTTER AND CHEESE MANUFACTURE.

Mr. GRIEVE asked :

How many pounds of butter and cheese were manufactured in each province of the Dominion of Canada during the years 1881 and 1891, respectively ?

PICTON POST OFFICE.

Mr. DAWSON asked :

1. Have the Government purchased land in the town of Picton, in the county of Prince Edward, upon which to erect a public building to be used as a post office and custom-house ?
2. From whom and when was the said land purchased, and at what price ?
3. What amount has been paid ?
4. Were there any buildings on said land at the time of purchase, and are they still there ?
5. Are the buildings occupied, and if so, by whom ?
6. Do the occupants pay rent, and if so, what amount ?
7. Who collects said rent ?
8. Do the Government intend to erect the said public building upon the said land ?
9. Has the contract been let yet, and if so, to whom and what is the amount ?
10. If let, has work been commenced by the contractor ? If not, when is he to begin ?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. Yes. 2. From Mr. J. N. Carter, in February, 1894, for $3,500. 3. $3,500. 4. Yes. 5. The buildings are occupied by the following parties : Messrs. Alcorn & Young, lawyers ; Mr. Richard Hubbs, lawyer ; Mr. Hodgins, storehouse for agricultural implements ; Messrs. Sixsmith & Baker and J. N. Carter. 6. Yes, $500 per year. 7. The Collector of Revenue for the department. 8. Matter not yet settled. 9. No. 10. No.

MINISTERIAL RESIGNATIONS.

Mr. GRIEVE asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to lay on the Table of the House copies of all papers, telegrams and correspondence that have passed between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the seven Ministers of his Cabinet, Hon. John Graham Hag-gart, Hon. George Eulas Foster, Hon. Arthur Rupert Dickey, Hon. Walter Humphries Montague, Hon. John Fisher Wood, Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper and Hon. William Bullock Ives, regarding the resignation of these gentlemen from his Cabinet?

Mr. FOSTER. In answer, I will say to my hon. friend that the Government will bring down such correspondence as is usual on such occasions.

THE HON. CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta) asked :

Whether the Controller of Inland Revenue is a member of the Cabinet? If so, what is his position in the Cabinet?

Mr. FOSTER. In answer to that, I beg to say that the Controller of Inland Revenue is a member of the Cabinet and his position is exactly the same as that of any other Privy Councillor being a member of the Cabinet.

THE HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Mr. CASEY moved for :

Copies of all correspondence by letter or telegram between the Government and Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., concerning his present visit to Canada.

He said : In regard to the late High Commissioner's visit to Canada, we have been left considerably in the dark. It was stated in the press in general terms, that he had come here in connection with the fast Atlantic scheme, and the scheme for a Pacific cable, or what I might call the intercolonial cable system. I asked the Government on Friday what leave of absence was granted to Sir Charles Tupper from his duties in London, and for what purpose, when he last came to Canada. I received only the following answer from the hon. Finance Minister :

Summoned to Canada by Premier's cablegram, 2nd December, 1895.

Well, Sir, that is far from being an answer to the question I asked, but it is such an answer as the Finance Minister generally gives to an inconvenient question. He either refuses to answer at all, or he gives an answer which is utterly meaningless. In this case we are entitled to a fuller and more courteous answer than was given to that question. The House requires, and the country requires to know by whom its public servant was summoned from his office in London, where he was supposed to be attending to the country's business; why he was brought to Canada; whether he received leave of absence for any specified period; if so, what that period was; and a lot of other particulars which the hon. gentleman carefully refrained from giving.

In answer to another question which I asked on that day, as to when Sir Charles Tupper had resigned the High Commissioner-ship, I was informed that he had resigned it on the 15th January, 1896. So that up to that time Sir Charles Tupper was a public servant, receiving the pay and allowances due to that office; and we have a right to know why he was called from London, and what he was called to do here. We need not ask the hon. member what he did after he came here, because that has been patent to all the world. He fell in with the mutineers in their attempt to wreck the Government, which has been his employer, in which they have been successful to an extent which we shall only be able to appreciate later on, when the full effects of that plot are matured. In the meantime, I move for this correspondence, which of course includes anything as to the objects of the visit, either suggested by the Government to Sir Charles Tupper, or by him to them.

Motion agreed to.

THE NORTH-WEST EXHIBITION.

Mr. MARTIN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence in connection with the Territorial Exhibition held last summer at Regina, and all papers showing the connection of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories with the same, and detailed accounts of receipts and expenditures of said exhibition; also the amount still owing on account of same.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in making this motion I desire to call attention to the exhibition which was held at Regina last summer, which was discussed slightly in the House the other day. The House will remember that a grant of $25,000 was voted by Parliament as a bonus towards this exhibition. In addition, $10,000 was granted by the city of Regina, and $5,000 by the North-west Assembly, supplemented later on by another grant of $5,000; making total grants amounting to $45,000 of public money. The exhibition seems to have been conducted without any responsibility on the part of any particular body or particular person, so far as any one can learn, and no statement of receipts and expenditure has been laid before the public. So that the amount received for entrance fees, both for exhibits and for visiting the fair, is not known. In some quarters it is estimated as high as fifteen thousand or twenty thousand dollars, because there were a great many entries and a very considerable attendance. However, I have no knowledge myself whatever as to what the receipts amounted to. They did, however, amount to very considerable sums, so that in addition to the grants of $45,000 there was this amount received, whatever it may be. It appears now that the whole amount of that money which was received, amounting to over fifty thousand dollars, has been spent, and there are heavy debts outstanding due by

I know not whom. It is stated out there that they are due by the Government, because the exhibition was looked upon as a Government exhibition, conducted, so far as it appears to have had any head at all, by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, who seems to have run the whole thing himself. He appears to have been the head and the committee and everything else connected with it. He appears to have had full charge of the management, and as he is an officer of the Dominion, the exhibition was looked upon by the creditors as an institution carried on by Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh for and on behalf of the Dominion Government. I understood the other day that the Government were investigating his accounts sent in for debts due by this institution. I do not know myself exactly what investigations the Government are making of these accounts except to check the amounts. The first step they should take, with the view of knowing what the real indebtedness is, would be to advertise in the Territories at Regina for all claims. The Government, it appears, have not so far made up their minds whether to pay these debts or not; but certainly before coming to a conclusion, it would be well to know exactly what amount they are obligating themselves for. I would suggest that they should ascertain what the unpaid claims are before coming to any conclusion. And I may say myself that I think the claims ought to be paid by the Government, although it is certainly a great outrage that we should be called upon to pay these claims, after having already paid a grant of $25,000. But the Government, by the position in which they have placed themselves, it seems to me, have given authority to their officer, the Lieutenant-Governor, to incur these expenses. He certainly has incurred them, and there is no other source than the Government from which they can be paid. The city of Regina has certainly given more than its share in giving the sum of $10,000, and the legislative assembly has no money to give for purposes of this kind. It was more for the purpose of drawing the attention of the House to the manner in which this exhibition was conducted that I make my motion, and I shall not attempt to make any comments myself upon the exhibition because I was not present at it. I shall confine myself to reading the opinions of newspapers published in the Territories, most of which are very strong supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite. The first one I shall read from is not a Government paper but an Opposition organ published by Mr. J. K. McGinnis, who is the Patron candidate against my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). This is what he has to say regarding this matter. The article is dated Regina, 15th August, 1895, and headed "After the Fair:"

It was with deep reluctance that the "Standard," months ago, objected to the policy of making the Territorial Fair a one-man show. As we then stated, we would much prefer that every act of the Lieutenant-Governor was such that we could heartily endorse. We were quite satisfied that His Honour should be the official head of the fair, but we felt that to shoulder all responsibility, even to the locating of booths and fixing the price on meals, was unfair to himself, and sure to lead to confusion and dissatisfaction. Experience has amply proven that we were right. No amount of congratulation, presentation or flabellation can obliterate the facts that confusion and consequent dissatisfaction reigned from beginning to end. There was no organization, no system, no discipline. All this could and should have been avoided. The complainings of some of our contemporaries who lent their columns to fulsome flatteries before the fair, are a source of amusement.

After referring to the comments of other papers, the writer goes on to say:

The "Standard" has no desire to prolong the agony. We have many glaring tales of mismanagement at hand, but will not go into them unless further discussion of the matter is forced upon us. The course we took in advocating thorough organization and subdivision of responsibility has been fully justified by the results.

Now, strange to say, that is by far the most moderate article which I have come across amongst the territorial newspapers in commenting upon this exhibition, and that is the only paper which I shall read, which is not a strong supporter of the Government. The next article to which I shall refer is from the Alberta "Tribune," which is a strong Government paper, published in the city of Calgary. The following is a portion of an article which appeared in that paper on the 28th Sept. last:—

Let the farmers, whose schools, roads and bridges are being neglected, bear in mind what that extravagant orgie has already cost—$25,000 Federal vote, $10,000 given by the people of Regina, $5,000 voted last year by the assembly, in all $40,000; much more than the legitimate expenses of a fair twice as important. And now another $5,000 is wanted from the farmers to pay for the revellings of the governor and his cronies. Surely, the assembly will never consent to this wanton extravagance. Let the members rather insist on a detailed and audited account of the money already spent. The executive cannot constitutionally evade responsibility for the expenditure of the $25,000 granted by the Federal Government to the assembly for this purpose. But even should it be contended it can, surely no one will urge that it can evade responsibility for the expenditure of the $5,000 voted last year directly by the assembly in this connection.

The next article is one which appeared in a paper which was founded in the city of Regina by the hon. member for West Assiniboia. I understand that the hon. gentleman has parted with this newspaper, which we have often heard of in this House, the Regina "Leader." I understand that he has sold that paper, but I notice that it still continues to support that gentleman very urgently and also the Government very strongly. This is what the Regina "Leader" said with regard to this exhibition on the 7th of November last. It is headed: "He should be Recalled:"

The conduct of business by the present chief magistrate of the Territories is bringing scandal and contempt upon the honourable office which he holds. When the incumbent is spoken of with jeers, respect for the office itself cannot long be maintained. The name of the one who in the North-west at this moment occupies the place of honour, but two seats below the Throne of Great Britain, is a bye-word and reproach. The situation is bringing discredit upon the Dominion Government, whose appointee he is.

The Hon. C. H. Mackintosh is not playing the part of a man. This refers to the Territorial Exhibition matter. He was manager extraordinary of the exhibition. The affair is in debt. In that there is nothing disgraceful or contemptible. But those to whom money is due want to get it. They cannot get it. They cannot even see or hear from the one by whom the debt was contracted. They telephone him—he is not at his office. They write him—he does not reply. They go to his house—he is shooting. The part a man would play in a case like this would be to meet the creditors, explain to them the circumstances of the deficiency, tell them how it was to be met, or how it was hoped it would be met. The manly thing is to meet a difficulty face to face and thresh it or take a threshing.

For an humble individual to skulk around a little difficulty would be contemptible; for a ruler—a sovereign—it is unpardonable. In their anxiety to get a glimpse of the Lieutenant-Governor in the past few weeks, people have been led to study his record and his proceedings. Of the former the Government know more than we can know; of the latter the people know more than the Government can know. When the people read the frequent "interviewer's" accounts of His Honour's overwork, his prodigious devotion to duty, and "only a constitution of adamant could stand the pressure of his unceasing toil," those of them who can afford it, laugh; the others curse. They have watched, and know that he has not been in his office half a dozen times in half as many months. "Out shooting." When he tells the interviewer, "Candidly, had I the power, my first design would be to keep out the demagogue"—the politician—"and bring in the worker," the people wink the other eye.

When we read, as appears in a report of a meeting of the town council, in another column, a remark by a councillor, that "His Honour cannot return from the East until Sunday," it forcibly reminds us of that historical member for Galway, whose only safe conveyance from London to his home after dissolution of Parliament was a coffin.

For the honour of an honourable and picturesque institution, and for the preservation of its own prestige, the Government cannot too quickly recall the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories.

I shall read another article from a newspaper, which is also a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. In the Alberta "Tribune," of the 16th November, a week later than the date of the article in the Regina "Leader," I find the following:—

TIME'S REVENGES.

Time brings its revenges. The day was when the Alberta "Tribune" was the only paper in the Territories that dare criticise Charles Herbert Mackintosh. Some remained silent; others denounced the "Tribune" for its crime of lese majeste. The "Tribune" was content to wait for a justification of its words. Of all the grovelling sheets which six months ago inserted the Lieutenant-Governor's puffings of himself, and endeavoured in their own weak way to emulate those inimitable specimens of sickening adulation, there is now "none so poor to do him reverence." The columns of almost every paper in the Territories have recently been filled with letters complaining of the unpaid prizes and accounts in connection with the Territorial Fair, whose gross mismanagement by the Governor the "Tribune" was assailed for denouncing. The fair has proved an even greater financial failure than the "Tribune" predicted; and the lick-spittle journals which failed to support the "Tribune's" criticism when such action would have been serviceable, are now joining in a chorus of abuse against the man they were formerly lauding with the extravagance of Herodian flatterers. The man's charlatanry, which disgusted the "Tribune," and which should have disgusted every decent journal, as soon as it began to be practiced, they now find abominably nauseating. His shallowness and incapacity, which any one of discernment might long since have discovered, they now find patently observable. A cry goes up for his deposition from the governorship. Never since confederation has a representative of royalty in Canada been the subject of so much execration. A sample article is republished elsewhere from the Regina "Leader." Its strictures are warranted, its contumelies are deserved, its demand is pertinent. The pity is, they did not appear sooner. Yes, if the "Tribune's" justification at the hands of its contemporaries has been deferred, it has certainly been ample, now it has come.

Then, the hon. gentleman in question, finding all these criticisms directed against him, determined to offset them, if possible, and he got up a banquet to himself at the town of Moosomin, some weeks ago. This is the manner in which the organ of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) referred to that banquet. I quote from the Regina "Leader" of the 26th December, 1895:

On the eve of his departure from the Northwest for Ottawa, to spend an indefinite term of absence, Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh was banquetted at Moosomin. The enthusiasm over the event was not so spontaneous as His Honour must have wished. The tables were set for fifty, but only thirty-five, or thereabouts, sat down. We do not regret that we have not space to produce the speech made by His Honour on the occasion, for a more unseemly hotch-potch of recrimination, self-adulation and stale jokes it would be impossible for one occupying His Honour's high position to deliver. If only our Lieutenant-Governor would repress himself and attend diligently to the amount of business which pertains to his office, the people of the Northwest, even after his scandalous conduct in connection with the closing of the exhibition affairs, might learn to tolerate them; but, if he will persist in making himself obnoxious, the "Leader" may find it necessary to repeat in more urgent manner a request we made to the Government a few weeks ago.

The Regina "Leader," as I say, is the organ of my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia—at any rate, it is a very strong supporter of his, and formerly was conducted by him. Now, the Alberta "Tribune," referring to these remarks I have just quoted, speaks as follows in its issue of 28th December last:—

The Regina "Leader's" comments on the Lieutenant-Governor's Moosomin speech are entirely deserved. His Honour has no conception of dignity, and very little of decency. The speech was a farrago of vulgar stories, coarse abuse of his critics and gross self-laudation. It was the rant of a pot-house politician in his cups, rather than the utterance of a representative of Her Majesty.

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, I ought to apologize, on the score of loyalty, for the extreme language which, in the discharge of my duty, I have been compelled to read from these Conservative organs published in the Territories. On my own behalf, I would like to say, that, from what I have heard from others, I am led to believe that these comments, although expressed in such strong language, are perfectly justified so far as the management of the exhibition is concerned. The very first thing that was done by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor in relation to this exhibition was to appoint as manager, a man named J. K. Strachan, who has just been practically dismissed by the Winnipeg Exhibition Association, for two reasons—first, for drunkenness, and, second, for being behind in his accounts. He had retired from his position to avoid dismissal, and Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh picked him up and took him to Regina and put him in charge of this exhibition which was to spend $50,000. That was the first mistake that was made, and I do not see even how it can be excused as a mistake, because Mr. Strachan's conduct as manager of Winnipeg's exhibition was just then the subject of a good deal of newspaper criticism. Then I have heard of a great many complaints, indeed, from exhibitors and persons who had business in connection with the fair, stories of the grossest mismanagement. In fact, I have been told by different persons who sent exhibits out to Regina fair, the railway company carrying exhibits there and back, free, that these exhibits came back to them just exactly as they went, never having been opened at all. I have heard a great many complaints of that kind. I may say that I regret very much that the representative of Her Majesty in the Territories has behaved as this gentleman has done, because I believe that the criticism directed against him by these newspapers is entirely deserved. I notice that that gentleman spends very little time at home, although he is paid the sum of $7,000 a year, and travelling expenses, for attending to such duties as the office has attached to it in the Territories. We find that every two or three weeks, I might almost say, he is down in Winnipeg, pretending to be on public business. Now, I think it would be very much better, indeed, for Mr. Mackintosh, if he finds the time a little dreary out in the city of the plains, and desires to come down to Winnipeg for purposes of his own, that he should do so and say nothing about public business. He talks about making arrangements for the blind, and the deaf and dumb, in the Territories, making excuses of this kind, and he brings a retinue with him, the expense of which all comes out of the country. Then, again, we find that every session he is here at Ottawa during the whole session. I find from what has occurred in another place, that this session his leave of absence lasted only from 20th December to 20th January; but, from what has at present occurred, he certainly intended to remain in Ottawa all winter. His family left Regina and took a house in New Edinburgh, a suburb of this city. I think the House will agree with me that conduct of that kind is not such as should be expected from a man who is paid such a large salary as Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh is paid for doing certain duties. If it is necessary to have a Lieutenant-Governor of the Northwest, it surely must be necessary that he should remain all his time, practically, in Regina, the capital of the Territories. But, as I have said, we find that he is continually absent from his post, not in travelling through the country as other Governors do, but in going down to Winnipeg, and coming here to Ottawa, really for the purpose of relaxation on his own part. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we should have a very full and complete statement of all financial affairs of this exhibition, because it does appear that, unfair as it may be to the people of Canada generally, the Government will have, under the circumstances, to assume the very considerable debt which Mr. Mackintosh has incurred, in addition to these large sums which were voted by the different bodies to which I have alluded.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, and has put a motion into your hands, seems to be under somewhat of a misapprehension. The tenor of the remarks which he made, as well as the wording of the motion, go to show that the hon. gentleman seems to be under the impression that the exhibition was held under the auspices of the Dominion Government. The remarks which he made to the House would indicate that that is the impression on his mind, and the wording of the motion in which he asks for a detailed account of the expenses of that exhibition, go to bear out the fact I have stated. I need scarcely remind the House that the hon. gentleman is quite mistaken, if that impression does rest upon his mind. It is true that the sum of $25,000 was recommended by the Government, and voted in the Estimates for purposes in connection with the exhibition, but though I have not directly before me the language of the vote, I had the Order in Council before me only this morning, I am convinced that the wording of that order is simply "to aid in the holding of an exhibition in the North-west Territories," just the same as the vote is given towards aiding agricultural societies of the North-west Territories in connection with the annual exhibitions that they hold in various portions of those Territories. So far as the investigation of the accounts is concerned, it is true that the Government have certain accounts before them. They have the accounts and vouchers for the money which this Parliament voted, namely, the $25,000; they have the accounts and vouchers as sent by the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories to the Department of Agriculture for that sum. We have no hesitation in placing before the House these accounts and vouchers, together with the other papers, so far as we have them, which show the connection of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories with this exhibition. I make this explanation to the hon. gentleman because the papers may fall quite short of what he moves for in his motion, by reason of the fact that we have not got them.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I have listened with a considerable degree of interest to the observations that have fallen from the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) with reference to the North-west exhibition. It is a well-known fact that an exhibition of that character in a new country cannot be inaugurated at once. There have been great difficulties in the way. It is also well known that the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories did everything in his power to place before the Government and people of this country the desirability of holding an exhibition there; and if he accomplished it, it was only by the utmost exertion on his part, aided by the co-operation of the Government. We know perfectly well that in a new country like that, there are great difficulties to contend with in organizing an exhibition of that kind, and it cannot be done without considerable expense. It is also well known that in a large undertaking of that character you cannot ascertain before hand the exact sum necessary. If a few dollars extra have been expended, they were probably well expended in developing the resources of that country. Let me say that at no time in the history of the North-west Territories has any project been pushed forward that tended more towards the development of that country, and gave the public in eastern Canada and in Great Britain a better idea of its vast resources. This exhibition has been a credit to the North-west, and if some difficulties have sprung up, necessitating an extra expenditure, on the right hand or on the left, in carrying out that exhibition, are we going to find great fault with the gentleman who had the manliness of character and the independence of position to undertake the responsibility of inaugurating and carrying to completion a project such as this—not for his own purposes, not for his own personal aggrandizement, but merely for the purpose of showing to the world what remarkable progress and advancement that country has made along every line. Under these circumstances it is wrong for an individual to come to this House and attempt to lash the Government over the shoulders of the Lieutenant-Governor, because hon. gentlemen have been trying to accomplish that work. I hope and trust the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), being a gentleman who no doubt has an interest in the country and its development, will change his view, and when associated with a high official in promoting the development of the North-west, he will exercise his full powers to assist him in carrying forward the general interests of that great country. I was surprised to find that the hon. gentleman in his criticisms to-day was prepared to throw discredit on a section of country like the North-west and on the great people who live there, and who are receiving that encouragement to which they are entitled in developing the resources of that country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The statement of the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) and the statement of the Minister of Agriculture do not harmonize. The member for Ottawa has informed the House to-day that this was a Government project, that it was carried through with remarkable success, that it attained gigantic proportions, that it developed the resources of the North-west, and that the Government and Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories are entitled to the greatest credit for such enterprise. The statement of the Minister of Agriculture was a very different statement. The statement of the Minister was, that the Government had no responsibility in the matter, that they had not undertaken to forward the enterprise at all and had nothing to do with it beyond contributing $25,000 voted by this House for the purpose of aiding the exhibition. If the parties who conducted the exhibition undertook to spend a very large sum, they had no more right to come here than they had to go to any other contributor to the exhibition funds and ask to have the difference made good. The gentlemen who are managing the enterprise were bound to consider that point while the exhibition was in progress; they knew the sum of money at their disposal and they should have cut their garments according to the exhibit of cloth. That is not what was done, and the complaint of my hon. friend against the Lieutenant-Governor is as to the manner in which he undertook to manage the exhibition and the responsibilities which he assumed in connection with it. There is only one observation I wish to make in regard to the statement of the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister stated that the accounts sent in were being audited.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not say that, and the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then, what has been done?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought I made my statement perfectly clear. I said that all the accounts sent to the Government, or at least all the accounts in my department, were accounts and vouchers for the $25,000 which this House voted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the accounts and vouchers are here and the Government are seeing whether they correspond, whether the vouchers are satisfactory and account for the money, then this amounts to an auditing of the accounts. What I propose to ask the attention of the Minister and the House to is this: If you have a contribution made by the Government, and that sum of money was paid over by the Lieutenant-Governor to the board which was to manage the exhibition, that would be all that would be required in his behalf so far; but the House will see that if you have this Government's contribution with certain other contributions, it is impossible to distinguish whether the vouchers are given for the money contributed by the Government or for money contributed by somebody else. It seems to me, therefore, that in order to have a proper audit, and account fairly for the expenditure of $25,000, it is requisite to have an audit of the entire accounts. I cannot see how the one sum can be separated from the other sums. I think the Minister will see this point, and that the Auditor or any other competent accountant will tell him that this is the case; and it seems to me that if the Government are to make a satisfactory statement to the House with respect to this money they will require to know what has been done with all the moneys that were received by the managers of the exhibition. That is a necessary incident in order to ascertain all the facts with respect to this special matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Further discussion on this subject will be useless, I think, until all the papers are before us. The Government are perfectly willing to bring all the papers down, and the House when seized of the subject will be able to discuss it more intelligently.

Mr. MARTIN. But the attitude of the Government, I may point out, is rather different from the attitude assumed at the informal discussion inaugurated by the hon. member for Assiniboia. He and I then desired to know whether the Government intend to pay these debts. I understood to-day from the Minister of Agriculture that the accounts which the Government were investigating—and for this reason they desired to delay answering the question put by the hon. gentleman—were not accounts for debts amounting in the aggregate to $10,000, $20,000 or $30,000 (for the amount will be found, no doubt, much more than $8,000), but they were accounts and vouchers for the amount of $25,000 contributed by the Dominion Government. The people of Regina do not care a snap of the receipts affecting payment of that sum of $25,000; it was already eaten up, but they are interested in accounts amounting to $8,000 or $10,000 which have not yet been paid. The hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) has talked about a few dollars spent over and above the amount granted for that exhibition. The hon. gentleman apparently does not see the point, that a large amount has been expended but has not yet been paid, and that is what the people are inquiring about. In addition to the sum of $25,000 voted by this Parliament, a large sum was received from entries and from visitors to the exhibition, and Mr. Mackintosh has spent all that money, in addition to which he has incurred debts for an unknown amount. The Government disclaim all responsibility for the exhibition when it comes down to the question of paying this additional amount, and the Government claim they are not responsible. In view of the circumstances under which the Government entered upon that exhibition, it seems to me they are responsible, especially when they contributed $25,000 for the purpose of carrying out an exhibition at Regina, and instead of giving that sum to an agricultural society or to the local assembly as a bonus or grant, the Government allowed their officer, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories, to take charge of the exhibition, to become responsible for it, to take full control of it, and to manage it in all its details; thus the Government are responsible for it, and are in the position that the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) desired to place them in, namely, of having aided and abetted and backed up this exhibition. Of course, Mr. Speaker, if the Government is in that position it will not do for the credit of Canada that there should be $5 or $10 here and $100 there, of debts floating around through the Territories, and incurred—not by Mr. Mackintosh, for no one looks to him in the matter—but by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories on behalf of the Dominion Government. That is the position that the people up there take, and I must say there will be a great deal of disappointment indeed, because the other day when this discussion came up irregularly at the instance of my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) the hon. Minister of Finance suggested that the time to discuss this matter in all its bearings was when my motion came up. My motion is now before the House, and the only thing the Government are prepared to say in regard to it is that they gave $25,000 in aid of the exhibition, assumed no liability in connection with it, and that the accounts which they are investigating are the vouchers in connection with that sum of $25,000. That will not be satisfactory to the people up there. I hope the Government will reconsider their position, and will look upon it as an unfortunate matter; for it is a most unfortunate matter that Mr. Mackintosh has been so foolish, has been so reckless, and has been so extravagant as he has been. It does seem to me that it will be a blot upon the honour and the dignity of the Government itself if it allows these small debts, distributed as they are all over the Territories and Manitoba, to go unpaid. I for one, as a member of Parliament—not interested directly, but coming from the adjoining province—will be very glad to support the Government in placing an item in the Estimates to wipe off these debts, and so let us hear the last of this very disgraceful and discreditable business.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make any remarks on the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), except to clear away certain impressions which, no doubt, his remarks have left on the minds of hon. gentlemen. In the first place, my recollection is that the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories, having been for some time in his gubernatorial office, considered that it would be a good thing for the Territories and for the people there to bring the people together at Regina at a territorial exhibition. This exhibition would advertise the country itself, and would bring the people together. Up to the date of the holding of this exhibition at Regina the people had been living there for eight or ten years, removed at long distances from each other, and they had not the opportunity of associating together. In the meantime, many enterprising men had brought in splendid bands of cattle, and some portions of the Territories produced better wheat and crops than others. The idea of the Lieutenant-Governor was to show the products of different localities, and was, in my opinion, a very good one. In carrying out this idea, he associated with himself the officers of all the agricultural societies which exist in the Territories. He met them in their associations, and they appointed committees, and, as I understand, these committees made up the Central Fair Association. The fair was held at Regina in due course, and was inaugurated by His Excellency the Governor General. It was a great success in every particular. The entries were far and away much larger than at the Winnipeg fair, and notwithstanding two or three days of wet weather, the territorial fair was a success in every particular. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) would give the House to understand that there are debts owing by this exhibition association all over the Territories and all over Manitoba. As I understand it, every prize taken at the exhibition has been paid.

Mr. MARTIN. Those newspapers do not say so.

Mr. DALY. As I am advised, the only debts outstanding are certain debts incurred by the exhibition association to dealers in Winnipeg and other places. It was thought the accommodation at Regina would not be sufficient to meet the crowds of people who would come there, and numbers of tents were procured from Winnipeg and elsewhere. In addition to that, windmills and other facilities were obtained for procuring water, and large supplies of lumber were furnished for the purpose of giving shelter to the cattle at the show. As I understand it, it is sums in connection with these matters that remain unpaid. So far as the Government is concerned, its position is simply this: after the announcement had been made that the Lieutenant-Governor, in conjunction with the several agricultural societies throughout the Territories, would organize this exhibition, the Lieutenant-Governor came here to ask if this Government would contribute a sum of money towards the exhibition. The Dominion Government contributed $25,000, and, as I understand from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague), vouchers are at hand for every dollar of that $25,000. The only question now is, as to whether this Government is responsible for any of the outstanding debts the association owes. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) has one word to say for the people of the North-west and fourteen or fifteen words against the Lieutenant-Governor, and that the object, and the sole object, of the hon. gentleman in bringing the matter up here, is to make an attack on the Hon. C. H. Mackintosh, Lieutenant-Governor. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) has quoted several newspaper articles, but it is known that the proprietors of those newspapers had a personal enmity with the Lieutenant-Governor.

Mr. MARTIN. Why?

Mr. DALY. I do not know, but I do not think it has anything to do with this exhibition. Possibly it may have. They may be men of disappointed ambition. They may be men who have not had as much to do with this exhibition as they would like. But at all events, of one thing I am perfectly satisfied, and that is, that so far as the Lieutenant-Governor is concerned, no matter whether the exhibition has been extravagantly conducted or not, it was a first-class show, a splendid advertisement for the North-west Territories, and it will last for years as a monument to the enterprise of the Lieutenant-Governor and those who took part in it. If there are any outstanding accounts, I have no doubt that these accounts will, or should be, paid. As to the position this Government occupies, it was a contributor, the same as the North-west Assembly or any of those associations. According to the statement of the Minister of Agriculture, the Government are prepared to show that every dollar that was voted by them has been accounted for by the managers of the fair.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Martin) who brought this matter before the House referred frequently to the Regina "Leader," and looked across the floor at me. He read articles from the "Leader" and laughed, if it was a laugh, as though to suggest, though he did not say so, that I wrote the articles. He referred to the fact that at one time I controlled, and in the main owned the Regina "Leader." Well, Sir, I regret to say that all that about my owning the paper has to be put in the historic tense. I regret greatly to say that before these articles appeared, I had alienated every farthing of interest I had in the "Leader," and nobody can possibly regret more than I do to say what I say here: that I have not the least interest in that paper at present. Now, Sir, when I was editor and, in the main, proprietor of that paper, articles frequently appeared in it that I had nothing whatever to do with. A man cannot be away on the continent, or down here at Ottawa attending to his political duties and writing articles for a paper in Regina, and taking care that nothing gets into that paper that he would disapprove of. But so long as I was proprietor, so long as I was manager and technically responsible, I never repudiated any of these suggestions. I saw that one of the Ottawa papers quoted the article and said: "From Davin's paper"; and other papers had it, "Davin on Mackintosh," and so on. I tell my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) that I never suggested and I never inspired such an article, and I was not aware that such an article was to appear in the "Leader." That is enough. I may tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) further, if he wishes: that I was away at that time visiting my constituents, and that I came home one morning and saw the article. Now, with reference to what has fallen from the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly). Living here as he does in his place at Ottawa, and although he keeps, I think, more in touch with the Territories than any Minister of the Interior that we have ever had, still he cannot be supposed to be as well acquainted with the opinion of the Territories as one of the members from there. The object of sending members here is that they will be able to let the Government and Parliament know what each locality, represented by the individual member, feels. My hon.

friend, in accounting for those articles. I think, made a mistake. He said they were inspired by personal animus towards Mr. Mackintosh.

Mr. DALY. I said disappointed ambition.

Mr. DAVIN. What kind of disappointed ambition, would my hon. friend explain?

Mr. DALY. In connection with the exhibition, of course.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to explain, if my hon. friend will allow me, that though I read from the "Leader" and the "Standard" and the Alberta "Tribune," I might have read similar articles from every Conservative paper in the Territories.

Mr. DAVIN. I may say that when I first saw that article headed, "He ought to be Recalled," my first feeling was one of great annoyance, and I will tell you why. I have been for years on terms of close intimacy with Mr. Mackintosh, and if I had full power over a paper, I would do what every man who controls a paper sometimes does: I would put a strain on myself, and sometimes allow my personal feeling to override my public duty as an editor. Every man does that sometimes: I do not say he ought to do it; but I must say this in justice to Mr. Walter Scott, who is my successor: It has been said that he could not write that article—that it was too clever an article for him to write. The man who has succeeded me as owner of that paper, is a very young man; he was trained in great part in my office; and some persons said to me, as one man did: "There were sentences in that article which I do not think a man in Canada could write but yourself." Well, it would be surprising if a man who had been trained in my office and had read every one of my articles, and I suppose every speech I made for ten years—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Happy man—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has he survived them?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, and it would be good for the compression of your style if you had done the same. Well, Sir, my friend, Mr. Scott, who owns the paper now, told me himself that he was the author of the article. He is not only capable of writing such an article, but he is the makings of one of the first journalists on the continent of America. He is a man incapable of writing such an article from mere personal pique. But, Sir, I was not surprised when I saw the article, and I will tell you why. Deputations came to me, as I have no doubt they did to him, as the editor of the paper, composed of men having claims against the exhibition, complaining that they could not get satisfaction. And now, let me say of my friend Mr. Mackintosh, that the strongest charge that can be made against him is what seems to me to be foolish carelessness. All he had to do, in my opinion, the moment he found that he had not money enough to pay all persons to whom he was indebted, was to call a meeting of them, and say: "The money is run out, but I will do my best for you; I will speak to the members of Parliament, and also write to the Government, and do my best to get money put into the Estimates, so that you shall be paid." What angered them, was this, that, as that article correctly states, they could not get speech with him, and they felt as if they were going to be done out of the money. This was their feeling when they came formally to me. I said to them, "What on earth have I to do with this? It is none of my funeral. I have never been consulted on the matter at all. What have I to do with it?" They said, "You are our Dominion member, and a supporter of the Government of the day"—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And you will make it your funeral.

Mr. DAVIN. Ah, Mr. Speaker, the grass will be growing and flourishing over the political grave of the hon. member for Bothwell when I shall be sitting in this House—and I shall be on the Government side, too, as I am now. They said to me, "You are the Dominion member, and a supporter of the Government, and we support you. We would not have given any private individual credit; but, seeing that this man was the Lieutenant-Governor, we gave him credit." And I hope that the matter will be considered by the Government, as the Minister of Finance intimated that it would be considered, from that point of view. But let me ask the attention of the Government for a moment to the view I take of this matter myself. Whatever way you regard the position of my friend, Mr. Mackintosh, the Government have to enter into this matter. If you regard him as the agent of the Government, then the Government is debtor to those creditors in Regina and elsewhere. If he be not the agent of the Government in this matter—and, mind you, the language of the Minister of Agriculture is well borne out by the item, for it says, "$25,000, contribution towards an exhibition in the North-west Territories," he is the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories; and the North-west Territories, and surely Canada, too, are concerned, to some extent, in the honour of this gentleman. You cannot allow a man wearing the Windsor uniform, and representing Her Majesty, to go up there and incur debts in a quasi official matter, and then allow the creditors to go unpaid. Then, let me say, in regard to the audit which the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) says has taken place, that I do not think it is a satisfactory audit, either from a financial or an official point of view. The vouchers may show that every penny of the $25,000 may have been expended, and that there are receipts for every penny of it; but if the audit of the two sums of $5,000 from the Territories, and the audit of the $10,000, are conducted separately, there is no guarantee to the public, who are concerned with the honour of this man, that everything has been fair and square; and, as I must feel confident that everything is fair and square, and that the honourable gentleman who occupies that high position will be found to have done everything fair and square, it is a puzzle to myself why he himself has not seen fit to lay before his Minister all the accounts connected with the exhibition, showing what the exhibition cost, what money he got from the Dominion Government, what he got from the local government, and what he got from Regina. And when they saw those accounts, I do not think this Government would have any difficulty in getting $8,000 or $10,000 from this House to supplement what was given. Now, I can agree entirely with my hon. friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant) and with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) as well. This exhibition was a great success and could not fail to do good; and if we could send broadcast pictures of the live stock exhibit and the grain and of all the great potentialities of the Territories which were at that fair, the result could not fail to be very effective.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand that these exhibits were not from the Territories alone.

Mr. DAVIN. The live stock, the grain, the roots, the minerals were all from the Territories, but the horticultural exhibit, in great part, came from Winnipeg. But in any case there was a large number of exhibits, and the exhibition was a success. But there were irritating features to account for a certain feeling in the Territory that expressed itself, no doubt, in much criticism. There were some things none of us could understand. We could not understand, for instance, why the Lieutenant-Governor should send outside the Territories for the great majority of those he employed. We could not understand why people should be brought from Winnipeg to do work that could very well have been done by people living in the Territories—and you must remember, Sir, it was a North-west exhibition. My hon. friend from Ottawa talks about the difficulties of doing things in that country. That kind of talk again led to some irritation—trying to make out that, in some way or other, the clever people, coming from Ottawa or Toronto or anywhere else, came as great civilizers; that in the midst of all sorts of difficulties, they have only to wave the wand of the magician, and at once all is order and all is "hunky dory." That is the sort of talk, no doubt, which has challenged a great deal of criticism. You may call it what you like, fake talk or buncombe, but talk based on the rock-bottom of fact it was not. My hon. friend from Ottawa is quite wrong. I cannot as a representative of the Territories, where, man to man, we are as good as any men in Canada, acquiesce by my silence in the supposition that Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh or anybody else, from any part of the Dominion, could come to us as a missionary of civilization and of social amenities and of progress and of the Lord knows what else. We had a great deal of that kind of talk, and it was hard to keep silent when met by statements that were more like the egotistical dreams of a madman than anything else, as to what was being done and as to the fearful difficulties that had to be overcome. All that sort of thing was so much worse than froth and led to this criticism. But the bottom of fact remains that the exhibition was a success. To my knowledge, the Lieutenant-Governor worked hard to make it a success and was deeply interested in it. If he and his friends had been content to regard one of the largest cabbages that was ever grown as a cabbage, it would have been well, and it might have been made the theme for a paean by a Pindar of the North-west or Ottawa or anywhere else; but to try to make out that the cabbage was such a thing as was never before seen on the face of the earth, and that, examined under a microscope, it was found to contain potentialities of diamond dust was simply the height of flabbergashed nonsense. The North-west Territories are neither to be humbugged nor abused; and my hon. friend from Ottawa will find that not until the exhibition had got into certain difficulties was the wisdom of the North-west Territories called to help it out. It was the managing power, the practical experience of the North-west Territories that ultimately made that exhibition a success; and if the brains which had been used for some weeks in carrying it on had continued in its direction, instead of being the success it was, the exhibition would have been a great failure. But when it had fallen into the rut and the mud hole, then the common sense of leading men, practical men in the North-west Territories was called in, and they took the ship off the sandbank and guided her to success. I repeat that the most serious charge which can be brought against Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh, so far as I know, is rather that of carelessness and foolishness than anything positively grave. To my knowledge, he was full of enthusiasm about this exhibition. He worked hard at it, and whatever little mistakes were made, it was a success and did great good to the North-west.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not intend to interfere in this discussion at all, but I must say that I am exceedingly sorry that a muddle has been made of this exhibition held in the North-west, owing to the men who had charge, and who, no doubt, were anxicus and earnest to accomplish something to the advantage of the North-west, overstepping the bounds of prudence in the expenditure connected with it. If I understand properly, there was a grant of $25,000 made by this Government to aid that exhibition. No one could possibly have formed the idea that that grant was to be supplemented by any additional sum to meet any extravagance in the carrying out of that exhibition. For my part, I will not consent to grant a dollar more in any shape or form. The country has sufficient to bear without being held responsible for the extravagance of the board which controlled that exhibition. They ought to have acted—whether the Lieutenant-Governor or any body else—within the limits of the money granted and the anticipated receipts and not have put themselves in the position of having to ask us to supplement our grant of $25,000 by still another grant. For my part I shall unquestionably use all parliamentary means to prevent the granting of one dollar in addition to what we have already given.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. McMILLAN moved:

That whereas the United States Government offers to admit free of duty ploughs, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horse rakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, from any country which admits free of duty like articles imported from the United States, it would be greatly in the interests of both the Canadian agriculturists and the Canadian manufacturers that Canada should accept that offer by admitting those articles into Canada free of duty and at the same time so relieving the Canadian manufacturers of their taxation on their raw material as to enable them to take advantage of the markets of the United States.

He said: When the Government last revised the tariff, the duty was reduced from 35 to 20 per cent on a certain number of agricultural implements. I have learned since from the American tariff that the same list of implements, or nearly the same, is included in the United States reciprocity clause and has been so included for a length of time. Allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Government, for a length of time, has been spending large sums of money under the pretense that it was going to be of great benefit to the agriculturists of this country. None of this expenditure, has so far given much benefit or relief, in any shape, to our Canadian farmers. Here is an offer from the government of the United States to allow a number of different kinds of agricultural implements to enter the United States free of duty from any country that will allow similar implements from the United States to enter its ports free of duty. At the present time the Government are giving a rebate of 99 per cent of the duty upon the raw material entering into agricultural implements manufactured in this country and exported to foreign countries. So, in reality there would be very little loss of revenue to the Government through the acceptance of this reciprocity which the United States offers us. In the last Trade and Navigation Returns only $70,000 of duty appears to have been paid upon agricultural implements coming into this country, and in this list are included a large number of agricultural implements to which this offer of the United States would not apply. If the Government of the day are really anxious to benefit the farmers of Canada, if they are anxious to take one step in the direction of encouraging immigrants to go to the North-west and Manitoba, let them accept this offer. It will not deplete the treasury of any considerable sum of money, and if it is true, as the Finance Minister has stated, that Canada can manufacture agricultural implements as cheaply as any country in the world, what can be the reason for refusing to accept this reciprocity clause and allowing the free admission of these goods into Canada. It is the plain duty of the Government at this time to give this slight advantage to the farmer. Time and again I have been asked what the government of Alexander Mackenzie ever did for the farmers of Canada. Let me say that in the tariff schedule under that government there was a clause allowing agricultural implements brought in by agricultural societies for the purpose of encouraging agriculture in Canada to enter free. That was a great benefit to the farmers of that day and it would be a great advantage to the farmers to-day if it were in force. It would be one of the greatest inducements to immigrants to go to the North-west and Manitoba to be assured that they would get their implements as cheaply as the people across the line. I have frequently come in contact with settlers that have gone from Ontario to the American North-west, and that was one of the inducements—that they found they could get their implements, as they could at that time, 35 per cent cheaper in Dakota and some of the other states than they could in any part of Manitoba or the North-west. I would urge the Government to take this step and so do something to prove to the farmers of this country that they are earnest when they say that they are doing much to advance the farmers' interests. However, I am afraid, Sir, that the Government of the day will be influenced in the other direction. It is true we have in Canada a number of agricultural implement manufacturers, who are ready, under the conditions of the motion I am about to make and with free raw material, to manufacture in competition with the manufacturers of agricultural implements of any country in the world. And if it is true, as stated by the Finance Minister, that agricultural implements can be manufactured in Canada as cheaply as anywhere, they are perfectly justified in concluding that, with free raw material, Canada has nothing to fear in competition with the world. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, agricultural implements to the value of $635,000, the product of Canada, were exported from this country last year, while the imports amounted to only $292,000. If we can manufacture as cheaply as any country in the world, we have nothing to fear from the competition of the United States.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the resolution is put, I desire to say a few words. It seems to me there are very strong objections to the passage of this resolution. The mover of it has stated that the changes he proposes would be to the advantage of the manufacturers in Canada. I think it would be a serious disadvantage to our manufacturers of agricultural implements, and no real advantage to our farmers, except, perhaps those in Manitoba and the North-west. Throughout the older provinces it would be no advantage, because agricultural implements to-day are sold cheaper in Canada than in any other country in the world.

Mr. MCGREGOR. How would our manufacturers be hurt, then? Would the American manufacturers send their higher-priced goods into a cheaper market?

Mr. WALLACE. I will inform the hon. gentleman. In the first place, the American manufacturers are protected by patents, which would prevent implements manufactured in Canada from being sold in the United States. Thus it would be a jug-handle business from the start; there would be no real reciprocity. Besides that, in the United States, as we know, there are immense manufacturing establishments with millions of dollars of capital. Do we not know, from our knowledge of human nature and our experience of the past, that, if our market were thrown open to the American manufacturers they would, for one or two seasons, put down their prices to so low a point as to kill our manufacturers, many of whom are struggling for an existence? And after that, having the whole Canadian market to themselves, they would raise the prices higher even than those ruling in the United States, which I contend, are higher than those ruling in Canada to-day.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Surely they are shut out now by 20 per cent.

Mr. WALLACE. Twenty per cent is sufficient to shut them out. That is a substantial protection, although it was stated last year that 20 per cent was no protection, inasmuch as they paid a larger percentage on some of their raw material. Well, Sir,

I went into a calculation last year. I got the figures from the Noxon Manufacturing Company, of Ingersoll, and this is the result: A machine is brought in from the United States, say a binder, and entered for duty at $100, that being the figure given by the manufacturers themselves as their wholesale price in the United States, and is much larger than their retail price. That was the wholesale price given by McCormick Bros., of Chicago, to the Department of Customs, that meant $20 duty. All the raw material has not to be imported, much of it is made here, and purchased here by the manufacturers, because it can be purchased cheaper here than it can be imported. But suppose it were all imported, the duty on the raw material would not be more than $7, leaving a clear protection to the Canadian manufacturer of $13. That protection, as I stated before, does not increase the price. On the contrary, you can buy an excellent binder in Canada for $100 or $105, and no farmer in the United States can buy one for the same money.

Mr. SPROULE. The Canadian farmer can buy them this summer for $90, as many as they choose.

Mr. GRIEVE. Where?

Mr. SPROULE. In the counties of Grey, Peel, and York, manufactured in Orangeville.

Mr. GRIEVE. Would the hon. gentleman name the manufacturer?

Mr. WALLACE. I can inform the hon. gentleman that when the present Controller of Customs and myself were meeting the farmers, we also met a number of manufacturers, and the manufacturers in Orangeville, in Alliston, and in Shelburne told us that they were selling binders for $100 cash.

Mr. SPROULE. Ninety dollars cash, last summer.

Mr. WALLACE. The price may have gone down last summer, that was the price they were asking then, and that was a lower price than a similar article could be bought for in the United States. I say, for these reasons, it would be ruinous to the Canadian manufacturer, and it would be no benefit to the Canadian farmer, to adopt the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan).

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to say a few words in reply to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He says that the wholesale price last year of the McCormick Bros., Chicago, for binders, was $100. I have letters in my possession from the McCormick Bros., of Chicago, in which they state that they have proved to the agent of the Customs Department of Canada, at that time controlled by my hon. friend, that their highest wholesale price for binders was $80; but the hon. gentleman refused to fix the price at $80 for export duty, and he fixed it at $100, so as to give an additional protection, no doubt, to the Canadian manufacturer. They wanted to export binders to the North-west, and the Controller of Customs refused to take the duty at the wholesale price of $80, and he ruled that the value of the binder was $100, and would not take anything less than $20 duty.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the customs law?

Mr. McMULLEN. If my hon. friend will just sit down and wait a moment—

Mr. WALLACE. Permit me to make an explanation; I am sure the hon. gentleman wants to get the truth. The duties are not reckoned on the export price, but the Customs Act holds—the laws of the United States and Canada are similar in this respect—that the price for duty shall be the price for home consumption, not the price for export. The price for home consumption was fixed by McCormick Bros. themselves, and I verified it by sending an agent there to examine their books, and found the price to be as stated, and that was the price fixed for customs duties, as the law requires.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman wished the House to understand a few moments ago that the wholesale price of McCormick Bros. for binders, was $100; that is what he said.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, for home consumption.

Mr. McMULLEN. No, he said the wholesale price was $100. Now, I tell the hon. gentleman that the wholesale price is not $100.

Mr. PRIOR. Yes, it is.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, I have the signature of the firm, and I am prepared to produce their statement over their own signature, that they proved to the agent sent by the Controller of Customs to Chicago to examine into the facts, proved by their own sales, that their wholesale price was $80 in Chicago. But he refused to fix the duty at $80, and fixed it at $100, and in that way made the Canadian user of the American implement pay an increased duty.

Mr. PRIOR. There is no dealer in the United States from whom you can buy them for $80.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman had better not be too positive in his assertion.

Mr. PRIOR. I am positive.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to inform my hon. friend that he is quite mistaken, because I took every opportunity, not only by writing, but I sent a party there for the purpose of entering into a contract for binders, and they offered, and tendered to supply him with a carload of binders at the rate of $80. Now, will the hon. gentleman challenge that statement too?

Mr. PRIOR. Were they for Canada?

Mr. WALLACE. For export?

Mr. McMULLEN. They offered to supply him with a carload of binders for $80.

Mr. PRIOR. They were not coming into Canada.

Mr. McMULLEN. How does the hon. gentleman know that? The party who applied for them did not say a single word about it. There may be certain sections in which they would not sell them at that price, because, I admit, they have a combination in binders in the United States. They did not inquire what direction the binders were going, but they agreed to sell a carload of binders for that money. But my hon. friend will not give the American binder to the Canadian user at the price of $80 for export duty, but he fixes it at $100, and the user pays $20 extra. Now, I cannot understand the argument of my hon. friend when he says that if you open our ports to the importation of American agricultural implements, the Americans will run the price down, and the result would be that they would shut up our Canadian manufacturing. I would like to know whether the Canadian manufacturers could not try a dodge of that kind. Could they not combine and sell their binders at a low price for export and make money in them? What would be the result? If the American manufacturers, or any person else, were to sell their binders in Canada for $60 in order to crush out the Canadian manufacturer, why could not the Canadian importer buy large numbers of those binders and re-export them again to the United States?

Mr. IVES. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what would they be doing with their capital, their shops, their machinery, their plant, and their employees, while they were dealing in foreign-made binders?

Mr. McMULLEN. I will explain to the hon. gentleman. No difficulty would arise on that point with the American binders, because they would come in here free of duty and go back as an American product without any difficulty, and the result would be that the very game they would try to play would rebound upon themselves in that case.

Mr. PRIOR.

Now, I cannot see why that could not be done. More than that, I contend that the statement made by my hon. friend is quite true. I believe agricultural implements can be produced in Canada as cheaply as in the United States even more cheaply, and if such is the fact, we should allow our agriculturists the chance to get machines which are necessities for the cultivation of the soil, at the very lowest possible price; and as the Americans have offered very reasonable and equitable terms it is the duty of Parliament, in the interests of our farmers, to allow them to obtain the articles they require at the lowest price at which they can be procured. We know perfectly well, and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) does not deny it, that the manufacturers of agricultural implements reap very considerable profit, no less than from $13 to $15 on the intrinsic value of a machine. I understand that the Harris-Massey Manufacturing Company turned out 20,000 binders last year; suppose the number was only 20,000, the profit being $13 odd, as I have said, would give about $30,000 profit on an output of 20,000 binders. So the Canadian manufacturers of agricultural implements have considerable advantage over American manufacturers. It will be remembered that the Government some time ago offered to adopt reciprocal terms on certain manufactured articles, and we should be willing to adopt reciprocity in agricultural implements, which represent 20 per cent. So on a binder of the value of $80, $16 would represent the duty, but by placing the value at $100 the duty is increased to $20.

Mr. SPROULE. According to the hon. gentleman's own argument and the statement of prices he has given, binders can be bought as cheaply in Canada as in the United States. Even if we take the price at $80, the hon. gentleman, if he will visit Orangeville, through which he passes every time he visits his home, will find that the small steel binder is sold there by the single machine at $90 each, and could be bought, no doubt, by a carload for $80 cash. It has been sold for two years at this figure, and it is as low as any good American binder can be bought either in the United States or in Canada. But the hon. gentleman, in his desire to give the Americans control of our market, seems to be only actuated by a desire to kill the National Policy. I take it that the main object of this motion and discussion is to attack the National Policy piecemeal, because this is a subject which is interesting to farmers, and upon which some impression can be created by hon. gentlemen opposite for use at the coming elections. The hon. gentleman asks, would the American manufacturers reduce the prices to get control of the Canadian market? Such has been the history of manufacturers all over the world, and it has been found necessary to afford protection to home manufacturers. This was done by England towards the United States for years, it is done to-day in the United States against Canada, and it would be done to-morrow by the Americans if they had the chance to destroy the manufacturers of Canada. There is another strong reason why it is not to the advantage of Canadian farmers to allow free importation of American implements. One of the great troubles experienced by farmers using implements is as regards the matter of supplies when repairs are needed, and their inability sometimes to obtain them rapidly and cheaply. If they use Canadian-made implements, and avail themselves of the telegraph, they are able within a few hours to reach headquarters for supplies and get them sent forward either that day or the day following. Therefore, they are not compelled to remain idle any great length of time owing to necessity for supplies to complete repairs. So long as our farmers use Canadian implements, and they can be purchased, as is the case to-day, as low as any other implements, it is most desirable that our farmers should be supplied at home instead of from abroad. But there is another very important reason which should be stated, and it is that the largest part of the wood that goes into Canadian-made implements is purchased from our farmers. To every small saw-mill the farmers bring their wood, perhaps they may not have large quantities of timber, but they have enough to enable them to bring maple, elm and birch, and other hardwood, to the mills, where they find a ready sale, and the mills again can sell this timber to manufacturers established throughout the country for the manufacture of implements. If you supply the Canadian market with a foreign product, you destroy the market for the sale of this class of lumber, and it must be sold in the United States, in which case the transportation will take off a large portion of the profits, and great injury will thus be done to farmers who take out the logs and have them converted into this class of lumber which goes into the manufacture of implements. At the present time many of our farmers are relying almost as largely on operations in the woods during the winter as on the crops from their farms during the summer. So long as low prices prevail for implements, we should endeavour to keep the manufacturing of them at home. It has been denied that the Americans have an advantage over the Canadian manufacturers on account of patent rights held by them. If, however, our manufacturers took their machines to New York, Ohio or the western states for sale, where the patent rights are held as regards those respective states, our manufacturers would not be allowed to sell the machines, or at least they would be handicapped with regard to their price. Therefore, while the Americans might say that they have taken off the duty, yet in view of this position they could take in regard to the patent right, of what use would be the American market? To-day our manufacturers cannot take advantage of it, and the American manufacturers would at the same time, if the proposed arrangement were carried, would control our market. The Canadian manufacturers want the home market. Our manufacturers of implements use the raw materials which the Canadian farmers are supplying every year, and our manufacturers are able to turn the manufactured products at the lowest possible prices. No evidence has been adduced that our neighbours, even in the past or at the present time, are manufacturing and selling implements to American farmers on lower terms than Canadian manufacturers are selling them to Canadian farmers, and so long as there is no evidence that Canadian farmers are paying more than the implements are really worth, or for which they can be honestly produced, there is no valid reason why American implements should be admitted here. The assertion made in regard to American prices has never yet been proved; every test made has shown that American implements cannot be purchased at lower prices than those for which Canadian implements are sold. At my hotel I am sitting at the same table with a farmer from Ohio, who has been comparing prices. He declares that Canadian farmers are paying for their implements here, in many instances, less than they are sold by manufacturers in the United States, and he thinks our farmers have no reason to complain as to price or quality, as in every respect our implements compare favourably with those manufactured on the other side of the line. So long as that is the case, there is no reason why we should remove the duty, because it gives our manufacturers the Canadian market, and enables them to employ a full force, and at the same time a larger market is provided for the products of the Canadian farmers. One interest is working into the hands of the other, and so long as that continues and the farmers are not paying more for implements than they should pay, there is no possible reason why we should not maintain this protection in Canada.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, the hon. the mover of this resolution (Mr. McMillan) said that it was in the interests of the North-west farmer that the Government should agree to this resolution. Both he and the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) seem to take considerable interest in the North-west farmer, and when they are discussing this question of duty upon agricultural implements they use it as an argument that they are speaking on behalf of those unfortunate people. If it true, I admit, that some years ago the North-west farmer laboured under disadvantages with regard to the prices of agricultural implements. That was in the days before we had direct communication with eastern Canada via the Canadian Pacific Railway. Prior to 1886 when Canadian implements had to be exported either by way of Lake Superior and Duluth or by all-rail through to the United States, the price of binders in the North-west was high. In those days you paid from $300 to $325 for a binder for which you now only require to pay from $140 to $150. You can get no better evidence as to what the National Policy has done for the farmers of the North-west Territories, than to compare the prices of implements to-day, with the prices in that country before the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We take it that the National Policy did not simply contemplate putting duties upon certain articles, but that it also meant the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the opening up and developing of our country. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) contends that he has indisputable evidence in his possession that the McCormicks will sell either one implement or a carload of implements for $80 each. Well, Sir, if that be the case, they are imposing greatly upon the farmers of North Dakota, because the retail price of their implements there is from $130 to $140 each, and the all-rail freight from Chicago to Neche cannot make up the difference between $80 and $130 or $140, even adding a reasonable profit. If it were not for our National Policy which caused this competition amongst the manufacturers of agricultural implements, the farmer of Manitoba to-day would be at the mercy of the American implement manufacturer, and, as they are paying from $130 to $140 in Dakota, for an implement which the hon. gentleman says is wholesaled at $80, our people would be paying a far higher price in the province of Manitoba. The fact is, as the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) established some time ago, the duty is only $7. We find that the prices paid by our farmers in the North-west at the present time for Canadian implements are not greater than are paid by the farmers of Dakota and Minnesota, when you compare the distances from the point of manufacture. I have a statement here which I will give to the House furnished me by an implement dealer at Gretna, in Manitoba. He says that the Massey-Harris binder sells at from $140 to $150 at Gretna upon time, and at Neche, across the line, binders sell at from $130 to $140. But there is a difference in favour of the Manitoba farmer, and that is that when the Dakota farmer buys on time he has to give a mortgage not only upon the binder which he buys, but upon all his other implements in order to get credit. The farmer in the Canadian North-west who purchases a binder simply gives a lien upon that article, and gets it on time for two or three years. I will give to the House a further comparison of the prices of agricultural implements at Gretna, Man., as compared with the prices at Neche in the United States. This statement is also from the gentleman I have referred to before :

GRETNA.

Binders	$140 to $150

AT NECHE.

Binders	$130 to $140

Gang ploughs.....	50 to $60
Walking ploughs.....	18 to $20

*Price varies according to size.

Low grades of carriages and buggies are very much cheaper on the other side. The better grades are about the same price. Fancy sleighs and cutters are very much better value on this side—so much so that the dealers across the lines are getting theirs from Winnipeg this winter.

Therefore, with the exception of binders, the prices paid in Canada and the United States are identical, and the Manitoba and North-west farmers have the advantage of getting better terms for their purchase. As the member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) said, there is a great deal of difference between buying an implement from a Canadian manufacturer and buying it from the American manufacturer, because the Canadian manufacturers have agencies everywhere in the North-west, and the farmer is enabled to get his "repairs" immediately. Any man who has anything to do with a binder, and hon. gentlemen in this House who are agents for machines, know how necessary it is for the farmer to be able to get his "repairs" cheaply and immediately. If a farmer be living outside some of the large centres, such as Brandon, Prince Albert, Regina, Winnipeg, and so on, in order to get an American implement "repairs" he has to telegraph or go down to town to get "repairs"; whereas the Canadian manufacturer has an agent in every centre who can furnish the "repairs" at once. Mr. Speaker, I have established by the figures I have given, that instead of the North-west farmer having to pay a larger price than the American farmer for his implements, he is exactly on the same plane in that respect as is the farmer across the line. There is another feature in it. If the Manitoba farmer wants an American implement to-day he pays almost the same price for it as he does for the Canadian implement, but if the duty were off we would find that the American implement would be sold at a considerably higher price than the Canadian implement is sold for to-day. The member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) controverted the statement of the member for West York as to the value at which the American implements come in. If the hon. gentleman will look at page 112 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will find that there were 685 binders brought into Manitoba last year from the United States, and that they were valued at $65,000, upon which a duty of $13,000 was paid. If the hon. gentleman makes a calculation he will find that these binders were valued at $95 for import, and not $100 as the hon. gentleman said. They were valued, as I say, at $95, and if you add the 20 per cent duty to that you find that the profit that is made by the American dealer upon these agricultural implements is much in excess of the profit made by the Canadian dealer. The idea of our North-west farmers being oppressed by the prices they pay for agricultural implements is a thing of the past. It is exploded. No hon. gentleman can stand on the platform in the North-west or in Manitoba and get applause from any audience by making such a statement. As I said, Sir, in my opening remarks, it was a question with the farmers in Manitoba and the North-west some years ago. Our farmers now find that the Canadian article is equally as good and equally as cheap as the American article, and they can obtain it on better terms so far as credit is concerned. There is now as good material in the Canadian implement as in the American implement, which was not the case some years ago. I remember when the prices were higher than they are to-day, that the Canadian manufacturer did not make as good an article as the American manufacturer did, and the preference was given by our farmers to the American article. The Massey-Harris binder to-day is made from the latest American patents, from the very best steel, and from the very best dry material, and it is now in every respect as good an article as either the McCormick or the Deering binder. I venture to say that so far as the value to the farmer is concerned, he gets better value from the Massey machine than he does from the Deering, or the McCormack.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to correct the hon. Minister. He will notice that in the report, mention is made of harvesters, with binders and without binders. The number given as imported is 685, which would make an average cost of $95 each. Will he say how many had binders attached, and how many were without binders? He will find, if he refers to the rulings of the Department of Customs, that they have ruled that $100 is the value of a binder for the purpose of duty.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will see, on reference to page 111, that the number of binding attachments imported into Manitoba from the United States is placed at one, of the value of $48, on which the duty was $9.60.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have been very much interested in the turn this debate has taken.

It amuses me to hear the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) state that if the duty were taken off agricultural implements, the farmer would have to pay more for them than he does to-day. I heard a similar argument from hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to binder-twine at the time we had to pay 14 or 15 cents a pound for it, and when we stated that it could be sold in the province of Ontario for 8 or 9 cents a pound, we were told it could not. I am convinced that the farmers of the North-west would also get their implements cheaper if the duty were taken off. I am also astonished at the statement that we have not a single patented article in Canada which would be allowed to go into the United States. Most of our implements are patented, and the right to manufacture them in the United States could be purchased, just as the Americans purchase the right to manufacture in Canada. This debate proves to me that I was right at the time the duty on agricultural implements was reduced from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, when I asked whether the Government were going to retain the right to revalue those implements when they came in, and when I said that the reduction in duty was more apparent than real, so far as the farmer was concerned. With regard to the statement of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that the farmers supply a very large amount of the wood-work that enters into these implements, very little wood-work enters into them except in threshers. What wood-work enters into a harrow, a plough, or a reaper? Very little; so that the argument of the hon. gentleman is really fallacious.

Mr. SPROULE. The men who sell it do not think so.

Mr. McMILLAN. Now, hon. gentlemen say that our manufacturers can manufacture agricultural implements as cheaply as any others, and that those implements are sold cheaper in Canada than in any other country in the world. If that is the case, and the manufacturers are able to export their implements and to meet the competition of other manufacturers, I want to know what harm will be done to our manufacturers if this duty is removed. Some of our manufacturers have said to me within the last twelve months, that if they could get their raw materials free, they would be prepared to compete with foreign manufacturers in any part of the world. The farmers of Canada understand all these arguments on this subject, and the day will shortly come when they will show that they understand them. They will show that no farmer or class of farmers is deriving any benefit from the policy of this Government. I once saw the statement that there were 123 different articles from which the duty was removed in favour of the manufacturers; but hon. gentlemen cannot show half a dozen articles from which the duty was removed for the benefit of the farmers; and when it is proposed to allow agricultural implements to come in free, all possible obstacles are thrown in the way.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman who has just sat down failed to seize the argument of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and of another hon. gentleman on that side. Their argument is that if there had been no National Policy, instead of having implements at the price at which they are sold in the country at present, and instead of having manufacturers in Canada to supply those implements, you would be without the manufacturers, and, consequently, you would be supplied by manufacturers in the United States. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) missed that argument by saying if the manufacturers in Canada are producing implements so cheap, why could you not take off the duty? That has no cogency, and is no reply to the argument of the hon. Minister of the Interior. Having developed manufactures by reason of the National Policy, which gives us implements at enormously lower prices than we were paying before the National Policy came, the only question we should now consider is this: Whether some regulation of the tariff may not be necessary, not as against the National Policy, but in the carrying out the principles of the National Policy. I have been a good deal assailed out west for using the phrase "scientific protection." Well, perhaps from a pedantic standpoint, the term is assailable. Political economy is a science, and a tariff is an application of that science. A tariff may be called an artificial application of the science of political economy. As a pictorial phrase, I think "scientific protection" serves my purpose; and, for the sake of scientific protection, I think you might well consider whether some change might not be made in the tariff which, while doing no harm to the manufacturer, and not impairing the National Policy, would yet benefit the people. Now, my hon. friend the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) said, and said truly, that under no circumstances could the motion of my hon. friend benefit the farmers in Ontario, though it might benefit the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was right in the figures he quoted, so far as they go. So far as my inquiries go, the prices at which implements are sold in the North-west Territories are as low as, if not lower than, the prices at which they are sold in Dakota. But there is this to be considered. My hon. friend is not quite right in supposing that the farmers in the North-west get better terms from the one company with which they have mainly to do, the Massey-Harris Company. Cases have come before my notice where this company had not only a lien on the implements but had a mortgage even on the crop.

Mr. DALY. That is after the payment is overdue.

Mr. DAVIN. And we passed an ordinance last year in order to protect those farmers from themselves, making it impossible for them to hypothecate their growing crops. But the way I look at it myself is this. The Massey-Harris Company now have, so far as the North-west Territories is concerned, a monopoly; and the moment you have a monopoly, you have to regard it with suspicion. I say you have to regard it with suspicion from the point of view of the National Policy. I hold, as a strong protectionist, that protection, like every other good thing, requires to be constantly watched and regulated in order that it shall be in accordance with the needs of the community. And it is a matter for consideration now whether some action might not be profitably taken, quite on the lines of the National Policy, with regard to the Massey-Harris Company, who do business in the North-west Territories, and who seem to me to have exceptional advantages. However, we shall have an opportunity of dealing with this matter later when I propose my own motion, but I thought I would rise to point out the fallacies to which my plausible friend, the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) has given expression. I have heard him on the platform as well as in this House, and I must say that he is one of the most plausible and, at the same time, one of the most fallacious of men.

Mr. GRIEVE. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is troubled with a very short memory. It was only in the beginning of this session—I think the first day the House met—when the hon. gentleman placed a motion on the Order paper asking that the duty on agricultural implements be abolished.

Mr. DAVIN. And I have just said that I will have an opportunity of moving it.

Mr. GRIEVE. If that was the opinion the hon. gentleman then had, while knowing, as he apparently appears to know, that agricultural implements are being sold in Manitoba and the North-west as cheap, and cheaper perhaps, than in Dakota and the other western states, what, in the name of common sense, was the reason he placed this motion on the Order paper?

Mr. DAVIN. I have just indicated my reason, and will explain further when I move my motion.

Mr. GRIEVE. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) referred to the fact that binders were sold in different parts of Canada for $90. It would be interesting for the farmers, who have been placing their orders this season with the Massey Manufacturing Company, Noxon Bros., Frost & Wood and others, for $115 to $120 cash, to know what manufacturing firm in Canada is making a first-class machine and placing it on the market at $90.

Mr. SPROULE. The Orangeville firm, and the hon. gentleman lived near enough to that firm to know.

Mr. GRIEVE. For my part I am satisfied the hon. gentleman's statement is not correct.

Mr. SPROULE. I saw the implements sold right in my presence and the money paid over not longer ago than this summer.

Mr. GRIEVE. I don't think the hon. gentleman knows the difference between a self binder and a self rake reaper, and no doubt it was a self rake reaper which he saw sold. However, let that be as it will, the statement has been made that if the duty on agricultural implements were removed, Canadian manufacturers would be swamped and driven out of the market. But how is it that the large implement manufacturers on the other side do not swamp the smaller firms? How is it that the smaller manufacturers in the United States are still able to go on manufacturing, as they have been doing for years, in competition with those large manufacturers? How is it that the small manufacturers of Canada are not being swamped by the large ones? We know that the Massey-Harris Company manufacture very largely, and we know that other firms can manufacture only on a smaller scale. How is it that the large firms are not able to drive the smaller ones to the wall? On the contrary, we see the latter going on manufacturing in greater numbers than in former years, although they have to compete with the larger firms. I am not prepared to say whether the farmers of Canada are paying more for their machines than the farmers of the United States. But this much I say, that the Canadian manufacturers would have no reason, if they had free entry for their machines into the American market, to fear the competition of the American firms, when we have free entry into a market of sixty million people, and in return the American manufacturers would only have the entry into a market of five million people. Who would benefit—the manufacturers of Canada or of the United States? I believe that the manufacturers of Canada are able and willing to compete with those of the United States or any other country. We know that to-day they are placing their goods side by side with American goods and English manufactures in Australia and New Zealand, where they have no favours, and also in England and Germany they are able to hold their own. I do not think for a moment that they are placing their goods in these countries for the mere honour of the trade. They are doing it for the money that is in it. And if they are able to compete with those large manufacturers upon foreign soil, why, in the name of common sense, can they not compete with them at home? I have no doubt that our Canadian farmers would rather buy machines of Canadian than of foreign manufacture.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. GRIEVE. Before the House rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to show the relative positions of the manufacturers in Canada and the manufacturers in the United States. I was attempting to answer the arguments of some gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who tried to make it appear that, if we had reciprocity in agricultural implements, the manufacturers in the United States would be able to swamp what those hon. gentlemen call the smaller manufacturers of Canada. I was able to show, I think conclusively, that the manufacturers of Canada were able to compete with all comers in foreign markets, that they were able to send their products to Australia, New Zealand and other distant countries and compete successfully with foreign manufacturers there. I tried to show, further, that if they could compete in foreign markets, they certainly should be able to compete at home. The Canadian farmers would much sooner use implements manufactured in Canada. They believe, and I think rightly, that the machines manufactured in Canada are as good, if not better than those manufactured in any other country in the world. Our farmers believe in supporting home manufactures; they would rather pay more for goods manufactured in Canada than for goods manufactured in any other country. Is there anything in this resolution unjust to the manufacturers of Canada? If so, it has not yet been pointed out. It has been said that the Canadian manufacturers would not be able to send their products into the American markets because the manufacturers there are protected by letters patent, and under the patent laws of the United States, machines manufactured in Canada would be excluded. I do not believe that, generally speaking, that is correct. It may be true in the case of one or two machines, but I believe that it is not true as to the majority of the machines covered by the resolution. I am satisfied that there is no patent covering ploughs, tooth and disc harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horse rakes, cultivators and threshing machines. It may be that one or two manufacturers in Canada are making self-binders upon which or upon certain parts of which letters patent have been issued to inventors in the United States. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) stated that the farmers of Manitoba were perfectly satisfied with the existing tariff. Representing, as he does a Manitoba constituency, he should know better than I do the wants and wishes of the farmers of that country. But, within the last few years, I have gone through Manitoba and the North-west Territories and, in addition, I have met many farmers from Manitoba and have had frequent opportunity of speaking with agricultural labourers who have gone from my own part of Ontario to help in taking in the immense harvests that they have had in Manitoba and the North-west for the last two years. They have all told me that one of the great difficulties the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west labour under at the present time is the excessive tariff upon their agricultural implements. These men tell me, I have no doubt truly, that if the farmers there were allowed to buy their implements from the American manufacturers or wherever they could buy them best, they could harvest their crops much more cheaply than they do at the present time. I do not know that I would favour this resolution in its entirety. It might place our manufacturers at a disadvantage in this way: They are now obliged to pay a heavy duty upon their coal, their steel, their iron and many other articles of raw material that go into the manufacture of their machines. I think this resolution ought to go further and place the raw products of the manufacturers of this country upon the free list as well.

Mr. McMILLAN. It does.

Mr. GRIEVE. On re-reading it I see that the hon. gentleman is right. That being the case, I contend that there is no reason why any man in this House, whether looking to the interests of the farmer, or looking to the interest of the manufacturer should feel it desirable to vote down this resolution. Sir, I have confidence in the manufacturers of this country; I believe they are able to compete successfully with the manufacturers of any country in the civilized world. I believe that the great institution established in Toronto, the Massey-Harris Company, who have competed so successfully in foreign lands, could send their goods into the centres of the United States and compete with the manufacturers of that country. I believe they can turn out as good an article and do it as cheaply as the manufacturers of the United States. Within the last few years I have met in conversation many of the manufacturers of this country, and I have failed to find one but told me that if the duty was taken off the raw material of his manufacture, he would hold up both hands for reciprocity with the United States. If our manufacturers are satisfied that they can compete with the manufacturers of the United States, surely those of us who are not engaged in manufacturing pursuits could find no fault with this proposal. I might deal with this matter at considerably greater length but I do not know that it is necessary to do so at the present time. This subject will come up for discussion later in the session. I simply rose in the first place, to point out the absurd position occupied by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in placing the resolution he did upon the Order paper at the beginning of the session and then speaking as he has done, upon a resolution worded almost the same as his own. I hope that if this resolution is pressed to a vote, the members of this House will be found placing themselves on record in favour of lessening the burdens resting upon the farming community. I know that this duty is a grievous burden to the western farmers, perhaps not so much to the farmers of Ontario, because, undoubtedly, competition has, in a measure, reduced the price of the manufactured goods. When gentlemen say, as they do, that the smaller manufacturers have been driven to the wall by the larger ones, I contend that this is due not so much to over-competition and consequent reduction in prices—because I believe there is a fair margin of profit in the prices of nearly all classes of goods—as to over-production. We have in Canada a limited market. If we had reciprocity in manufactured goods, the opening up of a market of 65,000,000 people would be a boon that would stimulate our manufacturing industries as nothing has stimulated them for many years past. Having these views, I feel that it is my duty to support the resolution that is at present before the House.

Mr. STAIRS. In the remarks made by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Grieve) there is one thing that needs a little consideration by this House. There is one fact connected with the manufacture of agricultural implements in Canada and in the United States that the hon. gentleman has not taken into consideration. Before six o'clock, and I think since, he referred to the advantages which the Canadian manufacturers of those implements would have in securing a market of fifty millions of people, whereas the American manufacturers would only secure a market of five millions of people. Now, it can easily be seen that if the production in each country were just equal to the consumption, neither the manufacturers in the United States nor those in Canada would be either injured or benefited by this reciprocity. I will illustrate my point by assuming that the consumption of agricultural implements in Canada in one year, of binders, we will say for example, is 20,000 a year. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but it does not make any difference to my argument what the real number be. I will assume that the consumption of implements in the United States is about 12 times as many, the population of the United States being about 12 times that of Canada, in round numbers. Now, it will easily be seen that if the production of implements in each country were 10 per cent less than the consumption, the argument of the hon. member for Perth would have a great deal of weight, and the manufacturer in Canada would be largely benefited by the reciprocity in machines. While the manufacturer in the United States would only have a market in this country to fill up a shortage, so to speak, in our production to the extent of 2,000 machines, our manufacturers would have a shortage to fill up in the United States to the extent of 24,000 machines. That is how the thing would stand if there were a shortage of production of about 10 per cent. As I said before, if the production and the consumption in each country were equal, if the Canadian manufacturers to-day, and the United States manufacturers to-day, were making exactly the quantity of machines that each country required to use in any year, then, neither in the United States nor in Canada would the manufacturers be benefited by reciprocity. The hon. gentleman will see that a fact comes in here which must be taken into consideration by the Canadian manufacturers, at least. Not only in Canada is there a much larger power of production than the country requires for consumption, but in the United States also there is to-day a very much larger power of production, on the part of the agricultural implement makers, than the consumption of that country requires. It is very much greater than 10 per cent. I am confident, but for the sake of the argument I will assume that it is 10 per cent, and that the agricultural implement makers of the United States are able to make 10 per cent more machines than are used in that country, and the agricultural implement makers in Canada are also able to make 10 per cent more machines than are used here. Now, under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman will see that to have reciprocity in agricultural implements to-day, would work to the great disadvantage of Canadian manufacturers. They would only have, so to speak, a surplus which they want to get rid of, of 2,000 machines that they could send into the United States, whereas the manufacturers in the United States would have a surplus production of 24,000 that they would be able to sell in Canada. I have only thought this matter out within the last minute, but I think I have largely underestimated the surplus power of production on the part of the United States manufacturers to-day, and that if they had a free market in Canada, they would have a surplus production that they could turn out of their factories each year that would far more than supply all the demand of Canada for that year. Even allowing that they could make to-day about 10 per cent more machines than their consumption, this would be the case. Then there is another factor that has to be taken into consideration, one that should be considered very seriously by the manufacturers of Canada, and that is the geographical position. Even if it be true, and I hope it is true, that the manufacturers of Canada, under the same conditions, can manufacture as cheaply as they can in the United States, these conditions would result in many of the manufacturers in Canada transporting their enterprises into the United States. I think this result would naturally follow. The bulk of the free raw material, the iron and the steel which enters into the manufacture of these agricultural implements, comes from the iron districts of the United States. Now, the resolution asks that iron should be free, and under these circumstances, I hold, that to manufacture for Canada, the geographical position of the Canadian manufacturer is as favourable as the geographical position of the United States manufacturer; but to manufacture for the United States, hon. gentlemen will see that the geographical position of our manufacturers is not as favourable, because the Canadian manufacturer must pay freight from the American iron districts to points such as Toronto and Brantford, and then pay freight back again on the agricultural implements into the United States, many of which would have to go far south of Chicago to find a market. Now, how would any large manufacturer in Canada reason under these circumstances? He would say: I can manufacture for Canada just as cheaply in Chicago, or in some other American centre, and just as favourably, using American raw material, as I can in Canada, say in Toronto; and if I move my works there I am in a far better position to manufacture for the United States; and the result would be that in a few years, under the conditions proposed by the resolution of the hon. gentleman, these works would be moved to the United States, and our Canadian farmers and our Canadian labour would lose the advantages they now possess in these operations being conducted in Canada. But I did not intend to take up the time of the House at any length in discussing the details of the question. I only wish to say, however, in closing, that I believe this question must be considered on still broader principles than those I have enunciated. I hold that the National Policy has to stand or fall as one complete policy. The Conservative party, at least, are not going to pick out any one individual item, or any one class of manufactures, and put it upon the free list, and maintain their protective duties on other articles. It is the policy of the Conservative party to protect the farmer, to protect the manufacturer, to protect the artisan, and all the different classes of labour in this country, so far as they can. If the farmer, under the present tariff, has not protection enough, let us try and give him more protection on the lines of the National Policy, but let us not give it to him by striking a blow at some other industry which we are at present protecting.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For what reason was it that agriculture was singled out for special reductions?

Mr. FOSTER. It was only a moderate reduction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It comes to about half the protection given it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Do you object to that?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I object to any one industry being discriminated against.

Motion negatived.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— THE ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1897, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,

Ottawa, January, 1896.

Mr. FOSTER moved:

That the Message and Estimates be referred to Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

THE HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Mr. CASEY moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council, instructions from the Government or any department, and other documents, relating to the appointment of a High Commissioner in London, or the nature of his duties, or his discharge of those duties, which have not already been laid before this House.

He said: This motion raises a rather grave question, the question whether the course which is being followed in respect to the position of Sir Charles Tupper is one which is consistent with truly constitutional practice, and is decorous and convenient, so far as regards the business of the Government of the country. The Finance Minister gave me the following answer to a question on Friday. I had asked:

Has the attention of the Government been called to a statement in the press as to Sir Charles Tupper holding the double office of Secretary of State and High Commissioner? Is it their intention that he shall continue to be High Commissioner while a member of the Cabinet?

Mr. GRIEVE.

To the first of these questions, the Finance Minister replied, no. To the second question, he replied:

He is acting High Commissioner for the present.

It appears he resigned the office of High Commissioner on 15th January, and on the same day was reappointed Acting High Commissioner.

It will be within the memory of hon. members that this is not the first time Sir Charles Tupper has filled the dual position of Minister of the Crown in Canada, and High Commissioner in London, whether in the body or out of the body, during most of the time it would be very hard for any one to tell. I was told on Friday by the leader of the House, that Sir Charles Tupper had been appointed Acting High Commissioner on 30th May, 1883, and acted as such until 24th May, 1884. I had asked during what period Sir Charles Tupper had been Minister of the Crown since his first appointment as Acting High Commissioner in 1883. The Minister of Finance said Sir Charles had acted as Minister of Finance from 27th January, 1887, to 22nd May, 1888. But the hon. gentleman forgot to tell us what is equally the fact, that Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways at the time he was appointed High Commissioner at London, in 1883, and continued for a year or more afterwards to act as Minister of Railways and High Commissioner jointly. I have no means of knowing the exact period, but have put a question on the paper on that point, and I hope the Minister of Finance will furnish information which will be more accurate than that which he gave on Friday.

At all events, in June, 1884, Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways, and was what was called Acting High Commissioner in London at the same time. Mr. Blake called attention to this matter, and moved a motion similar in terms to the resolution I submit. I will quote from remarks offered by the hon. gentleman at that time, because he put the case more strongly than I could do it on the spur of the moment. After referring to the announcement of the condition of things in question, Mr. Blake said:

Now, I think when an arrangement of this kind was made, it was not an unreasonable thing to expect that the earliest opportunity would be taken to make an explanation to the House of the reasons for the change, if it was a change, and the arrangement substituted for the original one, for, no doubt, it was an important substitution.

The change the hon. gentleman referred to was from the intention of having Sir Charles Tupper reside in London permanently as High Commissioner, to the plan of his holding that office while acting as Minister of Railways. Mr. Blake proceeded to say:

We may differ as to the constitutional propriety, as to the convenience of that arrangement; but, whether we differ or not, it is an innovation on our practice, and one of sufficient importance to entitle us to explanation upon it.

Mr. Blake proceeded to point out the peculiar relations that might arise between the High Commissioner in his capacity as such, and the High Commissioner as a Minister. He said:

In the first place, there is the question of the relation of the High Commissioner of Canada to the particular members of the Administration. He is agent of the Administration at large, but he is also agent of the various Ministers to whom individually he has been in the habit in the past of referring. We have before us instructions given to Sir Alexander Galt as High Commissioner. It will be remembered that, in respect to the negotiations with France,—I rather think, with Spain also—he received instructions from the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance wrote the Commissioner a letter, which was published, instructing him what to do. The Commissioner proceeded, and did not do it, but, I suppose, the failure was not his fault—he tried to do it. He reported to the Minister of Finance what he had done under his instructions. He reported to the Minister of Agriculture what he had done in regard to emigration, and, I dare say, to other hon. Ministers also with respect to matters in which, under their direction, he had acted for their different departments.

Sir, those same complications will arise now. We shall have Sir Charles Tupper the Secretary of State, instructing Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner at London, to take certain action there. We shall have Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, hurrying off to London to carry out these instructions given by Sir Charles Tupper, the Secretary of State. We shall have Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, reporting to Sir Charles Tupper, the Secretary of State, what he has done in connection with this business; and we shall have such a perfect tangle of Sir Charles Tupper, that we shall not be able to distinguish which of these is the head of the reigning dynasty, which is the Prince Imperial, and which is merely the Lord High Commissioner.

Mr. Blake pointed out at greater length how such complications might arise. He referred to the responsibilities of Ministers. He said that in this country Ministers were held individually responsible for the business of their departments, as well as collectively responsible as a Cabinet for the general conduct of the Government. Mr. Blake further said that he did not see how a Minister who was at the same time High Commissioner, could be held individually responsible for the action of the High Commissioner, who was himself, or for his directions to himself, to do certain things and to report to himself. He also pointed out the grave difficulties that might arise from the absence of the High Commissioner from London, when business needed to be transacted here which should be done by the same person when a Minister of the Crown. He pointed out that such difficulties had arisen, and that while Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, was in London the business of Sir Charles Tupper, the Minister of Railways, had been neglected, and had passed into the hands of the then Minister of Agriculture, as acting Minister of Railways, with the result that a great many matters had been carelessly treated. For example, he cited:

Questions of the route through the Rocky Mountains; the settlement of the passes, of the financial standing of the company, of the guarantee—the papers in regard to which, we hope, will be brought down in a few moments—and other questions of great importance, all of which we have not fully before us at this time.

He goes on to point out that it is a very awkward, unconstitutional and inconvenient thing for a member of the Cabinet to be away for any length of time, his duties being performed by an acting Minister; and, on the other hand, that it is perfectly absurd to have a man appointed as High Commissioner in London, unless he is in London attending to his duties as such. "Unless," says Mr. Blake, "he was an Irishman or a bird, he could not be in both places at the same time."

Now, it was argued at that time by Sir John Macdonald, in reply to Mr. Blake, that there were English precedents for a similar course. The then Premier spoke as follows:—

The hon. gentleman knows that it is a matter of practice in England. There was no inconsistency in Lord Beaconsfield, or the Marquis of Salisbury, going to Berlin, or in Lord John Russell, a member of the Administration in England, taking part in the Treaty of Vienna, after the Crimean war, when he was Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Sir John Macdonald also instanced the case of Lord Castlereagh, a member of the Government of the day, who, in 1814, had been for a year in Vienna arranging about a treaty. Mr. Mackenzie called attention to the fact that none of these precedents bore on the case, for none of the gentlemen referred to had been permanent resident ambassadors at a foreign court, but envoys extraordinary sent to perform special duties, and for a limited time. As Mr. Blake also pointed out: they had not been sent as subordinates, they had not been sent out as civil servants subject to orders of the Government or of any department of Government; but they were sent with full powers to negotiate a certain treaty, which were specified before they left home.

The argument of Sir John Macdonald, and the precedents he quoted on that occasion, appear to have come to naught. So fully was it admitted that they had come to naught, that it was felt that the position of Sir Charles Tupper was indefensible without special action being taken, and special action was taken later in the session. On March 4th, 1884, Sir John Macdonald moved to introduce a Bill respecting the Independence of Parliament, which provided that the existing Act, that of 1878, should be amended by declaring :

Provided further, that nothing in this section shall render ineligible any person holding any office, commission, or employment of the nature or description mentioned in such section (A) of this clause, as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him from sitting or voting therein, if, by his commission or other instrument of appointment, it is declared or provided that he shall hold such office, commission, or employment, without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emoluments, or profits of any kind, that may be attached thereto.

You will probably remember, Mr. Speaker, as I do, and as many others do, that until that Act was passed Sir Charles Tupper used to sit in the House, make a speech upon a measure advocating a certain line of policy, and then walk out and sit in the gallery while a vote was being taken, for fear he would be subject to the penalties consequent upon illegally sitting and voting in this House. After that Bill was passed he was enabled, not only to speak, but to vote in his capacity as a Minister.

I would call your attention, Sir, further, to the fact that even the conditions of this whitewashing Act were not carried out. It provided that a man holding a position such as Sir Charles Tupper held should be eligible for Parliament only if he received no fees, wages, allowance, and so on. Yet we find, from a return brought down in obedience to the motion proposed by Mr. Blake, that during the year 1883-84 Sir Charles Tupper, when acting as Minister of Railways and also as High Commissioner, was paid no less than $4,729.33 for expenses, etc., in his capacity of High Commissioner. He was allowed for removal expenses $836, and "Bank of Montreal, London, L.C., cheque of High Commissioner (£800), $3,893.33," or a total of $4,729.33. We find from the same return, Sir Charles Tupper reporting to the Minister of Agriculture on various occasions in regard to the cattle trade and immigration, and so on. We find him acting as a subordinate to his own colleagues, and reporting to them, practically, as a member of the Civil Service of Canada.

Now, Sir, the House and the country want to know whether this farce is to be played over again; whether we are going to have the Premier—for it appears to be taken for granted that he will be Premier, if Sir Mackenzie Bowell takes the line which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would wish him to take—the House and the country want to know whether we are going to have, at all events, a leading member of the Cabinet, perhaps the Premier of that Cabinet, acting as High Commissioner in London, receiving allowance for rent of house, income tax, and other things, as High Commissioner, and, at the same time acting as a member of the Government, or perhaps as the Premier. We want to know what other precedents for such an extraordinary action, an action so contrary to the spirit of the constitution and the independence of Parliament Act, the Government may be able to find now, which they were not able to find in 1883-84, when Sir John Macdonald made an attempt to find precedents for a similar action. I have no doubt the hon. Minister of Finance can give us some further facts in continuation of his little game of cross-questions and crooked answers. He may be able also to find some weighty precedents for this case.

Let me, in closing, briefly tabulate the imperfect and incorrect information which the hon. Minister gave me on Friday. In the first place he stated that Sir Charles Tupper was for about one year Acting High Commissioner, from the 30th May, 1883, to the 24th May, 1884, when he became full High Commissioner, and remained so until January, 1887, about two years and seven months. The hon. Minister forgot to tell us that during 1883-84 Sir Charles Tupper was also Minister of Railways. Then there was an interregnum of about a month and a half, from 27th January, 1887, to 7th March, 1887, during which nobody appears to have been High Commissioner or Acting High Commissioner. From 7th March, 1887, to 6th July, 1887, about four months, Sir Charles Tupper was again Acting High Commissioner without pay. This was the time when he was Finance Minister in Canada, and carried out that wonderful scheme of protection and bounties on iron, which has done so very much to develop the smelting trade of Canada, and to make Canada one of the foremost iron manufacturing countries in the world—that is, according to the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have never been able to find any results from it, except in their speeches.

Then, there appears to have been an interregnum of about ten months again, during which nobody was High Commissioner or Acting High Commissioner. This continued so long as to lead us to suspect that matters would go on very well if no one was acting as High Commissioner in England at all. In 1888 Sir Charles Tupper again put on the mantle, and remained High Commissioner until 15th January, 1896, when he again resigned as High Commissioner, to become Acting High Commissioner without salary.

Now, Sir, during this last period a remarkable interlude occurred. Sir Charles Tupper, who was a public servant of Canada, in the pay of the country, who was the representative of the whole country at the Court of Great Britain, came out to Canada and assumed, not exactly the leadership, but the generalship, of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite during an election campaign. Throughout the whole campaign of 1891, while he was receiving pay at the high rate we allowed him to keep up his establishment in London, he was rushing about from one end of Canada to the other at the public expense, doing what? Trying to defeat one of the parties struggling for political ascendancy in this country—trying to keep his party friends in power. Sir, I do not think the conduct of a public servant who could do that can be spoken of in terms of too high or too bitter condemnation. I think the scandal was such as could not possibly have occurred under any government but that of which the remains still occupy the Treasury benches. If it had not been a thoroughly Tupperized Government at that time, no such scandal could have been permitted; but it was permitted, for we have the statement of the Minister of Finance that during that whole period Sir Charles Tupper was full High Commissioner, and, therefore, doubtless, in receipt of the full salary and allowances belonging to that position.

On the 15th of this month he resigns again, and the farce of calling him an Acting High Commissioner re-begins. How is he to do his duties in London while he is out here? Or who is to do them for him if he cannot do them? Will he transact all his business by cable? My question on this point, on Friday, was as follows:—

Is any business now pending, or are any Canadian interests at stake, which require the presence of a High Commissioner in London?

To that the hon. Finance Minister replied:

All business is regularly attended to by the officials in London, with approval from here.

In other words, the leader of the House tells us that the business in London is all done by the clerks in the office, with approval from here—after it is done! Is that what we pay a commissioner twelve or fifteen thousand dollars a year for? If so, we want to know it. If not, and if there is need of a High Commissioner in London, it is a perfect scandal that the man who is needed there to look after our interests, should be kept here for a large part of the year to transact the duties of Secretary of State, purely partisan duties, with which he should not be allowed to mix at all.

The position is one which it seems a little hard to characterize as it should be characterized. It seems hard to realize that the Government should now, in the days of their weakness, as they did then, in the days of their strength, have the effrontery to keep a man in two positions at once, either of which would require the whole time of a good and competent man to fill. That appears to be what they intend to do, and it is perhaps the most abject confession of their own incapacity and weakness they could give to the country. They confess that they have not got a leader, or any one fit to be a leader, in Canada. They confess that they have to call home a civil servant from England to lead them; and yet they propose to continue him in authority and in part pay, notwithstanding anything said in the Order in Council; because his allowances appear to be going on as in the past, and he has full authority as High Commissioner. I ask the Government to bring down these papers as soon as they can, and I will leave the House to form its judgment upon the constitutionality of the Government's action in this connection. I have worded my motion so as to include all papers that were not brought down in compliance with Mr. Blake's motion of 1884.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to call the attention of the House to the statute, and I would ask the Government to explain how they can appoint an Acting Commissioner to discharge the duties for which the statute provides. I find, in the first place, that the statute provides that the High Commissioner shall act as a resident agent in the United Kingdom. Now, as I understood the hon. Minister, in the explanation he gave a day or two ago, in reply to a question put by my hon. friend, the High Commissioner is not to reside in England, but is to be a member of this Government, and is to reside in Canada, being engaged to discharge the duties of a member of the Government in Canada. I would like the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) to tell us how a High Commissioner, acting or permanent, can be appointed, and how, at the same time, the Government shall undertake to decide that he need not reside in England, but may continue to reside in Canada? Those hon. gentlemen are, as the sworn advisers of Her Majesty, bound to act in conformity with the law. They bind themselves to discharge their duties as the law itself requires. Now, the law requires that the High Commissioner shall reside in England. But these hon. gentleman say: What signifies the law? It is a matter of no consequence; the High Commissioner shall reside in Canada; and we, the Ministers of the Crown, the servants of the Crown, will over-ride the law by assuming to ourselves to do what Charles the I. undertook to do in England. We will put ourselves above the law by declaring that the law is made for ordinary mortals, but must not regulate the conduct of the Government of the day. That is the position taken by these hon. gentlemen. The law provides that the High Commissioner shall act as a representative, and a resident agent of Canada in the United Kingdom. Now, I tell those hon. gentlemen that they have no authority to appoint a High Commissioner who is not to reside in England. They have no right to pass such an Order in Council, and no right to ask His Excellency to sanction such an Order in Council. The Act further provides that the High Commissioner, while residing in England as the agent of Canada, shall, in that capacity, execute such powers and perform such duties—where? Here? No, Sir, in England—as are from time to time conferred upon and assigned to him by the Governor General in Council. Does that Act contemplate a High Commissioner sitting here in Council, preparing a provision defining what his duties shall be—preparing himself, it may be, an Order in Council defining his duties, and asking His Excellency to sanction the order, and which order provides that he may discharge those duties three thousand or four thousand miles away from the place where, under the statutes, he is bound to discharge them? The Act provides that he is to :

Take the charge of, supervision and control of the immigration offices and agencies in the United Kingdom.

But how is he to take charge of the duties of the Immigration Office or see that the work is performed, if he does not reside in England? Then he is to :

Carry out such instructions as he, from time to time, receives from the Governor General in Council.

Carry them out where? In England. By residing there, by being upon the ground, by seeing that the work which is assigned to him is discharged, either directly by himself, or indirectly by those under him. It is further provided that he shall receive a salary of not more than $10,000 per annum, and the same shall be paid out of the unappropriated moneys forming part of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada. Sir Charles Tupper, on one occasion, violated that law. He undertook to discharge his duties by the acceptance of the office, and it was said he would discharge them independent of salary. I pointed out at the time that there were two cases in England where this question had come up—I shall not detain the House by reading those cases—showing that the agreement to accept vacated the seat, that it was not necessary there should be a salary earned, that the very moment the party agreed to accept an office to which a salary is attached, he, by that agreement, vacated his seat, and that a gentleman who had agreed to accept the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer was compelled to go back to his constituents and be re-elected, although he did not get the office at all, in consequence of the alienation of mind on the part of the King after he had made that agreement, or given that assent. So it was perfectly clear, and in consequence of those two decisions this House found it necessary, in order that Sir Charles Tupper, who had vacated his seat under the provisions of the law, might sit here without going back for re-election, to propose a statute which enabled him to continue in his seat. In fact, that statute made him a member of this House, and he did not become a member by virtue of any election. Now, it was provided by that statute :

That nothing in this section shall render ineligible any person holding any office, commission, or employment of the nature or description

mentioned in such section A of this clause, as a member of the House of Commons, or shall disqualify him from sitting or voting therein, if, by his commission or other instrument of appointment, it is declared or provided that he shall hold such office, commission, or employment, without any salary, fees, wages, allowances, emoluments, &c.

And it was under that provision that he continued at that time to hold the office of High Commissioner. I do not know whether that statute is now in force or not. I have not looked at the law. I find here in the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, in 1886, two years after that statute, a statute defining the duties of High Commissioner, which absolutely declares that he shall have a salary and does not refer to the exceptions provided for in that special statute. But even though the commission had been issued to Sir Charles Tupper, and even though, under that commission, it was declared that no salary is, for the time being, attached to his office—I do not care how that may be—it does not authorize the Government in appointing a man to that office who is to reside in this country, and who cannot, in consequence of the position he holds here, reside elsewhere. I deny that any such appointment can be validly made, and therefore Sir Charles Tupper cannot legally be Acting High Commissioner in England in the face of that provision of the law. I say that the Government cannot issue to him a commission—I do not care in what form it is—which will enable him legally to discharge the duties of High Commissioner, when the law itself—which is above Ministers of the Crown, and under which it is their duty to act—says that the High Commissioner to England shall be a resident agent of the Canadian Government in that country. He is not a resident agent, he cannot be resident agent. The fact that he takes the position of Minister of the Crown the law conclusively presumes that he has his residence in the capital where the duties of his office are to be discharged. There are, besides that, inconsistent duties that exist as between an agent of the Government who is High Commissioner and a Minister of the Crown, and that being so, I maintain that this House ought not, for one moment, to recognize so flagrant a violation of the law as the Government have committed in undertaking to make Sir Charles Tupper the Acting High Commissioner. I do not care what name they give it—they may call him High Commissioner if they please—if he undertakes to discharge the duties and receive an appointment under the great seal of this country, he is in fact a High Commissioner, he is in law a High Commissioner, and the adding of the word "acting" cannot alter the character of the office he holds. He is disqualified by the law from accepting the office, and it is an outrage on parliamentary government in this country that the Government should assume to make him acting

High Commissioner and Minister of the Crown at the same time. He may be one or he may be the other, but he cannot be both. The duties of a Minister of the Crown, require him to be here at this capital for the discharge of the executive duties attaching to his office. He cannot be elsewhere; no act on the part of the Ministers can place him elsewhere. No more can he hold an office under the great seal as High Commissioner of Canada and reside elsewhere than in the United Kingdom where his duties are to be discharged.

Mr. DICKEY. I understand the hon. gentleman's objection to be based particularly at that section of the statute which requires the High Commissioner to be the resident agent of this Government in London. I take it for granted that the hon. gentleman would agree with me that that would not mean continuous residence, but that a man might be High Commissioner and absent himself from London and from the United Kingdom. So there is no objection to Sir Charles Tupper being in Canada and being High Commissioner representing this Government in England.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But when you make him a Minister of the Crown here, you give him another residence.

Mr. DICKEY. That is another point. I am speaking of temporary absence from England being no objection to his holding the office of High Commissioner under the statute. But, Sir, my mind is a good deal relieved with regard to the hon. gentleman's constitutional point—although I must say that it is raised by him quite unexpectedly to me—by the fact that the practice that the Government has adopted in this instance was adopted, I believe in 1887 by so high a constitutional authority as Sir John Macdonald. At that time, if I remember aright, Sir Charles Tupper was appointed a Minister of the Crown and was also acting High Commissioner. The hon. gentleman is far better aware than I am that, with regard to Ministers of the Crown themselves, the practice has grown up, in case of a vacancy or the absence of a Minister, to appoint an acting Minister. I do not know exactly in what category that officer would stand before the law, but that is the practice. Now, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman's attack is not exactly in point, because this Government has not appointed Sir Charles Tupper High Commissioner in England, nor has it issued a commission to him under the great seal. He resigned the office of High Commissioner and that resignation was accepted and the office was in that way vacated. As I take it the office of High Commissioner is vacant at the present time. For convenience there were two courses open to the Government. They could have appointed a junior officer in London as acting High Commissioner—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Under what authority?

Mr. DICKEY. I dare say the hon. gentleman may be technically correct; there may be no authority under the statute for such an appointment. But I assume that the British Government, for the convenience of transacting business between this Government and the home government, would recognize an agent appointed in that way, though, technically, there might be no authority for it under the statute. The Government, as an alternative, had the opportunity of availing themselves of Sir Charles Tupper's very great and intimate knowledge of the business at London which is now going forward and appointing him temporarily as acting High Commissioner. They chose that alternative. The hon. gentleman sees and the House sees that the constitutional question raised by the hon. gentleman is a tempest in a teapot. The arrangement is certainly not intended to be permanent. There is no salary or remuneration of any kind attached to the office. The simple fact of the matter is that Sir Charles Tupper, without any formal commission or anything of that sort—and possibly the hon. gentleman is right without any legal authority technically—is acting as intermediary between this Government and the home government.

Mr. CASEY. May I remind the hon. gentleman of the statement made by the leader of the House that Sir Charles Tupper has been appointed High Commissioner without salary. What sort of an appointment was it?

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman, I think, has not read it correctly. The leader of the House said he was appointed acting High Commissioner. I have his answer here. So the effect of the hon. gentleman's point is this that we may be to-day without a High Commissioner. Our attempt to name Sir Charles Tupper for that purpose may be a total failure; we may not have authority under the statute to do such a thing. But that is the whole point. Even if it be so, that is a point that may be raised by the British government and may be productive of some inconvenience. I quite recognize the force of the hon. gentleman's statement as affecting the position of High Commissioner that the appointment of a High Commissioner for any great length of time to the position of Cabinet Minister would lead to a very great practical inconvenience. But I can assure the hon. gentleman, so far as my assurance is of any service, that the moment any practical inconvenience arises out of the situation as it is, steps will be taken to make a change in the existing arrangement. It is admittedly a temporary arrangement, and on constitutional grounds cannot possibly cause injury in any quarter. I must say that I think the attack of the hon. gentleman is not quite called for.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I really feel sorry for my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey). It is abundantly apparent to the whole House that the hon. gentleman agrees with the point taken by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). In fact, the argument is irresistible, incontrovertible; it is so plain that it cannot be misunderstood, and the hon. Minister of Justice in his halting and inconsequent answer, practically admits its soundness. Everybody who knows the hon. Minister knows that he will not submit to put forward an argument to the House that he does not believe to be sound as a matter of law. Therefore the statement made by the hon. member for Bothwell stands, that the appointment of Sir Charles Tupper as acting High Commissioner is unconstitutional and illegal, and that argument is practically assented to by the Minister of Justice. It is a humiliating position for this country to stand in that this man can so dominate the party with which he is connected that he can compel them to appoint him from time to time illegally to the office of representative of this country at the Court of St. James. Now, what answer does the hon. member give? He pleads to the House a misercordian that it has no permanency, and no salary. What has that got to do with it? The hon. gentlemen might appoint the Finance Minister Acting High Commissioner at Washington. He has equally as much authority to do it. The statute gives you authority to appoint one man, and one only, in London to represent this country, and it declares that when he is so appointed, that man, in order to hold his office, must be a resident agent, and if he ceases to be a resident agent, he ceases to be a qualified High Commissioner. You can appoint a High Commissioner at Washington, if you choose, over-ride the statute law, or act without statute law altogether. If the Governor in Council are to constitute themselves a power paramount to Parliament, and superior to the statute law of the land, they can appoint a High Commissioner, I assume, to almost every Court in Europe, and they can say whether it is intended to be a permanent or a tentative appointment; they can say, we will see how it gets along, and we will withdraw it if it becomes, as the Minister of Justice says, inconvenient, and, perhaps, after that, as he says, the English government won't find fault, they won't take any exception, and we will flounder through in this miserable haphazard way, as we are floundering through the other government business now before the House. Well, Sir, it is not an enviable position for the Government to occupy. It may be—I am not sufficiently conversant with the official acts which the High Commissioner has to perform—but it may be that very serious consequences will flow from this. Perhaps the government of England may not inquire very closely, probably they would not inquire whether he is being legally appointed; but I imagine that if he came there as Acting High Commissioner, with the imprimatur of Lord Aberdeen on his commission, they would probably, as a matter of courtesy, assume that he was properly appointed. But this Parliament cannot assume that. This Parliament has had brought before their notice that this appointment is illegal and unconstitutional, practically admitted to be so by the Minister of Justice; and still, Sir, that man's power in his party is such that while he holds office as Secretary of State, I believe, he compels them illegally and improperly to appoint him to the Acting High Commissionership in England, and the only excuse they have to give is that there is no salary attached to it, and no permanency. Well, Sir, I regret exceedingly that the Government have allowed themselves to be driven into this ignominious and ignoble position, and I pity the Minister of Justice that he is forced upon his feet to attempt to defend that which he practically admits is indefensible, and to palliate and excuse it when he cannot defend it, alleging it is only a temporary appointment, and there is no salary attached to it. Now, he says that the appointment was made by Sir John A. Macdonald. Sir John A. Macdonald never attempted to argue that it was constitutional. Political exigencies compelled him, or impelled him, to make the appointment then, and he laughed it off in the House because he had a majority of sixty or seventy behind him. But I do not think the hon. member is prepared to say that everything the late Sir John Macdonald did or sanctioned is, perforce, to be a precedent in this country that we are for all time to follow. Sir John A. Macdonald might be able to laugh these things through the House, but I trust we have reached that state now when the House and the country will require something more than a jocular laugh to convince it that appointments of this kind can be made by the authority of the Governor in Council, directly in contravention to the express words of the statute.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think that my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) need be afraid that the hon. gentlemen opposite will try to laugh things off at present. I do not think they are in that humour, by any means. But the Minister of Justice seems to think that the only difficulty that might arise in this matter would be that the British government might find that Sir Charles Tupper's appointment was illegal, and might raise some difficulty. Now, Sir, it is not that which concerns us at all. It is not what the British government will think about it, but it is what the Canadian people will think about it that concerns us, and, moreover, what Sir Charles Tupper's position will be in this House.

Now, it is admitted by the Minister of Justice himself that this appointment as Acting High Commissioner, or any other kind of commissioner, is not legal under the Act. If that appointment is not legal, the exception made by Sir John A. Macdonald's amendment to the Election Act in favour of men legally appointed by commissions to such offices does not apply to this case. So that if the contention of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and which is admitted by the Minister of Justice, is correct, Sir Charles Tupper is at this moment ineligible to be elected a member of this House.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, oh.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister of Finance tries to have a little laugh about it. He will feel himself laughing very much on the other side of his mouth, if, after all the trouble and expense of getting Sir Charles Tupper elected in Cape Breton, it were to turn out that he had never been eligible there at all.

Mr. FOSTER. He is going to be elected there all the same.

Mr. CASEY. It is very likely he is going to be elected, but he won't stay elected if he was ineligible when he was put in nomination. Hon. gentlemen may be quite sure of that. They do not control everything in this country yet. The members of the Government have been mesmerized, perhaps I should say, Tupperized, but the people of the country have not been Tupperized yet, and if a man is ineligible on account of his office, and on account of receiving an allowance and profit from an office to which he is illegally appointed, he is not eligible to be elected, no matter how many votes he may get in Cape Breton. The hon. gentleman need not be so dead sure, either, that he is going to get a majority in Cape Breton. The hon. gentlemen were quite sure a day or two ago, after the latest developments that had taken place in Charlevoix, that their candidate was going to be elected there, but he is not—by a large majority. Now, Sir, that is the only point I wished to make in reply to the Minister of Justice, that the difficulty is not as to how the British Government may view Sir Charles Tupper's position, but it is as to how the British government may view her of this House, and as a servant of this country.

Mr. LISTER. I do not see why there should be so much discussion on this subject. Sir Charles Tupper has come out to Canada, as he came out frequently before, just before an election. He came out in 1891, he was out, I think, in 1886, and, after the elections were over, and the Conservative party had succeeded again to office, then Sir Charles Tupper went back again to the loaves and fishes. This is but a little scheme of a wrecked party to gather themselves together. They think that the name of Sir Charles Tupper will draw the Conservatives all together, and they will have another victory, and as soon as that victory takes place, they will reappoint Sir Charles Tupper as High Commissioner, and he will leave the Government, as he always did before. However, I think, Sir Charles is somewhat foolish in resigning the position with the expectation that he might go back in that way, because, if the indications can be relied upon at all, there will be very little of the Conservative party in this House after the next election. I think we are going to sweep you, I think you are a wrecked party. Subscribing $3,000 or $4,000 in this House, in No. 16, and sending it down to Cape Breton by a member of this House, is not going to save you. Notwithstanding all the money you may put in, and the efforts you may make, the probabilities are that he will be defeated. You expected to carry Montreal Centre, you were almost sure you would carry it, hon. gentlemen would have bet on the result, but instead of carrying it, you were defeated by 1,200 or 1,300. You expected to carry Jacques Cartier, and you were defeated there. The Conservatives were almost sure of carrying Charlevoix to-day, but, according to the returns received to-night, you have been defeated there also. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Choquette) says you sent $1,000 into Charlevoix.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The money came from the Post Office Department as a deposit.

Mr. LISTER. At all events, whatever was sent to Charlevoix has been lost; that country has remained true to the Liberal cause, and instead of my hon. friends opposite having another supporter, there will be another member sitting here to oppose them—another nail in their coffin.

Mr. FOSTER. Another member to vote for a commission.

Mr. LISTER. Then hon. gentlemen brought on elections in two constituencies where they thought they were reasonably secure. In Cardwell they did not prove very successful, it must be admitted. In North Ontario also they were not very successful; if there had been two candidates the Conservatives would have been unseated there. Taking altogether, the by-elections, if they may be taken as any indication, they show that the Government is not particularly strong in the country. The fact is, the people have no faith in the Government. Its shifting policy has been such as to convince the electors that the Government is not to be trusted. The Minister of Agriculture, in his county, represented the remedial order as simply a decree of a court, which of necessity had to be issued; it did not follow that it had to be enforced.

Mr. FOSTER. It strikes me that we are deviating somewhat from a debate on the position of High Commissioner.

Mr. LISTER. We are discussing somewhat the propriety of Sir Charles Tupper's position as High Commissioner, and so on. In Verchères, the Postmaster General and Minister of Public Works visited the county and urged upon the electors that the Government were bound to pass the remedial legislation; they were bound to pass the legislation which the Minister of Justice, in emphatic tones, had proposed, and which it was represented must be passed even through fire and brimstone. But the legislation was not passed. When the Government were unable to carry out the strong promises made, those two hon. gentlemen and a colleague left the Government. Then it was perfectly understood that no remedial legislation was to be enacted. But another promise was made by the Government, that if they would only come back and re-enter the Government, a special session would be called and remedial legislation would be passed. The session has arrived, but instead of the remedial legislation talked of, which was to follow exactly the lines of the remedial order, the ex-Minister of Justice informed the House the other evening that the measure would be of such a character that almost everybody could support it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not see the connection between the speech of the hon. gentleman and the motion before the House.

Mr. LISTER. I was going to refer to the contest which is now going on in Cape Breton. I do not like to say anything that might be considered harsh so far as Sir Charles Tupper is concerned, but the country at large, I think, will look upon it as a somewhat indecent thing that a gentleman who has occupied that high position for so many years, drawing such enormous salaries from the exchequer of this country, should make a convenience of Canada, because that is all he is doing, resigning that office when he thinks proper, coming out here, entering the Government, trying to build up the Government and help it along, and as soon as he has succeeded, returning to his old nest in old London and resuming the office and all its emoluments. When Sir Charles Tupper assumed the office of High Commissioner, it was generally understood that he accepted the position of an ambassador of a European government. It was supposed that he had given up politics as a game, and he would work there for the best interests of Canada as a whole, a servant of this Dominion, drawing his salary from the people of all Canada, not of the Conservative party nor of the Liberal party, but of all the people. It was supposed he would devote his time, energy and ability to discharging those important duties. What would we think if an ambassador of Great Britain, the moment an election was announced or was near at hand, should return to England and temporarily resign the position he occupied and take an active part in politics, expecting to be re-appointed to the position he had resigned as soon as the elections were over. Such an act would never be tolerated in the old world for a single moment, such a thing has never been attempted; yet here we have the spectacle of the ambassador of Canada to the British government, when he pleases or it suits his own convenience, resigning for the time being and plunging into elections in Canada for the purpose of serving one political party, in order that he may resume the office he had resigned. When I say that such conduct is indecent, that phrase fully describes the position of affairs. Sir Charles Tupper is coming here to save the Conservative party. That party has wrecked itself. Vacillation, incompetence, extravagance, corruption of the very worst kind can be charged against that party, and for the purpose of booming the party they have brought Sir Charles Tupper over here, thinking that the name of Tupper will becloud the political actions of the party and enable it to snatch another victory. They will find, when the elections come on, the people understand this action. They will find Sir Charles Tupper is a back-number, and that he cannot come here and resuscitate the Conservative party. He is a reminiscence, a galvanized corpse. The party will find when the elections come on that with or without Sir Charles Tupper the Conservative party is doomed. I am sorry for the sake of the Controller of Inland Revenue. If I were following my own inclinations and feelings, I should like to see him longer in office. Whether in office or not, the chances are exceedingly good, if we can look upon it in that light, that he will be defeated at the next elections; at all events, he will not be able to hold the present honourable position in the Government nor draw the emoluments, which are no doubt a trifling matter to him as compared with many other hon. gentlemen. The motion before the House is fully warranted by the facts. The position which Sir Charles Tupper occupied is contrary to law; there is no law giving authority to the High Commissioner to discharge the duties of the office to which he has now been appointed, and to which the Government have no power to appoint him.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Following the example of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister), and carrying on the logical discussion which he has carried on, starting the discussion on Sir Charles Tupper and bringing in the election of Charlevoix, I should like to say one word on the subject, and it is that if the election in Charlevoix has been carried by a friend of the hon. gentlemen opposite, it is because the candidate representing the Liberal cause in that county at the last moment declared he would vote for the policy of the Conservative party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TARTE. He never did so.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but when the vote of that hon. gentleman is taken in this House, hon. gentlemen opposite will not feel as happy as they feel to-night. It is well known to those from both political parties who are carrying on that fight, that Mr. Angers proclaimed by telegrams all over the county that he would not support the policy of his leader, the Hon. Mr. Laurier, in his policy upon the Manitoba School Bill.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. That was in the "Gazette" only.

Mr. LISTER. The Bill may be such that any one could support it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am telling the hon. gentlemen opposite what their candidate did. Further, I am telling them, that if it had not been for Mr. Anger's adhesion to the policy of the present Government on that question, he would not have been elected in the county of Charlevoix.

Mr. TARTE. Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster-General seems to know everything about that Charlevoix election. The wires may have told him a great many things that we did not know before he knew them; but there is one thing I am sure of, and that is, that my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) is quite mistaken. I challenge him to put before the House immediately those famous telegrams that he speaks of. Mr. Angers never pledged himself to vote for the hon. gentleman's policy.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. On the school question.

Mr. TARTE. He never did even that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He did.

Mr. TARTE. We are now face to face with a very simple question of fact. My hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) has stated that Mr. Angers has pledged himself to vote for the policy of the Government.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me for interrupting him. Mr. Angers pledged himself to vote against the policy of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) upon the commission of inquiry.

Mr. TARTE. I say that my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) is altogether misinformed. There is a very simple thing to do in the matter. Let the hon. gentleman who has spoken of telegrams produce these same telegrams that he says Mr. Angers sent over the county. It is no use for the hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) to speak of things that he does not know all about. He has alluded to that Charlevoix election; he should not have done so. Through the wires on Saturday went to the county of Charlevoix a pastoral circular—if I may express myself that way—which did not approve of the policy of the Government, but which asked the electors to pledge themselves to vote for a thing that they had not seen, and the electors did not pledge themselves to vote for that thing which they had not seen, and they ought to be congratulated by all free men. The Government, in that election, relied on a thing that has not had its effect. I speak freely here, and I speak proudly, because in Verchères we had to do with the same—I would not say, as some extreme people do, the same dangerous influence; surely not—but with the same ill-advised influence. I may be excused, and I may be pardoned, if I speak strong language here to-night, but it is the fault of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Surely the Government, it seems to me, was able to carry on its warfare in Charlevoix without expecting the Bishop of Chicoutimi to interfere in their behalf. And since I am on my feet, since my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) has himself brought the question before the House, I ask the leader of the House to state to-night, if it is true or not, that they have submitted to the bishops of the province of Quebec the Remedial Bill that they have pledged themselves to introduce into this House?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) permit me to ask him, as confidentially as he asked me, to produce the telegram which he says asked the bishop to send letters, or to interfere in the election?

Mr. TARTE. I never said there were any telegrams sent.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Well, telegrams or anything else?

Mr. TARTE. Do I understand my hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) to say that the bishops had no communication with them on that very Remedial Bill? I do not accuse the bishops. They have a perfect right to have any communications whatever with the Ministers. It is only a simple question of fact that I want to know, and we will know then in the most positive way where we are. The leader of the House, it seems to me, should answer that question. He is free not to answer it, but at the same time it will be remembered that the question has been put to him.

Mr. FOSTER. I had no communication with the bishop.

Mr. TARTE. Who is then the leader of the House? Of course, I may be mistaken in him.

Mr. FOSTER. The question was not as to who was the leader of the House. I answered your question, and I said that I had no communication with the bishop.

Mr. TARTE. The hon. gentleman (Sir Adolphe Caron) should not have brought up that question of the Charlevoix election here.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has not answered the question which my colleague (Sir Adolphe Caron) put to him. He has not produced those telegrams, or that communication which he stated most positively had been sent, if not at the instance of the Government, at least in the interests of the Government, to the voters of Charlevoix asking them to vote in the direction indicated.

Mr. TARTE. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has not understood me correctly.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) would say it in French I would understand him better.

Mr. TARTE. Although my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is a great French scholar, I doubt if he would understand me better if I spoke in my native tongue. But, Sir, to speak seriously. The Postmaster General has been wrong in bringing that question up here to-night. It is not correct to say that Mr. Angers pledged himself to vote against the policy of my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier).

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, on the school question.

Mr. TARTE. My hon. friend (Sir Adolphe Caron) is mistaken about that. He is mistaken. Mr. Angers has not pledged himself to vote for the policy of the Government.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. TARTE. He has not pledged himself and there is very good reason why he should not, because the policy of the Government on that question is not yet known, and it may be that it will take some time more before it is known.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But the policy of the leader of the Opposition is perfectly known.

Mr. TARTE. What is it then?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is no policy at all.

Mr. TARTE. You are mistaken again.

Motion agreed to.

THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Return showing the number of employees on the Intercolonial Railway on the 30th June last.

The number of miles of railway operated at same date.

The number of stations and station-masters.

The number of cars put on the line during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1895, and charged to working expenses.

The number of engines put on the line and charged to working expenses.

The number of cars put on and charged to capital account.

Mr. FOSTER.

The number of engines put on and charged to capital account.

The number of tons of new rails put down and charged to working expenses.

The number of tons put down and charged to capital account.

The number of ties put down and the number charged to working expenses and capital account respectively.

The number of bridges repaired or put in and charged to capital account and the number put in or repaired and charged to working expenses.

The number of overhead bridges renewed and charged to working expenses and the number to capital account.

The amount spent on fencing and charged to working expenses and the amount charged to capital account.

The total amount spent on new buildings of any kind along the line, and the portion charged to capital account and working expenses respectively.

The total amount spent in repairs of buildings and the amount charged therefor to capital account and working expenses respectively.

The amount spent on drains, ditches and culverts along the line, over and above what was done by section-men, and the portion thereof charged to working expenses and the portion to capital account.

Mr. HAGGART. The number of employees at a particular date will not give the hon. gentleman the number of men employed as a general rule on the Intercolonial Railway, because at some periods of the year there are more required than at other periods. As the hon. gentleman evidently wants to know what amount of the expenditure on the railway has been charged to capital account, I may tell him that no increase has been made in the mileage of the road since my last annual report. As regards the rolling stock, it is kept in as efficient a condition as possible, and has not been charged to capital account, but has all been paid for out of revenue account. The same is the case as regards rails and ties. Some thirty miles of the road have been laid with new rails, all of which have been charged to revenue account. All works and repairs on drains, ditches, bridges, &c., have been charged to revenue account, and none to capital account. There have been no charges to capital account on any of the items in the hon. gentleman's motion. The return will be a very long one, and he must expect that I cannot have it ready in a short time; but I will get it ready as soon as possible.

Mr. McMULLEN. If I might be permitted to reply to the hon. Minister of Railways, some years ago, when Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways, he stated that when any new engines or cars were put on the line, they were charged to capital account, while all repairs were charged to working expenses. On several occasions he also charged fencing and over-head bridges to capital account. Now, I would like to know whether the policy that was adopted previous to the present Minister of Railways coming in is still being carried out. If none of these items have been charged to capital account, then the return should not be a very long one, and should be very easily made up. It would be interesting to the House to know what has been charged to capital account and what to working expenses. My motion asks for the number of men employed on the Intercolonial Railway on the 30th of June last. I cannot see that it should be a long work to give the number on the pay-roll on that date. I do not ask for the average number employed throughout the year, but the number on the 30th of June.

Mr. HAGGART. There would be no trouble in giving that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The explanation given by the hon. Minister of Railways left on my mind the impression that this return could be made up almost instantaneously. There has been no expenditure on capital account for nearly two-thirds of the subject-matters mentioned in this motion, so that there ought to be no difficulty in giving in the return. I would suggest that after that part of the motion asking for the number of employees, there be added "distinguishing between permanent and temporary employees," otherwise the return would not give the information to the House which it appears desirable to have.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman must note that a great deal of information is required, whether the expenditures are charged to capital account or not. But I can assure the hon. gentleman that all this work has been done, and that the road has been kept in as good repair as it has ever been in, and it has all been charged to revenue account. It is very difficult to distinguish between permanent and ordinary employees. There are none permanent on the road at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We understand by a permanent employee, one who receives regularly his monthly wages, whereas a temporary employee is only employed by the day.

Mr. HAGGART. If the hon. gentleman asks for the maximum number employed and the number employed on that date, I could give that.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. Minister must know that every section foreman is a permanent employee, with perhaps four or five men under him; but when there is extra work to be done, such as the removal of snow, an extra number of men are put on and are paid by the day; and it is quite easy for the department to show the number of men regularly employed on the railway as distinguished from those employed only occasionally. As the Minister properly says, there are no permanent employees. At the same time, that is misleading, because there are a number of men who have been in the employ of the Government railways for a number of years. My hon. friend, I understand, simply wants the number of regular employees as distinguished from those put only on temporarily. In my opinion, there would be no difficulty in distinguishing between them.

Mr. DICKEY. What does the hon. gentleman say about train hands?

Mr. GIBSON. I beg to tell the hon. gentleman a point that he must know. I do not know what is done on the Intercolonial, because the employees there are perhaps treated in a different manner, or engaged somewhat differently from what they are on ordinary railways—they are, perhaps, put there for political purposes; but an ordinary railway is run on business principles. There is regular gradation. A man starts as a brakeman, then comes to be a freight conductor, and then is made a passenger conductor. The hands on a railway are, to a large extent, looked upon as permanent employees, and receive promotion according to good behaviour and long service; and I may tell the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) that it sometimes takes eight, ten or fifteen years for a railway employee to reach the position of first-class railway conductor. Perhaps things may be different on the Intercolonial down by the sea. Now, if a man has been in the employ of a company fifteen years, he may well be looked upon as a permanent official. Train hands are dealt with in the same way as all other employees; so long as the men behave themselves they are promoted. I have had twenty-seven years' experience in railway matters, and I know that the men are promoted from one grade to another, according to length of service. On the Grand Trunk, so long as everything else is equal, each man takes his turn for promotion. So well is this carried out, that even if a man is not aware that his turn for promotion has come, he still obtains it, and those below him are promoted in turn.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Notwithstanding all the explanations we have had, the fact still remains that the information asked for by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) will be very difficult, indeed, to make out upon paper. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to get up and, in a general way, give their experience of what constitutes a permanent and a temporary employee on a railway. We may all have in our minds some very definite idea; but I think the hon. member for Queen's will now agree with me that when that comes to be classified and put upon paper, when we come to divide permanent and temporary, where there is really no permanency, except length of service, it is exceedingly difficult, indeed. Let me ask the hon. member for Queen's, if he will call a permanent employee one who has been six months on the road, or three months?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In the railway I know the most about, the Prince Edward Island Railway, no difficulty is experienced at all. All the employees of the road are called, in ordinary parlance, permanent employees. They are not permanent in the technical sense of the term, but permanent as distinguished from casual or temporary labour, employed from time to time for casual or temporary purposes. I do not intend to use the term in the technical sense to which my hon. friend refers, but I wish to distinguish casual and temporary employees from the usual employees.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think we are bound to look rather at the nature of the employment than the nature of the contract that may exist between the railway company or the Government and the individual. If the employee is a person engaged in doing work that always existed, and requires to be done every day, although he may be changed every day, he must be regarded as a permanent employee of the road, in the sense my hon. friend wishes the word to be understood. Whereas, if the work is something that has arisen through casualty or some particular exigency and which requires service for a short period of time, the person engaged in the performance of that work would be regarded as a temporary employee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Since the hon. gentleman from Queen's interrupted me, I withdraw my objection, because I do not think there will be any difficulty. We have had three definitions from the other side as to what permanent and temporary employees, respectively, are, and as these definitions all differ, no doubt the Minister of Railways will have very little difficulty in getting at the facts.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copy of the Order in Council concerning the superannuation of J. B. Guévremont, railway mail clerk, and of any power of attorney given by him to any party to draw his retiring allowance; and of all other papers and correspondence in connection with this matter.—(Mr. Flint.)

Return showing the number of employees in the several departments, temporary or otherwise, that do not contribute to the superannuation fund for each of the years 1892-93-94 and 1895; and the gross amount of salary paid to such employees in each department for each of the years above named.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Statement showing the names of all persons appointed to any positions in connection with the Customs at Toronto since 1st July, 1891, with dates of appointments and salaries of such appointees.—(Mr. McMullen.)

THE BUDGET SPEECH.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say that I had arranged to deliver the Budget Speech tomorrow, and last Saturday morning I sent a letter to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), informing him of my intention. That gentleman had left town, however, just before the letter went to his residence, and he did not get it until he came back to-night, so that I have decided to postpone the speech. I had some conversation with the hon. gentleman, and to what I am going to propose I do not suppose there will be any objection, namely, that on Thursday the Government orders take precedence. To-morrow, which is Government day, when we come to Government orders, we will let them stand, and the work of private members will go on just the same as it would on Thursday. Then on Thursday, I shall deliver the Budget Speech.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have no authority to agree to that proposition, and it must stand for consideration of the House to-morrow.

PREPARATION OF CUSTOMS RETURNS.

Mr. HAZEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, there is a matter I would like to bring to the attention of the Government. It is one of great importance, affecting, as it does, the returns of the export trade of the Dominion. I think it will be admitted by every hon. member of this House that it is extremely desirable that the returns of exports furnished by the collectors of customs and other officers in charge of these matters should be as accurate and complete as possible, and that credit should be given to the country for all the goods exported from the Dominion.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. member is raising a question that will be provocative of discussion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Take it on the adjournment.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HAZEN. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, when I was called to order, that it was desirable and that every one would admit that it was desirable, that the returns of exports from the country furnished by the customs authorities from time to time should be as complete as possible, and that full credit should be given the country for all the goods exported. For some time past I have had my attention called to this matter, and I have reason to believe that large quantities of goods are being exported from this country to Great Britain and to the United States for which credit is not given in the trade returns of the country. During this winter, as many members of the House are aware, there have been large shipments of western produce from the port of St. John to Great Britain. During the last six weeks on the lines of steamships that are now running from that port, about a million dollars' worth of produce, chiefly the product of western Canada, a small portion of it the produce of the maritime provinces, and a portion from the western states, has been shipped from St. John to Great Britain. People in that city, members of the board of trade and others who take an interest in these matters, looked into the subject to see to what port these shipments would be credited. They found that only a small portion was credited to the port of St. John, and that the rule prevailing in the customs service was that this produce should be credited to the port nearest the district from which the produce came. For instance, in the case of goods from the province of Ontario shipped from the port of St. John the goods would be credited to the custom-house in the county nearest to the point of origin. It would appear, however, from information furnished by gentlemen who have looked into the matter, that a considerable quantity of this produce has not been credited either at the port of export or at the port of origin, and, as a result, there is going out of the country a large quantity of produce for which the country gets no credit whatever in the trade returns. Further, Mr. Speaker, it is claimed, and I think it can be proved beyond question, that a large amount of produce from Miramichi and the northern counties of New Brunswick is being shipped to the United States, which produce is not credited to any custom-house in the province of New Brunswick or elsewhere in the Dominion. And so, as I have said, the Dominion of Canada is not getting credit for the full amount of the exports of the country. This, I think, every hon. gentleman of this House and every citizen of the country will admit is not desirable. The returns should be as complete as possible. In order to make the matter more clear, I will read an article from the St. John "Sun" of Saturday last, which explains the matter more clearly, probably, than I have been able to do :

BETTER EXPORT RETURNS WANTED.

Since the close of navigation on the St. Lawrence ten steamships have taken cargo on the west side of the harbour for Great Britain. The value of the first cargo shipped by the "Lake Superior," as officially recorded, was $138,000. The same ship on her second trip had a more valuable cargo. It is safe to estimate the value of the produce taken hence in the four sailings of the Beaver line at over $500,000. The Donaldson and Furness ships have, since the middle of December, taken away $300,000 or $400,000 worth of goods. The value of exports to Great Britain by these regular steamships has been close to a million dollars in less than six weeks.

According to the official reports, the total exports of the port of St. John to all countries for the year ending last June was $3,310,215, or less than four times the business done by the steamships sailing from the west side since the middle of last December. The present prospect is that during this winter not less than $2,500,000 worth of goods will be snipped across the Atlantic from St. John in regular line steamships, and nearly all of this is western freight.

Notwithstanding the increase in the export business of St. John, it will probably be found, when the Trade Returns are taken up next year, that the exports of the port are about the same as the previous year. Not more than 10 per cent of this winter trade will, under the present system of book-keeping, be credited to St. John. All that will go down as the trade of St. John will be goods, mostly lumber, which are gathered for export in this immediate vicinity.

The first cargo of the "Lake Superior" may be taken as a sample. This ship took hence a cargo valued at $138,000. The value of the goods entered as the export of St. John was $16,000, in round figures, chiefly representing deals. The value of goods entered with clearance from inland points to the westward was $42,000. Concerning the origin of the remaining $80,000 worth of goods, or their place of entry, the custom-house authorities here have no official information. These shipments may possibly appear as the export of some western town, or may not be recorded at all. The chances are all in favour of a great part of the goods escaping entry altogether.

The collector here has regarded the law, which requires that the goods should be entered as the export of the port nearest the original place of lading. St. John is not that port. The collector has also obeyed this law in regard to goods shipped to the United States and other countries from New Brunswick inland points. For example, fish from the north shore, lobsters, eggs, berries and other goods forwarded by way of St. John are supposed to be entered for export in the customs district whence they are first shipped by train or other conveyance. It is known that, as a matter of fact, a great part of these exports do not go into the statistics of any port. The export trade of the country is misrepresented to that extent in the trade tables of the Dominion. At least $1,000,000 worth of Maritime province produce shipped from St. John does not appear in the trade returns of St. John or any other place.

Collector Ruel forwarded to Ottawa some time ago a full and fair statement of the circumstances, pointing out that the present system greatly impaired the value of the trade statistics. He showed that the proper and sure way of recording the export trade is to keep the return of goods at the port of exit, whether it be a seaport or a frontier station. The United States Government has found it necessary to adopt this method in order to obtain greater accuracy.

The reason this has not been done in Canada is probably because the inland towns desire to be credited with the exports from the district of which they are the centre. This is a natural and proper ambition. Moreover, it is desirable that there should be a return of the trade of local customs districts. But the first consideration is to have a reliable and complete general statement. The failure to make entry of a great part of the goods gathered at inland points defeats both objects. It ought to be possible to devise a method by which each port of exit should be credited with the volume of goods passing through it, while at the same time a record would be kept of the value forwarded from each port of origin. Then the amount of foreign business done in each district would be recorded, the value of the foreign trade of each seaport would be known, and the aggregate exports of the country would be accurately stated. At present not one of these three things happens.
