But, the order being made, we are told that it was too drastic, that it asked for too much, that, in fact, it asked for the re-establishment of inefficient schools. That being called to the attention of the Government, time was given. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in going over what has been gone over several times within the last few days; but to follow up the history, the order of July was then sent to Manitoba, to which order there could be no exception taken on the ground of it asking too much. That order gave them the option of applying the remedy or of suggesting the remedy and, as they have the power, of applying it. But still nothing was done. The pledge of the Government had to be kept, that pledge being that this Parliament should be called together and this Bill introduced and pressed to a conclusion. But we are told that this Parliament is in its dying days and the people have not been consulted, and have not been told what was going to be done, and therefore it would be hasty legislation to pass this Bill now. There are many ways in which the opinions of the people are made known to their representatives. We cannot refer everything to a plebiscite, for if so we would kill all party government. But we know that when questions arise members of the Government go through the country stating their views upon them and gathering the feeling of the people who attend and hear their addresses. I recollect in an early stage of this question, at a large meeting held in the city of Toronto, hearing the late leader of the Government and of this House, Sir John Thompson, state that every step he took in the matter he would take after having had the opinion of the highest legal tribunal, and that, having obtained that opinion, he would follow it to the letter. And that statement was received by that great meeting with cheers, and none cheered louder than the hon. gentleman who, on the floor of this House—blamed the Government for following the Decision of the highest tribunal in the Empire, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). I heard the hon. gentleman, the late leader of the Government on several other occasions in my own town and in other places in Ontario, make the statement, and never once did I hear that statement made by him or by any one else representing the Government which he then led, but it was received with approval by the men who are now trying to blame the Government for having followed that course. That was the solution proposed—that the difficulty should be constitutionally solved and it only remains for this Parliament constitutionally to enforce it.

As has been remarked, the Government are attacked on two different lines. We have the leader of the Opposition leading one line, or perhaps, I might say many lines. For while the hon. gentleman has a very fine record for talking on both sides of the question and all round the question and never saying anything emphatic on either side, I think he excelled himself in that respect yesterday. First, he was very much opposed to coercion. He read us a very eloquent lecture upon the evils of coercion and how very wrong it would be to practise it. Then almost in the next sentence he proceeded to say that veto was the remedy. The hon. gentleman did not say that the Act should have been vetoed, but if the question had not been asked him, which showed that he was really dodging the question, no person who heard him would have thought, no reporter in the gallery would have reported otherwise than that the hon. gentleman had recommended the veto.

How close did he go to it? He tells us that the minority asked for it, and if justice had been given to them, as it had been in other cases, they would have had their grievance redressed long ago. He then goes on to say that four Acts were passed that session, that two were vetoed, and two were not. This Act was not vetoed, and one referring to the French language was not vetoed. The minority's rights were not protected by the veto, either as regards the French language or as regards their schools; but in other matters, the veto was brought into play. And so he argues until he leaves the question, thoroughly impressing every one who heard him that he thought that was the remedy that should have been applied. But, unfortunately, a member from this side of the House put to him the question whether he thought the Government should have disallowed the Manitoba School Act, and then he answers neither yes or no, but avoids the question.

Mr. MASSON.

Well, having lectured against the evils of coercion, he then tells us that an inquiry should be made as to whether there was a grievance, and almost immediately afterwards tells us that there was a grievance, a grievance against heaven's laws, the unwritten and the unchangeable. Then, having told us that there was a grievance, he virtually tells us that it was impossible to remedy it, that this Parliament could not give a remedy. Then he says that the constitution gave the remedy, and that that remedy should be applied. What does the hon. gentleman's argument amount to from all these various statements? Whether the Government vetoes or does not veto, whether they coerce or do not coerce, whether they consider there is a grievance or no grievance, whether there is a remedy, or no remedy, whether they apply it or leave it alone, in any case and in every case, they must be wrong. I think that is really the substance of the hon. gentleman's argument. To follow his argument further than that would only be a waste of time at present. Almost at the close of his speech, he wants a reference, and he wants many things inquired into. One thing he wanted inquired into was whether this matter of education was a matter of conscience with the Roman Catholics. Well, as a Protestant, I never doubted it. As a Presbyterian, it is a matter of conscience with me, and I thought that the Catholics went further than any Protestant church in the matter of conscientiously looking after the education of the youth. But the hon. gentleman wants an inquiry to satisfy somebody, surely not himself. I can assure him there is no person on this side of the House who wants any inquiry on that question. We all grant that the matter of education is a question of conscience with the Roman Catholics. He wants an inquiry as to compacts, and what compact was broken. That might be a very important question for inquiry, but quite outside, as I have already said, the question we are dealing with. Are the schools Protestant? Does the hon. gentleman want to inquire into that? He has had an ample opportunity to do so. Surely he has found out by this time whether they are or not. If we take the Catholic view of it, they are Protestant; we have the Protestant view of it that they are Protestant; but if they are not, will that satisfy the conscience of the hon. gentleman? Will it satisfy the conscience of the hon. gentleman to have the Catholics deprived of their rights to have schools of their own, to teach their own schools, and to have their own religious instructions given in those schools? Is that not inflicting a twinge upon the conscience of the hon. gentleman? Does he not think it would be an outrage on the conscience of the minority of Manitoba to have that right taken away, whether the schools are Protestant or not? I can understand men who have no deep religious feelings of their own, who care not for religious matters, who would like to see the country brought up to infidelity or to materialism, and religion swept out of the back door—I can understand men of that class being satisfied with schools having no religious instruction in them, or with passing the schools over entirely to secularism; but I cannot understand a member of any Christian church, who thoroughly believes in the religion he professes, deeming it a matter of small importance whether religion is driven from our schools or not, or whether the right to teach the religion of the parent to the child, is a matter of no practical importance. I know that many Protestants think they have other means of teaching religion, and it was stated by the Minister of Justice, as his private opinion, they had better do away with separate schools altogether. The only alternative is to do away with religious instruction in schools. That is the only alternative that has ever worked with any satisfaction. We have the statements of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) that the secular schools had been a success in some countries. But it is a matter of opinion as to what success is. If obtaining classical lore or secular education is all that is required in our schools, why, then, we may look at the secular schools of some countries as being a success. But to look at it from a religious standpoint, can we say that any of them have proved a great success? The hon. gentleman referred to several countries. Why did he omit Germany, where they were first introduced in Europe, a country whose circumstances are so parallel with our own, with its Protestant states and its Catholic states? About eighty years ago it introduced secular schools, and has had, therefore, several generations of experience. Why did he omit it? Was it because he knew, from a Christian standpoint, it would not only be a failure but a great disaster? Germany was then as Canada is to-day, thank God, a religious country, very religious it might be called. How is it to-day? Largely gone over to infidelity. Why did he not refer to France, the next in importance, and where a still closer parallel can be drawn; where, on the expulsion of the Jesuits, the state had to take charge of the male education, and did it with secular schools? How is France to-day in this regard? Is the religious element of France improved by the change or otherwise? I do not think there are two opinions on that point. The hon. gentleman did refer to Italy. What about Italy? He said it was a great success there. He must have been reading of the first few years' experience in Italy. Introduced in 1848, for the first 12 years the reports, the best I have discovered furnished by the British and Foreign Bible Society, are loud in their praises of the secular schools. The priests and clergy had been driven out; these men had a better chance to do the work they were after, and they were loud in their praises. They stopped praising, and it is interesting to note the change in their tone. But without seeking to go over the matter in detail I would refer to one of the authorities, which states that Italy is now under thralldom worse than that of Rome. I wonder if it is possible for the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to know of any thralldom worse than that of Rome? Yet such was the language of that report, and also that the national schools were the hot-bed of infidelity. Does the hon. member for West York claim that is a success and one that is desired for Canada? If so, I commend his opinion on that point to the hon. gentlemen he pretends to lead. But the hon. gentleman also referred to the United States. Does he find it such a glaring success in that respect there? They have only been started fifty years; commencing in New York, they spread west and south; and how about the infidelity that has followed? How about Sabbath observance in that country, where there is no Bible or religious instruction in the schools? You can trace it from state to state; the crop has always been an outcropping of infidelity. If that is a success desired to be attained by the introduction of secular schools, by schools that are not Protestant, that are not Catholic, where no religion is taught that would hurt anybody or do any good. If that is the result, does the leader of the Opposition wish to say that the minority in Manitoba would have no grievance if such a condition prevailed there? For my part I am inclined to respect their consciences so far as to say that not only would I give them schools of which they would not complain as being Protestant, but I would give them schools in which they were entitled to teach the religion of their fathers. That is what our various Protestant churches have fought for, what the Huguenots fought for, what the Orangemen fought for, what the Calvinists of Scotland fought for, the rights of civil and religious liberty, including the education of their child as they liked, none daring to make them afraid.

On that point we hear a great deal said about the rights of the State and the rights of the Church, as if these two statements comprised all the rights that could possibly exist. We know that on questions of civil and religious liberty the fight was often between the State and the Church. But that does not embrace all the rights, and to my mind on the question of education; neither the State nor the Church has the about the rights of the State and the rights to educate and to direct the course of the education. It is the duty of the State and the duty of the Church to assist in that education, but not to control it, and I think we often mistake the position both of State and Church when we give to either one or the other the full power. It is their duty and privilege to assist, but in my humble opinion it is the right of the parent first to educate. I will not detain the House much longer on this question, important though it is. I have traced briefly the history of the legislation that brought this question about, the manner in which it has come before the House; and it now only remains for me to say in regard to the Act itself, the details of which I trust we will soon be able to discuss clause by clause, when perhaps I may consider it my duty to take some exception or ask for some amendments with respect to the details, but speaking of the Act as a whole, I consider it to be strictly within the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council, strictly within the lines of the remedial order, going as far as is absolutely necessary in remedying the grievance which is complained of, and going no further. I think the Bill shows proof of great care on the part of the Government in the endeavour on their part to go just as far as the judgment of the Privy Council pointed out it was their duty to go, just as far as it was absolutely necessary to redress the grievance and to apply the remedy, and yet not to interfere with the public schools of Manitoba. And while we hear from the other side of the House, from the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken on the subject and who have declared that the Bill is incomplete, the leader of the Opposition also stating that it granted no relief to the suffering minority and that it would be of no real value to them—a statement also made by two of his followers—we are still bound to say that it does remove the conscientious grievances that were imposed upon them, that it does relieve their consciences from the temptation of which we have heard complaints made and places them on a fair footing, giving them a clear right to educate their own children in their own way and to support their own schools and carry these matters out while at the same time not interfering in the least degree with the regular working of the public schools. These are the two objects which have been kept prominently before this House in the various debates which have taken place here. I think the Government deserve credit for the manner in which they have carried out this policy. We were told by the last speaker (Mr. Lavergne), that the Manitoba government were promising redress, and that in the last general elections the leader of the Liberals there had been charged by the other side with a desire to coquette with the question, and had been charged that if he were returned to power we would grant a remedy. I do not think it is necessary, Sir, to look to an opponent for an explanation of one's intentions. The Liberals in Manitoba gave their own statement, and that statement was emphatic enough. They stated that they would stand by the Act of 1890, and that that was the issue. I will not trouble the House with reading the statements of the Liberal leaders in Manitoba, for they have already been quoted on more than one occasion. The statements were very emphatic, not only those made by Mr. Greenway himself, but those made by Mr. Sifton, in Mr. Greenway's presence. They stated that they would not back down from the School Act which they had passed, that they would not interfere with their public schools, and that they would not re-establish separate schools. It is, therefore, quite unnecessary to quote from the words of the opponent of a political leader, to find out what that political leader means, when he himself makes an unqualified statement of his meaning. We have been told, over and over again, by gentlemen opposite, that every sunny means of conciliation has not been adopted in regard to the government of Manitoba. Well, it is easy to say that "everything" has not been adopted, because it is a very wide expression, and it might include some very fine details that have not been attended to. But have hon. gentlemen opposite who have made these charges, ever pointed out one thing which has been left undone, or one effort that has not been made, which would lead to any different result? It is a well-known thing in practice, in the profession to which I belong, that when a flat refusal is given, there is no necessity of tenders; there is no necessity of begging, and praying, and pressing for a thing to be done if there is once a positive refusal. Now, Sir, on three occasions at least, has the olive branch been held out to the government of Manitoba. Three attempts have been made to get Manitoba to do something, and on each and every occasion the answer has been an unqualified refusal. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, I think it is idle for hon. gentlemen opposite to talk about something possible being done yet. Sir, it is for this House to respect itself. The Remedial Bill is now before it, and if it is the desire of this Parliament to stand by the constitution—and I trust that it is the desire of every member of this House to carry out the constitution to the letter and in the spirit—it is their duty to support this Act. If, in the meantime, before this Act receives a final assent, Manitoba will, as she properly should do, by a statute of her own, grant a remedy and keep the control of education in her own hands, then, Sir, I am sure there is not a member in this House who would not be glad that this Act would become unnecessary and need be pressed no further.

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the National Sanitarium Association.—(Mr. Roome.)

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for second reading of Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba), and the proposed motion (six months' hoist) of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. IVES. As a representative of the Protestant minority of the province of Quebec, I have naturally given a great deal of study to the question as to how the interests of that minority are affected by the question now under discussion. I propose, with the permission of the House, to devote the chief part of the few moments that I intend to speak, to the consideration of that branch of the question more especially. The House is aware that at the time the Quebec conference met to consider whether or not the provinces would agree upon a scheme of confederation, a very serious objection was raised by my distinguished predecessor, Sir Alexander Galt, on behalf of the Quebec minority, more particularly on account of the position in which the minority was likely to be placed in educational matters. The provinces all agreed in demanding that to them should be given the subject of education; and while that seemed to be a necessity, then the position of the minority in the province of Quebec was brought to the attention of the Quebec conference very forcibly by Sir Alexander Galt. The first answer that was made to Sir Alexander Galt's objection was that the Confederation Act, which would necessarily be an Imperial Act, should be made to guarantee, beyond the power of repeal by the Quebec legislature, the 'status quo' in school matters and school laws, as it existed at the time of confederation. That view Sir Alexander Galt protested would not protect the minority, because, under the school law, as it existed at the time of confederation, the governing body was a board known as the Council of Public Instruction; and although it had been before confederation appointed by the Governor in Council of United Canada, it would after confederation be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Quebec; and inasmuch as the sole management, regulation and control of the dissentient schools would rest with that body, and inasmuch as that body might be all Roman Catholics, so far as anything that the minority could do would avail to prevent this, it was felt and represented by Sir Alexander Galt that the 'status quo' in school matters existing at confederation was entirely insecure and unsafe for the Protestant minority. It was then promised to Sir Alex. Galt that in the session which the Parliament of United Canada was to hold before confederation came into force, the law would be amended and changed in such a way as to meet the objection of the Protestant minority of Quebec. In that last session, a serious effort was made by the Government and the Parliament of United Canada to pass a new and more satisfactory educational measure. But that effort did not succeed, and, at the time of the London conference, it seemed to be necessary that some other measure should be taken to protect them, otherwise it was impossible that the Protestants of Quebec could agree to the scheme of confederation. It was then proposed by Sir George Cartier, and our present colleague, Sir Hector Langevin, that they would remain in the legislature of Quebec long enough to have passed by that legislature amendments to the school law which should make safe, secure and satisfactory the position of the Protestant minority of Quebec, and to protect these amendments from subsequent repeal. To make the position of the Protestant minority secure, Sir Alexander Galt, at the London conference, proposed to his colleagues an amendment, which you will find in Mr. Pope's confederation papers, a facsimile of the handwriting of Sir Alexander Galt himself, and that amendment is substantially the provision under which the minority of Manitoba are to-day appealing to the Government and Parliament of Canada. That amendment was inserted, not for Manitoba, not for Roman Catholics even. It was suggested by a Protestant of the Protestants, a representative of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec, and it was designed for the protection of that minority after confederation. That amendment was adopted by the London conference. You will find it in all the drafts which are given in Mr. Pope's book, from the rough draft to the fifth and final one; and you will find it in the British North America Act itself. Sir, this provision was inserted to protect legislation which had not then been passed; it was inserted to protect legislation which Sir George Etienne Cartier and Sir Hector Langevin promised they would see passed and adopted by the legislature in the province of Quebec, in the first or second session after confederation. Such was the good faith between public men of that day, such was the confidence that the Protestants reposed in the two distinguished French-Canadians whose names I have mentioned, that they were willing to trust to these men for the introduction and adoption of the necessary legislation, and all that they asked was, that the Imperial Parliament should provide a clause which would protect the legislation after it was passed. Now, another provision was adopted, not at the London conference, but subsequent to that conference, which appears for the first time in the Imperial Act itself. That provision is a clause which secures to the Protestants the same provisions of law as had been given to the Roman Catholic population of Upper Canada. The way in which I account for the words "shall be, and the same are hereby extended," in the clause to which I am referring, is, that a petition was forwarded to Her Majesty in person at the time the Bill was before the Imperial Parliament, from the Protestant school teachers of Lower Canada. You will find that petition in Mr. Pope's papers. The conclusion of it is as follows:—

Wherefore, your memorialists humbly pray your most gracious Majesty to take their case as above stated into your favourable consideration, with a view to the introduction of proper and just safeguards into the Imperial Act of confederation, should such Act be passed.

They state :

That while your petitioners would prefer a general and non-denominational system of education, they believe that so long as the present system of separate schools shall continue in Lower Canada, they may justly claim the following privileges as constitutional rights, which should in no way depend on the vote of the local legislature:

1. That all direct taxes for the support of schools, paid by Protestants, unless otherwise designated by themselves, should be applied to Protestant or non-denominational education ; and that all public money given for the same purpose should be divided between Protestants and Roman Catholics in proportion to population.

2. That suitable and adequate provision should be made for the protection of the educational interests of Protestants in the management of educational funds, the establishment and proper classification of schools and institutions of superior education, and generally in the administration of educational affairs.

That petition, received by Her Majesty and referred to the Imperial Government, while this Bill was before the Imperial Parliament, unquestionably led to the insertion in the British North America Act of the provisions of that subsection, where it says :

All the powers, privileges and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be, and the same are hereby extended—

These are the words—"are hereby extended."

—to the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

So that the Protestants, at the time of the confederation, by provisions of the 1st subsection of section 93, are constitutionally protected in the possession of the law as it stood at confederation, which practically gave them the right to establish dissentient schools. It gave them the benefit of the law of Ontario, as applied to the separate schools in Ontario. And they had also the promise of the distinguished French-Canadian statesmen, whose names I have mentioned, of amendments by the Quebec legislature, and it gave a constitutional provision protecting this legislation against subsequent repeal.

Now, it would be interesting here to refer for a moment to an article contributed to a volume known as "Canadian Pamphlets," in which Sir Alexander Galt gives his opinion of the position of the Protestants at this time. He says :

The only status, therefore, which we are guaranteed under the Imperial Act of confederation is that existing at its passage. Now, it is well known that this was wholly unsatisfactory to the Protestants, especially in Montreal and Quebec, and an endeavour to pass the requisite amendments made in the last session of the Canadian Parliament was defeated. So important did I regard this defeat, that I resigned my seat in the Government, and declined any greater share of responsibility than was accepted by other Protestant representatives.

However, as it threatened to interpose most serious obstacles to the acceptance of confederation, it was finally agreed, to be satisfied with the assurances of Sir George Cartier and the French-Canadian Roman Catholics following him ; that, at the first session of the local legislature of Quebec, the required legislation should be obtained, and that the local government should be so organized as to ensure this result. Though not a member of the Government, I formed one of the delegation to London, and assisted in the compilation of the Act of confederation ; and on the 1st of February, 1867, when confederation took place, I re-entered the Ministry, and, with the assistance of Sir George Cartier and the Hon. Mr. Langevin, the school Bill, as it now stands, was passed ; but even then it was not attained without great difficulty, as can be testified by all who were acting with me in Quebec at the time.

* * * * * The educational rights of Protestants as respects much of the principle and mode of taxation, separate management and other important points are therefore not secured by the Act of Confederation, but rest upon a provincial statute of Quebec that is subject to repeal.

Now, before referring to the Act passed by Sir George Cartier and his supporters in the province of Quebec, I think it is proper to give you an idea of the law of Quebec and Ontario, respectively, as it stood at the time of confederation, inasmuch as the body of that law is all that is secured to us by article 1 of the constitution. The law of Quebec at the time of confederation, in a few words, was this : The Governor in Council appointed the Council of Public Instruction which consisted of not more than fifteen, and not less than eleven persons, and the Superintendent of Education made one of their number. This council had power to make, from time to time, with the approval of the Governor in Council, such regulations as they deemed expedient for the organization, government and discipline of the schools, and the classification of schools and teachers. They had also power to select, with the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, such books, maps, and globes as could be used in the schools, and to exclude all others. They had power also to make rules and regulations for the guidance of the Board of Examiners of teachers; also power to revoke teachers' certificates. There were provisions for the establishment of dissentient schools by meetings of Protestant heads of families, similar to those which applied to separate schools in Ontario, and they had a right to share in the legislative grants. These, in the main, were the leading features of the Lower Canada law, a board appointed after confederation by a Catholic Governor and a Catholic Council, and which might be, were bitter feelings to arise, entirely composed of Catholics. This board had the power of controlling the organization, management and maintenance of all Protestant schools; had the power to impose any sort of text books they saw fit upon those schools; had power in Quebec of making those schools inoperative and so distasteful that they would not be used. Under that law, the Protestants of Quebec could be very easily placed in the same position in which a man would be who was living in a comfortable house with his family, but in a house where another man owns the doors, and windows, and the staircases. They could be very easily placed by the Catholic majority of Quebec in just as uncomfortable a position as this man would be in if the owner came and took out the doors, and windows, and staircases. The house would be left; so the dissentient schools would be left, but the machinery by which those schools would be worked could be made absolutely inoperative. Now, if you go to the school law of Ontario, or Upper Canada, as it existed at the time of confederation, you find there also that any number of persons, not less than five, being heads of families, freeholders, or householders, residing within any school section, or any township, incorporated village, or town, or within any ward of any city or town, and being Roman Catholics, could convene a public meeting of persons desiring separate schools for Roman Catholics, for the election of trustees for the management of the same. This meeting could elect three persons to act as trustees, and one of these could give notice to the reeve, or head of the municipality, or chairman of the board of common schools, of the election of such trustees. Thereupon, the trustees became a body corporate. They had power to impose, levy, and collect rates or subscriptions from persons sending children to the separate schools; and they were empowered to perform the same duties with regard to separate schools as the trustees of common schools. Separate school teachers were made subject to the same examinations, and received their certificates of qualification in the same manner as the common school teachers did. Supporters of separate schools were exempted from the payment of common school rates, upon giving notice, and any Roman Catholic who desired, might withdraw his support from the separate schools by giving the notice prescribed by law. Every separate school was entitled to share in the funds annually granted by the legislature for the support of common schools, according to the average number of pupils attending such schools during the twelve next preceding months; but the separate schools were not entitled to any portion of common school moneys, and were free from local assessments for common school purposes. The trustees were required to send to the Chief Superintendent of Education a correct return of the number of children attending each school, with the average attendance during the next preceding six months, and upon this return, the Chief Superintendent determined the proportion which the trustees of each separate school were entitled to receive out of the legislative grant, and the grant was payable monthly to the trustees of each school for that school. The Roman Catholic separate schools were subject to inspection, as provided from time to time by the Chief Superintendent of Education, and were subject, also, to such regulations as were imposed, from time to time, by the Council of Public Instruction. In the event of disagreement between trustees of separate schools and the local superintendent of common schools, or other municipal authority, the case in dispute was referred to the arbitration of the Superintendent of Education. The Council of Public Instruction, to whose regulations the separate schools were subject, was appointed by the Governor in Council, and held office during pleasure. It consisted of not more than nine persons, who, in the exercise of their duties, were subject to the lawful orders and regulations of the Governor in Council, and they had power to make such regulations as they deemed expedient for the organization, government and discipline of the schools, and for the classification of the teachers; and they had power also to recommend or disapprove of text books to be used in these schools. Now, under this Ontario system, the same fatal defect, if you apply its provisions to Quebec, existed, as exists in the case of the Quebec law itself, there was no provision for a Catholic board or a Catholic committee; there was no provision for any special Catholic management of those Catholic schools. The public schools of Ontario, as they existed at confederation, were governed by a board which might all be Protestants, which probably were nearly all Protestants, and by a Protestant Superintendent of Education. When you come to apply those principles to the province of Quebec, you are in precisely the same situation that you are in if you are using the Catholic machinery of Lower Canada. You have the board appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and that board entirely controls the schools, and that board may be entirely a Catholic board. Now, what was gained by inserting the words in the second subsection of section 93 of the British North America Act, which brought the Ontario law into effect, and applied it to the Protestants of the province of Quebec, I have so far failed to see. The machinery, perhaps, was a little more perfect for taxation and assessment; in the case of the examination of certificates of teachers, it was a little better; but otherwise, in its main features, it was practically one and the same thing if applied to the Protestants of Quebec.

I go on to note the legislation which was passed in 1869 by the legislature of the province of Quebec, before Sir George Cartier and Sir Alexander Galt and Sir Hector Langevin left that legislature. The legislature of that province made these important amendments. They provided for a large board to compose the Council of Public Instruction. They provided that a certain number on that board should be Protestants, and they provided that the entire control and management of Protestant schools should be given to and exercised by the Protestant members of the Committee of Public Instruction for the province of Quebec. Here you have the turning point, the vital point in the whole system. The school books, the rate of taxation, the methods of conducting the schools, the grading of the schools, everything connected with the schools was placed in the hands of Protestants themselves, and have remained there ever since. Not only was that overwhelmingly important change made, but we were given great advantages in other directions. For example, the superior education fund was divided in a manner much more beneficial and satisfactory to Protestants. Prior to the passing of this law, our colleges and higher schools had to apply to the Superintendent of Education for the necessary funds. He gave them whatever he thought they should have, subject to the approval of the board. There was no settled basis on which we shared in the fund for superior education, there was no fixed rule by which our colleges and higher institutions received aid. This Act cured that defect, and it gave us such a proportion of the total funds as our population bore to the total population of the province of Quebec, an equitable and easily understood basis of division. In the cities of Montreal and Quebec, prior to the statute of 1869, the Protestant schools only received, in Montreal one-fourth of what Protestants contributed in the way of school taxes, and in Quebec only two-thirds of what Protestants contributed. That was an actual provision of the old law; hon. members will find it in the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, chapter 15. Why it was so fixed, I do not know; but the result of the statute of 1869 was to give the Protestants of Montreal, not one-fourth, but the proportion to which the population of the city entitled them, and the proportion allowed to Quebec was not two-thirds, but that proportion to which their population entitled them. There were other matters of minor importance dealt with, but with which I would hardly be justified in taking up the time of the House. I have already shown that the Act of 1869 is valuable as regards the interests of the Protestants of Quebec. Some amendments to the Act have been made since. One was made in 1888, giving the school teachers of the province of Quebec the right to elect one of the members of the Council of Public Instruction, a most valuable provision to the educationists of the province; and all these provisions hang upon a clause, almost similar, word for word and letter for letter, with the clause in the Manitoba Bill we are now discussing.

Do you wonder, then, Mr. Speaker, that as representing the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec, I take a great interest in this question, and that I would protest against any action of this Parliament which would be in the direction of holding this clause as inoperative, and one that cannot be used because it would be coercion of the province and an interference with the autonomy of the province. Will you tell me of any case where this clause ever would be required, if the local government, seeing what it had done and the injustice committed, was ready to rectify a wrong? This was put into the constitution to meet such a case as this, and will it be said that, when the majority refuses to give way, and refuses to restore rights, when it refuses to do justice for five years consecutively, and the minority appeals to us, as they have a right to do under the constitution, we are to shut the door in their faces, because, forsooth, it is interfering with the autonomy of the province to act upon the plain provisions of the law in the protection of minorities? It seems to me the greatest possible absurdity to say that it is coercion for this Parliament to exercise the powers specially conferred upon it by the constitution itself. Anyway, whatever you do, do not fail to know this, that, if you refuse to call into exercise the power you unquestionably possess in the case of Manitoba, you may have before many years go by to hear an appeal from the Protestants of the province of Quebec. What would be more natural than for that province to say: If we cannot make you listen in one way, we will try and make you listen in another; if you cannot, without this step being taken by us, listen to justice, then we propose to repeal the legislation passed on the subject of education in the province of Quebec. Then we come here, a minority as numerous as the majority of Manitoba is, a minority owning a very large proportion of the property in the province of Quebec, a minority to which belong some of the most distinguished of the citizens of the province, with an appeal to have our rights restored to us. What are you going to do? How are you going to constitutionally act on our petition and give us a restitution of our rights, if you have refused to hear the prayer of the minority in the province of Manitoba? You cannot blow hot and cold. You cannot act so inconsistently as that. If you hold to-day, that hands must be kept off Manitoba, that you must not interfere with Manitoba, if you hold it to be coercion to exercise this power in the case of Manitoba, then, what can you say, you Protestants, you Orangemen, who are always so much to be relied upon to protect the rights of Protestants, not only here, but in Ireland, and everywhere—how are you going to protect us? I asked the question of one of the most distinguished members in this House prominent in the Orange body: "What are you going to do, when we come here with an appeal?" "Oh," he said, "we will take care of that." "But," I said, "I cannot rely upon that; I cannot rely upon your simple statement that you will take care of us. How are you going to take care of us? Are you coming down with force to restore us our rights, are you going to take care of us by armed means, or how?" Well, Sir, I got no satisfactory answer from the hon. gentleman, and I said to him: I cannot go back to the Protestants of the province of Quebec and say to them: We did not grant the petition of the minority in Manitoba, but I have got the assurance of the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Wallace), that he and the members of the Orange body will take care of us, when the trouble comes.

Sir, there is only one way in which the Parliament of Canada can take care of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec, and that is, to enforce the constitutional provisions inserted in the constitution to protect the minorities all over this Dominion. The Manitoba minority, if I understand it, ask for nothing but their rights, and I hope that the minority of the province of Quebec will never ask for anything more than their rights. I believe that if justice is done in this case, we shall never hear any appeal from the minority of Quebec, nor any reason for an appeal.

I was exceedingly pleased this morning when I took up the "Citizen" to observe that Sir Oliver Mowat has given to the country his views upon this important subject, in a resolution in the Ontario legislature. If you will study the resolution, you will find that Sir Oliver admits that it is established by the judgment of the Privy Council that the Manitoba School Act of 1890 deprives the Roman Catholics of rights and privileges in relation to education. You will find, also, that he admits that the Manitoba legislature should remove the grievance by supplementary legislation. You will find, also, that he says that Ontario, though opposed to separate schools by a large majority, always recognizes its constitutional duty to give effect, by provincial legislation and otherwise, to the provisions of the constitution on the subject. Sir Oliver Mowat says it is much preferable that Manitoba should deal with the subject. He says that remedial legislation by the Dominion should be the last resort. He deprecates hasty action by the Dominion, and he thinks there should first be a thorough investigation of the facts by the Dominion. Now, Sir, with all these statements of Sir Oliver Mowat, excepting the last one, I heartily concur, and I commend them to the careful reading and the close study of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not find that Sir Oliver Mowat has anything to say about drastic remedial orders. I do not find that he has anything to say about the inadequacy of the present Remedial Bill. I do not hear him say that it is a proper thing to reject this measure on the second reading, because, forsooth, it is not strong enough, as the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) said last night. Sir, Oliver Mowat simply says—and that is the only point of difference between him and this Government—that the question is: whether now, or a little later, for remedial legislation. Now, this resolution of Sir Oliver's makes it very plain who is guiding the destinies of the Liberal party all over this broad Dominion at the present moment. We find that a resolution was introduced in the Manitoba legislature a few days ago, to which Sir Oliver refers in his resolution. We found, a few weeks ago, that there was a sudden change of base by the leader of the Opposition, when he announced this policy of a commission of investigation. I am happy to know, Sir, that so good a man, and so loyal a man, and so safe a man, as Sir Oliver Mowat is steering the Liberal ship at this time. It is surprising, how near the two parties are together at the present moment, upon this question. Sir Oliver says that a grievance exists which ought to be remedied by the province of Manitoba. This Government says so too. Sir Oliver says that the Dominion should only interfere as the last resort. We say so too. He says that he wants to have further investigation, but we say that five years is sufficient to ask the Manitoba minority to wait for a remedy for their grievances. Now, you will find, if you study carefully this resolution, that Sir Oliver wants to investigate what, and the hon. leader of the Opposition wants to investigate what? The leader of the Opposition wanted to investigate whether there was a compact when Manitoba came into the confederation that she should have separate schools. He wanted to investigate whether the minority in Manitoba really in their conscience did not like these schools that Mr. Greenway had established ; and he wanted to investigate as a third point whether these schools were Protestant schools or Catholic schools. That is the whole trouble that has for many years afflicted the leader of the Opposition. Now, if you will look at the clause in question of the British North America Act, you will find there what it is that gives rise to this appeal, and if you examine what it is that gives rise to this appeal, you will find exactly what there is to investigate. What is it which gives rise to this appeal ? The British North America Act says :

Where in any province, a system of separate or dissentient schools exist by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

That is what the right of appeal is based on. If you look at the Manitoba Act you will find it is more brief :

An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council, from any Act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

Now, what have you to investigate. You have simply to investigate whether the legislature of the province of Manitoba have passed any Act which affects any right or privilege of the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba in relation to education. That is all you have to investigate. Whether these schools are Protestant schools, or whether they are Catholic schools, has nothing to do with it. The only question to be investigated is the one simple question : whether the Act of 1890 affected any right or privilege of the Catholic minority of Manitoba in relation to education. That is the only question, and the lords of the Privy Council have settled that question. And when it comes to the subject of the investigation, who wants this further information ? Surely Mr. Greenway does not want any further information. He lives on the spot ; he passed the Act. He surely was familiar with the Norquay system of education adopted in the statutes of 1871 or 1872. Mr. Greenway knows what Acts were repealed ; he knows what Act he passed to repeal those Acts ; he knows whether or not that Act affected the rights of the minority of Manitoba in relation to education. What does he want an investigation for ? The French Liberals do not want any investigation, because they have already made up their minds that the present Bill is not strong enough. The Government do not require any investigation ; they are satisfied ; they have rendered their judgment, and that judgment is in accordance with the judgment of the Privy Council. The irreconcilables in this House do not want any information, because if you were to pump information into them for a hundred years, they would still be opposed to separate schools, and would not want anything done. Then, who wants further information ? For what reason should further information be obtained ? We know, on the other hand, that if this question is not settled in this House at this session, it becomes a question in the next general election ; and if so, does not that increased a hundredfold the danger to the fabric of confederation which the hon. leader of the Opposition referred to in his speech ? Does the hon. gentleman for any political purpose, want to keep this sore open, this question unsettled ? Is he gaining by it ? Does he find his present position happy, when he has actually to dragoon some of his followers into supporting him ? Does he want to go to the country with this question unsettled ?

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Mr. IVES. I do not think he does. I do not think he is wise if he wants this question kept open. Surely Mr. Greenway can afford a remedy. Mr. Greenway's legislature is now convened ; Mr. Greenway is there ; Mr. Greenway can adopt any remedy he thinks right and proper, and can pass it long before we get out of committee on this Bill. The Government of this country are not anxious to interfere with this question. I admit with Sir Oliver Mowat that our interference should be the last resort ; but we do not think, from anything we have seen, that either Mr. Greenway or Mr. Laurier or the Liberal party, who have been making a football of this question for the last five years, are anxious to have it settled. We think the responsibility rests upon us to do justice to the minority of Manitoba, who have waited five years for justice. We do not propose to make those people a football of the politicians for another year or two years ; and if the hon. gentleman's policy is further investigation, why did he move the six months' hoist, during which there can be no investigation ? Why did he not propose his own motion, based on the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat, for a commission ? Why, indeed ? Because his irreconcilable supporters in this House would not vote for it. I say, Mr. Speaker, that when the two great parties in this House are so nearly agreed upon this matter as to make it merely a question of when—whether now or a few weeks or a few months from now—we should settle this question. It is the duty of all parties to join together and agree upon a settlement of the question. The hon. leader of the Opposition the other day referred to questions that have divided us in the past. He referred to perhaps the most difficult and exciting of all questions we have ever had in this House—the question of the Jesuits Estates Act. What was the result on that question? The combination of the wise men on both sides of this House resulted in limiting the number of those who united against that Bill to thirteen; and when it was found that the two parties united to do the proper thing in regard to that question, there was no excitement in the country; the whole matter was settled. And if the hon. leader of the Opposition and his followers would do as they want to do, as their consciences tell them they ought to do, as many of them are begging permission to do—join us in the settlement of this question—they would find themselves a great deal more comfortable when they go home at Easter, and we should have this vexed question removed from the sphere of current politics.

Mr. McNEILL. As one of those irreconcilables who want more information, may I ask my hon. friend a question? Was there something in the nature of a compact between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario with regard to separate schools? Was it understood that if separate schools were granted to the minority in Ontario, separate schools would be granted to the minority in Quebec?

Mr. IVES. I am not aware that there was ever any compact. They were granted long before confederation.

Mr. McNEILL. Was it not one of the understandings?

Mr. IVES. It may have been, but I am not aware of it.

Mr. McNEILL. Is it not notorious that when Sir Alexander Galt proposed separate schools for the minority of Quebec, the reply was that if the minority of Ontario received separate schools, separate schools would be granted to the minority of Quebec?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No, it is not.

Mr. McNEILL. I have always understood that there was something in the nature of a compact of that kind. I have heard it stated in this House, and it has never been contradicted before.

Mr. LAURIER. No investigation is wanted. They are ready to proceed. You are too inquisitive altogether.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss this question, I wish to say that the views I hold in regard to it are not dictated by the least feeling of hostility to my Catholic fellow-subjects or my French fellow-subjects in this country. I am glad to say that on this question I have no religious bigotry and no race feeling at all. We all admit that this question is one of the utmost importance, and that it is exciting great interest all over this Dominion. We know that there are great differences of opinion on this question. I admit frankly that there are sincere differences of opinion. I do not claim any more sincerity for myself in holding the opinion I do on the question than I allow to those who differ from me. I believe that the members of this House who differ from me on this question are just as sincere in holding their views as I am in holding mine. I have no fault to find with them. My object in rising is to state my own position and to give my reasons for the views I hold and for the vote I intend to give. I admit frankly that this question is a most difficult question for any Government to deal with, I care not what Government is in power. It happens at the present time that the government in power is the Liberal-Conservative Government. They have to deal with this question, and they find it a difficult question to deal with. But, Sir, it would be just as difficult a question for the Liberal party to deal with if they were in power. They would find themselves confronted with the same difficulties that the present government are confronted with. Because this is one of those questions on which there always have been and always will be differences of opinion—differences which in a country like ours it seems impossible to reconcile. We have a most difficult country for any government to govern on questions of this kind. We have the province of Ontario, which is strongly Protestant; we have the province of Quebec, which is strongly Catholic; and when questions such as this arise, it is inevitable that there should be differences of opinion, and very strong differences of opinion. It is a little unfortunate too that some questions, in recent years, have stirred up these feelings perhaps more than they should be stirred up. I say that this is a most difficult question for the Government to deal with, and they have my sympathy in dealing with it. I am very much pleased at the manner in which it has been discussed in this House. No one can find fault with that, and I shall endeavour to discuss it equally in a manner at which no one can cavil. Before entering on my subject I wish to say a word or two about the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition. We all admit that he made an eloquent and brilliant speech; but it seemed to me that while speaking, he felt most keenly the difficult position he occupies in trying to please the two opposing camps in his own party. He seemed to feel that he was treading between pitfalls, into any one of which he ran the risk of dropping at any moment, and it was amusing to watch the agility with which he steered clear of these pitfalls. I found the leader of the Opposition making a strong plea for further delay on this question, but I found him at the same time strongly condemning the Government for not having acted in this matter more promptly. I cannot reconcile these contradictory propositions; I leave that task to the hon. gentleman and his followers.

I suppose that I am one of the irreconcilables alluded to by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives), and I must admit that I want no further investigation or information. This question has been before this House, in one way or another, for five years; and I think most of us are pretty well informed on it. We know enough, at any rate, to give an independent vote and make up our minds as to how we are going to vote, and I want no further delay, no investigation, no commission, which would result in putting off the settlement of this matter and keeping it before the country perhaps a few years longer. I want it settled now without any further delay. The hon. leader of the Opposition spoke a good deal about the policy of conciliation. He blamed the Government for not having endeavoured to deal more gently with the government of Manitoba. In fact it seems to me as if those who advocate so strongly this policy of conciliation look upon the Manitoba government as a lot of children who must be coaxed into doing something, but must not be told plainly the facts of the case, who must be approached very gently and humbly and coaxed into something they think they ought not to do. I take no stock in this policy of conciliation, but at the same time I must say that those who advocate it have no reason to find fault with the Government. It is said that the Order in Council issued at first was harsh in its tone. It is said, on the contrary, and I have no doubt it is so, that it was issued in accordance with the judgment of the Privy Council. But subsequent to the issuing of the Order in Council, there had been milder messages sent by this Government to the Manitoba government, and I am free to say that if conciliation on the part of this Government could have accomplished anything, the whole question would have been settled and not have come before this House at all.

As I said when I rose, I wish to state my position frankly on the question. It is no new one in this House. When Sir John Thompson became Premier, I wrote him a letter in which I assured him of my support in carrying out the main policy of the Conservative party, but, at the same time, I told him plainly that in case remedial legislation was introduced, I would be compelled to vote against it. In speaking on the amendment introduced into this House by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) in 1893, condemning the Government for their policy on this question, I supported the Government, and I stated then plainly that if a Bill of this kind were introduced I would vote against it. Last year I stated my position on the question, so that it is no surprise to the Government and my constituents, and therefore I have no hesitation in saying that my position to-day is what it was then, and that I am constrained to vote against this Bill.

It is contended that Parliament is not legally bound but is morally bound and bound in honour to pass this legislation; and that is the question to which I propose to devote the most of my remarks. Are we in honour bound to pass this remedial legislation? I do not want to weary the House going over the facts; but as I wish to make my speech as connected as possible I will just recite again the facts which have been recited over and over again in this House. I shall recite them most briefly, and in everything I shall say endeavour to confine myself most strictly to the subject and make my remarks as brief as possible. Look at the case once more. Manitoba had no school system by law before the union. After the union, the system of separate schools was established and separate schools granted the minority in that province. We find that these separate schools were abolished in 1890, by the same power that established them, and a system of public schools was then established. The minority asked to have this Act disallowed. The Dominion Government refused to disallow it. And here I say that for this I give the Dominion Government great credit. No doubt, great pressure was brought at that time to bear on the Government to disallow the Manitoba Act of 1890, but the Government took the ground that they would not disallow it, and I was very much pleased to hear Sir John Thompson declare that not only did the Government not disallow the Act but never had the slightest intention of disallowing it. In that I supported him most cordially. But what is the position of some hon. members opposite?

Mr. McMILLAN. Speak for yourself.

Mr. CRAIG. What position did the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) take? He took the ground that the Government should have disallowed the Act. Well, I approved of the Government in not disallowing it. That is the reason for his condemnation. In the speech he made in 1893, when moving his amendment condemning the Government, the whole point of his speech was this, that the Government had not disallowed the Act of 1890. Whether his friends agree with him, he knows better than I; but in a speech delivered the other day by the leader of the Opposition, we find him touching on this question of disallowance, and while he did not say—because, I suppose, he thought it was not good policy at this time—that the Government should have disallowed the Act, yet he almost said so, and hinted strongly in that direction. He said there were two other Acts disallowed at the time, which did not conflict so much with the Dominion Parliament, and which were not Acts that should have been disallowed any more than this school Act. I do not know what his own secret opinion is, but he gave me the impression that he wished to leave on the mind of his Quebec supporters the idea that he would have been in favour of disallowing the Act. This Act was not disallowed and was then carried to the courts. The Privy Council's decision, as we all know, was that the Act of the Government was intra vires, that in passing the Act of 1890, the Manitoba legislature had kept entirely within its own power. The next step in the proceedings was this: Under a section of the Manitoba Act, the minority appealed to the Dominion Government for relief. They said they had a grievance, and they asked the Dominion Government to listen to their appeal. The Dominion Government were not quite sure that this was a case which came under this section of the Act, that it was a case which came within their right to hear the appeal, and referred the point to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court decided that this was not a case which came under this section of the Act providing for an appeal. The matter was carried to the Privy Council, and they decided that this Government could hear the appeal. I am not a lawyer and am not talking as a lawyer, but judging by what I have heard from gentlemen of the legal profession, who have studied the question, I hold that this judgment of the Privy Council saying that they had this right was not properly a judgment, but merely an opinion upon this section of the Act. They said that this was a case in which the Government had the right to hear the appeal. Well, Sir, the Government did hear the appeal, and passed the remedial order.

Now, I come to the point which I wish more especially to discuss. It was held, and it is held that the Government were bound to pass this remedial order. I do not agree with that opinion. I hold that the Government had to hear this appeal, but they were not bound, either morally or legally, to make any remedial order; in other words, while they were bound to hear the appeal, they were not bound to grant what was asked for. It is asked: What, then, is the good of the right of appeal to the minority? It was this good, that it gave them the right to bring their case before the Government, to state the facts, and to argue the case and show reasons why, in their opinion, relief should be given. But did it follow as a matter of course that they had a right to have their appeal granted? This I hold to be one of the crucial points in the argument of those who favour remedial legislation. They hold that it followed, as a matter of course, that the minority had a right to have their appeal granted. That I cannot admit. I admit that the Government had the power to advise Parliament to apply a remedy if they thought the circumstances of the case warranted it, but only on that condition. The Government must consider, and Parliament must consider the whole circumstances of the case, and if they decided that a remedy should be granted, they were perfectly right to grant it. Now, I wish to say further, and, to my mind, it is an argument that cannot be refuted: By the constitution, separate schools established before the union could not be taken away; I think we all admit that. But if separate schools established after the union by any provincial legislature could not be taken away, then I say that should have been distinctly stated in the Act. If it was the intention of the Manitoba Act that separate schools established by the legislature after the union could not be taken away, that should have been stated. But I do not find it stated at all. I find it stated that if these separate schools are taken away, the minority have the right to bring their case before the Government and Parliament, and ask for a remedy. The argument is that, while the Manitoba legislature had the right to abolish these schools, this Parliament is morally bound to restore them. If that is so, the argument ceases. If we have no right to look at the question in a political light, which I hold is the proper light in which to regard a question like this affecting the interest, not of Manitoba alone, but of the whole Dominion, there is no use of argument. I should judge, from his speech, that the leader of the Opposition thinks that Manitoba is morally bound to restore separate schools. I do not agree with that position; I do not think that separate schools should be established at all. The hon. gentleman did not state this opinion distinctly, but from the tenor of his speech, I gather that he holds that opinion. The argument of those who favour this Bill is that a province in which separate schools were established before the union cannot get rid of those schools—and that, I think, we all admit—and that a province in which they are established after confederation cannot get rid of them either. No matter what change takes place, no matter how small the minority in the province may become, separate schools cannot be got rid of, because this Parliament is morally bound to restore them. Putting the case in that way destroys the whole force of the argument, to my mind.

The Government did make a remedial order, and Manitoba refused to obey it. The Government, last session, did not press remedial legislation upon this House, but made a pledge that it would be brought down and pressed this session, and to-day we have a Bill before the House. I have no intention of discussing the details of the Bill at the present time. It is said to be a mild Bill. It is said to be so mild that it will not give any relief to the minority. I was amused and a little surprised at the speech of the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), and at his criticism of the Bill. He did not hesitate to tell us that the reason he was going to vote for the six months' hoist was that he considered the Bill not strong enough, and that, even if passed, it would be of no use. He says: I promised that I would vote for remedial legislation, but I am not going to vote for a Remedial Bill that does not give a remedy, therefore, I am going to vote to throw the Bill out. And he went further. He said that he preferred to wait and get a better Bill from his own leader. When the hon. gentleman said that, I saw the hon. leader of the Opposition change countenance. I saw that he felt that while he himself had very cleverly dodged all these troublesome issues, yet his own follower, in his first speech in this House had clearly spoken his views, and had announced that he was going to vote against this Bill because it was not a Remedial Bill at all, and gave no relief to his suffering compatriots in Manitoba.

Mr. FOSTER. But suppose that you help to get his leader in ?

Mr. CRAIG. Well, I may say frankly that I shall be very sorry to get his leader in. And I say further, that while I esteem his leader very highly, I should be still sorrier to get that hon. gentleman in if he were going to carry out the promise or the implied promise of the hon. member for Verchères. But, however mild this Bill may be—and I am prepared to say that it is a very mild Bill, I think it is about as mild a Bill as it could be to be a Bill at all—the reason I object to it and the reason I vote against it, is that however mild it is, it restores the system of separate schools in Manitoba, and that is a principle I cannot support. Now, if it were true that Parliament was morally bound, bound in honour, to pass this Bill and grant this relief, that would be a very strong plea. It is not argued that Parliament is legally bound, but if it is morally bound, that is a stronger plea even than to say that it is legally bound. Now, are we so bound? What are the reasons given? Well, I have not heard many reasons given, because I think it is pretty hard to find any very strong reasons. But I have noted down one or two reasons, and one is that the Manitoba Act was the result of a bargain, that it was understood that separate schools were to be guaranteed to the minority. Well, Sir, I have not been able yet to come across any proof that there was any such bargain. But I will say, that, if we could find such a bargain, if we knew that there was such a bargain, then my mouth would be closed. But there is no proof of this fact, and, therefore, I cannot accept any such statement. But, Sir, another argument is, that this clause in the British North America Act giving an appeal, was put in for the protection of the Protestants of Quebec, and that confederation could not have been accomplished without it. Well, that may be the case; but, at the same time, I do not suppose that the fathers of confederation could look forward and see all the circumstances that would arise; and as I said before, if it was contemplated by them that separate schools, as they were established before the union, or after the union, could never be taken away, then they failed to express their opinion on that point. Now, I want to refer for a moment to a matter that has been often spoken about in reference to this Bill. It is said, that, if we refuse to pass this Bill, then the legislature of Quebec could take away some of the privileges of the Protestants, and, if they were to come here and ask for relief, we would have to refuse to grant it, because we had refused in this case. Now, Sir, that may appear to be a good argument, but I hold it is no argument, on the ground I take, because I hold that every case must be considered on its own merits. But I go further than that, and I say, that the cases are not parallel in any sense of the word. And why? For this reason, that there is no similarity at all between the public schools of Quebec and the public schools of Ontario, which, I suppose, are similar to the public schools of Manitoba. Why, Sir, what do we find all over the province of Ontario? We find Catholics going to the public schools; we find no objection on their part. We do not find that their consciences receive any wrench at all. I know that in my own town, where we never distinguish between Catholics and Protestants, they go to the same school together; they study together; they grow up together; there is no difficulty at all. But, when we go to the province of Quebec, what do we find? We find that the public schools there are really religious schools, and are schools to which a Protestant could not send his children, because a great part of the time, or, at least, a good deal of the time, is taken up with religious instruction and religious instruction in the tenets of the Catholic Church. Now, Sir, I say it would be an outrage to suppose that Protestants should send their children to schools like that, and I do not suppose that Catholics would want them to do it, either. Well, a great deal has been said about the generosity of the Catholics of the province of Quebec; and, while I rejoice that this is the case, at the same time I hold, that those who base an argument on that, altogether lose sight of the fact that I have just alluded to, namely, that the schools are entirely different in character to the public schools of Ontario. The public schools of Manitoba, as I understand, are religious schools in no sense of the word. There may be some very slight religious exercises at the beginning of the school, but you cannot call them religious schools. But the public schools of Quebec are religious schools in every sense of the word, and they are Catholic schools in every sense of the word, as well; and, while I make no objection to that, I say it would be absurd to compare the two classes of schools and to suppose that there would be the same objection to Catholic children going to the schools of Ontario or Manitoba, as there would be to Protestant children going to the schools of the majority in the province of Quebec. Now, Sir, this question, after all, is too serious a matter to be decided by suppositions or imaginary bargains, or any conjectures at all. I hold, that on this question we must be guided by the facts, we must examine all the circumstances of the case. Now, the first decision of the Privy Council declared that no rights enjoyed by the minority at the time of the union were taken away. Now, that is a point on which I lay a great emphasis. I think, from my point of view, that is a most important declaration, that the Privy Council, after hearing argument with reference to the School Act of 1890, declared that no rights the minority had at the time of union were taken away. Well, then, the second decision said that the minority had a grievance. Now, a great deal of stress is laid on this word "grievance." As I said, I am not a lawyer, but I have been given to understand by lawyers, and men who are skilled in their interpretation, and men who have studied the facts, that this word "grievance" does not really mean that a great wrong is done to these people, but it means this, that something had been done to them which gave them a right of appeal, and I understand that is as far as it goes. I do not pronounce on that, because I am not in a position to do so. But I hold, that that word "grievance" means here that something had been taken away from them which gave them a right of appeal to the Governor General in Council. Now, Sir, I ask, is this grievance such a one as warrants us in imposing on Manitoba remedial legislation? That is the question that comes to my mind. I know there are many members of this House who say it is; but, to my mind, the answer is, no. I am not able to answer this question in the affirmative; if I was, I would vote in support of the Bill. I was rather amused, last night, in listening to the speech of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), in referring to the position taken by the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion). The member for Verchères objected to this Bill because it does not give enough; and the member for Bellechasse said that reminded him of a man who should come to you hungry, and you should say to him: Well, my friend, I would like to give you a meal. I have got a loaf here, but it is not quite enough for a meal, and, therefore, I will not give you anything. He said the Government were offering remedial legislation, and the member for Verchères says: Well, this Bill may give some remedial legislation, but it does not give enough, so I will vote against it. Now, I ask: Is this grievance such a one as warrants us in imposing remedial legislation on Manitoba? To my mind, it is not. While there may be a grievance, I hold that it is not such as would warrant us in imposing remedial legislation on Manitoba. Now, are we in honour bound to redress this grievance? We have the power; does our honour require us to use this power? Let us see what the minority lose. Did they lose the right to educate their children as they saw fit? Some say they did; they say they lost the right to educate their children as they saw fit; that they wished to teach them religion, and they were deprived of that right. But what they did lose was the right to have the state aid in teaching religion. No one wishes to deprive them of the right to teach religion to their children; all the Act of 1890 says is, that, if they wish to teach religion to their children, they must pay for it themselves, and by that Act they have lost the aid of the state in educating their children in their own way. They lost the right to control any state-aided schools. Now, there is no doubt that what the minority want is control of their schools. I find no fault with them for that, I find no fault with them for asking that certain things be given them; that is their own business. All I am concerned with is the question, whether this is a case in which I should vote to interfere with Manitoba, and to pass a law overriding that which they have passed. Did the minority suffer by the change? Are the public schools less efficient? Do their children receive an inferior education? Sir, I answer all these questions in the negative. I hold that the minority did not suffer at all by the provincial legislation. It is said that they suffer in their conscience. Well, I do not know whether they do or not. I have no evidence on that point. It has been said they do, but I am not at all clear, because, judging from what I see of the Catholics in my own province, I hardly think this would be the case. Are the public schools Protestant? Now, this is a great point. I think it was referred to by the leader of the Opposition as one of the points that ought to be investigated. But I remember, two or three years ago, when he made a speech on this question, and his whole speech was based on the supposition that these schools were Protestant. He said, that, if these schools were Protestant, then there ought to be redress. Well, Sir, I agree with that. But from what I have learned, these schools are not Protestant in the true sense of the word. The schools are public schools, and the Privy Council expressly declared that they were not Protestant and not sectarian in any sense of the word, that while there are certain religious exercises given there, they cannot be called Protestant schools? What, then is the grievance? As I have said, the minority seek the control of their schools and to teach religion in them to their children. They say they have lost this right. So they have. They ask to have it restored, to be able to control their schools and to teach religion in them to their children. In reply I say this: I respect every man's religion and I have no desire to interfere with the way in which any man worships God—that is his own business, it is not my business. I am glad I live in a country where there is freedom of conscience. I do not know any country where more than in Canada there is re-religious freedom ; I have no sympathy with religious bigotry and intolerance, and I have no fault to find with any man on account of his religion. But the state is not called upon to teach religion. It is outside of its business entirely. Why, if the state is called upon to teach religion, and you carry that argument to its logical conclusion, where do you land ? The state will have to tell us what church we must attend before long ? If religion must be taught, then a religious test for teachers must be employed. But that test is never imposed in the public schools of Ontario and in the public schools in Manitoba. So I lay down in answer to that idea, this, that if teaching religion in the schools is to be carried on they must teach it in their own schools, and pay for it themselves, but I am entirely opposed to the state teaching religion at all. But, Sir, are we bound in honour to say to Manitoba : You have passed a law abolishing separate schools ; you know best what your country requires, nearly all your people endorse your action, but we are bound in honour to restore the separate school system in Manitoba ? Shall we say that ? Are we bound in honour to override the legislation of the province ? It is said we are not overriding it, but I hold that this Bill does override it, in this way, that the separate schools have been abolished, and it is claimed that we are in honour bound to restore them. Shall we say to Manitoba : We are bound in honour to believe the majority of your people desire to oppress the minority ; we are bound in honour to override the expressed wish of the great majority of your people. It is said that this is one way to promote peace and harmony. Sir, I hold the very opposite. It is said by some : Only pass this Bill and then the whole question will be settled. I hold that if this Bill is passed by this House and becomes the law of the country, instead of peace and harmony we will find strife and faction. We will find in Manitoba resistance to the enforcement of this Act, and I believe we will find, and I shall be sorry to find it, in Ontario that instead of the question being settled, it will assume still greater prominence, and I believe the people of the province, so far as I know them, will be indignant at a law having been passed overriding the law of Manitoba and restoring separate schools in that province. It is said that patriotism requires us to pass this Bill. I think patriotism requires us to leave the question to the people of Manitoba ; and I say here and I believe this, and I believe it sincerely, that if the minority had trusted the people of Manitoba more, if they had waited for them to give relief, if they had not appealed to the Governor in Council, if they had not pressed their claim on this Parliament in appeal, this question would have been settled before now and settled peaceably and amicably. Sir, how will this Bill be enforced ? Will it help the minority ? Will it help the minority to place them in direct conflict with the majority ? Will it help them to have this Bill passed for the purpose of giving them certain rights and leave them in a great measure dependent on the majority for the carrying out of the provisions of the Bill ? After all the Bill will be no relief at all. On that question there can be very little difference of opinion. The Bill will give very little relief. While it establishes the principle of separate schools, it does not go far enough to give the minority the relief they have a right to expect. My conclusion is this, that we are not bound in honour to pass this Bill.

I will vote against this Bill, first, because I am opposed to separate schools. I am opposed to separate schools because I think they are not in the best interests of this country. I have never advocated, and I do not advocate any agitation in Ontario to endeavour to abolish separate schools. I accept the situation there. But I am glad to know that in a great many sections of Ontario the Catholics do not ask for separate schools, but are quite satisfied with the public schools, which are as a whole well administered. I hope to see the day, not only in Ontario, but in Quebec and the whole Dominion, when no separate schools will exist, when children will go to the same schools, not to be taught religion, which I hold should not be taught, and which in the public schools in Ontario is not taught in any sense of the word, but where the pupils will study science, the arts, reading, writing, arithmetic, spelling, and learn to become good citizens of this Dominion, which is going to be a great country in the future. I have not lost hope that that time will come ; I believe there are signs that the day is approaching. There are signs of greater liberality in religious matters, and it requires no great strength of imagination to look forward to the time when separate schools will be a thing of the past, and the agitation about separate schools will be one of the events to which we shall look back with horror and disgust.

I shall vote against this Bill because I think the grievance is not one that calls for any interference. In saying that I admit, while I am opposed to interference generally, that there might be a case which would call for interference. I do not take the ground that no such case could arise. I believe a case might arise in which Parliament would be called upon to interfere, but I hold this is not such a case.

I object to this Bill because of the difficulty of enforcing it, and because no real injustice has been done to the minority. I have dealt with those questions already, and I am now only summing up my reasons for opposing the Bill.

I oppose the Bill because no real benefit will accrue to the minority by passing it. I hold rather that the minority will find itself in a more difficult position because of the hostility of the majority, which would be exercised against them by this Bill being forced on the majority. I will vote against this Bill because I hold that its passage would be a greater grievance to the majority in Manitoba than that from which the minority at present suffer.

I oppose this Bill, finally, because I am a Conservative. I am proud to belong to the Conservative party. Whatever opinions I hold on this question, and if I may seem to be a follower of the leader of the Opposition on this question at this moment, I am not his follower on questions of public policy and questions of trade and finance. I am a firm believer in the policy of protection; I am a firm believer in what is called the National Policy. I believe that policy has helped to build up this country, along with the energy, intelligence, industry, and economy of the people. I believe that policy is going to accomplish still greater results for this country, and I am proud, as I have said, to be a Conservative. But I shall vote against this Bill because I am a Conservative, and because I do not want the Conservative party to have to bear the odium which will be attached to it, of forcing separate schools on Manitoba. I shall regret exceedingly, and I say this deliberately, if this Bill shall pass its second reading. That may involve consequences which we do not like to contemplate, but I am prepared for those consequences. I have thought this matter over carefully, and I believe even those consequences would be preferable to the fact of having a party which has done so much for this country compelled to bear the odium which will attach to it for all time, of having forced separate schools on Manitoba.

Now, Sir, I wish to say a word with reference to the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I am sorry he is not now in his seat. At a meeting lately held, I spoke somewhat in this strain, and the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) criticised my attitude, and said: Oh, it is very easy for the member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) to talk about opposing this particular Bill, but what he should do is to oppose the Government on everything.

Mr. McNEILL. Whether right or wrong.

Mr. CRAIG. And the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said: Because the member for East Durham is sincere on this question, he opposes this Bill; therefore, he should be insincere on every other question, and therefore he should be a hypocrite on every other question. Sir, I have no sympathy with remarks of that kind. I regret that I am compelled to separate myself from my fellow-members who differ from me on this question. I have no doubt at all as to the sincerity of the Government in carrying forward this measure. I have no doubt, Sir, that they think they are doing what they ought to do, in the interests of the country. I have no doubt that they think they are carrying out the principles of the constitution, and whatever my own opinion may be, I cannot help admiring them for pressing forward, when they think they are right, even though defeat may stare them in the face.

I thank the House for its attention, Mr. Speaker. I have not said anything new, nor had I any idea of doing so. I have simply stated my views, and before I sit down I repeat: I take the position I am taking with great regret, because it is a pain to me on any occasion to vote against the Government, and to sever myself from many of my fellow-members, whom I esteem so highly.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I regret to hear from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) that he is to vote against this measure, because he is a Conservative. He places himself in such a position that the Conservative party, which I have no doubt, as a whole, is to vote for this measure, cannot agree with him; and if he regrets separating himself from us, for the moment—I hope it is only for this one occasion—he may be sure that we regret as much as he does the position which he has taken. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go over all this question again. During the last three days and three nights, it has been treated of by a number of hon. gentlemen, and, for my part, I may leave the matter rest there. The question has been well treated by members of the Government side, from their way of thinking, and also by members of the Opposition, from their point of view. Sir, the hon. the leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper), when he spoke on Tuesday, was kind enough to mention my name, and to appeal to me as likely to support what he said with reference to the basis of our confederation. I took down his words then. He was speaking of the decision that had been reached between the leaders of the two great parties before confederation, Sir John Macdonald and the Hon. George Brown, and he said:

The result is known to you all. When in October, 1864, a conference was called under the shadow of the Crown, by the concurrence of the provincial and Imperial authorities, at Quebec, after considerable discussion the basis of union was arrived at. I am sorry to say that only one of my colleagues is here to-day (and he mentioned my name). He will bear me out in the statement: that no feature impressed itself more deeply upon all the delegates present than that this measure of confederation afforded a means to remove that antagonism of race and religion, which had been found so vital with reference to the interests of Canada.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) states there. During the conferences which we had with regard to confederation, we always had in view the settlement of the difficulties which previously existed between the two great political parties, and between the two great provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. The question of representation, based upon population, was a great difficulty in our way. We saw that if we conceded that principle, Upper Canada would have a much larger representation than Lower Canada, and that, therefore, we of the province of Quebec, could not carry any measure unless Ontario was disposed to grant it. We thought that we should not be put in that position. Before confederation, the struggle went on for years and years, until at last we found ourselves in the position that the Governments were defeated by a majority of one or two votes, and that new Ministries were required to be formed. We could not proceed with the work of the country, and the country was suffering. The question then was, not only a question of race, or a question of religion, but it was a question of our very existence. And, it was so much felt in that direction, that the Hon. George Brown, when he again saw the defeat of the Government by a majority of two, approached, through a common friend of himself and the Government, the leader of the Government, and led him to understand that he was ready to have a conference on the subject, to see if a different state of affairs could not be arrived at. The leader of the Opposition and the leader of the then Government met, and the result was that they came to an understanding that we should have confederation. That question was submitted to Parliament, and a new Government was formed, having Mr. Brown, amongst others, in the Ministry. Mr. Brown would have wished not to enter the Government at that time, at all events, but he was told that in order that his party should agree to this measure, they should have at least one, if not two representatives in the Government. The Hon. George Brown finally agreed to enter the Government, and the result was the different conferences upon confederation; first, the conference at Charlottetown, P.E.I., and later on the conference at Quebec, at which conference the true basis of the Confederation Act was discussed and settled.

We had taken in view the settlement of our difficulties, not only with regard to carrying on the Government, but with regard to the future of the two great provinces, on the questions of race, religion and representation. As the leader of the House stated on Tuesday, when we went to England and settled there finally the basis of confederation, we considered not only those difficulties which we had before, but another question, which was agitating some portions of the provinces, and which we thought should be settled at the same time. That was the question of divorce. Previous to confederation divorces were granted by one province or the other as the case might be. We thought it might be better that that question should be left entirely to the Federal Parliament—for different reasons,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

among them that by putting this question there the difficulties would be greater in the way of divorces and avoid mere mockeries, such as we find often in the United States. Another reason was that if we left that question to be settled by each of the provinces—for example, in the province of Quebec, where to the Roman Catholics, who are in a very large majority, divorces are not palatable and are against their creed—Protestants who required divorces, and who had a right to them according to the rules existing in the other provinces, might go to the central Parliament and not to the legislature of Quebec; so that the province of Quebec would not be placed in the position of being told by the Protestants: "You are opposed to us; we cannot get justice from you." If justice was in that direction, we thought it should be left to the Parliament of Canada, and there it is. As has been stated by the leader of the House and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, previous to the adoption of confederation the question arose, in the Parliament of the two provinces, whether we should not have new legislation in reference to education for Ontario and Quebec; and if my hon. friend the leader of the House remembers that circumstance, he will recollect that two Bills were introduced at that time, one for Ontario and one for Quebec. We saw the difficulties that were in the way, and the two Bills were withdrawn, though the Hon. Mr. Galt was very much annoyed at their withdrawal, and insisted on having passed, at all events, the Bill for the province of Lower Canada. Well, after discussing the matter, we saw that it was impossible to pass a Bill for that province alone. Under those circumstances, it was suggested by Sir Alexander Galt that the matter, so far as the province of Quebec was concerned, should be left to be dealt with by the legislature of that province, so soon as it was established and met after confederation. As was stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to-day, this matter was left by Sir Alexander Galt to Sir George Cartier and myself to have the Bill passed in the legislature of Quebec, of which we were to be members as well as members of this Parliament. It is a recollection that I am proud of—that the representative of the Protestants of the province of Quebec in Parliament would say to two French-Canadians and Catholics: "We all trust you, and we rely upon you both carrying this measure through the legislature of Quebec, and putting the Protestants of that province on a proper footing, so far as their educational matters are concerned." When afterwards the clauses of the Confederation Act were passed, we put in that clause guaranteeing that, in all provinces where separate schools were established previous to confederation, those schools and the legislation for them should not be changed after confederation. When the legislature of Quebec met, and we moved the measures which we had promised, it is true they met with opposition on the part of one member especially, who was perhaps a leading member; but he had no success. We were bound to fulfil our promise, as our word had been given; the members of the House stood by us, and the Bill was passed. I do not intend to read the Act, but it is as well that I should indicate some of its provisions. There was another Act in 1868 on the subject of education; but this special Act was to provide more efficiently for the support of schools in certain cases, and other objects. That Act was passed on the 24th of February, 1868; it is the law of the land; and it cannot be changed, so far as those schools are concerned, without the consent of the Protestant population of the province of Quebec. Then, in 1869, the main Act, which consists of 39 clauses, was passed. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) said, that in that Act the great concessions, the prescriptions in favour of separate schools were adopted. In the first clause, we find it provided that four months after the passage of the law, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall appoint twenty-one persons, fourteen of whom will be Roman Catholics, and seven Protestants, to form the Council of Public Instruction for the province of Quebec, with the Minister of Public Instruction or Superintendent of Education for the time being, and until then, the members of the present council will remain in force. After the four months had expired, the Council so reorganized was to be divided into two committees, one composed of Roman Catholics and the other of Protestants. That is the basis of the present system, and all that relates to the separate schools is dealt with by these Councils separately. For the Catholics there is the Committee of Roman Catholics, and for the Protestants the Committee of Protestants, and each is invested with the same powers as regards their schools. The Protestant Board looks after the Protestant schools, and the Roman Catholic Board looks after the Roman Catholic schools; and the money is divided between them, according to population—that is, the money granted by the government. These committees distribute that money, according to their views, among their schools, so that the Catholics do not interfere with the Protestants, nor the Protestants with the Catholics. The two sections are perfectly distinct, there can be no trouble between them, and the majority will never interfere with the minority. It has been said that, if justice be not done to the minority in the province of Manitoba by this Bill, there might be a change in the province of Quebec—there might be an attempt on the part of the very large majority of Roman Catholics in Quebec against the separate schools of the Protestants. Nobody need fear that, we will never do anything of the kind, and I make that statement on behalf of the province of Quebec. We have bound ourselves by law, the constitution requires it, and we do not want to excite new difficulties in our province by acting unjustly towards our friends, the Protestants of that province. If we cannot obtain justice for our co-religionists of the province of Manitoba, that is no reason why we should commit an injustice towards the Protestants of Quebec.

There is another branch of the subject of which I wish to speak now. I was asked, whether there had been some pledges, or arrangements, or contract made between the Dominion Government and Manitoba before Manitoba entered confederation. Well, I shall not enter into the details of the first rising of the half-breeds under Riel, because they are a matter of history, but I may say this, that, when the first rising took place, the Dominion Government found itself in this position. It had to decide, whether it would put the rising down by force of arms, or succeed in inducing the rebels to listen to reason and submit themselves to the laws of Canada. Well, at that period the Archbishop of St. Boniface was absent from his diocese. He was in Rome, attending the Council of the Vatican. The question then was, what could be done to obtain the exercise of his influence over these people, and I was entrusted by my colleagues to cable him and ask him to come back and help the Government to restore peace in that country. I did so, and the archbishop replied at once, that, though it was very inconvenient for him to leave his work, nevertheless, he would come. And he came, loyal, as he had always been, and as he continued to be until his death. He had interviews with the Ministers, and he claimed, on behalf of his people, that they should be treated with all possible leniency. He asked that an amnesty should be granted, and that afterwards proper treatment should be given them, because at that time there was no other power there than a power which could hardly be said to be capable of being exercised at that moment by Canada. The archbishop went, and the result was that, in a very short time, the half-breeds ceased their opposition, and we began to have peace again in that portion of the Dominion. Well, delegates were sent down from these people, and the archbishop, of course, was communicating with those who could help that country and obtain for the people a proper administration of their affairs. These delegates came down. I remember the names of two of them, Father Ritchot, and Mr. Black, and I think there was another. They came down empowered to negotiate with the Government. Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier were entrusted with the task of negotiating with these delegates and endeavouring to prepare a measure to give a government to that country. The delegates were together a long time.

Unfortunately, Sir John Macdonald was laid up for, I think, three weeks, and Sir George Cartier had to continue the negotiations. Parliament was sitting, and we did not want to have Parliament rise before the matter was settled. It was understood that these people were to have schools of their own, not schools where they would be taught another religion than their own, but schools that they could control in this and other respects. That is the reason why the clause was put in the Act. The words may not be exactly the same as those referring to the separate schools in the province of Quebec, but it was understood that they would have their schools, and Parliament so understood when the Act was passed. It was so understood in Manitoba afterwards, because, for twenty years those schools were maintained unchallenged, until Mr. Greenway's government changed the law and did away with the separate schools. That is the reason why the appeal is made here by the minority. They believe, and I believe with them, that they should have their schools in which to educate their children as they please and that they should not be bound to send their children to schools where the religious doctrines taught are not their own. I do not see why they should not have their schools just as the Protestants have in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend from Durham (Mr. Craig) says he does not want separate schools and he will not interfere to restore them, and therefore, will vote against this measure. If to-morrow the same thing should occur with regard to the separate schools in Quebec, I wonder how he would vote. I think he would find good reason why he should interfere and give back to the minority the rights and privileges that they have to-day. And he would be perfectly right. But he will never be called upon to take such a course; because the Protestants will never have cause to complain of the Roman Catholics of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the law that was passed to give the minority their schools in 1870 was the result of an arrangement between the Government and Parliament and themselves. It was a compact, and they should be maintained in the enjoyment of their rights and privileges. We have in the Confederation Act a compact, and it was so considered when the Bill was before Parliament in England. They regarded it as a treaty between us, the different provinces, and that such a treaty was to be accepted by Parliament as it stood and passed. If the Parliament of England thus respected our position as provinces, why should we here refuse to that minority, that small minority in Manitoba, the maintenance of the compact that was made with them? Why should we refuse to them what has been granted to the Protestants of the province of Quebec? And I am glad to know that it was granted cheerfully.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go into a discussion of the nature of the Bill. That has been done already. The only thing I have to say is that I believe it is a most acceptable measure and that it will give to the minority in Manitoba the relief for which they are asking, that it will restore to them the rights and privileges which they had under the old Act, which were recognized by every government and every legislature during twenty years and which should never have been taken away from them. It was promised at the time to the Archbishop of St. Boniface who was acting for his people, that this should not be disturbed but should be maintained. Well, unfortunately, the archbishop was deceived, and the schools have been done away with, and the Parliament of Canada is appealed to, to try to remedy the evil. The province of Manitoba have had plenty of time to give justice to these people. They have been asked to do so. And I have no doubt that if they were ready to-day to do substantial justice to these people we should have no more trouble, but could proceed with the work of the country in other departments. But the answer has been: No, and No, and No. We are bound by the constitution to give relief to these people, and for my part I should feel that I was committing an injustice, that I was not acting fairly towards these people and towards the country if I did not vote for this measure. Therefore, I will support it as it is. If it passes exactly as it is I shall be satisfied. I understand that the people there are satisfied with it—I mean the Roman Catholics for whose benefit it is intended.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. They are not.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is not from Manitoba, and therefore the Bill is not for him. But the people there are satisfied.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to read him a letter which has been received from there.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I believe that the people are satisfied with the Bill. The archbishop who speaks for them, and who knows quite as much about it as the hon. gentleman, is satisfied with the Bill and has accepted it as it is. Therefore I say, if they are satisfied, why should not we be? Some say the Bill does not go far enough. But the people themselves say it is sufficient. When it is passed I hope that peace and harmony will be restored.

Mr. SPROULE. In rising to continue this debate I must first express the regret which I experience in being obliged to differ with political friends with whom I have been associated for a long time and with whose lines of policy I have usually worked in hearty accord. It is a matter for regret amongst politicians on either side of the House when they find themselves out of accord with the political party with which they have worked many years, and you readily understand, Mr. Speaker, as I have no doubt the House does, that it is a very strong provocation which will induce any member of Parliament to go against his own political party. It is only the conscientious convictions which I hold on this question, and the interpretation which I put upon the constitution that we have heard so much about of late, and the understanding I have with regard to the rights of the majorities and minorities, that induce me to take the stand which I take to-night. But we owe a duty to our country as well as to our party, and there will sometimes come in most men's lives a time when they are obliged to leave party, and to stand for what they regard as the best interest of the country. As representatives of the people we are sent here, as far as possible to reflect the views, and the sentiments and the wishes of our constituents in whatever part of the country they live. In endeavouring to do that to-night, I am about to speak on the line which I have mapped out. We are asked in connection with this debate, what duty we owe to our constituents? The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) my colleague, who spoke on this question last night, said that it is not usual for the Government to submit a question to the people by way of a plebiscite; but they go up and down the country and hold meetings; they watch the press of the country, and by that means endeavour to ascertain the sentiments of the people, and then to keep themselves in accord with those sentiments in discharging their duties as legislators or as a Government. Now, if that be the case, and I presume it is a fair exposition of the case, I wonder how hon. gentlemen supporting the Government of the day, and composing the Government of the day, can justify their position upon this question, or pretend to say that they are in accord with the sentiment of the country. At the outset, I may say that I regret to find that the Government are, in my judgment, so much out of accord with the sentiment of the country. Why do I say so? How do I estimate or gauge public sentiment on this matter? I take the press of the country, from one end of it to the other, especially that press which represents the political party to which I belong, and which endeavours to give voice to their sentiments, to defend their policy, to support their conduct; and I say that the Government must regret to-day to find that there is scarcely an important Conservative paper which is defending them and their policy in endeavouring to pass the Bill that is before the House. If you go from Prince Edward Island in the east to Victoria in the west, and look over the Conservative papers in this country, I think you might count on the five fingers of your hand all those that come out and give a straightforward support of this measure, and of the policy of the Government in attempting to pass it. Then I take the independent press of the country. I might mention a few of them, but they are so well known to this House and to the people that it is scarcely necessary for me to do so. But it would not be out of place to ask, in reference to those papers that have supported the Government so strongly in the past, where are they to-day? The only one that is giving even a half-hearted support to their policy is the "Mail and Empire," of Toronto; and yet it has never, so far as my judgment enables me to understand it, adduced any respectable argument either to defend or justify their course to-day. If we leave out of account the "Mail and Empire," where do we find the rest of the papers? Where do we find the "World," the next greatest exponent of the principles of the Conservative party? We find that it is arrayed against the Government's course on this question. Where do we find the Toronto "News"? Where do we find the Toronto "Telegram"? Where do we find the Toronto "Star"? Where do we find the Hamilton "Spectator"? I might go over the whole list, and I find in almost every instance that those papers are arrayed against the party, and they believe that they are voicing public sentiment. Then, if they are voicing public sentiment, how can the Government to-day be in accord with that public sentiment? If it be the duty of the Government to reflect public sentiment in their legislation, then I ask, how can they square this legislation with the sentiment of the country, as expressed by these papers? Now, we are told by the hon. member for North Grey that in order to ascertain what public sentiment is, the Government go out into the country and hold political meetings. Well, if I take the expression of the public meetings that have been held in this country, do I find any stronger evidence of public sentiment being with them than it is as expressed through the press? I can assure you that the verdict of the people is to the contrary, as expressed in public meetings that have been held for the last two or three years in every part of the country. Why, they have scarcely gone upon a single platform and dared to say that in the end they were bound to pass remedial legislation, and asked the electorate of this country to endorse it, and where the electorate have endorsed it. When they went into North Ontario and put up their candidate, what were they obliged to do? They were obliged to have their candidate keep from the knowledge of the electorate his intention regarding remedial legislation, as they knew, otherwise, that he could not receive the support of the people. I ask the hon. gentleman from North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray), what course did he take in trying to induce the electorate to support him? He said: I am not going to be pledged in this matter; but I point you to my record in the past as to what you may expect from me in the future. Have I not gone through two or three political fights in the province of Ontario?

Mr. MCGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman is mistaking my position in North Ontario.

Mr. SPROULE. In what respect, I would like to know, am I misstating the hon. gentleman's position? I was going on to say that according to what I read in the papers which reported him pretty extensively, his language was to this effect: The electorate of this county know my record, because I have fought two political fights in provincial campaigns on this question. They know the stand I have taken on the question of separate schools; they know what I have said. Now, then, I tell you that I am standing to-day upon the same ground that I have always stood. Now, Mr. Speaker, what was that ground? Was it in support of a remedial law which would force separate schools on Manitoba, or was it against it? Why, if I understand the ground the hon. gentleman has taken in the past, it was that when Ontario and Quebec entered into a compact at the time of confederation, they accepted these separate schools as an arrangement between the two provinces. They are here to stay, and we cannot help it. But I shall never support their extension into any other province or any other part of the country. That was the record upon which that hon. gentleman sought election, and it was upon that record that the people accepted him. But had that hon. gentleman come out plainly and told the electorate of North Ontario: I am going down to vote for remedial legislation, I am assured by men who ought to know the situation, that he would have been buried under a majority of nearly a thousand votes in his own riding. Is that an evidence that the Government are fairly entitled to accept as voicing public sentiment in favour of this legislation? No; I say it is not. Then if I go to Cardwell, what does public sentiment tell me there? It tells me that the Government candidate who had apparently, at least, come out and admitted that he was prepared to support the policy laid down by the Government upon this question of remedial legislation, was buried under a hopeless mass of votes; he was buried so far as his political life is concerned, never to rise again, at least in that constituency. But the hon. gentleman who frankly opposed the policy of remedial legislation, was accorded the support of the majority of the voters of Cardwell, and public sentiment declared against interference with Manitoba. Then the Government went down to Montreal Centre and tested public sentiment there. But did public sentiment endorse the legislation they propose to-day? No, Sir, but the candidate who was put up to oppose them now sits in this House in opposition to the Government. Then they tested public sentiment in Jacques Cartier, and met with the same response. Look also at the result of their efforts in Verchères. In fact, in almost every constituency where they have tested public sentiment, up to the present time, they have been defeated. They went down to Cape Breton to elect the hon. Secretary of State, and by a herculean effort, by dint of exercising all the power they could bring to bear, they did manufacture sufficient public sentiment to endorse their present course. But I say there are many men of intelligence to-day who, as I read in the public press, are observing the signs of the times as indicated in the way we judge public sentiment, and who have come to the conclusion that the voice of the country is against the Government in this attempt to interfere with the rights of Manitoba. There is no mistaking it, and if hon. gentlemen constituting the Government do not believe it to-day, a time will come when they will recognize it, when at the elections the people will speak with a voice so strong that they cannot misunderstand it, and many members who now fail to recognize that voice, as indicated by public sentiment, will be left in the minority after the votes have been counted, and they will then recognize that they misunderstood public sentiment and acted contrary to it.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate on this most important subject, I may refer for a few seconds to the portion of it under consideration when you left the Chair at six o'clock. I was endeavouring to give then what, according to my judgment, was public opinion and public sentiment on this measure, and how far they were in accord with the action of the Government in dealing with this most important measure. There is no doubt that no question which has engaged the attention of Parliament for a great many years in this country is regarded as of as much importance as the one before the House to-day. On this question above all others, you might naturally look to the press of the country for an exposition of public sentiment, and also as manifested by public gatherings, through church assemblies and similar channels. I was endeavouring to show that if we examine the press of the country there can be no mistake as to what public sentiment is, because while the press supporting the Government in their policy, their National Policy, their measures relating to the fast steamship line and the development of trade, and on almost every other line of policy which has been under consideration during the last fifteen or sixteen years, those journals have been notably silent as regards saying anything endorsing the measure now under the consideration of the House. On the contrary, there is scarcely a Conservative paper in the country but has given out some discordant sound, some note of warning, some suggestion which might induce the Government to abandon what very many regard as an insane course they are following at the present time and desist from seeking to force on an unwilling province a Bill that will take away rights that every province has heretofore enjoyed, which the province of Manitoba has heretofore enjoyed, and which in the opinion of the large majority of the people it should enjoy in the future. So far as my judgment goes, there can be no mistake as to what public opinion is. Then if the Government are running counter to public opinion and thereby lose the support of their own friends, they should not blame their friends, but rather blame their own blindness that leads them in a channel which compels their friends to desert them.

Why do I oppose this Bill at the present time? I oppose it because it is making a serious inroad on principles which have been heretofore regarded as sound. What are those principles? This Bill is interfering in the first place, with the rights of the province. There is no one who is acquainted with the history of Canada and has watched closely affairs during the last twelve or fifteen years who failed to regard with a good deal of suspicion anything that raises the question of provincial rights or causes antagonism between any province and the Federal Government, because we have had several fights in this country on that line, and the lesson taught is to avoid in future as much as possible any interference with the rights of the provinces. Only a few years ago we had a very great struggle on provincial rights, it occurring on the Streams Bill. Two or three enactments were passed by the provincial legislature. They were disallowed by the Dominion Government on the question as to the right of a province to control streams within its own territories. What was the result? When the question was taken to the courts the highest court of the Empire decided against the Dominion. In the meantime a very strong feeling had been aroused. The agitation that had been carried on against the Dominion Government for interfering with what a great many regarded as the rights of the province had created a feeling of antagonism against the Dominion Government, which threatened to be very serious. But for the fact that the highest court of the Empire decided against the Dominion Government and in favour of the provincial government controlling those rights, we do not know how the agitation would have ended, or what disastrous results would have flowed from it. Then we had a struggle as regards the claims of a province to own minerals and timber. This again involved the question of provincial rights, and ended in a decision against the Dominion, and the province was secured in the rights which it enjoys to-day, and which the people thought they were entitled to enjoy at that time. That contention also raised a great deal of agitation. This agitation which went on, intensified and accentuated the feeling that the provinces should know what rights belonged to them, and be accorded those rights without any interference. Then we had a question of provincial rights somewhat similar to the very important question which is now under discussion. Hon. gentlemen will remember that we passed the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, and by that Act we practically took away the right of the province to charter local railways, a right which all the provinces had enjoyed up to that time; or, in other words, we put a monopoly clause in the charter of the company, which prevented the Manitoba government from exercising what was the undoubted right of every province, to grant charters for railways within its own territory. What was the result? A very serious fight took place, a very strong agitation was carried on. It was considered a grievance which at the time was difficult to remove. And what was the result of that agitation, and what was the result of that strife? We were obliged to buy back that monopoly from the Canadian Pacific Railway at a very great cost, for the purpose of appeasing the feeling and the anxiety of Manitoba, and we were obliged to give them back the power which they thought, under the constitution, they should enjoy, and which they complained was unfairly taken from them. Until that was done we had nothing like a settlement of that question. All these things have tended to create a feeling of antagonism between the government of Manitoba and the Dominion Parliament. Then, after that, we had what was known as the Jesuits' Estates Act. That was a question dealt with in this House and discussed at very great length. Upon what ground did we, who voted with the Government upon that occasion, justify the vote which we gave. It was solely upon the ground—I speak at least for myself—that we were upholding the rights of the province of Quebec. We got our information upon that question from a source which would be regarded as sufficient authority to satisfy most members of the House. We got our advice from the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. We were told, that at confederation, the rights of the provinces were laid down, and amongst these undoubted rights were: first, the control of the land within their bounds, to sell that land, to give it away, or to use it as they saw fit. We were told, that the right of the control of educational affairs rested with the provinces. We were told, that it did not matter whether it accorded with the views of the majority of the Dominion Parliament or not, the right of the province was to control its educational affairs. We were told, that, so long as the province raised money according to the ways laid down in the British North America Act, it did not matter how they spent it. It was said to us, that the provinces might grant licenses to raise money, or they might sell their lands to raise money; but, so long as they raised it according to the constitution, they could use it for any purpose they desired, no matter whether it was agreeable to outsiders or not. I remember distinctly putting a question to the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald about that. I said: Suppose that a province should pass a law to use money for a purpose which, in the judgment of the Dominion Parliament, and in the judgment and the wisdom of the people of Canada, would be detrimental to the interests of the Dominion, or to the interests of the other provinces, or even to the interests of the province itself, would the Dominion Parliament be justified in vetoing that law. And Sir John Macdonald's answer was: So long as they raised that money in the manner laid down under the constitution, it is a matter of unconcern to us, and it is none of our business, if they pitched that money into the St. Lawrence or into the fire. And he further said: They have sold a portion of what was their own land, and they have raised money; they are now using this money on educational lines, and they are entitled to do so, and, whether it is agreeable or disagreeable to us, it is the right of the province, and we must be satisfied with it. Upon that understanding, and believing the right hon. gentleman to be a greater authority than I on provincial rights, although it was against my judgment, and although it was against the judgment of my constituents, I supported the Government on that occasion. And, Sir, I remember that the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald said, in answer to the same question: It may come back to you in the province of Ontario to-morrow, and how could you be so inconsistent as to oppose the right of the province of Quebec to deal with her own land, her own money, and her own education, if, on a similar question arising in the province of Ontario, you were obliged to vote the other way? Those were the arguments then used by Sir John Macdonald, in the case of the Jesuits' Estates Act.

Now, Sir, I regard this present question as being on the same lines. Manitoba has seen fit to deal with education. It is the right of that province to deal with that matter. It is true, it is said, that Manitoba can deal with it only within certain limits. I admit, there is a proviso in that, but it has been the generally-accepted principle heretofore, that every province had the uncontrolled right to deal with education, and every province had used that right according to its will, and there has been no interference with it up to the present time. This is the first time in Canadian history that we have been asked to interfere with that right of a province. We are asked now to endorse a principle, the very opposite of the principle we stood by, when the province of Quebec was making a fight for her rights. We stood by the province of Quebec then on a question which was very unpopular with us, which, in the judgment of many, was wrong; but we stood by the principle, believing that we stood up for the rights of a province. If that rule is applied to the province of Quebec, then, why should it not be applied to the province of Manitoba to-day? The same that applies to one should apply to the other; the same rights the one province has, the other province ought to enjoy. Sir, I oppose this Bill because it prevents the will of the majority from being carried out. The invariable principle is, that majorities must rule. Some say, that majorities should not always rule, but they do rule in every walk of life. If you go into a business corporation, the majority rules; if you go to a church meeting, the majority rules; if you go to a township council, the majority rules.

Mr. DEVLIN. If you go to Turkey, the majority rules, too.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). And the majority in heathen countries rules.

Mr. SPROULE. I am talking about civilized life, as we understand it in the British Empire. I say that in every part of the British Empire it is regarded as the correct principle that the majority shall rule, and whatever decision the majority comes to, it is generally recognized to be right. Now, it does not matter whether you apply the principle to a township council, or to a municipal corporation, the principle that the majority rules is the principle that holds good. Why should a rule the reverse of this be applied to the province of Manitoba? In the provincial legislature there, the majority rules. In this very House the majority rules by their voice. Whether the minority acquiesces in the principles promulgated or not, it does not matter; the majority rules. The province of Manitoba has rights, or she thinks she has rights, which she was entitled to enjoy, and, according to her understanding of her rights, she is dealing with a question in which she is vitally interested. A large majority of her people have come to the solemn conclusion, that it is in their interests and the interests of their province, that they shall in future have a different system of education from what they had had up to the year 1890. And yet to-day we are trying to prevent that majority from ruling in the province of Manitoba. We are told, that this is something embodied in the constitution, and that, therefore, it should be held sacred, and we should not disturb it. There is no doubt there is some show of argument for those who hold that view, and I will deal with it later on. I have here the debates which took place in 1865 and 1866, when they were trying to bring about confederation, and I have looked at the discussions which took place upon the resolutions on which the British North America Act was founded. I see here one of the eminent men of that day, forecasting what might be the dangerous result, if you insist on taking away the rights from majorities. And to-day, in the light of experience, it seems to me to be verified to the letter. John Sandfield Macdonald, who was a Roman Catholic, was speaking against that provision of this resolution, which was intended to place upon provinces rights for minorities which never could be changed, no matter what the changed condition of the country or the character of the people. He moved a resolution in opposition to that, and, in supporting his resolution, he said :

I rise, Sir, to propose another amendment. I can assure the House that I never knew a measure of anything like this importance go through with so few attempts to amend it. Nor do I rise for the mere purpose of putting my amendment on record, for I do feel that the views I am about to express, and which I have ever held since I have been a member of this House may not commend themselves to any considerable number of the members. I have no desire that the rights of the Roman Catholic minority of Upper Canada should be abridged.

He had no desire that they should be abridged, but he refused to endorse the principle that the resolution granting them should be perpetual.

I have no desire that the rights and privileges of any other denomination shall be interfered with in any respect ; but I wish hon. members to bear in mind that the experience we have had in this country, not to allude to that of the neighbouring state, proves that a denial of the right of the majority to legislate on any given matter has always led to grave consequences. I need only mention the Clergy Reserve question. This, it must be recollected, was forbidden to be legislated upon by the Union Act ; yet it was the cause of fierce strife and legislation for many years. The original constitution of the United States prohibited the question of slavery from being interfered with by Congress ; yet an agitation for its suppression was early commenced, and has at last terminated in civil war. The agitation of the Clergy Reserve question produced a rebellion in Upper Canada. I say, Sir, that by making a constitutional restriction in respect to the schools of the minority, we are sowing the seeds from which will in the end arise a serious conflict, unless the constitution be amended. The minority will be quite safe on a question relating to their faith and their education in a colony under the sway of the British Crown ; but if you expressly withdraw that question from the control of the majority, the rights of the minority will not be safe in either section of the province, if you distrust the action of the majority. It is our duty, Sir, to see that a question which affects us so dearly as the education of our children—a question which has before now created no little excitement in Upper Canada—shall not be withdrawn from the management of the local legislature. We ought not to deprive them of a power which they will want to exercise, just because they are deprived of it, and provoke a desire on their part to alter the system. You may rely upon it other religious bodies will be sure to protest against any particular creed having special rights, or an exclusive monopoly of certain privileges, whatever they may be. I should be astonished if any one in this House would say, either to the Protestant minority in Lower Canada or to the Roman Catholic minority in Upper Canada : " You are not to trust to the justice of the majority." Have they ever known a country where the majority did not control affairs and where the minority had not to submit ?

And yet we are asked to-day to prevent the majority in Manitoba controlling the affairs of that province, although we have never known a civilized country where it was not the case that the majority controlled and the minority submitted. He goes on :

Does not the majority rule and the minority submit in England and in France ? I have never heard of any case where this was not the case. The minority is safe against undue encroachment on its rights, and I am willing to trust to the sense of justice of the majority in Upper Canada to preserve the religious and educational liberties of the Roman Catholics of Upper Canada. I am now getting some what advanced in years, and I am the more anxious to put my opinions on record, because before long I shall have the satisfaction of saying, though perhaps not on the floor of this House, that I protested against resolutions intended to prevent the free expression of opinion by the majority of the people of Upper Canada, and the exercise of a power which ought to be entrusted to them.

We can see to-day, in the light of experience, the foresight and intelligence of the late John Sandfield Macdonald in the forecasting what might be the result if the rights of the majority in a province were taken away, and they were not allowed to exercise the rights that belong to every civilized country. He went on to move a resolution as follows :—

That the following words be added to the original motion :—

" And that it be an instruction to the said committee to consider whether any constitutional restriction which shall exclude from the local legislature of Upper Canada the entire control and direction of education, subject only to the approval or disapproval of the general Parliament, is not calculated to create widespread dissatisfaction, and tend to foster and create jealousy and strife between the various religious bodies in that section of the province."

He goes on to say :

If hon. gentlemen think they are going to silence the bitter feelings which have been engendered in Upper Canada in consequence of the attempt to make permanent a certain system of education, they are much mistaken ; and I desire to have the expression of the opinion of the members of this House on the subject, whether they think that the restriction in the proposed constitution I have mentioned is calculated to bring about harmony, and whether it is not better to let the Catholics of Upper Canada and the Protestants of Lower Canada protect themselves, or rather trust for protection to the sense of justice of their fellow-subjects.

An hon. gentleman who opposed that motion said :

Though I am against the separate school system, I am willing to accept this confederation, even though it perpetuates a small number of separate schools. Under the present legislative union we are powerless in any movement for the abrogation of the separate system ; it is even very doubtful if we could resist the demands for its extension. We will not be in any worse position under the new system, and in one respect we will have a decided advantage, in that no further change can be made by the separate school advocates. We will thus substitute certainty for uncertainty. I deeply regret that the hon. member should have thought it necessary for any purpose to move this resolution.

He did not contemplate any further changes, but he was willing to accept what was then in existence in Upper and Lower Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN. Who held that language ?

Mr. SPROULE. It was Mr. A. Mackenzie.

Mr. DEVLIN. The late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie ?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, I think so. Now, I think I have made clear two things. The first is that it was never contemplated at confederation to compel every province that came into the union to accept separate schools, but only to accept the solemn compact made between Upper and Lower Canada, and to act on the understanding that that compact should be carried out. Acting on that understanding, in two or three local elections in the province of Ontario in which the school question engaged a great deal of attention, I steadily refused to say one word against separate schools in Upper or Lower Canada, because I considered that under the solemn compact made at confederation, the rights enjoyed by the minorities in the two provinces should be maintained. But I held that it was never contemplated, when confederation was brought about, that similar rights should be extended to every province that came into the union, and I am justified in that belief by the resolutions that were moved at that time. Some say that we are bound not only to give separate schools to every province that comes into the union, but after it comes in, and it engrafts on its statutes some privilege in regard to schools that may or not be justifiable, that privilege must remain there for ever. I say there is nothing in the resolutions to warrant that contention. In reading the resolutions assigning to the legislatures of the provinces the subjects which they could control, I find this laid down :

The local legislature shall have power to make laws respecting the following subjects :—

Among these is :

Education, saving the rights and privileges which the Protestant or Catholic minority in both Canadas may possess as to their denominational schools at the time when the union goes into operation.

Mr. SPROULE.

But it says nothing about the same right being extended to any other province that may come in. That was the solemn understanding come to when these resolutions went to the Home Government as a basis for legislation. But we are told to-day : "Oh, but the British North America Act says so-and-so." In the legislature one hon. gentleman got up and contended that the Bill that passed the Imperial Parliament should not become law until it was submitted to the Parliament of Canada, and the Parliament of Canada had an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon it, and either assenting to or dissenting from it ; and also until there was an appeal to the people upon it. One reason he gave for that view was : We know by experience, he said, that it sometimes happens that we make laws on certain lines ; but if, after these laws have been made and become constitutional laws, certain provisions are found in them that were never contemplated, we ought to have some opportunity of examining them before we are asked to assent to them. In opposition to that, the Attorney General, who was afterwards Sir George Cartier, spoke as follows :

In reply to what the hon. member for Hochelaga has just said, I shall merely tell the hon. members of this House that they need not take any alarm at the apprehensions and the predictions that the hon. gentleman has made.

That was the danger of something creeping into the law which it was never contemplated should be embodied in it.

I have already declared, in my own name and on behalf of the Government, that the delegates who go to England and will accept from the Imperial Government no Act but one based on the resolutions voted by this House, and they will not break faith in order to bring back any other. (Hear, hear). I will pledge my honour and that of the Government to that effect, and I trust my word of honour will, at least, have as much weight with the House and the country as that of the hon. member for Hochelaga. (Cheers).

And it was accepted on that ground, but there was the resolution, there was what the provincial legislature was to have, the right to control education, save only as regards the compact entered into between the two Canadas. But afterwards, in clause 93 of the British North America Act, an improvement was introduced that goes even further than that. It says :

All the powers, privileges and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be, and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholics in Quebec.

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union,—

That only applied to the two Canadas, Upper and Lower Canada, and it did not contemplate any other province. It did not contemplate that the resolution I have read should extend to any other province. It did not contemplate that it was to extend to provinces coming afterwards into the union. It says :

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council.

That does not give the right to establish them and then say that, once established, they are never to be disturbed afterwards. Now, the delegates who were acting on behalf of Manitoba were not satisfied with what had taken place in New Brunswick about education, and they wanted to pass a law which would go further than the British North America Act went, and secure for themselves greater powers and improve their position. They passed what is known as the Manitoba Act. Here is the clause of that Act applying to the subject :

In and for the province of Manitoba the said legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions :—

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

They went further than the British North America Act, because that Act only provided that they shall enjoy what they have at the time of the union. But it was changed because of the New Brunswick case. The minority had not the right to have separate schools in law, and, therefore, that right could not be given back to them. The minority should enjoy the right which they had on going into the union. Is any right taken away from them which they enjoyed when they came into the union? Did the Privy Council say so? The Privy Council did not say anything of the kind. The Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba had not that right in practice, because there were no separate schools there in practice; they had what is known as parochial schools, which they might establish to-day upon the same basis. And, therefore, we are not going beyond the bound of reason, when we say that they have not the right, under the Act providing for the incorporation of Manitoba into confederation, to appeal against the Manitoba statute which did away with separate schools, because they did not enjoy the right to separate schools when they came into the union. That right was given them after they came into the union. The union was consummated in 1870, and separate schools were given in 1871, and the Roman Catholic minority are enjoying to-day all the rights they enjoyed on coming into the union, and no right which they enjoyed then is taken from them to-day. Therefore, they cannot complain fairly on that line.

We are told that the constitution shows that they shall enjoy certain rights. Now,

I would like to ask this House, what are constitutions? They are only compacts between governments and individuals, made to suit the necessities of the time and circumstances, and, as time goes on and conditions change, as people die and pass off the stage of action and others take their places, as the necessities of the time and changing circumstances and conditions may require, those constitutions may be changed. Constitutions are not immutable. At one time one of the provisions of the British constitution was, that there should be church and state. Where is church and state to-day? Where would it be to-day, if that constitution never changed? The old system of church and state has been done away with by the very descendants of the men who were the strong advocates of it years ago, and who regarded it then as one of the safeguards of the British constitution. But, as time, as conditions, as the circumstances changed, it was a wise act to do away with it. There was a time when a Roman Catholic could not hold any office. But is there any one to-day who, in his wisdom, will say they have no right to hold office, as well as any Protestant? Things have changed, and they hold office to-day by virtue of the will and consent of the majority.

Mr. DEVLIN. Has the Manitoba government the right to change the constitution granted to it?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, so the British North America Act says. It has the right to change its own constitution in certain lines. I shall not specify all the lines, but it has that right. But I say that constitutions are only compacts, which only last so long as those compacts suit the situation, the circumstances, the conditions and the age in which they are applied; and, when they are not in harmony with the age, they must be changed.

Mr. AMYOT. Would the province of Quebec have the right to change the constitution, so far as separate schools are concerned?

Mr. SPROULE. I have shown the hon. gentleman that, under the solemn compact they have entered into, they are pledged to Ontario to retain those schools, and I do not look at it as standing in the same relation at all. I have given the reasons. It is because that compact was entered into before confederation, under which that province must have separate schools, but, as regards Manitoba, the compact was only that they should enjoy what they had on going into the union; and on going into the union, Manitoba had not separate schools.

The seigniorial tenure was, at one time, a very burning question in the province of Quebec. It was at one time suitable to the wants of the people, but, as time and conditions changed, it was abolished by law. We had a clergy reserve fund that gave a certain portion of land for the benefit of the clergy, and that was embodied in the compact between Upper and Lower Canada and formed part of our constitution. Is it standing to-day? No, long since the clergy reserve lands were taken away from the clergy and used for the purposes of the country, because the changed conditions of the day rendered the change necessary. The constitution of the United States provided that Congress should not interfere with slavery. Enlightened public opinion in that great republic, however, demanded that slavery should be done away with, because it was inhuman and not in consonance with the advanced state of civilization, and not in harmony with human feeling and sympathy; and, although the American constitution provided that it should not be changed, what did the people do? They first made a compromise, what is known as the Missouri compromise, and declared that slavery should not go beyond certain bounds. But that was not sufficient; public opinion was too strong to stand slavery to any extent, however limited, and they abolished slavery, though they were obliged to do it by changing the constitution, though, in order to effect that change, they had to resort to arms and cause the loss of tens of thousands of valuable lives and millions of money, and though they had to accomplish that change by one of the greatest civil wars the world has ever seen. The constitution, however, had to be changed, because the requirements of the time demanded it. What are constitutions, if they are not made to suit the requirements of the times and of the age in which we live? If the constitution of Manitoba became entirely unsuited for the requirements of Manitoba, would it be wise to insist that Manitoba should abide by it, and not effect a change? I say it would be most unwise. Because she saw fit to think otherwise, because she seeks to make this change, are we going to abuse her? No. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen: Suppose that through some inadvertence or malicious design, or from any other cause, you had engrafted upon the constitution of that country a separate school system that was entirely unsuited to the civilization of the age, entirely unsuited to the requirements of the rising generation, who ought to be given a fair education. It is said that this separate school system is a good one; but suppose that the separate school system had been the worst. Merely because that system had been engrafted upon the constitution, must it remain there for ever? Would that be common sense or common wisdom? Would it justify any class of men in abiding by it? Would not these men rather be justified in so amending the constitution as to bring themselves into harmony with their environments and with the requirements of the country in which they find themselves? Why is this Bill objectionable? It is objectionable mainly because it establishes two systems of educational law, and two systems of education in a country where they can hardly afford to support one system. We hear it often said: Suppose the people of Quebec were to do with their separate schools there what the people of Manitoba have done with the separate schools there. But the cases are not at all the same, and the comparison is not a reasonable one. You can only compare things that are, to some extent, alike. I go to the province of Quebec, and I find the people settled on narrow lots that extend a mile and a quarter in length, but are only, if I remember well, forty rods in width. A family lives on the front of each lot, and the front of the lots is like a continuous village. The people are congregated in large numbers in a small space. If the people want two schools they may be quite able to support them, for they are numerous enough and wealthy enough to do so. But compare that with the conditions in Manitoba. Half of the land is kept as a reserve, and not settled at all in some places; the people can get 160 acres each, instead of 80 acres each, and there are only four families in a mile, instead of from eight to sixteen. Is it to be supposed that the same rules are applicable to the people of Quebec that are applied to the people of Manitoba? Not at all. The provincial government, in their wisdom, decide that the conditions were such that it is impossible to impose two school systems upon the people, that the people are too weak and cannot maintain them in efficiency. That is the reason why they did not wish to perpetuate the two systems there. I have here a pamphlet that deals with the subject, and it shows that the population there is sparse and scattered. Reading this pamphlet, one gets an idea of what it means for such a population to attempt to maintain two school systems. This pamphlet takes 198 school sections and shows that in 1894 the average attendance in no single one of them reached ten. Some of them are as low as five, and the line of figures runs nine, five, eight, seven, six, seven, nine, and so on. Every one of them is below ten. What would be the condition in that country if you were to insist upon the establishment of another school system amongst these people who are struggling to maintain one system of schools? Would such a thing be wise? A few years ago we had an appeal from Quebec. I remember that a number of Protestants from one part of that province came here and asked this House to provide means to transport them to the neighbourhood of Calgary so that they might settle together where they could keep up their schools and churches. As an evidence of the difficulty of maintaining these institutions where populations were sparse, they showed us a map of that country where the Protestants, one by one, had been bought out by the Roman Catholics until they had become distributed in very small numbers, yet in much larger numbers than can be found in the settled country districts in Manitoba. And they said: We are unable to keep up our societies, we are unable to maintain our churches, we are unable to support our schools, because we are so few in number. When they were asked: Why do you not attend the schools of the majority, as the Roman Catholics of Ontario attend the public schools there? the answer was: If the schools in Quebec were of the same nature as the public schools in Ontario where the object is to give a secular education and not teach the religion of any particular church first, we would send our children to them. But in those schools they teach principles that are regarded as inimical to the belief of a Protestant denomination. Therefore, we cannot send our children to their schools, and we are too weak to keep up our own schools. Is not that the condition in Manitoba? And if the Government came to the conclusion that this condition of things overburdened the people, and decided that it would be better to give them one system of national schools where religion was not taught, where the tenets of no particular church were taught, have they not strong reason for doing so? For, whatever may have been said, I have never seen it proven that any religious creed or the tenets of any particular church were taught in these schools. They go through the form of reading the Lord's prayer, and they occasionally read a passage of scripture; but they have never introduced any catechism or the teaching of the dogmas of any church. They have made a system of national schools in which the chief desire is to give the rising generation that secular education which is necessary to fit them for becoming good citizens. We are asked to compel the people of Manitoba to go back to the dual system, and to carry on that dual system under two sets of laws, one set of schools under the control of their own laws, and one under laws passed by this Parliament. What must be the result? It must engender a feeling of strife and resentment in the minds of the majority which, if aroused now, may not die out within the lifetime of the youngest member of this House. We are told that we should pass this Bill and settle the question finally. If I could hope that this would be a final settlement of this question, I confess that I should be inclined to do a great deal that I would not otherwise do. But I regard it as only the commencement of this fight, if this is forced upon the people contrary to the will of the majority there.

Now, I object to separate schools on principle. But while saying that, I have no feeling against those who regard separate schools as the right schools. The principle which I regard as right in this country is to bring the children up together in one school, where they will learn, through the associations of youth to love and respect each other, where they will play together, where they will learn to tolerate each other's eccentricities, and learn that human nature is human nature in one, the same as the other; where they will grow up together, having inculcated in their minds the same principles of education, science and knowledge that must be useful to them throughout life. I regard it as a correct principle in the interests of the state that in school the children shall see nothing of the diversity of religion, though that may remain, and the church has the right to teach it, but that it shall not keep the children apart in two hostile camps as is now being done. This is essentially why I oppose this Bill. I do not care whether it is a weak Bill or a strong Bill. The Bill has in it the principle of forcing upon an unwilling province separate schools which were done away with because the people regarded them as unsuitable to the requirements of the situation or the condition of things in their country. Then again I oppose it because I think the state ought to control education. I believe the trend of the age is towards the state controlling education. Those of us who remember our schoolboy days will no doubt recollect when we went to what were called pay schools, and we paid so much a month for the support of the teacher. There was not much difference in the amount of religion taught in those schools and that taught today; but they were pay schools kept up by voluntary subscriptions, and kept up by those who wished to educate their children. The state in its wisdom afterwards thought it necessary to take over the control of education because there was a large number of poor children in the country whose parents were unable or too careless to give them an education, and this made it possible for a very large percentage of them to grow up in ignorance. Believing that education ought to be the birthright of every citizen of the British Empire, and that intelligence is the best guarantee for good citizenship, the state thought it right to give them an education, and therefore it took the schools of the country under its control. Instead of having pay schools, instead of having parochial schools, instead of having church schools, we have what is known as free schools controlled by the state. As soon as the free school system was introduced in Upper Canada it was regarded as the best system yet devised for the people, and it has been controlled by the state from that time to the present. Now, then, I said that the trend of the age is towards the state taking control of education. Why do I say so? Because the day of private schools and parochial schools has passed away. I am strengthened in that opinion by the history of other countries as well as our own. I need not cite the case of Upper Canada, because no one would pretend to stand up to-day and say that we should revert to the old system of allowing churches to keep up their schools and private individuals to keep up their schools, instead of the state doing it. But we have gone further than that by taxing ourselves for the education of children whose parents are not able to pay for it, by giving money out of the public treasury to support poor schools where the people are not able to tax themselves for it. In the province of Ontario the development of our educational system has been along that line for the last thirty or forty years, until it is a recognized fact to-day that no one would pretend to deny. I say again that the trend of the age is towards free schools, as shown by what has taken place in other countries. I take a work that I hold in my hand, and in it I find facts drawn from the history of other countries which strengthen my conviction in that regard. According to the "Encyclopedia Britannica," Vol. 8, page 712, I find that all over Europe education is passing from the control of the clergy into the hands of the state. Europe is older than our country; it has learned, as every country learns, by the experience of the past, and their experience has taught them the wisdom of taking the control of education from under the hands of the clergy, from under the hands of the church, and transferring it to the control of the state. The same is said to be true even in Mexico, and Central America, and in South America. Then when I come to look at some other countries I find that in Ireland, that benighted country, where it is sometimes said the people are steeped in ignorance, they have a system of national schools. Under the national school system of Ireland, Roman Catholics and Protestants are educated together. They have learned by experience the folly of keeping children apart when they are educated, because separate education, instead of harmonizing opposing sentiments and feelings, tends to accentuate them, tends to make them worse. Therefore, the wisdom of the administration of Ireland has led them to devise what might be regarded as a national school system. Australia has also come to the same conclusion, because the common school system of Australia is based on the principles of perfect religious freedom, and the non-establishment of any particular form of religious belief. I need not give the history of the United States in regard to this question, as it is doubtless well known to members of this House. Although attempt after attempt has been made by the Roman Catholics, and in all honesty, in all sincerity, to bring the educational affairs of that country under the control of their church, as they have no doubt a perfect right to attempt to do, I say that great country, which is regarded as in the forefront of advancement and civilization to-day, has never accepted the principle of separate schools, and has never allowed education to pass from under her control. To-day her schools are free to every child of the state, and the children must be educated together in all state-supported schools. Denominational religion is not taught in her schools, but the principles of religion that are common to all, are inculcated in many of them. I know something about the schools in the United States, because I passed some time in her educational institutions; and although the state teaches some of the doctrines of religion that are common to all creeds, the same as are taught in many parts of this country. I heard no objection from any Roman Catholic. And although, as I say, application has been made from time to time for separate schools, the state has never abandoned her control of education. No doubt some honorable gentlemen will remember that two or three years ago the question was asked of one of the high dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church of the United States, Mons. Satolli, Would the church in the United States allow the children of Roman Catholics to be educated in what were commonly called godless schools, and the answer was that under the circumstances, they could do so; under the circumstances they were at liberty to send their children to the public schools. The Roman Catholics do not enjoy the privilege of separate schools there, as they do here. Now, then, in Mexico also, free public schools have been established, and whoever sends a child to a parochial school is fined. Experience has proven the wisdom of preventing parochial schools from controlling the education of the country, and the state has made it a punishable offence for any one to send a child to a parochial school. On this question I find some facts quoted by Dr. Sidney. In the Republic of Central America children between the ages of eight and fourteen years are required to attend public schools. Education is free, compulsory, and under state control. Then I come to South America, to the republics of that continent with their 50,000,000 of population, and what system do we find there? Until twenty years ago the education of the children was carried on in parochial schools and under the control of the clergy, but experience has shown the unwisdom of that system of education, and they have changed it. Their schools now are public, under state control, and compulsory. The education of that great country is to-day closely modelled after the system prevailing in the state of Michigan. In that great country of fifty millions of people, whoever sends a child to a parochial school is fined, and the parochial schools have been closed. Free schools have been established in Uruguay, and Venezuela, under a system much the same as that prevailing in other republics I have mentioned. Then we come to New Brunswick, and we find that they have practically state schools. They have state schools in the province of Nova Scotia, they have state schools in

Prince Edward Island. Then, I say, I am justified in the conclusion that the trend of the age is towards the state controlling the education of the country. Why, I ask, should Manitoba be compelled to go back to what is really an obsolete, an unsatisfactory, and an unsuitable condition of things for the needs of that province? For that reason again, I am opposed to this Bill. Now, Sir, we are told that we have a right to legislate because there is a grievance. What law has ever been passed restricting a man's rights, that does not leave a grievance behind it? Is there any law that restricts us in any walk of life that does not give rise to some grievance, if we are to consult our own feelings when rights have been taken away from us? But if, in the interest of the state, in the interest of humanity, it is necessary even to create a grievance by taking away certain rights, the state is justified in taking away those rights in the interest of the whole. And though there may be a grievance behind it, it is no justification for going back to the old condition of things simply because it is a grievance. Was there not a grievance in New Brunswick when the provincial government took control of the schools and changed the system? The Minister of Marine and Fisheries fought that question eloquently in this House, declaring there was a grievance and a very serious grievance. But when Sir John Macdonald was appealed to, he refused to give back what they regarded as their rights, because, he said, it was the right of a province to control that matter, and he informed them that it was their duty to go to the highest tribunal, the people, and fight out the question there. He told them to go first to the provincial legislature, and then to go to the people, because the people had the power to change the representation in the legislature. He told the representatives of the minority to go before the people and convince them that their demand was a right and just one, and, he said, there was sufficient justice in humanity to grant what is right.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will permit me an explanation, as he referred to me by name. He has stated that the late Sir John Macdonald, when appealed to by the minority of New Brunswick, told them that he could give them no relief, but to go to the legislature. I think the hon. gentleman will find that there they were sent, not to the legislature, but to the courts, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. SPROULE. I read the discussion a few days ago. The contention is that the courts of justice offer no redress and, therefore, the people have to come here for redress, and that the British North America Act contemplated that we should come here for redress. But the understanding, as expressed by Sir John Macdonald, was that you must go back to your own legislature, and if you do not obtain relief there, then appeal to the electors, because they can put out the members of the legislature; but, in Sir John Macdonald's opinion, we had no right to interfere. I read the debate in this way, and I am in the judgment of those who have read it as well as myself.

Will Manitoba settle this question if left alone? I believe, if Manitoba were left alone she would ultimately settle it: perhaps the minority would not get all they expect or claim, but the province would settle it as satisfactorily as it was settled in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, and the other provinces. I have sufficient respect for the judgment and fairness of the people of that great country, many of whom went there from Ontario and Quebec, to believe that they do not want to act unfairly to any of the people there, and if left alone they would settle the question in a way that would be satisfactory to the minority after a time. The minority are taking advantage of the law which exists there to-day, and I find they are bringing the schools under the control of the law in increasing numbers every year. I have, therefore, the right to assume that not very great dissatisfaction exists there.

Who are clamouring for this law? Are the people of Manitoba clamouring for it? It is true that a largely signed petition has been sent here asking for the change, and I cannot shut my eyes to that fact; but it was got up, I am credibly informed, by the hierarchy, and was signed by people who were asked to sign it, and they sent down the petition. This was all right. But the greater clamour comes from the province of Quebec, many of whose people know little of the situation, whether separate schools joined with national schools can be worked or not. They are forcing the issue, and they are the party who are forcing the fight on the situation to-day. I do not believe, if they knew the situation as well as the people there do, if they knew the difficulties that Manitoba has to contend with, they would fight strongly and insist so vigorously in forcing on an unwilling people a measure that is not desired there, and compel them to restore the school system which was abolished because it did not suit them.

There are some features of this contest that attract my attention at the present time, and which must attract public attention. One is the voice of the bishops and clergy on the question. We all understand that it is a serious offence to interfere with the rights of a member of Parliament in the discharge of his legislative duties or to intimidate him. Those of us who know anything about the Roman Catholic religion, are aware that it is a very serious thing to take away from any member of that church the rights of the church, to tell a man who believes that through that church alone he can find salvation, that the ecclesiastical authorities will take away from him the rights of the church. I believe it to be a very serious threat when you tell any man discharging his duties as a member of Parliament, or is about to go back to the electors for endorsement or otherwise, that if you do so and so the church will declare you to be no longer a Roman Catholic. I have here a statement which was put out a few days ago, and it seems to me a very serious matter with respect to Roman Catholics in this House. I am sorry to mention it, and I do not do it for the purpose of creating any feeling, because I know it may make some hon. members who are Roman Catholics feel that I am doing what I should not, as a Protestant do, in speaking of it. But I only speak of it because of the sentiments enunciated by the leader of the Opposition the other night. That hon. gentleman said: While I love my church and revere my church, and respect my church, yet in the discharge of my duty as a Liberal in this House, following the principles of Liberalism as enunciated, known and carried out by the great Reformers of the British Empire, I refuse to be controlled in the discharge of my duty even by my church, because I regard it as the first duty of a member of Parliament to do his duty to the state, and while I am unwilling to come into conflict with my church, I believe I know the situation better than they do; I do not regard it as offensive because they imagine they are right in doing so; and I think they are rather objects for sympathy than otherwise. Father Lacombe, a very respectable missionary—I do not blame him for his utterance, because he thought he was doing right, and doing what he conceived to be his duty—declared that no man who opposed this Remedial Bill would be regarded as a Catholic. He said:

If, which may God not grant, you do not believe it to be your duty to accede to our just demands, and that the Government, which is anxious to give us the promised law, be beaten and overthrown while keeping firm to the end of the struggle, I inform you, with regret, that the Episcopacy, like one man, united to the clergy, will rise to support those who may have fallen to defend us.

Archbishop Langevin of St. Boniface has stated his views in these words:

It has been said, falsely, that the Catholic hierarchy in this Dominion of ours is to settle the school question. No, the Catholic hierarchy—you know it, and I can say it plainly—the Catholic hierarchy leads the Catholics in their religious conviction, and all those who do not follow the hierarchy are not Catholics.

And he has instructed them that this was clearly their duty, because the church instructed them in their line of conscience, by telling them that it was their duty to support the Bill which gives back these rights to the church.

When the hierarchy has spoken there is no use for any Catholic to say to the contrary, for if he does he is no longer a Catholic. Such a man may carry the title, but I declare this as a bishop: I say to-night, and I say it with plain authority, a Catholic who does not follow the hierarchy on the school question is no more a Catholic, and who will be the one to entitle such a one to the name of Catholic? Where is the society or government who will give him the right to call himself a Catholic when I in my authority as a Catholic bishop, declare that such a man has no right to the name.

Then, I say, the bishop is putting them outside the pale of the church, and that is a very serious matter for Catholics. Sir, I regard that as a most unfortunate thing, because it is interfering with what most people in this country look upon as the right of every member of Parliament to do, namely, to follow the dictates of his own judgment in matters where the state must control, and where the state must be above the church and above religion, and where members believe that they know the condition of things better than the men who are attempting to give advice. I do not blame the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church for doing so. I do not blame them for bringing every influence they can to bear upon the church to do so, but I think it is unfortunate that that influence should be brought to bear. A man who has the courage of his convictions, and who has the manhood and the integrity to say: In the face of all that, I regard my duty to the state as so and so, and I shall carry it out, notwithstanding the fact that I may be buried under the anathema of the church, and notwithstanding that the whole church shall be arrayed against me, and support the party opposed to me; I say that the man who has the moral courage to say that will be endorsed by the people of this country. They will regard him with respect and honour, and they will look upon him as a greater statesman than they did before. This is one of the features of this contest which makes me to-day go very strongly against this Bill. We are told that if we do not legislate in this case, Quebec may take away the rights from the Protestants of that province. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) speak in the generous and manly tone he did this afternoon, when he said that whether the minority in Manitoba got their rights or not, Quebec would never descend to any principle so low. I always had a high opinion of the French-Canadian people, I always regarded them as chivalrous, as honourable, and as disposed to do right to the minority down there. But above and beyond all that, I say that whether we legislate or do not legislate, the rights of the minority are not in danger in that province. There was a solemn compact entered into with the province of Quebec in this matter, and I believe that no person would dare to break up the original contract which was entered into between the two Canadas before confederation, and embodied in the Confederation Act of 1867. And should the people down in that country wish to legislate upon that question, and if they felt as strongly on it as do the people of Manitoba, would the people of Manitoba be disposed to interfere with their rights? I think they would not. And if the people of Quebec came to this House would they be inclined to regard with quietness and courtesy any effort that was made to interfere with their rights. I think they would not. They would be the very strongest to create an agitation that would be large in its proportions, and dangerous in its results, if they were not allowed to control their rights, as they were allowed in the Jesuits' Estates case. They would tell us that any legislation against them was an interference with the rights belonging to their province, and they would not brook any interference. Now what should the Government do with this question at the present time? I say they should leave it to the people of the province of Manitoba to deal with as in their judgment they think best. That was what they should have done in the first place. While the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council said to the minority: You have the right to appeal, what did that mean? Some say that the Government are now only carrying out the judgment of the Privy Council. I do not so understand it. Although that was very fiercely contended a few months ago, no member of the Cabinet to-day will say that the Government is obliged to take this course because of the judgment of the Privy Council. That judgment of the Privy Council was an opinion in the nature of advice to the Governor in Council here. It told them that the minority had the right to appeal to them for a hearing of their case. That was all. They heard that case, and according to their judgment and wisdom they could say either "yes," or "no," you have a grievance and we will change that law, or we will not change it. It was equally their right to say: we will not interfere with Manitoba, or we will interfere. It was the right of this Government to say: if the circumstances are such that we ought to interfere, then we can interfere with it; or, if the condition of things are such in Manitoba that they cannot successfully carry on two educational systems, we shall not interfere with it. But, Sir, this Government were equally at liberty to say either one or the other. There is no judgment of the Privy Council telling this Government to interfere or not to interfere.

Now, we are told that if this Bill is passed the fight will be over. Well, Sir, if I believed that, I would be inclined to go a long way. I would be disposed to do many things I would not otherwise wish to do, if I thought that the passing of this Bill would be a finality in this matter. But, Sir, can I shut my eyes to the agitation going on in the country to-day? Can I shut my eyes to the unanimity of sentiment in Manitoba, where three elections have been run on that question, and where there has been a majority in favour of the rights of the province every time. Can I shut my eyes to the fact, as we are told, that at least 85 per cent of the people of Manitoba are in favour of allowing that province to work out her own destinies according to the law she has placed upon the statute-book? Can I shut my eyes to the fact that all over the country there is no defence of the action of the Government by the press of the country who gauge and educate public sentiment? Can I shut my eyes to the fact that there has been scarcely a gathering all over this Dominion, which says to this Government: Go on and do what you are doing to-day. No, Sir, it is the very reverse. I therefore say that I have no right to assume that the passage of this Bill would be the end of this contest. I do not believe that the heartburnings and the strife that is raised to-day, would all die out in a few months if we force Manitoba to do as she is not inclined to do. I believe that the sentiment of the country does not justify any interference with the province of Manitoba in this matter. I believe that public sentiment of the country is, that there shall be no interference.

Now then, what will be the result to the present Government if they persist in pressing this Bill. It must in my judgment inevitably result either in their defeat in this House, or in their defeat in the country. It may be said that the country has not spoken. We have often asked them of late to appeal to the country, and we have said, that although we believe public sentiment is against you, yet if you appeal to the country, and if the voice of the country says, pass that law, you will be justified in doing it. But they have not appealed to the country, nor given the electorate an opportunity to speak. If they are defeated in this House they must appeal to the country, and if then the judgment of the electorate is that the Government shall go on with the measure, then they will be justified. The Government will be fortified with public opinion behind them, and they will be fortified with the support of many friends in this House who are opposing them to-day. Sir, if I know anything about the public sentiment of the country, I say it is all adverse to the policy of the Government in this matter. Mr. Speaker, I can only express regret, as I did at the beginning of this debate, that I am obliged to place myself in opposition to the Government of the day. However, I do not believe that I am in opposition to the sentiment of the Conservative party of this country when I oppose the Government. I believe that the Government is against public opinion, and that I am with public opinion in doing as I am doing now. I believe I am in harmony with the sentiments of the people of Ontario to-day, when I am standing as I am against the Government on this question. I believe that I am also in harmony with the sentiments of the people of Manitoba when I stand up here to oppose the Government on this occasion. I believe, too, that I am in harmony with the people of the North-west Territories, because the same difficulty is looming up there, and that is another reason which leads me to think that this fight will not be ended soon. If we are successful in forcing Manitoba to-day, the next thing will be to force us to repeal the law which gave national schools to the North-west Territories. The Catholics regard themselves as having a grievance there the same as in Manitoba. Archbishop Langevin said so at Edmonton, I believe. He said: We are not reconciled to the laws which have been put on the statute-book of the North-west Territories; the national schools there do not satisfy us any more than the national schools in Manitoba. Therefore, I say that if the parties who are forcing on this remedial legislation succeed in getting it, the fight will commence in the North-west Territories as soon as the Bill is passed. The school Bill passed in the North-west Assembly has been held in abeyance, and has not yet received the assent of the Lieutenant-Governor. Why is it held in abeyance? Because the clergy do not approve of it. Now, I would venture to ask this Government, as the authority either to veto that law or to allow it to go into operation, what they intend to do with it? Do they intend to give the people of the North-west Territories the right to control education, or do they intend to veto that law? And if they veto it, will they start the fight there which they started on behalf of the minority in Manitoba? Will they continue that fight also for five years, until they secure in the North-west Territories what they wish to secure in Manitoba to-day. I say that this justifies us in believing that the fight will not be ended by this Bill; but that the passage of this Bill would be only the commencement of the fight. The fight must go on, though this Parliament must go to the country, and though dozens of members who support the Bill to-day may be left at home by an exasperated electorate. As John Sandfield Macdonald said at the time of the birth of confederation, if you take from the majority the right to control education, you do not settle the question for ever. It will loom up again. Like Banquo's ghost, it will not down; it will come to the front, and the fight will continue. Therefore, in the interest of humanity, in the interest of the people of Manitoba, who think they ought to enjoy freedom, as every westerner thinks they ought, I ask you, not to exasperate them too far. If you do, the consequences may be something that we do not wish to contemplate to-day. We all hope that the consequences may not be serious; but we all know what the feeling of the people of Manitoba was when we were obliged to hark back and repeal the monopoly clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act; and if we force this measure upon them, the results may be serious, not only to that country, but to confederation, because it tends to destroy provincial autonomy. Then I say, in the interests of all the provinces of this great Dominion, in the interests of the people of that country, who live under a condition of things entirely different from the condition of things here or in the province of Quebec, let them enjoy the rights they are entitled to; let them adopt laws suited to their conditions an environment, and carry out those laws according to their will, so long as they are doing no substantial injustice to any portion of the people. For these reasons I am about to vote against this Bill. I am sometimes told, that, in voting against the Government on this Bill, I am voting for the Opposition. Well, it is fortunate that we can sometimes meet, even if we do not always meet. If I think the Opposition are right, I am generous enough and glad enough to record my vote with theirs. I want to see the Bill killed; the Opposition are moving with the same end in view, therefore, we vote together. I do not regard it as an unmixed evil that I am voting with them. I do not regard it as an unmixed evil that I am voting against the Government, which I have loyally supported these seventeen years, because I think they are wrong on this question, and it is my duty to vote as I think right. Feeling, as I do, that the best thing we can do in the interest of the country is to kill this Bill, I intend to vote for the motion made by the leader of the Opposition; and I was glad that he made that motion, because it gives us an opportunity to vote straight against this Bill, and to kill it, if possible. On other lines I am with the Government. They may see fit to read me out of the party for taking the independent stand I do. If they do so, that is their right, and they can act according to their own sweet will. But, so long as I occupy a seat in this House, I shall regard it as my right to vote according to the dictates of my conscience, and with such understanding as I have, on every measure that comes before this House. Therefore, regarding this Bill as a most obnoxious one, not only as doing away with a system of education that is the very best for the rising generation, but as taking away from the province of Manitoba the right of control in educational matters, which it ought to enjoy, I shall have much pleasure in voting for the six months' hoist.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss the motions which have been placed in your hands, I wish, at the outset, to state that, in my opinion, the question of denominational schools ought not to be approached as a purely political question, still less in a party spirit. The question at issue, in my humble opinion, is one that towers far above purely political or party issues, as it concerns the creed and the conscience of a large number of citizens in this country. I consider further that it would be a death-blow dealt at confederation, if those weighty interests which are dearer to us than life itself were used as a political foot-ball by politicians and were solved from the standpoint of the more or less ephemeral interests of the party in power, instead of being determined from the standpoint of right and justice. In support of this position, let me appeal to the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition on the 5th February, 1895, before 6,000 people in the city of Toronto :

I have been asked to state what position I occupy upon that question (the Manitoba School question). Let me tell you, then, at once, I do not wish her or anywhere else, to make any political capital out of that. Even if I had it in my power to be borne into office over that question I would not do it.

This solemn statement, the hon. leader of the Opposition reiterated at the monster meeting of Sohmer Park in Montreal and elsewhere. Never, so far as I know, did he take any other position on that question. As a matter of fact, you may read all his speeches and you will find that he has been dealing all along with this question in an incidental manner, placing all the time in the fore-ground the economical issues of the day, which are the ground-work of the platform of the Liberal party. That the school question is not a party question, is further evinced by the fact that it was not embodied in the platform formulated by the great convention held in this city in 1893. Still at the time, it was as much a burning question as it is to-day. The session had scarcely been brought to a close, and the Government policy had been arraigned by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) in a motion of want of confidence, which I had the honour to second. Now, you may read all the resolutions which were adopted and you will not find a single sentence, a single word, a single syllable in connection with the Manitoba school question. And why so? The reason is that, as every body was satisfied that it was impossible to be of one mind on the question, it was better to leave every one free to act as he pleased. Mr. Speaker, I have endorsed the programme drawn up by the Liberal convention in 1893, and I still adhere to it in its integrity. I voted confidence in the hon. leader of the Opposition, and in every circumstance I have expressed the respect and the deep admiration I entertain for him. I have nothing to take back. It is a matter of genuine and deep regret to me to be under the necessity of separating from my leader and registering my vote against the resolution which he has moved in amendment to the second reading of the Remedial Bill, and here are the grounds which warrant my taking that course.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) I am one of those who conscientiously believe in denominational schools for Catholics and for Protestants as well, for Manitoba Catholics as well as for Quebec Protestants. I believe in the inalienable right of the head of a family to decide in which school his children are to be educated, in which religion they will be brought up, and I look upon as an intolerable usurpation any attempt at infringing that right.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) In looking over the educational legislation of the province of Manitoba, I find that in 1870 a complete system of separate schools was set up in favour of Protestants, then in a minority, and in favour of Catholics, who were then in a majority. A council of public instruction was established, comprising a Catholic section, having under its control the Catholic schools, and a Protestant section, having under its control the Protestant schools. The public grants were distributed according to population, and the school taxes were appropriated to the maintenance of Catholic or Protestant schools according to the religious tenets of the rate-payers. That state of things continued for twenty years. In 1890, two Acts were passed, altogether doing away with that state of things, substituting to the separate schools a so-called system of public schools; but in reality Protestant, which despoiled the Catholics of all the rights they had hitherto enjoyed. It was, in my humble opinion, an iniquity, an act of intolerable tyranny which it was impossible to tamely acquiesce in. The Catholics vigorously protested, but it was of no avail. Vainly did they petition for the exercise of the federal power of disallowance. This action, had it been adopted, would perhaps have resulted in a momentary commotion, but never would it have led to an agitation fraught with such danger as the one which we now witness with so much sorrow. After having twice run the gauntlet of the judicial tribunals, the Catholics now come before this House, with a judgment of the Privy Council to the effect that their most sacred rights have been infringed upon. They come before this House, asking that their schools be restored to them, that the imprescriptible rights of their conscience be respected, and that a stop be put to tyranny, under the unbearable weight of which they have too long suffered. Are we to turn a deaf ear to their prayer? Shall we tell them in so many words by our vote that might is right, and that there are no longer any rights which the majority are bound to respect? Are we then to shrink from the most important, the most imperative, the most honourable duty which is incumbent upon this Parliament, that of extending our protection to the minority in the enjoyment of their rights? As for me, Sir, I say I cannot do so. Therefore, I will vote for the second reading of the Bill, on this ground, first, that it lays down as a principle the restoration of separate schools in favour of the Manitoba minority.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) In the second place, I vote for this Bill, on the further ground that it practically sanctions the principal of federal interference, with a view to the protection of the constitutional rights of minorities. It is high time, Sir, that we should loudly proclaim that principle, because we do not know when other minorities will come before this House and claim the redress of grievances similar to those of the Manitoba minority. For fifteen years, the Conservative party in Ontario has adopted as the first plank of its political platform the abolition of the separate school system in that province. Have the hon. gentlemen forgotten the electoral contests of 1882, 1886, 1890 and 1894, and the savage onslaught directed by Mr. Meredith and his friends against everything that bore the Catholic name? Can any hon. gentleman in this House give us the assurance that, were the exercise of the principle of federal interference withheld in the case of Manitoba, the province of Ontario, which is by far more powerful, would not altogether do away with the separate schools, without troubling itself about the constitution or the judicial tribunals? And I put the question to the hon. gentlemen: what is there that could deter the Catholic majority in Quebec from dealing in the same way with the Protestant minority in that province? It is really too bad, from the standpoint of the principle of federal interference, that the aggression did not originate in Quebec? Those very men who cry out against federal interference would be the first, the most eager to resort to the best and most efficacious remedies, such as disallowance or the passage of a Remedial Bill, to the effect of bringing the Protestant minority under the aegis of Parliament. Can any man, in his sober senses, either in this House or out of it, have any doubt but that a decisive intervention would have been quickly and effectually secured? Does any hon. gentleman believe for one moment that the Protestant minority would have been kept waiting five years, forced to run the gauntlet of the judicial tribunals, and to crawl on its knees before a hesitating, if not a refractory House? Why, then, have two weights and two measures? Are the eternal principles of right and justice not the same everywhere and for everybody? I just said, Sir, that, from the very fact that other minorities were threatened with the same fate, intervention was expedient. Allow me, Sir, to bring back to the remembrance of the House two threats uttered by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. McCarthy) during a memorable debate which took place in this House in February, 1890, as recorded in "Hansard." He said:

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL.

I do not say, Sir, that the time may not come when it will be proper to move—though in that I do not find much sympathy in this House—to do away with the dual language in this Chamber.

And further on:

And I do hope that before very long the delegation from the province of Ontario will call on this House for its aid to blot out the separate school clause from the British North America Act, which limits and fetters the people of that province. That clause was carried by a majority of French-Canadians and was imposed upon the people of Ontario against their will.

Such would infallibly be, in my opinion, the conclusions reached, should we vote down the Bill on its second reading, thereby defeating the principle of federal interference. I now come to the third ground which prompts me to support this measure, that is the unconquerable hostility of the Manitoba government to the principle of separate schools. The Greenway government, we are told, are ready to make concessions, provided that the remedial order and Bill be withdrawn. They are ready to give the minority their share of the public grants, and to allow religious teaching to be given in their schools at certain stated hours. I am willing to grant that the Greenway government are disposed to promise a great deal and to do something in that direction. But will any one in cold blood pretend to say that our Manitoba co-religionists would be justified to exchange the protection afforded by the constitution and the law for a mere system of toleration which could be taken away from them at any moment? They have struggled for six years past and they have not yet succeeded in having their grievances set right. And it is at the very moment when they are about to gain the battle, that you want them to lay down their arms and to surrender at discretion? Such a proposition cannot be seriously entertained. Now, invert the terms of the proposition and substitute to the Manitoba legislature that of Quebec, and to the Catholic minority substitute the Protestant minority and tell me how the latter would welcome the proposition to waive their claims and the pledges given by the constitution, and what for? To surrender without any stipulation of conditions, to the persecuting power! The Greenway government do not want to accept and will never agree to accept the separate school principle, that of state-aided schools, receiving aid and protection from the provincial government. They have worked up to such a pitch provincial fanaticism that it would probably not be safe for them to recede from their position. And far from making any concessions, they have reiterated their firm determination to fight to the bitter end. The local legislature is now in session, and what do we see? From the very first day, the government submitted to the legislature a series of resolutions protesting not only against federal interference, but against the re-establishment of separate schools. One of the resolutions reads as follows:—

Therefore, be it resolved: That this House notes with cordial approval that the advisers of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor in the Order in Council of the 21st December, 1895, did decline to recommend the re-establishment of state-aided separate schools.

And in order that there might be no doubt as to the meaning of the resolution, Mr. Sifton explained it as follows:—

For himself he could see no other meaning, and certainly there was no intention of any other meaning than reiterating the position, the positive, definite conclusion that the government would in no way, shape or form be a party to the re-establishment of state-aided separate schools.

As the government had gone to the country on a statement of their position on this question, it was now only right that the members elected should have an opportunity of placing themselves on record.

And that policy so clearly enunciated was endorsed by a vote of 31 against 7. Mr. Fisher, who was anxious to check that torrent of hostility, appealed to the good sense and moderation of the legislature. He moved a resolution, the conclusion of which I will read to the House:

Therefore, this House is of opinion that the present situation calls for prudent and conciliatory action in the hope that such a result may, by wise counsels, be avoided, and to this end that the time is opportune for a calm and dispassionate review by the legislature of the matters at issue between the majority and minority with a view to consider whether a reasonable settlement of the question may not be found which will avoid all excuse for federal interference.

That motion was defeated by a vote of 30 against 7. To my mind, it is beyond a doubt that, whatever favours or concessions the Manitoba government may be disposed to grant to the Catholics in the administration of public schools, they will never agree to the restoration of denominational schools. In consequence, I have reached the irrefragable conclusion that the only remedy calculated to restore to our compatriots their schools, is a federal statute. Now, Sir, having laid down the principles and reached the conclusion I have just mentioned, I come to consider the Bill, as it stands. I for one do not look upon the Bill as an ideal one. The principles upon which it is founded are, no doubt, excellent, but they have forgotten to draw from them all the conclusions. Thus I look upon as a very unfortunate idea that of allowing the provincial government three months either to accept or ignore the Bill, to appoint the members of the School Board of Education or in default of the provincial government, to empower the Federal Government to make the appointments. Were any doubts left as to the tendencies of the local government, were not their hostility so open and so emphatic, there would perhaps be some excuse for that alternative. But under the circumstances it is, to say the least, an act of weakness. The Bill recognizes to Catholics the right to share proportionately in any grant made out of public funds for educational purposes; but it fails to oblige the province to make such grants in proportion to those which may be granted to public schools. To my mind, that clause is entirely illusory. Another defective provision is that which invests the provincial government with the exclusive power of appointing inspectors to whom is committed the duty of ascertaining the efficiency of the separate schools. It is quite clear that with such provisions as these, the separate schools will lack efficient visitation and will not be subsidized by the provincial authorities. Evidently, the Bill is based upon the false assumption that it will be accepted and fairly put in operation by the local government. How such an idea came to spring up in the minds of our Ministers is more than I can understand. It seems to me that the Bill ought rather to proceed from the principle that the provincial government having shown openly and reiterated their hostility to separate schools under any shape, the federal law should provide for their creation and their maintenance under the exclusive control and protection of the Dominion Government. In short, the separate schools should have been made a purely federal institution until, at least, the local legislature had passed a new statute restoring to the minority the full enjoyment of all their rights. Through their having adopted a different principle, the Dominion Government run the risk of securing from their legislation but partial and unsatisfactory results for the minority. Neither do I mean to take back or to mitigate any of the charges which I have made in regard to the unsettled and wavering government policy which has only resulted in complicating the position, in fostering an agitation fraught with danger and in making more difficult the adjustment of the matter. Far from taking back any of those charges, I make bold to arraign the Government on a further ground still more serious; it is that of having endangered the passage of the measure in not having brought it down at the very outset of the session, in losing valuable time in intestine squabbles and by throwing for a whole month as a bone of contention to the disputation of parties a budget which they had no intention to have voted by the House. If, owing to the threatened obstruction which the Government measure might be offered in the Committee of the Whole, both by their friends and by my own friends who oppose the Bill, it could not be pressed through this House and made law before this Parliament has reached the natural term of its life, that is to say before the 25th of April, the Government will be held responsible and will warrant the belief of those who challenge the sincerity of the Ministers.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) I think the hon. member would find it difficult to substantiate his statement, as to some of his friends intending to make obstruction. As to me, I must say that it is the first intimation I have of it, and I do not think our friends on this side of the House are harbouring any such thought. Whether the followers of the Government intend to pursue such a course is more than I can say.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Well, then let us say that the obstructionists are among the followers of the Government. Notwithstanding the shortcomings of the Bill, which may be corrected in the Committee of the Whole, through the amendments of which the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) has given notice, I shall vote against the six months' hoist and in favour of the second reading of the Bill. I, taking that position, I have the support of the Catholic minority in Manitoba; I have the support of the most distinguished representative of the Catholics of that province, a Liberal like myself, the member for Provencher, a thoroughly French and Catholic constituency, the Hon. Mr. Prendergast, who, during the debate on the Sifton resolution, at the sitting of the 27th February last, from his seat in the legislative assembly, thus delivered himself:

Under these circumstances, I consider that the Bill, although defective in some respects, is satisfactory, and if I had the honour to sit in the Dominion Parliament I would vote for it. I believe that even without the aid of the government, the separate schools would get on, provided that the remedial law gave the Catholics the right of collecting their taxes and relieved them of the burden of being taxed for the support of other schools.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, this is how I size up the position: 1. The Bill which is before us recognizes the right of the Manitoba Catholics to their own schools; 2. It provides for the establishment of a system which will enable them to establish, control and maintain their schools; 3. It dispenses them with contributing towards the support of public schools; 4. It allows them to tax themselves for the support of separate schools. As the men best authorized to speak in behalf of the Manitoba minority accept this state of things as satisfactory and declare that, strictly speaking, they can get on without the legislative grants; and further, that if they were members of this House, they would vote for the Bill; and as I do not wish to be more Catholic than the Pope is, nor more loyal than the Queen is, I shall vote for the Bill. But there is uppermost in my mind another consideration which prompts me to take this course. It is the deeply seated connection that it is in the public interest that this question should be settled before the general elections, in order to remove this bone of contention from the field of party politics. I deprecate the perpetuation of this quarrel, because I do not want the discussion of trade to be completely lost sight of and hindered by the thrusting of this sectarian contention into the arena. It is obvious that if the law did not pass, the next elections would be exclusively fought out on this question of federal interference, and the voters would not be able to express their opinion on the evils under the weight of which we are being crushed. The Liberals believe in their policy, in their chief, in their programme. The Conservatives mean to invoke with pride their eighteen years of power and protection. What interest have both parties to perpetuate a situation and a crisis which have continued already too long? I appeal to all those who desire to see peace, harmony, prosperity prevail in this country, to put an end to this agitation, in awarding justice and right to whom justice and right are due, and in restoring political order in the country. Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I desire to settle a question which is of a somewhat personal interest to me. Some public sheets have stated that in supporting the Remedial Bill, I was deserting my leader, and the attitude I had taken in the past in order to assume a new role. That is a gratuitous assumption. Sir, and to disapprove it, I need but refer to the well defined attitude which I took on the question at issue, from the very first day when the question was brought before this House. On the 7th March, 1893, three years ago, I solemnly pledged myself, as follows:—

Should the hon. the Minister of Justice pledge himself to adopt such remedial legislation as might be calculated to redress the grievances complained of, in accordance with his report of the 21st March, 1891, I am ready, with a large number of my friends, on this side of the House, to lend him a loyal support, thus making up the loss of a few votes among his own friends.

In the month of July, 1895, I reiterated that statement in identical words before this House. I have never flinched from my determination to support a Remedial Bill, and I will stick to the end, regardless of consequences, to the course I have so far pursued, and which has never been censured neither by my chief nor by any Liberal newspaper.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, since this debate was opened, I have heard several members give utterance on the floor of this House to their regret that such protracted and acrimonious discussions should have been raised in connection with the school question. What occurs here should not be wondered at, as the very same spectacle has been witnessed in all the countries where religious opinion is divided. What happens here occurred also in Germany, in France and in England, where numerous and hot disputes have arisen in connection with the education of youth and childhood. As far as France is concerned, the hon. members of this House are quite aware of the fact that for eighteen years, during the whole reign of Louis Philippe, the Catholics, although an overwhelming majority of the French people belong to that religious persuasion, were not allowed to have schools conducted according to their own religious tenets. Not only they did not receive any grant from the state, but the state put under the ban those schools which were wholly supported by private citizens. The hon. members remember, no doubt, that remarkable incident in the life of the great French orators, de Montalembert and Lacordaire, who, having one day attempted to open free schools in Paris for the education of youth; were arrested by the police. I am happy to state that they did not go that far in England. Still, a few years ago, the Gladstone government was defeated on that very same question of public instruction, owing to the fact that they could not come to an agreement as to how public instruction should be organized in Ireland. I heard, a little while ago, the hon. member for Durham East (Mr. Craig) give expression to a desire, which, I do hope, will never be realized. He said the day was fast approaching when, in his opinion, religious teaching would be banished from the schools. I am sorry I cannot concur with the hon. member in his opinion, and that not only from a Catholic standpoint, but from a Protestant standpoint as well, and I may say I guard myself on high Protestant authority. I remember in that connection, reading last year a pamphlet containing a report of a meeting held in England. The meeting was held in connection with religious teaching in the schools, and the Bishop of Manchester made an address, in which he recorded deplorable facts showing what had resulted from purely secular schools, known also as godless schools. He recorded his own experience in Australia in that respect. It would appear that in Australia, for over twenty years, religious teaching has been altogether eliminated from the schools, and the Bishop of Manchester quoted many statistics to show the deplorable results of that system on the morality of the people and especially of the youth in that country. The same experiment was repeated in France. In that country the liberty of instruction, it is true, is recognized; but what does that freedom amount to? It consists in this, that Catholics, Protestants and Jews have the right of opening schools and teaching therein whatever they like, but at their own expense. In the state-aided schools, no religious teaching is given. It is distressing to find that religious principles are disappearing in France, and with them public and private morality. Frightful scandals have quite recently come to light in France. Those scandals, I venture to say, are not the outcome of the government policy, but rather that of the educational system in vogue in that country. The school troubles in Canada may be traced back to a pretty remote period. They originated with the Ontario Catholic schools, and were finally settled by the educational statute passed in 1863. When confederation was established, all those who took part in its formation, were anxious to ward off the difficulties which had been encountered under the old regime, and which had given rise to discussions much to be regretted. In order to accomplish this object, it was decided that power should be given to the local legislatures to make laws with regard to education, but no plenary power was accorded, and there was introduced a limitation, to the effect that the legislature should have no power prejudicially to affect the rights of the minorities, existing at the time of the union, in educational matters. There was also another provision to the effect that, whenever a local legislature should pass a law prejudicially affecting a privilege of the minority in educational matters, that minority should have the right of appealing to the Governor General in Council and to seek for relief and the redress of their grievances. Such was the enactment passed at the time of confederation.

Now, what happened, after the entrance of the province of Manitoba into the confederation? The province of Manitoba was annexed to the confederation in 1870. It is beyond controversy that when that province was annexed to the Dominion of Canada, and when it came to providing for the drafting of the terms of union, the object which the framers of the Act had in view, when drafting the Bill, was to obviate the school troubles which had been met with in New Brunswick, where the minority later on, appealed to the Federal Parliament. Parliament debated at great length this New Brunswick school question during the sessions of 1872 and 1873. The question at issue with reference to the New Brunswick school question was this: A law had been passed in 1871 by the local legislature doing away with the schools of the Catholic minority of that province. The minority petitioned the Federal Government, praying for the disallowance of the obnoxious law; the contention was that it was unconstitutional. The Federal Government deemed it expedient to obtain the opinion of the law officers of the Crown in England, and they applied for the opinion of the law officers, because at the time they could neither refer the question to the Supreme Court which had not yet been constituted nor to the Privy Council of England. Therefore they thought that the opinion of the law officers should be obtained as to the legality of the statute. The answer was that the law was not unconstitutional, and the ground on which they vested their opinion was that the denominational schools in question were not in existence under the law, prior to confederation, and existed only by practice. Now, the experience acquired in connection with the New Brunswick school troubles was turned to account, and at the time of the drafting of the charter of the future province of Manitoba, provision was made or thought to have been made to prevent the recurrence of such difficulties. Such was, beyond any doubt, the intention of the framers of the Manitoba Act. Clause 93 of the British North America Act contains an enactment conferring power on the provincial legislatures, exclusively, to make laws in relation to education. It is also enacted that nothing in any law they may pass should interfere with or prejudicially affect the rights acquired by any religious minority under laws passed prior to confederation. In the Manitoba Act, undoubtedly, the words "by practice" were added, with a view to obviating the difficulties which have occurred in New Brunswick. Such is the way in which they dealt with that question in framing the Manitoba Act. Unfortunately, from the Privy Council judgment in the case of Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg, it appears that the Manitoba Act did not contain the guarantees of protection which its authors had in view, and that, in consequence, the Catholic minority in Manitoba did not secure the protection which it was evidently the intent of the law to give them. In 1871, the Manitoba legislature passed a statute establishing a separate school system for that province. Later on, that law was consolidated and amended in 1881, but I will pass over the amendments which have been made, and deal exclusively with the law of 1871, under which had been set up the separate school system. It is not on record that the law in question did give rise to any important debates at the time it was enacted. At that time Protestants and Roman Catholics were then in about equal numbers. Neither is it recorded that the law in question did meet with any serious opposition in the Manitoba legislature. What was then the educational system created by the law of 1871? Before going any further, Sir, let me point out that there exists an important difference between the system of dissentient schools, such as it obtains in the province of Quebec, and the separate school system, as it exists in the province of Ontario. Many people in the province of Quebec are under the impression that the law concerning the separate schools of the province of Ontario is similar to that existing in the province of Quebec; and I must say that such persons labour under a very serious misapprehension. There are notable differences between the two systems, and it will suffice, in order to prove my point, to mention the main provisions of the Quebec law compared with the Ontario educational law. In the province of Ontario, the religious minority, which, as the hon. members are aware, is Catholic, is entitled to separate schools; but, Sir, those schools remain under the direct control of the Government, under the control of the Minister of Education. They are under the immediate supervision of inspectors appointed by the government, and the religious minority has no direct control over the appointment of the inspectors. I do not say, Sir, that the religious minority cannot exercise an indirect influence over the appointment of those inspectors, but, even if it does, it is only indirectly, because the latter are selected by the government of the day. That influence, of course, may be brought into play through the ordinary channels, but not otherwise. Such is the system prevailing in the province of Ontario. The separate schools in that province are under the immediate control of the Department of Education, under the control of the head of that department. Such is, in short, the Ontario system.

But, Sir, such is not the system of separate schools that obtains in the province of Quebec, and about that system I may speak with a thorough knowledge of the matter, as, for about nine years past, I have had the honour to be one of the members of the Council of Public Instruction for the province. The Quebec system differs materially from the Ontario system, in this respect, that, with us, in Quebec, the schools are under the control of the Council of Public Instruction, but that council is subdivided into two sections, the Catholic committee, and the Protestant committee. Each of these religious denominations enjoy a complete and distinct organization in educational matters, practically speaking. One might say, judging from the standpoint of the Protestant schools or of their organization, that the province of Quebec is exclusively Protestant. If, on the other hand, you were to judge from the Catholic standpoint, you might be tempted to say that you are in an exclusively Catholic province, and therefore, that the schools are exclusively Catholic. The organization which is styled the Council of Public Instruction of the province is composed of Catholic and Protestant members. That council consists of a certain number of members who control all matters educational. The Catholic bishops of the province, the apostolic missionaries are ex-officio members of the Catholic committee. To these ex-officio members are added an equal number of Catholic laymen as members, and an equal number of Protestant members is added to that of Catholic laymen. Such is, Sir, the composition of the Council of Public Instruction in the province of Quebec. As I said, this council is divided into two sections, the Protestant committee and the Catholic committee. The Protestant committee of the council has exclusively under its control all the schools of the Protestant minority in the province. I may here, say, to the credit of my province, that the Quebec legislature has been so liberal, so generous towards the minority as to go to the length of introducing the following enactment in its educational law. The superintendent of Public Instruction is ex-officio member of each committee, and the legislature, through respect for the minority, has introduced into its educational statute an enactment to the effect that the superintendent, notwithstanding that he is ex-officio member of each committee, has the right of voting only in the committee on which devolves the consideration of matters pertaining to his own faith. Therefore, Sir, if the superintendent happens to be a Catholic, he has no right to vote as member of the Protestant committee of Public Instruction. He is free to join in the debate, to take part in the proceedings, to give expression to his views, but he has no right to try to have those views carried by the committee, although he be a member of that committee. Likewise, if the superintendent happens to be a Protestant, he may, as member of the Catholic committee, take part in the debates, and in the proceedings with the other members of that committee, but he has no right to vote. Practically, those two committees really constitute two different bodies; and it is equivalent to having two councils of Public Instruction, a Catholic council and a Protestant council. A striking proof that the council of Public Instruction as a body exercises no control over the schools of either religious creeds, is found in the fact that, since I am a member of the council, there was held only one meeting, and that several years ago. That council, which is composed of a Catholic committee and a Protestant committee has had but one meeting these nine years past, and that meeting was called merely to adopt certain amendments to the law, interesting both Protestants and Catholics. They have come to the conclusion that it was perfectly useless to call together the Council of Public Instruction, and that it was preferable to hold separate meetings of either the Catholic or the Protestant committee, according to the requirements of the case. It was but last week that a sub-committee met to discuss the consolidation of the educational laws, as the matter proves to be of common interest to Protestants and Catholics alike. We, on our side, appointed a Catholic sub-committee, and the members of the Protestant committee appointed one on their side, and both sub-committees will take into consideration the scheme laid before them. Therefore, as I said, the Quebec Protestants have complete control over their schools in the province. The same applies to Catholics. So far, I have dealt with the general management of the schools. I come now to another point: what machinery does the law provide for the establishment of separate schools in the province of Quebec? Nothing is less complicated than the machinery. If a sufficient number of ratepayers professing a religious faith different from that of the majority declare that they want to withdraw from the school corporation under the control of the majority and signify such dissent in writing, to the chairman of the commissioners from that very moment they cease to be liable for any taxes or school rates imposed for the common schools. It is highly important to know how the school rates are distributed. In the first place, the taxes imposed upon the Catholic inhabitants go to the Catholic schools, and the taxes upon Protestants go to Protestant schools. There was never any trouble on that point. But at the outset, there arose a difficulty which was settled through an amendment to the educational law, passed in 1869. That amendment goes to prove the great liberality displayed in educational matters by the legislature of the province of Quebec, the overwhelming majority of which is Catholic. The question was as to how should be distributed the taxes levied upon neutral corporations, such as the railway companies, and the banks, which are quite numerous. This difficulty was solved by the legislature of the province of Quebec, and I have no hesitation in saying that it was solved there in a much fairer and more liberal way than it was by the Ontario legislature. In Ontario, it is the directors of those corporations who decide to which school corporation their taxes will be paid. So then, even if one half of the shareholders of a bank were Catholics, the directors could not allot the tax to the public school fund. In the province of Quebec, the taxes are divided between the Catholics and the Protestants, in proportion to the population. That amendment to the educational law, passed in 1869, may be invoked as an argument in favour of the position which we, on this side, now take, while the confederation scheme was being debated, they tried to impose upon the Quebec legislature the very same enactments which were, subsequently to confederation, passed into law in 1869. The Quebec representatives objected to that enactment, and would not bow down before the threats. The hon. Mr. Cauchon, a well-known statesman, wrote many editorials in the "Journal de Quebec," in opposition to the pretensions of Sir A. T. Galt, and against the very same enactments which were, later on, embodied in the Act of 1869. He said: The guarantees which you ask for now, will be granted to you later on; it would be a gratuitous insult and perfectly useless on your part to seek to impose them upon us. Had they tried, in 1869, to coerce the Quebec legislature, as they are now trying to do with the Manitoba legislature, that law would not have passed. The Quebec Protestants have now more than they asked for at that time, because, the generosity, the spirit of fair play of the Quebec legislature were appealed to. Now, let me offer another remark, in answer to what was said here this afternoon by the hon. member for Durham East. I do not call in question the good faith of the hon. gentleman, but I say he has made an egregious mistake in what he stated about the Quebec schools. The hon. gentleman said: The Catholic schools of that province are purely Catholic schools. Well, I appeal to the hon. gentlemen in this House who have attended those schools. I did also attend them, and I may say that religious teaching takes up but a small portion of the school hours. Through all the provinces the schools open at nine o'clock and continue till twelve; they open again at one o'clock to close it at four. That amounts in all to six hours a day. Well, out of those six hours, religious teaching, strictly speaking, hardly takes up half an hour, which is devoted to the teaching of catechism, and that only during that portion of the year when young children are being prepared for their first communion. During all the remaining hours of the day, there is no purely doctrinal religious teaching given, but children are taught writing, reading, geography, history and mathematics, and sometimes, in the more advanced classes, chemistry and geometry; in short, all the matters taught in the schools of the other provinces. I am not here to vindicate all that occurs in educational matters, in the province of Quebec; but I think it my duty to point out certain conclusions drawn by some newspapers from statistics which have been lately published. I do not know from what source they come, but I presume they have been drawn from the census bulletins. Well, I may say that very little credit ought to be given the census, for in many instances its glaring inaccuracies have made it the laughing-stock of the public. There is nothing less safe than statistics; and although in certain cases, they may be useful, it is on condition that no abuse is made of them. For instance, when I had the honour to be mayor of the city of Quebec, I used to receive from the department of Agriculture the vital statistics. There was a table showing the rate of mortality in the principal cities of the Dominion, Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, &c. To my great surprise, I found out that the city where public health was presumed to be in the worst state was, first, Three Rivers, and in the second place, Quebec. As far as Three Rivers was concerned, I was not prepared to pronounce myself, but I could speak with a thorough knowledge of Quebec, and all those who have visited that city know that if there is a city where prevails good sanitary conditions, it is Quebec. The number of deaths in Quebec was nearly double that of Toronto. In scrutinizing more closely the matter, I found out that an important fact had been overlooked: it was that in the cities of Quebec and Montreal, there are certain institutions where are received foundlings from the different parts of the province of Quebec, and even from Ontario, and from the other provinces of the Dominion. It is a well-known fact that the rate of mortality among those children is excessive; yet, all those deaths were credited to the city of Quebec. Well, the same remark holds good in educational matters. I find that the educational statistics would be simply alarming, were they exact. For instance, from those statistics, the number of people who cannot read is 7 per cent for the province of Ontario, and 29 per cent for the province of Quebec. I freely admit that the number of illiterate persons is more considerable in the province of Quebec than in the province of Ontario. It is not within my province to explain the causes of that difference; still, I may say that the statistics are not correct, and in this connection I appeal to the experience of professional men in this House, and I am sure none of them will gainsay my statement. When I tell them that they must often have found from their own experience that at least one-half of our Quebec farmers, when asked to sign their names, declare themselves unable to write. A false shame, Sir, the fear of the ridicule they would incur in writing not as fine a hand as they would like to, prompts them to say that they do not know how to sign their names. Those farmers will tell you: Please, sir, do sign my name for me. I write such a poor hand. Those people have attended school and could have signed their own names had they not been prevented from so doing by a false shame, by the fear to incur ridicule in writing an imperfect hand. If the census officers contented themselves simply with asking the farmers whether they knew how to write and read, I do not wonder that the latter told them that they did not know how to write, for fear less they should be asked to show what they could do. I merely say this, Mr. Speaker, to show that one must not place too much reliance on statistics. Besides, our school statistics, as applied in Quebec, are far from doing justice to the province. We have a law concerning statistics as to educational matters. The members of the Council of Public Instruction have bestowed particular attention to that law, and at our meeting of last week, it was one of the questions that came under our consideration. The report of the Department of Education mentions only the institutions under the control of the government, that is, state-aided institutions. All independent institutions remain beyond the reach of the statistics published by the department of Public Instruction in the province. In order to show the importance of that omission, I may call the attention of the House to the fact that the Quebec Seminary, an excellent institution, which imparts a classical education of a very high order, is not included in those statistics. If you refer to the report of the department, you will find that this institution, which has a scholar population of 500 pupils, is not mentioned there. The same remark applies to the Sulpician College of Montreal, called the "little seminary," which is also omitted from this report, because those two institutions receive no legislative grant. So likewise with a number of private schools. I freely confess, Sir, that I am in terrible dread of statistics, because, although they be useful, they may be made to say many things which are not always true. We have had, in the province of Quebec, for a long time, splendid private schools, which imparted tuition to a large number of pupils, without receiving any aid from the state. I may mention here, Sir, a school conducted by Miss Machin, a person of great abilities, who trained up the best pupils who came from all parts of the country. That school did not appear in the report of the department of education, although it counted 50 pupils. Let me mention another private school, probably the best commercial school we ever had in Quebec, conducted by the late Mr. Thom, a man who exercised a very beneficial influence, and who trained in his school several of our leading business men, and taught pupils from all the cities of Canada and from several parts of the United States; still the name of that school does not appear in the report of the educational department, because it was not a state-aided school. My object in calling attention to those facts is to caution those who might be tempted to place too much reliance on statistics. As I just remarked, Sir, I am prepared to say that probably we are behind the province of Ontario in educational matters, but not to the extent stated. Mr. Speaker, I have read of late in certain public sheets that the separate school system which obtained in Manitoba, was similar to the system established in the province of Quebec. Such an assertion, Sir, is not grounded on facts. In the province of Manitoba they had no council of public instruction, composed of Catholics and Protestants, and organized on the plan of that existing in the province of Quebec. There were two boards, a Protestant and a Catholic board, whilst in the province of Quebec, there is but one council, and that council is composed of a Catholic committee and a Protestant committee, having each their own jurisdiction. Such was the state of things which prevailed in the province of Manitoba under the law of 1871, and which continued until 1890, when they passed the new law, from which originated all the subsequent troubles. Sir, it has been stated here that the ground on which the new law had been enacted was the inefficiency of the Catholic schools. Sir, I do not think it is any justification for what has been done, saying that the schools established by the Catholic minority were not in a proper state of efficiency. If they really were inefficient, as stated, that was a good reason for insisting that they should be conducted on a better plan, but it did not warrant the government in taking away from Catholics their right to separate schools. There is the right of using and abusing, and it was the duty of the Manitoba government to tell the Catholic minority: if you do not make a better use of the legislative grant, you shall no longer have your share of it. Such is the course pursued in the province of Quebec, and that practice prevails also in Ontario. If the Manitoba schools were in a state of inefficiency, the government might have stopped the legislative grant. Now, Sir, whatever may be the value of the reason alleged for sweeping away the Catholic schools, it is beyond doubt that from the law of 1890 originated all the troubles which have cropped up both in the province of Manitoba and throughout the Dominion of Canada; that law of 1890 has been the main spring of all the disputes which have since arisen. The first action of the Catholics was to petition for the disallowance of the law. Through their petition to the Dominion Government the Catholics practically asked for the law being disallowed; for, Sir, it is no use quibbling here. The Catholics were asking, by their petitions, the Dominion Government to remedy the state of things brought about by the legislation of 1890. Now, the only efficacious remedy the Government could resort to was the exercise of the power of disallowance.

What is the law of the land with reference to the power of disallowance? Had the Dominion Government the right to veto the Manitoba legislation? The Government had the incontrovertible right to disallow that law. If you read the constitution, and refer to clauses 56 and 90 of the British North America Act, you will see that the Government have the right to disallow any legislation passed by a local legislature within one year after receipt of the authentic copy of the Acts passed by such legislature. Such is the enactment of the Act of 1867 with regard to the power of disallowance. The minority, grounding itself on the constitution, prayed for the disallowance of the law passed in 1890. Now, Sir, the Dominion Government had, beyond the shadow of a doubt, the right to disallow that law. If I may judge from the reports of the newspapers and from the words fallen from the hon. Postmaster General yesterday, they are under the impression in the province of Quebec, that the Dominion Government could only disallow the law on the ground of its being unconstitutional. Such a statement is altogether erroneous, as shown from the very text of the constitution. The British North America Act makes no such distinction. The Government may disallow any law passed by a provincial legislature. The Dominion Government had, therefore, the power of disallowing the law in question. Were they bound to do so? I give here expression to my own individual opinion, and I may say that, to my mind, it is chiefly when a law is perfectly constitutional that it must be disallowed. Then it is that the power of disallowance must be exercised, because, in the case of an unconstitutional law, it is perfectly useless to veto it. No judicial tribunal has the power to apply an unconstitutional law, so that from the very fact that a law is invalid, it is set aside by the courts and it would serve no purpose, if the Government were to disallow it. In that case, I hold that government interference is unnecessary, and even fraught with danger, for the subject of disallowance could be a law, the invalidity of which would be open to doubt and then the Government would arrogate to themselves the right to determine a question still pending between them and the provincial authorities. That is what occurred in the case of the province of Quebec. The Dominion Government disallowed a law passed by the provincial government, establishing a court of district magistrates. The law officers of the crown at Quebec were of opinion that the law was perfectly constitutional. Still, the Minister of Justice disallowed it. Hence it will be seen how the exercise of the power of disallowance upon the grounds of invalidity is fraught with danger. What is on that point the practice of the Imperial Government? That Government has the right to disallow within two years any law passed by the Dominion Government. Now, I am aware but of a single case where the Imperial Government disallowed such a law upon the ground that it was 'ultra vires.' It was in the case of the famous Bill passed in 1873, to provide for the examination of witnesses on oath by committees of the Senate and House of Commons. The object of the Bill is well known. A special committee had been appointed to inquire into the charges brought by the Hon. Mr. Huntingdon, with reference to what is known as the "Pacific Scandal." The House had not been prorogued, but simply adjourned, in order to allow the committee to sit. Well, in the meantime, to the utter surprise of every body, the Bill was disallowed upon the ground that it was 'ultra vires.' I think there can be no possible doubt about the propriety of having disallowed this Bill upon the ground that it was 'ultra vires,' but it is the only case of that kind I know of. The practice of the Imperial Government is to disallow none but the laws which they consider contrary to the general interests of the Empire, and I think it is the right practice. That is my individual view of the matter. I know that it is not looked upon in the same light by everybody, but I say that if we wish to conform to the English practice, and disallow none but the laws affecting the interests of the whole Dominion, the question arises: Should the Dominion Government have disallowed the Manitoba Acts of 1890? As to those who pretend that further investigation into the matter is requisite, I quite understand that they should have paused before urging the disallowance of the Act; but as to the Government, who hold that the minority has a well-established grievance, how could they hesitate to disallow it? I quite understand that the hon. leader of the Opposition might hesitate, being of opinion that a proper investigation into the facts of the case ought to be made; but, if those grievances are as well established as the Government say they are, their duty was to disallow the law of 1890. Did not the Government in 1891 possess all the information which they have to-day? Certainly, yes. Have they obtained any further information since 1891? Absolutely none. Now, had the Government been honest and consistent with themselves in the course they have followed, they should at the time have said, as they do say now: The rights of the minority have been interfered with, and that interference with their rights affects the interests of the whole Dominion, therefore, this Bill ought to be disallowed. It is of no avail saying that the Government acted in that way through scruples, for they were not over-scrupulous under other circumstances. I have just mentioned the English practice, but I am going to show what is the practice of the present administration, which is, with the exception of a few changes, but the continuation of the Government I am about to speak of, and as my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) suggests, this Government is but a revised edition, considerably enlarged but not improved, of the Government of 1878. They did not scruple, as I said, to disallow a law of the Manitoba legislature, a policy which brought us on the very brink of civil war. They did twice disallow the Act to provide for the building of the Red River Valley Railway. The Manitoba people had grievances against the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and in order to escape from their monopoly, they wished to communicate with the Northern Pacific Railway. They then decided upon the construction of the Red River Valley Railway. That law was not disallowed, on the ground that it was "ultra vires," but the reason alleged was that it interfered with the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, with which the Government had passed a contract, extending over a certain number of years. And as the hon. leader of the Opposition remarked but the other day, a law was passed in the same year, doing away with the use of the French language; another law was enacted establishing quarantine regulations for animals, and another, concerning public companies. The Government disallowed two out of those four laws, that concerning the quarantine regulations and that concerning public companies. The law concerning quarantine regulations was disallowed because the government held that there was a danger of contamination for the Canadian cattle, and the law, therefore, affected the general interests of the Dominion, thus endangering the exportation of Canadian cattle. What was the reason alleged for disallowing the law concerning the public companies, passed at the same session? Here again the general interest of the whole Dominion has been alleged, and it was held that the law embodied a clause enacting the confiscation of the property of those companies. Such was the reason alleged in both cases. Now, was the health of cattle, in the opinion of the hon. Ministers, who are at the head of affairs, a more weighty question than the interests of the Catholic minority in Manitoba? Could the hon. Postmaster General tell me whether the Government were of opinion that it was more important to protect the live cattle than the Catholic minority in Manitoba? The course followed by the Government seems to show that they are of opinion that the laws interfering with the French language and doing away with the separate schools of the Manitoba minority have less importance than the Act concerning the protection of live cattle. Why did they not disallow those laws? For a very well known reason, Sir. We were on the eve of the elections of 1891, and the Government did not want to go to the country with the responsibility of a disallowance exercised in favour of the Catholic minority. The Government thought it safer to disallow the Bill concerning live cattle rather than that concerning separate schools. But, after they had declined disallowing the act in question, the elections being over, the Government immediately passed an Order in Council, dated March, 1891. In that Order in Council, it was stated that these questions required the decision of the judicial tribunals, and it was further declared that—and I call particularly the attention of the hon. members to this point—if the legal controversy should result in the law being declared "ultra vires" by the judicial tribunals, there would still be left a door open to the minority, and that was the appeal to the Governor General in Council. Was that door really open to the minority? There did not seem to be the least doubt about that, at the time, but it will be seen that two years later, the Government began to entertain certain doubts about the matter. Then, Sir, began a series of trials which were brought to a close only last year. Proceedings were taken in 1890 to test the validity of the Educational Acts by means of an application from Mr. Barrett, a Roman Catholic ratepayer, and Mr. Logan, an Anglican ratepayer, to quash a by-law of the city of Winnipeg, on the ground that the law was ultra vires. Judge Killam, of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench upheld the validity of the law. An appeal was taken to the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench, and the court affirmed the decision of Judge Killam, Judge Dubuc dissenting. The case next went to the Supreme Court of Canada, which unanimously reversed the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, holding the Manitoba Educational Act of 1890 to be ultra vires, on the ground that it prejudicially affected the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority acquired by practice prior to the union. Appeal was then taken to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England, and their Lordships to the surprise of every body and even of the appellants, reversed the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. The appellants did not expect at all to win their cause before the Privy Council, but the case of the minority was so badly argued before the tribunal that they reversed the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and declared the Acts of 1890 ultra vires. Their Lordships, in rendering their decision said that the Manitoba legislature had no right to enact statutes prejudicially affecting the rights and privileges guaranteed to the Catholic minority of the province by practice, but further said that the Catholic minority had the same rights as they had prior to the union, that is to say, that they had a right to their separate schools within the ordinary meaning of that word, but not within the meaning accepted here. Lord Herschell, in delivering the last judgment of the Privy Council, has again referred to that point, and disposing of the comments made about the decision rendered by this tribunal in the case of Barrett vs. the city of Winnipeg, and of Logan vs. the same municipal corporation, stated that the duty of the tribunal was to interpret the constitution, and to determine the true construction of the words used. The question was not what may be supposed to have been intended, but what has been said. They had merely to determine what was the true construction of the language used by the framers of the constitution to give effect to the intent of the legislature. Now, his Lordship says that the expression "separate schools," is not a technical expression, but is a term used in common parlance, without any special meaning. Within the ordinary meaning of that expression, the Catholics continue to enjoy the same rights as they had enjoyed previously and still enjoy, and they are free to establish, if they like, separate schools. I need hardly tell you, Sir, that the expression "separate schools" carries with us a technical and special meaning. Had the matter been rightly explained to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, they would have rendered quite a different decision, and the law would have been declared invalid. It is perfectly well understood from the history of the question that those words carry with us a well determined and defined technical meaning. Had this definition been well explained to Lord Herschell and to the other members of the Privy Council, the decision rendered would have been quite different, because they gave that expression of "separate schools" the ordinary meaning and not the technical meaning in vogue here. Nobody was more surprised at the decision of the Privy Council than Sir John Thompson himself was, for he did not entertain the least doubt that the judgment of the Supreme Court would be confirmed by the Privy Council. The Government, however, had to face the music, to cope with the difficulty. They again evaded the difficulty, as they had done when up came the question as to whether they should entertain the petition for disallowance which had been transmitted to them in 1891. In 1891, it appears from the Order in Council that neither Sir John Thompson nor any of the Ministers did entertain any doubt about their right of interference; not the least doubt apparently existed in their minds about it, for they told the Catholics in so many words: Should the legal controversy result in an unfavourable decision being rendered against you, you will always have the right of appealing for redress to the Dominion Government. But those very men who in 1891 were so positive, in 1893 no longer enjoyed the same freedom from doubt. Then, what did the Government do? They declared that it was their duty to submit the case for reference to the judicial tribunals, to determine the question as to whether they had the right of intervening after the judgment of the Privy Council had been rendered, although that judgment was quite foreign to the question at issue. And the minority was again sent back before the tribunals; after having run the gauntlet of the courts, from Winnipeg to London. In connection with the case submitted for reference to the Supreme Court, I think it but fair to point out an error which has gone around the Conservative press of the province of Quebec, and which I have heard repeated here. They would mislead people into believing that if the Government did not undertake to disallow in 1891 the educational acts, and to entertain the appeal in 1893, it was because the hon. Mr. Blake had caused a resolution to be adopted which precluded them from interfering. Well, Sir, I have in my hands Mr. Blake's resolution, and there is not a single word in it in that direction. It was further stated that the hon. leader of the Opposition had seconded Mr. Blake's motion. And all this with a view to lead people into believing that the Government had been constrained to take the position they did take, by the action of Mr. Blake and of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier). That is, at least, what I inferred from the words fallen from the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron).

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) The hon. member is quite mistaken. What I said was that the course pursued by the Government was on the lines of the resolution presented by the Hon. Mr. Blake, seconded by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and carried without a single dissentient voice in the House. But I never meant to say that it was under the Blake resolution that the Government were constrained to take the course the hon. gentleman insinuates they have pursued.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) I am very glad to hear that, for it is the first time I hear it from a Ministerial source. It has been the contention all the time that the Government could not take any other course.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) We have never made any such statement.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Not only the political sheets, but even "La Semaine Religieuse," a small religious weekly stated that if the law had not been disallowed at the outset, and if the appeal had not been entertained without delay in 1893, Mr. Blake and the leader of the Opposition were to blame. I have no French copy of the Blake resolution; but it is so miserably translated that it makes Mr. Blake utter an absurdity; that is the reason why I prefer to use the English version. I may say incidentally that I do not know by whom Archbishop Taché has been imposed upon.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) In a pamphlet which he has published on the Manitoba school question, the Archbishop falls into the same error as the Government press did. He quotes a so-called Blake resolution, which is not at all conformable to the original. I do not wish to call in question his good faith, but evidently he has been imposed upon. The resolution reads as follows:—

That it is expedient to provide means whereby on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance or of the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the Executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration, in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the Executive.

So, then, the point upon which Mr. Blake obtained a decision of the House was that it was expedient to provide means whereby the Dominion Government "might" and not "should" refer to the judicial tribunal questions of law or fact, mentioned there, when they thought proper to do so. But it never occurred to him to propose a resolution to provide means whereby the course to be pursued by the Government upon a political issue should be prescribed. If the resolution was not so explicit in its terms, it could be made still clearer, by referring to the debate which then took place. Sir John Macdonald said that when he first read the resolution hastily, he saw an objection to it, because he was under the impression that it was meant to obtain from the judicial tribunals legal decisions which would be binding on the Executive, but on scanning the resolution, he added, his first impression was dissipated and he saw that such a decision was only for the information of the Government, that might either agree to or dissent from such a decision. Now, Sir, such an enactment is not unknown to our law. That right of reference to the Supreme Court has not the merit of novelty; it may be found at chapter 135 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, as follows:—

The Governor General in Council may refer to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration any matter which he thinks fit to refer; and the court shall thereupon, hear or consider the same and certify their opinion thereon to the Governor in Council: Provided that any judge or judges of the court who differ from the opinion of the majority, may, in like manner, certify his or their opinion or opinions to the Governor in Council.

As seen from the above enactment, even prior to the Blake resolution, the Government had the perfect right to refer questions to the Supreme Court. The only difference which exists between these two modes of reference to the Supreme Court, is that under the law prior to the Blake resolution, the cause was referred to the Supreme Court 'ex parte,' and without being argued. Further, the judges of the Supreme Court were not obliged to give the reason for their opinion. Finally, there was no appeal from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council. The Blake resolution aimed primarily at adopting a mode by which lawyers could argue before the tribunal: in the second place, to obtain a reasoned judgment of the tribunal, and finally to provide for an appeal to the Privy Council. It is a most fortunate circumstance for the Manitoba minority that this appeal should have been provided for, because otherwise they would have found themselves without a remedy. Three members of the court decided, that an appeal did not lie, while two members held that an appeal would lie. And the two judges whose opinion was favourable to the Catholic minority were, prior to their ascending the bench, Liberals, while the three others were Conservatives. I do not, Sir, mean to lead the House to believe that the minds of the judges were in the least biased in rendering that decision, but I simply wish to state that Justice Fournier, that man who had, for years and years, been denounced by the Conservative press, as an enemy of religion and a foe of the clergy, and those so-called enemies of the clergy know how to stand by their co-religionists. I do not mean to say that he rendered that decision, because he was a Catholic; no, but because he was of opinion that it was the law. However, that also evinces the fact that he was not such a bad Catholic after all, nor such an enemy of the clergy as stated by the Conservative papers which have so often held these men up to public animadversion. Such, Sir, are the circumstances under which Mr. Blake's resolution was presented to the House during the session of 1890. I am not aware, Sir, of the reason why they waited till the next session of 1891 to turn that resolution into law and place it upon the statute-book; for, the Blake resolution was adopted in 1890. Under that law, reference was made to the Supreme Court, and that high tribunal gave a decision, as I have just said. The Privy Council of England reversed that decision of the Supreme Court. Here again, Sir, there prevails in the minds of a class of people in the province of Quebec a very erroneous opinion, and that erroneous opinion is being daily disseminated and scattered broadcast by the French Conservative press throughout the province and the other provinces. The opinion I allude to is this: that once the Privy Council had rendered their decision, the Dominion Government had only to act mechanically that they were merely a machine entrusted with the execution of the Privy Council judgment. Such is not the case. A client who consults his lawyers is not bound to follow the latter's advice. Such is the exact position of the Dominion Government. All they did was to consult the Supreme Court and the Privy Council as to whether it was within their jurisdiction to entertain the appeal of the Manitoba Catholic minority. The Supreme Court held that the Government had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal in question, but the Privy Council decided that the Governor in Council had jurisdiction. As those who are conversant with the legal profession are aware, Sir, there is a material difference between a law giving jurisdiction and a law making it binding upon a tribunal to decide in favour of the appellants. Every day cases are taken to the Supreme Court, which first decides the question of jurisdiction. It often occurs that after having decided in favour of the appellants in so far as its jurisdiction is concerned, the Supreme Court decides against them on the merit of the cause. The tribunal which decided that it has jurisdiction does not thereby decide that the appellants are going to gain their case, that is elementary. Subsequently to that decision, it only remains for the tribunal to hear the cause and to render their decision. Such is the position in which the Government find themselves placed, under the judgment of the Privy Council, and no lawyer could hold the contrary opinion. The Government has jurisdiction, that is what the tribunals have decided. The Privy Council therefore held that the Government could take cognizance of the complaints of the minority. What is taking cognizance in such a case? It is to inquire about the facts upon which they have to pronounce. When the Government found that they had jurisdiction, they had to hear the Catholic minority who wanted to lay before them certain grievances, and the government of Manitoba who denied the same. The Privy Council never pronounced as to the existence of the grievances of the Catholic minority. It simply declared that if they had any grievances, they had a right to appeal to the Dominion Government in order to urge them. It is a well known matter of procedure that before obtaining that a court should deal with a case, the existence of a grievance warranting the appeal must be proved. If no good reasons had been given to warrant it, that appeal for a federal interference should have been dismissed. According to the rule followed by the courts, it is not enough to state a grievance, it must be proved. It is quite true, Mr. Speaker, that for my part, I would have been willing to take the word of one of the petitioners, Archbishop Taché; but if I am to believe the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), I should not take the word of Archbishop Taché, for the hon. member for Three Rivers contradicted him under oath. We all remember that at the time of the inquiry held, in 1874, with respect to the North-west rebellion and the amnesty question, Archbishop Taché stated under oath that an amnesty had been promised him by Sir George Cartier, Sir John Macdonald, and Sir Adam Archibald. The hon. member for Three Rivers, heard as a witness, disproved that statement of Archbishop Taché. But, notwithstanding that, I would have been willing personally to accept the evidence of that bishop. I have well known Archbishop Taché; I was even one of his relatives. He was among my personal and close acquaintances, and I would have been willing to take his word as regards the grievances of the Catholics. But if Archbishop Taché's statements are denied by the local government, which of the statements of the representatives of the Catholic minority, or of the statements of the representatives of the Protestant majority are you going to accept? What have the Government done? Have they inquired about the facts? And facts have a great importance here. The Protestant people are greatly mistaken with respect to education. Thus a great many among them are unable to see why the Catholic minority should object to the school system established in Manitoba. It is said that the Act passed in 1890 established schools having no connection whatever with any creed. That is what is said by the framers of that Act, and they claim that the schools existing under that legislation are strictly conducted as prescribed by law, that is to say, they are neither Protestant nor Catholic. It is rather difficult to have it understood by the Protestants that the Catholics may have serious objections to such schools. It is known that the teaching of the Catholic Church, at least its discipline, if not its doctrine, makes it imperative that religion shall be taught in every Catholic school. Teachers sharing the religious faith of the child are required, because it is feared that the religious convictions of the teacher might make themselves felt, even without his knowing it in his teaching. Thus, I will not refer to moral philosophy, but let us take history. Is it possible for a Protestant teacher to teach Catholic children certain parts of the history of the Reformation, for instance? Catholics and Protestants do not appreciate from the same standpoint that moving page of modern history. I stated a moment ago that there lay a right of appeal to the Privy Council here. The hon. gentlemen opposite have taken much trouble to try and show that there was a right of appeal. I never entertained the least doubt about it, and it was placed beyond any discussion by the judgment of the Privy Council. But it is plain that it does not mean that the appeal should be sustained in any case. The Privy Council declared that the British North America Act is not applicable in this case; that it is only section 22 of the Manitoba Act that applies here. It is stated in this latter Act that whenever the local legislature shall pass a law affecting in any way the rights and privileges of the minority, whether Catholic or Protestant, an appeal shall lie. Let us suppose that the Manitoba legislature, instead of passing the Act of 1890, which, in my opinion, is so prejudicial to the Catholics, had merely provided that the Lord's prayer should be said at the opening of every class. The province of Manitoba would have made a law giving rise to an appeal, under the judgment of the Privy Council, because it would have affected the rights of the Catholic minority. But will it be said that, for such a matter, all this complicated machinery should have been set in motion? No man of sober judgment would pretend that. Let us give another instance: The same right of appeal lies with reference to the Acts of the Quebec legislature. Should it pass an Act providing that in the future, the taxes of dissentient corporations should be distributed otherwise than they are now, there is no doubt that such a law would interfere with a right of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. Should we for all that set in motion all this ponderous machinery? Surely not. It is plain that the intention of the fathers of confederation, as well as of the framers of the Manitoba Act, was that educational legislation should be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislature, and that the right of appeal should only be exercised in the most serious circumstances, and when no other means are available to remedy the situation. It is the point that should have been established in this case. Was it established? I say, no. The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) stated a moment ago that it was useless to inquire into the grievances of the Catholic minority, inasmuch as the Manitoba government had declared that they would do nothing to remedy the existing state of affairs. Well, Archbishop Langevin has himself repeatedly stated that he would accept no compromise, that he wanted all his rights, that he wanted the separate schools to be restored as they existed prior to 1890. I have his words here. Here is what he said in the month of April last, in Notre-Dame Church in Montreal. It will be observed that he wants nothing less than what the Protestant minority enjoys in the province of Quebec :—

English-speaking as well as French-speaking Catholics are a unit on this question. They want no compromise. After having called upon all the Catholics of the Dominion to sign a petition claiming the full liberty of our schools, it would be strange, indeed, if one should accept a semi-liberty. Once more I say : No compromise ; our rights, such as are guaranteed by the constitution. We decline to accept a position inferior to that of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. I repeat that the Catholics have only one mind and one conviction, and that is that we must claim our rights to their utmost extent.

Later on, he stated in St. Hyacinthe cathedral, on May 26th, 1895 :

I insist upon stating that in educational matters the Manitoba Catholics will never accept the crumbs falling from the table while the Quebec Protestants are seated at the festive board. No, never.

We are neither slaves nor sons of slaves, and as long as the Quebec Protestant minority will enjoy their full rights, we, Canadians from the west, will never consent to half measures.

Then, a few days later :

Some say : " He is speaking too much." Others find that he does not speak enough.

My brethren, I wear on my head a sacerdotal crown, but, thank God, my neck is not peeled off. It knows, and has never known any yoke but that of the Lord.

And lastly, a month ago, at Edmonton, in the North-west Territories :

We will have all our rights, even though we should have to die to obtain them.

Such were the statements made by Archbishop Langevin. We will see in a few moments whether the Bill now before the House grants a fair remedy to this down-trodden minority, whether they are granted the fulness of their rights and whether they are put on the same footing as the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. This is a material point, for not only have they required the federal interference, but they have also asked for the restoration of all the rights of the Catholic minority without any exception, all the rights enjoyed by the Quebec Protestant minority. Yet, now, they seem willing to accept much less, by accepting what is given in the Bill. The Greenway government never declined to grant what is proposed by this Bill. Never was a compromise proposed as that which it is intended to make by this Bill. Had the Federal Government, instead of sending threats to the local government, said to them : Be reasonable, you violate rights that are sacred to the minority, do justice to them—had, then, the Manitoba government declined to act, they would have incurred a universal reputation. If the Dominion Government should act too hostile in their intended purpose to restore the minority their rights, they will have against them the reasonable people of the whole Dominion. These reasonable people would be in favour of the minority, were they convinced that they are oppressed. The Catholics are not the only people who wish that justice should be done to the Catholic minority in Manitoba. I think, Sir, the great majority of the people of this country would not forgive the Manitoba government for holding to the whole law of 1890, were they shown that this law deals unjustly with the Catholic minority in that province. Were they to maintain such an attitude, they would set all the people against them, and were then the Federal Government to interfere, they would have the whole people of Canada to support them in any measure calculated to do justice to the Catholic minority. There is a most important point, in my judgment, and it is why I cannot agree with my hon. friend, the member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoliel). I consider as disastrous to the interests of the Catholic minority the interference now proposed by the Government. They want to allure that minority by the last section of the Bill. By that famous section, they want to allure the Catholic people and induce them to accept this Bill. They say to the minority : It is quite true that this Bill will give you nothing, but the principle will have been accepted and, later on, we will pass a good Bill giving you all what you claim. The Ministers would not dare to state that in this House, but it is what is being done. Is the hon. Postmaster General willing to state that this is only the beginning and that the Bill will be completed later on ? If he is willing to make such a statement, I am willing for my part to vote for the Bill. Is the hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) willing to state that that which is now before the House is only the beginning and that this Bill will be completed at another session ? Let him answer forthwith. He keeps silent and he will not speak. The reason why he will not speak is well known. The hon. Postmaster General does not answer, and they will go on trying to deceive the representatives of the minority in having them believe that this is only the beginning of the measures of justice which the Government intend granting to them. They say that this Bill sanctions the principles of interference, and that the law will be completed later on. I hope the minority are not simple-minded enough to be enticed by such an allurement. This Bill will not give separate schools to the Manitoba Catholics, because it does not provide the means for the working of such schools, and the local government will not give the money required, although it is stated in section 74 that the separate schools shall have their share of the public grants appropriated for separate schools. This section simply adds insult to the injury already done to the Catholics. It is making a mockery of the Manitoba minority to have such a clause in this Bill. Section 74 states that the minority will be entitled to their proportionate share in the public grants for separate schools; now, it is well known, Sir, that the Privy Council never affirmed, as contended in this clause, that the minority had a right to this proportionate share in the public grants. The Privy Council simply declared that there was a difference between the law of 1890 and that of 1871, a difference which warranted the appeal of the minority and gave jurisdiction to the Federal Government. But it is not stated that the Catholic minority are entitled to the grants appropriated by the legislature. The Privy Council held the contrary in the case of Barrett. Sir, it is chiefly through the last section they want to allure the Catholic people. This section reads as follows:—

Power is hereby reserved to the Parliament of Canada to make such further and other remedial laws as the provisions of the said section twenty-two, of chapter three of the statutes of 1870, and of the decision of the Governor General in Council thereunder may require.

With that they say to the Catholic minority: Accept this Bill, it is only a first instalment, and full justice will be done to you later on, at the next session and at the following session. It is a first instalment, but the debtor will never pay. He is insolvent. What I regret in this Bill, Sir, is that it will sanction for ever the principles that the Catholic can expect nothing over what is given to them by this Bill. The Manitoba legislature will henceforth be deprived of the right to legislate in relation to that question. It is the opinion of the best jurists that the moment the Federal Parliament interferes, it takes away from the Manitoba legislature the right to legislate upon that point.

Mr. TURCOTTE. (Translation.) It has had time to legislate.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) The hon. member for Montmorency has perhaps a deeper knowledge of the law than I have, but I am not giving him my own opinion only, but that of prominent jurists. The Manitoba legislature will be powerless to do anything, and the Federal Parliament will itself be unable to interfere. The hon. Postmaster General does not dare to state that the Government will do anything further later on, because they are determined to do nothing. Now, the Catholics will be compelled to be satisfied with what is given them by the Bill. Well, it is making a mockery of them. They have objected to the plan proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition, saying: The inquiry you propose would delay the establishment of separate schools. Do you imagine that you are going soon to have separate schools under this Bill? Let us simply consider the whole fabric of the Bill. The establishment of these schools requires the appointment of a Board of Education which will be appointed by the Manitoba government, who are declared to be the desperate enemies of separate schools. Presuming that as expected by the Federal Government, the Manitoba government will be willing to take advantage of this provision, do you imagine that they will appoint very zealous men? They are simply bound to appoint Roman Catholics. There are some who are very zealous for separate schools, but there are also others who do not want them. Suppose that Roman Catholics should be appointed to that board, such as Mr. Donoghue, who appeared before the Privy Council of Canada when the appeal was heard and stated that he did not complain of the public schools. The Manitoba government, by appointing to the Board of Education such men as this one, would play a trick to the Catholics. But it is to be presumed that the Manitoba government will not take advantage of the power given them by this Bill. They will, on the contrary, utterly ignore it. Then you will have to wait three months before the Federal Government can do anything, from the date of the putting in force of the statute. Besides, certain it is that the Dominion Government would not make such appointments from one day to another. But should the members of the Board accept their appointments, it will take them more than one day to get organized; they will have to appoint a chairman and a secretary; four or five months will elapse before such an organization is completed. The law can now be carried out. What will happen? The Catholics, willing to have separate schools, will have to apply to the municipal council to be granted that permission, and to cause school districts to be established. That municipal council, like that of Winnipeg, for instance, which is opposed to the thing, will do nothing; they will have to give it such time as is required. It will not decline to do it, but say that it has other business to do, and allow one, two or three months to elapse before it deals with it. Here we are again with a delay of three or four months before a school district can be formed. But should the municipal council decline to establish these school districts, then the law suits would begin anew, followed by appeals, to say nothing of all the proceedings that can take place in the meantime.

So much for the delay. I could point out many others, but taking the Bill itself, it is plain that you cannot have separate schools before seven, eight or ten months. But there is more than that. This Bill does not give a cent for these schools. True, it refers to the establishment of a Board of Education, but, as stated the other day by Principal Grant, of Kingston, in a Toronto newspaper, when will that board meet? No accommodation is even provided for them. Will they meet in the streets, in a store? And if they meet somewhere, something must be paid for the premises. They have to appoint a chairman, a secretary. There must be a superintendent; if he is qualified, he will have to be paid a good salary. All these people will have to be paid, and this Bill does not provide a single dollar. I forgot to mention that the superintendent will be appointed by the Manitoba government. They also put in this Bill that the Manitoba government may make regulations concerning the schools. Well, to charge a hostile government to make the regulations is in itself, it appears to me, making a mockery of the people. I will ask all fair people: how will they cause this organization of separate schools to work, if they have not the funds required to meet the expenditure? The Manitoba Catholics are not richer than those of the province of Quebec. Now, suppose that in our province the Government should not grant a cent to the Council of Public Instruction, would we have a superintendent and two secretaries? These officers cost thousands of dollars to the government. The province is compelled to make a large annual expenditure to keep the machinery in motion, for, if it give nothing, the very Council of Public Instruction would not work six months, it would not meet if the public did not pay the travelling expenses of its members. There are, for instance, in the province of Quebec bishops who have no revenue at all. I may mention a bishop, Mgr. Lorraine, Apostolic Vicar for Pontiac, one of the most distinguished members of the Council of Public Instruction, who has no resources whatever, who cannot procure the strictest necessities of life owing to a poor population. He would be unable to pay his own travelling expenses if the government did not pay them. In another clause of this Bill, they pretend to make provision for the raising of the funds required. They compel the municipal councils to levy upon the dissident Catholic ratepayers a sufficient amount to pay twenty dollars per school per month. If the schools are opened during eleven months, as is the case in the province of Quebec, it would make $220 per school per year. The municipal council is authorized to collect 25 per cent besides this amount. If it warrants the impossibility of doing it, then there will be no separate school. If, upon the spur of zeal at first, a certain number of separate schools are established,—and it is likely to happen— they will not be kept standing very long, and gradually, when the Catholics will find that they are overburdened by the expenditure caused by such a system, when they will have to pay for a superintendent of education, for a secretary of the board, in short to bear all the educational expenditure, including the school-houses, they will withdraw—and they will have a right to do it—from the separate schools organization and the efficiency of these schools will cease in proportion as the number of their supporters will decrease. But we must bear in mind that it is provided by this Bill that separate schools will have to be kept upon an equal footing, as to efficiency, with the public schools, otherwise they could not continue to exist. There is another remark, as to which I would like to say a few words. The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoliel) stated that this Bill sanctioned the very important principle of the right of a father to have his children educated as he intends them to be. The hon. gentleman did not notice that the Bill compels the parents to send their children to public or separate schools, they are not free to send them to a private school chosen by themselves. The father must send his children to a school kept in conformity with the law. Is that sanctioning the liberty of the father of a family? It is the very reverse that is sanctioned by this Bill. Now, does this Bill respect the rights of the minority in another most important respect? The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoliel) stated that this Bill sanctions the principles that the Catholics have the right to control the schools. Is the selection of the books to be used left quite unrestrained, or to whom is that selection reserved? In the province of Quebec, this is considered as a very important matter. The selection of the books belongs to the Catholic committee as regards the Catholics, and to the Protestant committee as regards the Protestant schools. No other authority, not even the government, has any right to deal with it. The selection of books relating to religion and morals is left to the care of the ministers of religion who have under their jurisdiction the various schools. Now, what do we find in the Bill now before the House? Is the selection of books unrestrained under this Bill? No, for under its provisions, they must be either books approved of by the Protestant board of schools, or books in use in the Ontario separate schools. They go insulting the future board of education by refusing to trust to their judgment. They are not left the liberty to select the school books; the right is taken away from them who will be entrusted with the management of the new educational system, to select at their will among the methods of teaching, a privilege which belonged to the Catholic minority prior to the law of 1890, and which was taken away from them by that law. I regret, Mr. Speaker, having taken so much of the time of this House. This Bill is simply a mockery. By the last section, the minority are made to believe that this is only the beginning of the measures of justice and that, later on, this shapeless Bill, this abortion of legislation will be completed. This is only an allureurement of which we must beware. By adopting this Bill, we would make worse the position of the Catholic minority in Manitoba in favour of whom we may now make an appeal to all reasonable men among the Protestants of the whole Dominion. By adopting this Bill, we would cause the characters to be changed, and to the mind of a great many people in this country, the minority who are down-trodden would give way to the Protestant majority in Manitoba who, in their turn, would profess to be treated with hardship by the majority, and who would have the sympathies now going to our co-religionists. I think there could be nothing more to be regretted for the Catholic minority or more contrary to the restoration of their rights. On these grounds, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MONCRIEFF moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 6th March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 77) to amend the Railway Act (from the Senate).—(Mr. Boyle.)

RETURN ASKED FOR.

Mr. CASEY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the leader of the House that I have his promise to bring down very shortly the correspondence ordered by the House some weeks ago between the Government and the High Commissioner with regard to the nature of his duties and so on.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I made inquiries on that point and I was told that that order had been complied with and the papers brought down.

Mr. CASEY. I think a mistake was made. There was one order for correspondence about the reasons for the High Commissioner's return to Canada, and that correspondence was brought down. But there was also a general order for correspondence regarding the High Commissioner's duties since the last return was made upon that subject in 1884.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I daresay I have been misinformed, and I will give immediate attention to the matter.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, who promised that we should have Supplementary Estimates, when he proposes to introduce them?

Mr. FOSTER. The Supplementary Estimates are in course of preparation. I may say that I have not hurried them very much, because I did not see any immediate prospect of having them acted upon by the House. I will have them for the hon. gentleman in time.

REMEDIAL BILL (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for second reading of Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba), and the proposed motion (six months' hoist) of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Mr. Speaker, the question now before the House is one of peculiar interest, one that has interested the country for many years past, and one, Sir, that I hope is very nearly at an end so far as its political significance in this country is concerned. The hon. gentleman from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) who preceded me last night, spoke in the French language. I never before realized so fully the necessity, either that the dual language should be abolished, or that I should understand the French language itself; I think, however, the latter alternative would be much more preferable than that the beautiful French language should pass into oblivion. Sir, I hope that in any remarks I may make to-day, I shall not give the slightest offence to any of my Protestant friends with whom I disagree on this very serious question; and at the same time I hope that any remarks I may make will not be considered in the slightest degree offensive by any of my French fellow-members of the House, with whom I am proud to say I have been on the most friendly social relations since I have had the pleasure and the honour of a seat in this House. Sir, the question before the House is one, as I have said, of peculiar interest, and largely so on account of a seeming religious aspect that pervades it. As for myself, I may say I do not think that its religious aspect is the most important. The hon. gentleman who preceded me had a few objections to make to this Bill; and I gathered enough from his remarks, which I understand were very eloquent indeed, to ascertain what were some of his objections to the Bill. The first objection the hon. gentleman had was that the Bill was no good. Sir, I do not think it comes properly from him to say whether the Bill is good or not; that is a judgment which should come from the members of Manitoba itself. There are three Roman Catholic members to-day in the legislature of Manitoba; one of them, I believe, is a Liberal, and the other two are Conservatives; and all three have agreed that the Bill meets the requirements of the minority in Manitoba. There are no objections whatever to this Bill, with the exception of those which have been conjectured by the followers of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The next objection made by the hon. member for Quebec Centre was that the Government did not disallow the Manitoba Bill of 1890, five years ago. That is a pretty argument to come from a follower of the leader of the Opposition—that this Government ought to have disallowed that Bill. Why, the leader of the Opposition claimed credit the other day for the Reform party for the position it had taken in that it had always opposed disallowance. Sir, if the Government had disallowed this Bill, what would have been the result? Why, the whole Reform party, including the hon. gentleman himself, would have condemned this Government for so doing. Another thing that the hon. gentleman said—if I am wrong, of course, he can correct me—was that all that the judgment of the Privy Council had decided was that jurisdiction was given to this Government to make a remedial order. Sir, he is entirely mistaken. That is only one of six propositions on which the Privy Council gave their opinion. He is correct in what he says, but that is only one of six propositions, and he omitted the other five. The most important of them is probably the sixth, and last, which I shall refer to in its proper order. But allow me to say this: If the hon. gentleman believes that that is all the Privy Council decided—and he nodded assent to me when I made the remark that that was his statement—then we can well understand why so many people throughout this country, of less intelligence than that hon. gentleman, should misunderstand what the decision of the Privy Council was in this matter. Sir, I suppose it is well known in this House that I am a Protestant. I was brought up as a Protestant; but, at the same time, I should be ashamed of myself, I should feel unworthy to be called a Protestant, if I held in less esteem any one of my fellow-countrymen because his religious convictions were not the same as my own. Now, Sir, religious convictions are acquired. I may say, in childhood. It is the whispering of a mother in the ear of her child that initiates and confirms his religious conviction; and a man feels when he buries his religious convictions for one moment, that he buries the respect and the love he has for the mother who gave them to him. Is it, then, to be wondered at, Mr. Speaker, that on an occasion of this kind, when there is a possibility of religious feeling arising that the discussion should be of an extremely interesting character. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who spoke last night, said quite enough indeed, in the tongue of the other half of the dual language. Now, Sir, what are his objections to the Bill? If I understand him correctly, that hon. gentleman said that he was opposed to separate schools, and that is one of the reasons he opposes this Bill. Well, that reason simply belittles his intelligence, because that, in my opinion, is no reason at all. I am just as much opposed to separate schools as he is. I do not think that his mind has thoroughly grasped the position. He also said that he saw no legal or moral obligation on the part of this Parliament to enact remedial legislation. I must direct my reasoning powers as against those of the hon. gentleman. I think when an hon. member says there is neither legal nor moral obligation to support this Bill, either he has not studied the question, or else he must be so prejudiced against separate schools that he drowns, so to speak, the salient points of the argument in favour of giving redress to the minority in Manitoba. He also interpreted the law according to the declaration made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). That hon. gentleman—I am sorry is not in his place—

An hon. MEMBER. He never is.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has adopted the interpretation of the judgment of the Privy Council as given by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), instead of taking the plain English of the judgment. If the hon. member for North Simcoe were in his seat, I would hope, before I conclude my remarks, to convince him that there were two sides to this question. The hon. member for North Simcoe has spoken in that strain before, and any hon. member who follows him to-day is going to be led astray. The hon. gentleman also bases his reasons for voting against this Bill on the ground that a certain number of people in the country have become a little excited, as they naturally would on an occasion of this kind, and pastoral letters have been written by bishops to their followers. What have we to do with what the hierarchy or the clergy of the country have written? No. If every Catholic priest in Ontario were to write a letter, it would not have the slightest effect on me when I am judging a constitutional case. Why was the statement of the hon. gentleman made? Why should he refer to letters of priests or bishops? Was it not done for the purpose of engendering religious dissensions among ourselves, or at all events through the country? It could be done for no other reason, and it could not possibly affect the constitutional question before the House.

I come now to a branch of the case nearer the point at issue. There has been within the last two or three years a great deal of agitation in this country over this question. How has it arisen? I am giving the House the view of the matter as it strikes me, whatever I say is only my own opinion, and I hope the House will believe me when I say that it embodies my conscientious convictions. How has this agitation come about? If there is any man responsible for this agitation more than another, it is the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He held the brief for the government of the province of Manitoba in the Barrett case, and he did not cease when he had completed his duties in behalf of the Manitoba government, to hold that brief, which in fact he has held ever since. I have no quarrel with the hon. gentleman as regards his conscientious convictions, but I say that the fact that the hon. gentleman held that brief and pocketed thousands of dollars for appearing before the Privy Council has not tended in any way to change his judgment. The hon. gentleman has done more than any one else to agitate this question throughout the country. The hon. gentleman has to-day practically the support of the Toronto "World," which presents the hon. gentleman's views to the public. That hon. gentleman did not always have the support of that paper. Only a few months ago that journal called him the leader of the strife party. I have here some extracts from the "World," which will be interesting to the House. Here is an article headed "The Strife Makers en Tour." I will read a few extracts:

The first thing we learn about the new party at this stage in its history is the fact that the head office is not attracting new and able men. Whatever may be the change of complexion in the rank and file in the country the leaders of the party to-day are the same as they were when the party sprang into existence at Ottawa.

Further on the article says:

The head office walked the platform at Georgetown and at Stratford, but no district agents appeared on the scene to report progress of third party local affairs. The three representatives of the third party, in fact, attracted just about as much attention as any three Toronto drummers would command on their way to work a western town. The chief of the party was easily distinguishable from the right and left wings by his get-up, the most pronounced feature of which was a new style English tile hat (Piccadilly).

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What is the date of these extracts?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. October 13th, 1893.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There has been a change since then.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Those gentlemen afterwards took a trip to Listowel, and I have here a report of the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe, at a meeting held at that place. He said:

Mr. MONCRIEFF.

It might be asked, why am I here to-day after fighting for so many years in the ranks of the old party? For one thing I am here because I decline to allow the Jesuits' Estates Bill to pass unchallenged in the Parliament of my country.

Further on he said:

In regard to the Manitoba school question, my position is this: Under no circumstances, no matter what the pleadings before the court may be, I am not prepared to support any interference with the Manitoba school law.

Sir, he occupies that position to-day, and for some years past, and his record in this House on every occasion has established that that is the position he has taken.

Therefore, Sir, we have as leader of the third party—and I trust every hon. gentleman in the House will follow my remarks—we have an hon. gentleman as leader of the third party, who says, that under no circumstances, no matter what the argument may be, no odds to him what the pleadings may be before the courts; he will oppose any interference with the Manitoba government on this question. Well, Sir, when I meet with a man of that kind, a man who takes such a position as does the leader of the third party, it could hardly be expected that anything I may say would influence him. At the same time, Sir, I have a right to know that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) is not amenable to reason, and having concluded from his own statements that he is not amenable to reason, I then have the right to say, that I trust, that in this Parliament and in this country, there are few men like him.

Now, Sir, I come to another branch of the question. It surely must have struck this House as very strange and very peculiar, that the leader of the Opposition should have moved the "six months' hoist" in amendment to the second reading of this Bill. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is the motion in amendment, that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), had already prepared to move himself. Why, that is the resolution of the member for North Simcoe. The leader of the Opposition, made a speech in which he did not oppose relief to the Manitoba minority, but he thought it was necessary for an inquiry to be held. Then, why did you not move for an inquiry, and if you do not tell me why, I will tell this House why you did not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Address the Chair.

Mr. ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Mara). The hon. gentleman should address the Chair.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I hope I am not deaf, but I did not hear what Mr. Speaker said. I take it for granted that you rose, Sir, because I was out of order, and if I am out of order I will, of course, withdraw.

An hon. MEMBER. They object to you addressing the leader of the Opposition in a direct manner.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Oh, I find that I should have addressed the Chair. Well, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that I did not intend any disrespect to the Chair. It was a slip of the tongue. Now, Sir, I will come back again to what I was saying. I said, that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) had stolen the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). The leader of the Opposition made a speech of an hour or two's duration, but in the course of that speech, he never for one moment said that the Manitoba minority were not entitled to some redress. However, he did say, and I suppose he was sincere when he said it, that he was not quite sufficiently possessed of the facts to vote upon this question, and consequently he believed it was necessary to have an inquiry, and that when the inquiry was made he was prepared to deal with the matter. Now, Sir, I shall deal with that position of the hon. gentleman at a later stage of my remarks; but in the meantime, I do not think I am very far astray in telling the House this. I will take the House into my confidence this much at any rate, and say: That the hon. leader of the Opposition does not, I think, mean one word of what his amendment says. He is not sincere in that. But, Sir, I think that he means that he may be able to secure a larger vote in the House by his "six months' hoist" amendment, than he would secure if he moved a motion based on his own speech.

An hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Surely that is not unparliamentary. The hon. the leader of the Opposition has never once declared in this House, that he was opposed to the minority in Manitoba receiving the restitution of their rights. Sir, at the present moment there is a Bill before this House by which the rights of the Manitoba minority are to be restored to them, and the leader of the Opposition knows just as well as I do, that the Bill is satisfactory to the Manitoba minority.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. No.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Yes, satisfactory to the Manitoba minority, satisfactory to the clergymen in Manitoba, if the hon. gentleman likes to know, and satisfactory to the members of Parliament who represent Manitoba who are of the Catholic religion. But still, the hon. the leader of the Opposition says: I want to defeat this Bill. Well, Sir, the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) rather let the cat out of the bag. He said: "I am going to oppose this Bill, because it does not give as much to the minority in Manitoba as I think they ought to have, and I know that my leader will give a better Bill when he gets into power." Sir, under such circumstances does it not seem rather ridiculous that the leader of the Opposition should move to defeat this Bill altogether. The Bill is on the Table of the House, and if there is any particular clause that he does not approve of, cannot he move an amendment to it, and I can assure the hon. gentleman this much—although I do not speak for the Government—I know that this Government is prepared to do what is right, and if he has a suggestion that will improve the position of the Manitoba minority, this Government will be pleased no doubt to consider it. Now, what can I conclude from all this? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) went through the province of Ontario last summer, and at each and every meeting he addressed, he told the people that under no circumstances would he consent to ride into power on a question such as the one before the House. Then, in moving this "six months' hoist" is he conscientiously and honestly following out the promise that he has given the country and the statement he has made time and again in this House of Commons. He told us that he would not wish to ride into power over a religious question. I have a right to ask the hon. gentleman, why therefore, did he not propose a motion in harmony with his speech. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) and the leader of the third party (Mr. McCarthy) had been consulting together before this motion was introduced. I might imagine that these two hon. gentlemen had a little consultation together, and that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said to the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier): My friend, I think if you move this motion it will have more effect than if I moved it. I think I can hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) say: You know, Mr. Laurier, if I move this motion, I don't stand well at any rate with your French supporters; you know that I cannot draw a French vote; you know that I cannot draw the vote of a Government supporter in the House, but if you will make this as a party motion on your side of the House, it will have some effect, and I and my lieutenants behind me will support you in that and so we may defeat the Government. Has not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), I submit, tried to ride into power on religious prejudices? What else can it be? The motion is not an honest motion—so far, I mean, as following the argument the hon. gentleman addressed to this House. Then, it must have been for some other purpose. Was it for the benefit of Manitoba? No; it is prolonging the discussion. For whose benefit was it? It was moved in the hope of being for the benefit of the Reform party in the country.

Sir, I have spoken too long on the initiatory parts of this address. I now come to review the legal aspect of the question. The position of Quebec, Ontario and the other provinces at the time of confederation was most satisfactorily explained by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) yesterday, and by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) on the previous day. But it is necessary for the continuity of my remarks, that I should, even at the expense of keeping the House for a while, repeat much of what has already been said. It is often said that we cannot have too much of a good thing, and I hope the House will forgive me.

Now, in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, there were, prior to confederation, respective minorities. In Quebec there was a Protestant minority, in Ontario there was a Catholic minority; and, when the subject of confederation was under discussion, the rights of those respective minorities were well guarded. In the province of Quebec, at that time, there was practically no law that gave the Protestants the rights they required. We know that the Protestants in the province of Quebec, though not numerically strong, formed a most important body; and, whether they did or did not, they were entitled, and they felt that they were entitled to protection under the Confederation Act. Knowing the position they occupied at that time, knowing that they were not secure in the absolute control of their separate schools, they insisted, while the agreement was being formed, that a better law should be enacted in the province of Quebec than then existed, for the protection of their interests. An understanding was come to between those who framed the Confederation Act, that after confederation took place, an Act should be passed by the legislature of Quebec, securing to the Protestants of that province certain further provisions and better control over the Protestant schools. Was there anything at all unreasonable in that? Is not that what we might expect would be done? Among those who were then gathered together, were Sir George Cartier and Sir Hector Langevin, who now sits in this House—and, Sir, I regard with respect the men who framed the constitution, and I regret that there are not more of them living to-day. Those two gentlemen promised that, after confederation, Quebec province would pass a law for the protection of the rights of the Protestant minority in Quebec. That was no part of the Confederation Act; but it was suggested that the Confederation Act itself should also, as far as possible, assist in making permanent the provisions of such provincial law so to be passed. It was urged, that a law of the province would be liable to be repealed at any time the province might think fit, and, therefore, that a provision should be inserted in the constitution by which any interference with any rights or privileges acquired by the Protestant minority of Quebec passed after the proposed union, should be subject to an appeal to this House. That was considered protection enough, and the provincial Act was passed in the first or second year after confederation. Under that Act the Protestants, as Protestants, had a representation on the Board of Education for the province of Quebec. Before that time they never had any such representation and their school books could be prescribed by the bishops who might compose the Board of Education of the province. Under the new law, a board was formed, having two divisions, the one being Protestant and the other Catholic. The Protestant Board had charge of everything relating to Protestant schools. They prescribed their own school books, and regulated the working of their own schools. These rights they never had before, and these rights are certainly very sacred and very dear to the Protestants of the province of Quebec. Now, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) asked: Would it not be ultra vires of this Parliament to interfere in any way with the rights of the Protestants of Quebec? I tell him that it would not in respect of any post-union legislation of the province. The same, the Confederation Act, provided that whatever rights and privileges the Catholic minority in Ontario had at the time of confederation, should be transplanted, so to speak, in the province of Quebec, for the benefit of the Protestant minority in that province.

Now, what rights and privileges did the Catholics of Ontario, at that time, enjoy, which were granted by the Confederation Act to the Protestant minority in Quebec? Why, they were very slight, indeed. The Roman Catholics in Ontario, as such, had no representation on the school board there. The two systems of schools were under the control of the one board, on which the Roman Catholic minority, as such, had no representation. And, therefore, when the Confederation Act provided that the Protestant minority of Quebec should enjoy all the benefits which the Catholic minority had in Ontario at that time, it did not certainly give the Protestant minority of Quebec all that they desired, and all that they now enjoy. The privileges which the Roman Catholic minority enjoyed in Ontario were not considered sufficient in the interests of the Protestant minority of Quebec. It was for this reason that the clause was put in the Confederation Act, providing that, in respect of any post-union legislation, there should be a right of appeal to this House. Now, in answer to the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), I may say that any legislation of the province which would interfere with the rights of the Protestants in Quebec, which they had at the time of the union, and which were given them by the Confederation Act, in order that they might have the same rights and privileges as the Catholics in Ontario possessed in respect to schools would be ultra vires. But any legislation not affecting such rights would not be ultra vires. Therefore, the very Act which was passed by the province of Quebec, after the union, giving additional rights and privileges to the Protestant minority of that province, not given them by the Confederation Act, could be constitutionally repealed by the Quebec legislature. No one can gainsay that.

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. No; the hon. gentleman might say that in that case there would be the right of appeal to this Parliament, and in that respect I agree with him. If the legislature of Quebec should to-day pass an Act taking away from the Protestant minority the right of representation upon the Educational Board—which is a right granted to them since the union, and was a right not enjoyed by the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario at the time of the union, and which is a right certainly sacred to the Protestants of Quebec—such legislation would be intra vires of the legislature of that province, but the question then would come up of the right of the Protestant minority there to appeal to this Government for a redress of their grievance.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put him a question? When was it that the Protestants in Quebec got their representation on the Council of Public Instruction?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. It was in 1869, two years after confederation. By the Act of that year there was established a Board of Public Instruction, consisting of twenty-one members, fourteen of whom were Catholics, and seven Protestants; and I may say that there previously never was a board in that province on which Protestants, as such, were entitled to a seat. Is not that a right and privilege dear to the Protestants of Quebec?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where did you get the idea that legislation since the union stands upon a different footing from the legislation before the union? The words of the section are: "In any province where a system of separate schools exists by law at the union, or is thereafter established."

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I understand the hon. gentleman to ask where I get the law for saying that the rights and privileges which the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec had before the union were to continue? Perhaps I had better read the subsection of the British North America Act:

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools, which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That refers to denominational schools, which any class of persons, either of the majority or the minority might have had; whereas, in the other case, they are persons who belong wholly to the minority, and are protected in a different way.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Then, take section 2:

All the powers, privileges and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be, and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and

Roman Catholic subjects in the province of Quebec.

So that whatever privileges the Catholic minority in Ontario had, as such, at the time of confederation, were granted by the Act of Confederation to the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec, and nothing more. The hon. gentleman shakes his head; it is the first time I have ever remarked any expression of dissent on this point. For the purpose of making it clear, let me read the first part of section 93, which, really, I should have read preceding what I did quote:

In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:—

Those provisions are the subsections I have just read. Allow me to read subsection 3, which will complete my quotations from the Act:

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You see both stand on the same footing.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Now, Sir, I simply say this to make it clear that there has been given by the Confederation Act, by the compact that was then made, a right of appeal on the part of the Protestant minority of Quebec, and the Catholic minority of Ontario, against what? Not against any law that existed prior to confederation, but against any interference with any privilege that has been given to the minorities of these provinces by provincial legislatures passed since the union. I do not believe that there is any gentleman, lawyer or not, in this House, who would dispute that all the provinces at that time were put on an equal footing in that respect.

Now we come to the question of the manner in which Manitoba has been dealt with; and here I must ask your consideration for a little while. At the time the negotiations were taking place for an Act suitable to the circumstances of the province of Manitoba, is it to be wondered at for a moment that the question of separate schools should be considered in the interests of both parties? At that time the population was about equally divided, half being Catholics and half Protestants. Is it to be for one moment supposed that both parties were not looking after their own interests? It is to the Act under which Manitoba became part of the union, we must now look to see what the privileges of the minority were to be. There was no telling, at that time, which were to be the minority, whether the minority were to be Protestants or Catholics. But the Bill was drawn so, that, whichever became the minority in future years, should be protected. Let me read here the sections of the Manitoba Act which particularly apply :

In and for the province, the said legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provision :—

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

Now, what followed immediately after the union? The Protestants being half, the legislature in the year 1871 passed an Act creating a Board of Education for the province of Manitoba. That board consisted, I think of an equal number of Protestants and Roman Catholics, and each branch of the board had control of its own schools. Now, it may be well to look at the judgment of the Privy Council referring to the position of affairs in Manitoba at the time of the union. At that time there had been no separate schools established by law. And, when the Act of Union was formed, there was inserted the words "or practice" after the words "by law," which I have no doubt was intended by the negotiators to protect the minority, whichever it turned out to be. Now let me here quote from the judgment of the Privy Council on the Manitoba case :

Those who were stipulating for the provisions of section 22 as a condition of the union, and those who gave their legislative assent to the Act by which it was brought about, had in view the perils then apprehended. The immediate adoption by the legislature of an educational system obnoxious either to Catholics or Protestants would not be contemplated as possible. As has been already stated, the Roman Catholics and Protestants in the province were about equal in number. It was impossible at that time for either party to obtain legislative sanction to a scheme of education obnoxious to the other. The establishment of a system of public education in which both parties would concur was probably then in immediate prospect. The legislature of Manitoba first met on the 15th March, 1871. On the 3rd May following, the Education Act of 1871 received the Royal Assent.

I also wish to say here, Mr. Speaker, that, immediately after the union was accomplished, the Manitoba legislature, representing Catholics and Protestants together, created a school system that was satisfactory to the province. The Lords, in their judgment, speaking of the position of affairs up to 1890 and the result of the legislation of 1890, made the following remarks :—

Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only toward the support of the Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants.

Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctly Protestant in their character.

Sir, after the legislation was passed in 1890, what followed? Petitions after petitions were sent into this Parliament by the minority in Manitoba, some of which alleged that the Act was ultra vires. Well, it was decided in the Barrett case that the Act was not ultra vires, that before the union there had been, neither by law nor practice, any separate schools in the province. But the law lords themselves, in considering the question, show by their expressions, that they felt that the words "or practice" were put into that statute for the purpose of covering what "by law" did not cover. I will read now what they said in that respect, which I find on page 273 of the Manitoba case :

It may be that those who were acting on behalf of the Roman Catholic community in Manitoba, and those who either framed or assented to the wording of that enactment, were under the impression that its scope was wider, and that it afforded protection greater than their lordships held to be the case. But such considerations cannot properly influence the judgment of those who have judicially to interpret a statute. The question is, not what may be supposed to have been intended, but what has been said.

Now, can any hon. member of this House come to any other conclusion than that when this Manitoba Act was framed, the words "or practice" were added for some particular purpose? Then, Sir, an appeal followed to the Supreme Court of this country to find out whether there was any right under that Act for the minority to appeal to the Government of this country for the redress of their grievances. A good deal has been said against this Government for having asked the opinion of the Supreme Court; but I think if anything was justifiable on the part of this Government it was their action in appealing to the Supreme Court before they asked this House to legislate on the question. Why, if we had not the judgment of the Privy Council to establish that we have authority to deal with this matter, the result would have been that after we had passed this legislation the Protestant majority of Manitoba would have taken it to the Supreme Court, and would have taken it home to the Privy Council to have it there decided whether our legislation was constitutional. Now, we have the fact established in advance that the law we are about to enact, is constitutional. It would not have shortened the proceedings one day; the Protestant majority of Manitoba, if we had disposed of this matter before the judgment of the Privy Council, would unquestionably have carried it to the Privy Council in the end. Now, there were several questions submitted to the Privy Council for decision. Hon. members have risen in this House and have confined the issue before the Privy Council to the simple question of jurisdiction. Now, at the expense of wearying the House, I propose to put on record once more what questions were submitted to the Privy Council. The questions were six in number and were as follows:—

1. Is the appeal referred to in the said memorials and petitions, and asserted thereby, such an appeal as is admissible by subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, or by subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 33 Vic. (1870), Chap. 3, Canada?

That, Sir, is the first question. Then in sequence let me give the answer:

1. That the appeal referred in the said memorials and petitions, and asserted thereby, is such an appeal as is admissible under section 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 33 Vic. (1870), Chap. 3, Canada.

Question 2. Are the grounds set forth in the petitions and memorials such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsections above referred to, or either of them?

Answer to question 2. That grounds are set forth in the petitions and memorials such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsection of the Manitoba Act immediately above referred to.

Question 3. Does the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Barrett vs. The City of Winnipeg, and Logan vs. The City of Winnipeg, dispose of or conclude the application for redress based on the contention that the rights of the Roman Catholic minority, which accrued to them after the union under these statutes of the province, have been interfered with by the two statutes of 1890, complained of in the said petitions and memorials?

Answer to question 3. That the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the cases of Barrett vs. The City of Winnipeg, and Logan vs. The City of Winnipeg, does not dispose of, or conclude, the application for redress based on the contention that the rights of the Roman Catholic minority which accrued to them after the union, under the statutes of the province, have been interfered with by the two statutes of 1890 complained of in the said petitions and memorials.

Question 4. Does subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, apply to Manitoba?

Answer to question 4. That subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, does not apply to Manitoba.

Question 5. Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declarations or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises?

Answer to question 5. That the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and the appeal is well founded, but that the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute; that the general character of the steps to be taken is sufficiently defined by subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 1870.

There, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, opposed to the Bill, have stopped, and, I think, they have led this House to understand that no other question of any practical value was submitted to the Privy Council for their consideration.

Question 6, which I am about to read, is the question which is important above all others, and it is the one above all others which materially deals with this subject. The question is:

6. Did the Acts of Manitoba relating to education, passed prior to the session of 1890, confer on or continue to the minority "a right or privilege in relation to education" within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, or establish a system of separate or dissentient schools, within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867; if said section 93 be found applicable to Manitoba; and, if so, did the two Acts of 1890 complained of, or either of them, affect any right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council?

The answer to that question is as follows:—

6. That the Acts of Manitoba relating to education passed prior to the session of 1890 did confer on the minority a right or privilege in relation to education within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, which alone applies; that the two Acts of 1890 complained of did affect a right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council.

Then allow me to add the final words of the judgment of the highest court in England:

Her Majesty having taken the said report into consideration, was pleased by and with the advice of Her Privy Council to approve thereof and to order, as it is hereby ordered, that the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually observed, obeyed and carried into effect in each and every particular. Whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being, and all other persons whom it may concern are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say "hear, hear." If they would support legislation following that judgment, I would respect more their cries of "hear, hear." Sir, after having heard the answers given by the Privy Council—the Privy Council being, as we all know, the highest court in the realm—are we not obligated to follow the decision given? If there be any just reason for a grievance on the part of the minority of the province of Manitoba, and the Privy Council has decided that we have not any justification for refusing to remedy it, are we not bound by law and by honour to deal with the minority in a fair and honourable way? The hon. member for North Bruce, speaking in this House, I think, last year, said as follows:—

That a grievance exists, I admit. No one can gainsay the fact, the patent fact, that certain rights and privileges were conferred upon the Catholic minority in Manitoba, and that those rights and privileges, after they had been enjoyed for nineteen or twenty years, were taken away suddenly, and, as I have already said, I believe harshly, in certain respects.

With the judgment of the Privy Council staring us in the face, irrespective altogether of the remarks made by the hon. member for North Bruce, can there be any question whatever but that we should deal with this question fairly and honourably as between the province and the Dominion?

Under such circumstances, what are we to do? We have it admitted before this House that a grievance exists. We have it admitted that certain privileges were given to the Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba by the Act of 1870. We have it admitted beyond question that the Act of 1890 deprived the minority in the province of Manitoba of all those privileges. We have the judgment of the Privy Council of England that those privileges were granted, and that they were taken away by the Act of 1890, and the fact of taking them away was such a grievance as regards the minority in the province that under subsection 2 they had a right to appeal to the Dominion Parliament for redress. Are we to give them no redress whatever? Are we to disregard the whole facts of the case; are we to disregard the judgment of the Privy Council? If we are to do so simply because we are opposed to separate schools. Let us say so at once and be done with it. The question of whether we favour or are opposed to separate schools has nothing whatever to do with it. We are face to face with the difficulty—what are we to do? Are we to follow the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who said that under no circumstances whatever, no matter what the pleadings might be before the courts, he would oppose any interference with the legislature of Manitoba. If we intend to take that position, then we will wind up the matter at once. But I say that the Dominion of Canada is bound in good faith to keep inviolate the contracts made with any province when it came into this union. If we should now, when an occasion presents itself fail to carry out the constitution to the letter with a province of the Dominion, no matter how small, and affirm that it was not a question of the constitution, but one of force, and a majority should control it, nothing now could happen to assist in the disintegration of the Dominion more than to decide that the minority in Manitoba should not have relief on the case presented to this Parliament. We are bound to keep good faith with the provinces. By the Act of 1870, which established the province of Manitoba, we are bound to hear an appeal, and to deal honourably and fairly with the minority, whatever it may be, in that province, when any question arises which deprives them of any right they had acquired in regard to education. That question has arisen; the occasion is now. Is this House to tell the minority in Manitoba that no matter what we agreed to at the time of the admission of the province, we are opposed to separate schools, and will support the government of Manitoba. It would be a very sorry day for the Dominion when we made such an assertion.

Now, Sir, let us take, for a moment, this point. All legislation affecting legislation enacted after the union, is on the same footing, as is this question now before the House. I ask if any hon. gentleman in this House will dispute what I say. I say again, that all legislation passed by the provincial legislatures since confederation, is on the same footing as is this question. And, Sir, if we say that we shall not treat fairly the minority in Manitoba, we shall have, if the occasion ever presents itself, to say to the minority of the province of Quebec: We refuse to assist you; you must be governed by the majority in your own province. Of my Protestant friends in the province of Ontario, I ask this question. I ask the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule): If the minority in the province of Manitoba happened to be Protestants, what course would he take on a question like this? I want the hon. gentleman to think about that. If the minority in the province of Manitoba happened to be Protestant, would that hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), and others who feel like himself, object to grant them relief under the constitution?

Mr. SPROULE. As it is, yes.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. No, Sir, you would not.

Mr. SPROULE. I say, yes.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I beg you a thousand pardons. If it were a question of Protestantism, I am sure you would say: I shall support the Protestant minority in the province of Manitoba, the constitution says so, and, under the constitution, you, the Protestant minority, are entitled to be relieved.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish distinctly to say to the hon. gentleman—and he has no right to do other than accept my word—I say emphatically, I would not.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Well, I shall accept the hon. gentleman's word. I cannot do less. I accept his words to mean this: That if the Protestants of the province of Quebec were deprived of the rights they received under post-union legislation, he would not hear their appeal.

Mr. SPROULE. It is not the same at all.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) says that he will not grant relief to the Catholic minority in Manitoba. Now, if the minority in Manitoba, as was at one time expected, happened to be a Protestant minority, the hon. gentleman says that he would not hear their appeal. Well, he must follow up that position, constitutionally, and he must also say: If it happened that the appeal came from the Protestant minority of Quebec; if it happened that Quebec deprived the Protestants of their Protestant Board of Education, the hon. gentleman could not take any other course but to refuse to the Protestants of the province of Quebec any relief whatever. That is his position. Sir, I know that every Roman Catholic member in this House is willing to give the Protestants of Quebec their rights. I know that every Roman Catholic will maintain, inviolate, every single privilege given to the Protestants, under any Act of the legislature, passed since confederation.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him one question? Does he say that there is any sort of analogy whatever, in law or anything else, between the position of the Protestants of Quebec and the position of the Roman Catholics in Manitoba?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. A man must be blind who does not see that the position in regard to post union legislation is exactly the same. The Protestants of Quebec have acquired the rights I speak of since the union, and every Act of Parliament passed by any province of the Dominion since confederation is intra vires of the legislature to repeal it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the hon. gentleman tell me, what rights the Protestant minority in Quebec have?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Does not the hon. gentleman know?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the hon. gentleman define what the rights are, that the Pro-

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Why, everybody knows that.

Mr. O'BRIEN. A great many people do not know.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman himself does not know.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I would not be standing on the floor of this House to-day if I did not know the rights of the Protestant minority of Quebec. Does not the hon. gentleman know that there is a Protestant Board of Education in Quebec?

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is no answer.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Certainly it is. That is one of the privileges of the Protestants in that province.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) asked me, what is the similarity between the position of the Protestant minority in Quebec and the position of the Catholic minority in Manitoba? I do not know whether it is my obtuse way of putting things to the House, or whether it is the obtuse character of the hon. gentleman, but I thought I had made that plain. I tell the hon. gentleman that all the privileges, and rights, sacred to our Protestant friends in the province of Quebec, and which are as sacred as the educational privileges are to the Catholics of Manitoba; all these rights which are of any practical value, have been acquired since confederation. It is intra vires of the legislatures to repeal every one of those Acts passed since the union, and, Sir, if the province of Quebec chose to act—shall I say, so ugly—they could take away the Protestant Educational Committee that is now existing in the province of Quebec.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What then becomes of the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I am just as well able to answer that question as the other. What I want to give to the religious minority of one province, I want to give to the religious minority of another. Every Act that has been passed in the province of Ontario since confederation, is under the control of the legislature of Ontario, and is subject to the same right of appeal as an Act passed by the legislature of Quebec. I ask any member of this House, especially any lawyer, to dispute what I say. That is, I think, a fair answer to the hon. gentleman.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question has arisen, whether or not this Bill is coercion. I say it is not coercion. I say, that, if we pass this Act, we are not coercing Manitoba, but we are following the lines of the constitution: we are giving the minority the right which they had under the constitution, and nothing more. To say, that giving a man a right which he has under the constitution is coercion, is something which I never heard

Now, Sir, let us look for a moment at the result of the legislation of 1890. What does the hon. member for Winnipeg, for whom I have the greatest respect—who, I believe, knows more about matters in Manitoba than perhaps any other hon. member of this House—what does he say about the legislation of 1890? In a letter to the "Globe," of the 25th September, 1895, he says:

As a matter of fact, Manitoba made no difference in the religious exercises of the old Protestant schools. In other words, the religious exercises that had been adopted by the old Protestant board have been applied to the new national schools. I believe myself that it is wrong; I have never hesitated to say so; and I would have been glad if the legislature of 1890 had adopted a thoroughly national system of schools, excluding therefrom religious exercises of every kind.

Such, Sir, is the view of the hon. member for Winnipeg. Now, the "Globe," not for the purpose of quieting religious dissensions, but, I believe, for the purpose of assisting the Reform party of the country to defeat the Conservatives, sent a certain gentleman of high education to the province of Manitoba to investigate the school matter. I believe his name is Dr. Grant—a thoroughly educated man, I admit; but he went up there at the instigation of the "Globe," and made a report, which, I may say, is, on the whole, rather against the Bill now before the House. The hon. member for Winnipeg, who, I agree, is fully conversant with the affairs of Manitoba, has addressed a letter to the "Globe," in reference to the report made by Dr. Grant, and what does he say? He says:

I cannot, however, congratulate it on the success of its experiment in sending Principal Grant here with that view. It seems to me that he has succeeded in nothing, except in making the most egregious blunders with regard to the facts of the case, and that his own opinions which he puts forward as exemplifying the highest wisdom as applied to the case in question, instead of being wise, are most absurd and ridiculous. In fact, the three letters on the question force me irresistibly to the conclusion that Dr. Grant, instead of being the exceedingly wise man he sets himself up for, is in fact a conceited humbug.

Whatever we see in Reform newspapers respecting Dr. Grant, we have, at any rate, the opinion of the hon. member for Winnipeg, that he is a conceited humbug, and is not possessed of the facts, as they are in Manitoba.

Now, Sir, let us consider for a few minutes the position of the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman knows all about separate schools; and he has stated on several occasions in this House, that the Roman Catholics are unanimously in favour of separate schools, and that, if the Manitoba schools are not Protestant, they are still offensive to the Catholics. I think he speaks truly for his co-religionists. Now, the Protestant schools of Manitoba are either one thing or the other. If they are Protestant, it is certain that they are objectionable to the Catholics; and the hon. leader of the Opposition says, that, if they are not Protestant, they are equally offensive to them. Now, seriously speaking—for this is a matter of conscience—if they are objectionable, are we going to impose them upon the Roman Catholics, when they have a right, under the constitution, to be protected from having them forced upon them? The hon. leader of the Opposition also says, that Protestants, as a rule, are in favour of the system of common schools, while Catholics are unanimously in favour of separate schools. "If," says the hon. gentleman, "the schools are Protestant, every Protestant will say that the Government should interfere by all means and stop the outrage." "If the schools are not Protestant," he says, "they are still offensive to the Catholics." Is this the time for the hon. gentleman to talk of postponing this question? I say, no. The question is put in a nutshell by his own statements. Am I to say, that, when the hon. gentleman spoke these words, he was saying what he did not believe? Am I to assume, for one moment, that he was saying what was untrue? I accept his words, and this House has the right to accept the words of a gentleman in his position. Does he need any commission of inquiry? What is a commission required for? It makes little difference—if the schools are Protestant they are offensive; if they are not Protestant, they are equally offensive.

Again, the hon. gentleman says, referring to his Catholic friends:

If their conscientious conviction is that their children should be taught religious principles, which they deem essential and necessary, who can object seriously?

The hon. gentleman, surely, if not by direct language—and I will show direct language shortly—by indirect language, expressed himself in favour of separate schools for Manitoba. He is in favour, under that statement, of restoring any rights to the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba of which they may have been deprived. Let me say here that I am not in favour of separate schools. I wish that we could all see alike, I wish that there was no necessity for separate schools in the country. I wish my children to go to school along with the children of my Catholic friends, and I do not see why my Catholic friends' children should not go to the same school with mine. I am willing that my wife should educate her children in her faith, and I am willing that the wife of every Catholic should do likewise. But that does not satisfy the conscientious conviction of Roman Catholics. Roman Catholics believe that religion should be taught in the schools, and I do not want, for a moment, to interfere with their conscientious convictions. There I draw the line, and I shall not, for one moment, attempt to cross that line with my opinions or prejudices, if I choose to call them so. Sir, I believe in the old golden rule of doing to others as you would like to be done by, and the whole question now before this House resolves itself down to this golden rule. Do we want to do by the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba as we would wish the Protestant minority of Quebec to be done by. Let us do to the one as we would do to the other. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has, time and again, in this House, stated that the minority in Manitoba have a grievance, but he does not think it proper, in the interests of the Dominion, to grant the relief they ask. He also contended that the right of appeal given did not mean anything. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not here, but I must say that I have never read a statute giving a right of appeal, in which the higher court was dictated to as to what it should do. When an appeal is given, the unwritten law is that the court of appeal shall act as it thinks right. To say that we have the power to hear an appeal, and are not bound to legislate one way or another after having heard it, is absurd. What is the use of an appeal unless it means something? The appeal comes before us, and it is admitted that the minority have a grievance. It is declared by the highest court in the realm that the grievance is within our competence to remedy, and that the minority in Manitoba have had taken away from them, rights they acquired since the union. And is it possible that the Parliament of Canada will say: We will not give to it any consideration. Why, Sir, that surely is going too far.

Another point is this: It has been contended that provincial rights should prevail, and that the province of Manitoba had the right to pass this law. True, it had, but allow me to tell every hon. member of this House that the province of Manitoba has no exclusive jurisdiction in school matters. For evidently good reasons the framers of the Manitoba Act did not give Manitoba exclusive jurisdiction in school matters. What that reason may be, it is easy to conjecture. It was in case the tide of population might change one way or another, the minority might feel safe and rely on the Dominion Parliament for protection. The judgment of the Privy Council itself makes that view clear. What does it say:

Bearing in mind the circumstances which existed in 1870, it does not appear to their lordships an extravagant opinion that in creating a legislature with limited powers, it should have been thought expedient, in case either the Protestants or Roman Catholics became dominant, and rights that came into existence, under certain circumstances, were interfered with, to give Parliament the right to legislate in matters of education, so far as necessary to protect the Protestant or Roman Catholic minorities.

The minority in Manitoba might as well have turned out to be Protestant as Catholic. The appeal which has been made, it has been decided we have the right to hear. In answer to the sixth question, the law lords decided that the minority in Manitoba had acquired rights under the Act of 1870, and that those rights have been taken away from the minority by the Act of 1890. Now, we are face to face with what we have to do. Are we to refuse any legislation? Are we to disregard the judgment of the Privy Council of England, and ruthlessly throw out any appeal from the minority in Manitoba simply because they are a minority? If we desire to do that, we might as well throw to the winds the whole constitution. I was very much pleased, Mr. Speaker, in reading the report of the meeting of the Grand Orange Lodge of Ontario West at London, the other day, to note what was said by Mr. Hughes, the Grand Master of that lodge. Mr. Hughes is a man who, today, has under his control the education of twenty-five thousand children. He has occupied his present position for a quarter of a century. He is one of the best-educated men in the province, and he understands education, probably, better than any man on the floor of this House. That is the gentleman who spoke as grand master of the Orange Lodge, an institution for whose members I have the greatest respect, an institution which, if I understand its constitution aright, is bound to give equal rights to all, whether Catholics or Protestants. It is no part of the programme of the Orange institution of this country, if I understand it aright, to maintain any special privileges in this country. The grand master, in his remarks to the lodge, at its meeting at London, spoke as follows:—

Whether the Manitoba minority had a grievance was not the question to be dealt with here. The highest authority in the land says the minority had a grievance. Whether that minority was Catholic or Protestant made no difference. Every man and woman in this house would say it was an outrage if the minority was Protestant. Then in all justice, truth and righteousness, how can it be called wrong to right that grievance?

Sir, the remarks made by that gentleman are worthy of commendation. Whether he is a Catholic or a Protestant, there is no man who can gainsay what Mr. Hughes said. And I believe that, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Hughes's remarks, made to that great convention in London, were not approved of by the committee who took them into consideration, what Mr. Hughes said will, I believe, outlive the comments of that committee. I believe, that, when the members of the Orange body, for whom I have the greatest respect, are fully conversant with the circumstances of this case, those who in that meeting favoured a course which would perpetuate strife between the religious sections of this country, will eventually be in the minority, and that the broad and liberal opinion stated by the grand master on that occasion will prevail in this Dominion.

Now, let me turn to the remarks that have been made on this subject heretofore by the hon. leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman has, over and over again, declared, that he would be the last man to desire that the party to which he belonged should walk into power through the door of religious strife. I am willing to accept what he says, but I fail to see that his actions carry it out, and I shall prove to this House, or, if I do not prove it, I shall be wonderfully disappointed, that the statement I have quoted is not carried out by the hon. gentleman's actions. The hon. gentleman made a speech in which he asked for an inquiry. Is he sincere in asking for that inquiry? That is a question that every hon. member on each side of the House should think over. What does he want to inquire about? He has already stated on the floor of this House, that, if the schools are Protestant, they are offensive, and, if they are not Protestant, they were equally offensive. Now, he did not want an inquiry to find out whether the schools were offensive. What, then, does he want an inquiry for? Let me give his own words:

I agree that there was no cause for a reference of this question to the Supreme Court.

This was said at the time when we were discussing the propriety of having this question submitted to the Supreme Court. Said the hon. leader of the Opposition:

This is a mere question of fact on which each one can pass his judgment when the papers have been placed before us.

This was said on the motion of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), that the papers in the Manitoba matter should be laid on the Table, and the hon. leader of the Opposition then said, that each member of this House would be quite able to pass his judgment on the facts, as soon as the papers were laid on the Table. Now let us consider his sincerity again. Says the hon. gentleman:

I have only this remark to make to the hon. gentleman, that the longer this question is kept before the public the worse it is for the good of Canada. It is a question on which there should be an immediate and speedy answer.

Is that not worth while considering? What is he doing now? Moving the six months' hoist of this Bill to keep the question a year longer before the people of Canada, and to keep up the agitation among the different religious sections of the country. He then says, that it is a matter upon which an immediate and speedy answer should be given. Some time ago, the hon. gentleman did not urge a reference, as we all know very well. He pressed for an immediate answer from the Government on this Manitoba school question. Now, however, he moves the six months' hoist. Is he sincere in that? Are those his honest convictions, or does he do it for the purpose of defeating this Government? If those are his sincere convictions, then he has blown both ways, and I do not know in which course he really believes. Not long since, the leader of the Opposition made these remarks:

I say that the reference to the Supreme Court under such circumstances is most dangerous.

He was then speaking on a motion opposing the Government for having referred this question to the Supreme Court. He goes on:

Because if the Supreme Court should decide that the Government have the power to interfere with the legislature of Manitoba, and the Government should not obey the mandate which they themselves had sought, there would be a powerful and righteous agitation in some parts of the country against them.

Does this House take into consideration the meaning of these words? The hon. gentleman opposed a reference to the Supreme Court; he said it would put the Government of Canada in a dangerous position, because, if the judgment of the Supreme Court was against them, they were bound to carry out the mandate. Sir, the Government submitted the matter to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, judgment has been given, and this Government is prepared to carry out the mandate. The hon. gentleman did not expect when he made these remarks that this Government was prepared to carry out that particular mandate; he thought the Government would shirk it; and so he said the Government were putting themselves in a dangerous position, because, if the judgment of the high court was against them they would be bound to carry out the mandate. Sir, let me take him at his own words. He says they would be bound to carry out the mandate; why should he then oppose them to-day? Is he opposing them to-day because he honestly believes that they ought to be opposed? Or is he opposing them to-day, as I rather suspect, for political purposes? An hon. member opposite shakes his head. Probably he was in the little room with the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and they decided that this would be the way to catch the most Protestant votes from Ontario. If he was in that little room, and heard them decide that the leader of the Opposition should submit this resolution, and not the hon. member for North Simcoe, because it would catch more Protestant votes, let the responsibility be with him. It is not a pretty thing for a party who do not want to ride into power upon any religious questions, to submit a resolution to this House that draws the religious lines. Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite ought to be ashamed to support such a resolution. The Reform party do not believe in such a resolution. Hon.

gentlemen opposite do not believe in supporting the hon. member for North Simcoe any more than I do, but they submit this resolution because they think they can catch more votes. I think I have proved to every fair-minded member that this is not a question of separate schools. A man may be as much opposed to separate schools as I am, and still vote against the resolution of the leader of the Opposition. I ask this House to remember, besides, and in this I speak feelingly, that what is the case of the Catholic minority in Manitoba to-day, may be the case of the Protestant minority in Quebec to-morrow. I challenge any man in the House to say that I am wrong in making that statement. There is no doubt whatever that I am right in what I have said. If to-morrow legislation took place in the province of Quebec by which the Protestants were deprived of representation on the Educational Board, the hon. member for North Simcoe, I think, would be found rising in his place and insisting upon Protestant rights in the province of Quebec. I ask him, and I ask this House, to apply the same doctrine to the province of Manitoba that it is conceded in this House would be applied to the province of Quebec if any interference were made with the rights of the Protestants of that province. Sir, I also ask this House to remember that if there is one thing more than another that tends towards solidifying confederation, it is to give the provinces of this great confederation to understand that when the occasion presents itself to the Dominion Parliament, the rights of minorities will be respected, that the terms of the treaty under which they entered the union will be kept inviolate by the Parliament of Canada. If you want to disintegrate this great Dominion, then I say let the provinces know that you keep no faith with them. Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote, as surely my remarks have shown, against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition and in favour of the motion of the Secretary of State. I may err in voting that way, but, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that if I err in voting that way, I shall certainly err in favour of the constitution. If, Mr. Speaker, I err in voting so, I shall at least err in favour of the Protestant minority in Quebec as well as the Catholic minority in Manitoba; if I err in voting so, I shall at least err on the side of peace, and harmony, on the side of adjusting these religious questions; if I err in voting in the way I have indicated, I shall err on the side of that line of action which will bind together more firmly the several great provinces of this great British colony.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Moncrieff) has spoken in a spirit of reasonableness as regards his attitude towards the Roman Catholics, and I was very pleased to hear his remarks in that direction. But I have been informed that the hon. gentleman in a recent contest which took place in Ontario expressed views which scarcely coincide with those he has enunciated with so much vigour and eloquence to-day. I am informed that the hon. gentleman was a very active and strong supporter of Mr. Gurd, the P.P.A. candidate for the provincial assembly. I understand that among the planks of the P.P.A. organization is one that no Catholics shall be dealt with, that no Catholics shall be employed by a member of the association. I find it difficult indeed to reconcile the attitude which the hon. gentleman takes here to-day as a member of this House with his attitude in an election for the Ontario legislature and the candidature of the member of the order to which I have referred. I am told that the hon. gentleman was so anxious and desirous that the support given by him to Mr. Gurd should be known that he went to the ballot box and ostentatiously dropped his ballot marked for that candidate. We know that the local legislature contest in the county of Lambton from the P.P.A. standpoint was very bitter indeed, that all means possible were taken to incense the people against the Roman Catholics; that the supporters of Mr. Gurd, chief among whom was the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, brought into that country a woman named Margaret Sheppard, who maligned the Roman Catholic people and the Roman Catholic clergy, and who introduced into the contest there elements very widely different from the sentiments which the hon. gentleman has addressed to the House to-day. The remarks I am now making with respect to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff), I am sorry to say, apply to a number of other hon. members from the province of Ontario. When it was a question of opposition to Sir Oliver Mowat their attitude towards Roman Catholics was very different. Those very same men who find in every piece of legislation carried through the Ontario legislature by Sir Oliver Mowat some proposal to hand over the affairs of the province to the Pope, are to-day filled with pleasure and delight at the action of this Government in connection with the Remedial Bill. I think it is very evident and clear how that change of opinion has come about. In the one case the effect of the attacks was against Sir Oliver Mowat, the Liberal Premier of Ontario; in this case arguments of that kind are calculated to tell against the Government which hon. gentlemen support here. I am very sorry to notice this change of view as regards the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff), and I think it takes away very largely from the effect of the very fine sentiments he enunciated to-day. The hon. gentleman spent considerable time in dealing with the matter which was first brought into this debate by the Minister of Justice, and one as to which I crave the indulgence of the House while I offer a few remarks. The hon. gentleman elaborated time and again the position of the province of Quebec. It is urged that the change by which Protestants obtained representation in the Council of Public Instruction took place subsequent to 1867, that the only remedy the Protestants could have in case the provincial legislature of Quebec should repeal that law and refuse to Protestants representation on the Council of Public Instruction, would be an appeal under the appeal clauses which we are dealing with in considering this Bill now under discussion. I do not think it would be a matter of very great importance to the Protestants in Quebec if they were denied representation on the Council of Public Instruction. It is very proper they should have such representation, and it is very creditable to the Roman Catholic majority that they should freely have accorded this representation to Protestants, and allowed, freely and without compulsion, the Protestant board to decide all questions affecting Protestant or dissentient schools in that province. But for many years prior to 1869, the Protestants had no such right or privilege in that province, and yet they did not appear to suffer very largely on that account. The Minister of Justice attempted to convey the idea that the Council of Public Instruction in the province of Quebec had control over the text books, and if the Protestants were eliminated from the board the council might impose such text books on the dissentient schools as would be disagreeable to Protestants. I admit at once that if that were the fact it would be a matter of very considerable importance, but it is not the fact. The law with respect to the selection of school books is the same as it was prior to 1867. The law is exactly what it was in 1861, under which the Council of Public Instruction have no power to select text books which refer to questions of morals and religion. So far as other text books are concerned it is a matter of no importance. Protestants can learn arithmetic from the same book as Catholics, or vice versa; it is not as regards text books or arithmetic, geography, or grammar that any difficulty would arise. It could only be upon questions of morals or religion, and as to that, the provisions of the Quebec law are the same as they were in 1861. They provide that these text books are not selected by the Council of Public Instruction; nor are they selected by the school trustees of the districts. Section 65 of the Common Schools Act of the statutes of 1861, gives the duties of school commissioners, and as to the course of study, &c., subject to this proviso:

But the curé, priest, or officiating minister, shall have the exclusive right of selecting the books having reference to the religion or morals, for the use of the schools for children of his own religious tenets.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that applies just as well to Protestants as to Catholics, and, therefore we see, what this idea introduced by the Minister of Justice amounts to. It has been suggested to me by an hon. member, that this idea was repeated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who represents particularly in the House and in the Government—rather in the Government than in the House—the Protestants of Quebec. It was stated as an argument of great strength by him. But there is nothing whatever in it, because, as I say, while the Protestants perhaps would regret and feel injured, if their representatives on the Board of Education were done away with, yet, it would not be considered as an attack upon their religion, or as an attack upon them in any respect at all. If it were true, as suggested by the Minister of Justice, that by a change in the law of Quebec the text books affecting morals and religion for dissentient schools were to be selected by a Council of Public Instruction exclusively Catholic, then there would be an opportunity for great wrong, and a proper reason for protest.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was alluding to the point raised by the hon. Minister of Justice, and repeated with considerable emphasis by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is the Protestant representative of Quebec in the Government. The point they made was: that there have been changes in the law of the province of Quebec since confederation, which, if repealed by the legislature, would place the Protestants there in an anomalous position, and one which they could only obtain a remedy for under the clause which we are discussing in connection with this Bill. I was able to show that the law in the province of Quebec—which was important to the Protestants with regard to the choosing of text-books and with regard to morals and religion—was the same prior to confederation as it has been since. That being so, under the British North America Act, any attempt to change that law would be ultra vires of the legislature of Quebec, and would have no effect at all; because the Protestant minority of the province of Quebec are entitled under the British North America Act not only to all the rights and privileges enjoyed by the Catholic minority in the province of Ontario, but also to all the rights and privileges the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec enjoyed at the time of the union. So, any point that is attempted to be made for the Government based on this aspect of the affair falls to the ground; and we come to find that the only change of importance to Protestants in Quebec that was made since confederation, was a change by which, under the law, they are entitled to a certain number of members on the Board of Public Instruction. As I said before, a repeal of that law would not be pleasant or palatable to the Protestants there; but still it would not be such an infringement of their rights as to create any trouble or difficulty; and therefore it is a matter of very little moment, so far as this Bill is concerned.

One other matter with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for East Lambton. He made use of an argument which I have heard used upon the stump, in connection with this question, but which I have not heard in the House, and had not expected to hear in the House from any lawyer of standing. It was not put forward by the hon. Minister of Justice on behalf of the Government, and it requires only a moment's consideration to show its absurdity. The hon. gentleman read from the formal part of the Order in Council adopted by the Imperial Privy Council on the report of the Judicial Committee. It is as follows:—

Her Majesty having taken the said report into consideration, was pleased, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, to approve thereof and to order, as it is hereby ordered, that the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually observed, obeyed and carried into effect in each and every particular. Whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being, and all other persons whom it may concern are to take notice and to govern themselves according.

The hon. member for East Lambton interpreted that to mean that we were bound to do what the Government proposed to do by means of this Bill. In the speeches on the stump to which I referred, gentlemen representing the Government, reading these words, have alleged that it would be high treason to Her Majesty on the part of the Government here to refuse remedial legislation to Manitoba in pursuance of these words. Now, Sir, every lawyer knows that these words are contained in every Order in Council that is passed on the recommendation of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—that they are purely formal, and have no reference particularly to this question. And if it were necessary to allude further to an argument of that kind, it merely drives us back to the question what the Privy Council decided in their judgment contained in the Order in Council; and, so far as these words are concerned, they throw no light upon the question one way or the other. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Secretary of State, in moving the second reading of this Bill, dwelt at considerable length upon the negotiations which finally resulted in the confederation of the first four provinces of Canada. As I understood him, he urged as an argument why this Bill should be passed, that difficulties and troubles existed at the time of the union and long prior thereto with regard to the question of separate schools in the province of Ontario, and the question of dissentient schools in the province of Quebec. As the founders of confederation were able to adopt certain provisions contained in section 93 of the British North America Act for the purpose of finally settling those disputes, he held that to be a reason why this coercion Bill should be passed. Now, in the first place it is evident that the negotiations and the legislation resulting therefrom had no reference whatever to any other province than the four provinces in question. The constitution of Manitoba was established long after that time, and the section as to education in pursuance of any provisions of the British North America Act. If it were intended, at the time that settlement took place, that in the new provinces of Canada as well as in the old provinces, this agreement as to separate schools for Catholic minorities, and as to dissentient schools for Protestant minorities, should apply, we would have found a provision in the British North America Act that in establishing a constitution for a newly-created province thereafter, the same provisions should be inserted. But nothing of that kind was found in the Act, and the provisions made with regard to the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are quite different from the provisions made with regard to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Although the words are the same in the first subsection of the clause giving to any class of persons the rights and privileges they enjoyed at the time of the union, it is well known that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick enjoyed by law no rights and no privileges, and therefore those two provinces are confined to that section providing that if, after confederation, any rights and privileges should be conferred by legislation, there should be an appeal to the Government here. So each province was dealt with according to its own circumstances, and nothing whatever was said with regard to new provinces that might afterwards be brought into the union, as Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and Manitoba have been. Therefore, I fail to see what possible reason can be derived from the negotiations which then took place, or from the parliamentary settlement that was made in pursuance of those negotiations with regard to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, why this particular Bill should be passed.

The hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), all through his speech, seemed to put the question upon the basis, that there had been in Manitoba an enjoyment, prior to the union, of a right or privilege by the Roman Catholic minority which the legislature of Manitoba afterwards interfered with. He repeated that statement, time and again, in that speech. It is scarcely necessary, it seems to me to point out to this House, every member of which has very fully, for the past five or six years, studied and discussed this question, that in no way is that the question involved, because it has been determined by the Privy Council, in the case of Barrett vs. Winnipeg, that the statute of 1890 in no way affects injuriously any right or privilege which the Roman Catholics enjoyed at the time of the union, and the right which the Privy Council, in its second judgment, has determined to belong to the minority in Manitoba, is a right claimed to have arisen owing to the passage of the School Act of 1871. That is the question we have to deal with. And the question, it seems to me, which should divide those who are for and those who are against remedial legislation, is: Had the statute of 1871 the effect of giving to the Roman Catholics in Manitoba the right never to have that statute changed? And does the fact, that the statute of 1890 repeals the statute of 1871, and thus takes away the privileges conferred upon the Roman Catholic minority by that statute, demand, in itself, from the Government, in the first place, by its remedial Order in Council, and from Parliament, in the second place, by its Remedial Bill, ipso facto, without anything further, the interference of the Government and the House? It is contended, on the part of the Government, that the mere fact, that this statute of 1871 gives separate schools to Manitoba, and that the statute of 1890 takes away those separate schools, compels the House of Commons, no matter what the views of its members may be, to pass a Remedial Bill, restoring those separate schools. Now, I take issue with that. The opponents of remedial legislation contend, that that is not a constitutional interpretation of our fundamental law there; they contend, that that is not the decision of the Privy Council in the second case, but that, on the contrary, what the Privy Council decided was, that the statute of 1890 having taken away from the minority certain rights and privileges conferred upon them by the statute of 1871, a case arises under the 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, which gives jurisdiction to the Governor General in Council to hear and determine the appeal of the Roman Catholic minority, but, just as the Privy Council in its judgment expresses it, it is for the authorities—that is, the Governor General in Council here—to determine what relief shall be given, and the nature of the relief. It must be either one way or the other. Either we are bound, without any option, without any opportunity of discussion, as a mere machine, to restore everything that was taken away, or there is the right of inquiry, and there is the responsibility of the Government, in the first place, and Parliament afterwards, of determining just how far it is fair and right to the majority and the minority in Manitoba to interfere with local legislation, which does take away any of these rights and privileges thus conferred. And it is our contention, that the very first thing necessary, under the circumstances, is for the Governor General in Council here to thoroughly understand all the circumstances, to take up the law as it was in 1871, and as it was amended from time to time up to 1890, to consider the rights and privileges conferred upon the minority by those laws, to learn on what pretext the legislature of Manitoba in 1890 took away some of those rights and privileges, and whether the taking away of those rights and privileges was an unfair oppression of the minority, or a legitimate exercise of the provincial jurisdiction in the matter of education. That is our contention, and that is a very different matter, indeed, from the suggestion put forward by the Secretary of State, that, in doing this, the Government was merely carrying out the constitution. I contend, that they are not carrying out the constitution. I contend, that they are attempting to place an interpretation upon the Manitoba Act, and that they are seeking to evade their responsibility in the premises. They certainly have never heard the case of Manitoba. They have only heard the case of the minority. Upon the strength of that case, they have, by a remedial order, conceded to the minority the whole of their claim. They have passed a remedial order, the effect of which, if it had been carried out by the legislature of Manitoba, would have been to restore exactly the state of things that existed in 1890, prior to the passing of the School Act of that year. That is the only way in which the legislature of Manitoba could have obeyed the remedial order. Then, up to that point the Government acted in accordance with their own theory. They passed the remedial order, which correctly carries out that interpretation of the constitution; but they stopped short when they came into this House, and presented a Bill, not in the terms of the remedial order, but another kind of a Bill. It has been said, on their part, by speakers outside of this House, and probably inside this House, that the Government would never restore to Manitoba the inefficient schools which were proved to have been in existence there under the legislation prior to 1890. On what principle do they refuse to restore these inefficient schools? According to their own argument, they must do it. According to their interpretation of the constitution, we have no discretion, we have no right to inquire whether it is well for the minority that these schools should be restored, or not, any more than we are entitled to inquire whether it is fair that the majority should have done as they have done. If the mechanical theory is the correct one, then it is useless for them to say that by their remedial legislation they will make the schools efficient, for that is not the complaint here. The complaint is that the statute of 1871, having conferred a right or privilege—no matter how extreme, no matter if it had gone ten times as far as it actually did go—it is binding for all time, and that if the local legislature of Manitoba repeals that Act, or interferes with it, we are bound, under the interpretation put forward by the Government, to give back to them what was taken away, whether we think it is right or not, whether we think it is fair or not. But, Mr. Speaker, that contention they have entirely failed to carry out. And why? Why has the Bill, as presented here, failed to follow the terms of the remedial order? Because, in spite of the Government's decision to close their ears, in spite of their decision to act without any investigation into the conditions in Manitoba, facts have come to their knowledge since the passing of the remedial order which have shown them that these schools were inefficient, that there were many reasons why the legislature of Manitoba were quite justified in dealing with the state of things as it existed in Manitoba prior to 1890. And they admit that by saying that they will not, in their Bill, give to the minority the relief that the remedial order gives, but they will temper that by making, of their own accord, provisions which did not exist in the old law, and which they propose to put in now, for the purpose of making these schools efficient. Surely they must be wrong, either in one instance or in the other. If we are a mere machine in this matter, if we have no discretion, then the only thing that we can do is to pass the Remedial Bill in the terms of the remedial order, giving back to the minority in Manitoba whatever they had before, without any attempt to inquire whether what they had before was right or wrong, fair or unfair. If, on the other hand, we have the right to do as the Government have done in presenting their Bill, if we have the right to take into consideration the circumstances, to look at the law that was passed, and make up our minds upon our responsibility as legislators, how far we will restore these schools, how far we will impose conditions upon the restored schools, with the view of making them more effective in the interest of the minority, for whose benefit they were established, if that is our duty in making a Remedial Bill, surely it follows that that was the course that the Government should have taken in connection with the remedial order. And I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is where the whole difficulty in this question has arisen, as I shall show when I come to deal with the suggestions which have been made, and are being made, day after day, pointing to a compromise or settlement of this question through the Manitoba government.

Now, the Minister of Justice recognized the fact that there had been throughout Canada a great deal of very unfavourable, very hostile criticism of the remedial order; and he endeavoured to show that on the 21st March, 1895, when it was passed there was really no course open to the Government but to pass the remedial order in the terms in which it is couched. Let me examine for a few moments the reasons given by the hon. Minister in support of this contention. In the first place, he said, it was well known that Manitoba intended to do nothing in the premises, and, as a proof of that very broad and, I must say, very untrue statement, he instances the fact that in 1894 a communication was sent from the Government here calling the attention of Manitoba, and also of the North-west Territories to the unfair position of their school legislation, as affecting Roman Catholics, and that, in answer, the government of Manitoba sent a communication stating that they were satisfied with their school legislation, and did not intend to depart from it. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it cannot be argued that that was any indication of the position that Manitoba would take in view of the present position of the question. For that correspondence took place before the decision of the Privy Council was known, and the decision of the Privy Council entirely altered the position of Manitoba. The government of Manitoba have never said that they intended to defy the constitution; they have always admitted that they were bound by the constitution. But in 1894 there was no decision which made it clear to them. Therefore, anything they may have said or done prior to that decision is no indication what their position would be after they had the decision of the highest tribunal in the land pointing out to them the position in which the province was placed, and showing them that in case they refused to redress these grievances the Government here and this Parliament had the power to take the subject of education out of their hands, and legislate for them. The next thing that the hon. Minister of Justice cites as an indication of the position of Manitoba is the speech from the Throne, in 1895, and this, I may say, is the only indication whatever that Manitoba had given, up to the time of the passing of the remedial order, of what their position would be. I will read it, and I ask the House to consider whether what is said in the Speech from the Throne in Manitoba, in 1895, is couched in such language as to induce the Government here to believe that there was no use in attempting to negotiate with Manitoba upon this question. These are the words:

It is not the intention of my Government in any way to recede from its determination to uphold the present public school system which, if left to its own operation, would in all probability soon become universal throughout the province.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, that is a very moderate assertion of the right, of the intention, of the province to stand by its legislation. There is no suggestion there that they do not propose to be bound by the constitution; there is no suggestion there that they are not prepared to receive communications, to enter into negotiations with this Government with regard to that matter. Yet that is really the only evidence that is put forward by the Government as to any indication of its attitude given by the legislature of Manitoba prior to the 21st March, 1895, when they, without any inquiry, on the shortest possible notice to Manitoba, without any endeavour to investigate the facts, passed the remedial order, which, Mr. Speaker, I say is an order calling upon Manitoba to restore the old law just as it was, with inefficient schools and everything else, no matter what might be contained in those statutes that were in force prior to 1890—all had to be restored. Now, let me read the material part of the remedial order in proof of what I have to say. After reciting all the facts, the remedial order, the kernel of it, is this :

The rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province in relation to education prior to the 1st day of May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following rights and privileges, which, previous to and until the 1st day of May, 1890, such minority had, viz. :—

(a.) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes, which were repealed by the Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

(b.) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

(c.) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payments or contributions to the support of any other schools.

Those were the three things which the Roman Catholic minority were deprived of by these Acts, and the remedial order goes on to say :

And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid, shall be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid.

Not any modification, not any change, but restore those rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid.

And which will modify the said Acts of 1890, so far and so far only as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, could words be clearer? Is it possible to state in more definite language, that what they are called upon to do is to restore those statutes in so far as they affected the Roman Catholic minority, exactly as they were, without any regard to whether there was anything in them providing for efficiency, without any regard to any matters of detail, without any other consideration at all, except the one fact, that they should have those schools as they were before, that they could not be taken away from them, and, if they were taken away from them, or if there was an attempt to take them away, by the local legislature, then this Government and this Parliament intervened to restore them, not because they were right, not because they were fair, but because the constitution compelled us to give them back those schools exactly as they were. Now, the Minister of Justice said that the remedial order did not say that. He said it pointed out, by recital, the judgment of the Privy Council. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice: If you are reading a document, or a deed, do you look for the recitals for what the deed is to pass? Do you look at the recitals, or do you look at the operative part? I say, that you have got to look at what they are ordered to do. The remedial order orders them to do something. It recites the facts and the circumstances which have led up to the passing of the order. The Minister of Justice says it recited the judgment of the Privy Council, and the remarks of these judges that it would not be necessary to repeal the Acts of 1890. Well, I suppose, no one has contended that: it has never been contended by any one, that it would be necessary absolutely to repeal the Acts of 1890, because it is admitted, on all hands, that it had the right to change, as we did change, the constitution of the Protestant board. But what the remedial order does, is to say, that you must change the Act of 1890 so as to give these three things to the Roman Catholics; there is no qualification, there is no suggestion whatever in the remedial order itself, that anything less than a complete compliance with it would be an answer to it, and it was so interpreted by the people of Manitoba. When it was laid before the legislature, the legislature took the ground that they could not obey it, and they refused to do so. I shall allude later on to suggestions made by the legislature in making that refusal. But what I am trying to emphasize now is, that the Government had precluded themselves and had precluded the government of Manitoba, from entering into any negotiations, from proposing or suggesting any compromise, from doing anything at all, except what they did, that is, in a dignified manner to refuse to obey the remedial order. I say, that, so far as that aspect of the case is concerned, the whole difficulty in which the Government finds itself to-day, and in which this Parliament finds itself to-day, has arisen from the fact, that the Government have passed this exceedingly drastic, this exceedingly far-reaching Order in Council, without, as I say, attempting to exercise any discretion in the matter, pretending that they were a mere machine; and now, when they find that they are not able to propose to this House a Bill in the terms of the remedial order, they begin to think of negotiations. They began to think of compromise. The time for negotiation, the time for compromise, the time for consideration, the time for inquiry and for investigation, was before judgment, and not after judgment. These hon. gentlemen, acting in a judicial capacity, have given judgment. They are about to proceed with execution, and they hesitate in executing their own judgment, and send Sir Donald Smith to Winnipeg to see if there is not some possibility of the government of Manitoba doing something, anything to get them out of this hole, even if it was only to throw out a suggestion. I believe at the present moment they are on their knees to Mr. Greenway, imploring him to come to Ottawa in order that they may say that he is coming here for the purpose of settling the difficulty. Settling what difficulty? Getting the Government out of the trouble in which they have placed themselves by passing this most unfortunate remedial order. It may be that Mr. Greenway will come here. I can scarcely see how he can avoid it, on the principle he has laid down, because he has said, time and again: We admit the constitution, we do not dispute the decision of the Privy Council; we desire to control our educational affairs; we admit you have jurisdiction to take them out of our hands; we are prepared to do justice in the premises, to give every facility for investigation, and if, after investigation, a case is made against us, we are prepared to make matters right ourselves. We do not desire coercion; we do not desire to be interfered with. But I can say this, that if Mr. Greenway does come here, that will be no sign and no indication that there is any hope whatever that the government of Manitoba will do anything in the premises. They cannot do it. The Government here have rendered it impossible for them to do it. Every attempt has been made. His Excellency sent for Mr. Greenway and Mr. Sifton. They came here. They met His Excellency, and they discussed the question with him. Nothing came of it. Sir Donald Smith went to Winnipeg. He met Mr. Greenway and Mr. Sifton. They discussed the question together, and nothing came of it. Nothing will come of any negotiations or any attempt at compromise or settlement of this question, unless one thing is done, and the Government were early in the day informed of that. If they are prepared to retrace the false step, if they are prepared to repeal the remedial order, and place the matter back where it was when they made that fatal blunder, the door of negotiation, the door of compromise will be opened, and they may have some chance of obtaining what all hon. members in this House, on both sides, would deem to be the most fortunate result that could occur under the circumstances, a settlement of this case by Manitoba herself, and one satisfactory to the minority. The Minister of Justice, it is true, in referring to the communications which passed in 1894, and the Speech from the Throne in 1895, threw out the suggestion that something had happened since the passing of the remedial order as a justification of his position. He stated that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) had stated, in July last, in this House that Manitoba could not recede from her position. Surely nothing that occurred after the passing of the remedial order could be any justification for the passing of that order; and I can say this, that what the hon. member for North Simcoe meant by saying that Manitoba could not recede from its position was, as I have been endeavouring to explain, that the people of Manitoba considered the remedial order a most harsh judgment given against them in their absence, without any opportunity, on their part, to meet the case made against them, and they believed they were justified in the interest of the province in answering that remedial order by a dignified refusal to obey it. The legislature of Manitoba had, I believe, the approval of nineteen-twentieths of the people of that province in their answer to that order, and surely, under those circumstances, hon. members could not expect the government to recede from their position; they could not do it if they desired, for they would lose the public confidence which they now enjoy to so large an extent if they receded one iota from the position they took in June in answer to that order. But that is all they have done. They have never said they would refuse to do justice in the premises. They have only said they would not obey the remedial order. I therefore say that until and unless the remedial order is rescinded, and the question put back where it was on 21st March, there can be no hope of any settlement or any compromise.

There is an incidental feature of this case to which, at this stage, I may refer, and that is the appearance in the printed documents that have been laid before this House of a number of affidavits which were presented to the Governor General in Council by Mr. Ewart on behalf of the minority, but which were withdrawn. The hon. member for Pictou, the ex-Minister of Justice, boldly justified the course of the Government in printing those affidavits. But I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in 1895 the Government were challenged with the impropriety of printing affidavits which were withdrawn or not allowed to be entered, affidavits on which the remedial order was not based, because the remedial order could not be based on material which was not before the courts, and which was put on one side. What would hon. members think if the Court of Queen's Bench in Manitoba heard a case, and during the case certain affidavit evidence was presented by the plaintiff, and for one reason or another, was withdrawn, and not entered, and not considered by the court in its judgment, yet, on certifying a case, as the court is bound to do, for appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, the court should include in that case for appeal the affidavits that had been withdrawn. Why, it would be considered an outrage in that case, and it is all the more an outrage on the part of the Government, because if a court is bound to be fair, how much more is the Governor General in Council, the representative of the Queen, bound to be fair in a matter of this kind. And so the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) considered it at that time. Last session the matter came up on the motion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and Mr. Dickey with regard to that matter spoke as follows:—

Mr. DICKEY. I desire to make a personal explanation, not to offer any remarks on the subject before the House. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) referred to the publishing of some affidavits which were put in evidence at the hearing before the Privy Council of Canada, and subsequently withdrawn as the case proceeded. The hon. gentleman seemed to feel that that was a great injustice, not only to himself but to others, and the present Government as an organization has quite enough faults to answer for without answering for my personal faults, and I therefore desire to take the personal responsibility of publishing those affidavits. They were put in and read, and subsequently, as the proceedings show, were withdrawn. Mr. Ewart claimed they should be printed, and there was no contest over it, in fact, the question was never raised. I was then Secretary of State, and the Printing Bureau sent and asked me whether they were to be printed, the message being received by me just as I was going into the room on the second or third morning, and without consulting my colleagues and without giving the matter serious attention, I said, "Certainly, they are part of the proceedings, print them, and print that they were withdrawn." I may have been entirely wrong, perhaps I was; I must say, on considering the matter when the printed book was placed in my hands, I thought I had made a mistake. What I want to say is that any observation founded on want of good faith or on the idea that there was any intention on the part of the Government in so acting is entirely mistaken. We are still subject, and I personally and particularly am subject to any remarks as to any practical injustice that has been done, but I do not want the House to suppose that there was any intention in placing the affidavits there, of taking any unfair advantage, and that there was anything more than a mistake made. The mistake occurred inadvertently, and the hon. members may refer to it as they think proper, but they should consider it not an intentional and wrong act.

Mr. MARTIN.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that is a most manly, honourable, and straightforward explanation, and it was so accepted by the House. But what do we find this session? We find the hon. the ex-Minister of Justice coming forward boldly, and claiming it was right, claiming there was nothing wrong about it, that it was done deliberately and intentionally, and that it was justifiable. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is an outrage. I say that no greater wrong could be done than to publish evidence withdrawn by the plaintiff, and never allowed to be answered. It is sometimes suggested; but why do you not answer these affidavits now. Why, that is worse than what I was talking about; it is settling the case after judgment. They want us to give our evidence after judgment has been rendered against us. What is the object of that? I suppose if we answered these affidavits now, there would be counter affidavits in reply, and the matter might go on for some time. But I say this, Mr. Speaker: There is an answer to these affidavits. I can say further, that these affidavits are not true so far as they refer to actions of mine. I do not propose to discuss them here, or to consider them at all in connection with this case. They were not made a part of the case. I never knew of them until after judgment was given. It is so manifestly unfair, and against the ideas of justice, that these affidavits should be published, that one would have thought that no government would do it, no matter how depraved, no matter how lost to all idea of fair-play and decency, as this Government in many cases has shown itself to be. Surely one would think they would have enough manliness, and enough decency, and enough fairness, not to attempt to prejudice the people of Canada, by sending broadcast, with the official stamp, documents that are no documents at all, affidavits that are not affidavits in this case, and which were withdrawn and never considered. Yet, with a view of attempting to influence the people of Canada, this Government have descended to this petty means. What do you think of a government capable of that? Were it not that this is in entire accordance with their conduct in many instances, my surprise would be greater than it really is.

Mr. AMYOT. Are you talking about St. François Xavier now?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, with regard to St. François Xavier. What does the hon. member (Mr. Amyot) think with regard to that?

Mr. AMYOT. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to tell him, I will tell him.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. AMYOT. I think it was a most extraordinary way of imposing upon the people by false promises. False promises were made, while it seems it was the intention of the candidate, and of the Government at the time to deceive the people.

Mr. MARTIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, there we have an example of what we are complaining of. Even a member of this House has allowed his judgment to be influenced by these affidavits. Even a lawyer, and a Queen's Counsel I am told—

Mr. AMYOT. Yes, and able to read.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think that the title of Q.C. adds any very great lustre to the hon. gentleman's position.

Mr. AMYOT. I do not agree with the opinion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) is not one.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think that title adds any very great lustre to the hon. gentleman's position, considering that every fifth-class lawyer in the country is a Queen's Counsel.

Mr. DALY. Except yourself.

Mr. MARTIN. If he is a Tory.

Mr. DALY. I suppose you include the Attorney General of Manitoba.

Mr. MARTIN. But, he is not a Tory. A distinguished Queen's Counsel said to me the other day in Winnipeg, that he wished he could get rid of his right to be a Queen's Counsel, because, he said, nowadays it is a greater distinction not to be a Queen's Counsel than to be one. Why, my opponent in the city of Winnipeg, a very respectable lawyer but a gentleman who hardly ever appears in court, when he was defeated, he was made a Queen's Counsel.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He was not paid any money.

Mr. MARTIN. No. Here we have the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), a lawyer, a Queen's Counsel, and a member of this House, actually telling me what he thinks of what occurred in Manitoba, based on statements contained in these affidavits. If the hon. gentleman were a judge would he express the slightest opinion upon a case, either of the defendant or the plaintiff, based upon affidavits which the other side had not had an opportunity of answering?

Mr. AMYOT. I do not speak of these affidavits. I speak of the facts of the case as they appeared at St. François Xavier. It was promised there, that if the Greenway candidate was elected, and if the government of Mr. Greenway succeeded, that never would the Catholic schools be touched, that never would the French language be interfered with, and that the territorial divisions would not be changed. But immediately after, when on account of these solemn promises the Greenway candidate was elected; the first opportunity was taken by that government, to deprive the French of their schools, of their language, and of their territorial divisions. The hon. member (Mr. Martin) has had eight years to contradict that, and he never could contradict it, and he never will be able to contradict it.

Mr. MARTIN. These are the very affidavits I have referred to. The hon. gentleman will find them on page 129 of the papers in reference to the Manitoba school case, presented to Parliament during the session of 1895. The first one he will find is an affidavit of James Fisher, of the city of Winnipeg, barrister-at-law—a long affidavit, referring to these very suggestions which the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has taken as true.

Mr. AMYOT. It is not from that book I take them at all.

Mr. MARTIN. Where did you get them?

Mr. AMYOT. We got them from Manitoba years and years ago. They were given to the public, and they are well known, and the hon. gentleman is not able to deny their truthfulness.

Mr. MARTIN. I say, I am able to deny the truthfulness of the statements made in those affidavits; but I never had an opportunity of doing so, because they were withdrawn. The gentleman who presented them, Mr. Ewart, dared not allow an answer to them; and, rather than submit them to be answered by those affected, he preferred to withdraw them, and did withdraw them. But, in spite of that, we have them printed at length in this official book, bearing the Government stamp, and sent broadcast throughout the land to influence the electors on this question; and, if they have influenced, as they appear to have done, the learned Queen's Counsel, the hon. member for Bellechasse, who knows something about the circumstances, and must have known that they were withdrawn, how much greater must be their influence, and how much more unfair their operation, upon the great body of the electors, who cannot be supposed to know all these circumstances to which I have alluded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words with regard to my own connection with the legislation which is before us for consideration. As there has been an endeavour throughout Canada, by the use of certain statements made by me, to discredit through me the 1890 Act of Manitoba, I desire to explain just what I did. I have nothing to withdraw. I stand by every word that I have said on this question. But I protest against the unfair manner in which advocates of the Government have misrepresented my attitude with regard to this question. Last year, on the 25th June, while the House was in session, having observed in one of the papers here, that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) had stated in an interview, that, if the Roman Catholics were allowed to have religious exercises in their schools in Manitoba, they would be perfectly prepared to accept the 1890 Act as it was. I wrote the following letter to the "Citizen" newspaper of this city:—

Editor Citizen,—I notice in your issue of today's an interview with the Hon. Mr. Ouimet, from which the following is an extract:—

However, it would be idle to discuss that now as no legislation has been asked by the Catholics of Manitoba giving them the right to share in the funds provided for education by the Government or by the local authorities if their schools are not up in secular teaching, to the public schools of the province. All that they ask is to be at liberty to add to the secular education required in the public schools such religious teaching as will meet their religious views. I may say that if that had been provided for in the legislation of 1890, we would never have heard of the Manitoba schools question.

There has been all along a very serious misunderstanding between the Roman Catholic church and the people of Manitoba, if the above is an accurate statement of the position of the church. I suppose, however, that we must take for granted that Col. Ouimet is in a position to formulate the wishes of the Roman Catholics in connection with this question. If so, then I may say at once that there is no need of any remedial legislation in order to bring about such a state of affairs. I believe the people of Manitoba would be willing to give the Roman Catholics all that is asked for.

Everybody wishes that a solution of the question may be found without any coercion on the part of the Dominion Parliament, and if the demands of the minority are correctly expressed by the Minister, I am very much at sea in my acquaintance with the views of the Manitoba people, if they will not bring about of their own accord all that is asked.

When I introduced the School Bill of 1890, I pointed out that in so far as it provided for religious exercises in the schools, it was in my opinion defective. I am one of those who deny the right of the state to interfere in any way with matters of religion. I said then, and I still think that the clause of the 1890 Act, which provides for certain religious exercises, is most unjust to Roman Catholics. If the state is to recognize religion in its school legislation, such a recognition as is acceptable to Protestants only, and in fact only to a majority, of Protestants, is, to my mind, rank tyranny. The desire of those with whom I think in this matter is to eliminate every question of a religious nature from the school laws and to make the school laws purely secular. This has not been done in Manitoba, and that course is apparently not supported by a majority of the people there. That being so, surely it will be admitted that the nature of the religious exercises or religious teaching (I am unable to make any clear distinction between the two) should be such as is agreeable to the consciences of those whose money is taken to support the schools. I have sufficient faith in the liberality of the Manitoba people to declare on their behalf that if a final settlement of this question can be reached upon the lines suggested by Col. Ouimet, they will do their part. What Manitoba has insisted upon is that the Roman Catholics shall not have a system of separate schools such as existed prior to 1890, which were exempt from the general laws as to efficiency. If the Roman Catholics are willing to accept the schools as they exist at present and as they may from time to time be modified with the addition of such religious teaching as they may desire, then there should be and I am sure would be no difficulty in reaching a settlement of the whole question without any legislation on the part of the Dominion Parliament.

Yours truly,

JOSEPH MARTIN.

Ottawa, June 25th, 1895.

Now, Sir, I still adhere to every word in that letter; and I again make the statement, that, if this is the only objection that the Roman Catholics have to our legislation in Manitoba—that there are religious exercises there which are not acceptable to them, though acceptable to Protestants—the people of Manitoba, in order to settle this question, would be willing to remove from their schools all religious exercises. If that were not done and it were insisted upon by Protestants that the religious exercises which are acceptable to them should remain there, the people of Manitoba would be prepared to give those schools in Catholic districts the same right to have religious exercises suitable to them. I have no doubt of that. And if it were not so, if the people of Manitoba were prepared to consider the conscience of Protestants and not the conscience of Catholics, they would be guilty of the rankest tyranny; and knowing the people of Manitoba as I know them, I am satisfied that they would not rest under any such imputation. I am opposed myself to any religious exercises in the schools, simply for the reason that I consider that we have no right to deal with the question of religion in the legislature. I believe it is one of the subjects that, under the British North America Act, belongs neither to the Dominion Parliament nor the local legislatures—the determining of what religion a citizen of Canada shall profess or be taught. That, it seems to me, is something, under our constitution, over which none of our legislatures have control or should have control, and I say that any attempt to deal with the question of religion in a community who are not all of the same religion, is wrong. I say further, in support of the stand I take, that the schools should be secular, and that, so far as the religious exercises provided for by law in Manitoba are concerned, they are of no importance whatever. They are merely formal, and I may say that one of the leading divines of the Presbyterian Church in Manitoba, when I put the question to him: Do you consider that the reading of those passages of Scripture and the prayers provided have any effect at all upon the religious education of the children in the schools, he admitted to me that they had not, that the matter was one purely of sentiment, and that the reason he desired those religious exercises was in order that the people might not be able to say that we had godless schools. Now, surely there is nothing in that. If religious exercises are of such purely formal character as to have no effect upon the character or the religious education of the children, then surely we can well afford, rather than have any citizen of that country feel that he is imposed upon in his conscientious belief, to do away with that small modicum of religious exercises. That is the stand I take; and I must say this, that the wrong is about as small as can be under the circumstances, because, in the first place, the question of having religious exercises is entirely within the control of the trustees in each district. If the trustees are, as they may be under the Act, all Catholics, or a majority Catholic, they can refuse to have these religious exercises. If they are Protestants who think like me, who are opposed to religious exercises on the ground that I take, they can refuse to have them; and I must say that I believe in the majority of school districts in Manitoba they do not have them. I believe, in actual practice, most of the schools in Manitoba are godless schools in the sense in which I refer to them. Therefore, I say it was a great mistake that when we were making this Act of 1890, we did not eliminate from it all suggestions of any attempt to influence the children one way or the other, in a religious sense. Because the moment you go beyond the purely formal exercises in the schools, you get at once into trouble. The moment you attempt to inculcate religious dogma in a mixed community, the question is, what dogma? Even amongst Protestants, supposing there are no Catholics, the question would be whether you would inculcate Christianity, as understood by the Presbyterians or by the Episcopalians. If you are going to have religion as one of the subjects to be taught in the schools, it follows that the teacher must be competent to give religious instruction. Therefore, he must be examined upon religion. What is to be the test? Is he to answer questions according to the Episcopalian, the Baptist, the Methodist or the Presbyterian view?

Mr. DAVIN. I want just for my own information and the information of the House, to ask my hon. friend, who was Minister in Manitoba at the time, I believe, whether one set of districts and one set of inspectors and one set of trustees were all abolished, and one set retained—whether the Protestant set was retained and the Roman Catholic abolished?

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman's question has no bearing on the point I am now treating. I have no objection to refer to that when I come to it, and I will give the hon. gentleman full explanation of what was done in that matter; but surely the very question that is put by the hon. member, representing a constituency contiguous to Manitoba, shows that before dealing with this subject, the Government ought to have inquired as to these very matters concerning which the hon. gentleman is seeking information. What better evidence can we have that they do not know anything about that, that they do not know what was done, that they do not know how the Act of 1890 was an interference, or how the Acts prior to 1890 were interferences, and what was the effect of them—whether the schools were good schools or bad schools? All these questions all this desire which this House has shown from the very commencement of this debate, a most laudable desire, to learn something about it, is the strongest kind of argument against the autocratic action of the Government in deciding the whole question in the entire absence of any knowledge whatever on the subject. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) refers to a matter which is being put forward as an objection to the 1890 Act. It may be that it is an objection, it may be that perhaps there might have been some unfairness in that respect, but I do not think so. The 1890 Act abolished all the old laws and started out with a new system entirely. It interfered as fully and as completely with the Protestant schools as it did with the Roman Catholic schools. There were two Boards of Education. One was composed exclusively of Catholics and had entire control of matters in Catholic schools, and the other was composed entirely of Protestants and had entire control in Protestant schools. The government, of which I was a member, being a Liberal government, being imbued with the idea that the government should bear full responsibility for the expenditure of all money entrusted to them for the carrying out of the laws, in 1890, came to the conclusion that that system was not right, regarding it from that standpoint. They held that the government had no right to hand over to a board of Catholics or a board of Protestants a large amount of government money, and allow that board to spend the money and regulate these schools, and thus relieve themselves from all responsibility as to the manner in which those schools were carried on. They believed that it was the duty of the government to see to the execution of the school laws. For that reason they abolished both boards. The point that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) more particularly alluded to, as I understand it, was with regard to school trustees. Now, there was, in most cases, no difficulty. In most cases throughout the province the Catholic school districts were quite separate and apart from the Protestant districts, and the law was the same in both cases. The old district was declared to be a new district under the new law, and the old trustees—in the case of a Catholic district, the Catholic trustees, and in the case of a Protestant district, the Protestant trustees—were continued in office until the next election. When the next election came round, every person who owned land in the school district, whether he was a Protestant or a Roman Catholic, was a ratepayer under the law, and was entitled to vote in the election for trustees. There were, however, one or two cases in the province where the school districts were co-terminus, the Protestant and Catholic districts covering the same territory. Some special provision had to be made for these cases. I do not think that this occurred in any other place than the city of Winnipeg. The statute provided that in such cases the Protestant board should be the school board under the statute until the next election. Now, it may be that there was some slight unfairness in that. But, in discussing that provision, I stated to the House that if the Roman Catholic members of the House thought that it was not fair, the government were prepared to change it in any direction they suggested. It was a matter of very small importance. This was in the month of May, and in December the annual school trustee elections came on, and it was a mere question whether we should order a special election in Winnipeg in May to choose trustees for the unexpired portion of the year, or continue the Catholic or the Protestant board in control of school matters until the regular time for the election. Strictly speaking, it was not exactly fair to continue the Protestant board in operation even for that short time. But, as I have stated, I offered to make any change that the Roman Catholic members of the legislature might suggest. They declined to make any suggestions, taking the ground, which, I think, was not unfair, from their standpoint, that they thought the law unconstitutional, and would not be responsible for any part of it. They were wrong, as it turned out. This has been put forward as a strong argument as against our course, but I think that if there was a wrong, it was a trifling one, and I am sure that if they had made any suggestions, their views would have been met.

Now, I desire to say a few words with regard to the effect of the Manitoba Act upon this question in supplement to what I have already said with regard to the remedial order. I take this stand, Mr. Speaker—I believe that the Remedial Bill which is now before us for consideration is wholly unconstitutional and ultra vires, and I shall endeavour to satisfy the House of the correctness of that position from a constitutional standpoint. How do we get jurisdiction in this matter? How does it come that this Parliament is entitled to deal with education in Manitoba, it having been provided in the Manitoba Act that the province shall have exclusive jurisdiction in educational matters. Our jurisdiction arises from the fact that the Privy Council in England have interpreted the subsections of section 22, which conferred the jurisdiction as to education upon Manitoba to mean this: That if Manitoba, at any time, passes a statute which gives rights or privileges to the minority, and afterwards repeals that statute, there shall be a right of appeal to the Governor General in Council, and to Parliament. Subsection 3 provides as follows:—

In case any such provincial law, as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then, and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial law for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

When are they to make it? In case such provincial laws are not made. Now, Mr. Speaker, has the legislature of Manitoba ever had the opportunity of passing, as a provincial law, the Remedial Bill which is proposed for our consideration? Never. They have never been asked to pass it. And I say that is the source of the jurisdiction of this House—that there should have been a first refusal of the legislature of Manitoba to enact such provincial law as “seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section.” That is one reason. Another reason is that the Governor in Council has never determined that this Remedial Bill which we are asked to pass is requisite for the due execution of the provisions of section 22. I say that this Parliament has no jurisdiction to pass an Act upon the subject of education in Manitoba until the Governor General in Council, as provided in section 22, has passed an order providing for that Act. And another circumstance must intervene, and that is that the order must be transmitted to the legislature of Manitoba and they must refuse to pass the Act. Now, neither of these things has been done—there has been no Order in Council by the Governor General providing that this provincial law shall be enacted by Manitoba; there has been no refusal of the legislature of Manitoba to enact this provincial law. We propose to coerce Manitoba by this Bill. We propose to usurp the jurisdiction of Manitoba, which I grant, under certain circumstances, we have the right to do, and we are bound to do. But I say those circumstances must arise. It is suggested that the remedial order goes further than this, and will include any Bill not exceeding the remedial order. I say no; I say that you are just as far wrong when you fall short of the remedial order as when you exceed it. Because the whole thing comes down to this. Has Manitoba ever refused to pass this law? It is suggested by some that it cannot make any difference; that Manitoba has been asked to restore the schools as they were. In answer to that request of the Government upon them they might have passed this Act; therefore they have had an opportunity to pass it, and it was no injustice to them for this House to do so. I think that is an absurd argument. We do not get this jurisdiction as a matter of justice or injustice to Manitoba; we do not get this jurisdiction as a matter of fair-play to Manitoba; we only get it under certain circumstances, and those circumstances must arise before we have the jurisdiction. It makes no difference whether Manitoba has had a chance to do it or not. You might as well say that you need never send a remedial order to Manitoba. An argument of that kind proves altogether too much, because, if the transmission of a broad remedial order which covered everything, which restored the schools just as they were, gave Manitoba an opportunity of legislating thus far, then there was really no necessity of sending it to them at all. You might say we have got jurisdiction here, because they should never have gone wrong. It is clear that if they have gone wrong, they should not have gone wrong; therefore there is no injustice in putting them right. But our jurisdiction does not arise from any such considerations as that; our jurisdiction is to come within the express words of section 22, and unless we come within section 22, we have not got any jurisdiction. I would like to know how the legislature of Manitoba could ever have foreseen the Remedial Bill proposed now by the Government, from reading the remedial order. Do you think it would have been possible by any guess of the legislature to have arrived at the abortion of an Act which is put forward on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba? Could they ever have supposed, after what has been said by His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, by the clergy of Quebec, by the advocates of remedial legislation—could the legislature of Manitoba ever have supposed for a moment that an Act like this would have met the difficulty? Why, when we come to go into suggestions of that kind, where do we land? We cannot depart from the letter of the law. There is a clear system laid down, and it is very simple, first, that the Governor General in Council must decide the kind of law, and he must embody that in an Order in Council. That must be transmitted to the legislature of Manitoba. If they accept it and act upon it, that ends the whole difficulty. On the other hand, if they refuse to carry it out, this Parliament has jurisdiction, not to deal with the question of education in Manitoba, not to exercise their discretion as to what kind of a law is proper to be enacted for Manitoba, but to put into the statute-book the law which the Governor General in Council has deemed requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section. That is what we can do, and that is the only thing we can do. We have no discretion. I do not say for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that the Remedial Bill must be simply a copy of the remedial order. We have the right, once vested with jurisdiction, to devise any expedient that we may think fit to give effect to our jurisdiction. We have a right to provide every kind of detail in order that our jurisdiction may be effectually executed. But we have no right to depart from the provisions of the constitution. Our Act must carry out the remedial order in every particular; every one will admit that it cannot exceed it. I humbly submit that the considerations which I offer for your approval show conclusively that we can no more fall short of it than we can exceed it. If that be so, Mr. Speaker, it is to my mind a further argument emphasizing the great crime that the Government committed in attempting to decide the nature of this legislation, of this interference, with Manitoba, in the absence of all knowledge of the circumstances under which a statute was passed, the circumstances of the people to whom the statute applies, the probable effect upon the majority and upon the minority of the proposed legislative interference of this House. The hon. the Secretary of State, in his remarks upon this Bill, contended that there was no coercion. Well, I do not know what coercion means, Mr. Speaker, if it is not the exercise of the jurisdiction given us here.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Was the Bill of 1890, coercion?

Mr. MARTIN. Well, I am not prepared to say whether it was or was not. It is not material to this question, and the Privy Council of England has decided that it was quite constitutional, quite fair, and quite just.

Mr. COSTIGAN. They decided it took away rights, and forced the minority to support schools they did not believe in.

Mr. MARTIN. In the Barrett case they decided everything in our favour; on the other hand, in the second case they decided that the taking away of those rights from the minority, gave a right of appeal here; and as I say, the moment that the Privy Council gave that second decision, the people of Manitoba were placed in a very different position from what they were before. Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that in no part of Canada is there a people more law-abiding, with greater respect for constituted authority and for the constitution, than the people who reside in the province of Manitoba. I venture to say that in no part of Canada is there less crime in proportion to population than there is in that province. They are law-abiding, they recognize the constitution, the Government in their answers have said so each time, and they admit that this Parliament, after the matter has been investigated and an Order in Council has been properly passed, has jurisdiction to interfere. But it must be by coercion, or else there is no use for it, as the hon. gentleman has said. What does it imply? It implies that a wrong has been done to the minority of that province, and that the Governor General in Council has called upon the legislature to right that wrong, and the legislature has refused. Therefore, under the provision of this constitutional Act, the Parliament of Canada forces the legislature of Manitoba to do justice in the premises. That is what coercion is; any interference by this Parliament, under circumstances of that kind, would be coercion.

We, in Manitoba, do not contend, that this Parliament has no right to coerce us, but we do contend, that, where the constitution has seen fit to give a responsibility of that kind to the Parliament of Canada, this Parliament is not doing justice to itself, nor to Manitoba, if it proceeds to the extremity of coercing that province until every other expedient has been tried. We say the Government have proceeded to coercion without trying every other expedient, without making the slightest attempt to see whether the people of Manitoba were prepared, in view of the decision of the Privy Council, and in view of the position in which they were placed constitutionally, to deal with the question themselves. From what has already fallen from me, it must be clear to the House, that I am in favour of a full investigation of this matter. I favour an investigation and inquiry into the circumstances that existed there, not because it is the policy enunciated by the leader of the Opposition, because I should like to say in this House, as I have said out of it, that this question is with me one that transcends party, and, if the policy of the leader of the Opposition did not meet with my approval, I would feel bound to oppose it in every way until justice was done in this respect to my province. I say, therefore, that I do not adopt the policy of investigation because it is what has been asked by the province which I stand here to represent. When the remedial order was sent to the legislature of Manitoba, after refusing most positively and most definitely to obey the remedial order, this is what the province said:

We believe that when the remedial order was made there was not available then to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools. We also believe there was lacking means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect on the province of the changes indicated in the order. Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make full and complete investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we will cheerfully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be framed with a reasonable degree of certainty. It is urged most strongly that upon such an important a matter, involving as it does, the religious feelings and convictions of different classes of the people of Canada, and the educational interests of their province, which is expected to become one of the most important in the Dominion, no hasty action should be taken; but that on the contrary, the greatest care and deliberation should be exercised, and a full and thorough investigation made.

That was the first answer. When this Government, which was bound to pass their remedial order at once—it could not afford time for Manitoba to prepare its case; time was the essence of the contract, and it had to be done at once—ascertained the trend of public opinion, they found time to adjourn the passing of the Remedial Bill from July, 1895, to January, 1896, in order that a second attempt might be made upon the province to see if the provincial government would recede from their position. Again the province of Manitoba made it most clear and distinct, that they were prepared to assist in every way in an investigation. I know the Minister of Marine and Fisheries does not desire that the province of Manitoba should settle this matter. He is, probably, the only man in this House who does not wish it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman does not know anything of the kind, and he has no right to say so.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman's own utterances show it. The hon. gentleman said, in this House, that he would be very sorry to have a settlement made by the province of Manitoba; that they did not want a settlement.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Never.

Mr. MARTIN. That they wanted to pass remedial legislation.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I rise to a point of order. I hope the hon. gentleman does not feel bound to give such an interpretation of what I stated on that occasion. I have explained before, that the dropping of one word in the unrevised "Hansard" might have exposed me to that misinterpretation of what I said. I have already explained the matter. I have stated repeatedly, and the country knows it, and no man has said more plainly than I have, that the question should be settled by the legislature, instead of being brought here. I have always said that.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman has been very unfortunate, I must admit.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Not so unfortunate as the hon. gentleman thinks.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) did make an explanation, and he said that the word "not" ought to be put in, but the difficulty is, if you put the word "not" in, you have all the other parts of the speech to explain. You have the part of it to explain where he said: That even if we had Mr. Greenway's promise it would not be any good to us, and where he said: We want the Remedial Bill and we want to coerce Manitoba.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) is wrong. The hon. gentleman has no right to state what he may believe to be true, but which I know is wrong. I never said I wanted coercion.

Mr. SPEAKER. When the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan) says that he did not use the word, of course the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) must accept that statement.

Mr. MARTIN. I certainly do, but I say I have got my impression of what the hon. gentleman meant from what he was reported to have said in the "Hansard." Of course the "Hansard" may be wrong. I know it is a very inconvenient thing to have.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is that the corrected "Hansard" you are about to read from?

Mr. MARTIN. I am not disputing what the hon. gentleman says. I accept his statement now, of what he desired to say, but I suppose it is not out of order to read what got into the "Hansard" in some way or other. I suppose the reported must have been listening to some other gentleman, and thought it was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That hon. gentleman said:

I hope I will not be offensive to any hon. gentleman, but I will as a matter of duty state clearly that my convictions are, not from a desire to attack any hon. gentleman, but to state the matter as I understand it, and my observations are of course subject to correction. At that time, to speak of a commission was to throw the question overboard so far as the minority was concerned, it was to rely upon the legislature of Manitoba to redress the grievance and to do justice to the minority. If the leader of the Opposition had a guarantee in his pocket and could produce it before this House, from the government of Manitoba, stating that in 24 hours from this time they would amend their law and re-establish separate schools, acquiescing in the remedial order, I say that would be no remedy, that it would be no settlement of the case, that they could kick it aside three months afterwards, if they thought it had not worked well.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would point out to the hon. member (Mr. Martin) two breaches of the rules, which he is committing. In the first place, he is reading from the report of a past debate, and again, even supposing that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan) was reported exactly as the hon. member from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) states he was in the "Hansard"; if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) denies he made this statement, his denial must be accepted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Permit me to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member (Mr. Costigan) did not deny that he is correctly reported; but simply, that one word is omitted which he declared altered the construction of the whole sentence. It is easy for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) to put in the word "not," and then we have the exact fact.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) cannot very well get over the objection; that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) is reading from a past debate.

Mr. MARTIN. There is no question, that is the binding rule of this House. It is a little inconvenient sometimes, but I will have to submit to it. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was going on to say, that while they were in such a violent hurry to pass such a remedial order, that time could not be allowed for anything, yet these gentlemen allowed considerable time to elapse between the receipt here of the answer to the remedial order, and their announcement of what they intended to do. And for what purpose did they delay? Why, we are told, it was for the purpose of seeing if they could not get some settlement out of Manitoba. It was for the purpose of trying again to get Manitoba to submit to the remedial order. And Mr. Speaker, the legislature of Manitoba lays down in the clearest language, that they are prepared to deal with this question fairly and reasonably. They say as follows:—

It is a matter of regret that the invitation extended by the legislative assembly to make a proper inquiry into the facts of the case has not been accepted, but that, as above stated, the advisers of His Excellency have declared their policy without investigation. It is equally a matter of regret that Parliament is apparently about to be asked to legislate without investigation. It is with all deference submitted that such a course seems to be quite incapable of reasonable justification and must create the conviction that the educational interests of the people of the province of Manitoba are being dealt with in a hostile and peremptory way by a tribunal whose members have not approached the subject in a judicial spirit or taken the proceedings necessary to enable them to form a proper opinion upon the merits of the question.

The inquiry asked for by the reply of the legislature to the remedial order should, in the opinion of the undersigned, be again earnestly invited, and in the event of the invitation being accepted the scope of the inquiry should be sufficiently wide to embrace all available facts relating to the past or present school systems.

The desire of the legislature and government of the province throughout the whole course of the proceedings, beginning with the enactment of the statutes of 1890, has been to provide the best possible means of education for the children of our citizens. To that end every possible effort has been put forth and every possible pecuniary sacrifice made in order that there might be established a school system based upon sound principles and equipped and administered in accordance with approved modern educational methods. Though very much remains to be accomplished it may be fairly asserted that a reasonable measure of success has attended the efforts which have thus been put forth.

In amending the law from time to time and in administering the system it is the earnest desire to remedy every well-founded grievance and to remove every appearance of inequality or injustice that may be brought to notice.

With a view to so doing, the government and the legislature will always be ready to consider any complaint that may be made in a spirit of fairness and conciliation.

It seems, therefore, most reasonable to conclude that by leaving the question to be so dealt with, the truest interests of the minority will be better served than by an attempt to establish a system of separate schools by coercive legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have endeavoured to point out, that the remedial order has absolutely prevented the Government of Manitoba from entertaining any of the numerous suggestions that have been made to them, by and on behalf of the Dominion Government, with a view of their entering into negotiations with this matter. If that be so, if that fatal error of the Government has had that effect, how much more will the passing of a coercive measure in this Parliament tend in the same direction. I think it will be admitted by every one who favours remedial legislation, by the advocates of the rights and wrongs of the minority in Manitoba, that the most effectual way in which to remedy those wrongs, is to have them remedied by the legislature of Manitoba. I might go further. I might say that in my opinion no coercive Bill passed by this Parliament could ever be effectually carried out in Manitoba so as to be of real advantage to the minority in that province. As long as the people there believe that they have been unfairly treated, as long as they feel that the coercive power of this Parliament has been employed unduly and hastily, without giving them an opportunity to show the facts, and without proving a case against them, they will feel inclined to throw every obstacle in the way of the carrying out of a measure passed by this Parliament. The Government themselves, by the provisions which they have inserted in this Bill, have acknowledged that, in order effectually to carry out the remedy for the minority which they offer, they must have the concurrence of the government of Manitoba: because they provide that the government of Manitoba are to appoint a Roman Catholic board, and are to pay over the proper share of the government grant to the Roman Catholic board brought into existence by this Act. By these provisions they admit that the law can be properly put into execution only with the approval and concurrence of the local authorities. I say, therefore, that the Government, having made one fatal mistake in passing the remedial order in the terms in which it is couched, and under the circumstances under which they did pass it, will intensify the difficulty very much, indeed, if they press to a conclusion the coercive Bill now before the House. I believe that if that Bill be withdrawn, and the remedial order of the 21st of March be rescinded, the people of Manitoba, being law-abiding, and understanding the position in which they have been placed by the second decision of the Privy Council, will be prepared to do justice in the premises. I am not bound to rely upon my own knowledge of the people of

Mr. MARTIN.

Manitoba in making that statement, because we have it from the government and the legislature of Manitoba, that they recognize their position, that they do not propose to fight the constitution, that their objection to the remedial order and to the Remedial Bill is not that this Government and this Parliament have no jurisdiction in the premises, but that the jurisdiction conferred upon the Governor General in Council, and upon this Parliament, has not been exercised in a manner calculated to bring about a settlement of this question—in a manner calculated to really aid the minority, on whose behalf it is suggested we should pass this law. We all desire to remove this question from the arena of Dominion politics. I believe every word the hon. Minister of Justice gave utterance to as to the intense desire of the Government that they should not be called upon to exercise this jurisdiction. That desire is reciprocated on this side of the House. We also would be glad if there were no Manitoba school question in this House. That there is a Manitoba school question in this House, that we are here taken away from the subjects we should properly be considering, to deal with a matter of interest only to a small community, and delegated to the constitution to the legislature of the province to which that community belongs, is, I say, the fault of the Government who have control for the time being of the destinies of Canada. It is their fault. They thought they could gain great political capital by the step they took. They had decided to appeal at once to the country. They were under the impression that this hasty action would bring to their side the votes of a large percentage of the electorate of Canada. They have found that instead of it bringing them political strength, it has brought them political disunion. They have found that in every constituency that has been opened since they passed that unfortunate remedial order, they have been weakened instead of strengthened. And they find now, when they propose to follow their remedial order with a coercive Bill, that they have arrayed against them a large section of the members of this House, who were elected to support them, and who agree with them in other matters of policy. I say, Mr. Speaker, that they have brought all this upon themselves by their own action. The policy of the hon. leader of the Opposition is exactly the opposite of the policy of the Government. I am very glad, indeed, from the stand that has been taken by the legislature of the province from which I come, that I am able to support the policy of the hon. leader of the Opposition upon this question. As I said before, if that policy were not a fair one to Manitoba, if it were not in the interests of Manitoba, I should feel bound to register my vote against the leader of the Opposition, and, if necessary, in favour of the Government. I am not placed in that position. I am here prepared, heartily prepared, to vote for the six months' hoist of this Bill. By that vote, I do not intend to express the idea that this Parliament should not interfere in the Manitoba school question; but I intend to express the idea that the action of the Government in this matter has been wrong, from beginning to end, that they have not been actuated by proper motives, that they have taken hold of the question in the wrong way; I believe that there is no man in Canada better fitted to bring about a solution of this troublesome and burning question than the hon. gentleman whom the Liberals have the great good fortune to have at their head. That gentleman has the confidence, I believe, of a large portion of his native province. He also has the confidence of a large portion of the people of Manitoba, the province particularly affected by this question. He has announced his policy as being opposed to any attempt at coercing that province unless and until it is shown clearly and distinctly, that the province of Manitoba is not prepared to submit to the constitution and is not prepared to redress wrongs when these wrongs have been pointed out to it. If that gentleman comes to power, we believe that there will never be any necessity for his proposing in this House a coercive law for Manitoba. I am satisfied that he will be able to settle this question, not, as I understand the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite to mean, because the government of Manitoba happens to be Liberal and he is the Liberal leader; not at all for that reason, but because he has taken a statesman-like view of this question. It is not the Liberals of Manitoba who have taken their stand upon this question; it is the people of Manitoba. Conservatives in that province are just as strong upon the school question as the Liberals. The government there which would attempt to use that question as the football of party, would soon lose the support of the people of that province. Therefore, I say, it is not because the leader of the Opposition in this House is the leader of the party to which the government of that province belongs, that I look to an amicable settlement, under his auspices, of this question, but because he, from the first, has taken a high exalted position upon it—a position which is calculated to inspire confidence in him by the people of Canada from British Columbia to Nova Scotia, including the province of Manitoba. I look for a settlement in that way, but I have no hesitation in saying, that the people of Manitoba have not put themselves in the wrong upon this question, no one will refuse to accord this to the legislature of Manitoba, that, upon each occasion when they have been called upon to express themselves upon this question, they have done so in a dignified, statesmanlike way. They have touched the question fairly, and, if they are fairly approached, as I know they will be, by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), when that gentleman becomes, as he soon will become, the Premier of Canada, we will have heard the last of the Manitoba school question, and this Parliament will proceed to do the proper business of the Dominion of Canada, which requires so much, and has so little, of its real consideration for the past seventeen years.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Printing and Stationery, for the year ending 30th June, 1895.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 80) further to amend the Railway Act.—(Mr. Béchard.)

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WELDON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the House to a paragraph which appeared in the Toronto "News" of Saturday, 7th instant, reading as follows:—

Dr. Weldon was willing to go into the Bowell Administration a few weeks ago and accept the remedial policy and office together.

I sent a copy of this extract to the Prime Minister, requesting from him an answer which I might communicate to the House, and to-day, I have that answer, as follows:—

Dear Dr. Weldon,—

I have to acknowledge your note of 7th instant, calling my attention to a paragraph which appeared in the Toronto "News" of the same date, to the following effect:—

Then he gives the quotation:

This statement is entirely without foundation.

Yours sincerely,

MACKENZIE BOWELL.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that it may be a question of practical politics within our party as to whether, at an early date, the "Toronto Mail" and the "Toronto News" should not be read out of the Liberal-Conservative party.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. CASEY. I wish to call the attention of the leader of the House to a matter in regard to which we had some conversation on Friday last. I supposed then that a return to an Order of the House which I moved some time ago had been brought down, and I find it in the index under a different heading. The return has come down, but there is in it an omission to which I wish to call attention. The order of the House was for—

Copies of all Orders in Council, instructions from the Government or any department, and other documents relating to the appointment of a High Commissioner in London, or the nature of his duties, or discharge of those duties, which have not already been laid before the House.

Now, the only documents contained in this return are a report of a committee of the Privy Council, dated 11th May, 1880, in regard to the appointment of Sir A. T. Galt as High Commissioner, with a copy of his commission; also copy of a report to the Privy Council, dated 24th May, 1880, in regard to his appointment, to which is attached a memorandum of instructions given to Sir A. T. Galt. These are of date 20th May, 1880. Now, the last return which was moved for was by Mr. Blake, in 1884, under circumstances which the Secretary of State will remember, for he was in the House at the time. I do not remember exactly what was brought down then, but I wish to obtain by my order documents of the same sort which have come into existence since that time. The hon. Secretary of State, in his dual capacity, will have special knowledge as to what documents of this nature exist, and I have no doubt now that I have called his attention to what is lacking in this return, he will take every means to get them down at the earliest possible date. I suppose he understands the scope of the motion, although I believe he was not present when it was moved. It is merely to get down such documents as will define the nature of the duties of the High Commissioner, and his relations to the Government and the different departments thereof.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I had not seen the return, but I will take immediate steps that the motion made by the hon. gentleman may be fully complied with as early as possible.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to inquire with respect to returns moved for on 17th January: 1. Showing the number of employees, employed temporarily or otherwise, who have not contributed to the Superannuation Fund. 2. The number of employees on the

Mr. WELDON.

Intercolonial Railway. Neither of these returns has as yet been brought down. Is there any hope of getting them shortly?

Mr. HAGGART. The order was given to Mr. Pottinger, manager of the Intercolonial Railway, to send up the information as soon as possible. It has not yet arrived.

Mr. McMULLEN. There was an order of the House passed on 17th February for a copy of tenders received during the year for the conveyance of mails between certain points in British Columbia. That would be a short document to prepare, and yet a month has elapsed, and it has not been brought down. When may I expect to get it?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I gave instructions, when the motion was passed, to have the document prepared, and I was under the impression that it had been brought down. But I will look into the matter, and have the return expedited as rapidly as possible.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was in the return office just before the opening of the House, and it has not been received.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No doubt the hon. gentleman is right.

Mr. MULLOCK. I wish to call the attention of the Government to what I am told is an omission in regard to certain papers laid on the Table of the House two weeks ago. I am informed that the papers laid on the Table with respect to the report of the Board of Visitors to the Royal Military College at Kingston do not contain the full findings of the board, and there are other findings of an important character which have not yet been laid before the House. I am requested to ask if such is the case, and if those findings can be laid on the Table at an early date.

Mr. DICKEY. I laid on the Table the papers exactly as they were handed to me by the Deputy Minister. I understand there was a defect in the papers, and I will inquire immediately and correct the defect.

THE CANADIAN JOCKEY CLUB.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 48) respecting the Canadian Jockey Club.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MARTIN. When this Bill was before the House on a previous occasion, I asked that it might stand in order that I might have the opportunity of hearing from the racing association of Winnipeg. I have not had time to hear from that association, and I should like the Bill to stand for a further period, as I expect to hear in a day or two. I understand that amendments are to be proposed which will meet many of the objections that were urged against the Bill by certain gentlemen in Ontario who are interested in it; but one of the strong objections to the Bill still remains, and that is that a committee of twelve is appointed by the shareholders of the club, and these shareholders are those who own the stock in this like any other incorporated joint stock company. If this body is to control racing in Canada, there should be provision made whereby the shares should be taken up by the different racing associations which are to be affiliated to this company, otherwise representation on the board will not amount to much: twelve original shareholders would control the organization, and the affiliated associations would have very little representation in the club. While it is true that the rights of the club to make regulations is confined to these clubs which are affiliated with it, still I believe the intention is that this club shall control racing in Canada, and this organization will be able to make such arrangements with the racing associations in the United States as to practically have a monopoly of racing in this country. I do not see any objection to that, provided each association is entitled to fair representation upon the board; but it highly undesirable to give to any small body of men having $5,500 in stock subscribed, and $550 paid up, practically the control of all these matters. It is objectionable that there should be any stock whatever. The proper system for an organization of this kind is to make it entirely representative of the different affiliated clubs, and there is very serious objection to racing associations, such as that in the city of Winnipeg, being controlled by an organization of this character. However, I speak without any great knowledge on the question, because I have had no time to communicate with the racing people of Winnipeg, and I should like very much if the promoter would allow the Bill to stand until Friday, by which time I am satisfied I shall have received an answer.

Mr. TISDALE. Would not Wednesday suit?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes. It takes a little over a week to get an answer from Winnipeg.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the committee rises I would draw the attention of the promoter of the Bill to one or two points which he might consider in the meantime. He was good enough to place in my hands a few moments ago some of the suggested amendments which have been assented to by the parties who desire the provisions of the Bill to be extended. It appears to me, however, that perhaps a little more is necessary to carry out what is intended. I would suggest that in section 4 it should be made quite clear when the next club committee shall be elected, because that does not appear on the face of the Bill. If that is left to be regulated by the Companies' Act, that leaves it to the company. By clause 5 it is also left to the company to say when the meeting shall be held. Probably some provision could be placed in the Bill to prevent the first club committee lasting for years if it so chose. In the next place the amendment to section 4 does not, so far as I can see, provide how the representatives of the affiliated clubs are to be elected members of the committee. It says that each affiliated club shall be entitled to have one member on the committee; but it does not say in what way or how often the affiliated club shall elect its representative. I think the provision is inoperative unless it does that. Again, in section 5 enormous and unusual powers, though perhaps necessary powers, are given to the club committee in regard to the making of by-laws. For instance, it can make by-laws to disqualify jockeys and trainers, and to place all tracks under the control of the committee. That is a very strong power. The club committee makes these by-laws first; but they are of no good whatever until they are approved of, not by the affiliated clubs at all, but by the shareholders of this company, who have paid up $2,000 of stock. In that way, I think the ultimate control of these by-laws and all the regulations covered by them would be left in the hands of the present company. I throw out these suggestions to the promoter of the Bill.

Mr. TISDALE. I am much obliged to my hon. friend for calling attention to these matters; but it seems to me that the Companies' Act, which is made applicable to this Act, will determine the time of the annual meeting. However, I will consider the matter with the promoters of the Bill; and, if there is any doubt, it will be removed.

Mr. EDGAR. It says according to the express provisions of the by-laws of the company.

Mr. TISDALE. I may say, for the information of the House, that since the last time the Bill was before us, there has been a meeting of the representatives of those who objected to the Bill, and the amendment which I am instructed to ask the House to introduce, covers all the points in dispute. However, it may be, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, that in considering these amendments, they have overlooked some of the technical provisions to which he has called attention, and I will have them considered. In the meantime, I have given notice of these amendments, so that they will be printed in the Orders, and hon. members of the House will be able to see what they are. I have no objection whatever to allowing the Bill to stand.

Committee rose and reported progress.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 64) to incorporate the Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

CHIGNECTO MARINE TRANSPORT RAILWAY COMPANY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Powell for second reading of Bill (No. 75) respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited).

Mr. POWELL. In moving the second reading of this Bill, I may say that this matter has been before the House frequently, and I presume that all the members are fairly well acquainted with the objects of the Bill. As introduced originally, the Bill had some defects; and, at the instance of some hon. members, it was re-drafted and re-introduced as amended, and it now comes before the House for its second reading. The work of the company was begun some years ago. Its object was to connect the Bays Verte and Fundy by a railroad that would have the capability of transferring ships from one bay to the other. Upon that work the company have already expended some $3,500,000. Their time for the completion of the work has expired, and the bondholders, who are now promoting the work, are desirous that the time be extended. The provisions of the Bill are, first, a mere reviving of the company; second, the renewal of the powers of two amending Acts as to preferential bonds and stock. I need not say anything further on the Bill, as hon. members are already acquainted with the work.

Mr. WELSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not like the look of this Bill. I have been keeping a sharp lookout after it, ever since it has been on the Order paper, and I do not like it. In the year 1882, I find that a Bill respecting this railway was introduced into this House by Mr. Cameron, of Victoria, and the matter was discussed very fully. The Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) spoke very favourably of the Bill, and referred to the Chignecto Railway in glowing terms, and on May 8th, 1882. Sir Charles Tupper brought in a resolution to the effect that the House should go into Committee of the Whole to grant a subsidy to this company. It was a new question before the House at that time, and the matter was very fully discussed. The Hon. Mr. Mackenzie on that occasion said, that the matter was brought before them without giving the House time to consider it, and on May 11th, the Hon. Secretary of State spoke again on this matter, and said:

The whole question is thoroughly familiar to members of the House, and is so fully set forth in the papers which have been distributed, and the subject in one form or another has so long engaged the attention of Parliament, that I do not think it will be necessary to detain the House very long in explaining the proposal of the resolution.

The hon. gentleman then goes on to explain matters connected with the railway, and in speaking of the navigation of the Bay of Fundy, he remarks:

I regard the tide in the Bay of Fundy of the greatest possible advantage because it does not leave a vessel dependent upon the wind to the same extent as elsewhere. The vessels go up with one tide and down with another.

Well, I had not the honour of a seat in this House at that time, but there was a gentleman here, Mr. Killam, representing Yarmouth, who was intimately connected with shipping, and he opposed the scheme, in the following language:—

As to the commercial merits of the scheme I claim, speaking with all modesty, to be as fair a judge as any hon. gentleman on either side of the House. I leave all the statements of the Minister of Railways as to the number of fishing vessels which may use this railroad, the tonnage of the vessels entering the Bay of Fundy, and likely to use this railway, with his conjectures, as to whether a vessel could be carried up by the tide, to the public who are better qualified to judge than the hon. gentleman. But I do not believe his statement to-night that the railway has the commercial value he attaches to it. I believe any sort of transmission would have a certain amount of local commercial value, but not that general commercial value which he believes. I do not believe it would have that general commercial value which he believes. It might be possible to have some mode of crossing the Isthmus, which could save time and thus induce owners of vessels to pay some toll for crossing it. The commercial value of the work must be estimated by what those vessels would be willing to pay. Not one of the 600 fishing vessels spoken of bound for the United States ports could be expected to pass through the canal and be transported over the ship railway. With a fair wind they would square away to get out of the Gut of Canso, preferring to take their chances upon the open sea outside the Bay of Fundy, than to go into the Bay of Fundy where fogs and difficult navigation render the course more dangerous and necessitate their paying a higher rate of insurance. Nothing has been done since I have had the honour of representing a constituency in this House to show any serious intention of going on with the Baie Verte Canal. This canal will not be of very general commercial—but may be of considerable local—value. This proposal to vote $150,000 a year for twenty years may be regarded as simply a means of attracting offers from capitalists, in order to get their idea as to what might be done. I do not see why, if the Government have deliberately adopted the intention of substituting the scheme of a ship railway, they should not have informed the House that they resume the responsibility, because the distinguished engineer who had this subject under consideration will be in a difficult position when he attempts to borrow money to proceed with its construction. It may be said to him, that the Canadian Government do not in any way endorse the scheme, that they did not think it was of sufficient commercial value to make it worth while to construct it, but are willing to say: If you will take the whole risk, you may do so, and if you succeed we will give you the annual subsidy. This indicates that the Hon. Minister of Railways has abandoned the scheme which for years he pretended to regard with so much favour. He gives it up, and says that if Mr. Ketchum, or somebody else will find the money to build it, and make it a complete success, the Government will then pay the money. I look therefore, upon this as an abandonment of the project which the hon. Minister pretended he had at heart.

We therefore see, Mr. Speaker, that the only hon. gentleman who at that time was connected with shipping in the House, gave his opinion that this railway would be of no value to the country. Then, Mr. Speaker, we find again, when the House went into committee on that Bill, Sir Charles Tupper said :

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is proposed to make a contract on the terms of the proposal, taking every guarantee that the work shall be done in a proper manner and binding the Government, should the work be done to their entire satisfaction and the work satisfactorily performed, to pay the subsidy and to continue paying so long as the service is efficiently performed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Opposition in the House at that time, Mr. Blake, commented on this statement of Sir Charles Tupper, and made the following remarks which show how far-seeing that hon. gentleman was :—

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the contract will enable the company to raise capital more easily. But the terms of the agreement may be such as may entangle us, inasmuch as capital is to be raised on the strength of them. Hence may arise some such kind of obligation, as is sometimes recognized by governments to pay the subsidy, inasmuch as capital was raised on it, although the conditions might not have been fulfilled.

That is fourteen years ago, Sir, and here we are to-day, with the obligation resting upon us that Mr. Blake foresaw. This matter has been before the House several times since 1882. In 1888 there was a long discussion on the question, and I believe nearly every member from New Brunswick spoke against this Bill. They all said the scheme was going to be a failure. I had the honour of a seat in the House at the time, and I took part in the discussion. On April 19th, 1888, the present Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 101) to make further provision respecting the granting of a subsidy to the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company (Limited). Mr. Jones, then member for Halifax, opposed the Bill very strongly, and I took a hand in the discussion and spoke as follows :—

I quite agree with the words that have fallen from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). I think it is a work that is unnecessary, and that is my private opinion. I know the place well. I know Baie Verte and I know there is a shoal strand where you have to go for five miles from shore before you get twenty feet of water. I would like to know how you will build this railway. If you build it on the principle of a marine slip you will find great difficulty. Any person in this House conversant with the shipping interests knows that there are very few marine slips so perfect that they can take a ship out of water and take her on the rocks on to the slip without doing her an injury. I say that in taking a ship out of water, say a ship 1,000 tons, loaded or unloaded, and conveying her overland, the chances are that the ship will be badly injured. If this Bill passes I hope there will be a clause inserted that the company will be liable for any damage or injury done to a ship during transport. I notice that this company applied for a charter seven years ago and that they got what they asked for. I find that a few years after they applied for an amendment to that Act. They obtained the amendment seven years after the passing of that Act granting them all they asked for, and without their putting a spade in the ground or having a shilling paid out they asked this House for further amendments. I think that is pressing the matter rather close. The hon. the Minister of Finance stated the other evening that everything comes to those who wait, and I think those gentlemen who applied for an amendment to the charter are acting upon that principle. I think it is a bad principle, where a company after seven years comes a third time applying to this House for further concessions or for further grants in some way or other, that we should grant it until they do something. In looking over the list of promoters of this scheme I do not find many shipowners among them. Every hon. gentleman in this House knows that some ten or twelve or thirteen years ago there was an agitation for a Baie Verte Canal, and this was agitated for a number of years. Finally the Government of the country appointed a commission to take evidence as to the feasibility and chance of success for that canal. I think that the result of that commission was that the canal was not warranted, that it was not feasible and that it would be of no service. I myself remember being in court when the evidence was taken.

Then I go on to repeat some evidence given by an old shipmaster in opposition to the scheme. The hon. member for St. John, N.B., (Mr. Ellis and Mr. Weldon) spoke very strongly against this scheme, although, if it was going to benefit any part of the Dominion, it would certainly benefit New Brunswick. The hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) then replied as follows :—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can hardly allow the measure to be carried, after what has been said, without making a statement to the House. I would remind the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Welsh) that they are six years too late in the speeches they have addressed to the House to-night. This Parliament deliberately, six years ago, adopted the policy of giving a certain amount of aid for securing the construction of this work, after the matter was put fairly and distinctly before the House ; and from that hour down to the present, although certain modifications and extensions of time have been asked, not one dollar additional has been asked by the promoters of this enterprise over and above what Parliament deliberately sanctioned six years ago. So much for that part of the question. Now, Sir, why did the House sanction this work ? I can understand the position of the hon. member for Halifax perfectly well.

I hope the hon. members for Halifax, who are present, will pay particular attention to this :

The hon. gentleman wants to prevent the construction of this work in the interests of his own constituents. He wants every vessel sailing from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to be compelled to pass by the port of Halifax, to make a friendly call at that port, and leave a little money there on its way to New York, Boston, or Portland. But I consider it the height of ingratitude on the part of the hon. member for Queen's to stand up here and oppose a measure which, if it is going to benefit one part of this Dominion more than another, will benefit the island on which he lives. Why, Sir, it will give to the great article of export of that island, potatoes, a value almost equal to the amount of the duty that now meets them in the United States. It will enable the large fleets with which Captain Welsh is identified—if he will allow me to use his name—to make two or three voyages between Charlottetown and Boston and New York, for every one that it can make as matters stand today.

Mr. WELSH. No.

I again reply, no, with equal force now. The hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) then went on to say :

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why, Sir, I am not attempting to offer to the House, on a question of this kind, my opinion in opposition to that of a gentleman who is perfectly familiar with navigation on the water ; but that hon. gentleman has had no experience in navigating his ship on land.

Mr. WELSH. No, and I do not want to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He is no authority on the question of taking his ship over land for twenty miles.

Then again the matter was brought up, and, after a long argument, the company got their charter and $150,000 per year for twenty-five years. Then we go on to 1891, when we find another extension called for. This company would require a parliament for itself, it comes before us so often. The matter was brought forward again on May 29, 1891, when the hon. Minister of Finance moved, that the House resolve itself into committee on the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to provide that the time for the completion of the works of the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, Limited, shall, as respects their title to receive the subsidy heretofore authorized, be the 1st day of July, 1893, instead of the 1st July, 1890 ; also that all penalties, forfeitures and deductions incurred by the company under section 2 of chapter 4 of the Acts passed in 51st Victoria be remitted, and that said section 2 be repealed.

Several gentlemen took a hand in the debate on that resolution, and the Secretary of State gave a long account of what had been done by the company, from their point of view, towards carrying on this work. He stated, on behalf of the company, the difficulties they had met, owing to financial troubles in London money market and several other matters. Then I got up and replied to the hon. gentleman. I said :

I would not have said anything in regard to this matter except that Prince Edward Island has been brought into the discussion. The Minister of Marine has given the House to understand that the Island will be benefited by this scheme. I have denounced it every time it has been brought before this House, and I denounce it now—

That was in 1891, and now, in 1896, I denounce it just as forcibly.

—and I say that when this company has had eight or nine years to carry out this work and has only made use of three years of that time, and now asks for an extension of time and to be relieved from the penalties involved from non-fulfilment of contract, the boot is on the other leg. If they had a claim against the Government which had been put aside, they would have claimed damages to the extent of millions. I have read the article quoted by the Minister of Marine ; and as regards the engineers, I would not give two-pence for their opinions. They are full of theories ; the engineering difficulties no doubt can be conquered and the railway completed, and Canada will have to pay $2,000,000.

I said two million dollars ; but, if we carry out this Bill, and renew the charter of that company, that railway is going to cost this country five million dollars.

Mr. POWELL. How do you make that out ?

Mr. WELSH. In this way. If you want to buy an annuity of $170,000, you might get that for something between two million and three million dollars payment, cash down. Now, Canada has no money to spare and she cannot afford to pay three million dollars in cash for an annuity. But the contract says we have to pay $170,000 for twenty years. At the expiration of that time, that will amount to five million dollars at 4 per cent interest. Is there a man who dares to deny it ? I would like to see him on his legs.

Mr. POWELL. I deny it.

Mr. WELSH. I have got it computed. I have got in my hand the calculation made out by the manager of the most important bank in Ottawa.

Mr. FOSTER. Extend it to one hundred years, and it would be much more.

Mr. IVES. Why does he stop the interest at the end of twenty years ?

Mr. WELSH. Because the contract says, that, when they build this road, the Government will pay them a subsidy of $170,000 a year for twenty years. That is why I stop there.

Mr. IVES. Why not go on for ever reckoning the interest ?

Mr. WELSH. Go on as much as you like, you will only make the interest all the greater. For once in my life, I have to compliment the hon. Minister of Finance. It seems that in November, about eighteen months ago, he was in London, and a deputation of this company waited on him. I quote from a pamphlet issued by the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company :

Hon. Mr. Foster, when in London last October, received a deputation of the share and debenture holders at the office of the High Commissioner, and in reply to their request that the question of the railway company's concession should be considered by the Government as early as possible, he said :—" Conditions always accompany the grant of a subsidy, and if the conditions are not fulfilled, the Government is not equally responsible at all for the payment of the money. The Government, however, in this matter is bound to take in other considerations than those of strict and absolute legality, and I can assure you—and this is as far as I can go in an assurance as a responsible member of the Government—that the Government will take this matter up, as was promised Mr. Provand, and we will give it our best consideration on the ground of what might be called moral obligations. (Of how it may affect credit, and also, as we are primarily bound to do, in respect of the best interests of our own people, for whom we are trustees and for whom we are bound to act with great care and prudence. I think you are perfectly right in asking that you should have a decision upon this question as soon as possible. It has been impossible, and I may say that it is impossible to have a question of this gravity—

That is well put, "of this gravity."

—considered without what we may call a full meeting of Council, and circumstances during the holidays have rendered it impossible for the Government to be assembled in force."

I went on, then :

Canada will have to pay $2,000,000 for a railway that will not be worth one cent when completed. Talk about granting $125,000 a year as a subsidy. I say this is boodleism carried out to a great extent. Talk about wild-cat schemes, this is one of the most wild-cat schemes that ever entered into the imagination of any one.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, I did not believe there was a man outside of a lunatic asylum that would approve of the measure.

As I was afraid the Minister of Marine might subsequently say that this resolution passed the House without opposition, I protest against it. I should like to give it the six months' hoist. How many men in Canada have a dollar or a cent invested in this scheme? The money is that of English capitalists, and the credit of Canada will be injured when this scheme is exposed and the railway proves to be a failure. I told the late House that if the Government brought a shipowner or a man engaged in the shipping business who had invested a dollar in the scheme I would hold my tongue, but I never heard such was the case. If there were any honourable way of getting out of the scheme I should like to see it adopted, because it is only going to be a swindle.

In 1893 the matter again came before the House, being brought up by myself on a question of privilege :

Mr. WELSH. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to call the attention of the House to an article in the "Free Press" of the 4th February inst., and to put myself in order, I move the adjournment of the House.

Then I will go on to quote the paragraph, as follows :—

Some months ago the Dominion Government passed an Order in Council agreeing to extend the time for the completion of the Chignecto Ship Railway, without forfeiture of the subsidy voted by Parliament in aid of the scheme, provided work on the railway is actually in progress on the 1st day of July next, 1893, and the company establishes to the satisfaction of the Governor General in Council that it has secured all the capital necessary fully to finish and equip the railway, docks and other works of the company in all respects according to the requirements of the contract. The company must therefore raise the necessary funds to complete the project before the 1st July next, when the extension granted some years ago will expire. The directors have issued preference bonds upon the railway to the amount of $350,000,— —and hope to obtain the needed money by the sale of such bonds. They expect that the capitalists who have already invested money in the project will take up the new issue of bonds rather than see the work abandoned.

I suppose they mean pounds sterling.

I then went on to say :

Well, if this is true, Mr. Speaker, I do not like it. Every extension of time, and every charter that has been granted to this railway, has been done with the sanction of Parliament; and on every occasion that this matter has been brought up, there has always been, from this side of the House at all events, and I think in the minds of a great many gentlemen on the other side of the House, an expression of dissatisfaction, seeing that this scheme had been approved and supported by Parliament. This matter was brought up in 1888, when the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution :—

And they passed the resolution, extending the time to 1889 and providing :

Also that the company may be conferred a further delay of twenty-four months for such completion, on the condition of the payment of a monthly penalty of $5,000 for each month during which the works remain uncompleted after the above-mentioned date, and also that the amount of capital mentioned in section 2 of the Act 49, Victoria, chapter 18, as that on which the payment of the subsidies limited so as to make up the net earnings to 7 per cent per annum, shall be $5,500,000 instead of $5,000,000.

I said further :

There was considerable debate on that motion, and it was opposed by my hon. colleague and by many others, including Mr. Mitchell, the late Minister of Marine. I will not take up the time of the House by quoting the whole of the debate, but I will read an extract from the remarks of Sir Charles Tupper which, at this time, read like a theatrical performance. Among other things, he said :

"But I consider it the height of ingratitude on the part of the hon. member for Queen's to stand up here and oppose a measure which, if it is going to benefit one part of this Dominion more than another, will benefit the island on which he lives. Why, Sir, it will give to the great article of export of that island, potatoes, an increased value."

Then the hon. gentleman went on and made a long speech. I continued :

When I read those speeches and the remarks that were made to sanction this wild-cat scheme, it reminds me of one of Baron Munchausen's yarns. I see some very strong opinions were expressed by the Hon. Mr. Mitchell and others. This has been going for eight or nine years. If the time is extended much longer there will be no ships left to pass over the railway, even assuming that it will be possible to carry them over. I have opposed this scheme ever since it was introduced into this House, with all my power. If the Government have extended the company's time by Order in Council, their action is not fair and honest to foreign capitalists. This scheme has always been ventilated on the floor of Parliament, and hon. members have had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on it, and it is well that this has been the case, because it has tended to inform foreign investors of the position in which the company stands before Parliament. I am within bounds in stating that the last discussion in this House was the means of saving foreign capitalists very large sums of money. I have denounced, and I denounce now, this scheme and all such wild-cat schemes, such as the dead-meat scheme, and the Chignecto Railway, as being the means of doing great injury to this Dominion, for if foreign capitalists find such schemes have received the sanction of Parliament, and have been subsequently granted extensions of time and other privileges whereby to assist the companies in carrying on their schemes, the credit of Canada must severely suffer. I oppose this scheme now in order that my action throughout may be consistent. I repeat that I have always opposed it, that I oppose it still, and that this Parliament would do well to express its opinion on the matter, because if it does so, no doubt private foreign capital will save money as well as the taxpayers of the country, if the work should be completed, to the extent of $3,000,000.

I say that now.

When this subject was brought before the House last year, with a view to grant the company an extension of time, the Minister of Finance delivered a long speech, in which he embodied many statistics connected with the railway, including the quantity of mud and rock removed and grading done, statistics handed him, no doubt, by the engineer of the road. I have little faith in the engineer's reports.

Then I go on to give an illustration respecting engineers. They are always sworn never to say anything that will prevent giving employment to an engineer. Then the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) comes in. He was at that time simply the member for Cumberland, and I really believe that he was the acting solicitor of the company.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WELSH. Yes, I make that statement. There was another hon. gentleman in this House, then, as member for Westmoreland. He is now a senator. This railroad runs across between Cumberland and Westmoreland. The hon. Minister of Justice took a hand in this debate at that time:

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that either of the hon. members for Queen's, P.E.I., have added anything to what they have already said in this House with reference to the Chignecto Ship Railway. But I think they would have done themselves more credit, if I may use the expression, if they had not taken this particular time to say what they have said.

Mr. WELSH.

If he had applied that advice to himself he would have done well. It would have been much better for himself and would have saved his own constituency. I have great regard for the hon. member, and I think this was one of the most inconsistent actions of his life. Then he goes on to say :

I understood the hon. member to express great fears that our endorsement of this work would result in a loss of credit, and would, therefore, render it difficult for us to raise capital again when we needed it.

Well, Sir, if any thing could render it impossible for Canadians to get money on the English markets, it would be that the great Dominion of Canada should undertake to plead the statute of limitations. The Dominion of Canada has made a grant in aid of this work; the time within which the work was to be completed was limited to a certain period; men go on and subscribe capital, and put three millions of dollars and a third in hard cash into the work.

He goes on with a lot more. Then the hon. gentleman, I think, imputes some sinister motives to my action in the matter. He says again :

I cannot understand what the other hon. member's (Mr. Welsh's) objection to this railway is, whether that it will not carry ships or that it will not pay. I think an old sailor is something like an old lawyer—

God forbid, I say now.

—very conservative, and finds it difficult to get out of the old ruts. The hon. gentleman has been sailing wooden vessels all over the world, and he has come to the conclusion that a steamer cannot do useful work over this railway.

Sir, I owned steamers before that hon. gentleman was born, and I own steamers now, and I am more interested in steamers than I am in anything else afloat. So the hon. gentleman made a blunder there.

The hon. gentleman has been so long away from the practical work on the sea that I am afraid I must take the judgment of others in this matter. The people who put their money into the work were not as visionary or as foolish as the hon. member imagines.

I guess they will find that out.

He will excuse me saying that I think his judgment in this matter is biased by his political feeling.

Mr. WELSH. No.

Mr. DICKEY. The people who invested their money in this work did so on the advice of thoroughly competent men—

I say that I have never seen them yet, not one of them.

—who investigated the scheme and satisfied themselves as to its feasibility; and if the hon. member for Queen's sets up his judgment against the engineers who pronounced this scheme to be feasible, I think the House must come to the conclusion that he is biased by political feeling or by something else.

Mr. WELSH. I do not doubt the feasibility of building this railroad, and I did not object to the statement of any of the engineers.

Then the present Minister of Justice goes on and gives us a long speech of about two pages; I will not weary the House by taking it up. I asked the hon. gentleman, at that time, when he imputed sinister motives to my action:

Is the hon. gentleman speaking as a member of Parliament, or as solicitor for the Chignecto Railway Company?

And the hon. gentleman never answered that question, he never told us whether he was speaking as member for Cumberland, or as solicitor for this Chignecto Railway Company. I hope he has thrown it off his back by this time. Now, Mr. Speaker, I take up the words of the Finance Minister, eighteen months ago. When replying to a deputation from this company, he said this matter would be taken up and carefully considered by Parliament, that they were the trustees of the people's money. Now, there is not an hon. gentleman in this House but will acknowledge that we are legally clear of all claims. They failed in every contract they entered into with the Government. The company, time and again, were before this Parliament for extension of time, we have given them all they asked for. On the last occasion we gave them two years' extension of time, they paying $5,000 a month for every month they were short in completing the work, and the Government even forgave them that penalty. Now, fourteen years after the charter was given they come before Parliament and ask us to pass a Bill which I believe is the thin edge of the wedge to get hold of the $170,000 a year for twenty years. I think we have no right to pass this Bill, or to consider it, until we know what action the Government is going to take in this matter, whether the Government propose to regrant them all the privileges and subsidies that we gave them fourteen years ago. I say that even if this railway was completed to-morrow it would stand a monument of parliamentary folly as long as there is a rail on the road, and as a monument of the folly of those who advocated it. Now, as to any moral obligation. Mr. Provand, the chairman of this company, had several interviews with me. I said there might have been some moral obligation, and I said: "Do you tell me you have got a million and a half of money ready to complete this work?" "Yes," he says, "we have." "Well," I said, "I would advise you to keep that million and a half pretty sure, because as sure as you put that in, you will have to get another million and a half, and then you will lose it all." Then I advised him to apply to the Government on the ground of moral obligation. I tell every hon. gentleman in this House that it behooves him to look out, for if this matter is carried through, as I have no doubt it is the intention of the company, it will cost this country five millions of money. And for what purpose? Suppose it had been built fourteen years ago. There was then, I suppose, five wooden ships to one now sailing in the gulf. I have never yet heard a ship-owner acknowledge that if this railway was built to-morrow, and he had a hundred ships, he would never allow one of them to go on it. I know that I have had ships in England, Scotland, and in almost every port of Great Britain, and it was an anxious time with me when I wanted to get a ship taken out of the water, even on a slip of 150 feet. In nine cases out of ten where a ship is taken out of the water and put on the docks, she is strained and injured. The Secretary of State, in his speech, gave a vivid description of the great works on the London docks, where they have hydraulic locks and lifts and other apparatus for lifting a ship up and down. But the hon. gentleman forgets that lifting a ship up and down is not carrying it over the land; and the hon. gentleman also forgets that the navigation of that time on the Bay of Fundy is out of date now. But the most difficult navigation on the coast is at the head of the Bay of Fundy. The tide, in some parts of the Bay of Fundy rises over 50 feet. There is only one place in the world where there is a greater variation of tide, and that is at Chepstowe, on the Bristol Channel, near Gloucester, the rise and fall of the tide being over 70 feet.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman speaks of the rise and fall in the Bay of Fundy. At what point does he speak of?

Mr. WELSH. Sixty feet in the Basin of Minas? Am I correct?

Mr. DICKEY. Not so far as Chignecto.

Mr. WELSH. No, I said in the Basin of Minas. This House has now before it a serious matter, for this work, if carried out, will cost the taxpayers of the Dominion $5,000,000. If any one will challenge this statement, I will prove in black and white; and, if there is any moral obligation resting on the Government, they had better buy out that moral obligation, and not permit an everlasting exhibition of our folly to be seen in this ship railway. I hope hon. members will seriously consider this subject. I have no political feeling whatever in regard to it, my whole desire being to further the interests of the taxpayers. We are not so flush of money that we can afford to see public funds spent, except on projects for the benefit of the people of this Dominion.

Mr. POWELL. Is it not a fact, that insurance rates are less in the Bay of Fundy than in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

Mr. WELSH. That has been gone over by the hon. gentleman's predecessor, Mr. Wood, now Senator Wood.

Mr. POWELL. I was not aware of it.

Mr. WELSH. But I will reply, in the words of the Minister of Justice: What part of the Bay of Fundy does he refer to? I have paid insurance rates for vessels laying at the point where the Chignecto Railway is supposed to start, at Tignish—I have had hundreds of vessels insured there at 12s. 6d. per cent, and in some parts of the Bay of Fundy I could get the same rate. But you cannot get insurance done as low in the Bay of Fundy in the summer time as in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. POWELL. Did you ever see a policy—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. We are not in Committee of the whole House, and there cannot be a series of questions exchanged between hon. members.

Mr. WELSH. If the hon. gentleman wants any information about insurance rates, I can give him satisfaction on that point. I have done some business in the Bay of Fundy, not much, but I have done a large business in the gulf, and for sixty years I have been in active shipping life in this Dominion. I take great interest in the shipping business. I desire to read an extract from a speech delivered by an ex-Minister of Marine (Mr. Mitchell), who possessed a great knowledge of shipping. In 1888 he spoke as follows:—

Well, six years ago, and seven years ago application was made, if I recollect aright. He states that a young gentleman who has devoted six years of his life to the prosecution of this enterprise, invested a large amount of money in it. Now, Sir, that gentleman to whom he refers may have invested a great deal of money in it, but so far as I can learn there is no work done. Where the money has been invested I do not know. That is the second proposition the hon. gentleman has made. The third proposition is the great advantage it would be to the trade and commerce of Montreal and Quebec and the gulf ports, connected with the trade of St. John. Now, Sir, I ask: What would be the trade suppose you had a canal built to-morrow over that route—much less a ship canal? Does my hon. friend pretend to tell me that he has submitted to this House any statistics upon which he could base the continuation of the insane act? because I say it is nothing more than a piece of folly, first, to have subsidized such a thing as that Chignecto Ship Railway, and next to continue it from year to year upon the statute-book, encouraging the belief—not that such a thing is not possible, because it is possible—but that such a railway, if built, would inure to the benefit of the country, or in any way benefit the trade and navigation of Canada. Sir, my hon. friend speaks of the shortening of the distance of 600 miles between Montreal and the port of St. John. What trade is there between the two? By the railway which we have subsidized from Montreal down to the harbour of St. John, you can carry, in less than twenty hours, freight and passengers. Does any man believe that in face of the low railway carriage at this day, people will ship goods down the

Mr. WELSH.

St. Lawrence, ship them an eight or ten days' voyage down to the point where a vessel will take them on, and then take them over a railway down into the waters of the Bay of Fundy, and thence down the St. Lawrence? Why, Sir, there is no business between the two ports to start with, and my hon. friend has not submitted any statistics to show that there is any business to warrant such an expenditure as this. In the next place it is apparent to every one conversant with the current of trade in this country, that railways are taking away trade from the ships, that shipments by railway are taking the place of shipments by water in large quantities by vessels. My hon. friend speaks of 600 vessels visiting the Gulf of the St. Lawrence. Whose were they? Were they vessels of Canada? No, Sir. If 600 vessels last year, or the year before, visited the Gulf of St. Lawrence, they were the vessels of the United States, they were the fishing vessels for which we have sacrificed so much by the Bill we have already passed in this House, they were the vessels of a foreign nation from whom we are seeking justice, but have not got it as yet, they are the vessels of a country from which we are excluded from reciprocity in the natural productions of Canada. Are we going to expend $170,000 a year for that purpose? And if we did so, would any of these 600 vessels go over that railway? Why, Sir, there is not a particle of evidence submitted by the hon. gentleman to show that if the railway were built to-morrow, these fishing vessels—and they are the only ones that go there, comparatively speaking—there is not a tittle of evidence to show that they would go over that railway, even if it were built. I have been engaged in the trade of that country in shipping, and in business, for many years, and my hon. friend has not; and I may tell him now that if that railway were built to-morrow, it would not pay the grease to oil the wheels that run over it, and it is an expenditure of public money which this country is not warranted in making. Sir, my hon. friend has brought forward another argument to induce this House to adopt this scheme, he says it is to be built with British money. Is it possible that my hon. friend, occupying the prominent position he does as the representative of this country in England, speaking with the authority which that gives him, is going to give currency to an idea that if English money is going to be invested in this enterprise it can be invested profitably and with satisfaction to the men who furnish the money? Sir, does my hon. friend himself believe that this railway will ever pay a dollar? He has not told this House that he does. I tell this House that I would regret to see any investments secured under false pretenses, brought into Canada to discredit Canada by putting them into a scheme which must be an utter failure, and an utter ruin to the men who furnish the money. The hon. gentleman says this country was pledged to this scheme six years ago. What are the facts? Seven years ago a scheme was propounded for building a canal. Subsequently this scheme comes up for building a ship canal, and a charter is granted. He says the House is pledged to it. Who pledged the House to it? The influence of my hon. friend pledged the House to that scheme.

This is a quotation from a speech delivered by the Hon. Mr. Mitchell, formerly Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I think, Sir, I have wearied the House long enough for the present, and I will leave the matter in the hands of hon. gentlemen.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I agree with one remark that has fallen from the hon. member (Mr. Welsh), and that remark was that this was a very important question. I do not intend to weary the House with this oft-told tale further than is necessary, but as briefly as possible, to place the position of this question, as I understand it, before the House. In 1870, the Government of Canada appointed a royal commission to travel through the country, to take sworn testimony, and to form the best and most intelligent judgment that they could as to the canal expenditure that the Government ought to undertake. That commission was composed of the most eminent men that the country could produce. Sir Hugh Allan, a gentleman of great enterprise and of very high standing in connection with everything regarding navigation and the commerce of the country, was the president. Other gentlemen occupying very high positions in the commercial world, and eminent engineers, were appointed on that commission. They travelled through the country where canal expenditure was the subject of important consideration. They took the sworn testimony of the highest and best authorities, commercial men, sea captains, persons connected with navigation, and persons connected with trade, and they made their report. They divided their recommendations in that report into two classes. First, they put in No. 1 class the works that in their judgment the interests of Canada required should be undertaken so soon as the means could be provided to accomplish them, and in that category they placed a canal to connect the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence with the waters of the Bay of Fundy. The Government adopted that report, Parliament adopted that report, and after surveys and examinations and estimates had been made, we had before us the opinions of eminent engineers that the construction of such a canal as was recommended would cost something over $5,000,000. Parliament adopted that report, and it voted $1,000,000 towards the commencement of the work, after giving the subject careful consideration. This scheme then had the imprimatur of Parliament. The Government went out of office shortly afterwards, in 1873—as I dare say some hon. gentlemen in this House may remember—and the duty of taking up this question devolved upon their successors in office. The Government of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie took this matter up, and they put a large sum of money in the Estimates for the purpose of promptly proceeding with the construction of this canal, at a time when it was estimated to cost something over $5,000,000. Further examination and investigation in connection with the work led the Government of Mr. Mackenzie to doubt the accuracy of the estimated cost of that canal. The subject was referred to Mr. Page, a very eminent engineer, and the result of his investigation was that, in his judgment, the amount required for the construction of that canal would be nearer $9,000,000 than $5,000,000. Under those circumstances, that Administration submitted to Parliament the question: as to whether although an expenditure of over $5,000,000 would be justified, the work was one that ought to be proceeded with when there was reason to believe that the cost would be nearer $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 than $5,000,000. Under these circumstances, there was, I believe, no person in the House who pressed the Government at that time to proceed with the work at so great a cost as was estimated by Mr. Page.

Now, a gentleman who is well known as an engineer of very considerable ability, took this subject up, and he came to the Government with the proposal to substitute the somewhat novel undertaking of a ship railway instead of the canal. The increased cost connected with the canal arose from its having been discovered that there was a much larger amount of rock to be encountered than was originally supposed. Mr. Ketchum, the engineer who brought this subject under the consideration of the Government, submitted a proposal to construct a ship railway instead of a canal. If the ship railway were practicable, he showed that it would be of more value than a canal, because it would open earlier in the spring, and close later in the autumn than a canal would, and that therefore the commercial objects to be attained would be attained to a greater extent by a ship railway than by a canal. The Government of that day met the proposal of Mr. Ketchum with the statement that although it was known that ships could be raised by hydraulic power, and although it was known that they could be carried on a railway for a certain distance; yet there was no place in the world where ships were carried for so great a distance as that proposed, between the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy. And we said: that under these circumstances, the Government would not embark any capital, and they would not be responsible for the payment of any public money whatever for this work; unless upon the proposal that the capitalists undertaking it should be obliged to demonstrate the absolute success of the scheme before they should be in a position to claim any money. The contract, therefore, in this instance, differs from almost all other contracts of a public character in this respect, that not a dollar was to be taken from the public treasury of Canada until the parties engaged in this enterprise found all the capital that was necessary to construct and complete the works, and put them in successful operation. And more, the contract provided that if at any time they failed to operate the ship railway successfully, these subsidies should cease. The House will at once see that it would be an extremely difficult matter to raise capital under these circumstances, because so many considerations were involved which might prevent the realization of capitalists, that they would be extremely careful in entering upon such a work. When this matter was submitted to the House by myself, on that occasion—and the matter was fully, and fairly, and clearly stated to the House—hon. gentlemen on both sides arrived at the conclusion that, if for a subsidy of $150,000 for twenty-five years (or as it was subsequently changed by an Act of this Parliament, to $170,000 for twenty years); if for that sum of money a work of equal value could be had to that which had been adopted by both parties in the House without any division whatever; then we would be warranted in undertaking it. $170,000 a year for twenty years would involve an expenditure, if capitalized at 4 per cent, of about $2,343,000. That is to say, Canada was to obtain a work of equal value to the canal which had received the approval of Parliament and of both governments, for less than one-half of the money which Parliament had originally agreed, in view of all the facts, to expend upon it. Now, Sir, I do not intend for a single moment to enter into a discussion, at this hour of the day, as to whether the Royal Commission, in the first instance, had gathered the correct trend of public sentiment on the subject, or as to whether they were right in the conclusion at which they arrived, that the Government of Canada would be warranted in an expenditure of $5,000,000 for the accomplishment of this work; because that is all beside the question. After this House had on several occasions, without division, adopted the policy of making this expenditure, and a solemn binding contract had been made with British capitalists for the accomplishment of the work, all that discussion ceased to be relevant. Although, in the light of all the information and experience I have been able to obtain in connection with this work, I believe as confidently to-day as I did at the time the measure was first submitted to Parliament, that the expenditure of $5,000,000, which was originally proposed for the canal, and much more the lesser expenditure of one-half that amount for accomplishing the work, was a wise and judicious expenditure, yet, assuming that I am altogether wrong in that, I say that in my judgment it does not touch the question. This work, having been thus commended to British capitalists, not by myself, but by the authority of a Royal Commission who had investigated it, and on sworn testimony the most full and able and complete that they could command, and British capitalists having been found to undertake the work, I say that if they have carried on their operations in good faith, they are entitled to all the support that is required from hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House to implement that contract, thus fairly and honestly made. Now, Sir, I would just draw the attention of the House for a single moment to the fact that after this contract was made, the responsibility for that work not having been in operation long ago rests upon this House, and not upon these contractors. When they were in a position to put their bonds on the money market for the purpose of obtaining capital, they found—and I invite the attention of every hon. gentleman to this as a most important point—that by an amendment to the general Railway Act, passed by this House after the contract had been made with them, and before they were able to put their scheme on the money market in London, they were prevented from obtaining the capital. That was a provision passed in 1888, which had not been noticed as having any bearing on this project, but which prevented the bonds for a public work being put on the market until a certain amount of expenditure had been made. But for that all the money they required for the completion of this work would have been promptly obtained in London, and the work would have been completed long ago. I say that is a circumstance which I am sure every hon. gentleman in this House, looking at this contract between capitalists and the Government of Canada, will regard as having great weight.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Did not the company in a few months obtain the requisite portion of capital, and then issue their bonds?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, the fact is as I have stated. When they were in a position to put their bonds on the market, they put a portion of their bonds on the market above par; and when they would have obtained the whole of the money, they were precluded from doing so by this unfortunate amendment of the law. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen further to the fact that the House came to the conclusion that was an unwise amendment of the law, and it has since been repealed. But, in the meantime, before the debentures of the work could be placed upon the market, a financial collapse occurred, which I have no hesitation in saying was unprecedented in the history of the world. In my judgment there never was a house that occupied the position of the Barings in London; and, as hon. gentlemen know, that house unfortunately in the meantime came to grief, which caused a disturbance to the money market that has lasted to a greater or less extent down to the present hour. I do not myself believe that there will ever be a financial house in London occupying the same position that was occupied by Baring Bros. at that time. The consequences of that failure were of the most disastrous and widespread character. They were of such a character as to bring down the contractor who had contracted with the company for the construction of this work—a man of great wealth, but one whose means were largely invested in the Argentine Republic, which was especially affected by the failure of Baring Bros. Under these circumstances, what has happened? These gentlemen have expended in good faith—and I am quite certain that there is no member of this House who will not regard that as establishing a strong moral claim, irrespective of the merits of this case—some £700,000 sterling, equal to some $3,500,000, in the prosecution of this work; and about $1,500,000 more is required in order to complete it. Now, not to weary the House, but to put this matter in a nutshell, where every hon. member of this House will at once see, I think, that we have a clear and obvious duty before us, these gentlemen came to the Government for an extension of time. In the first instance, an extension of time was granted; but they were still unable, owing to the great disturbance in the financial market in London, to obtain the money; and in 1892 they came before the Government of Canada and pressed for a further extension of time, in order to enable them to obtain the means to complete this work and get some return for the vast amount of capital they had expended. The Government, very properly in my judgment, said to them: "You are not in a position to ask for an extension of time, because you are not able to show the Government that if you got that extension of time, you could obtain the means to complete this work; and therefore application for these indefinite extensions of time, without a guarantee that they will result in the accomplishment of the work, cannot be entertained." But the Government pledged itself, as hon. gentlemen will see, that when they were able to obtain the capital required to complete this work, it would ask Parliament to extend the time in order to enable them to do it. That is the position to-day. Mr. Provand, to whom the hon. member has referred, and who had visited this country, for the purpose of pressing the Government on this subject, returned to London, and the result was, that the parties who had furnished this £700,000 sterling, were so deeply committed, that the company were enabled to induce them to take up the project and to furnish the necessary amount of capital. I saw some of the most eminent bankers in London, and they told me that they had a large amount of these bonds, upon which loans had been made, and on which they stood to lose the money unless the work was completed; and one eminent banking house said: We are prepared, under these circumstances, to subscribe £50,000 more for the purpose of completing this undertaking. Now, this £700,000 sterling is represented by securities in the vaults of large banking houses in the city of London, who are deeply interested in the completion of this work. I do not mention it as an additional inducement, but every member of this House, I am sure, will see, that, when the Minister of Finance goes to London to raise a loan, these are the parties to whom those interested in the matter go for the purpose of furnishing money for the Government of Canada; and I need not say to the House the disaster it would be to the Dominion, if it was felt that parties acting in good faith, supplying their capital, as this capital has been supplied, in good faith, and expending such a large amount of money in order to carry out a public contract with the Government of Canada, were not in a position to obtain from the Government and Parliament of this country every fair, honourable and just consideration. I believe there is not a member of this House who will not say that a more fatal blow could not be struck at—I do not say the Government of Canada, because its credit, its standing, is so extremely high that it would be very difficult to interfere with the floating of a loan—but at any commercial enterprise, however sound, however valuable in the best interests of the country, than to create the impression, that an enterprise in which British capital has been furnished to carry out a contract in good faith, and meeting the difficulties that this enterprise has met with, difficulties of an altogether unprecedented character, as is entirely within my own knowledge—cannot come back to the Government and the Parliament of this country with perfect confidence that they will be met in a fair, straightforward, honourable and business manner. Under these circumstances, I am sure I need not detain the House more than to say, that I do trust there will be no difference of opinion in this House on a question of this kind, and that, what I regard as the good faith and credit of the Government and Parliament of Canada will be maintained. If this extension of time be granted by the House, I have every reason to know that the capital has not been only provided, but that the Messrs. Pearson & Sons, the most eminent, or as eminent contractors as are to be found in the United Kingdom, have made a contract to complete, for the amount of money now obtained, these works and put them in thorough operation as promptly as possible. I do trust, that, under these circumstances, there will be no division of opinion in this House, and that on a question, to the principle of which both sides have been committed, in the first instance, by approving the construction of a canal which was to cost double the amount that this is to cost—that on a question of that kind and one which this Parliament has again and again unanimously endorsed, and an enterprise with regard to which a charter has been granted unanimously by this House, we should all be united. There has been a good deal of misconception with regard to this matter, and I trust that that misconception will be entirely removed by what I have submitted to this House. I will not detain the House further than to say, that I regard this as a very serious and important question in the best interests of Canada, and

I trust there will be no substantial division of opinion here upon the fact, that, whatever may be thought for or against the commercial value of this project, the position in which it stands is one that ought to, and, I trust, will, receive the approval of hon. gentlemen on both sides.

Mr. EDGAR. There is a point about this resolution I would like to have explained. After the speech of the hon. Secretary of State, I certainly admit that I do not understand the position of this legislation. We are now discussing a motion to read a second time a Bill introduced by a private member of this House, asking for the ordinary extension of time for the completion of a private enterprise. On this occasion the hon. Secretary of State said—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me just one moment. My hon. friend, I am quite sure, will admit, that I did not introduce the discussion of this question. The discussion arose on a motion by a private member to extend the time allowed this company for the completion of its contract, and the hon. gentleman undertook to challenge, as in opposition to what was asked with regard to this Bill, the wisdom of giving any further assistance by legislation or otherwise. This discussion was not invited by me, but I thought it was better at the outset, as the hon. gentleman had brought up the subject and treated it at length from that standpoint, that I should briefly state to the House the position in which I regard the question.

Mr. EDGAR. Another Bill was introduced by the same hon. member who has moved the second reading of this Bill to-day, respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, Limited; and in that first Bill the single clause was certainly very much more comprehensive than the language of the single clause in this measure. That first Bill, which was withdrawn, practically gave an extension of all the powers, franchises, rights and privileges conferred upon that company. It struck me at the time, that, if that Bill had passed, we would have committed Parliament—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear; the first Bill was an entire misapprehension.

Mr. EDGAR. The House would have been committed, by the passage of that first Bill, to the granting of this money.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so.

Mr. EDGAR. I understand that it is absolutely clear, that the money has been forfeited by the lapse of time, under the terms of the contract.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Legally.

Mr. EDGAR. Of course. Not illegally, I suppose. It is forfeited, and I understand, that, in order to incur that responsibility again on behalf of Canada, Parliament will require to revoke that subsidy to those concerned, in some shape or other.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so.

Mr. EDGAR. Very well; I certainly supposed that the only thing we were asked to do by this Bill was to give an extension of time for the completion of a public work by a private company in which they had already expended a considerable sum of money.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDGAR. And Parliament has never, so far as I know, refused to do that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDGAR. Therefore, I was surprised when the Secretary of State took this occasion to go on into the merits of the case, as he did. It seemed to me that after his speech, if we passed the second reading of this Bill, we would practically, unless we protested against it, be bound to make that grant. We have not discussed that question; it is not before us except in this indirect way, and I do not propose to discuss the merits of it at all on this motion, if it is distinctly and clearly understood by this House that this is only the extension of the right of that railway company to build that ship railway. If that is all, and that seems to be all by the terms of this Bill, I do not propose to discuss the merits. I infer from the announcement of the hon. Secretary of State that it is the policy of the Government to renew that.

Mr. MULOCK. To renew the charter?

Mr. EDGAR. No, to renew the grant.

Mr. MULOCK. He said so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That question is not before the House now.

Mr. EDGAR. Except as the Secretary of State introduces it by stating that the Government and the country were bound to supplement that legislation and argued the whole case. For my part I want to have it absolutely and distinctly understood that this House is in no sense or way committed to the policy of extending that grant. It may be right to do so or it may be wrong, but it is too important a question to have this House committed to it in any way by private legislation. If this Bill means anything of that kind, it must originate in a resolution of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so.

Mr. EDGAR. This is a private Bill, and I would suggest for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, whether, on that point, it is out of order or not. If there is anything in that Bill—as one would judge there was from the argument so far—that will involve the granting of public money, it is out of order. If you hold that it does not, then, of course, it is a piece of ordinary private legislation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If I may be allowed a moment's explanation—my hon. friend will see that if the reasoning of the hon. member who preceded me were to prevail, the House might be asked not to grant this Bill. But this Bill speaks for itself. It was introduced in the first place under an entire misapprehension. There was no intention to commit this House to anything more than is contained in the Bill itself. If the Bill is passed, the other matter remains sub judice, for the House to deal with when the Government bring down their policy on this question.

Mr. BAIRD. I have deep sympathy for the stockholders of the unfortunate company which has undertaken this work, and I know of no more tangible evidence of that sympathy that I can show, than to discourage, as far as I can, further legislation or further expenditure of money and further loss that must be involved by this work. Whatever may have been the redeeming features of this work at the time of its inception or prior to 1882, whatever may have been the inducements to enter upon the enterprise then, to my mind they have been completely swept away by the wonderful changes that have taken place in the ways of ocean traffic since that day. Whatever may have been the views of the gentlemen who made the surveys and reports of which the hon. Secretary of State has spoken, whatever may have been the wisdom of that day is the folly of to-day, the transportation of ocean freight has been so completely changed. At the present time there is absolutely no traffic between the ports of the Bay of Fundy and the ports of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the River St. Lawrence. As a person engaged in the coastwise and carrying trade of Canada, I can say truthfully that for the past five years I have not had any proposal to charter, or any offer of freight of any kind between any of the ports of the Bay of Fundy and those of the St. Lawrence. The only trade that is left from the waters of the St. Lawrence would be that to the ports of the United States. And, Sir, I would call him an unwise mariner who, with his vessel loaded, if this marine railway were in actual operation, would cradle his ship, transport her across the isthmus and place her in the waters of the Bay of Fundy, where he would have to thread his course through currents and counter currents, by head winds and fair winds, sometimes in dense fogs, and beat his way from the Bay of Fundy and follow the coast to the ports of the United States whither the cargoes of lumber are sent,—when he has an open highway down through the Northumberland Straits, out of the Gut of Canso, and into the Atlantic Ocean, where he can give the coast of Nova Scotia a wide berth, and get plenty of sea room, and with a few tacks he finds himself in open sea, ready to make his destination. Now, I am speaking of the summer months; as regards the winter months, I need not consider the Gulf of St. Lawrence at all. The Gulf of St. Lawrence is a prohibited water in every insurance policy that I know about that is issued in the commercial world. Every policy prohibits entrance into those waters from the first of November until the 10th May, and some of them, from first of October until the 10th May. In the Bay of Fundy you are prohibited by floating ice, so that in the winter months we have not to consider that. Well, Sir, this company have evidently met their fate, by the pure course of circumstances, by meeting changes in commercial enterprise. Changes have taken place that have completely revolutionized the business. This business was once great and profitable. In 1882, for instance, we were in the very zenith of our greatness as a maritime people. Canada, I think, was fourth in the world in commercial importance, and St. John was the fifth city in the registration of her merchant marine. That has entirely changed. The trade has been completely revolutionized, and almost swept away from us. The change has been very slow and simple, but it has wrought great differences in ocean transportation. But the greatest change has taken place in prices, or the rates of freights that we have had to deal with. Any hon. gentlemen who are acquainted with shipping, and can recollect the prosperous days of 1882, and can also recollect the change that took place from 1884 to 1888, will realize the wonderful depression that then existed. Many men who owned ships, and went through that day of depression, appeared to have entirely forgotten it, when another great change came on from 1888 to 1891, which may be called the day of greatest prosperity that we ever had in marine enterprise; and men were drawn from their bearings; lured by the prospect of gain, they forgot the adversity of the period between 1884 and 1888, and invested all the earnings they had made between 1888 and 1891, invested all their credit, mortgaged their future, to be able to carry on the trade that was then so profitable to them. But as quickly as the change came on in 1888, from adversity to prosperity, so quickly did the change come in 1891 from prosperity to adversity, and down through the range of prices, freights have fallen 25, 50, I will even say, 75 per cent. I think shipowners will agree with me in saying that in that day of prosperity we received as high as $27 a thousand on lumber from Canadian ports to ports in Brazil and the Argentine Republic, but at present, and during the past year, we have been glad to get $6.50, as compared with $27, four years ago. Now, this is a revolution that we could not guard against, and many of our best men who had invested, could not stem the tide. They saw the fortunes of earlier days swept away, and everything engulfed in the vortex of financial ruin. There was no way they could guard against it, and I say to this company that there is no way they can guard against the changes that have come over them. They are not to be laughed at; their misfortunes are the same as the misfortunes of others. There are financial wrecks as well as marine wrecks to be found on every shore. They need our sympathy. But from all I can gather, from all the information I can obtain in the few years that I have been engaged in commercial enterprises, I can see no future for the company, no hope of prosperity, no way that they can make up their lost ground. I feel that it is a matter of kindness to them to speak frankly, and I feel deeply in earnest when I urge them to abandon the scheme. As to the Parliament of Canada, well, I would ask them to be deeply in earnest when dealing with the people's millions in works of this kind that are of a doubtful character. They should guard, with jealous care, Canadian institutions when money is sought to be loaned upon them in the markets of the world. We have had some sad memorials of undertakings of this kind in the maritime provinces, and I suppose in the other provinces of Canada, when money was obtained on public credit. Credit of this kind is very sensitive as to how it is handled, and if once abused, the effect is apt to react upon others who go into the markets of the world with bona fide and meritorious schemes. From this standpoint, I would strongly urge upon the Government carefully to consider whether any more money, in future, or even on this occasion, is to be invested in this scheme. I say this in all earnestness. I know it is a disagreeable thing; I know it is an unpopular thing. But I do not propose to say it in a disagreeable way; I say it as a matter of advice, and I say it advisedly, from the best information I can gather. Sir, in conclusion, I must say that if we would honour our own judgment, if we would save the country from further expenditure and loss, if we would discourage the completion of the works that can never be profitable, if we would be kind to the company, in any sense or in any form, we would refuse further legislation upon this subject.

Mr. WELDON. The measure before the House can certainly not be objected to if it be in no way connected with the suggestion thrown out, as I gathered, by the hon. Secretary of State, that this private Bill might, during this session, be followed by a Government Bill asking for a vote of money. The simple request of this company that their franchises may be extended so that they may have an opportunity to go to the money markets of the world and raise money to complete their works, seems to be most reasonable. If, however, it is a case simply of the camel poking his nose into the tent, it is a question that we should argue now, on its merits. I will ask the leader of the House if he will be good enough to make a statement on that point; because, for my part, I can offer no opposition to the Bill in case we have the assurance of the leader of the House that it is not proposed, during the session, to ask for a grant of public money for this company.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman an assurance that the Government will not submit for the consideration of the House a measure implementing the Bill which has been brought down.

Mr. WELDON. On the assumption that we will be asked to vote public money to this company, I share very heartily the view of my hon. friend from Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird.) I may say that that hon. gentleman is one whose words in all matters of this kind will carry great weight in the province of New Brunswick. He is one of a number of managers of fleets of vessels who has had singular success, and who is understood by those who know him well, to speak only of those things that he knows well, to speak of things that he knows about. I represent a county, Mr. Speaker, which lies, as this atlas shows, but a very few miles west of the Bay of Fundy terminus of the Chignecto Ship Railway, and it ought, therefore, to be true that men in my own county engaged in the shipping interests, would have some knowledge of any possible advantage that this work was likely to afford. I must take the responsibility here and now of making this sober statement, that during these ten years that I have had a seat in this Parliament, during all of which this work has been more or less discussed in Albert county, I have talked with the managers of two or three of the largest fleets controlled in that county, and I have talked with a considerable number of masters and men engaged in shipping, and I have not yet met a single man in Albert county who has ever spoken even respectfully of the commercial prospects of this enterprise. It is only fair, I think, to the men who, having lost three millions and a half of good money, to say this, and as my hon. friend has just said, to warn them, that if they spend further money, they are throwing good money after bad. So much for the measure, with respect to its effect on the company. I think, as does my hon. friend from Queen's, that this Bill, if it is to carry with it a further grant of public money, should be killed. Now, as to the effect on the country. It was stated by the Secretary of State that it would be immoral, having regard to the past course of this Parliament in granting an extension of time in similar cases—that it would here and now be immoral, that it would practically be an act of repudiation, that it would be something closely related to a breach of faith, if we were not now again, in 1896, practically to renew the subsidies. I cannot agree with that view. Fourteen years ago we began to legislate on this matter ; we have made two or three amendments to our law, we have given an extension of time. We have made in another statute, and in another year an alteration of the terms, by changing a twenty-five years' subsidy into a twenty years' subsidy of a larger amount. We must all agree that the time limit to these contracts has some significance. There must come a time, after repeated renewals and extensions, alterations and relaxation of terms, when the Finance Minister can say that these old obligations which have been binding upon the country can now be wiped off the slate. There must come a time when the Finance Minister comes forward to make a financial statement, and is desirous of entering into new undertakings and of pledging the faith of the Dominion to new ventures, that he may find himself prepared to state to Parliament that he is free to do so. Can he do so if after fifteen, twenty or twenty-five years there is some slumbering obligation, not a legal but a moral obligation, which may rise up and be fastened on the public treasury ? Can we afford to strike out of our public contracts, no matter how many years have elapsed, the time limit, which has a meaning and which was put there for a purpose ? I would be willing not to press this point in this case, if I did not share the view which has been presented by my hon. friend (Mr. Baird) that we would not be doing any good to anybody by revoting this subsidy. We will lead this country into a useless expenditure of $3,400,000, and do no real service to any honest man now living. I confess that after considering the matter fully, I consider there is no question of good or bad faith involved. In regard to the effect on Canadian credit, it must be remembered that we have two hundred millions odd borrowed in London, and if our credit were to be in the slightest degree affected by throwing out this Bill, or the Bill which will follow this, it would be a matter of business for us to consider whether we could afford to do so or not. Last year when a discussion seemed imminent, I obtained the best information it was possible for a Canadian member to acquire on this side of the Atlantic, the opinions of men eminent in banking and stock-broking, and from the best information I could obtain last summer, I came to the conclusion that Canadian credit would not in the slightest degree be affected. I make that statement for what it may be worth, but I am not free to strengthen it by giving the names of my informants. As to the effect on other Canadian enterprises, if we were to assent to this proposition it would simply mean that we would induce the people who have already lost $3,500,000 to lose another $1,500,000, and perhaps more ; and, looking to the future, we will strengthen Canadian credit, we will give a better chance to companies seeking to float loans in London for proper and what are likely to prove successful enterprises by declining to give any bonus to this company. I am thankful to say that I was not a member of this House when the subsidy was voted. I remember voting on one occasion for an extension of time, and I do not recall a vote with so much regret as that vote given some years ago, and I regret my silence on that occasion. If it was proper then that I should have spoken, it is much more incumbent upon me to do so to-day, and I declare that what I have said embodies statements that I have gathered from shipowners and captains of vessels. If this Bill is carried in spite of our protest—and I hope it will not be carried—I take it that if these subsidies are voted in the future, this House must be very vigilant in watching the terms of the contract and insisting upon alterations, so as to make it perfectly clear and certain what are the conditions of the contract which must be fulfilled before subsidies running over perhaps twenty years are due and payable. If we are overborne and this Bill goes through the House, I ask hon. gentlemen on both sides to watch this Bill so that the provisions may be clearly defined, so that the company shall not receive $170,000 a year for twenty years without having during each of these twenty years shown itself to have performed a reasonable amount of work.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not share the hon. gentleman's objections to the Bill now before the House. As it was introduced by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) some time ago, it was open to the objection taken by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) ; but that objection has been entirely removed since the Bill was recast, and in so far as the Bill stands now on its own bottom, I do not think any objection can be fairly taken to it. We should not object to an extension of time for the completion of this work unless such an extension necessarily involves the assent of this Parliament to further aid being given to the work. I would not have risen to take part in the debate, being satisfied with the assent of the leader of the House to the statement of the hon. member for West Ontario, but I do not think the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) has fully and fairly stated the action of Parliament in respect to this great public work. The hon. gentleman has, in his usual forcible way, intimated that the credit of this Dominion has been pledged irretrievably to this undertaking, and that the application of the share and bondholders should be acceded to, if we were to act in an honourable manner. The leader of the House suggested that the measure brought in for pledging this country to the payment of the money named had never been challenged on the floor of Parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I did not say that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then, I did not understand the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said the proposition received unanimous assent on several occasions. I did not say it was not challenged.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I specially remember the matter, because since 1882, I have taken part in every debate that has occurred with respect to the extension of time and the granting of a subsidy to this company. I remember very well, in 1888, when the promoters asked for further aid, and when the whole subject was discussed, my hon. colleague from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh) expressed himself as strongly as a man could do against the practicability of the undertaking, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) followed in the same language, and I expressed myself very strongly against the measure, because I had done what the hon. member for Albert says he has done, applied to a great many practical men in my part of the Dominion and obtained the opinions of shipowners and others in the shipping business, and I failed to find one man who said he would venture to place his ship on the slip or thought this was a practicable or feasible scheme. We went further, and divided the House on the second reading of the Bill. The shareholders and bondholders who come before Parliament urging the moral obligation to renew the money grant state almost directly that no expression of opinion was given in the Parliament of Canada as against the feasibility of the scheme and rather by the expression of opinions uttered in favour of the work lured the public into investing their money. A pamphlet has been placed in the hands of hon. members, and I find, at page 13, the following:—

Not a syllable tending to discredit its future was heard until after the investors had spent nearly $3,500,000 on the enterprise, every dollar of which was laid out in Canada except the sums paid for hydraulic machinery and material which could not be obtained here.

Those who now make idle statements with the view of prejudicing the company are making a mistake, as they cannot harm it; but they may leave reckless and irresponsible persons to attempt to discredit their own people by imputations which, if true, could only show that the share and debenture holders had been too confiding, when they invested their money on the faith of statements of leading public men in Canada and on the acts of the Canadian Parliament.

I simply rose to say that so far as a very large section of the Canadian Parliament were concerned, in 1888, before these gentlemen, as I understand it, invested one dollar; before these share and debenture holders invested a dollar; the strongest expressions of opinion were given utterance to, by men whose position in the House entitled these expressions of opinion to weight, declaring that this scheme was a wild-cat scheme in which no Canadian had ventured to put a dollar. And we went further: and we challenged the opinion of this House on the question, and actually divided the House upon it. I do not mean to say, that that ought to be conclusive, but I state the fact in answer to the statement made in this pamphlet, to show that if these gentlemen did place their money in this scheme, they placed it with the full knowledge, that at any rate, a large proportion of the Canadian people thought the scheme to be a wild-cat scheme, and an impracticable one. I do not wish, for one, to commit myself absolutely to the proposition, that this money should not be voted. I think it is a matter for the very gravest possible consideration. The Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) has said, that in his opinion, the credit of Canada is somewhat at stake, and he thinks we ought to act in an honourable and fair way. I am quite sure the House will act in an honourable and fair way, and I think we are disposed to give every consideration to the question: Has, or has not, the credit of Canada been pledged to these people; not in a technical or legal sense alone, but substantially and morally. If these people who placed their money in this company, had reason to believe, that even if they were years and years beyond the time allotted to them, Canada was prepared at all hazards to give them the subventions which were contained in the original Act—

Mr. LISTER. That may be your view.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not express any view. I am guarding myself very carefully against expressing any view.

Mr. LISTER. It will be a robbery sanctioned by this Parliament.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am calling attention to the fact that the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) has made that statement, and I want to analyse it for a moment, to see where we stand. The hon. Secretary of State emphasized the statement, that the Parliament of Canada has passed an Act in 1888, preventing bonds or debentures from being issued until 20 per cent of the cost had been actually expended on the work, and that as a consequence of this action on the part of Parliament, these people were thrown into financial difficulties. Now, I do not think, from reading the pamphlet which the shareholders have submitted to the members here, that that statement can be accepted fully, as a correct statement of the reasons why they were unable to go on with the work. I will quote from the pamphlet at page 6, where they refer to this action of the Parliament of Canada, and I believe I can show, that this action of Parliament was not the sole and only reason for the difficulties of the company. The company say:

The capital issues of the company were to be £700,000 in debenture bonds and £300,000 in preference shares. Early in March, 1889, the company was ready to place these issues on the market when it was discovered that after the company's Act had been passed in the previous year, a General Railway Act had also been passed, and in section 93, subsection 4 of this Act, it says, after defining the extent of borrowing powers:— "But no bonds or debentures shall be issued until 20 per centum of the cost has been actually expended on the work." On this account the directors could only issue the £300,000 in preferred shares, which were subscribed for on the 20th March, 1889. They had then to wait until the bulk of this money was expended on the work and could not issue any debentures until the 22nd November following, say eight months after, and on account of the change which had meantime come over the money market they could only succeed in obtaining subscriptions for £250,000 out of a total of £700,000 authorized.

Now, according to their own showing, they were delayed for more than eight months in issuing a portion of the stock which they proposed to issue. They issued the preferred stock £300,000 in the first instance, and they had to show that 20 per cent of the cost had been spent upon the work, before they were able to issue the other portion of the £700,000 authorized. But, eight months after, they did float £250,000 of it, and they were unable to float the rest, not because of the action of this Parliament, but on account of the extraordinary depression of the financial market at home. Well, Sir, I shall content myself by keeping an open mind upon this subject, and if the Government take the responsibility of bringing down a proposition to this Parliament to involve this country in the expenditure of two and a half million dollars, or whatever the sum may be—

Mr. WELSH. Five million dollars.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman puts it at five million dollars, but I take it at the capitalized value.

Mr. FOSTER. Two and one-third millions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes. If the Government bring down a proposition, asking this House to involve this country in the payment of that money, I for one shall be prepared to give it every fair and reasonable consideration. There is one phase of the case, however, which we cannot deny. Whatever views may have been entertained years ago as to the feasibility of this scheme, those views are all dissipated now. We know that the scheme cannot be a paying one. We know that it is not a practical, nor feasible one from a business standpoint. We know that if it is constructed it will be a monument—as my hon. friend (Mr. Welsh) has said—of the folly of Parliament in voting the money; but nevertheless, if the honour and credit of this country have been pledged to the payment of this money, I think that this Parliament, notwithstanding that it may be an utter loss will vote it. But, Sir, I am not at all satisfied at present. I have read the pamphlet very carefully with a view of coming to an honest conclusion upon the subject, and I will be prepared to keep an open mind to vote upon the question when it comes down. I admit that there are strong reasons for holding, that the time limit should not be too strongly relied upon. There is no doubt upon that. But, this is a peculiar case. Time and again, they have come before this Parliament; time and again they have got extensions, and every time they have come, and every extension they have got. I have been one of those who have protested against voting the money, and against the contract being carried out at the expense of the country at all. However, under these circumstances, I will be prepared to hold myself open until the Government bring down their proposition.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, when the question was put by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) as to whether this motion involved any more than the renewal of the charter, and when the answer was given, that it did not, then perhaps the House might have allowed the discussion to cease, but for the fact that the member for Queen's (Mr. Baird) added more testimony as to the unwisdom of the scheme. Since then, however, we have had a statement by the leader of the House, which is in fact a notice that this renewal of the charter, is to be supplemented at a later date, by a submission of the Government to Parliament, for a renewal of the old subsidy. It is impossible, of course, at this moment, in a side way, to discuss the merits or otherwise of that proposition. But, inasmuch as we learn that capitalists, on the very slightest grounds, would seek to involve the public credit upon the utterances of a public man, or, upon what has been said, or hinted, or left unsaid; I for one now, at this stage in the debate, in assenting, if I do assent, to the second reading of the Bill, wish it to be understood that I do not in the slightest degree compromise myself, as to a grant of public money to this enterprise. I listened to the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) when he asserted to-day, that he had complete confidence in the wisdom of this scheme. Now, if the hon. gentleman was in the witness box, and obliged to testify as to the grounds of his confidence, I would like to know how his evidence would harmonize with the testimony of the member for Queen's (Mr. Baird), an experienced ship-owner, who has told us that the scheme must result in financial ruin. What is the basis of the advice given by the Secretary of State to Parliament: That this scheme is financially sound, or is a wise scheme. Well, Sir, that is an illustration of the recklessness with which assurances are given to Parliament, leading up to the expenditure of public money. Now, Sir, the Secretary of State said, as an argument in favour of this proposition, that the Parliament of Canada had intercepted the manoeuvres of this company in 1888, by passing an Act rendering it impossible for them to sell bonds and carry on the enterprise. I have turned up the statute incorporating the company, and I find that it was passed in 1882. I find that it required the company to go into operation and begin its work within three years, and to complete its work within seven years. It was obliged therefore, to begin the work in 1885, and to have it completed in 1889. It was an enterprise novel in its character. There was nothing on earth like it, or nothing in the waters under the earth like it, and it was to be completed in a year after the passage of the Act in question, which is said to have interrupted the enterprise financially. Is it credible, can anybody believe it, that the Act of 1888 prevented the company securing money to complete the enterprise, when the contract by Parliament required it to be completed within a year after the passage of that Act? Six years of the seven had run out before that Act had passed. The enterprise ought to have been begun within three years of 1882: and, if it had proceeded ratably in order of time, it ought to have been four-fifths completed when we passed the Act of 1888. But it was not until 1889, the year in which the law required the company to have the work completed, that they discovered that, in the previous year, Parliament had passed an Act preventing them floating any bonds without having put any money into the enterprise. So that the argument that the Act of 1888 was an obstacle in the way, has been removed from the debate by the statement of the company themselves. The hon. Secretary of State has told us, as an indirect argument to show the perils to the public, that the valueless bonds of this enterprise, so far as it has now progressed, are lying in the vaults of the Canadian bankers in London, and that they there confront the Finance Minister, whenever he goes to London to float any Canadian bonds.

Mr. FOSTER. You will not find many of them in the Canadian banks.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not say the Canadian banks. I said the bankers or financiers of the Canadian Government in London.

Mr. FOSTER. The Canadian Government has only one banker, that is, the Bank of Montreal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. member will allow me, I will explain what I said. I said, that the bonds were lying in the vaults of banks and other financial institutions, from which a Canadian Finance Minister would want support, when floating a loan in London.

Mr. MULOCK. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement as being, no doubt, correct; but I find no substantial difference between it and the inference I draw, that the existence of bonds of an enterprise such as this in London has a prejudicial effect when Canada is seeking to float her own bonds there. Is that not a reason why we should consider carefully how far we permit this company to increase the amount of profitless bonds in those London banks? If the testimony of the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird) is valuable, it means that we are going to allow this company to increase their bonds by 2,000,000 or 3,000,000, which, I suppose, will find their way into those banks in London, to the further prejudice of Canadian credit. The hon. Secretary of State is sanguine, and, I fear, has not learned caution with time. I have looked through the returns of the railways, laid on the Table of the House within the last few weeks; and I have in my hand at this moment—I do not know whether it is a complete list—the names of the defaulting railway companies up to the 30th of June last; and here I have a list representing millions of dollars of bonds, which are, no doubt, lying beside those Chignecto bonds in the vaults of the London banks. Here are twenty railways, practically insolvent, not earning working expenses, not earning a cent on debentures or a cent on stock—enterprises which from time to time have received the sanction of Parliament, the imprimatur of Parliament, and grants of money from Parliament, and on the strength of these have secured the moneys of unfortunate investors in England. The hon. Secretary of State will remember one among the many flowery speeches he delivered in Parliament, in regard to an enterprise something like this one. It is on record, and it will never disappear from the record. He was recommending the investment of public money in another enterprise down by the sea—the Caraquet Railway—and he told us that this railway, which connected with the Intercolonial Railway, would enable the people down by the sea to send their thousands and hundreds of thousands of quintals of fish to the west each year, and the people of the west each year to send their flour and manufactures to the east; and thus a grand interprovincial trade was to be developed. I find the name of that enterprise in this list of insolvent companies. The language in which the hon. Secretary of State to-day recommended this enterprise to the public was like a dull tale, compared with that with which he recommended us to grant public aid to the Caraquet Railway. We acted upon his proposal, with results most unfortunate to all concerned. Now, I submit, that the advice of the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird) ought to have weight with us. If the promoters themselves, having invested so many million dollars in the enterprise, and knowing the facts, say: We wish to follow up this enterprise and try to save our money by putting a little more into it, perhaps we cannot, as a Parliament, refuse them the permission to do so by renewing their charter. That is one thing. But, knowing all that I know to-day of this enterprise, if this company were now for the first time asking recognition at the hands of this Parliament so that they might be enabled, by means of a charter, to float the scheme and invite public and private money into it, I think it would be my duty to raise my voice and vote against the granting of such a charter, knowing that it must result in disaster both to private capital and public credit. But, if it is understood that this renewal is at the request of these unfortunate investors, who wish to be allowed, at their own risk, to increase the amount of their funds put at jeopardy, that is the extent to which Parliament should be compromised; nothing being done to give them any legal or moral right or claim to a grant of public money out of the Treasury of Canada. I view with alarm this proposition. It seems to me the inauguration of a new era of extravagance, a new era of wild-cat schemes. A Chignecto Railway is a fitting companion to a Hudson Bay Railway. We are told, that millions are to be poured out, that there is to be a great Subsidy Act introduced at the close of this Parliament, that the people of Canada are not spending as much as they can afford to spend, that we cannot be less economical, that we must go in for more large enterprises. Well, Sir, if this is a forerunner of such a policy, I deplore it. I, therefore, rise in protest against such utterances, suggestions, or halting assents given and withdrawn, compromising Parliament in the slightest degree at this moment. This is not the time to discuss every suggestion—for instance, a suggestion of the Secretary of State, that Parliament is under some moral obligation—that Parliament had done wrong and was obliged to make compensation for that wrong, and might, at a little later date, be called upon by this Government to remove it. All these observations are irrelevant to the subject under discussion. For instance, the suggestion of the Secretary of State that Parliament was under some moral obligation, that Parliament had done a wrong, and was pledged to make it good, and that Parliament might, at a later date, be called upon by this Government to renew this grant—all those observations, I submit, were irrelevant to the matter under discussion, and ought not to have been made, except as feelers to ascertain what the sense of the House and the country might be. But lest inferences might be drawn and the promoters might take steps, relying upon the utterances of to-day, I conclude by saying that I view this discussion with more than an open mind. My mind is pretty nearly made up, and it will be somewhat difficult to convince me that it is in the public interests to grant a farthing of public money to this enterprise.

Mr. EDGAR. I venture to suggest that as I was interrupted by the hon. Secretary of State, when putting my point of order, a word or two might be allowed me on the question. This Bill says that certain Acts, among others, the Act of 1892, are hereby revived, and are to be in force. That is a very broad expression. The Act of 1892 provides for the issue of some new bonds, and these bonds have been issued, according to the Minister of Finance, in reply to a question I put him the other day. These bonds are declared, by that Act of 1892, which is now revived, to be the first preferential claim, and charge upon, not only the docks, and so on, but the interests of the company in any subsidy in land or money, now or hereafter granted to it, or which the company may receive. In 1892 there was no default, and the company was entitled to receive, under certain conditions, this subsidy from the Government. We are reviving that Act by this legislation, and, as a matter of fact, the public Acts, the Act of 1886, for instance, granting the subsidy, are so interwoven with these private Acts that it is very hard to tell one from the other, and it is exceedingly hard to tell, in my judgment, the effect of this clause, even as it is drawn. The intention is declared by the mover of the Bill, and by the leader of the House, to be that it shall not be held to be a reviving of the lapsed grant. That being the case, I could reasonably expect the hon. leader of the House to consent to a proviso being put in the Bill in committee, which would render it clear that we do not, by this legislation, revive that grant.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no objection to that. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I beg permission of the House to make a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. This Bill has not been disposed of.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think that, with the consent of the House, I may make this statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it with reference to this Bill?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it can be done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am anxious to make a very brief statement to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is clearly out of order, with a question before the House just now not disposed of.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am aware of that. My application is informal, but when the House consents, I did not think there would be any objection.

Mr. SPEAKER. It would be violating all parliamentary rules, and we would get ourselves into interminable difficulties, if I were to consent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the question before the House may now be disposed of.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to address the House on this question.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. leader of the House has a statement to make, it might be done by moving the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. An adjournment of the House may be moved, but the discussion must be confined to the question before the House. The discussion must be relevant to the question before the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Secretary of State had better just realize that I have got the floor. I want to say, with regard to this question now before the House, that I wish to enter my solemn protest against countenancing, in any shape or form, the renewal of this charter, if it be understood that its renewal carries with it, in any shape or form a promise, implied or expressed, to renew the grant which this company has now forfeited. At the inception of this scheme, there was no expectation that it would take some fourteen years to complete the work. When the company got its charter, it was to complete the work in seven years. It came to this House, from time to time, for renewal and extension, and it is now fourteen years since the scheme was introduced and the company chartered. The enterprise was set upon all fours immediately before the election of 1883. The hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), in a very forcible and eloquent speech, presented to this House the advantages that would accrue to that particular section of country, and the shipping interests in the maritime provinces, by the construction of this work. In his speech to-day urging the renewal and reviving of the charter of this company, he intimated indirectly that the Government were disposed to renew the grant of $170,000 a year for twenty years. I was very much pleased to hear the protests honestly and conscientiously made by hon. gentlemen behind the hon. Secretary of State with regard to carrying out the construction of this work. I think that from those statements it is quite clear that if ever there was a period in our history when money flowed from our country like water down the streets, we might at such periods be warranted in making an investment in an undertaking of this kind. But any shipping conditions that existed in 1882 have been so completely altered that there is not a vestige left which would warrant this House in committing this country to a renewal of this charter, which will carry with it an expenditure of public money equal to $170,000 a year.

Mr. SPEAKER.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McMULLEN. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I was giving some reasons why, in my humble opinion, we ought to proceed very carefully and very slowly in reviving the charter of the Chignecto Ship Railway Company. If our action in this House is to be understood by the promoters of this scheme as any indication whatever of our intention to revive the grant that was made to them for the construction of the ship railway, we should hesitate to go a single step further. In my humble opinion, the country has already contributed altogether too much to schemes of that kind. I think the country already bears enough evidence on its surface of the folly of assisting undertakings such as the present. I notice from the history of this road that the Government have, by Orders in Council in past years, amended the grant or promise of a grant to this company. The original grant was of $150,000 a year for twenty-five years, and this the Government changed to $170,602 for twenty years. This would amount to about $3,500,000. The estimated cost of this ship railway is something in the neighbourhood of $5,000,000. A very considerable portion of that money has been spent already. If this House renewed the charter and revived the grant, the result would be that even though the present owners had to invest a considerable sum, say a million of money to complete it, it would be better for them than to have it an absolute and entire failure. If there were not two ships a year going across, so long as it was operated, so long as it was ready for the business that was offered, they would be entitled to get the $170,602 a year. The probabilities are that it might earn operating expenses. If it did that, the annual subsidy would pay nearly 4 per cent upon the bonds. Now, it would be better for the company, if they could get this House and the Government to revive the charter, to spend a considerable amount of money to get this grant rather than lose only what they have put in and get no annual grant. At the end of the twenty years they would, of course, be entitled to lift the iron and sell everything that was there and divide the company's resources amongst themselves. In that case the country would have contributed this very large amount of money for the grossest piece of folly, according to my humble opinion, that has ever been brought under the consideration of this House. As I stated before six o'clock, this scheme was first laid before Parliament in 1882, just before the elections of that year. Of course, it was a matter of considerable encouragement, and also a matter of very great temptation to the electors in the vicinity of the proposed work to have pointed out to them the prospect of the expenditure of about $5,000,000. I presume the hon. member for Cumberland at that time was very glad to be able to point out to the people of that constituency that by supporting the Government and maintaining it in power they would have this very large amount of money expended there. Now, we are on the eve of another election, and I suppose the Chignecto Marine Railway will be made to do duty again. That work is to be revived, a large amount of money expended there, and the people in many cases relieved of their financial embarrassments by having the opportunity of making money on this work. As I have said before, it is quite time that we should determine to put an absolute stop to any encouragement in the way of subsidy to this scheme. I have no objection to granting these men their charter, but I do object most strenuously to our giving any indication of the revival of the grant that was given before. The Secretary of State this afternoon, presenting the case on behalf of the Government and on behalf of this scheme, stated that when it was brought before the House in 1882 there was no opposition to the grant. I desire at this stage of the proceedings to enter my solemn protest against that grant ever being revived. There can be no possible moral responsibility, there can be no possible legal responsibility, because when the grant was made before it was made with the distinct understanding that the ship railway was to be completed in seven years. It was not so completed. The promoters came to this House and got a revival of their charter and a readjustment of their grant in 1885. The work was then to be completed in some four years. Again they failed. They came back again and got another extension of time to 1892, with a conditional extension to 1894 under a penalty of some $5,000 a month. And still, in the face of these extensions and with the penalty resting upon them, they failed again. Now, the Secretary of State said this afternoon that, owing to a change that was made in the Railway Act, the company had been hampered in floating their bonds. That was amended as soon as the attention of the House was called to it. It might possibly have caused a very short delay. But I contend that the fact that this scheme began with every prospect of success and with a Government bonus of over $170,000 fourteen years ago, and up to the present time has never been completed, shows great evidences of weakness and procrastination on the part of the promoters. If there ever was a time when any reasonable argument could have been given in favour of the construction of this work, it was at the time when the charter was granted. Since that time, as has been intimated by the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird), year after year the volume of shipping that would pass over this railway has been growing less and less, until now we find two men like the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Welsh), an experienced mariner for over fifty years, and the hon. member for Queen's, N.B., also a gentleman of great experience in these matters, expressing the same view as to the utter inutility and absolute folly of offering any further encouragement in any shape or form to the construction of this ship railway. Now, Sir, I think in face of those statements that the Government certainly should hesitate to offer the slightest inducement for a renewal of that subsidy. The charter, as I said before, I have no objection to give them; I have no objections to revive their charter for the purpose of enabling them to make the best use they can of the works they have, and in which they have spent a considerable amount of money. But I want to point out clearly and to warn the Government that they must not take the action of the Opposition in acquiescing in the revival of the charter, as any indication whatever that they admit any shadow of a moral responsibility to revive the annual grant. We do not do that, and the Government, in my humble opinion, will have very hard work. I am sure, in persuading the Opposition that it is a scheme that should get the slightest consideration in the matter of a grant. It is one of those things that unquestionably is no credit to us. The men that lent their assistance and their countenance to putting this scheme, in the first place, in such a position that its promoters could go to London and borrow money, certainly if they were men of sensitive conscience, would feel that they had been parties to a tempting offer being made to the London money-lenders to invest their money in what is no better than a sink hole without a bottom; because I am satisfied they never can possibly get anything out of it unless Parliament is fool enough to permit itself to be driven into a revival of the grant of $170,000 a year. Now, Sir, we have a few of these things scattered around this country that certainly will be monuments, after we are all gone, more particularly to the memory of the hon. Secretary of State than to any other man in this House, and that will unquestionably be a reflection upon the statesmanship, and the ability of the men who have administered the affairs of this country. We have the Chignecto Ship Railway Company for one, we have the Caraquet Railway for another, we have the St. Charles Branch, that has cost this country an enormous amount of money. I can well remember being in this House when the Secretary of State made his very full statement—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member had better confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am endeavouring, Mr. Speaker, with your permission, to point out the history of other schemes as compared with this scheme.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. member can go that extent. He can refer to them as illustrations of his argument, but he cannot go into the merits of those other schemes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will go no further than to say that I am sorry we have got so many of them. But I will confine my remarks to the Chignecto Ship Railway, because I think we may possibly have an opportunity to take up and discuss those other schemes before Parliament rises. Now, I must say that I was sorry this afternoon to understand my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) as making an admission that there was any shadow of a moral claim for a revival of the annual grant. I do not think he intended to do that. If he did, I can only say that I believe he did not reflect the feeling or sentiments of a single man on this side of the House except himself. However, I fancy that he had no intention of conveying the idea that he was at all disposed favourably to a consideration of the renewal of the grant of $170,000 a year. Of course the Government may be able to show that there is some moral claim over and above anything we have yet seen. I do not know how they are going to be able to show that, but I can say that so far as I am concerned, they will have great difficulty in persuading me that the country, or this House, is so committed to a revival of that grant and to a continuation of the promised assistance to this scheme, as to secure my acquiescence in the revival of a grant of $170,000 a year. I think if we grant the charter to the company, that is all they may fairly ask. They should be permitted to utilize the property that is there, if it is worth anything, to the best advantage. We have no objections to allow them to do that; but it must be with the understanding that the country shall not be called upon for any more money. When we come to consider the enormous annual expenditure of this country at the present moment, and the absolute necessity for reductions in every possible shape that reductions can be made, reasonably, and the affairs of the country properly conducted at the same time, it is unquestionably a piece of the greatest folly to attempt further to assist and encourage undertakings of this kind that bear upon their face evidence of a piece of folly, sacrificing the people's money in enterprises that will never give anything in the way of a return. Now, Sir, speaking on behalf of the constituency I have the honour to represent, I enter in my humble way, my solemn protest against a single dollar ever again being granted by Parliament to the Chignecto Ship Railway Company. I hope to-night we shall have heard the last of this scheme. I am sorry that it was ever launched before the English investors who have been induced to go into it. So far as we are concerned there is nothing lost yet, and we are bound by every possibly parliamentary rule that we can bring to play, in the interests of this country to oppose to the last and to the bitter end one single brass farthing of the people's money being cast into this scheme.

Mr. LISTER. Mr. Speaker, when this innocent looking little Bill was introduced into the House it was scarcely thought it would evoke so much discussion. It seems remarkable, Sir, that the hon. Secretary of State, who is really the father of this Bill, should have entrusted it to the hon. member who introduced it. It is hardly necessary to say that, so far as the Chignecto Ship Railway Company is concerned, it is most unpopular in every section of the country; and from the speeches we have had from the other side of the House, it is clear that those who live in close proximity to the scheme are opposed to it as being a useless and a prodigal waste of public money. Sir, I had fondly hoped that we had heard the last of this scheme, when it was introduced some years ago. When afterwards a charter which had been granted in the first place was renewed, it was a subject of controversy from one end of the country to the other. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that any elector in this country can be found to approve of the scheme which is introduced and proposed to be carried out. When the charter was allowed to expire the last occasion, we thought that this Parliament would never be bothered with this question again. But, Sir, I call your attention to the fact that it is a remarkable coincidence that with the re-appearance of the Secretary of State in Canada and in this House, the old claim is revived. Three years ago, I believe, have passed since this charter expired. Three years have already run by during which we have heard nothing of it; but the moment the junior member for Cape Breton takes his seat in this House, we find this infant again cropping up, and with an innocence one would hardly expect, we find a Bill is introduced, not by the Secretary of State himself, but by perhaps the youngest member of this House, in a brief and very moderate speech. One would scarcely believe that there was anything wrong with the proposed legislation. It is not the Bill alone we have to consider, but I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will do in this case what has been done in many others, renew a charter given by Parliament to a body of gentlemen for some enterprise public or private. But we have to fear the refusal to state whether this is to be supplemented by another Bill providing for a grant from the public funds of a very large sum, between two and three million dollars, in aid of an enterprise which is utterly and entirely worthless. Why, we might just as well spend the money of the people in hunting for the lost Atlantis as to spend it in this utterly worthless enterprise. Let me say to the Government if they attempt to introduce a measure asking this House to vote public money to this scheme, it will be the bounden duty of hon. members, at all events of those who think as I do, to oppose it to the utmost, and if possible save this country from a loss of between two and three millions, and if possible save the English investors from a further loss of a like sum. What is the scheme? One would think, upon its very face, it would not receive at the hands of intelligent men any consideration whatever, but in the good old boom days, when money flowed like water out of the treasury of Canada, there was no scheme too absurd to receive attention from hon. gentlemen leading the Government, one of whom was the present leader of the House and Secretary of State. Every scheme, for railroads or anything else you could think of, received the attention of the Government and substantial aid at the cost of the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite now say that the honour of this country is pledged to the renewal of this subsidy, which was granted under a preceding Act. This country is not bound legally, it is not bound morally, it is not bound in any way, to grant a single dollar to this enterprise; on the contrary, it is morally bound not to grant a single dollar. The Secretary of State told the House to-day that in the vaults of the Bank of London are to be found the bonds of this company, a company formed, I venture to say, by men who have now little, if anything, invested in this scheme. They floated the bonds of the company, no doubt, at a very heavy discount, and the banks of London bought them as a speculation, believing if it were carried out they would get their money back, and if not carried out they would lose every dollar put in the enterprise. In London the shrewdest business men in the world are to be found. Is any man credulous enough to believe that these business men would invest their money in bonds without examining with the greatest care every statute passed by Canada affecting them, and ascertaining the conditions on which the subvention is granted. They, no doubt, took the trouble to ascertain what was said during the debates in this House, and if they have done so they must have found that the representatives of half the people believe this was a boistered scheme, and that it was nothing but wasting the public funds. In view of these facts, how can these gentlemen come to this House and swear that we are bound in honour to subsidize the company again as it was subsidized in the first place? They bought the securities with their eyes open, they knew what they were doing, and there is no claim on the people morally or legally to grant a subvention to this company now, because they have failed in every contract they made. The Government provided that the company should pay a penalty for every month the work remained uncompleted beyond a fixed period. Years have passed and no claim has been made by the Government on the company; on the contrary, the Government have foregone their claims and have even done so by Act of Parliament; and yet now the company have the effrontery to come before Parliament and say that the representatives of the people are morally bound to make good this subvention. For the sake of investors in England we would be doing a moral wrong if we acted as hon. gentlemen proposed. It is feared that this work cannot be completed for double the money this Government is asked to grant, and the proposal simply means that the people who have already invested in it must be allowed to invest a further sum of $2,500,000, the effect of which will be merely to extend to those people more encouragement for the sinking of their money in a scheme that never can be carried out, and in this respect it closely resembles many of the railway projects of the Government. In considering the language used by the Secretary of State, bold as it is, full of adjectives, involving great promises, as it does, we must remember the Secretary of State in the past. We have a right, in drawing conclusions as to how much importance should be attached to his opinion given in this House to-day, to recall his statements of former years, and see how those statements have worked out. The hon. gentleman has promoted, urged and carried through this House over and over again schemes that would not have been carried through but for the positive assurances of the hon. gentleman that they would be profitable to the country, would develop our resources, would attract foreign investors, and upon these statements over and over again, the House has been foolish enough to yield to his importunities and grant the different corporations vast sums of public money. If Canada to-day owes an enormous debt, it is to the hon. gentleman more than to any other man in Canada is responsible for having loaded Canada with that debt. As one example, which bears a remarkable similarity to the statement made by the Secretary of State to-day, was the hon. gentleman's statement when promoting the Caraqueet Railway. Then he stated—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is referring to a matter which has no relation to the matter before the House.

Mr. LISTER. The Secretary of State made a statement to-day for the purpose of inducing Parliament to pass this piece of legislation. In order to show that the hon. gentleman's statement to-day is not reliable, I propose to show that he made a similar statement regarding another enterprise on another occasion; but if you rule, Sir, that this is not strictly in order, I submit.

Mr. SPEAKER. What I said is, that the hon. member (Mr. Lister) cannot enter into a discussion of these other matters. He may refer to them, incidentally, for the purpose of illustrating his argument, as I have already ruled. But if he begins to discuss the Caraquet Railway, that would certainly be out of order because it has no bearing whatever on the question before the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On that point of order, I would like to understand. It appears to me that it is a most proper thing, by way of illustration, to call attention to the fact that, on former occasions, promises were made to this House by the hon. gentleman referred to which have been signally unfulfilled. We have done that kind of thing very frequently, and it appears to me to be a thing which, in the very nature of the case, is most pertinent to the argument my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) is addressing to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I have stated, that can be done incidentally; but if the hon. member begins to refer to a discussion which took place regarding the Caraquet Railway, that would be out of order.

Mr. LISTER. I have no intention of referring to that discussion at all. What I proposed to do was simply to call your attention, Sir, to the statement made by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) respecting another matter. So far as these statements of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) are concerned, I have this to say: That in connection with schemes promoted, and subsidies given by this House upon the representations of the Secretary of State, the representations made by him, and upon which he induced this Parliament to vote large sums of money, have not been borne out by the facts. We have, Sir, as a matter of fact, a subsidy of public money voted to the Caraquet Railway to the extent of over $600,000, and we were told then that the construction of this railway would open up an enormous trade between the west and the east, that the fish of the Atlantic coast would be shipped to the far west, that the products of the far west would find an outlet on the Atlantic coast, and that the Intercolonial Railway would receive large additions to its freight, to the great profit of the people of this country generally. Sir, these were the striking words which the Secretary of State addressed to this House, and if we look at his promises and compare them with the results, one is struck by the fact that the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) was far afield in the statements he has made. Why, Sir, that road which has cost us—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member (Mr. Lister) cannot go on to discuss the Caraquet Railway on a motion for the second reading of a Bill respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company. The rule is: That on the motion for the second reading of the Bill, it is not in order to refer to a subject which does not come within the scope of the Bill.

Mr. LISTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With all due deference, I submit it does come within the scope of the Bill, and I must say that in all my parliamentary experience, I have never known such interference with a discussion of this kind.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) wishes to appeal from my ruling, he is quite at liberty to do so.

Mr. LISTER. It is hardly worth while, Mr. Speaker, appealing from the ruling, in view of the fact that the object here is not to prevent the Bill getting into committee, but rather to give the House and the country to understand that any action on the part of the Government to supplement this legislation, by legislation giving a subvention to this company, will be opposed as far as it is possible to oppose it. The scheme, Mr. Speaker, is one that certainly cannot, could not, and ought not receive the approval of any person of ordinary understanding. It is proposed by this company to construct a railway for the purpose of transporting ships over dry land. I venture to say that in no part of the world is there such a railway in existence for the purpose of transporting such large vessels. It is proposed to carry these ships from one body of water and put them into another, and if any evidence at all were required as to the impossibility of the scheme, that evidence is given by the hon. gentlemen who to-day spoke in opposition to the measure. Even if the railway were capable of carrying ships from one water to another, as a matter of fact, there are no ships to be carried, so that all there is to be accomplished by the construction of this ship railway, is the sinking of the private moneys of the English people, and sinking of the public moneys of the people of Canada. A more visionary scheme was never presented to any Parliament, or to any people. Upon its face, the scheme carries its own condemnation, and yet, we find the leaders of the House, and we find, I have no doubt, the members of the Government, and a great portion of the Conservative members supporting that Government, prepared to vote away two and a half million dollars for the purpose of carrying on this most visionary scheme. And, Sir, let us consider, further, the time at which they propose to do this. In the last days of the last session of this Parliament, they introduce this measure, for the purpose, avowedly, of carrying on this work. Is this one of the boomster schemes that the Government is going to propose to Parliament, in view of the near approach of the elections? Is there any honest intention on the part of these promoters to carry out this work, or is it for the purpose of making the people of that section of the country believe that two or three millions of dollars of public money, and five million dollars of private funds, are to be scattered broadcast throughout that section of the country? Let our gentlemen judge for themselves: the country shortly will judge them, if any such grant as this is made to this company. Sir, by granting this money, you are giving the promoters of this scheme a further opportunity to swindle the British public, because the scheme, upon its face, is a swindle. The men who are promoting this scheme do so in the face of the facts stated here, and in the face of the facts patent to everybody, that it can never be profitable, that it can never return any revenue, that it is not to be owned by the Government of the country, and operated free, as the canals of the country are, but that it is to be the property of a private company, who profess to construct it for the purpose of getting a return, in the shape of a revenue. It never can be profitable. It never can pay its running expenses, and I venture the prediction here to-night that it never will be operated, whether you give them the money or not. It will enable these people, with the promise of a subsidy from this Government, to issue bonds, and for a period, at all events, to guarantee the interest on these bonds out of the payment of the subsidy. You permit, by this legislation, the promoters of this scheme to further draw into their coffers the money of the people of England. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, there is no legal or moral claim on this Parliament to supplement this legislation by a subsidy. It would be an immoral act on the part of this Parliament to grant the money, because it would enable these people to further draw the money of the people of Great Britain into this utterly worthless enterprise.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the following statement to the House: Since answering the question asked a few days ago by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the following telegram has been received by Sir Donald Smith:—

Winnipeg, 2nd March, 1896.

Your telegram has received most careful consideration of myself and colleagues. While fully appreciating all you say, it is quite clear to us that we can only proceed to Ottawa for the purpose of holding a conference upon the official invitation of the Dominion Government. I fully appreciate your kind offices in this matter.

(Signed) GREENWAY.

In view of the assurance that the government of Manitoba are willing to have a conference, the Government propose, so soon as the second reading of the Remedial Bill is carried, to have a conference with Mr. Greenway's government with a view to arrive at a settlement of this question on terms that will be satisfactory to his government and the minority of Manitoba, but in the meantime to proceed with the question before the House de die in diem as previously arranged.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the National Sanitarium Association.—(Mr. Roome.)

GERMAN LANGUAGE IN MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST TER- RITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the hon. the Minister of the Interior is aware that the Manitoba government has had the provincial school laws translated into and published in the German language? Whether he intends to have a sum placed in the Estimates to provide for the translation and publishing in German the school ordinance of the North-west Territories?

Mr. DICKEY. The Minister of the Interior is not aware that the Manitoba government has had the provincial school laws translated and published in the German language. 2. He does not intend to have a sum placed in the Estimates to provide for the translation and publishing in German the school ordinances of the North-west Territories.

LOBSTER AND OYSTER PLANTING IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. CORBOULD asked :

Is it the intention of the Government during this season to place lobsters or lobster spawn in the waters of the Pacific, in British Columbia? If so, what steps, if any, have been taken in the matter? Is it the intention of the Government, during the season to place eastern oysters in the waters of the Pacific, in British Columbia? If so, what steps, if any, have been taken in the matter?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is the intention of the Government to introduce lobsters into the waters of the Pacific in British Columbia early during the coming season, probably in April or May, and arrangements are in progress for carrying out this intention. 2. It is the intention of the Government during this season to place eastern oysters in the waters of British Columbia, and instructions have been sent to the officer at Halifax to have a sufficient quantity of brood oysters ready to ship at the same time as the lobsters.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. EDGAR asked :

Has an invitation been extended by or on behalf of the Dominion Government, or by or on behalf of any member thereof, to the First Minister of Manitoba to come to Ottawa for the purpose of discussing any matters in connection with the schools of that province? Has such invitation, if given, been accepted?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In answer to the hon. gentleman I beg to say that all the information I have to give to the House is already given in the statement just made.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAITS.

Mr. PERRY asked :

Is it the intention of the Finance Minister to lay upon the Table of this House a map showing what borings have been made across the Straits of Northumberland, as promised some time ago? If so, when?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. FOSTER. I answered that question once before and asked the hon. gentleman to put a motion for a return to be brought down, and that motion would pass as a matter of form. And the information brought down would then be preserved by the House. If laid on the Table, in answer to a question, it is not taken into custody and the matter is too valuable to be lost.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness) asked :

What quantity—1, of solid rock; 2, of gypsum rock; 3, of loose rock; 4, of borrow pit; 5, of earth, and 6, of hard-pan—so-called respectively—was excavated on section from station 210 to 250, being from 28th to 29th mile whilst Sims & Slater and their sureties conducted the work on the Cape Breton Railway, east of the Grand Narrows, in 1887?

Mr. HAGGART. In reply I beg to say:—Excavated on section of the Cape Breton Railway of which Messrs. Sims & Slater were the contractors from station 210 to station 250, being on 28th and 29th miles, whilst Sims & Slater and their sureties conducted the work.

	Cubic yards.
Solid rock	1,873
Gypsum rock	Nil.
Loose rock	263
Borrow pit	70
Earth	2,374
Hard-pan (so-called)	Nil

LANDS TO FRENCH HALF-BREEDS.

Mr. O'BRIEN asked :

Has any proposal been made to the Greenway Government by the Rev. Father Lacombe for the setting apart of a tract of land in any portion of the North-west Territories, for the use of the French Half-breeds of Manitoba and the North-west? If so, has that proposal been agreed to? Has any Order in Council been passed, in pursuance of such proposal, and if so, what are the terms of such Order in Council?

Mr. DICKEY. The answer to all these questions is "yes," except as to the latter part of the last question, in reply to which it might be stated that the Order in Council will be laid before Parliament.

FISHERY LICENSE, CLEARVILLE, ONT.

Mr. CASEY asked :

1. Who applied this season for a fishery license or licenses at Clearville, West Elgin, Ontario, with residence of applicant and date of application, in each case?

2. Who have received a license or licenses?

3. What are the reasons for accepting or refusing the applications in each case?

4. Has there been correspondence with the Department of Marine and Fisheries on the subject?

5. With whom?

6. Will the Government lay it on the Table?

Mr. COSTIGAN. In reply to the hon. gentleman I beg to say :

1. Abraham Hoover, Clearville, 10th Dec., 1895. A. J. O'Brien, Clearville, 19th Dec., 1895.

2. Abraham Hoover.

3. The reasons for granting the license to Mr. Hoover and refusing Mr. O'Brien, are that it was shown by affidavit and agreement of Mr. O'Brien that he had formally transferred all his right or claim to the fishery, as well as the warehouse and dock to Mr. Hoover.

With regard to question 4, 5 and 6, this information would necessitate the papers being moved for.

MONTREAL CENTRE ELECTION.

Mr. BRODEUR asked :

Whether the accounts of the returning officers, poll clerks and others, who were employed at the last election for Montreal Centre, have been paid? If so, when were they paid; and if not, why not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The accounts of the returning officers, poll clerks and others employed in the election, have been paid, partly on February 8th and partly on March 3rd, except the constable at nomination, whose account has not been sent in. Some accounts for supplies, travel, etc., were not paid in full as rendered. The reasons for the deductions are given on the attached sheets.

QUEBEC OBSERVATORY.

Mr. BRUNEAU for (Mr. Choquette) asked :

1. Whether Mr. Arthur Smith, who has charge of the Observatory at Quebec, is entitled to free quarters for himself and his father's family?

2. On whose recommendation was he appointed to the Quebec Observatory?

3. Does he hold a certificate of qualification?

4. Are the Government aware that the report made to Mr. Carpmael by the said Arthur Smith, was not prepared by him, but by a friend of his, who is a surveyor and geometrician, and that Mr. Smith does not possess the knowledge required to prepare such reports?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Arthur Smith has charge of the observatory at Quebec, and there is a dwelling house provided for him, attached to the observatory. The department has no knowledge of his father's family having free quarters. Mr. Smith was appointed on the recommendation of the late Prof. Carpmael, of Toronto, Director of the Meteorological Service.

Prof. Carpmael reported to the department that Mr. Smith, who had been assisting the late Observer, Mr. Ashe, was duly qualified to perform the duties. The Government are not aware that the report made to Mr. Carpmael by Mr. Smith was not prepared by him, and the Government has every reason to believe that Mr. Smith possesses the knowledge required to prepare his reports.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY RATES AND REBATES.

Mr. FRASER asked :

1. What was the amount of rebate paid back by the Intercolonial Railway to Hon. Josiah Wood, Senator, Sackville; Charles Fawcett, Esq., Wood Stone Point Quarries; Moncton Sugar Refinery, Moncton; A. Gunn & Company, Halifax, and J. A. Leaman, Esq., Halifax, during the years 1892-93-94-95 and 1896? How large a business must any person or persons or firm conduct with the Intercolonial Railway before a rebate is given?

2. What is the rate charged on a car-load or part car-load of sugar from the refinery at Moncton (a) to St. John, (b) Newcastle, (c) Quebec?

3. Is the same rate charged on coal from Springhill to Moncton sugar refinery as to smaller consumers in Moncton? What is the rate to the refinery and what to smaller consumers? What is the rate on coal per ton from Springhill (a) to Sackville, (b) Moncton?

4. What is the rate on car of hay or other farm produce from Farnham, Que., to Halifax, N.S., via St. John, N.B.? What amount of freight on such car goes (a) to Canadian Pacific Railway, (b) to Intercolonial Railway?

5. What is the rate of freight on car of iron from Londonderry, N.S., (a) to St. John, N.B., (b) Halifax, (c) Quebec, (d) Montreal?

6. Passenger rate first and second-class from Montreal to (a) St. John, N.B., (b) Halifax and Sydney, and amount of each paid to Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. HAGGART. During the years 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896 no rebate was paid to the Honourable Josiah Wood, the Wood Point Stone Quarries, or J. A. Leaman. There was paid to Charles Fawcett, as rebate: In 1892, $401.87; in 1893, $892.32; in 1894, $588.09; in 1895, $393.74; in 1896, nil. There was paid to the Moncton Sugar Refinery, as rebate: in 1892, nil; in 1893, $783.20; in 1894, $210.75; in 1895, $2,483.48; in 1896, $39.38. There was paid to A. Gunn & Company, as rebate: in 1892, $457.87; in 1893, $3,232.76; in 1894, $1,533.45; in 1895, $168.82; in 1896, nil. There is no scale of rebate paid to persons or firms who conduct business with the Intercolonial Railway, excepting the case of coal for manufacturers at St. John and Halifax, in competition with the water. For some years a rebate was paid on corn to millers in competition with the Boston route, and a part of the rebate paid to A. Gunn & Company and Charles Fawcett was on corn, but this was discontinued in January, 1895. Where there are corn-mills and flour-mills along the line of the Intercolonial Railway, they are paid a rebate on flour and meal ground in the mills, provided the corn and wheat have been brought over the railway. Part of the rebate paid to A. Gunn & Company and to Charles Fawcett is for such product of their mills. In the case of the Moncton Sugar Refinery Company, all the raw sugar, as well as all the sugar refined by them has to pass over the Intercolonial Railway, which thus gets two freights out of it; hence the rebate. The rate charged on sugar : By the car-load, from Moncton to St. John, 6 cents per 100 pounds ; less than car-load, from Moncton to St. John, 12 cents per 100 pounds ; by the car-load, from Moncton to Newcastle, 10 cents per 100 pounds ; less than car-load, from Moncton to Newcastle, 11 cents per 100 pounds ; by the car-load, from Moncton to Quebec, P.Q., 14 cents per 100 pounds ; less than car-load, from Moncton to Quebec, P.Q., 23 cents per 100 pounds. The same rate is not charged on coal from Spring Hill to the Moncton Sugar Refinery Company as to small consumers. The rate to the refinery is 50 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds ; to smaller manufacturers, 66 cents per ton, and to all other, $1 per ton. The rate on coal from Spring Hill to Sackville, 60 cents a ton of 2,000 pounds ; rate on coal from Spring Hill to Moncton, $1 a ton of 2,000 pounds. The freight rate on hay, by the car-load, from Farnham, P.Q., to Halifax, via St. John, N.B., is 19 cents per 100 pounds. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company receives 61 per cent of this, equal to 1159-100th cents, and the Intercolonial Railway receives 39 per cent, equal to 741-100th cents. The rate on iron from Londonderry to St. John is $1.50 a ton of 2,240 pounds. The rate on the iron from Londonderry to Halifax is $1 a ton of 2,240 pounds. The rate on iron from Londonderry to Lévis, P.Q., is $2.50 a ton of 2,240 pounds. The rate on iron from Londonderry to Montreal is $3.40 a ton of 2,240 pounds. The rate on pig iron and puddle bars from Londonderry to Montreal is $2.94 a ton of 2,240 pounds. The first-class passenger rate from Montreal to St. John is $14, of which the Intercolonial Railway receives $10.75. The second-class passenger fare from Montreal to St. John is $9.25, of which the Intercolonial Railway receives $7.10. The first-class passenger fare from Montreal to Halifax is $17.50, of which the Intercolonial Railway receives $13.95. The second-class passenger fare from Montreal to Halifax is $11.50, of which the Intercolonial Railway receives $9.15. The first-class passenger fare from Montreal to Sydney is $21.20, of which the Intercolonial Railway receives $16.10. The second-class passenger fare from Montreal to Sydney is $14.30, of which the Intercolonial Railway receives $11.10.

SAMUEL DAVISON.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

Is Samuel Davison in arrears to the Customs Department at Toronto ? If so, how much, and when did he so become ? How did he get in arrears with the office ? Was an action taken against him ? If so, what was the result of it ? Has he made good any of the amount ? Has any action been taken to recover from him ?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Samuel Davison defrauded the Customs Department, at the port of Toronto, out of duties estimated at $2,750. in the year 1891, by entering silks on false invoices. No amount of the duty has been made good, as he fled the country, having no material assets. No action was taken to recover, as the claim stands good, should he return to Canada.

DURATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. O'BRIEN (for Mr. McCarthy) asked :

1. When was the last Parliament of Canada dissolved, and was the dissolution thereof announced by proclamation, and at what date ?

2. When did His Excellency the Governor General by proclamation order the writs for the holding of the election of the present Parliament ?

3. When were the said writs issued and at what time were they made returnable, including in this inquiry the writ of election for the district of Algoma ?

4. Was the House of Commons summoned to meet on Saturday, the 25th day of April, 1891 ? Was it prorogued from that date and summoned to meet for the despatch of business on the 29th day of April, 1891 ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would answer the hon. gentleman's questions as follows : 1 The sixth, or last, Parliament was dissolved by a proclamation of His Excellency the Governor General, bearing date, February the 3rd, 1891. 2. His Excellency the Governor General gave orders for the issue of writs for calling a Parliament by a proclamation, bearing date the 3rd day of February, 1891. 3. By a proclamation, dated the 3rd day of February, 1891, His Excellency the Governor General ordered that the issue of the writs should bear date the 4th day of February, 1891, and be made returnable the 25th day of April, following. (No special mention was made of the district of Algoma.) 4. By a proclamation, dated the 3rd of February, 1891, His Excellency the Governor General summoned Parliament (pro forma) on the 25th day of April following ; and by a subsequent proclamation, dated 17th March, 1891, he summoned Parliament to meet on the 29th of April following, for the despatch of business.

SHIPMENTS PER SS. "ADMIRAL."

Mr. FAUVEL asked :

How many carloads of flour, pork, coal oil and mixed freight were shipped from the Intercolonial Railway at Dalhousie, N.B., on the SS. "Admiral," during the seasons of 1894 and 1895, to the Baie des Chaleurs and Gaspé points ?

Mr. HAGGART. There was shipped from the Intercolonial Railway at Dalhousie, on the steamer "Admiral" for Baie des Chaleurs and Gaspé points, during the season 1894 : 1,683 tons of flour, equal to about 112 carloads ; 34 tons of pork, equal to about 3 carloads ; 68 tons of coal, equal to about 5¼ carloads ; 1,206 tons mixed freight, equal to about 121 carloads. During the season of 1895 : 1,620 tons of flour, equal to about 108 carloads ; 24 tons of pork, equal to about 2 carloads ; 89 tons coal oil, equal to about 7½ car-loads; 1,288 tons mixed freight, equal to about 129 car-loads.

HARBOUR OF PASPEBIAC.

Mr. FAUVEL asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Supplementary Estimates an amount towards making local harbour improvements at the port of Paspebiac, county of Bonaventure ?

Mr. OUMET. That subject is now under consideration.

GAS FOR GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS AT OTTAWA.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked :

1. Who has the contract for supplying the gas required for the Government Buildings at Ottawa ?

2. What price is paid for it per thousand feet ?

3. What quantity was used during the past year ?

4. Is it the intention of the Government to substitute electric light for gas, and what is the estimated cost of making the change ?

Mr. OUMET. The Ottawa Gas Company has the contract for supplying the gas required for the Government buildings at Ottawa. The price is $1.50 per 1,000 cubic feet, if the quantity consumed during any one year exceed 8,000,000 cubic feet. If the quantity consumed be less than 8,000,000 cubic feet, the price paid is the same as that charged to the public, with the usual discount given to the public and an additional 5 per cent. The quantity used during the past year was 9,794,800 cubic feet. It is the intention of the Government to gradually substitute electric light for gas in places where gas is still used in Parliament buildings, but not at present in the other buildings.

CONTRACTS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. FRASER asked :

1. Were tenders invited by the Government for green sand castings to be furnished for the use of the Intercolonial Railway at Richmond, (sound and clear) to be delivered at some station on the Intercolonial Railway ?

2. What is the name and address of each person or firm who tendered, and the amount of each tender ; giving price per pound ?

3. To whom was the contract awarded, and what is the price to be paid ?

4. Is scrap iron to be taken by the contractor as part payment ? If so, what proportion of scrap iron is to be taken by the contractor, and what price is to be allowed by him therefor ?

Mr. HAGGART. 1. Tenders were invited for iron castings to be furnished for the use of the Intercolonial Railway. 2. The Truro Foundry and Machine Company, Truro, 1½ cents per pound, taking equal quantity of cast scrap at $15 per ton, 2,000 pounds.

Douglas & Co., Dartmouth, at 1½ cents per pound, taking equal quantity of scrap iron at $10 per ton, 2,000 pounds. John A. Thompson, Halifax, at 1½ cents per pound, taking same weight cast scrap as castings, delivered at $10 per ton, 2,000 pounds. Robert Brown & Sons, New Glasgow, N.S., at 1¼ cents per pound, taking one-half payment in scrap at $12 per ton, delivered in New Glasgow, N.S. The Dartmouth Iron Foundry, Dartmouth, at 2 cents per pound, taking equal quantity of cast scrap at $10 per ton. 3. To the Truro Foundry and Machine Company, at 1¾ cents per pound, taking equal quantity of cast scrap at $15 per ton, 2,000 pounds. 4. Scrap iron is to be taken at $15 per ton of 2,000 pounds.

DISEASED HORSES SHIPPED TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. FEATHERSTON asked :

Has the Government had any information, official or otherwise, regarding disease in horses landed in Great Britain from the western states via Canadian ports ? If so, what is the nature of the disease and is it contagious ?

Mr. FOSTER. In answer to that question I beg leave to say that some allusion was noticed in the morning papers in reference to this matter, and I received a telegram from Dr. Montague, Minister of Agriculture, now in London, to this effect :

Think important all horses shipped Canadian ports should be subject veterinary inspection, same as cattle. Some American horses recently arrived found affected glanders.

But whether those horses went through Canadian ports or not, I can scarcely make out from the telegram, though the inference would be that they were horses that did go through Canadian ports.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What date is that ?

Mr. FOSTER. 3rd March. The matter is being considered by the department at the present time.

JAMES F. HAMILTON, ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. DAVIES asked :

Has James F. Hamilton, of St. John, N.B., who on the 27th February was stated in the House not to be in the Government employ, since been appointed to any Government office or employment ?

If so, when was he so appointed, and to what office, and at what salary ?

Has he passed the Civil Service examination ? If so, when ?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. James F. Hamilton has been employed as acting appraiser in the customs service at the port of St. John, N.B., since 28th February, ult., at a salary of $1,000 per annum. No examination was necessary in his case.

CUSTOMS DUTIES PAID IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. HASLAM, for Mr. Mara, asked :

What amount has been paid in customs duties from 1st January to 31st December, 1895, at the following places, viz. : Nelson, Kaslo, Waneta, and Boundary (Kootenay River) ?

On what date was Rossland made an outpost of New Westminster ?

What amount has been collected at Rossland from the opening of the office to 31st December, 1895 ?

On what date was Trail made an outpost of Nelson ?

What amount has been collected at Trail from opening of the office to 31st December, 1895 ?

Mr. WOOD. Rossland was made a customs station under the port of New Westminster, on 31st December, 1894, and Trail was made a customs station under the port of Nelson, on 12th October, 1895. As to the collections at Trail from the opening of the office to 31st December, 1895, and at Rossland from the opening of the office there to 31st December, 1895, and at Nelson, Kaslo, Waneta and Boundary (Kootenay River) from 1st January to 31st December, 1895, it is not possible to furnish the particulars requested, inasmuch as departmental records only contain information as to collections each fiscal year. The return of collections at ports and outposts is an annual statement which each collector forwards at the close of the fiscal year.

Also, copies of all correspondence between the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Justice in connection with said contracts. Also, copies of all Orders in Council bearing upon the claims of George Goodwin, in connection with such contracts. Also, copies of the reports to the Department of Railways and Canals, or to any other department, made by the Government engineer in charge of said works, bearing upon the work performed by contractor George Goodwin, and bearing upon said contractor Goodwin's claim against the Government for extra compensation in connection with water-tight embankment, or in connection with any other claim he has made relating to his contracts on the Soulanges Canal works.—(Mr. Davies, P.E.I.)

ADJOURNMENT—RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourns, I desire to call the attention of the Government to a matter of some importance. I do not know who is representing the Department of Agriculture in the House to-night, but the observations that I make have reference to that department. It appears, that the railway companies have recently issued a tariff rate, affecting the transportation of live stock which acts very hardly in the case of thoroughbreds used for pedigree purposes. Under the Railway Act, provision is made for the classification of freights, and that provision has been taken advantage of, and pedigreed animals are classified in such a way as to very seriously hamper their transportation throughout the country. For instance, take the ordinary matter of thoroughbred stock. Young bulls of six months and over, but under twelve months, are classified now on the Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway—these are my instructions—as weighing 4,000 pounds each. You can readily see what an enormous tax that is upon the farmers, or the breeders, who are engaged in buying and selling cattle of that kind. The way this matter affects the Government is this: The Railway Act declares, that no railway company shall collect any toll on any freight, except according to the schedule approved of by the Government. No railway company can make a change in the schedule of rates, or by classification increase the burdens upon the customers of the railway, without that schedule being first sanctioned by the Government. The railway companies cannot charge rates now as common carriers. Formerly, they were able to evade the Railway Act as common carriers. That was done away by the Act of 1888, and now they are not entitled to collect a dollar on any freight unless their tariff rates, including the classification, have first been submitted to, and received the sanction of the Governor General in Council. If the Government have sanctioned the classification I refer to, I can only assume that they have done it under a mistake. I do not propose to make any observations in criticism of the Government. I simply call their attention to the matter, as the spring is now on, and the tariff is operating very prejudicially to the agricultural interests. Unless it is immediately changed, it is going to have a very injurious effect.

Mr. HAGGART. Are you aware when the change in the classification was made?

Mr. MULOCK. I am not aware of it.

Mr. HAGGART. Or that it was made?

Mr. MULOCK. No, I am not aware that it was made with the sanction of the Government at all. I am only informed—and I speak, of course, subject to correction—that the railway companies have issued a schedule of rates, making a six months' old bull-calf equivalent to a 4,000 pounds bull, for freight rate purpose. You can readily see how that affects a very important feature connected with farming, restricting the distribution of valuable pedigree stock throughout the country. The matter has been brought before various live stock organizations, and representations have been made to the public, and will now, no doubt, be made formally to the Government, in regard thereto. Whether the railway companies have made this change in classification of their own motion or not, I do not know. The Government will, of course, know. I need not, I presume, call the Minister's attention to the law. Section 226 of the Railway Act states that the classification must first have the sanction of the Governor in Council. The Government have also power under the Railway Act to amend the rates prescribed by the railways, if the schedule of rates submitted by them is not satisfactory to the Government. What I ask the Government to do is to inquire into this matter and see whether the railways are prescribing a rate, either by their system of classification or otherwise, that is not in the interest of the agriculturists, while, of course, fair to the railways, as well; and, if the railway companies are not prepared to adopt a fair schedule, then I ask the Government to exercise their power to amend the freight rates in regard to pedigree animals—at least, animals shipped for breeding purposes. It might, perhaps, be necessary to extend the request to include other animals; but, for immediate purposes, I think the Government should see that the rates are made reasonable for the particular classes of animals to which I have alluded.

Mr. HAGGART. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I would state that my attention has not been called to this subject before. I hardly think the Government have sanctioned any rule of classification in the direction the hon. gentleman states. I know that the classification is a matter of agreement between the railway companies, and it is sometimes altered three or four times in a year. There are a great many articles that come up for reclassification, and all that I require from my officers is to see that the reclassification does not increase the rates charged. When they certify that to me, I get the sanction of the Council. The railway companies have no right to change the classification unless it is approved of by the Government. I am not so clear, however, that the Government have power to reduce the rates charged. I will make inquiries into the matter, and be prepared to make a statement in reference to it.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. leader of the House has moved the adjournment at a pretty early hour this evening. There is a good deal of important private business still on the paper. I was rather surprised at his moving the adjournment so early; but it may be that he desires time to consult his colleagues in regard to the result of the important vote that was taken this evening, in regard to which the whole weight of the Government—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CASEY. I am asking for a Ministerial explanation, Mr. Speaker, on the motion to adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 10th March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 81) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Alberta Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the leader of the House to the statement he made yesterday with respect to the Manitoba school question. I happened to be out of the House when the statement was made, but I read to-day that the hon. gentleman read a telegram from Mr. Greenway, in which the following statement was made:—
Mr. MULOCK.

While fully appreciating all you say, it is quite clear to us that we can only proceed to Ottawa for the purpose of holding a conference upon the invitation of the Dominion Government.

Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to say:

In view of the assurance that the government of Manitoba are willing to have a conference, the Government propose, so soon as the second reading of the Remedial Bill is carried, to have a conference with Mr. Greenway's government.

The House will be interested to know, and the whole public will likewise be interested to know, whether or no the official invitation of which Mr. Greenway speaks has been extended to him or not; if so, whether he has accepted it; and if so, for what time?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I desire to say, in answer to the leader of the Opposition, that my statement as read to the House has been sent by telegraph from the Premier to the Governor of Manitoba, with the request that he would submit it to Mr. Greenway and his government.

Mr. LAURIER. That is all the invitation that has been extended to Mr. Greenway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the present position. The arrangements for the conference have not been completed.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba), and the proposed motion (six months' hoist) of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I presume that members of the House are now perfectly conversant with all the facts in relation to the very important matter that has been under discussion in this chamber during the past ten days; but I may be able in the few remarks I shall offer to throw some new light into the discussion and answer some of the statements made, and reply to the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) in the speech he made the other night. Sir, the hon. gentleman referred at considerable length and with considerable warmth to the fact that the Government had incorporated in the printed copy of the proceedings before the Privy Council of Canada certain affidavits that had been put in evidence by Mr. Ewart, who was acting for the minority, which Mr. Ewart subsequently withdrew, but yet these affidavits were printed in the record of the proceedings. The hon. gentleman characterized that as an outrage. He said it was petty, it was mean, and that an advantage should not have been taken under the circumstances to place on the record these affidavits, and give to the House and the country knowledge of their contents when they could not possibly be answered. The hon. gentleman quoted at length the statement made by the present Minister of Justice, then Secretary of State, as to how and by what means these affidavits were printed on the record. He said that was an honest explanation, and no person could gainsay it. But the hon. member for Winnipeg took exception to a statement made by the ex-Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), that the Government had a perfect right to publish those affidavits in the record. I can understand perfectly well that the hon. member for Winnipeg considers that his feelings have been outraged by the publication of these affidavits, because the facts disclosed in them cut the hon. gentleman on the raw. And, Sir, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) tries to make the House believe, as he did the other evening, in answer to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) that hon. members here were first seized of the facts contained in these affidavits on the publication of the blue-book, he is very much mistaken indeed. The members of this House, the people of Canada, and particularly the people of the province of Manitoba, knew all the facts contained in these affidavits long months ago, aye, and years ago. Those of us who live in the province of Manitoba, especially, knew the whole record of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) in connection with the St. François Xavier election, because the facts were long since printed in a pamphlet published by Mr. James Fisher. That pamphlet was published broadcast, and no reference has been made to these affidavits by any member of the Government, or by any other person on this side of the House, since this discussion commenced. These affidavits simply disclosed matters that do not go to the issue of the case itself. But, Sir, they disclose certain facts that are not creditable to the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and for which reason, no doubt, the hon. gentleman was actuated in using the strong language he did the other night. Sir, these are the facts in connection with the St. François Xavier election. At that time the government of Mr. Harrison was being weighed in the balance, and Mr. Burke was the government candidate in that constituency, and Mr. Francis was opposed to him as the Greenway candidate. Mr. Burke was a French-Canadian, and Mr. Francis was an English-speaking Protestant, and rumours had gone abroad in the constituency that if Mr. Greenway and Mr. Martin came into power they were going to wipe out the dual language, going to do away with separate schools, and otherwise going to interfere with the rights which the Roman Catholic minority had enjoyed since confederation. The people of that constituency were consequently alarmed, and it was found necessary that that alarm should be allayed, and an explanation made by some person influential in the ranks of the Reform party, so as to contradict these rumours. According to the statement of Mr. Fisher, the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was imported into that constituency, and at least upon two occasions when addressing the electors of St. François Xavier, he declared that there was no truth whatever in these rumours, but, on the contrary, he gave them his pledge as a man of honour, and as a member of the Reform party of Manitoba, that if he and Mr. Greenway came into power the rights of the minority would not be interfered with. There is not the slightest doubt in the world that on the strength of that representation made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), Mr. Francis was elected. If Mr. Martin had not made that statement, there is no doubt that many who voted for Mr. Francis would have voted for Mr. Burke. And, Sir, the whole reason for the member for Winnipeg feeling so keenly that these affidavits have been placed on record is that the statements that were made publicly by Mr. Fisher and by others have been substantiated by affidavits. The member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) had opportunity, time and time again, to contradict the statements made by Mr. Fisher, but I have failed to find, either in the press or in his utterances on the floor of the local legislature, that he has ever contradicted these statements. Sir, they remain on record to-day, and they reflect little credit on the member for Winnipeg. In addition, we find that these affidavits have reference to an interview that took place between Mr. Greenway and Mr. Alloway, then a supporter of Mr. Greenway, and the Rev. Father Allard, the representative of His Grace the late Archbishop Taché. The facts disclosed in these affidavits relating to that interview are of public notoriety. Most of the members of this House were aware of them long before these affidavits were published in the blue-books. They were facts that were disclosed to the people of Canada by the publication of Mr. Fisher, by the statements of the Rev. Father Allard, and by the statements of Mr. Greenway in the Winnipeg papers, long ago. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) is simply stirring up a mare's nest; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) is simply endeavouring to procure the sympathy of hon. members on the other side of the House, and of hon. members who are opposed to the Government, by trying to make out, from the indignation he showed here the other night, that he has been injured, and that the Government have been outraging him, and outraging all decency, by the publication of these affidavits. Why, Sir, it is a matter of notoriety to the people who are most interested, namely, the people of Manitoba, that neither the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), nor Mr. Greenway, the Premier of that province, have carried out in good faith the promises and the representations that they made to the Catholic minority, both during the St. François Xavier election, and in the statements of Mr. Greenway to the representatives of the Archbishop. And, Sir, it rankles in the bosoms of these people, and they feel keenly that men occupying the position of these hon. gentlemen should have made promises which were apparently made to be broken. Now, we find in this House to-day that singularly enough the last gentleman to speak upon this important question is the author of all the trouble that has brought about this debate, the author of this burning question which is now being discussed more fully, and is occupying the attention of the people of Canada from one end to the other, to a greater extent, than any public question that has arisen since confederation. I take it, Sir, that no more important debate has taken place in this House than this present one, and no more important question has been before the people of Canada to decide upon and to discuss, than this very question now before the House. Sir, we have in this very House the gentleman who is responsible for all the trouble, responsible for all the ills, and responsible for all the difficulties that have arisen out of this matter. It was that hon. gentleman who introduced this contentious legislation in the Manitoba local House in the year 1890. Sir, the action of that hon. gentleman in proposing this legislation was cruel, was heartless, and was heedless. It was cruel in this: that, after having made the representations he did to the electors of St. François Xavier, which enabled him and his friends to defeat the Harrison government and enabled Mr. Greenway and his party to come into power—after having done that, and Mr. Greenway further having made these representations to the Archbishop—I say it was cruel for Mr. Martin and for Mr. Greenway to have made these promises, and, having got into power because of these promises, it was cruel for them, after having been in power for two years, to ruthlessly set aside the promises they had made and by this legislation to wipe out the condition of things that had existed since Manitoba became a part of our confederation. And, Sir, it was heedless in this: that in proposing such legislation the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) had apparently forgotten all that had taken place in the older provinces of Canada in connection with this vexed question of education. He had overlooked the fact that prior to confederation there was almost a deadlock in the old legislature of Canada between the representatives of Quebec and the representatives of Ontario, and that that deadlock was occasioned by this very question as to whether or not the Protestant minority in Quebec and the Catholic minority in Ontario should enjoy the privileges that each of those minorities claimed. He overlooked the fact, as stated by the leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) here the other day, and as re-stated by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives), that the one question which was discussed more than another during the consideration of confederation was this very question as to the rights of the minorities in the different provinces. He overlooked the fact entirely that Sir A. T. Galt, at that time a member of the Government, considered this question of so great importance that he went so far as to resign his position as a member of the Government because he believed he could not secure to the minority of the province of Quebec all these rights that they held dear. And, Sir, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) overlooked the fact that men who held such strong opinions upon this matter as the late Hon. George Brown and the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, in order to secure and bring about a solution of the difficulty, and in order to make confederation possible, had foregone their personal feelings, had foregone their wishes with reference to this question, and had united with Sir John A. Macdonald and the other leaders of the Conservative party at that time, to bring about confederation, and in bringing about confederation to do away with all these difficulties that had arisen, and which had engaged the attention of the people of Canada for years previously. The hon. gentleman was heedless of all that. He was heedless, also, of the fact—of which he must have been aware, of which any person who had read the history of Manitoba, must have been aware—that there was trouble in connection with the entrance of Rupert's Land into confederation. He forgot that, at that time, a delegation representing the people of that country came down here from Winnipeg, and entered into negotiations with the leaders of the Government, Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier. He apparently overlooked the outcome of those negotiations, in what is now known as the Manitoba Act. He forgot the fact that the members of that delegation went back to Winnipeg with a copy of that Act in their hands, as a compact made between the Parliament and the people of Canada and the residents of Red River, or what is now known as Manitoba. He overlooked the fact that that Act was read before the legislative assembly of Assiniboine, or whatever the district was called at that time, that it was held to be satisfactory, and was adopted by that assembly, and that, consequently, they were willing to become a part of this confederation. The hon. gentleman evidently overlooked these. He did not reckon upon them, when he introduced his legislation of 1890, which has caused so much trouble in this country during the last five years. I have no doubt that, if the hon. gentleman had to live over these five years again, he would not be guilty of the act he was guilty of in 1890, when he introduced this legislation, by which he wiped out the system of things that had existed in the province of Manitoba from 1871 up to 1890.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in the address he made the other night, quoted a letter written by him a year ago and published in the newspapers here. He says, that he stands by that letter to-day, and that the position he takes there has been misrepresented. Why, Sir, in that letter the hon. gentleman confesses that the present condition of things in Manitoba, so far as the educational law is concerned, is rank tyranny to the minority. Well, Sir, it seems to me extraordinary, that that hon. gentleman—who knew at the time that legislation was being passed, that he was inflicting upon the minority what he now believes to be rank tyranny—should have felt bound to go ahead with that legislation, without considering the feelings of the people against whom it was directed, or whether it was rank tyranny or not. If that was the feeling of the hon. gentleman at that time, I think we have reason to believe that, in introducing that legislation, he was not actuated by the motive stated by himself and by others on his behalf, namely, to do away with the inefficiency of the schools and give better educational facilities to the people of Manitoba. The position taken by the hon. gentleman to-day, in standing by that law, is rather in accordance with the statement he made at the time he introduced the Bill into the legislature—that he was actuated by only one motive, which was to wipe out the monstrous evil of separate schools, regardless of the fact, that he was going to inflict rank tyranny on the minority, and regardless of the fact, which was pointed out to him at the time, that those separate schools had been secured to those people by the Manitoba Act. That was not the action of a statesman, who had realized the highest ideal of a British statesman. Not only did the hon. gentleman rush ahead with that legislation, but he did so in spite of an amendment that was moved in the House at the time, declaring that it would be well to call a halt—declaring that, before changing the condition of things that had existed in the province for nineteen years, the legislature should ascertain, not by going to the people and getting an expression of public opinion, but from the courts of the land, whether the legislature was legislating within its powers or not in passing that Act. We find that, on the second reading of the Bill, an amendment was moved by Mr. Gillies, one of the leaders of the Opposition at that time. I will not quote the whole of that resolution; but I would call the attention of hon. members to one portion of it:

Whereas in view of such special provision, applicable to the province of Manitoba, grave doubts exist as to the validity of the legislation embodied in this Bill, the effect of which is practically to abolish the system of denominational schools existing in the province, at and since its formation, and it is inexpedient that such an important matter should be passed by this House before its legality has been authoritatively determined or the Manitoba Act so amended as to clearly provide for such abolition;

Therefore, be it resolved that the Bill be not read a second time, but that such steps be taken as will secure an amendment, by the Imperial Parliament, of the British North America Act or the Manitoba Act, whereby the right of the legislature of Manitoba to deal with educational matters in the province shall be firmly and clearly established without appeal to the Governor General in Council or to the Parliament of Canada.

That was the view expressed by the Opposition at that time. They asked Mr. Martin to call a halt. They said: "These people have enjoyed a system of denominational schools for nineteen years under the provisions of the Manitoba Act, and, surely, it is not too much to ask you, Mr. Greenway and Mr. Martin, to withhold this legislation until we obtain an opinion from the courts, whether it is legal or not, or until we make an application to the Imperial Parliament, from which we got our constitution, and ascertain whether that Parliament will amend our constitution or not." But Mr. Greenway and the hon. member for Winnipeg disregarded the position taken by the Opposition on that occasion. The hon. gentleman had undertaken this task, and he was evidently determined to go through with it, regardless of the legal question, regardless of the feelings of the minority, and regardless whether it would plunge Manitoba into the greatest difficulties that any young province could encounter—such difficulties as that province has encountered during the past five years.

Now, Sir, the first position taken by the hon. gentleman in the speech he made the other day, seems to me a very extraordinary one. You recollect, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. leader of the House, in moving the second reading of this Bill, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) dwelt at considerable length on the position of the minority in Quebec, with regard to educational legislation in that province. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) also dealt at considerable length with the same subject. In reply to the remarks of those hon. gentlemen, the hon. member for Winnipeg took exception to the position taken by them, and said he did not understand why any reference should be made to the question of education in the province of Quebec, or why it should be imported into this discussion, and he takes issue with the idea that it illustrates, by a parallel, the position that we occupy in Manitoba. Why, the hon. gentleman goes so far as to say that he did not think it would be a matter of very great importance to the Protestants of Quebec, if they were denied representation on the Council of Public Instruction. Surely, the hon. gentleman could not have listened to the speech made by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives), or to the quotation read by that hon. gentleman and the leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) from the speeches of and utterances of Sir Alexander Galt and other public men, regarding the position of education in the province of Quebec, because, if he had, he would have ascertained that the Protestant minority in Quebec held it very dear indeed that they should have representation on this Board of Public Instruction. Why, the hon. gentleman's reply to the position taken by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) and the hon. gentlemen I have mentioned, is, that the people of Quebec stand in the same position to-day as they did before 1867, with regard to the use of text-books in the schools. And he quoted the clause in the Acts of 1861 and 1867, which you will find in the Consolidated Statutes of Quebec, and cited the fact that the curé, the priest, or officiating minister, had the exclusive right of selecting the books having reference to religion or morality for the use of the pupils frequenting the schools of their own religious tenets, and he argued that, as that applied to Protestants as well as Catholics, therefore, the position taken by the Minister of Justice amounted to nothing. What the Minister of Justice said was this. He said: Suppose that the legislature of Quebec were to introduce and pass legislation, wiping out or interfering with the present Protestant representation upon the Board of Public Instruction of Quebec, in what position would that minority be? They would be placed exactly in the position in which the Catholic minority in Manitoba are now, and their only remedy would be an appeal, under the British North America Act, to the Privy Council of Canada, just as that is the only remedy of the minority in Manitoba. But the hon. gentleman showed his want of knowledge of the question by stating, in reply to the Minister of Justice: Why, such legislation by the Quebec legislature would be ultra vires. It seems extraordinary, that a gentleman who formerly held the position of Attorney General of Manitoba, and who introduced the Bill which has caused so much trouble, should display so little knowledge of the legislation and the condition of things that existed in Quebec in relation to education, as to take the stand he does to-day. Why, the veriest novice would know that such an Act would not be ultra vires. The hon. gentleman overlooks the fact, that the Privy Council, in the Barrett case, held that the legislation which the hon. gentleman introduced, the Act of 1890, was not ultra vires, but intra vires; and, equally, the legislation which the Minister of Justice suggested, might be introduced in the Quebec legislature, would be in exactly the same position as the Manitoba Act of 1890, and be intra vires; and the only remedy which the Protestant minority of Quebec would have against such a measure would be the appeal to the Governor General in Council.

But the hon. gentleman said, further on:

That the only change of importance to the Protestants of Quebec that was made since confederation was the change by which, under the law, they are entitled to a certain number of members on the Board of Public Instruction.

I shall not weary the House by repeating what was so well said, the other day, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) and by the leader of the House of Commons (Sir Charles Tupper); but any one who has read the debates prior to confederation, and who is at all conversant with the history of education in the province of Quebec, knows very well that what the Protestant minority of Quebec were fighting for was a change in the representation of the Board of Public Instruction. That is what Sir Alexander Galt fought for, that is what he resigned his seat for, that is what he went to London for; and, having fought for that and secured it, after the Protestant school teachers of Quebec had petitioned the Queen for that right, we have the hon. member for Winnipeg, at this date in our history, telling this House that it would make little difference to the Protestant minority in Quebec whether these provisions were wiped out or not. He little knows how dear to the hearts of the Protestant minority of Quebec are the privileges that were secured to them by the action of the majority in that province. Why, does the hon. gentleman suppose, for one moment, that Sir Alexander Galt would have taken the position that he did, that the Protestant school teachers of Quebec would have petitioned the Queen as they did, and that hon. gentlemen representing the majority in that province, such as Sir George Cartier and Sir Hector Langevin, would have made the pledge they did, and honourably fulfilled it as they did, if they did not think that this was a matter dear to the hearts of the Protestant minority in that province. Why, the history of the matter shows that, although that legislation could not be carried into effect prior to confederation, Sir George Cartier and Sir Hector Langevin pledged themselves to remain in the local legislature of Quebec for the purpose of carrying out the promises made to Sir Alexander Galt and the Protestant minority, and they remained in the local House and honourably carried out their pledge. In fulfilment of that pledge, that legislation was introduced and carried into effect and has remained on the statute-book ever since. It is the safeguard of the Protestant minority in that province:

and, if any action should be taken by the Quebec legislature to wipe out this safeguard, the only chance that minority would have of getting a remedy would be by appeal to the Governor General in Council in the same way as the minority in Manitoba have appealed.

Without wearying the House, I might read a quotation or two, to give you an idea how dearly the Protestant minority of Quebec hold the position they occupy there to-day, in connection with education. I find that Dr. Davidson, one of the most prominent members of what was known as the Equal Rights Association in Montreal, in the year 1889, wrote a letter, which was read at the convention of that association held in Toronto. Here is what Dr. Davidson said :

It is very easy for you to say do away with separate schools—easy for you and your strong Protestant province of Ontario. But as you are strong be merciful, and remember your weaker brethren in the province of Quebec. While we may blot out the 238 separate schools occupied by Roman Catholics in Ontario, you also desire to blot out the 980 separate schools occupied by Protestants in the province of Quebec.

That appeal, which was made by Dr. Davidson, should have force with hon. gentlemen who are opposing the Government to-day in this question. In addition, Dr. Robbins, principal of the McGill Normal School of Montreal, said :

We are the minority of this province, but we know we are not regarded as a factious or insignificant minority. Our susceptibilities are considered, our educational rights are maintained by the majority.

In the Quebec legislature, at its prorogation, on 21st December, 1895, before closing, the following remarks were made :—

Before closing, Mr. Morris, Minister without a portfolio, said he wished to state that since his entry into the Cabinet every suggestion or representation made by him on behalf of the Protestant minority, had received the utmost consideration, and no reasonable demand had been refused. There had been on all sides a desire to recognize the rights of the minority.

Premier Taillon said he was glad to hear Mr. Morris' remarks, because it would tend to dispel the impression which it had been sought to create in some quarters.

Mr. Stephens said the Protestants never had much cause to complain, and he did not want another impression to go forth.

The Premier was happy to see such breadth of mind, and said some of the other provinces which he need not name, might draw a lesson therefrom. This closed the incident.

That closed the incident, but that indicates to the Protestants of Ontario and other provinces of the confederation the position that our Protestant friends enjoy in the province of Quebec. If so, Sir, every man having a voice in this House, every Protestant in Canada should consider well the position that is being taken in this House to-day upon the question under discussion, and should remember that if we are endeavouring, as we are, to protect by legislation the rights of the minority in Manitoba, the day may come when the hon. gentlemen who are opposing the action of the Government upon this question to-day may be called upon to protect in a similar manner the rights of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. Now, I am not going to be content with the references I have made in this matter, but I desire to refer the hon. member for Winnipeg to a speech made by his leader in 1893. Those who were in the House at that time will remember it and will recollect how fully the hon. gentleman went into this very question. He said :

Suppose that to-morrow the legislature of Quebec were to abolish the Protestant School Board, then, by the effect of that law, the management of the Protestant schools would become vested in the Roman Catholic Board of the Council of Education, that is to say, practically in the hands of the Roman Catholic bishops. If such legislation were to be enacted by the legislature of Quebec, is there a man to say that it would not be a most infamous act of tyranny? Sir, if to-morrow such a law were enacted, the first thing that the Protestant population would do would be to come before this Government and ask this Government, in virtue of the powers vested in it by the constitution to abolish at once the obnoxious and tyrannical legislation. If the Protestant population were to come and represent to the Government that their schools, the Protestant schools, had been placed under the management of the Roman Catholic bishops of the province, I say that every man in this House, be he Protestant or Catholic, would at once call upon the Government to abolish the law and to pass remedial legislation for the Protestant minority.

And the position so handsomely taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition at that time is exactly the position the Government takes to-day in order to protect the minority of the province of Manitoba, and in view of that statement by the hon. gentleman at that time, in view of the eloquent plea I have just quoted, I cannot understand the position he takes to-day. Now that we are making an effort to protect the minority in Manitoba on exactly the lines that he said should be adopted to protect the minority in Quebec in such a case as he supposed, we find the hon. gentleman moving the six months' hoist, thus declaring that the principle of the Bill is wholly wrong, and seeking to prevent us from giving that protection to the minority which he says should be given to the Protestant minority in Quebec were they placed in a similar position. I would call the particular attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg to the utterances of his hon. leader of 1893, from which I have just quoted. I do not ask him to accept my argument, or that of others, with regard to the position of the Protestant minority in Quebec, but I ask him to read the statement of his leader. Had the hon. gentleman shown the same liberality of sentiment and feeling when he introduced his legislation in 1890, as was shown in the speech of his leader in 1893, we should not have been discussing this question to-day, but the legislation then introduced would have shown the same regard for the minority in Manitoba that his leader, in 1893, expressed for the minority in Quebec. Now, by way of emphasizing how our Protestant friends in Ontario feel in connection with the position occupied by the minority in Quebec, I might quote a portion of an address that was signed by the Rev. Principal Caven and Mr. E. Douglas Armour, as president and secretary, respectively, of the Equal Rights Association that was formed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in 1889 :

The right of appeal to the Governor General which minority at present have must remain. The entire Dominion is a proper guarantee for the equality of dealing on the part of the provinces with the adherents of the various churches, and nothing beyond this should be sought.

Why, Sir, here was an agitation got up by the hon. member for North Simcoe, after the Jesuits' Estates Bill had been discussed in this House, and this statement was affirmed by him and his friends in Toronto, in an address of the Equal Rights Association, appealing to the people of Ontario. Does it not meet exactly the position we find ourselves in here to-day in regard to the province of Manitoba? We are well aware, from the history that has been quoted in this debate, that at the time Manitoba came into the confederation there was grave doubt whether the minority would be Protestant or Roman Catholic, but that the provision in the Manitoba Act was to protect the minority, whichever it might be. It turns out that the minority is Roman Catholic, and all that they ask to-day is that they should receive justice at the hands of this Government and this Parliament under the provisions of the Manitoba Act which gave them the right of appeal that the Rev. Dr. Caven and Mr. E. Douglas Armour and the Equal Rights Association of Ontario declared must remain upon the statute-book in order to protect these minorities.

Now, the next extraordinary position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg is when he says that he fails to understand why the leader of the House should have taken up so much time in dealing with the question of negotiations that took place between the provinces prior to confederation. The hon. gentleman goes on to say that the constitution of Manitoba was established long after that time and was not established in pursuance of any provisions of the British North America Act. That seems to me a most extraordinary proposition. As to the leader of the House taking up time in dealing with the negotiations prior to confederation, I can only say that it is a pity that the hon. member for Winnipeg had not taken up more of his time in studying those negotiations before he introduced that legislation in 1890, for he would have found upon reading the discussion which resulted in the establishment of the Dominion, that of the questions that occupied the greatest minds of Canada at that time, nothing caused them more solicitude than this vexed question of education. When we find such leaders as Hon. George Brown, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Oliver Mowat, Sir John Macdonald, Sir Alexander Galt, Sir John Rose, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Hector Langevin—all the leading minds on both sides of politics—giving their time and best ability to the discussion of this question, surely the hon. gentleman should recognize the fact that it is a question larger than he supposed it was when he introduced his legislation in 1890. Sir, we find that the gentlemen to whom I have referred expressed very strong opinions upon this question at that time. Some of those opinions have been quoted already in this House; I will quote a few of them again. The reason that the Secretary of State, the leader of this House, referred at such great length to the negotiations, was to emphasize the fact, and to instruct the young people of Canada to-day, those who were not of an age to remember the discussion that took place at that time, how important this matter was then considered, and to what extent it engaged the attention of the leading men of that day, and how much trouble they took in order to settle it, and to assuage the feelings that had been excited, and to overcome the difficulty that had arisen from that vexed question. Sir, we find the Hon. George Brown saying :

Sir, here we sit patiently and temperately discussing how these great evils and hostilities can be justly and amicably swept away for ever. We are endeavouring to adjust harmoniously greater difficulties than have plunged other countries into all the horrors of civil war.

And again he says :

A most happy day will it be for Canada when this Bill goes into effect, and these subjects of discord are swept from the discussions of our legislature. I am further in favour of this clause as a remedial measure because it brings to an end the doubt that has so long hung over our position, and gives stability to our future in the eyes of the world that could not otherwise have been attained.

How much I regret that the hon. member for Winnipeg had not read the words of his late leader, the Hon. George Brown, before he introduced this legislation in Manitoba in 1890; because if he had read them he would have recognized the fact that those words came from the heart of a man who had struggled long and struggled ably and fiercely against the very position that he announced in that speech, and yet recognized the fact that he had to change his position, that he had to take back a great deal of what he had said, and a great deal that he had done, recognizing that this question had to be settled, and, he hoped, settled for ever. And we all hoped that this subject was settled for ever. It laid dormant from the year 1867 to the year 1890; and it was left to the hon. member for Winnipeg to re-introduce into the arena of politics in this country this vexed question of education; it was left to the hon. member for Winnipeg to open up all the old sores that it had caused prior to confederation; it was left to the hon. member for Winnipeg to undo all the good that had been done by the grand old leaders of both parties prior to confederation. Why, Sir, I lose patience when I think that any man should ruthlessly and heedlessly do such an act as was done by the member for Winnipeg when he introduced that legislation, and threw this apple of discord into the politics of this country. Sir, I trust sincerely that if this question is settled, as I hope it will be, we will never again see a man rising in any legislature in this country of ours, from one end to the other, and re-introducing this vexed question, but that we will settle it now, and settle it for ever. Sir, in addition to the Hon. George Brown, in this country, we find men occupying high positions in the politics of the British Empire have had something to say upon this question. I will quote to the House what was said by Earl Carnarvon, on the second reading of the British North America Bill, on 19th February, 1867, when he said:

Lastly, in the 93rd clause, which contains the exceptional provisions to which I have referred, your lordships will observe some rather complicated arrangements in reference to education. I need hardly say that that great question gives rise to nearly as much earnestness and division of opinion on that, as on this, side of the Atlantic. This clause has been framed after long and anxious controversy, in which all parties have been represented, and on conditions to which all have given their consent. It is an understanding which, as it only concerns the local interests affected, is not one that Parliament would be willing to disturb, even if, in the opinion of Parliament, it was susceptible of amendment; but I am bound to add as the expression of my own opinion, that the terms of the agreement appear to me to be equitable and judicious. For the object of the clause is to secure to the religious minority of one province the same rights, privileges and protection which the religious minority of another province may enjoy. The Roman Catholic minority of Upper Canada, the Protestant minority of Lower Canada, and the Roman Catholic minority of the maritime provinces, will thus stand on a footing of entire equality. But in the event of any wrong at the hand of the local majority, the minority have a right of appeal to the Governor General in Council, and may claim the application of any remedial laws that may be necessary from the central Parliament of the confederation.

Then the Hon. Oliver Mowat, on 25th March, 1890, speaking in the Ontario legislature, says:

In what spirit was the language of the constitution framed? It was a compromise all round, and an essential part of that compromise, so essential that without it confederation could never have taken place, was the provision by which the separate schools of Ontario and the Protestant dissentient schools of Quebec were guaranteed by Imperial enactment, and without these being guaranteed, we could have had no Dominion Parliament with its present limited powers, and no provincial legislatures with their powers.

Then we find the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, when Premier, in the debate on the New Brunswick school question, saying:

I believe in free schools, in the non-denominational system; and if I could persuade my fellow-countrymen in Ontario and Quebec, or any other province to adopt the principle, it is the one I would give preference to above all others. For many years after I had a seat in the Parliament of Canada I waged war against the principle of separate schools. I hoped to be able, young and inexperienced as I then was, to establish a system to which all would yield their assent. Sir, it was found to be impracticable in operation, and impossible in political contingencies.

Now, Sir, these quotations indicate how much thought and how much consideration these gentlemen had given to this vexed question we are now discussing; and I regret very much indeed that the words uttered by the hon. gentleman's leaders, not only by the Hon. George Brown, but by Alexander Mackenzie and Sir Oliver Mowat, had not been read by the hon. gentleman before he introduced the legislation of 1890. Sir, in order to carry out the idea that was expressed by these hon. gentlemen, in order to do away with the possibility of this question arising again in the formation of other provinces out of that vast territory we had acquired from the Hudson's Bay Company, namely, Rupert's Land, there is not the slightest doubt in my own mind to-day that when the Manitoba Act was framed, and clause 22 was framed, with its subsections 1, 2 and 3, the men who were legislating for Canada at that time in this House, had in view the difficulties that existed in relation to this question of education prior to confederation, and they wanted to wipe out, to still for ever, any possibility of the re-opening of that question in those far off lands. Sir, by way of illustration, and proving that such apparently was the feeling of the legislators of the Dominion Parliament at that time, I will quote no less an authority than the Hon. William Macdougall, who, on the 1st August, 1892, in writing upon this question, said:

We certainly intended that the Catholics of Manitoba, or whichever denomination might be in a minority, should have the right to establish and maintain their own schools. You see the words "or practice" were inserted in the Manitoba Act, so that the difficulty which arose in New Brunswick, where separate schools actually existed, but were not recognized by the law, should not be repeated in Manitoba. And then the right of appeal to the Federal Parliament was given to make assurance doubly sure.

I will say for the information of the House, and as a matter of history, that if I recollect aright, it was within one month after the vote had been taken upon the motion of the present hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan) upon the New Brunswick school question, that the Manitoba Act was introduced and passed in this legislature: so at the time of the passing of the Manitoba Act in 1870, all the discussion, all the doubts and difficulties that had arisen, had been ventilated by the several speakers who took part in the debate on that question, and were all fresh in the minds of the legislators who passed that Manitoba Act. Here we have the statements of hon. gentlemen who were members of the House at that time, and in addition to them I desire to quote some remarks made by the Hon. G. W. Ross. Mr. Ross, speaking in Montreal on 19th December, 1895, said:

As the Manitoba legislature had, beyond question, the right (and the Privy Council has so decided) to pass the School Act of 1890, I offer no observation with regard to it, except this, that I believe under the Act by which Manitoba entered the union, it was understood by all the other provinces that the minority, whether Protestant or Catholic, would have the right to establish denominational schools. It was the merest mockery to empower the Dominion Government to interfere for the protection of denominational schools, unless it was assumed that such schools existed, and that in the changes incident to the growth of a new country they might need protection from possible interference some time in the future.

Surely, if we have the opinions of men such as Hon. William Macdougall, Hon. George W. Ross, Hon. George Brown, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and Sir Oliver Mowat, what more do we want to emphasize the fact that the position which this Government has taken on this matter is the correct one. The position taken by the Government of this country is, that they find the legislation introduced by the Manitoba government, in 1871, establishing a system of schools there, which permitted the minority to have their schools, and the majority their schools, was wiped out by the subsequent legislation in 1890; that those rights having been interfered with—rights which they enjoyed under the constitution from 1871 to 1890—should be restored, not upon the mere statement and action of this Government, but restored after we have had the benefit of the judgment of the highest court in this Dominion, and the judgment of the Privy Council in England. So we come here to-day with this Remedial Bill, fortified with the judgments of the different courts of Canada, and of the Empire, and having exhausted every possible effort to approach this matter in a non-partisan manner, and in a manner that should appeal to the people of Canada as proving that the Government are actuated by one desire, to restore to the minority of Manitoba their rights under the constitution, which consti-tion has been interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest court in the Empire. It was to illustrate this position that the Secretary of State, in the speech which he delivered the other day, dwelt at length on the negotiations which occurred prior to confederation, to show the educational difficulties which prevailed prior to confederation, and to show that a settlement had been made. As the Hon. George Brown said "for all time this question has been taken out of the political arena," and it is to emphasize the position taken by the Secretary of State that I have wearied the House by the quotations I have made. In order to satisfy the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) I will not rest content with having quoted the language of hon. gentlemen who have long gone, or who have passed out of political life, but I will place before him the position taken by his leader on this subject in 1893. The leader of the Opposition is reported in "Hansard," 1893, page 1994, as follows:—

It is manifest from the words spoken yesterday by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin)—who can speak with authority on this subject since he was one of the delegates—the intention of the delegates to London was: that these securities, these guarantees, which had been devised by Mr. Galt, it is true, for the Protestant minority in Quebec should be extended to all minorities as well. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) tells us that, in his opinion, although this section may apply to Quebec, and may apply to Ontario, and perhaps to the older provinces of the Dominion, yet it should not apply to Manitoba. Well, Sir, I hope that my hon. friend on this occasion will not take a narrow construction of the law, and I say for my part, that the law has to be construed in a generous and liberal spirit, and whatever privileges are guaranteed to one minority in a province I claim in the name of justice and fairness for all minorities in all the provinces. My hon. friend spoke yesterday as a lawyer, and perhaps after all his contention as a lawyer may be true, that the Manitoba Act has limited the general Act.

The hon. member for Winnipeg said the other night:

The constitution of Manitoba was established long after that time and was not established in pursuance of any provision of the British North America Act.

Yet we have here the leader of the Opposition laying down as a principle that protection was given by the British North America Act to the minorities of Quebec and Ontario, and this was intended to be extended to the minorities in all the provinces. In order to show that so far as the Manitoba Act is concerned, it was based on the provisions of the British North America Act, I will quote the section referred to by the member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), namely, section 2 of this Act. It is as follows:—

The provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, shall, except those parts thereof which are in terms made, or by reasonable intendment, may be held to be specially applicable to, or only to affect one or more, but not the whole of the provinces now composing the Dominion, and except so far as the same may be varied by this Act, be applicable to the province of Manitoba in the same way and to the like extent as they apply to the several provinces of Canada, and as if the province of Manitoba had been one of the provinces originally united by the said Act.

The leader of the Opposition goes on to say :

It seems to me that this very section has imported into the Manitoba Act the whole of section 93 of the British North America Act, and that the privileges which are there guaranteed to the Protestant minority of Quebec are ipso facto to be extended as well to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba.

I think that, with the quotations made by the Secretary of State from the debates prior to confederation and after confederation, will prove to the hon. member for Winnipeg that the British North America Act has everything to do with the Manitoba Act, and with the constitution of that province.

The next point I desire to deal with is the question of an investigation. We find the position taken by the leader of the Opposition is, that the Government should investigate the facts, that they should have made an investigation long ago, before they passed the remedial order, before they introduced the Remedial Bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) also asserted that there should be an investigation made; but, following the example of other hon. members on the opposite side of the House, he did not state what facts are to be investigated. I fail to find in any of the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite in this House, or speeches made by their friends in the legislature of Manitoba, or articles in the newspapers published throughout the Dominion, a single fact set out which the Government should investigate, and which is not within the knowledge of every hon. member at the present time. Do hon. gentlemen opposite forget the case of Barrett and the Queen? Have they read the affidavits of Archbishop Taché, of Archbishop Machray, of Dr. Bryce, and all the other affidavits cited by Barrett in the application to the Court of Queen's Bench? These set out all the facts material to the case. They are on record, and can be read by any hon. member, and they give full information as to the material facts on which the case of the Queen and Barrett was decided, facts as fully set out as could be ascertained by any investigation. But, Sir, strange to say, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) does venture a little further than some hon. gentlemen, and he gives us some things that he thinks should be investigated. For instance, he says :

It is our contention that the very first thing necessary, under the circumstances for the Governor General in Council here, is to thoroughly understand all the circumstances. First, to take up the law as it was in 1871, and as it was amended from time to time up to 1890, and to consider the rights and privileges conferred upon the minority by these laws.

Well, any hon. gentleman can go into the Library and examine the statutes of 1871, and the amending Acts. They were all laid before the court in Barrett vs. Winnipeg, and in Brophy vs. Attorney General, and any gentleman can read the record in these cases, and can read the original Act of 1871 and amending Acts, and get all the facts pertaining to these cases, that he wants. In addition to that, if any hon. gentleman wants to know how the schools of Manitoba have been conducted during that time, he can go to the Library and find the reports of the Superintendents of Education, both of the Protestant and Roman Catholic boards. He can get from these reports, information as to the number of pupils attending the schools, as to the number of schools, as to the provincial grant, and as to every fact that it is material to ascertain. It is the veriest absurdity in the world, for a gentleman occupying the position of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), to say, that one of the things we have got to investigate, and one of the circumstances we have got to look into, is the legislation from 1871 to 1890. It is a great pity, indeed, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), before he introduced the legislation of 1890, did not pay a little more attention to the legislation that existed in other provinces in reference to education.

Now the second point the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) makes is :

To learn, on what pretext, the legislature of Manitoba, in 1890, took away some of these rights and privileges.

How are we to get at that fact, Mr. Speaker? I presume that the best way to get at that would be to ascertain what position the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) took himself, when he introduced the legislation of 1890; and what reasons he gave to the legislature, for doing away with previous legislation upon education. Why did the hon. gentleman appeal to the legislature to pass the Act of 1890. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) no doubt did give reasons to the Manitoba legislature, and I say, that if that knowledge is within the breast of the hon. member, he should have been fair enough to give it to this House. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) does not enlighten us in any single particular as to the reasons which were then given by him. Well, Sir, we find that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), when he introduced the Act of 1890, in the legislature, had not much difficulty in finding a pretext for it. He did not enlarge very much upon that pretext. It was not because the schools were inefficient, as we have since learned. He did not say then that the schools were inefficient. He did not prove that they were inefficient, but on the contrary, he paid a very high compliment to the condition of things which existed previously, and I will show this by a quotation from the speech made by the hon. member (Mr. Martin) in introducing his Bill. He said :

The government consider that they are under a very great deal of obligation to these gentlemen who have from time to time, for many years past, assisted in controlling and shaping the educational affairs, as members of the Board of Education. Their labours thus willingly given, had resulted in great good, and the government's action had not been determined because they were dissatisfied with the manner in which the affairs of the department were conducted under the system, but because they were dissatisfied with the system itself.

So, Sir, all we have to do to find a pretext for the introduction of the Act of 1890, by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), is to find what the hon. gentleman said himself upon that occasion, and his pretext was :

That they were not dissatisfied with the conduct of the schools, but they were dissatisfied with the whole system.

That was his pretext in 1890. Now, Sir, what fact is there to investigate in that? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) in that speech gives us the benefit of the pretext from his own knowledge. He said : That the action of the Board of Education had resulted in great good, and the only reason they were wiping out separate schools was that they were dissatisfied with the system itself. In addition to that, Sir, some weeks ago, I gave another quotation from the hon. gentleman's speech on that occasion, and I showed that another reason he gave was : That he wanted to do away with the monstrous evil of separate schools. Sir, we have the two pretexts from the mouth of the hon. gentleman himself, and yet he tells us to-day in the House, that one of the facts to be investigated is the pretext which gave rise to the legislation of 1890.

As a third reason for an investigation, he (Mr. Martin) says :

Whether the taking away of these rights and privileges, was an unfair oppression of the minority, or a legitimate exercise of the provincial jurisdiction in the matter of education.

Well, Sir, what is there to be investigated, as to whether the taking away of these rights and privileges was unfair to the minority? We have upon record, in the affidavit of Archbishop Taché, and in the affidavits of Barrett and others, the reasons why they applied for a remedy. They show that they are oppressed; they show that they are being taxed, as they say, unduly; they show that they have grievances, and the Privy Council has established the fact that they have grievances. I say, that no investigation which we can make, either by a commission, or by a committee of this House, would throw the slightest light upon this point, or give us any other fact, that has not been laid before the courts, in the cases of Barrett vs. Winnipeg, and Brophy vs. the Attorney General.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) hold, that these past trials have furnished all the information; taking second-hand evidence without reinvestigation?

Mr. DALY. I hold, Sir, that all the facts that were necessary to decide the questions decided by the Privy Council in Barrett vs. Winnipeg and Brophy vs. the Attorney General, were before the court at that time; and more than that: that all the facts that could be given, and that could be ascertained by the counsel for the province of Manitoba, were laid before the Privy Council of Canada by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy).

Mr. CHARLTON. Was it possible to have ascertained later on, as to the working of this school system? Were there any facts to be brought out, after the period the case was tried, that had bearing on the question?

Mr. DALY. Not any facts that were not disclosed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in his argument before us. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) will read the blue-book, and look at the pages and pages of the argument of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), he will find that that hon. gentleman discloses every possible fact he could, in order to sustain the case of his clients, the province of Manitoba. In addition to that, Sir, we have Mr. McCarthy on record in that matter. At Orangeville, on the 17th November, 1895, during the celebrated election that was going on at that time, we find that Mr. McCarthy the senior counsel for Mr. Greenway spoke as follows :—

I do not think there is a corporal's guard of men in Cardwell who want further information. If you do, we will supply it from the statistics of which we have an ample supply. So, if the Liberal candidate comes forward, without any policy except that which Mr. Stubbs supports, why should the forces be divided, and the Government candidate walk in between them. If the Liberal candidate, whoever he may be, wants further information, then you have these three positions to choose from. If you want the Government sustained in their determination to reimpose separate schools on Manitoba, you will vote for Mr. Willoughby; if you want further information you will vote for the Liberal candidate, and, if you are opposed to the re-establishment of separate schools, you will vote for Mr. Stubbs.

Now, Sir, we have Mr. McCarthy upon record, that there is not a corporal's guard of men in Cardwell who want further information. That same hon. gentleman said from his place in this House, that he does not want any more facts, that he has got all the facts he wants to make up his mind on the question ; and you will find the hon. member from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), saying the same thing. These men do not want an investigation. They do not want any further facts. But, most singular to say, Mr. Speaker, the only people we find who want further facts, and who want an investigation into this matter, are the great Liberal party of Canada.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) explicitly stated in the House, that he did require information, and he approved the policy, in that respect, of my leader.

Mr. DALY. No doubt the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) makes that statement from communication he has had with the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He said it in the House.

Mr. DALY. Then, we will include with the great Liberal party of Canada, the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), because I believe he is to be included with them on this vote. We find therefore, that the member for North Bruce, and the great Liberal party of Canada, require further information on this question, and that nobody else does. Singular to relate, we do not find the hon. member for Winnipeg, when he introduced this legislation in 1890, requiring any investigation into the facts. He did not want facts then. But, strange to say, along with his Liberal friends, he wants facts now ; and what are those facts ? I have shown you that the hon. gentleman gives only three reasons for wanting facts ; and every one of those facts is disclosed in the records, which are open to every hon. gentleman who chooses to go into the library and get them.

Now, I understand that one of the reasons given by the local government for abolishing separate schools—and, if I recollect aright, it was also given by Mr. Sifton, when he was addressing the electors of Haldimand—was that these schools were inefficient. As I have said, I defy any hon. gentleman to go through the debates of the legislature, when the Bill of 1890 was under consideration, and find the slightest reference there to the inefficiency of the schools, either Protestant or Roman Catholic. On the contrary, we had a certificate of the hon. member for Winnipeg himself, which I have read, stating that the efforts of the Board of Education had resulted in great good. But if the schools were inefficient, who was to blame for that ? Was it the Board of Education ? No ; it was the government of Manitoba ; for hon. gentlemen may not know that the hon. member for Winnipeg and another member of the Manitoba government, Mr. Prendergast, were members of the Board of Education representing the government, the former being on the Protestant board, and the latter on the Catholic board. Therefore, if those schools were inefficient, these men were to blame, because they could easily have remedied that inefficiency. But we have Mr. Martin's own statement that the schools were not inefficient, but, on the contrary, that good results had come from the efforts of the Board of Education, and that the only reason that had moved him to wipe out those separate schools was that he was dissatisfied with the system and wanted to get rid of the monstrous evil of separate schools. It was not until Mr. Sifton, the Attorney General, came down to Haldimand that we heard anything about the inefficiency of those schools. Therefore, I think it would be well for the hon. member for Winnipeg to present further evidence to the House to establish that those schools were inefficient before he and his friends put that forward as a reason for an investigation.

Now, the hon. member for Winnipeg says that the only way in which the legislature of Manitoba could carry out the remedial order was by restoring the schools exactly to the condition in which they existed prior to the passage of the School Act of 1890. The hon. gentleman also says that the Government have presented a Bill that is not in the terms of the remedial order. Now, in reference to the first branch of this part of the hon. gentleman's argument, I may say that just as clearly as the English language can express it, the remedial order and the covering minute disclose the fact that we particularly included certain quotations from the judgment of the Privy Council to convey to the government and legislature of Manitoba that we did not require them to restore the schools exactly as they existed prior to 1890. But they chose to take that position. Their reply indicated, as I take it, that they did not want to act under the remedial order ; and now the hon. gentleman emphasizes the position they took by saying that there was nothing left to them but to restore the schools as they existed prior to 1890. I will not weary the House with reading the covering minute, which has already been placed upon the record ; but any hon. gentleman who will take the trouble to read it cannot resist the conclusion that it was the desire of this Government not to fasten the legislature of Manitoba down to passing an Act that would simply restore the schools as they existed prior to 1890.

In another portion of his speech the hon. gentleman refers to the answer that was made by the local government to the remedial order ; but he failed to quote the reply that was made by this Government in July, 1895. After the remedial order was passed and transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba for the benefit of the local government and the local legislature, a period of some months elapsed before a reply was made by the local government. They did not reply until the 25th of June, 1895. One month after the receipt of that reply, on the 27th of July, 1895, the Government of Canada transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba a communication to be laid before his advisers and before the legislature. I am not going to read the recitals; but I will read what the Government said:

Fully appreciating the importance of the points involved in the above quoted paragraphs, the sub-committee beg leave to suggest that Your Excellency's Government should avail themselves of the invitation expressed in the memorial for further discussion of the subject, and that the attention of the provincial authorities of Manitoba should be invited to certain considerations suggested by the foregoing extracts.

In the interest of all concerned it will not be disputed that if possible the subject of education should be exclusively dealt with by the local legislature. Upon every ground in the opinion of the sub-committee this course is to be preferred, and with the hope that this course may yet be followed the sub-committee have now the honour to recommend that Your Excellency will be pleased to urge upon the government of Manitoba the following further views which may be pressed in connection with the remedial order.

The remedial order coupled with the answer of the Manitoba government has vested the Federal Legislature with complete jurisdiction in the premises, but it by no means follows, that it is the duty of the Federal Government to insist that provincial legislation to be mutually satisfactory should follow the exact lines of this order. It is hoped, however, that a middle course will commend itself to the local authorities, so that federal action may become unnecessary.

With a view to a settlement upon this basis, it seems desirable to ascertain by friendly negotiations what amendments to the Acts respecting education in public schools in the direction of the main wishes of the minority may be expected from the Manitoba legislature.

It is believed by the sub-committee that the religious opinions and rights which have been recognized in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council could be sufficiently met by the local legislature without impairing the efficiency or proper conduct, management and regulation of the public schools.

It is with the object of effecting some such changes in the educational system of Manitoba that the sub-committee desire that an expression of opinion be obtained from the government of Manitoba. It was with this view that the Canadian Government at the last session of the Federal Parliament made the following announcement:—

"Though there may be differences of opinion as to the exact meaning of the reply in question, the Government believes that it may be interpreted as holding out some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba government and legislature; and the Dominion Government is most unwilling to take any action which can be interpreted as forestalling or precluding such a desirable consummation. The Government has also considered the difficulties to be met with in preparing and perfecting legislation on so important and intricate a question during the last hours of the session. The Government has, therefore, decided not to ask Parliament to deal with remedial legislation during the present session. A communication will be sent immediately to the Manitoba government on the subject, with a view to ascertaining whether that government is disposed to make a settlement of the question, which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province, without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament. A session of the present Parliament will be called together, to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If by that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, the Dominion Government will be prepared, at the next session of Parliament, to be called as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority, based upon the line of the judgment of the Privy Council, and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895."

The sub-committee have, therefore, the honour to recommend that Your Excellency will be pleased to cause communication to be had through the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba with the government of that province, in order to ascertain upon what lines the local authorities of Manitoba will be prepared to promote amendments to the Acts respecting education in schools in that province, and whether any arrangement is possible with the Manitoba government, which will render action by the Federal Parliament, in this connection, unnecessary.

Now, you will find that clearly lays down, as the Government intended it should, in the minute covering the remedial order, that they did not exact that the government of Manitoba would re-enact the legislation which existed prior to 1890. The judgment of the Privy Council does not require that. All it requires is that the Act of 1890 should be supplemented; and I think the remedial order and the memorandum I have just read, of July, 1895, indicate to any fair-minded man that, so far as the Government of Canada is concerned, its desire all through this matter has been that the question should be dealt with by the legislature of Manitoba—that, in accordance with the decision of the Privy Council, the Manitoba legislature should supplement the Act of 1890 by such legislation as would restore the rights of the minority which the minority had prior to 1890. And that is borne out by the communication we made in July. Yet, strange to say, these gentlemen whom, according to the statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition, we are to approach in the sunny ways of patriotism, these gentlemen whom we did approach in these sunny ways—because the language cannot be taken exception to, in which this memorandum is couched—thought so little of the matter that this Government never received any reply to that communication of July, 1895, until December, 1895. Six months elapsed between the time we threw out the suggestion that a middle course should be adopted, before those hon. gentlemen replied; and then their reply was exactly in accord with the reply they made to the remedial order, namely, that they would not recede from the position they had taken, and would not pass any legislation in accord with the judgment of the Privy Council. That shows the fact that, so far as the remedial order is concerned, it was not intended by this Government that the Manitoba government should restore the statutes as they were previous to 1890, but that the Manitoba legislature should supplement the Act of 1890 by such additions as would restore the rights the minority had enjoyed prior to 1890.

Now, the hon. gentleman made the broad statement that the Bill differs from the remedial order. That was a serious charge for him to make, and yet, strange to say, he does not disclose any facts supporting his charge. Where, I will ask him, or any hon. gentleman, does the Remedial Bill differ from the remedial order? As the hon. gentleman says, very truly, the legislation to be enacted should come under the provisions of the remedial order. Have we gone outside of the remedial order? The hon. gentleman had the Bill before him, can he quote any clause or provision of that Bill that is not supported by the remedial order? I think not. I think that any lawyer, going through that Bill, clause by clause, will find that those who framed it confined themselves strictly within the limits of the remedial order.

And then the hon. gentleman attacks us because he says that we have endeavoured by this Bill to make the schools efficient, and that, by our endeavour to make them efficient, we admit that they were inefficient prior to 1890. That seems to me very strange reasoning. Surely we have the right, and it is within the Remedial Bill, to make those schools efficient, if we possibly can. And if there is an enactment in this Bill which goes further towards making those schools efficient than the legislation prior to 1890, we are legislating in a direction that should meet the approval of every member of this House, whether on this or the opposite side, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, whether a supporter or an opponent of separate schools. We want efficient schools; and if those schools were inefficient prior to 1890, the blame rests with the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and the government of which he was a member. I find no evidence to show that they were inefficient, but lest there should be any possibility of their being hereafter inefficient, the Government, by the provisions of this Bill, acting clearly within the lines of the remedial order, have endeavoured, so far as they can, to provide for the future efficiency of any schools that may be established in that country.

Now, the hon. gentleman next says that the Manitoba government will refuse to do anything. That seems to me an extraordinary statement for the hon. gentleman to make. We had read here yesterday evening by the leader of this House a telegram from the Hon. Mr. Greenway, and we had a statement made by the hon. leader of the House to-day, in reply to the hon. leader of the Opposition, that negotiations are about to be opened with Mr. Greenway, or rather that Mr. Greenway has expressed his willingness to negotiate with this Government, and that there is a possibility of a settlement being arrived at. And yet we have the hon. member for Winnipeg, no later than last Friday night, saying that the Manitoba government will refuse to do anything. In support of that statement, he referred to the fact that Mr. Sifton came down here a year ago, between the passing of the remedial order and the reassembling of the Manitoba legislature, and had an interview with the Governor General, and that the Manitoba government refused to recede from their position then, that they refused, in their answer to the remedial order, to recede from their position, that they refused, in reply to the memorandum of July last, to recede from their position, and that they would persist in refusing to do anything. Why, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman takes upon himself to speak for a great many people. In the earlier part of his speech he spoke on behalf of the Protestant minority. A little later he spoke on behalf of the government of Manitoba, of which he is not a member, and said it would refuse to do anything. Well, we trust that the Manitoba government will do something. We trust that it will recede from the position it has unfortunately taken in this matter, and that at last it will come to its senses and realize what the judgment of the Privy Council means. That judgment means that the legislature of Manitoba should act in this matter. The Privy Council did not expect that this Parliament would be called upon to discuss remedial legislation or pass a Remedial Bill, but expected that its judgment being directed to the local legislature, that legislature would pass the necessary legislation accordingly. I do not agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg. I think the probability is that Messrs. Greenway and Sifton will do something, and recede from the position they have taken. If they do not, then the blame will rest with them for refusing the last opportunity that they will have to act in accord with the judgment of the Privy Council. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) looks at me very inquiringly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have given so many last opportunities. I did not know that this was the finally final opportunity.

Mr. DALY. Unless it may be that the opportunity will come, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg referred very feelingly, and that was the opportunity which would come when the leader of the Opposition would be the leader of the Government.

It may be they will have an opportunity then. The hon. member for Winnipeg dwelt at considerable length upon that. But that is a long, long way off. I am afraid we shall be a good deal older than we are before that comes about. This is the last opportunity that is offered to Mr. Greenway and Mr. Sifton and the local government of Manitoba to act in accordance with the decision of the judgment of the Privy Council.

But, Sir, in connection with that feature of the case, the hon. member for Winnipeg took exception to the statement made by the Minister of Justice that all along the Greenway government had refused to act in accordance with the spirit that should have actuated them in connection with this important matter. The hon. Minister just quoted from the Speech from the Throne, and that quotation is repeated by the hon. member from Winnipeg. The words referred to occurred in the Speech from the Throne made by the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba a year ago last January. I think. The words are as follows:—

Whether or not a demand will be made by the Federal Government that that Act should be modified is not yet known to my government. It is not the intention of my government in any way to recede from its determination to uphold the present public school system which, if left to its own operation, would in all probability soon become universal throughout the province.

Now, the hon. member for Winnipeg says that that is "the only evidence that is put forward by the Government as to any indication of its attitude given by the legislature of Manitoba prior to the 21st March, 1895, when they, without any inquiry, on the shortest possible notice to Manitoba."—and so on. In a former part of his speech he says, referring to the hon. Minister of Justice:

In the first place, he said, it was well known that Manitoba intended to do nothing in the premises, and, as a proof of that very broad and, I must say, very untrue statement, he instances the fact that in 1894, a communication was sent from the Government here calling the attention of Manitoba, and also the North-west Territories to the unfair position of their school legislation—

And so on. Now, the hon. Minister of Justice did make that quotation. He quoted from the Order in Council of July, 1894, and the reply that was made by the local government. The hon. member for Winnipeg says: Oh, but when you quote that you quote from a document that was issued by the local government prior to the remedial order, and things are different since the passing of the remedial order; things are different since the deliverance of the judgment by the Privy Council, and the local government take a different position now from that which they took prior to that time. Let us examine whether they took a different position after the delivery of that judgment from that which they took before. Let us consider the position they have taken in this matter from its very inception, namely, since the appeal to the Privy Council in 1894, and we shall ascertain whether the statement by the Minister of Justice and referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg was the only statement that had been made by the local government as to the position they took. I find that on the 30th January, 1895, Messrs. McMillan and Sifton, two members of the local government, were in Toronto. That was after the delivery of the judgment of the Privy Council. What position did they take at that time? Provincial Secretary McMillan said:

The decision is not unexpected. Our counsel advised us that the remarks of their lordships during the argument indicated that the appeal would be allowed. The decision does not affect us in the least. The people of Manitoba know what kind of school system they want, and any attempt on behalf of the Dominion to override their wishes in the matter of remedial legislation would be so much time thrown away.

Now, Mr. Sifton said:

The decision makes no difference to us. We have established a common school system for all, and we will maintain it. The Manitoba government was bound to have one efficient school system for all, and would treat all alike, and cared little whether the Dominion passed remedial legislation or not, as they had taken their stand, and it was a constitutional one, and they were perfectly satisfied.

Mr. Sifton was again interviewed in the same month, January, 1895, and said:

If such a right of appeal be granted by the decision of the Privy Council, then, practically, the immediate effect of the decision will be that the Dominion Government has legal power to restore the educational privileges which the Catholics of Manitoba enjoy under the provisions of the former school Act.

And how will the provincial government take that?

The provincial government will not take it at all.

There will be a deadlock, then, between the Dominion and provincial governments, if the former decides to interfere with our existing school Act?

If they undertake to interfere with the legislation in any way, shape or form, there will be a deadlock certainly. The province will resent any interference with provincial rights.

What form will the resenting of such interference probably take?

Can't tell. We don't know yet that there will be any interference. I don't think the Dominion Government will trouble us. It is a difficult nut for them to crack, but I do not think they will undertake to make any change in our provincial laws.

Now, these are statements made by these hon. gentlemen after the delivery of the Privy Council's judgment. But I am not going to be satisfied to rest the case upon statements made by members of the government. We can find the position taken by the legislature itself and by the government itself in the legislature after the delivery of that judgment. We find, for instance, that, on the 27th of February, 1895, which was after the delivery of the Privy Council's judgment, and after the government of Manitoba were aware of the terms of that judgment, and, if I mistake not, at the time the hearing was going in Ottawa, for I think that hearing began on the 26th of February—in the local legislature of Manitoba, Mr. Fisher introduced a resolution, the concluding part of which reads as follows:—

And, having regard to the suggestions of the tribunal referred to, that "all legitimate" ground of complaint would be removed if the present system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievances upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to those provisions, without a repeal of the present law, this House is ready to consider the grievances referred to, with a view to providing reasonable relief, while maintaining, as far as possible consistent with that object, the principles of the present Act in their general application.

Now, Sir, was that resolution supported by Mr. Greenway, by Mr. Sifton and the members of the government? They did not support it, but they spoke against it and introduced an amendment which was moved by Mr. Sifton, as follows:—

That all the words after the word "While," in the original motion, be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:—"this House loyally submits itself to the provisions of the constitution, as interpreted by the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, it is hereby resolved that the exercise of appellate jurisdiction by the Governor General in Council in such a way as to lead hereafter to the alteration of such principles upon which the public school system of Manitoba is founded, will be viewed with grave apprehension. That an interference by the federal authority with the educational policy of the province is contrary to the recognized principles of provincial autonomy. That this House will, by all constitutional means, and to the utmost extent of its power, resist any steps which may be taken to attack the school system established by the Public Schools Act of 1890, which is believed to be conceived and administered in the highest and best interests of the whole population of Manitoba.

Does that amendment read like the utterance of men who were open to conviction? Does it disclose any desire to have this question decided? Does it show that these men were to be influenced by what the hon. leader of the Opposition calls "the sunny ways of patriotism?" Does it show that these hon. gentlemen recognized the force of the judgment of the Privy Council? On the contrary, it breathes the same spirit of defiance that has been shown by the government of the province of Manitoba in all the action they have taken in this matter from the time of the delivery of the judgment of the Privy Council up to this present moment. The amendment that was moved and carried by the government, the amendment of Mr. Sifton I have read just now, fully answers the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg the other night that the government of Manitoba had not expressed itself as unwilling to settle this question. Why, Sir, if the government of Manitoba had been desirous of settling this question in accordance with the provisions of the judgment of the Privy Council, would they have indicated and passed such an amendment as I have read here? On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, that amendment is exactly in accordance with the position they have taken in this matter all through. They not only passed that amendment then, but since that time they have passed other resolutions in the same line. But, Sir, I am not going to be content even with quoting the interviews that were had with Mr. Sifton or Mr. Cameron or Mr. McMillan; I am not going to be content by quoting the amendments that were made by them in the House or the expression of their opinions as placed on record by those amendments, but I will take the position that their counsel took at the hearing before the Privy Council of Canada, and what was the position then? Why, Sir, we find on that occasion that Mr. McCarthy disclosed to the people of Canada; and disclosed to the committee, exactly the position that the government of Manitoba were going to take in this matter. He says, on page S3:

I have not seen the Queen's Speech, but I should think the Lieutenant-Governor would not be allowed to say that. But I understand that the position of the Manitoba government is that they will resist by every constitutional means in their power the passage of any remedial order, and that they will not obey the order, which is something that they have a perfect right to do.

So, Sir, we have these gentlemen, whom we are to approach in the sunny ways of patriotism, instructing their counsel, who appears before the Privy Council of Canada before any remedial order is passed, to say that they are going to resist by every constitutional means any remedial order, and that if a remedial order is made, they are not going to obey it. Now, that is the position taken by these hon. gentlemen who, we are told, are amenable to appeal, that is the position taken by the hon. gentlemen who have the responsibility upon their shoulders of governing the province of Manitoba; and those are the hon. gentlemen who the member for Winnipeg said in his speech the other night, had not given any indication of an attitude that would disclose an unwillingness to open negotiations, or to be appealed to. Why, Sir, I think these words conclusively prove, as I said before, that those gentlemen have been opposed to any settlement of this matter from its very inception.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is singular that you should not have invited them down to a consultation.

Mr. DALY. I do not think it is singular at all. This Government invited them from the very first to look into this matter properly, they invited them from the very first to consider this matter. But those gentlemen have shown a spirit of defiance from the very inception of the trouble. My hon. friend beside me suggests the quotation I was going to make that :

While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you returning ?

Mr. DALY. You may return with me, and the crowds will exclaim :

See the mighty host advancing,
Satan leading on.

Sir, because Mr. Greenway, and Mr. Sifton, and Mr. Cameron, and Mr. McMillan have taken the position that I have shown they did take, and because the legislature backed them up, is no proof that these gentlemen are not still open to conviction ; and I hope and trust that they will recede from the position they have taken ; and I have no doubt that the hon. gentlemen opposite, who smile at my remarks, are also hoping and feeling that they are now open to conviction and to reason, and that they can be approached ; because I think that we all feel in this House, and the people of Canada feel, that if this matter is to be settled, it should be settled by the legislature of Manitoba. That was the position taken by the judgment of the Privy Council, that was the opinion expressed by Lord Herschell in his judgment, and that was the position taken by our late lamented leader, Sir John Thompson, in a speech that hon. gentleman made in this House in 1893 on this question ; and I cannot do better than to read his concluding words, indicating to you what his position on the matter was, and what he expected to come out of this appeal that was being made to the courts. Sir John Thompson said :

The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) challenges me, as he surely had no right to challenge me, to state in advance what the policy of the Government would be if such and so should happen. I tell him that the answer I can give him now, and the answer I shall be able to give him, if that event should happen, would be this, that the province of Manitoba is a constitutional province, and that whether it be in the hands of legislators opposed to us, or in the hands of legislators in sympathy with us, we have every reason to believe and to rest assured that she will obey the dictates of the highest tribunals of the Empire as to what the constitution is, regardless of consequences, regardless even of the displeasure of the majority if the decision should be against the majority ; and that, so far as the disposal of this appeal is concerned at any rate, the minority must bow to that decision, and the Federal Executive will advise His Excellency accordingly.

Now, those are words with which we can all agree. We all expected, and we all hoped, that when the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council gave its judgment, and that judgment came to the notice of the government and legislature of Manitoba, they would act in accordance with the principle laid down by Sir John Thompson, and that they would recognize and act in accordance with the decision of the highest judicial body in the Empire. Now, Sir, so positive was the member for Winnipeg that the Manitoba government would refuse to do anything, that he went so far as to say—and I want his words to go on record :

But I can say this, that if Mr. Greenway does come here, that will be no sign and no indication that there is any hope whatever that the government of Manitoba will do anything in the premises. They cannot do it ; the government there have rendered it impossible for them to do it. Every attempt has been made—

And so on. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that Mr. Greenway coming here will be no sign or indication that any settlement can be arrived at. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. I hope that his statement is not true. But I wish to deal with the concluding portion of that quotation, in which he says that this Government has rendered it impossible for them to do anything. The hon. gentleman does not give his reasons. Why, have we rendered it impossible for them to do anything ? Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is just as much within the jurisdiction of the legislature of Manitoba to-day to supplement their school Act of 1890, and to provide such legislation as will remove the grievance of the minority, as it was for them to repeal the Acts that existed prior to 1890. They have just the same power to-day ; there is the same power to-day to enact legislation as there was in 1890, when those Acts were introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg. Why, by our action up to this moment, we have not taken any power away from the Manitoba legislature. They are in just as good a position, legally and constitutionally, to legislate to-day, as they were before the judgment of the Privy Council was given, before the remedial order was made, or before this Remedial Bill was introduced ; and the second reading of this Remedial Bill will not affect the constitutionality of any Act that may be introduced and passed by them. So, Sir, without the hon. member for Winnipeg having disclosed any good reason why we have prevented them by our action from passing the necessary legislation to settle this question, the hon. gentleman boldly declares, in the first place, that if Mr. Greenway comes here, we cannot expect anything from him, and that we by our action have prevented them from legislating in the direction of a settlement. Now, the hon. gentleman also says :

Manitoba considered the remedial order a most harsh judgment, given against them in their absence, without any opportunity on their part to meet the case made against them, and they believed that they were justified, in the interest of the province, in answering that remedial order by a dignified refusal to obey it.

How can the hon. gentleman say that the government of Manitoba had no opportunity to be heard? Does the hon. gentleman ignore the fact that the government of Manitoba had secured the services of one of the ablest counsel in Canada, that the government of Manitoba were represented before the Privy Council by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy); and that in accordance with the wishes of that hon. gentleman, a week's time was given him to get more information, to get better posted, and to bring down here, that he might appear before us, the Superintendent of Education, Mr. Blakeley? Every opportunity was given to the counsel appearing for the province to disclose and state before that committee every fact and every argument that could be adduced to sustain the position taken by the government of Manitoba. I cannot understand why the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) should say, as he does state, that we only heard one side of the case, that Manitoba was not represented, that we adjudicated in her absence; and this statement is made in view of the fact that we have a blue-book, 120 odd pages of which are taken up mainly with arguments presented by Mr. McCarthy before the Privy Council. So the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg cannot be sustained. The hon. gentleman read to the House a letter which he read a year ago, and, discussing it, he said that he did not take back any of the statements it contained: that he was opposed to any religious exercises in the schools, simply for the reason he considered we had no right, in the legislature, to deal with the question of religion. The question of religion in the schools was discussed at very great length in the press and by the people of Manitoba at the time of the passing of the Act of 1890. The hon. member for Winnipeg has stated as a fact that, when he introduced the legislation of 1890, he considered that we would have what are termed godless schools, non-sectarian schools, in which no religion should be taught; and it is borne out by the letter from which he quoted, and by the hon. gentleman's subsequent statement, that if legislation had been on those lines, possibly the minority would not have had the reason they have now to complain in regard to religious exercises in the schools. But the hon. gentleman had to bow to the tremendous pressure brought to bear on him by the leaders of the different churches in Manitoba at that time, and by public opinion, and he had to amend the Bill he introduced so as to permit religious exercises being held in the schools, and the Bill was so changed and gave rise to the very serious complaints made by the minority in regard to this question. So, if the hon. gentleman, instead of pressing legislation, as he did, after eliminating that feature from the Bill, had waited until such time as he could frame a Bill that would meet the wishes of the minority, this trouble would not have arisen; but he was bound to push on legislation whether it affected the minority or not, whether the Roman Catholics were to have the right of holding religious exercises in the schools according to their own faith or not; he had no regard whatever for the consciences of the minority, but, apart from their interest altogether, the hon. gentleman was bound to push on the legislation to a conclusion, and he did it. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech the other day, grew very bold. He said:

I take this stand, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Remedial Bill which is now before us for consideration is wholly unconstitutional and ultra vires, and I shall endeavour to satisfy the House of the correctness of that position from a constitutional standpoint.

Then the hon. gentleman quotes subsection 3 of the Act, and he takes this position:

Now, Mr. Speaker, has the legislature of Manitoba ever had the opportunity of passing, as a provincial law, the Remedial Bill which is proposed for our consideration? Never.

Could anything be more perfectly absurd? Surely, if the hon. gentleman has read, as he ought to have read, the remedial order and the covering minute, he would have seen that what the local legislature is called upon to do is to pass such legislation as is necessary to restore the rights of the minority. It may be as well for me to quote the enacting words of the remedial order. They are as follows:—

And whereas the 26th day of February, 1895, having been appointed for the hearing of the said appeal, and the same coming on to be heard on that day, and on the 5th, 6th and 7th days of March, 1895, in the presence of counsel for the petitioners (the said Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba) and as well for the province of Manitoba, upon reading the said petition and the statutes therein referred to, and upon hearing what was alleged by counsel on both sides, His Excellency the Governor General in Council was pleased to order and adjudge, and it is hereby ordered and adjudged, that the said appeal be, and the same is hereby allowed, in so far as it relates to rights acquired by the said Roman Catholic minority under legislation of the province of Manitoba, passed subsequent to the union of that province with the Dominion of Canada, and His Excellency the Governor General in Council was pleased to adjudge and declare, and it is hereby adjudged and declared that by the two Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba, on the first day of May, 1890, intitled respectively "An Act respecting the Department of Education," and "An Act respecting Public Schools," the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province, in relation to education, prior to the 1st day of May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following rights and privileges, which, previous to and until the 1st day of May, 1890, such minority had.

And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid, shall be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the said Acts of 1890, so far and so far only as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.

So that, by the enacting words of the remedial order, the legislature of Manitoba has been called upon to pass a provincial law, and it has refused to do so.

Then, the next point made by the hon. gentleman is thus stated :

There should have been first a refusal of the legislature of Manitoba to enact such provincial law as seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section.

That reason cannot hold, in view of the fact that, by the enacting words of the remedial order, which I have read, the Manitoba legislature was called upon to pass such legislation as would restore the rights of the minority. But the arguments adduced by the hon. gentleman would lead one to the conclusion that it was necessary for this Government to prepare a Bill and send it to Manitoba, and the provincial government should refuse to pass the Bill, before we were in a position to introduce and pass a Remedial Bill. That position is untenable, because it is not necessary for us to prepare and forward legislation to that province. I do not want any better authority for my statement than the position taken by the hon. member for North Simcoe in the argument before the Privy Council. At page 54 of the Manitoba School Case, in reference to that feature, Mr. McCarthy says :

Another question is as to how remedial action is to be carried out. You will make a remedial order. I do not quite agree with my learned friend that you are to frame an Act of Parliament for the legislature of Manitoba. Your duty would be well performed, in case remedial action was to be taken, if you passed the remedial order and left the legislature of Manitoba to put that in the form they saw fit. That order would be an Order in Council upon the report, I suppose, of a committee or of the whole Council and approved of by the Governor General in Council in the ordinary way.

That is exactly what this Government has done. They passed the remedial order, and they have left the legislature of Manitoba to put that into the form of a statute if they saw fit. The legislature of Manitoba have not seen fit to put that remedial order in any form at all. The legislature of Manitoba have refused to do anything under that order. Sir, I do not know any person who would have been more ready than the hon. gentleman himself to take up the cudgels at once, and to have made an attack upon this Government, if we had taken the position he indicates. He now says that we should have prepared legislation and sent it to Manitoba. Suppose we had prepared an Act and sent it to the legislature of Manitoba, it would have indicated to them that they had to pass that law, and no other law. Then this Government would have been open to the charge that we had framed our legislation in such a way that we did not permit of it being changed, or altered, or amended, and that the government of Manitoba would have to pass that Bill or no Bill at all. No person more than the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) would have been ready to have attacked this Government if they had taken that position. But, Sir, I have the authority of the counsel for Manitoba, who declared before the committee—and with that authority the committee and I agreed—that it was not necessary for us to prepare a Bill at all, and that all we had to do, if we were going to pass a remedial order, was to frame that order in such a way as to indicate what was required. We did that. The Manitoba legislature refused to act in accordance with that order, and to-day it does not lie in the mouth of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) to say that the Manitoba legislature should, first of all, have the opportunity to refuse to pass such legislation as we prepared for them.

Another reason given by the hon. member for Winnipeg is as follows :—

Another reason is, that the Governor General in Council has never determined that this Remedial Bill, which we are asked to pass, is requisite for the due execution of the provisions of section 22.

My only answer to the hon. gentleman is : Let him read the Order in Council, and let him read the accompanying minute, and he will see there that we have determined that this Bill, which we are asked to pass, is requisite for the due execution of the provisions of the section. But the hon. gentleman reads subsection 3 as if it were really two clauses. The first part of the section says :

In case such provincial law, as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section, is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then, and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial law for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me perfectly clear that so far as the remedial order itself is concerned, the terms in which it is couched cover the position that the hon. gentleman takes in connection with this subsection 3, and it is also clear that we have met all the objections he has raised as to the terms of the remedial order. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) goes on further and says :

And another circumstance must intervene, and that is, that the order must be transmitted to the legislature of Manitoba and they must refuse to pass the Act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we remitted the remedial order to the government of Manitoba, and they have refused to act. The hon. gentleman goes on to say :

Now, neither of these things has been done. There has been no Order in Council by the Governor General, providing that this provincial law shall be enacted by Manitoba, and there has been no refusal by the legislature of Manitoba to enact this law.

Our only reply to that is : That the remedial order was transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba in the proper way, laid by him before his advisers, and laid by them before the legislature, and we have their reply. In their answer they refuse to do anything under the provisions of the Act. In their answer they say :

We are, therefore, compelled to respectfully state to Your Excellency in Council that we cannot accept the responsibility of carrying into effect the terms of the remedial order.

And as soon as that answer was received by this Government, and they choose to take that as final, then this Parliament would be vested with the authority to pass the Remedial Bill we now introduce. Mr. Speaker, I am hurrying on in order to get through before six o'clock. In the conclusion of the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), he makes this declaration, and he announces by this declaration that he takes the same position as was taken by the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion). He says :

I believe that there is no man in Canada better fitted to bring about a solution of this troublesome and burning question than the hon. gentleman whom the Liberals have the great fortune to have at their head. That gentleman has the confidence, I believe, of a large portion of his native province. He has also the confidence of a large portion of the people of Manitoba, the province particularly affected by this question.

* * * * *

I am satisfied that he will be able to settle this question, not, as I understand the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite to mean, because the government of Manitoba happens to be Liberal and he is the Liberal leader ; not at all for that reason, but because he has taken a statesman-like view of this question.

And we find that the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), in the concluding portion of his speech the other night, announces himself somewhat in the same style. He says :

Sir, having decided to vote against this Bill, I repeat that I shall do so, not because I am opposed to remedial legislation. On the contrary, I stated last year, that I had no confidence in the promises that were made on behalf of the Government by one of the Ministers ; but I have a strong faith that our leader will be able to succeed where the Government are sure to fail. I have full confidence in my party, and not only in the leader of my party, but in his lieutenants.

Now, Sir, these concluding remarks of the member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), and of the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) indicate to me that there has been a pretty good understanding between the different members and branches of the Liberal party in Canada, from Quebec through to the province of Manitoba. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) in the course of his address spoke of :

The splendid and patriotic stand that is taken by his leader on this question.

Now, Sir, there is no doubt that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) may believe that his leader is taking a patriotic stand. But it has been pretty hard for some of us to find out exactly where the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has stood upon the question. For instance, we first find that the hon. gentleman said : The question was a legal one. He next said : It is a difficult question. He next said : It is a question of fact. He next said : It is not a political question ; and then he said : It is purely a judicial question. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) seems to think, judging by the positions he has taken, that this is a Chinese puzzle, because he first says : It is a legal question ; then he says : It is a question of fact ; then he says : It is a political question, and then : It is a judicial question. Now, where do we find the hon. gentleman ? It is either a legal question or a question of fact. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, as the question grew, and as the hon. gentleman's position grew more intelligible, that he shifted his ground. When he addressed this House in 1893, he said it was a question of fact, and the question of fact which the hon. gentleman then said should be investigated by this Government was the statement made by the Archbishop in his memorial, that the schools in Manitoba were Protestant schools. We all remember how vehemently the hon. gentleman spoke on that occasion. We all remember how he declared that if that was a fact, he would go to Manitoba and appeal to Mr. Greenway, and into every Orange lodge in the country, and appeal to their sense of fair-play. He said :

I would not hesitate, if the statement is true, to go ahead and plead the case of the Catholics in Winnipeg with the government of Mr. Greenway himself, because, if there is such an outrageous state of things prevailing in the province of Manitoba, not a moment is to be lost in coming to the rescue of the oppressed minority. These are my sentiments. That is the position in which I stand at this moment, and that is the reason why I arraign the Government as I do. There was the fact which they should have investigated, and to which they should have addressed themselves; but, instead of investigating that fact, they tried every subterfuge in their power to delay investigation, because if they had studied the question, they would have to come to a decision.

The question of fact which the hon. gentleman wanted to investigate was whether or not those schools were Protestant. Why, Sir, it seems to me that no better opportunity could have been given to the hon. gentleman to ascertain that for himself than was given to him when he visited Winnipeg in 1894. The hon. gentleman was then on the same platform and face to face with Mr. Greenway; he was in communication with Mr. Greenway and the members of his government. More than that, he was waited upon and interviewed by a representation of his own co-religionists, who told him that those schools were Protestant. I quoted their statement before, and you will find it in the debates that took place in this House on the 21st of January, 1896. And yet, with that evidence disclosed to him by his own co-religionists on the spot, did we find the hon. gentleman taking the stand that he had declared he would take? He had said that he would plead the cause of the Catholic minority with Mr. Greenway himself. He had said:

I shall be prepared to repeat, and would repeat on every platform in Ontario, every platform in Manitoba, nay, every Orange lodge throughout the land, that the Catholic minority has been subjected to a most infamous tyranny.

Yet we do not find that the hon. gentleman has taken any steps in that direction from the day he made those declarations—and why? Is it because the hon. gentleman has found since then that the question is a legal one? Is it because he has found that it is purely a judicial question? Under these circumstances, it seems to me ridiculous for the hon. member for Winnipeg to say that the hon. leader of the Opposition has taken a patriotic stand on this question. In 1893 we had him declaring that not a moment was to be lost in coming to the rescue of the oppressed minority. That oppressed minority was the same minority that we find in Manitoba to-day; and when this Government are endeavouring to come to the rescue of that oppressed minority, where do we find the leader of the Opposition? We find him moving the six months' hoist to a Bill to give relief to that oppressed minority. At Morrisburg he said:

The question cannot be settled until there has been such an investigation. I would approach Greenway with the sunny ways of patriotism.

And when he puts up the hon. member for Winnipeg, who is supposed to be more conversant with the facts of this case than any other member of this House, that hon.

Mr. DALY.

gentleman cannot tell us what facts are to be investigated or what we require to have light upon. At Chicoutimi the hon. leader of the Opposition reiterated, amidst indescribable enthusiasm, his solemn engagement to re-establish the Catholic schools on his arrival in power; and I suppose that is what the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) is looking for. Is that why he supports this motion for the six months' hoist? Because he thinks that the minority in Manitoba must wait for separate schools until his leader comes into power? Is the hon. gentleman playing to the galleries of the province of Quebec? Is he trying to make out to the people there that this Bill will not restore the rights of the minority, but that if they wait until his leader comes into power, he and he alone can restore those rights? Is that the position the hon. gentleman takes? The hon. leader of the Opposition has accused this Government of vacillation that was fast paralyzing and fast disintegrating the national life. This Government have taken, step by step, such a position as they thought was the correct one—first ascertaining the legal rights of the minority of Manitoba, and what should be done to remedy the grievance which the highest court of the Empire declared they were suffering under; and, Sir, they are prepared to stand by the position they have taken. They have never swerved or deviated from the plain path of duty laid down by Sir John Thompson, when the Barrett case was sent to the highest court in the Empire. Following that, when the Government received the petitions from the Archbishop and the minority, asking that they should be heard under section 22 of the Manitoba Act, the Government said to those gentlemen: "Wait until that decision is confirmed, and then will be the time for us to hear you." And when the decision in the case was given, and they made their appeal to us under the provisions of the Manitoba Act, then the question arose whether or not, in view of the decision in Barrett vs. Winnipeg, we could hear that appeal. We did not take upon ourselves to decide that question, but submitted it to the courts for their decision. We went first to the Supreme Court, which decided in one way; then we carried it to the Privy Council, which decided that we should hear the appeal. We then heard the appeal; both sides were represented; we gave our judgment; and we have followed up that judgment by this Remedial Bill. So, that our policy has not been vacillating and paralyzing; but the policy of the Liberal party has been vacillating, paralyzing, and fast disintegrating the national life of Canada, because it takes the position that this House should not proceed with this Bill and be for ever done with this question. If this legislation is enacted by this House, there is no doubt that the question will be settled in a very short time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I have only to say that, speaking for the people of the province of Manitoba whom I represent, they regret exceedingly that this question has been kept open and alive so long. They think that the sooner it is settled the better it will be in their interest and in the interest of the people of Canada as a whole; and I am satisfied that when the matter is properly put before the people of Manitoba, they will agree with me that the question should be settled by the legislature of Manitoba—that they believe this question could have been easily settled by Mr. Greenway and his government, and there are no people in this confederation of ours who will hail with greater delight a settlement of this question than the people of Manitoba, more particularly if that question is settled by Mr. Greenway and his government; and I hope sincerely that the declaration which we have here in the telegram sent by Mr. Greenway, that he is willing to come down here and negotiate with this Government, will bear fruit. I hope that these negotiations will go on and that Mr. Greenway will arrive at the conclusion that it would have been better for him, better for Manitoba, and better for Canada, if he had taken the position a year ago which he takes to-day, and had settled this question by legislation such as I hope will be passed by the legislature of Manitoba during its ensuing session.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in rising to address this House, to-night, I do not intend to make any lengthy remarks. In order not to take up the time of the House beyond what is necessary, I shall content myself with giving the several grounds upon which I rely to support the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition. The question we have to deal with now, as all educational questions, is a complicated and difficult one. The first reason why it is so difficult to bring about a harmonious and satisfactory solution of the question at issue is inherent in the different views entertained by both Protestants and Catholics on the matter. There are in educational matters certain principles at stake on which they hold very strong and opposite views. It is not to be wondered at, Sir, if the Catholic hierarchy and the Protestant ministers have evinced such a lively interest in the question now under discussion in this House, and if there is strife between the different races and creeds arrayed in hostile camps. As to me, as a Catholic, I believe in the principle of denominational schools; I believe in the necessity of religious instruction in our schools. I coincide in the opinions the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) has given expression to on the floor of this House, a few days ago, in the course of his speech, which has enlisted the attention of the hon. members, although I sincerely regret to be unable to arrive at the conclusions he has reached. The hon. member for Berthier thus delivered himself:

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) I am one of those who conscientiously believe in denominational schools for Catholics and for Protestants as well; for Manitoba Catholics as well as for Quebec Protestants; I believe in the inalienable right of the head of a family to decide in which school his children are to be educated, in which religion they will be brought up, and I look upon as an intolerable usurpation any attempt at infringing that right.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) In looking over the educational legislation of the province of Manitoba, I find that in 1870 a complete system of separate schools was set up in favour of Protestants, then in a minority, and in favour of Catholics, who were then in a majority. A council of public instruction was established, comprising a Catholic section, having under its control the Catholic schools, and a Protestant section, having under its control the Protestant schools. The public grants were distributed according to population, and the school taxes were appropriated to the maintenance of Catholic or Protestant schools, according to the religious tenets of the ratepayers.

That state of things continued for twenty years. In 1890, two Acts were passed, altogether doing away with that state of things, substituting for the separate schools a so-called system of public schools, but in reality Protestant, which despoiled the Catholics of all the rights they had hitherto enjoyed.

It was, in my humble opinion, an iniquity, an act of intolerable tyranny, which it was impossible to tamely acquiesce in. The Catholics vigorously protested, but it was of no avail. Vainly did they petition for the exercise of the federal power of disallowance. This action, had it been adopted, would, perhaps, have resulted in momentary commotion, but never would it have led to an agitation fraught with such danger as the one which we now witness with so much sorrow. After having twice run the gauntlet of the judicial tribunals, the Catholics now come before this House, with a judgment of the Privy Council to the effect that their most sacred rights have been infringed upon. They come before this House, asking that their schools be restored to them, that the imprescriptible rights of their conscience be respected, and that a stop be put to the tyranny, under the unbearable weight of which they have too long suffered. Are we to turn a deaf ear to their prayer? Shall we tell them in so many words by our vote that might is right, and that there are no longer any rights which the majority are bound to respect? Are we, then, to shrink from the most important, the most imperative, the most honourable duty which is incumbent upon this Parliament, that of extending our protection to the minority in the enjoyment of their rights?

We, as Catholics, Sir, have no right to turn a deaf ear to the prayers and entreaties of the Manitoba Catholics, and that is the reason why I hailed with delight the Order in Council of the 19th March, 1895, which recognizes that the minority had: (1) The right to build, maintain, equip, conduct and support their separate schools; (2) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purpose of education; (3) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contributed to Roman Catholic schools from all payment and contribution towards the support of any other schools. I have, on several occasions, publicly expressed my adhesion to that Order in Council, both on the public platform and in the press. I would have, at the session of 1895, willingly supported and given the support of my vote to a fair, sincere and practical enforcement of that Order in Council. I would again have been ready to give it my best support, at this session. Now, Sir, if I think it my duty to vote against the Bill which is now before the House, the reason is that, in my humble opinion, it will not secure an honest, fair and practical enforcement of the enactments of the Order in Council I have just quoted, and also because it can in no way remedy the grievances complained of by the Catholic minority nor will it restore to them the rights and privileges they have been so unjustly deprived of. Let me, Sir, refer again to the words fallen from the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), who commented on the Bill, as follows:—

To my mind, it is beyond doubt that, whatever favours or concessions the Manitoba government may be disposed to grant to the Catholics in the administration of public schools, they will never agree to a restoration of denominational schools.

In consequence, I have reached the irrefragable conclusion that the only remedy calculated to restore to our compatriots their schools is a federal statute.

Now, Sir, having laid down these principles, and reached the conclusion I have just mentioned, I come to consider the Bill as it stands.

I, for one, do not look upon the Bill as an ideal one. The principles upon which it is grounded are, no doubt, excellent; but they have forgotten to draw from them all the conclusions. This I look upon as a very unfortunate idea, that of allowing the provincial government three months either to accept or ignore the Bill, to appoint the members of the School Board of Education, or in default of the provincial government to empower the Federal Government to make the appointments. Were any doubts left as to the tendencies of the local government, were not their hostility so open and so emphatic, there would perhaps be some excuse for that alternative. But, under the circumstances, it is, to say the least, an act of weakness.

The Bill recognizes to Catholics the right to share proportionately in any grant made out of public funds for educational purposes; but it fails to oblige the province to make such grants in proportion to those which may be granted to public schools. To my mind, that clause is entirely illusory.

Another defective provision is that which invests the provincial government with the exclusive power of appointing inspectors to whom is committed the duty of ascertaining the efficiency of the separate schools. It is quite clear that with such provisions as these, the separate schools will lack efficient visitation, and will not be subsidized by the provincial authorities. Evidently the Bill is based upon the false assumption that it will be accepted and fairly put in operation by the local government. How such an idea came to spring up in the minds of our Ministers is more than I can understand. It seems to me that the Bill ought rather to proceed from the principle that the provincial government, having shown openly, and reiterated their hostility to separate schools under any shape, the federal law should provide for their creation and their maintenance under the exclusive control and protection of the Dominion Government. In short, the separate schools should have been made a purely federal institution, until, at least, the local legislature had passed a new statute restoring to the minority the full enjoyment of all their rights.

Through their having adopted a different principle, the Dominion Government run the risk of securing from their legislation but partial and unsatisfactory results for the minority. Neither do I mean to take back or to mitigate any of the charges which I have made in regard to the unsettled and wavering government policy, which has only resulted in complicating the position, in fostering an agitation fraught with danger, and in making more difficult the adjustment of the matter. Far from taking back any of those charges, I make bold to arraign the government on a further ground still more serious; it is that of having endangered the passage of the measure in not having brought it down at the very outset of the session, in losing valuable time in intestine squabbles, and by throwing for a whole month as a bone of contention to the disputation of parties a budget which they had no intention to have voted by the House. If, owing to the threatened obstruction which the Government measure might be offered in the Committee of the Whole, both by their friends and my own friends who oppose the Bill, it could not be pressed through this House and made law before this Parliament has reached the natural term of its life, that is to say, before the 25th of April, the Government will be held responsible, and will warrant the belief of those who challenge the sincerity of the Ministers.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) I think the hon. member would find it difficult to substantiate his statement, as to some of his friends intending to make obstruction. As to me, I must say that it is the first intimation I have of it, and I do not think our friends on this side of the House are harbouring any such thought. Whether the followers of the Government intend to pursue such a course is more than I can say.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. (Translation.) Well, then let us say that the obstructionists are among the followers of the Government.

Notwithstanding the shortcomings of the Bill, which may be corrected in the Committee of the Whole, through the amendments of which the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) has given notice, I shall vote against the six months' hoist, and in favour of the second reading of the Bill.

Were the amendments given notice of by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) carried, not only would the Bill be improved, but it would also be materially altered. But the hon. member for Berthier should be aware of the fact that the amendments in question were several days ago, put on the Order paper; they have been brought to the notice of the Government and none of the Ministers have so far intimated their intention of accepting them. Those amendments are of such import that they cannot have escaped the attention of the Ministers before the Bill was brought down; and if they have not been embodied in the measure now before the House, the reason is that the Government do not mean to accept them and to carry through the House and pass them into law. Moreover, my hon. friend from Quebec Centre has directly put a question to the hon. Postmaster General on that important matter, stating that he was ready to give his support to the Bill, were the Government willing to complete it in the direction mentioned. The hon. Postmaster General has declined to give any answer. This is an eloquent silence, Sir. Beyond any doubt, it is not to be expected that the Bill will be perfected and rendered more operative, during this session. At any rate, I think the objections raised by the hon. member against the measure now before the House carry a great weight with them. But there are many other objectionable features in this Bill. I am satisfied, that before I resume my seat, I shall have somewhat added to the list of objections and I will show without fear of contradiction that the so-called Remedial Bill does not award justice to the Manitoba Catholics, and further, that the enforcement of that Bill cannot but result most disastrously to the Catholic interests and imperil the great principle of denominational schools which we are here to uphold. But, previous to reaching that point of the question at issue, I think it my duty to arraign the Government, on the ground of not having done their duty by the Catholic minority in Manitoba. The fact is, Sir, that for six years back, during all the time that this question was before Parliament and before the country, the Government seem to have been actuated by no other concern but that of shirking their duty and their responsibility, and shifting it on the shoulders of others, by resorting to all kinds of subterfuges. The hon. Ministers seem to have devoted themselves, not to mete out justice, but to prevent the wrongs from being redressed. In order to substantiate this last proposition, I shall have to trespass upon the forbearance of the House, while I go a few years back, to review the history of the school question, in order to appreciate its most salient features.

After Recess.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) When you left the Chair, at Six o'clock, Sir, I was about saying that I should have to trespass upon the forbearance of the House, while going a few years back, to make a retrospective review of the question under discussion. To begin with, Sir, on the 7th April, 1890, almost upon the enactment of the school laws, the following petition was sent to the Executive by Archbishop Taché and the leading members of the Catholic minority of Manitoba, praying for disallowance:—

To His Excellency the Governor General in Council:—

The petition of the Catholic section of the Board of Education in and for the province of Manitoba, doth hereby most respectfully represent; That

Whereas previous to and at the time of the union there existed by practice in the territory, which now forms the province of Manitoba, a system of denominational schools.

Whereas the maintenance of such system was made a condition of the union by clause 7 of the Bill of Rights upon which such union was negotiated.

Whereas, thereafter the legislature of the province of Manitoba has established a system of denominational schools which has been in existence since the union up to this year without being questioned or complained of.

Whereas the existence of such a system of denominational schools by practice previous to and at the time of the union, and by law since the union, has created rights and privileges in matters of education to Catholic and Protestant denominations alike.

Whereas a part of the protection afforded to all by clause 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, it has been enacted by clause xxii of the Manitoba Act, that:

"XXII. In and for the province, the said legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:

"(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

"(2) An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education;"

Whereas two bills respectively intituled "An Act respecting the Department of Education," "An Act respecting Public Schools," have been adopted by the legislature of the province of Manitoba, at the session closed on the 31st day of March, A.D. 1890, and whereas such legislation has prejudicially affected the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority of this province with respect to Catholic schools, inasmuch as by said Acts the said Catholic schools of this province are wiped out.

The Catholic section of the Board of Education in and for the province of Manitoba, most respectfully and earnestly pray His Excellency the Governor General in Council, that said last mentioned Acts be disallowed to all intents and purposes, and your petitioners will ever pray.

ALEX., Archbishop of St. Boniface, O.M.I.,
President of the Catholic Section of Board of Education.

T. A. BERNIER,

Superintendent Dept. of Education for the Catholic Section.

Winnipeg, 7th day of April, 1890.

The undersigned, respectively members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, fully endorse the contents of the present memorial, and earnestly join in the prayer therein contained.

A. A. LARIVIERE,

M.P., for Provencher, Man.

M. A. GIRARD, Senator.

Ottawa, 26th April, 1890.

Other petitions were sent to Ottawa, later on, praying for interference by the central power. What were, under the circumstances, the Government bound to do? To my mind, that question admits of but one answer, and that is a simple one. Had the Government been disposed to do justice, they would have asked no other alternative but to hear forthwith the appeal of the minority. They had no other course open to them but to invite to Ottawa the representatives of the Catholic minority and those of the Greenway government; to take into consideration the grievances of the Catholics; to hear the reasons alleged in support of their law by the Greenway Cabinet; to forthwith appoint a commission of inquiry into all the facts at issue between the contending parties; to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada, all the questions of law and fact, which that high tribunal would have been called upon to determine, under the Blake resolution which had just then been passed by the Parliament of Canada, and, finally, to do justice, in accordance with the facts of the case. Had the Government done their duty under the circumstances, the school question would have been settled and set at rest five years ago, and it would have been long since buried into oblivion. Had the appeal then been heard, had an investigation been held, beyond the shadow of a doubt the facts elicited at that inquiry would have been so favourable to the cause of the minority that the Government could not have helped disallowing the law, and by the very fact all traces of wrong doing and injustice would have disappeared. It is within the recollection of this House that in the case of Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg, the Supreme Court decided that the laws of 1890 were "ultra vires." Undoubtedly, upon reference made to that court by the Government, the same finding would have been reached. And strengthened by that judgment, the Government would have found themselves in the best position possible to disallow the law without in the least provoking a conflict with public opinion in the country. Why did not the Government resort to such a simple and expeditious proceeding which was at their disposal? The reason for the course they have followed is certainly not because they were opposed in principle to disallowance, since they disallowed two other acts that had been passed by the Manitoba legislature that very same year. The true reason for it was that the majority of the Government were then, as they now are, hostile to the Catholic minority, and that they never sincerely meant to do what was just to them. Here are the reasons, Sir, alleged by the Government press, to palliate the course pursued by the Government of the day. They say: (1) That Archbishop Taché and the Catholic minority in Manitoba had waived their claim to disallowance, because the Blake motion, adopted in 1890, precluded disallowance from being resorted to; (2) That disallowance would have proved useless, because the Greenway government could have re-enacted their law at every subsequent session. Let us then, Sir, scrutinize those two propositions and see whether they are well-founded. They say, first, that Archbishop Taché waived all claim to disallowance. Allow me, Sir, to refer here to what that distinguished prelate stated in a pamphlet which he published in 1893. It is but right that the House should be made acquainted with the means resorted to, in order to induce Archbishop Taché to waive his claim and let the Government have their own way. Let us hear what Archbishop Taché says in that connection in his pamphlet, page 101:—

I pray those who busy themselves about the disallowance of the school laws of Manitoba to pay special attention to what follows; in it there is something that deserves so much the more to be known, that the fact of not being aware of it has prevented even sincere men from fairly judging the question. To express myself more plainly and explicitly to those who ignore or forget what was done in Parliament, I say: "It is not the minority of Manitoba, nor Archbishop Taché that have abandoned the claim for disallowance. The granting of disallowance was made impossible by the unanimous vote of the Commons of Ottawa on Mr. Blake's resolution.

I want to be well understood; my words are not a reproach addressed to one of our public men, one of the most distinguished and the most generally esteemed. Hon. Edward Blake does not need my testimony in order that his superior intelligence be known and appreciated. I have no doubt of Mr. Blake's honesty, so that I am convinced that when he got up in the House it was not to add another difficulty to the solution of the question, no more than to diminish the responsibility of Sir John A. Macdonald and his government. In other words, Mr. Blake works neither against our schools nor in favour of his political adversaries. Nevertheless, he was the first to take in hand the question we now consider. Petitions asking for the disallowance of and every possible remedy against the legislation of which the Catholics complained, were hardly arrived at Ottawa when Mr. Blake rose in the Commons to move the following resolution:—

"That it is expedient to provide means whereby on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance or the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the Executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented, and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the Executive."

I pray those who charge us with the responsibility of not having obtained the disallowance of the Act to ponder over this resolution, and to read carefully the speech by which Mr. Blake supported it. That speech is found in "Hansard," 1890. As all my readers are not able to refer to this statement, I will make a few short quotations:

Here follow some extracts which it would be too long to quote and to which I shall refer again, later on:

All this is perfectly clear. Hon. Mr. Blake moved that in educational matters, as in the Manitoba case, the Government should not resort to the power of disallowance in the case of provincial Acts, nor even of hearing the appeal against such laws, without having beforehand referred the matter to a high judicial tribunal, to receive light and a direction which, although it leaves a responsibility upon the Executive, may enable it to act more safely, with less passion, and thus make fewer victims of political expediency. It was therefore a new machinery which the Administration was invited to set in motion.

As it will be seen, by the above extract, Archbishop Taché did not wave his claim to disallowance,—at least not of his own accord—and if he deemed it unpracticable, it was merely owing to the fact that bogus papers had been communicated to his Grace, not only in connection with the Blake motion, but also with reference to that gentleman's address in support of his resolution. Let me give to this House and contrast the very words of the Blake resolution and of his address in support of the same :

Blake's motion from (Hansard).

That it is expedient to provide means whereby on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance, or of the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the Executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration, in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the Executive.

Archbishop Taché's Pamphlet.

That under solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance or the appellate power as to educational legislation, the Executive should not act without having previously referred important questions of law or fact to a high judicial tribunal, in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented and that an opinion may be obtained for the information of the Executive.

It is quite easy for any intelligent man to see the difference between the two texts. I shall now proceed to contrast extracts from Mr. Blake's address :

From Archbishop Taché's Pamphlet.

It is now generally agreed that void Acts should not be disallowed, but should be left to the action of the Court.

From Hansard.

If it be ultra vires, the Act is void, and I think I may say that it is now generally agreed that void Acts should not be disallowed, but should be left to the action of the Courts. It is nevertheless, and I think with sound reason, contended, that circumstances of great general inconvenience or prejudice from a Dominion standpoint, and involving difficulty, delay or the impossibility of a resort to law, may justify the policy of disallowance, even in cases in which the Act is ultra vires, and therefore void.

When you act under the appellate educational clauses, as for example in the case of Manitoba. . . . It is important that the political executive should avoid, as much as possible, to arrogate to itself judicial powers. . . . It ought to have the power to call in aid the judicial department in order to arrive at a correct solution.

Now, I aver that in the decision of all legal questions, it is important that the political executive should not, more than can be avoided, arrogate to itself judicial powers ; and that when, in the discharge of its political duties, it is called upon to deal with legal questions, it ought to have the power in cases of solemnity and importance, where it may be thought expedient to do so, to call in aid the judicial department, in order to arrive at a correct solution.

I did not give, previously, the full text of Mr. Blake's address, as quoted by Archbishop Taché. I have given the page, in order that the hon. members may contrast the passage, as given in the Bishop's pamphlet and in "Hansard." It is a melancholy reflection to find out that such contemptible means should have been resorted to in order to bias Archbishop Taché's judgment and induce him to accept the reference to the judicial tribunals. As to the second pretext alleged, it is wholly groundless. It is easily understood that, if the law had been re-enacted at every subsequent session of the legislature, it should have been disallowed every time, and in the meantime the Catholic minority would have enjoyed their rights and privileges. The outcome of it would probably have been that, from one session to another, the law would have been amended so as to render it acceptable to both Protestants and Catholics. Be that as it may, the case was carried before the tribunals and regular proceedings were taken to test the validity of the educational acts by means of an application of Mr. Barrett, to quash a by-law of the city of Winnipeg. It has been contended that that action had been taken with the consent of the Catholic minority, and in compliance with the Blake motion. Those contentions are absolutely groundless. In the first place, a simple glance at the Blake motion suffices to show that all it does is to prove means whereby the executive may refer the question to a high judicial tribunal, and that it can in no wise be construed as in the least warranting such protracted and costly actions as those which have been taken at the instigation of the Government, with a view to shirk their responsibility. As to the other pretensions, it is flatly denied by Archbishop Taché himself, page 107 of his pamphlet, reads as follows :—

The minority in Manitoba and myself were charged with great responsibility for having allowed such a course to be taken. The fact is that my own attitude has been so absolutely passive on the matter, that I knew nothing of it until it was entirely settled and the counsel had been chosen for the case. The idea of this mode of action originated with the Government at Ottawa, who decided upon it, after Mr. Blake's resolution had been carried. The Barrett case is not my doing. More than that, I dare say that it might have resulted in quite a different way, if my views had prevailed. I do not understand why the minority is charged with its responsibility, as the Premier, in a public meeting in Montreal, on 12th September last, stated: "I am ready to admit it as I have already admitted in Parliament, the case was laid before the tribunal by the Government in order to obtain a decision which would settle the affair by judicial proceedings."

These words need no comments. The issue of the trial is well known. After having been successively defeated before the Superior Court and the Court of Appeals at Winnipeg, the Catholics gained their case before the Supreme Court. But, unfortunately, that decision was reversed by the Privy Council of England, their Lordships having decided that the laws of 1890 were valid, although they recognized that the Catholics of Manitoba had a right to their separate schools, provided they were independent schools, maintained by their own taxes. No sooner had that judgment been rendered, than Arch-bishop Taché and the Catholic minority petitioned anew the Government, asking the Government to redeem their pledges embodied in the report of the 21st March, 1891, which reads as follows:

If the legal controversy should result in the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench being sustained, the time will come for Your Excellency to consider the petitions which have been presented by and on behalf of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba for redress under subsections 2 and 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, quoted in the early part of this report, and which are analogous to the provisions made by the British North America Act, in relation to the other provinces.

Those subsections contain, in effect, the provisions which have been made as to all the provinces, and are obviously those under which the constitution intended that the Government of the Dominion should proceed, if it should at any time become necessary that the Federal powers should be resorted to for the protection of a Protestant or Roman Catholic minority, against any Act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any "right or privilege" of any such minority "in relation to education."

It was upon that occasion that were seen in the most glaring way the bad faith and the bad dispositions of the Government towards the Catholic minority. We had a right to hope that, true to their promises, the Government would hear the appeal and interfere without delay in favour of the minority. But in order the better to understand the question, it is absolutely necessary to refer to the clause of the Manitoba Act relating to that appeal. Clause 22 reads as follows:—

In and for the province (of Manitoba) the said legislature (i.e., the provincial legislature) may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:

Mr. RINFRET.

(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

(2) An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

The decision had been rendered under subsection 1, of section 22, and it was under subsection 2 that the Catholic minority had a right of appeal. What did the Government do? Then was the time for them to do justice to the minority. Nothing can be clearer than that subsection 2 of clause 22. There were at that time in the Cabinet Sir John Thompson, Minister of Justice, Mr. Curran, Solicitor General, and half a dozen others more or less distinguished lawyers. The trouble was that they would not agree as to the meaning of that clause, to avoid doing justice to the minority, and they instituted fresh proceedings before the Supreme Court and the Privy Council to ascertain whether or not they had the right to interfere, after the decision which had just been given by the Privy Council of England. In December, 1894, the Catholics throughout the country hailed with delight the announcement that the judgment of the Privy Council favoured their contentions and that justice would be done to them. The two main points decided were the following: (1) The Government was invested with jurisdiction to hear the appeal and (2) the Catholics were entitled to the rights and privileges I have alluded to above, in referring to the conclusions of the Order in Council: (a) The right to build, maintain and support their separate schools; (b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purpose of education; (c) the right of exemption from all payment and contribution towards the support of public schools. As I have just said, the judgment of the Privy Council was hailed with delight by all the Catholics throughout the length and breadth of the land, and there was a general cry that the time was at hand when justice would be done to the Catholic minority. From all parts of the country petitions were sent to Ottawa. One of those petitions was signed by a large majority of Catholics, praying for interference by the Dominion Government in favour of the Manitoba Catholics, and further asking for the disallowance of the Acts of 1894. The Government found themselves in a very favourable juncture to disallow the Act of 1894, owing to the fact that the Privy Council had just decided that they had the right to interfere. Why did the Ministers turn a deaf ear to the petitions of the Catholics? Upon one single ground, and that was because they did not want to right the wrongs of the Catholic minority in Manitoba. We have now reached, Sir, the most critical and the most eventful period of the political history of the school question: the enforcement of the last judgment of the Privy Council. In order to give effect to that judgment, the Government had no other course open to them but to pass an Order in Council and send it over to the Manitoba government, or in case the latter declined to conform to it, to have enacted by Parliament a bill in every particular conformable to the Order in Council, in order to remove the grievances complained of by the minority and restore them the full possession of their rights and privileges. Such is the course clearly outlined by subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act. The Government complied with the first part of their obligation: they passed the Order in Council, on the 19th March, 1895, the conclusions of which I shall now give:

The Committee therefore recommend that the said appeal be allowed and that Your Excellency in Council do adjudge and decide that by the two Acts passed the legislature of the province of Manitoba on the 1st day of May, 1890, intitled respectively "An Act Respecting the Department of Education, and an Act Respecting the Public Schools," the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province in relation to education, prior to the 1st day of May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following rights and privileges, which previous to and until the 1st day of May, 1890, such minority had, viz.:

(a.) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes, which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

(b.) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

(c.) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

And the Committee also recommends that Your Excellency in Council do further declare and decide that for the due execution of the provisions of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid, should be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which would restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which would modify the said Acts of 1890 so far, and so far only, as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) hereinbefore mentioned.

The Committee, further and for the reasons hereinbefore stated, recommend that if Your Excellency in Council should be pleased to approve of this report, Your Excellency in Council do make an order in the premises in the form and to the effect as set forth hereunto submitted, and that a certified copy of this Minute and of the said Order be transmitted to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba for his information and that of his government and provincial legislature, also that a certified copy of this Minute and of the said Order be transmitted to Mr. Ewart, Q.C., of Winnipeg, as representing the Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in Manitoba.

All of which is respectfully submitted for Your Excellency's approval.

JOHN J. MCGEE,
Clerk of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

For the first time, within that period of four years, after hesitating during several months, the Ministers had at least agreed upon one point: it was to appeal to the country. The consequence was that the Order in Council was passed without one dissentient voice. All the Ministers voted in favour of the Order. Indeed, no better document was available in view of appealing to the people. The proof of it is to be found in what transpired in the by-elections of Verchères and Haldimand, when the Ministers showed the people how they meant to avail themselves of the Order in Council. Whilst, on the one hand, in Verchères they flourished the Order, telling the people that it was the law of the land, in Haldimand, on the other hand, they told the voters that it was not worth the paper it was written upon, that it would never be enforced and it was only meant as a snare to entrap the Catholic voters. As I have just said, Mr. Speaker, the Order in Council was passed with a view to the coming elections. The general elections, however, were not held for reasons it would be too long to go into at this phase of the debate; and the Government were obliged to call Parliament together. God alone and the Ministers know. Sir, the wrangles which took place in the Cabinet with reference to that Order in Council and the law which was to give effect to the same. The outcome of all those disputes was that the Ministers were unable to agree and a Cabinet crisis broke out during which three French Ministers from the province of Quebec threw up their portfolios. I do not intend here to expatiate on the motives which prompted two of the Ministers, the hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Public Works, to come back to the fold. It will answer my purpose to remind the House in this connection that, when he left his colleagues, the hon. Mr. Angers was truly a prophet when he predicted that the school question would not be settled in the life-time of this Parliament in a manner calculated to give satisfaction to the Catholics. However, it could have been settled, if the Government had drawn from the recent events the lessons which they involved. After what had transpired, there was but one conclusion reached, both by Mr. Angers, by the public in general and especially by the members of the House of Commons, it was that the Manitoba school question could not be settled, unless some of the difficulties the Ministers met with were smoothed down and removed from their path. What difficulties were they and what was the means to remove them? The difficulties met with in the Cabinet originated from the same source as those experienced by the people of this country at large. They resulted, as I have said, from the fact that, upon that question, Protestants and Catholics hold different views and do not view the facts in the same light; and where there is question of disputed facts, Catholics and Protestants alike put their trust only in those who harbour in their breasts the same faith, who hold the same religious tenets which they themselves profess to believe. The only means of removing those difficulties would have been to appoint a commission of inquiry to investigate certain facts disputed between the interested parties and which are of the highest importance. Such are the following facts: (1) Whether the agreements entered into, at the entrance of Manitoba into the confederation were in any way binding, and are to be considered in the light of a treaty? (2) Whether the schools established in Manitoba are Protestant or public schools? (3) Another point which it would have been well to clear up, in order to give satisfaction to Protestant opinion is this: in what position would the province of Manitoba find itself from the standpoint of the establishment and operation of the present school system? Undoubtedly a commission of inquiry into these facts would have smoothed down, if not altogether removed all the difficulties encountered, at least some of them. But, of course, the Ministers did not want to accept my suggestions originating with the leader of the Opposition, and with one common accord the Government press ridiculed my hon. friend's proposal. It was really interesting, during the debate, to hear the ultras of the Tory party vying with each other to state that they did not require any investigation. We understand perfectly well their tactics; they do not want any investigation, because such an inquiry would set at naught all the calumnies uttered against the Manitoba Catholic minority. Some of our co-religionists do not want any investigation made, because they have made up their minds to accept any law dignified with the pompous title of remedial law, and provided that law may enable them to be returned to Parliament, at the cost of the sacrifice of the rights and privileges of their compatriots in Manitoba. But, Sir, there was a man who now sleeps the eternal sleep—a man who, a few years ago, was the most distinguished prelate who ever adorned the episcopal see in Manitoba and in the North-west Territories; a man who devoted all his energies and laid down his life, a holocaust to the cause of the Catholic minority. That man who was so sincerely devoted to the Catholic interests felt the need of an investigation. Listen to what he says, page 36 of his pamphlet above quoted:

There cannot be two opinions concerning the intention of the legislators at Ottawa, in voting the school case of the Manitoba Act, 1870. All proves evidently that the object of that legislation was to protect the minority, whether Protestant or Catholic. Every circumstance connected with that legislation points out in that direction; the negotiations asked for by the Imperial and Canadian governments to arrive at an understanding which will satisfy the people of the North-west and dispel their apprehensions; the requests of the delegates asking for separate schools; the satisfactory answers given to the delegates; the promises of the Government; the very fact, under such circumstances, of the introduction of the school clause in the Manitoba Act; the discussion in Parliament with regard to the same clause; everything goes to prove that the legislators were bound and willing to secure a protection for the minority in matters of education. The opinion here expressed has been fully endorsed by many eminent men, who took part both in the framing and discussing of this clause, and all are unanimous in stating that the clause was intended to protect the minorities.

Let an investigation take place, and I am sure that there is not a single witness that would dare to come, and on oath declare that the law as passed was in no way intended to secure the protection demanded. On the contrary, there are many witnesses who would unhesitatingly give sworn evidence that the clause 28 was introduced into the Manitoba Act, and was voted with the certainty that this said clause would secure to the minority of the new province rights acquired before, or to be acquired after the admission of the country into the Dominion. To deny this is simply to close one's eyes to the evidence. To refuse to draw the natural conclusions that such evidence dictates to all political parties, to all classes of citizens, of whatsoever origin or creed is a criminal abandoning of an imperative obligation.

It would be impossible to overstate the benefit that would accrue to the Canadian people from a fact of such importance. There are in the House of Commons Protestants and Catholic members; there are members who believe in separate schools, and there are others who are hostile to them; there are members who favour federal interference, and others still who deprecate it. But there is a point upon which all members are agreed and meet as upon a common ground: I mean to say the respect due to treaties and to pledges given by the Crown. This, Archbishop Taché understood perfectly, and that is why he asked for an inquiry. There is another point as to which a commission of inquiry would have been of incalculable benefit, and that is as to the working and the character of the Manitoba schools. On that point there are also differences of opinion, inasmuch as we may judge from the utterances of hon. members, in the course of this debate. I shall not insist upon that point, as it has been fully developed by the hon. members who addressed the House before me. It is really difficult to see, Sir, how it is that the Government have so stubbornly persisted in declining to make an inquiry after it had been asked both by Archbishop Taché and by the Manitoba government, and I may add by the mass of well meaning and disinterested voters in the Dominion. The Government have not busied themselves smoothing down the difficulties they met on their path during the period that elapsed between the session of 1895 and the present session. It is no wonder that, as a natural outcome, they have met with much more considerable difficulties, in solving the school question. Public opinion, Sir, did not suffer itself to be misled into believing the explanations given by the Government as to the causes of the crisis that broke out at the beginning of the session. Nobody was fooled into believing that the only question at issue was as to whether an imbecile and incapable leader was to give way to a still more impotent one. And, moreover, as a matter of fact, the old leader has not been removed and the harmony still prevails in the happy family. There is but one and the same cause at the bottom of both crises: the Manitoba school question. It is no longer a mystery for anybody that the crisis came to an end and the bolters came back to the fold only after having won the game: that is to say, they came back to the Cabinet upon the express condition that this law should be as mild as possible and brought down in such a way as to postpone its enactments until after the general elections. To quote from the "Mail and Empire" of February 13th, 1896:

The Bill is obviously another remedial proposal—a milder proposal than that of the Remedial Order as interpreted at Winnipeg. It is a further invitation to Manitoba to take the matter over. Time should be given. Possibly it would be wise to insert a clause rendering the whole measure inoperative if conciliatory action be taken by the province.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to go through the whole Bill clause by clause. I shall content myself with walking in the footsteps of those eminent lawyers, the hon. members for Drummond and Arthabaska, for Verchères and for Quebec Centre. I am going to sum up the main objections raised against the Bill by the hon. members opposite: 1. The Bill does not afford a solution of the school question. 2. The Bill leaves entirely in the hands of the Greenway administration, which is hostile to Catholics, the enforcement of the law. 3. The Bill does not provide for the necessary appropriations for the working of the law and imposes extraordinary taxes upon Catholics. 4. The Bill, in some of its clauses, contains principles utterly condemnable from the standpoint of the Catholic dogmas; such as compulsory education and the right of sending one's children to schools where there is no religious teaching. 5. The Bill evidently places Catholics in a position of inferiority, from an educational standpoint. 6. The Bill is not conformable to the Order in Council of the 19th March, 1895, and therefore invalid. Before resuming my seat, I ask again the indulgence of the House for quoting an extract from a well-known paper in the province of Quebec, "La Vérité," an independent Conservative journal, which is being patronized by a number of clergymen. In its issue of the 29th February, said:

The first section, to our mind, seriously endangers the interests of the minority. It says, in fact, that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba shall appoint, to form and constitute the Separate School Board of Education for the province of Manitoba, a certain number of persons, not exceeding nine, all of whom shall be Roman Catholics. We know it, there is hardly any probability of the Manitoba government applying that clause of the law, and appointing themselves the Board of Education for the separate schools; but they may do so. And if they took a whim to enforce that provision of the law, they would certainly do it so as to render the law illusory. In order to accomplish that object, they would only have to appoint, as members of the new council, a certain number of persons nominally Catholic, in the eyes of the law, but utterly hostile to separate schools.

Under section 2, the Dominion Government reserve to themselves the right of making appointments to the Separate School Board, should the Manitoba government not comply with the law. Prudence requires, we think, that the Government should absolutely reserve to themselves that right. Should they not do it, they would open the door to very serious difficulties. For, as we have said, should the provincial government meddle with the appointment of members of the Separate School Board it will only be with a view to create troubles.

Section 3 seems even more dangerous, because it makes almost unavoidable the unfriendly intervention of the Manitoba government. That clause actually says that "the Department of Education may, for the observance of the separate schools, make regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools." Now, the Department of Education in Manitoba is in reality nothing but the government itself. Under that clause, therefore the separate schools, as to their general organization, are under the control of the Administration that has just wiped them out! Moreover, that section 3 is as useless as dangerous.

Section 4 says that it shall be the duty of the Board of Education to have under its control and management the separate schools, and to make regulations for such schools. Therefore, there will be concurrent jurisdiction. Both the Department of Education for Public Schools and the Separate School Board shall have the right to make regulations in the matter of separate schools. Both sections 3 and 4 will, therefore, prove a source of endless conflicts.

Under section 4, the Separate School Board is authorized to select all the books to be used in the schools under its control, but restricts that selection to the books in use in the high or public schools of the province of Manitoba or in the separate schools of the province of Ontario. That limitation seems to us to be arbitrary and dangerous. A jurist told us in that connection: "I think, for my part, that the Dominion Parliament has no right to impose restrictions as to the use of books, if such restrictions did not exist in the Manitoba school law prior to 1890." Owing to that restriction, it will be very difficult, we think, to establish French schools—that is to say, schools in which the teaching will be given in French, for the Ontario separate schools are mostly English schools. The teaching of the French language is, to a certain extent, allowed; but even in the French districts, if we mistake not, the English language is the official language, both in the separate and in the public schools. The text-books must, of necessity, be of the same nature as the schools themselves, that is to say, that the English language must prevail.

Moreover, we are all aware of the terrible war waged on our separate schools in Ontario. Should a government, inimical to our separate school system, come into power at Toronto, they could very materially modify the text-books of our separate schools. Granted that to-day those text-books are acceptable, to-morrow they may be no longer so. Why, then, tie down the very existence of the Manitoba schools to the vicissitudes which the Ontario separate schools may have to go through?

In plain English, it means this: As the Catholic minority has the right to share proportionately in any grant made out of public funds for educational purposes, they may accept what the legislature will grant them. As will be seen, this is no enormous concession. But, add the Ministerial organs, the Government can go no further; they have no right to dispose of one single cent out of the moneys of the province, nor take a portion of it to the Catholic schools. All they can do is to declare that the Catholics have the right to share proportionately in any grant made out of public funds for educational purposes.

Naturally, the Dominion Parliament have no right to appropriate any portion of the funds of the province to any particular use. But the Bill could go much further than it does. It could say, for instance, that the minority having the right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for educational purposes, there shall accrue to the minority a right of action against the province of Manitoba, if that share be not voted. That would be the logical outcome of the premises laid down. The clause would then have a sanction. What avails it to solemnly proclaim the right of the minority to a portion of the legislative grants, if no means is provided whereby that right may be respected?

The law could further say that in case the Manitoba legislature should not vote in favour of the minority the moneys to which that minority has a right, then the Governor General in Council may appropriate, out of the proceeds of the sale of the school lands a sum in proportion to the number of Catholics, and apply it to the purposes of the separate schools. But there is no such provision in the Bill. In short, from a financial stand point, the Bill under discussion relieves Catholics but on one single point: it exempts them from paying taxes for the support of Protestant schools. That is certainly a great deal, but it is not enough.

It seems to me, Sir, that this clause ought to have been so worded that if Catholics did not receive from the province the legislative grants, they should in no way be forced to pay taxes for the support of public schools. It is an actual iniquity to tax the ratepayers for contributing towards the support of public schools, when they receive no legislative grant, as, under the present law, they are bound to do, whenever, for some reason or another, they cannot establish separate school districts.

Catholics have a right to their share in the grant made out of public funds appropriated by the legislature for educational purposes. Now, that portion, the Bill does not give it to the minority.

Section 81 consecrates the principle of compulsory education. The separate school trustees, with the sanction of the board, may oblige all Catholic parents to send their children to the separate school or send them to some other school. A fine may be imposed upon refractory parents. We need hardly add that this clause infringes the father's rights on his children. Competent persons have pointed out to us other sections of the law which would need to be modified; but those are secondary points, and we thought it our duty to insist only upon the essentials.

And later on, on the 7th March:

If the law be not modified so as to make it absolutely similar to the remedial order of March last, it may be impugned as invalid. For, the Dominion Parliament has the right to legislate upon the school question only in as much as the Manitoba legislature has declined to do so. Now, the remedial order of March, 1895, stated that the minority had (a) the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools; (b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for educational purposes; (c) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools. It was those rights (a, b, c,) that the Government ordered the legislature to restore; and it was those same rights (a, b, c,) which the Manitoba legislature declined to restore. It is therefore a, b, c, which the Dominion Government, under the constitution, has a right to restore. But under the Bill now before the House, the Government invites Parliament to grant only a and c; for, say what you like, clause 74 is not the same as b, that is to say, it does not give the minority the right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for educational purposes. Winnipeg might then say: I declined to grant a, b, c, but I did not refuse to grant a, c. You have therefore the right to legislate on a, b, c, by reason of my refusal; but you have no right to legislate on a, c, because you have not beforehand, called upon me to legislate on a, c only.

It is no use doing like the ostrich which hides its head in the sand believing itself safe. If clause 74 is not modified so as to grant also b, the law shall probably be declared invalid.

I shall not extend any further my remarks. I shall vote for the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition, on the several grounds I have just mentioned.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in such a solemn opportunity as this, when we are discussing one of the most important questions ever referred to the consideration of the public men of this Dominion, I wish I could have expressed myself in the language of the majority of the members of this House, but I fear that, should I use a language with which I am not quite familiar, I would be unable to do justice, almost as far as lay in my power, to the question we are now dealing with. It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to take much of the time of this House, for the question we are now considering has been so much discussed already, that there remains very little to say on this matter, which is, however, one of great importance. The question has been considered from a legal standpoint by the best legal shining lights on either side of the House, and I shall not venture on a ground which is a dangerous one for whoever has not a deep knowledge of the code and statutes. And then, what could I add to the eloquent pleas of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for East Lambton in favour of a remedial law? But it might be interesting to review some of the arguments used by the hon. gentlemen opposite and their new allies, in their attempts to explain their vote and conduct, to compare their present with their past statements and to put face to face the inconsistent reasons alleged by those who have determined to vote for the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Quebec East.

By what a stress of good will have all these gentlemen, whose opinions are diametrically at variance as to the very principle of the Bill, been able to meet on the same ground and vote for the six months' hoist? That is a question rather difficult to answer. That is a problem difficult to solve since, when the House shall divide on this question, we shall witness an exhibition for which our political history offers no precedent. We shall see, shaking hands together and embracing one another, those who in the province of Quebec were the loudest advocates of the Federal interference, and those who in the province of Ontario have been waging and are still waging a mischievous war against the restoration of separate schools in Manitoba. We shall see, folded in each other's arms and enjoying a piece of flirt, the fiery member for L'Islet, who on all the political platforms of the province of Quebec, thundered his invectives against the Ontario intolerants who declined to do justice to the minority in Manitoba, and the member for York (Mr. Wallace), the leader of the ultras, the man who went out of a Cabinet—where, as for that, his presence was of doubtful usefulness—because the members of that Cabinet were anxious to see the constitution obeyed and justice done to a minority harshly dealt with and deprived of their rights by an iniquitous, a nefarious law, a law subversive of the best interests of this country. We shall see the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) kissing the man whom, at Vaudreuil and elsewhere, he characterized as a physical, moral and intellectual cripple.

An hon. MEMBER. It is true.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) We shall see the light-headed and turbulent member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) and the member for Lotbinière, who has just spoken, pressing to their hearts the member for North Simcoe, whom they formerly denounced in such violent words and in a language of which they have the exclusive secret—

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) You have been for a long while going hand in hand together with these people.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Yes, and we have them now, because they forsake the principles for which we are contending. We shall see those who, for these last three or four years, have most forcibly condemned the Government now in power, because they had not disallowed the laws of the Manitoba legislature and because they did not bring before Parliament a remedial law, joining hands with those who are utterly opposed to any principle of interference. Lastly, we shall see all those who find that the Bill goes too far in the way of coercion, agreeing to reject it with those who find it incomplete and not going far enough in the way of redress and justice. And what is this monstrous alliance for between those who, lately, professed to be the only defenders of our racial and religious rights upon this continent of America, and those who, consistent at least with themselves, would like to keep treating as outcasts and helots the French-Canadians and Catholics of this country, who deny them their place under the protection of the British flag and have sworn to enslave them?

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) These are the people with whom you have been going hand in hand these last eighteen years.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) They are the people who went hand in hand with us, but with whom you are now willing to associate, and what is this union for?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) To oppose a bad Government.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Is it at least for the triumph of a great principle, for the defence of a sound cause? On the contrary, Sir, they want to prevent, if possible, the Government now into power from carrying out one of the greatest acts of justice that ever were brought under their consideration, but they unite especially because the Liberal party, in their inability to lay before the electors of the country an acceptable political platform, hope that by working up prejudices and sacrificing the time and interests of the country, they will hoist themselves up to power with the help of those who are blinded and led by an ignorant fanaticism. History repeats itself, Sir. The late Mr. Mercier succeeded in hauling himself up to power in Quebec by climbing over the Regina scaffold; Mr. Laurier, his friend, thinks he can reach the Treasury benches at Ottawa by appealing to prejudices and relying upon a religious feud. Were not the Liberal party aiming at the enjoyment of power, do you think we would see such an exhibition as I have just described, do you think we would be witnesses to such an alliance as this?

It is not possible even to presume it; for, what have not the Liberal journalists and stumpers of our province said and written against those whose co-operation and support they are now seeking? They could not find words strong enough to denounce the fanaticism of the Wallaces and of the McCarthys. They could not find words strong enough to curse their cause. How has this valueless lead been suddenly converted into pure gold?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) By the same process that makes herrings out of sardines.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) How is it that the leader of the Opposition now throws overboard—along with many others he has already hurled in the same direction—his platform with respect to a commission and an investigation, to seize upon the plain non-interference platform of which the members for York and North Simcoe were the authors? Why, it is because this platform, if brought forward by the leader of the Opposition and supported by his eloquent voice, would stand better chances of success with the Catholic Liberals of the province of Quebec than if brought forward by the member for York, Grand Master of the Ontario Orangemen, or the member for North Simcoe, counsel for Mr. Greenway and the Manitoba government. I have just referred, Sir, to the flagrant inconsistencies of those who will support the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition. Are long researches necessary in order to find out these inconsistencies? Were I allowed to refer to the debate that has been going on in this House since Tuesday last, I would have only to quote from the speeches delivered by the leader of the Opposition and by one of his most able lieutenants, the member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion). We have all of us listened to these two gentlemen, favoured with unquestionable abilities and superior minds, but showing strange logic, the one turning round against coercion and asking, both by language and by his opposing the second reading of the Bill, that Manitoba be left with the management of her educational affairs, and the other reviewing and carefully examining the Bill, charging the Government with having been wanting to all their promises and having introduced an imperfect Bill and one not going far enough in the way of coercion. And for two reasons radically opposed one to the other, these two gentlemen will vote against the second reading of the Bill and reject its principle. And there is the same contradiction between the speeches of the Liberals and those of the dissentient Conservatives who have so far spoken upon that question. But it will be a matter of genuine surprise to me and to many others to see the Catholic Liberal members from the province of Quebec voting against the principle of a measure for which they have been clamouring all the time, and which has been very carefully drafted by the Government, with a view to accomplishing an important duty and protecting the minority to which the Liberals have been extending so many hypocritical marks of devotion. For, numerous indeed were the professions of devotion extended by these gentlemen to the Manitoba minority, and the more numerous and boisterous they were as they thought and hoped that never would the Government have courage enough to bring this Remedial Bill before Parliament. Let us, for the information of the House and the country see what those gentlemen said and wrote on the matter since 1892. Let us take first the "L'Electeur," the authorized organ of the leader of the Opposition, a paper edited by his most intimate friend, by men who enjoy his full confidence, and who even sit near him on the other side of the House. Here is an article published on the 8th March, 1894:

A LUGUBRIOUS ANNIVERSARY.

A record of two years of the Government of honest men.

When the enemy is at our doors, when secular hatreds prevail in the Dominion Council, our Government are dumb. In vain do our compatriots, in the far away plains of Manitoba and of the North-west clamour for our intervention, claim our help. They do not even receive a word of good cheer, not even a hope-inspiring word for the future.

And the hon. gentlemen opposite are now ready to vote against Federal intervention!

The Government flinch before the noble task which is incumbent upon them, to protect the oppressed people of our race and religious creed; they flinch before the duty of protesting against the flagrant and formal violation of the federal compact to which we had been one of the contracting parties. Forsooth, the Government did break their engagements, and give the lie to their pledges! And two years after their advent to power, the people find out to their grief that they had believed in a Government pledged to redress, but that they have only succeeded in bringing into power a government pledged to national decadence.

All these gentlemen were then clamouring for interference and, as you can see, I have only to quote from their written statements to prove my own statements. They charged the Government with cowardice because, according to their wishes, they did not interfere soon enough. But now that the Government, to the risk of their political existence, has brought down a measure with a view to the accomplishment of a great act of justice, the hon. gentlemen opposite, the leader of the Opposition are the very people who stand up here and move the six months' hoist, that is to say, to put it off indefinitely. At another time, here is what "L'Electeur" said in an editorial whose heading was taken from the "Passion," and which was intitled: "Consummatum est":

Sir John Thompson said that the time for disallowance had lapsed. The Act being held constitutional by the courts of justice, will be carried out. The First Minister further stated that he made no promise to the effect that he would cause the Commons to adopt a Remedial Bill with a view to come to the relief of our compatriots. It is tantamount to saying that, from his standpoint, the Manitoba school affair is finally disposed of, and that this Government have determined to have nothing more to do with it.

Well, the Government of which the lamented Sir John Thompson was the leader at a time are now doing their duty. But what do we find? We are witnessing an exhibition that is a disgrace to the province of Quebec. We find English-speaking Protestants in this House, men who from conviction and principle, are opposed to separate schools, requesting the Government to do justice to the Catholic minority in Manitoba, because they are guaranteed certain rights by the constitution, while the Catholic and French-speaking Liberals of the province of Quebec are opposing it.

The last appeal to the Supreme Court, to obtain an opinion from that tribunal to the effect that this Government had no right to interfere, evinces the knavery of our Prime Minister; every body knew beforehand what would be the judgment of the Supreme Court, and the friends of the Catholic minority could not help saying that the only object Sir John had in view, in resorting to those appeals, was to mask his treason under a show of legality. Be that as it may, this last decision compromises the situation of the Manitoba Catholics.

Let us quote again from "L'Electeur":

The Conservative party will no longer be able to resort to shuffling, which has so far proved of such benefit to them in dealing with the electorate, and by which he has so long been kept in power. For many and many years, Sir John Macdonald, owing to his diabolical astuteness, succeeded, while working up the fanaticism, in passing for the best friend of Catholics. He had at his disposal a press subsidized by the jobbers, which deceived the public, and secured a large number of voters, through the appeal to religious prejudices. Sir John Thompson would be quite ready to walk in the footsteps of his predecessor; he has the duplicity and the hypocrisy of the old chieftain; the only thing he lacks is the shrewdness and the tact of his predecessor. He is going to keep the unbroken support of the Orange body; he will even get the support of the P.P.A., but the Catholics forsake him.

To-day, the parts are reversed, and it is now the turn of the Liberals to get the support of the P. P. A., of the fanatical Orangemen, as the hon. gentleman styles them. They rely upon them to turn out the Government. It is not the Catholic Conservatives, as insinuated by "L'Electeur," who forsake the Conservative government, but it is the Catholic Liberals of the province of Quebec who, yielding to party considerations, join hands with those whom they have formerly so strongly opposed, to bring the downfall of the Government. On the 29th June, 1894, replying to an article that had been printed in the "Evenement," of which I have the honour to be the editor, the "Electeur" said:

Under that heading, the "l'Evenement" said, a few days ago:

While discussing the political questions which actually inflame public opinion in this country, the "Electeur," the "Patrie," and other public sheets of the same colour, try to make allowance for circumstances, and do not want to take into account the fact that the Canadian electorate, being composed of heterogenous elements, our policy must of necessity be one of compromise and concession, if we wish to preserve peace and harmony, which are essential to any good administration of affairs, and that mutual good feeling, which is the sine qui non condition of our progress and prosperity. Since through the vexed school question, raised by the Liberal government of Mr. Greenway, the two great races which form the confederation have been arrayed against each other, the Liberal press in the province of Quebec, instead of trying to bring about a peaceful solution of the social problem which imperils our national destinies, instead of endeavouring to reconcile the extremists of all shades, by resorting to calm and judicious arguments, has, on the contrary, made it a point to foment discord, by making heated appeals to popular prejudices and passions.

Let me quote one of those articles from the "L'Electeur."

"Will we allow ourselves to be robbed by a Tory-Orange majority? Are we going to give up our right to the French language and to our separate schools? Is it through this policy of concessions and compromise, is it at the cost of this national abasement that peace and prosperity will be secured? We are not of the same opinion as our contemporary. If the Orange-Tory yoke suits our confrère, let him bear it with the majority of the Tory members from the province of Quebec. Those people are quite free to sacrifice, if they wish to, the rights and privileges of our co-religionists in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, in order to keep in power the famous Orange-Tory alliance. They will bear the responsibility of it before the country and before history.

But it is decidedly going too far to arraign the Liberal party for not having stood up as the protector of an oppressed minority, and having dared to say a few unpalatable truths to the fanatical Orange lodges.

"What have we seen, since the Manitoba school question was brought down before Parliament? Sir John Thompson, Mr. Costigan, all the French Ministers and the Conservative members, have aimed at nothing else but seeking to gain time by all means within their power. Their policy has been all the time to back down, to shift, to dilly-dally with the question, without ever evincing so much as the least desire to fight and resist. They are seemingly the slaves of their allies, the Ontario Orangemen. They were, no doubt, afraid, like the editor of the "l'Evenement," to disturb the peace of the country and to interfere with our progress and prosperity. Mr. Clarke Wallace, their chief, does not seem to be of the same opinion as the editor of "l'Evenement." He loses no opportunity of insulting French-Canadians, or of stirring up the Orangemen. No doubt, in a country like ours, where are found so many heterogeneous elements, it is right that the different races and creeds should be represented in the Cabinet. We have no objection to that. What we wish is this: Let all races and creeds here be on a footing of equality. Let justice be equally and fairly dealt to all classes, to Englishmen, to Irishmen and to French-Canadians. But we absolutely decline being dictated to by Grand Master Clarke Wallace, as the Quebec Conservative members actually are.

Thus speaks the Liberal organ, and I answer that it is not the Quebec Conservatives, who actually sacrifice the rights and privileges of the Manitoba minority, in order to maintain in power a Tory-Orange alliance, but I say it is the members of the Opposition who now sacrifice the interests which they pretended to champion exclusively; it is they who ally themselves with those whom they formerly opposed. What can be, I ask, the object of the hon. leader of the Opposition in moving the six months' hoist? He hopes, no doubt, to be able to recruit enough adherents in our ranks to defeat the Government. But those are foolish hopes and he may as well give them up, once for all. I have too high an opinion of the patriotism of the largest number of Conservative members in this House to be led to believe that they will consent playing into the hands of the Liberals. I could indefinitely go on quoting extracts from the organs of the hon. leader of the Opposition; but I do not wish to trespass upon the forbearance of the House. Allow me, however, Sir, to give two more extracts from that journal, before I come to deal with another Liberal sheet, edited by the hon. member for L'Islet. With reference to the crisis that took place here a few months ago, the "L'Electeur" said:

Mr. Bowell and Mr. Foster are going to announce their policy on that subject, on Monday. True, but who is imbecile enough to fancy that a piece of legislation of that importance will be brought down on Monday, and that it will go through its different stages both in the Commons and in the Senate, when Parliament is about to be prorogued on Monday? But have not, forsooth, our Ministers and our members gallantly fought to obtain justice for the minority? A lot of wretches, they have cynically made political capital out of this question! If you are in earnest, why do you not carry out the threat which your allies were ready to carry out themselves, had not some small concession been made to Catholics? If you are in earnest, why did you not accept the Liberal vote, to make up the loss of your fanatical allies? Wherefore, through obedience to the commands of the lodges, have you availed yourselves of this circumstance to rush upon our eminent compatriot, Mr. Laurier, after you had rendered it impossible for the Catholic members to come to an understanding? The truth is, in connection with this crisis, that we have been once more sacrificed to the venality of the Conservative party. The candidates for judgeships, the plump monopolists, the close contractors, the owners of breeding studs, who are paid two thousand dollars a year for lending their horses to the Government, all those people have kept repeating to the Government. To the devil with the Catholic schools rather than losing our feed! What would we do without it? For these eighteen years we have lived at the public's charge, and we never relied upon our own personal initiative and exertions to earn a livelihood!

I am quite aware of the fact, Sir, that the Liberal members would have been but too glad to welcome us into their ranks; but, before throwing ourselves into the arms of the leader of the Opposition we wanted him to give us a political platform more acceptable than that offered by the Government. And the fact is that the leader of the Opposition would not give us any definite pledge on the school question. Ever since last year he has given us but vague and indefinite pledges, and dodging on the question. Now, Sir, let us refer to another political organ of the leader of the Opposition, a paper whose utterances entitle it to a greater consideration, from the fact that it is edited by the hon. member for L'Islet, the very same man who went round all the political platforms of the province of Quebec to display his devotion to the cause of the Manitoba minority and who is going round the platforms in Ontario and advocating the very opposite doctrines, which he had so far been preaching, and trying to rouse popular prejudices against the same minority. On the 8th of March, 1893, the hon. member for L'Islet proposed a colourless motion, with reference to the Manitoba school question by which he aimed at catching as many votes as possible.

Neither Sir John Thompson, nor any of his colleagues have defined their position on this question, nor would they make any more definite statement, should the Supreme Court decide that the Governor General in Council has the right to redress the wrongs of the minority; but, the Government followers, to begin with Mr. Hugh J. Macdonald, the son of Sir John, are a unit in stating that the Greenway legislation should not be interfered with. Practically, the appeal to the Supreme Court is but a snare, a delusion, and a lugubrious mockery, aiming at nothing else but shielding the Cabinet in their refusal to interfere in their official capacity.

My amendment arraigns the Ministers for having taken such an attitude, and for having failed, in their official capacity as advisers of the Crown, to restore to the minority their rights guaranteed by the constitution. The Conservative members give their support to the Government, who did not interfere as the constitution authorized them to do, and who eluded their responsibility by referring the question to high judicial tribunals, which so far have given decisions adverse to our cause, and which will turn out the same way in the future. I am quite safe in predicting such a result. The Government and their followers are quite aware of it, and I arraign them here, as I have done from my seat in Parliament, for having wilfully sacrificed our rights, in order to keep themselves in power. The wording of my motion does not meet with their approval. I challenge them to propose another motion. I am ready to accept any proposition calculated to safeguard the interests of our race, which the Government have sacrificed, when allowing the French language to be abolished in Manitoba, and which they are again betraying in this school matter.

On the 16th March, he wrote again :

THE SCHOOL QUESTION.

We, French-Canadians, have been deprived of our rights on the 8th of March. The French Conservative members have bowed down before that flagrant injustice, before that affront, before that tyranny. I charge them with having failed to do their duty, and for their lack of energy, of foresight and of national dignity. They are the slaves of party spirit, instead of serving the interests of their compatriots. They are accomplishing and consummating, this session, the sacrifice to which they practically gave their consent in 1890, 1891 and 1892. The Government had pledged themselves to do justice to the minority, should the judicial tribunals decide that, under the law, as it stands, Mr. Greenway had the power to act as he did. The Privy Council of England, a tribunal where not a single Catholic does sit, of course gave a decision adverse to the claims of the minority. The Government declined to redeem their pledges and to interfere, as they have a right to do. They refer again the question to the Supreme Court, whence it will be removed to the Privy Council, whose final decision will seal the doom of our schools.

The hon. member had pledged himself to lend his support to the present Government, in order to reach a satisfactory settlement of the vexed question at issue ; we now see how he kept his promise. We will see later on, when I come to his motion, how he has kept the promises of which he was so lavish before the electors, when protesting of his devotion to the interests of the Manitoba Catholic minority. On the 1st July, 1893, he wrote again in his paper the following editorial ;

The " Cultivateur " still adheres to its opinion that the concessions, the shifting, which have been at the bottom of the policy of our Manitoba friends, have been fatal to the French interests in that province, and indirectly, throughout the whole Dominion. They should have told the Dominion Government : Do justice and enforce the constitution. What benefits did they reap from a contrary attitude ? Let them point them out to us, if they can. The Manitoba Catholics left to themselves, are unable to exercise any effective action. Still, they have entered upon their present course, without preconcerting their course with their brethren of the province of Quebec. The school question is one that interests the whole French race in Canada. Manitoba is far away from the centre of information and political action. Let us hope that all is not lost beyond redemption, but let us keep in mind that it is not by retreating before the foe that we shall inspire them with respect, and oblige them to give us back our rights.

On the 16th September, 1893, the " Cultiva-

teur." under the heading "From 1891 to 1893," said :

Sir John Thompson has spoken. I was too anxious to hear what he had to say on the school question. In 1891, Sir John Thompson gave in his report pledges which Archbishop Taché, on the 20th August, 1892, interpreted as follows :—

Sir John Thompson officially and publicly pledged himself.

Now, the First Minister is in a position to use, with the mass of the electoral gallery, the name of that Archbishop in order to prove that he is pledged to no one.

The French Ministers have consented to accept, and to cause to be accepted by their friends, if it be within their power, the policy of betrayal as to the rights of the minority adopted by the First Minister for the sole purpose of appeasing the fanatical elements of the party of which he is the leader. Of course, the French Ministerial members have assented to the action taken by their leaders.

In our province, party spirit is overpowering ; and when the Ministers have spoken, however weak, or incapable, or pusillanimous they may be, party men, with a few exceptions, at once join in the chorus without reasoning, without even suspecting that, in politics, liberty of thought is one of the most valuable guarantees of the rights of the people. The politicians from the other provinces know us, and they are aware that we will always give up.

They have had a new instance of it in this school matter.

Then, as you may see, the hon. gentleman was most favourable to interference : now his feelings have changed and he is for conciliation :

From 1890 to 1893 we have been receding and conceding, so much so that there is now nothing left for us to give up.

I claim for myself the credit of never having flinched.

It is rather amusing to read these past utterances compared with the present statements :

While I was unable to prevail upon the majority of my French colleagues in Parliament to join with me in claiming and resisting, I have at least proclaimed our rights and recorded a protest that will remain for the future and be useful to the future course I am determined to follow.

How fine were these statements. But they were made with a special view to win by captious means the confidence of the people who, fortunately, have now opened their eyes. When he stated that he had proclaimed our rights and recorded a protest that would remain for the future, he was, no doubt, far from suspecting that some day he would be called upon, through political circumstances which he could not then foresee, to attend political meetings in Toronto and Hamilton and give the lie to all his past declarations :

The Privy Council made it necessary for him to show his pluck.

I am just making in a few words the history of the Manitoba schools.

On the day following the political, or rather the British decision of the Imperial Council, Sir John Thompson was bound, both by pledges and by his duty, to officially interfere, to compel the Manitoba legislature to respect the rights of the minority.

He called upon Mr. Clarke Wallace, the representative of the most fanatical element of the whole Dominion, to join the Ministry.

I read in the "Cultivateur" of the month of September, 1894, the following editorial, of which I will give an extract:—

The promise of federal interference made by the Executive authority was formal, positive, solemn, public.

It was made during the lifetime of Sir John A. Macdonald, and at a moment when Sir John Thompson was only Minister of Justice.

Sir John A. Macdonald went to the great majority, was succeeded by Sir John Thompson.

Sir John Thompson is a Catholic, but he is not a Frenchman, and is little concerned about our schools and language.

He was not true to his word, and he caused the public to be deceived by the representative of the Queen.

I tell him in the face of the country: his being a Catholic is one of the surest sources of our school troubles.

Am I to be told that a subject of the Queen of French descent is less entitled to the respect of his rights than his neighbour of Anglo-Saxon origin?

Am I to be told by hon. gentlemen opposite that a British subject of French descent has less right to their respect and interference than his neighbour of Anglo-Saxon origin. I would go on quoting extracts indefinitely, but I wish now to quote from another paper, one which the hon. leader of the Opposition was compelled to disallow not long ago, but which was at the time his organ in the district of Montreal. I might say, in justice to the hon. leader of the Opposition, that he disallowed certain editorials of that paper because he found that it was going too far and that he might be compromised by it. I refer to "La Patrie" of Montreal:

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) In its article of March 15th, 1895, "La Patrie" said, on the eve of the crisis:

The fact is that the school question was to be settled last week. * * * The whole country was looking in the direction of the capital, anxiously awaiting the settlement of this serious matter, but it has again been put off; to-morrow. * * * Why put off till to-morrow the decision promised for last week? * * * Mr. Bowell and his colleagues are surely in fault for leaving the country in an alarming and dangerous statu quo. All moderate people wish for an immediate settlement of the school question.

Now that we have the Bill, the Liberals no longer want it and they move the six months' hoist. Mr. Bowell and his colleagues are surely in fault, says the article. No doubt the Government would have been in fault for leaving the country in statu quo; after all the attempts made with the Manitoba government to come to a satisfactory settlement of the school question. But it is a matter for surprise to find these same Liberals who then laid a charge against the Prime Minister, trying to have put off a measure which brings to an end the statu quo. On March 21st, "La Patrie" said, in connection with the remedial order:

And they say: Here is an injunction. Forsooth, one must have much enthusiasm or a deep-laid confidence to believe that such an expression of opinion can have any weight with the Greenway government, whose decided intentions in connection with this matter are well known. There is no doubt whatever that this better appeal and these good advices will meet the same fate as the previous ones.

It is plain the editor of "La Patrie" had not converted his leader before penning these lines, since at the session of 1895, I distinctly remember, the leader of the Opposition found the remedial order drastic, while his organ found it honey-sweet. There you have, Sir, not the whole, but a part of what wrote and said the Liberal journalists and stumpers, previous to the introduction of the Remedial Bill in this House. And it is by carrying such arguments as these on every hustings throughout the country, by making a show of such a spurious patriotism, by proclaiming upon the house-tops their fullest devotion to the interests of Manitoba, by most assiduously asserting that never would the Government have the courage to bring down a Remedial Bill, that they succeeded in blinding the opinion and carrying the counties of Verchères, Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier.

Mr. BERGERON. (Translation.) And Antigonish.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) They forget now their former good resolutions, and when obliged to face the music, and to approve a Bill which they fancied would never be brought down, they make a change of front, and declare that they will oppose any Remedial Bill. Now, leaving the editorials published in the public prints, I come to the addresses made by Liberal members in this House, and I find here also the same contradiction. In 1893, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), as I just said, moved in this House the following colourless motion. The hon. member's conclusion was truly remarkable. But allow me first to quote the motion itself:—

That all the words after "That" in the main motion be erased, and the following substituted:—"That this House desires to express its disapproval of the action of the Government in dealing with the Manitoba school question, and in assuming to be possessed of the judicial functions conflicting with their duty as constitutional advisers of the Crown, which assumption is wholly unknown to the law, and, if now acquiesced in, would be entirely subversive of the principle of ministerial responsibility."

I will now give the conclusion of the hon. member's address:—

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that when the hon. the Minister of Public Works and the hon. the Minister of Agriculture went into the Government, they had pledged themselves, to the groups who support them, to require justice from the Government. They have done nothing, they will bear before the province of Quebec a heavy responsibility for their weakness and their faint-heartedness! If they think there is time yet to come to the assistance of those who suffer persecution, we offer them our help, we hold out our hands to them, with disinterestedness. If they should be willing to act like men and to fulfil their duty, I may assure them they would have the assistance of my friends on this side of the House, at least of my friends, the members of the province of Quebec. I am not making this statement without being sure my words are approved of.

The hon. member, undoubtedly, promised more than he could perform.

As for us, it is not a party question, it is a question of principle, a question of justice. Our race has equal rights to those of the other races and we want these rights to be acknowledged and respected.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) What has become of all those declarations of the past? To-day the Government recognize and respect those rights, in bringing down a remedial law, while the hon. gentlemen, whose support the hon. member for L'Islet had given us the pledge, no longer want it. And on that same motion, Sir, what did the hon. leader of the Opposition say? His utterances, at the time, were re-echoed throughout the length and breadth of the land, and his political friends even wanted to frame a political platform out of them. In connection with the Manitoba schools and the contention that they were not neutral schools, but Protestant schools, the hon. leader of the Opposition said:

Sir, I heard the remark casually made yesterday in the House, that this statement was not true, and that the system of schools now prevailing in Manitoba was not a continuation of the Protestant system. I have looked over the whole blue-book, and all the correspondence brought down, and I fail to find any language there traversing that statement. It may or may not be true, but I deal with the case as I find it before the Government to-day, but if the statement is founded on fact which is made by His Grace Archbishop Taché, and which is repeated in all the petitions coming from the Roman Catholics of Manitoba, that, under the guise of public schools, Protestant schools are being continued, and that Roman Catholic children are forced, under that law, to attend what are, in reality, Protestant schools, I say this—and let my words be heard by friend or foe, let them be published in the press throughout the length of the land—that the strongest case has been made for interference by this Government. If that statement be true, though my life as a political man should thereby be ended for ever, what I say now I shall be prepared to repeat, and would repeat on every platform in Ontario, every platform in Manitoba, nay, every Orange ledge throughout the land, that the Catholic minority has been subjected to a most infamous tyranny. This is the case as I find it.

On that same motion, what did the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) say:

I expected the Postmaster General would state whether the Government of which he is a prominent member, are determined to do justice to the Catholic minority of Manitoba, or whether they are determined to do nothing for them. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the Government are quite unwilling to do the best thing for them; that they have decided, even before now, not to interfere in favour of our co-religionists of Manitoba, and that all what they are doing presently is for the purpose of gaining time and shirking the responsibility that is incumbent upon them. I wish the position we are going to take in this case should not be likely to embarrass the Government. On the contrary, I am willing to help them in every possible way, even to the extent of voting with them on this question; but, before doing so, I beg to put a question to the hon. Minister who has just taken his seat. I understand the only reason why the Government are now unwilling to declare whether they can interfere is because they want it to be decided by the Supreme Court whether the British North America Act can apply. The Government want, first, to inquire from the Supreme Court whether the Catholics of Manitoba can avail themselves of the section of that Act under which any minority has a right to appeal to the Government whenever rights are violated that were acquired by laws subsequent to the union. I understand the Government intend to have it decided by that court whether the Catholics of Manitoba have a right to invoke as a privilege of the Act of 1871. Well, I beg to put a question to the hon. Postmaster General, and to ask him this: If the Supreme Court should decide that the Catholics of Manitoba have a right to invoke the privileges conferred by the Act of 1871, will the Government be willing, after the decision by the Supreme Court, to pass a remedial legislation, or to restore the Provincial Act of 1871, or in any way to do something likely to remedy the grievances of the Manitoba Catholics?

Further on, the hon. member said:

What will be the outcome of all this? Will the persecuted minority in Manitoba have dealt out to them every right to which they are entitled? Will the hon. Minister of Justice restore to the Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba their invaded rights as to separate schools? In the assumption that the claims of the Catholics of Manitoba shall be sustained by the judgment of the Supreme Court, shall the Government interfere in the matter, as in duty bound? I expected, Mr. Speaker, to hear the Ministers declare the policy of the Government on the matter under discussion. I expected, above all, to hear from the French-speaking members of the Cabinet, who are the representatives of the province of Quebec, a full and authoritative statement as to the duty of the Government towards the protection of the Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba. But, far from it, Mr. Speaker, we have heard no such utterances from the Ministers. The hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) and the hon. the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron), have stated, one after the other, on the floor of the House, that they were not aware what position the Government would take on this matter should the Supreme Court uphold the claims of the Catholic minority; they have not had the courage to pledge themselves to redress the wrongs inflicted on the Catholic minority of Manitoba, should the courts assert the federal right of interference. As already stated, I should willingly give my support to the Government, should they pledge themselves to mete out to the Catholics of Manitoba their just rights. But no, Mr. Speaker, they will take no such engagement, nor give any such pledge; they would rather be guided by men known for anti-Catholic leanings.

At that time, the hon. member was quite satisfied with promises. All he required then from the Government was a promise of interference, and if that were granted him, he was ready, he said, to vote with the Government, against the motion of the hon. member for L'Islet. But now, although I would not insinuate that the hon. member is opposed to the Remedial Bill, as he has not yet spoken out on the question, I am still inclined to think that he has made up his mind to vote in favour of the motion of the leader of the Opposition and against the second reading of the Bill. The hon. member for Rouville, I presume, in 1893, spoke out honestly, frankly and without disguise. Now, if he spoke from conviction, I would like to know how, in the face of such utterances, he feels warranted in voting against the Government and in favour of the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition, which tends to defeat the principle involved in the Government Bill. Let us see what the hon. member for L'Islet said on another occasion. I am fond of resorting to the authority of the hon. member for L'Islet, because, since he has left the ranks of the Conservative party to join the hon. members opposite, he has assumed, in the party, such a prominent position that his utterances carry with them a great importance. The hon. member then said:

As to the other part of the question put by my hon. friend, I would like to know whether the Catholics in Manitoba and in the North-west are not deprived of the very same rights which the English Protestant minority enjoys in the province of Quebec. We had a right to our language; we had a right to our separate schools; and those rights have been taken away from us. The hon. members will perhaps say that those rights have been legally done away with. It is a well-known fact that quite a number of causes are lost before the judicial tribunals, but I never heard yet that a people had been deprived of its political rights by the courts. That is the reason why we insist so much upon the Government pronouncing themselves upon that question. I do not know whether any of the Ministers will vouchsafe a reply. The question I deal with is not one of private interest, but one which highly interests Canada. Would it not be better to discuss and settle that question in the House during this session, rather than allowing this agitation to perpetuate itself in the country?

The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), who, last year, wanted the Government to proceed without delay, apparently wishes now to continue the policy of delay and evasion, since he is disposed to vote in favour of the motion of the leader of the Opposition. Last year, in July, when occurred the Cabinet crisis, during which two French Ministers from the province of Quebec felt it their duty to leave the Cabinet, what did they not say and print against him at a time when, at great personal sacrifice, they took back their portfolios, in order to safeguard the interests they had so much at heart. The hon. members opposite could not find words strong enough to condemn their action. The hon. leader of the Opposition then said:—

I am not surprised that those gentlemen who have at heart the restoration of the schools to the minority in Manitoba should have no faith whatever in the policy of the Government or in the promise of the Government, because it is a fact that upon no question—not merely this one, but upon no question whatever—have the Government ever had any settled policy of their own. They have no mind of their own, they cannot come to any decision whatever; or if ever they do take up a position, forthwith they proceed to undo what they have done before. Looking at their course, they would seem to be afflicted with some cerebral malformation which, as soon as they have taken any course upon any question crowds upon their attention all the objections against that course, and impels them forthwith to undo what they have done. Looking at their course, it would seem that their nights are haunted by the demon of doubt and vacillation. Look at their course during this very session, and what has that course been but a record of unfulfilled promises, a record of broken engagements, a record of decisions adopted and then abandoned, a record of conflicting determinations and of retrograde mollifications.

And further on:

Well, at all events, one of the dissenting Ministers stated his objection, that he had no faith in the sincerity of the hon. gentleman, and he stated, moreover, that if the promises made by the Government were not implemented this session he had reason to fear that they never would be implemented at all. Now, Sir, this is certainly most extraordinary language and conduct on the part of a member of the Administration, on the part of a gentleman who had been associated with them, and one of their prominent colleagues; and I must say that, according to my own judgment, the hon. gentleman had too good grounds to speak in the manner he did. Sir, I charge against the Government of the day, and I invite their answer, that they have dallied with this question, they never dealt with it frankly, fairly, sincerely; and, if I am allowed, by the rules of debate, I will say they never dealt honestly with that question. There are two elements on the other side of the House. There is a fraction of hon. gentlemen who support the Government, who are against separate schools; there is another fraction who are in favour of separate schools; and the policy of the Government upon this question has been to give hopes to both of these elements, thereby placing themselves in the impossibility of satisfying either of them.

Sir, I speak for myself alone; I have no right to speak for anybody else. But I say again that so far as I am concerned, let my hon. friends try to restore to my countrymen the official use of their own language, the teaching in the schools of their own language, and they will have done a great deal. A great many suggestions have been made, and gentlemen opposite ask of this side of the House what suggestions we have to offer. I am making one. Why, my hon. friend is not ready to-day to go on with the measure his colleagues have promised the public. Six months hence, I say again, we shall be in a worse position. Passions will have been inflamed, speeches will have been made on one side in Ontario, and, it may be, in Quebec on the other. In Quebec we will preach the same doctrine we have preached in the past. The public press has, on many occasions, circulated false reports of meetings that we have attended. For my part, nearly every day I see my own words distorted. I suppose I can stand it—I must. The duty we have to perform, if you will allow me to say so, is to go calmly to work. These speeches made on the 12th July will not improve matters; and will you allow me to add, Sir, that the position taken by my hon. friends the French Ministers will not improve matters, either. If we could make up our minds to act like politic men; if, on both sides of the House, we decided to take the responsibility of our actions, a great many things would have been done that have not been done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, under what ground do the hon. gentlemen opposite base their opposition to the remedial law? Those grounds or pretenses may be classed under five heads if I understood the arguments so far put forth. To their mind, the Bill in coercive in that it imposes upon Manitoba a school legislation against the will of its inhabitants. Was not the Bill framed on the lines of the constitution? This is not the time, at this stage of the debate, to discuss the various clauses of the Bill; but let us take one of the first clauses, by which it is enacted that the Lieutenant-Governor may appoint nine persons, to form and constitute the separate school board. And if the Lieutenant-Governor does not, within three months after the coming into force of the Act, make the appointments, the Dominion Government shall make them. Where do you find any coercion in this clause? The Liberals contend again that, previous to bringing down their law before Parliament, the Government did not resort to all the means of conciliation within their power. But, I ask, what means have there been left untried? All the members of this House know that the Government of the day have done all what was humanly possible to do, to bring the Manitoba government to understand that it was in the interest of the country in general for the latter themselves to remedy the evils caused by the educational laws of 1890 and 1894. Do the hon. members opposite want the Government to go on bended knees to Winnipeg to obtain from Mr. Greenway what he has repeatedly declined to do? The Government are too anxious about their own dignity to submit to such a humiliation. Does not the crisis of last summer, through which the hon. members opposite cherished the hope of being borne into power, stand as an evidence that the Government resorted to all the means within their power to bring about a peaceful solution of this vexed question? The French Conservatives in this House, who were asked to consent to a six months' postponement, felt apprehensive least this delay should prove fatal to the settlement of the question, and were at first loath to grant it; but finally they surrendered to the reasons urged by the French Ministers, and by their Protestant colleagues who were in sympathy with us, and who asked us to use all the means of conciliation that could be resorted to with Mr. Greenway, and who told us: If, after six months, we have not succeeded, then we will join hands with you to have justice dealt to the Catholic minority. More than that, Sir, the Government, after last session, passed, on the 27th July, 1895, the mildest Order in Council that could be drafted; an order, I dare say, which provoked a certain feeling of apprehension among the supporters of the separate schools and among those who want justice meted out to the Manitoba minority. If I refer to that Order in Council, it is merely to show that the Government did all what was humanly possible to do, and that they could go no further in the way of conciliation. Previous to bringing down the Remedial Bill before this House, the Greenway government was repeatedly called upon to redress the grievances complained of by the Catholic minority, but they declined to comply with the suggestions offered. What does the Order in Council of the 27th July last say:—

In the interest of all concerned it will not be disputed that if possible the subject of education should be exclusively dealt with by the local legislature. Upon every ground, in the opinion of the sub-committee, this course is to be preferred, and with the hope that this course may yet be followed, the sub-committee have now the honour to recommend that Your Excellency will be pleased to urge upon the government of Manitoba the following further views, which may be pressed in connection with the remedial order.

The remedial order, coupled with the answer of the Manitoba government has vested the Federal legislature with complete jurisdiction in the premises, but it by no means follows that it is the duty of the Federal Government to insist that provincial legislation to be mutually satisfactory should follow the exact lines of this order. It is hoped, however, that a middle course will commend itself to the local authorities, so that federal action may become unnecessary.

It is generally agreed and understood that, under the law which will be passed by the Dominion Government, the control of education in the province of Manitoba shall be partly taken away from the local authorities. That is the reason why the Dominion Government communicated with the Greenway government and urged them to settle the question. All are agreed that it would have been by far preferable for the Greenway government to have remedied the wrongs inflicted upon the minority by the laws of 1890 and 1894. But in the face of the denial of the Manitoba government to comply with this request, the Government of the day decided to take action. The Order in Council goes on:

With a view to a settlement upon this basis, it seems desirable to ascertain by friendly negotiations what amendments to the Acts respecting education in public schools in the direction of the main wishes of the minority may be expected from the Manitoba legislature.

It is believed by the sub-committee that the religious opinions and rights which have been recognized in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council could be sufficiently met by the local legislature, without impairing the efficiency or proper conduct, management and regulation of the public schools.

It is with the object of effecting some such changes in the educational system of Manitoba that the sub-committee desire that an expression of opinion be obtained from the government of Manitoba. It was with this view that the Canadian Government at the last session of the Federal Parliament made the following announcement:—

“ Though there may be difference of opinion as to the exact meaning of the reply in question, the Government believes that it may be interpreted as holding out some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba government and legislature; and the Dominion Government is most unwilling to take any action which can be interpreted as forestalling or precluding such a desirable consummation. The Government has also considered the difficulties to be met with in preparing and perfecting legislation on so important and intricate a question during the last hours of the session. The Government has, therefore, decided not to ask Parliament to deal with remedial legislation during the present session. A communication will be sent immediately to the Manitoba government on the subject, with a view of ascertaining whether that government is disposed to make a settlement of the question which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province, without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament. A session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If by that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, the Dominion Government will be prepared, at the next session of Parliament, to be called, as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council, and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895.”

It is within the recollection of this House, Sir, that the hon. leader of the Opposition stated here that the remedial order was too drastic, or, at least, too imperative. Now, Sir, could possibly the Government go any further in the way of conciliation? Could possibly a better means be suggested to the Manitoba government, whereby they could extricate themselves from the false position in which they had involved themselves, and in which they remained entangled through their own obstinacy? I maintain that the present Government went as far as their own dignity warranted them to go. What reply did the Greenway government make to that most conciliatory Order in Council? That answer is found in paper No. 39, and reads as follows:—

It is, therefore, recommended that so far as the government of Manitoba is concerned, the proposal to establish a system of separate schools in any form be positively and definitely rejected, and that the principle of a uniform non-sectarian public school system be adhered to.

It is further recommended that the Order in Council of July 27th, 1895, with the reply of Your Honour's government thereto be laid before the legislative assembly of the province with all convenient despatch at the next ensuing session thereof.

It may be pointed out that the legal position in regard to the proposed remedial legislation is far from clear. It has repeatedly been declared, according to reported utterances, that remedial legislation does not necessarily mean that the remedial order will be literally followed, or that the system of separate schools which existed prior to 1890 will be restored. It would appear reasonable to conclude that no one could seriously contemplate the restoration of that system. Yet if remedial legislation in any other form than a literal confirmation of the remedial order be introduced, a grave doubt arises as to the competency of Parliament to pass such legislation without the same being first submitted to the legislature of the province. On the other hand any proposed measure would require to be in accord with the order of the Governor General in Council, so that the first step required might be to amend the remedial order. Whether any power exists to amend or rescind the remedial order is also a subject of some doubt.

It is a matter of regret that the invitation extended by the legislative assembly to make a proper inquiry into the facts of the case has not been accepted, but that, as above stated, the advisers of His Excellency have declared their policy without investigation. It is equally a matter of regret that Parliament is apparently about to be asked to legislate without investigation. It is with all deference submitted that such a course seems to be quite incapable of reasonable justification and must create the conviction that the educational interest of the people of the province of Manitoba are being dealt with in a hostile and preemptory way by a tribunal whose members have not approached the subject in a judicial spirit or taken the proceedings necessary to enable them to form a proper opinion upon the merits of the question.

The inquiry asked for by the reply of the legislature to the remedial order should, in the opinion of the undersigned, be again earnestly invited, and in the event of the invitation being accepted the scope of the inquiry should be sufficiently wide to embrace all available facts relating to the past or present school systems.

The desire of the legislature and government of the province throughout the whole course of the proceedings, beginning with the enactment of the statutes of 1890, has been to provide the best possible means of education for the children of our citizens. To that end every possible effort has been put forth and every possible pecuniary sacrifice made in order that there might be established a school system based upon sound principles and equipped and administered in accordance with approved modern educational methods. Though very much remains to be accomplished it may be fairly asserted that a reasonable measure of success has attended the efforts which have thus been put forth.

To those conciliatory suggestions of the Federal Government, and while the Minister of Justice suggested the means to reach a satisfactory solution of the question, the Greenway government replied by making a proposition altogether inadmissible. And the hon. members opposite contend that the Government did not go far enough in the way of conciliation! Even now, when, as a result of the repeated refusals and obstinacy of the Greenway government, the Federal Government are still endeavouring to have conciliation prevail, as shown by the statement made by the leader of the House, last night. The Greenway government seems disposed to enter upon a course of conciliation, a course which they should have pursued long ago. What does the Federal Government do? The Government here shows itself as conciliatory as ever. It was only when the Federal Government were satisfied that the Greenway government had made up their minds to make no concessions that they acted with the vigour with which their friends expected they would act. The Manitoba government seem disposed now to apply a remedy to the evil done, should they be invited to Ottawa, to hold a conference with the Federal authorities. I hope a means will be reached of bringing about a harmonious and satisfactory solution of the difficulty. The Federal Government have accepted the idea of holding a conference with the Manitoba authorities, but this time, they have insisted upon a previous condition, namely, that the Bill shall be read a second time. The Greenway government have too often denied the invitation of the Federal Cabinet; they have too often been called upon to give redress, for the position now taken by the Federal authorities being wondered at. But the Liberal organs will, no doubt, misrepresent again the intentions of the Federal Government; the fact is that they have already begun doing so, and to-morrow, Sir, you may read in those papers that the Government here are backing down, anxious to shirk their responsibility.

An hon. MEMBER. That is so.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) No; but it will only be a first statement, in keeping with the falsehoods they have been uttering for months and months about the present Government. If the Government have agreed upon holding a conference with the Manitoba authorities, it is because they wish to meet the argument which the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), and other members, have resorted to in this debate, and it is this: That the Government have not exhausted all the means of conciliation within their power. It is in order to dispose effectively of this falsehood, that the Government have agreed upon holding a new conference.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) You have yourself opposed that idea, some time ago.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) I come now to a third argument used by the hon. gentlemen opposite. They say: You take away from Manitoba the control over her schools. True, the present Bill takes away from the province the control over her schools, but, let me ask, whose fault is it? Are the Federal Government to blame, if they feel bound to press through the House the legislation now under discussion? Does not all the blame fall upon the Manitoba authorities who, in defiance of a solemn compact and of the very constitution, have taken away from the minority the schools which it had a right to? Another objection is supplied by the hon. leader of the Opposition himself, who contends that the facts are not sufficiently known, and that an investigation into them should be held. It was really amusing to hear the hon. member for Lotbinière state on the floor of this House that he was in favour of a commission of inquiry, but, still, that he was going to vote for the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition, in favour of the six months' hoist. What, then, I should like to know, are the facts which should be inquired into, previous to granting the minority their schools? Is it not a well-known fact that the minority has been deprived of its schools? Have not all the facts set forth in the petitions presented to the executive and to Parliament been several times proven before the judicial tribunals here and before the Imperial Privy Council of England? What further evidence do they want to get? That argument, Sir, is but another pretext, added to all the others. A last argument urged by the hon. gentlemen opposite is that the law is incomplete, and that it does not afford an adequate measure of relief to the minority, from the grievances complained of. I may say, Sir, that although I could wish for a more complete law, still no legislation is perfect, when laid down upon the table of the House. But, I ask, Sir, because in their opinion a law is incomplete, is it a reason why those who ought to be in favour of the principle of interference, should vote the six months' hoist? The law may need to be amended, but, in my opinion, the hon. gentlemen would have been more consistent, if they had allowed it to go through its second stage, reserving their right to complete and amend it later on? Moreover, who are those, the more directly interested in having an adequate and complete law? It is the Catholics in Manitoba. Well, Sir, the argument urged by the hon. members opposite is pointless in face of the attitude taken by those who are the accredited representatives of the minority, both in the local legislature and in the Federal Parliament. I have here the statement made by Mr. Prendergast, one of the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and a supporter of Mr. Greenway. That gentleman gave it as his opinion that the law actually before the Federal Parliament was adequate and as complete as it could well be, within the provisions of the constitution. He said :

The Remedial Bill, he said, is apparently clumsy, but it could hardly be otherwise, considering that, in the drafting of it, great care had to be exercised not to give the minority any advantage which it did previously enjoy. This Bill recognizes the principle which we have been fighting for these six years past. Our right to share in the legislative grants is also sanctioned by this Bill. I am not ready to challenge the power of the Federal Government to grant us a share in the provincial grants. If I were a member of the House of Commons, I would support the Bill. If I were in the House of Commons, I would insist upon the Catholic schools receiving a share of the money to the credit of the land grant. Should the Manitoba government refuse to grant us our share in the legislative grant for school purposes, I say that the Parliament of Canada would act justly in amending the Dominion Lands Act so as to enable it to grant us our share out of the proceeds of the sale of the school lands. I think the Catholic schools might get along if necessary without the government grant ; but, from whatever source it may come, we will require money for organizing our school board.

Such is the opinion of a prominent Catholic Liberal in the province of Manitoba. Now, let me give you the opinion of two Conservative members, who also represent the Catholic minority in the local House. Here is what Messrs. Théophile Paré and Roger Marion have to say, in connection with Mr. Prendergast's statement :

Mr. Prendergast has rightly interpreted the views of the minority with reference to the legislation which now occupies the attention of the Federal Parliament. In doing so, he is not liable to be suspected of partiality towards the Federal Government. As stated by him in his address, Mr. Prendergast is a Reformer, one of Mr. Laurier's followers, and not one of Sir Mackenzie Bowell's followers.

The reports of the proceedings in our local House, on the 26th February last, as published in the Winnipeg papers, have already made known the attitude taken by Mr. Prendergast. In calling attention to that portion of Mr. Prendergast's address in the House, we wish thereby to emphasize the fact that the Catholic members of the Manitoba legislature hold the same views as those expressed by Mr. Prendergast on the school question and particularly on the Remedial Bill.

THEOPHILE PARÉ.
ROGER MARION.

Here we have the representatives of the minority in the local House, declaring that the Remedial Bill is adequate and satisfactory? Wherefore do the Liberals oppose it? Why do they find it inadequate? We have also representatives of the minority both in the Senate and in the House of Commons. I am in a position to state that these gentlemen find the Bill as adequate and satisfactory as it could possibly be, within the provisions of the constitution, and, moreover, that the Manitoba minority finds it satisfactory. I may say that the religious authorities, the most directly interested in having the grievances of the Catholic minority redressed and in having restored to them their rights, under this law, have also declared the Bill satisfactory. Let me now refer to the public prints of the province of Manitoba, and what do we find? The "Manitoba" is the only French journal published in that province, as the representative of the interests of the Catholic minority.

Mr. JONCAS.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker. I am not authorized to state that the editorial in question has been approved by the religious authorities in Manitoba. But I have good grounds for believing that more authorities have approved of it. I am even inclined to think also, on good grounds, that the article I am about to read was submitted to the approbation of the religious authorities in question, previous to its being put in print. The editorial I am going to read appeared in the issue of the "Manitoba" of the 4th March instant :—

THE REMEDIAL BILL.

At last, after having waited and suffered six years, we have good grounds for believing that the hour of justice will soon come. We need hardly say that it is with a heart full of emotion and anxiety that we will watch the debates in the House of Commons, in the course of which will be disposed of a cause which confines to the innermost affections of our soul.

We have no hesitation in declaring that the Remedial Bill embodies in substance all the principles essential to the good working of our schools. We have the right to hope that all the members of this House, who have any concern for their duty, will give the measure the support of their vote. Being given the limits of federal jurisdiction, a careful perusal of the enactments of that Bill shows that it secures to the Manitoba Catholics as complete and independent an organization as possible, and that it effectively protects them against the ill-will of the provincial government. We are fully aware of all the difficulties that had to be warded off in the framing of this law. There was no question of framing at one cast a Bill which might give satisfaction to the Catholic minority. Allowance had also to be made for the Manitoba educational laws passed previously to 1890. We could neither claim any more rights than we enjoyed at the time, nor escape the control exercised at that time by the local government. So, for instance, we are obliged to leave in the hands of the Manitoba Executive the appointment of the members of the School Board and of the Superintendent, a right which has always been exercised by the government. The fact of taking away that right from the local government would have stamped the Remedial Bill with invalidity and jeopardized the measure.

So again with section 3 of the Remedial Bill, which enacts that the Department of Education may make such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools. That section is an exact copy of the enactment embodied in our statute previous to 1890.

The Government, however, exercises no control whatever over the powers of the Board of Education, and does not in the least interfere with the functions of that body, which are clearly defined under section 4. It is an elementary principle of law that a general clause does not restrict the meaning of another specific section, which goes into the details of the question. The latter always prevails in everything it particularly determines. Now, section 4 gives us an absolute control over everything connected with teaching and school organization. To recriminate upon those two points would be to render us a bad service. A federal law, from which sections 1 and 2 had been omitted, would necessarily have been ultra vires. As we said before, the law now under discussion in Parliament is a most desirable one. It embodies all the essential principles and the necessary mechanism for allowing the Manitoba Catholics to organize their school districts and insure their working. Certain public sheets, vexed at the fact that the firm stand taken by the Federal Government deprived them of the benefits they were in the hope of reaping from the school question, were suddenly smitten with a fine zeal for our interests. After having first arraigned the Ottawa Government for delaying to introduce their remedial law, and after, later on, insisting upon a commission of inquiry, they go to the expense of purposely magnifying the difficulties involved in it. If they sincerely wish to help us, why do they not seek to smooth down the difficulties? This is not the time to create further trouble by untimely recriminations, which savour too much of ill-humour to be of any weight.

As we said before, the law such as introduced in Parliament is satisfactory, and the Catholic minority in Manitoba accepts it, reserving to themselves meanwhile, the right to have it amended in the Committee of the Whole, as to certain details which leave something to be desired.

We ask all our true friends not to suffer under the plausible pretext that it is not perfect, to be battered and ruined, a law the main enactments of which are favourable to our rights and go as far as they can, within the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament.

Some newspapers have sharply commented upon section 74 which sanctions our rights to a share in the legislative grant, and they rested their animadversions upon the ground that it does not provide for any means whereby we may wrest from the provincial Ministers the moneys to which we are entitled. We must confess that the Federal Parliament have no power to enforce that section. However that may be, undoubtedly Parliament will have to amend the School Lands Act so as to secure for us our legitimate share of the grant out of the proceeds of the sale of lands. Those lands have been appropriated to the support of the Manitoba schools, such as recognized by the constitution. Those lands are, so to say, mortgaged for that purpose. Now, the decision of the Imperial Privy Council binds the Government in that respect. The Manitoba schools which have a right to share in those funds, are both the separate and the public schools.

We have a vested right to those moneys. It is not in the power of the Federal Government to hand our share of those grants over to the provincial government. The Federal Government are trustees for those lands, and the findings of the Imperial Privy Council are binding upon the executive as to the management of those funds. The necessary conclusion, flowing from the adoption of section 74 will be in the shape of an amendment of the School Lands Act, empowering the Government to give us our share of the moneys arising out of those sales of school lands. The just and firm stand taken by the Federal Government towards the Catholic minority warrants us in believing that they will not hesitate to perfect the Bill which is now before the House.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) That law enacts compulsory education.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Compulsory education is not forbidden by the religious authorities, when it is properly imparted.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Compulsory education is one of the planks of the platform of the radical school, which ranks among the Reformers, of course. Hon. gentlemen may laugh at their ease, but they laugh reluctantly. Such is my answer, Sir, to the quibbles of those hon. members who, on so many conflicting grounds will unite and vote in favour of the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition. One word more, Sir, and I am done. The question which is now before us is of such import to the future of the Canadian confederation, that I may be allowed to appeal to all those who have at heart the progress and the prosperity of our young country, and ask them to give their support to a legislation aiming at restoring to an oppressed minority the rights guaranteed to them by a solemn compact. It is not only the right but also our duty to support such a legislation. This is no national and religious question, but a constitutional question of the utmost importance. The minority, now claiming justice, is Catholic, it is true, but if we set up a dangerous precedent, if we allow any province to tear one of the finest pages of a constitution which has made Canada a great and prosperous country, it will be all over with peace and harmony between the different races inhabiting the Canadian confederation, and nobody can foresee where we shall stop. I freely confess that if the minority were Protestant instead of Catholic, we, Conservative French-Canadians from the province of Quebec, would fight their battle just the same as we fight for our co-religionists. As a proof of our disposition to respect the agreements entered into in 1867, at the time of the union, I refer the hon. gentlemen to the generosity with which the province of Quebec deals with the Protestant minority. As I said before, if we wish to make Canada a great and prosperous country, it is necessary that all unbiassed minds, to whatever race or creed they may belong to, should unite, in order to oppose a barrier to the ever rising flood of fanaticism and prejudices which threatens to break to pieces our political and parliamentary institutions.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has charged the Opposition with having contradicted itself on this matter. I say that the Opposition has not contradicted itself on the school question. What the French-speaking Liberal members of the House asked for was a law, and not the shadow of a law. The hon. gentleman has had the audacity to speak about contradicting. Does he not remember that last session he himself said that he had no confidence in this Government, and no faith in its promise of a remedial law. What is it that has since given him this confidence? Is it the declaration which the leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) made yesterday? I would recall to the House what the hon. gentleman said last year. He said:

I was inclined to think, Sir, that the Government were in earnest when pledging themselves before the country, and I was prepared to oppose the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition; but how can we take for serious a declaration which is not even accepted by as influential a government supporter as the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon)? The course followed by the hon. member is a blame cast upon the Government. This last challenge, Sir, fills the cup to the brim. I have relied so far on the pledges given by the Cabinet, up to the moment when their own friends repudiated those promises.

Further on, the hon. member said:

The very fact that the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) stands up and tells this House that he cannot support any remedial legislation which may be introduced, vindicates the statement that there is no longer any hope that the Government may succeed next session in passing a legislation which will afford relief to the minority in Manitoba.

Is it the conduct of the Government, as explained yesterday by the leader of the House which gives confidence to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas)? The hon. gentleman tells us that we are going to vote with the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), but does he not remember that in the session of 1893 he himself voted to support the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) when a resolution was brought by the hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson) censuring his conduct. The hon. gentleman has spoken about the great principles involved in the Remedial Bill, but the fact is, as my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister) says, there are no principles in this Bill. We on this side support the principle of remedial legislation—a principle which can be put into practice, but that principle cannot be put into practice under this Bill.

I shall not attempt to follow the hon. gentleman, for that would be rather difficult, as by far the greater part of his speech is made up of extracts from newspapers, but I shall confine myself to the Bill now before the House.

What strikes me in this measure, and what must attract the attention of everybody is the manner in which it has been drawn. Sir, the time which has elapsed since the ex-Minister of Justice ceased to be a member of the Cabinet is very short, indeed. The Bill itself is proof of this. What it proves, also, is that the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has been the Minister of Justice 'de facto' even since his official resignation. This project of law is his work; its diction is his; it betrays his skilful hand—skilful for election purposes.

In April last, the telegraph one day scattered the sensational information that the Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) had given in his resignation. The cause of this action on his part was the problem which every one was asking everybody else to solve. But later on it was shown that the Minister had eyes to see, and that he desired to appeal to the electorate on the remedial order. Indeed, to his mind, the remedial order was a dish agreeable to all palates, and spiced with all sauces. To Catholics it meant intervention and justice; to Protestants it meant very little, if anything. Antigonish, Verchères and Haldimand prove what I say. The opinion of the ex-Minister of Justice did not prevail, Parliament was not dissolved, and, in the existing conditions, it was necessary to tack carefully, so that the wind, from whichever quarter it came, would drive the Government safely back into port. And the same ingenious hand which drew up the remedial order, prepared the Bill we have before us. This Bill is neither fish nor flesh. It may mean much and mean very little. To some it means everything, and to others, nothing. Let me illustrate what I mean by some expressions of opinion from different quarters. The "Mail" is the chief Government organ in Ontario, and the "Minerve" holds a similar position in Quebec. Well, on the 13th February last, the "Mail" contained an editorial on the remedial order, which, after stating the principal lines of this Bill, concludes thus:

The Bill is obviously another remedial proposal—a milder proposal than that of the remedial order as interpreted in Winnipeg. It is a further invitation to Manitoba to take the matter over.

On the other hand, the "Minerve" said:

The Bill is a complete restoration by the Federal Parliament of the rights of the minority.

The ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) who, I am sorry is not in his seat to-night, must see how diversely his Bill is considered in different quarters, even by the most influential friends of his own party. It is appreciated favourably in Ontario, where it is praised as meaning very little; and in Quebec it is favourably considered by those who extol it as meaning everything. It was an ingenious hand which traced this document—a document intended to rally the whole Tory phalanx, more susceptible to the use of expedients than anxious for the maintenance of principle.

For my part, I am against this measure because it is too coercive to be received with good faith and put into execution with good grace by the Manitoba government, and not coercive enough to be really useful and advantageous to the minority. On several occasions, the Government has declared, that this question has been forced upon them. Sir, in making this admission, the hon. Ministers are very frank. But even though they had not admitted it, it would not have been difficult to see that this question was to them not a welcome one. The fact is, that the Ministers spoke truly, but did not speak the whole truth. What they did not state was, that it never occurred to them that they would be called upon to take a single step in favour of intervention. If the Government had honestly intended to deal with this question, is it to be believed that they would have taken the course they have taken since the decision of the Privy Council? If the Government had honestly intended to deal with this question, are we asked to believe that the eve of a general election would have been the time chosen to give effect to that intention? The fact is, that before issuing this remedial order the Government should have tried conciliation with the Manitoba government. But they did nothing of the kind, for the reason, as I said before, that it never occurred to them that they would be called upon to deal with this question. Hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to think, that in this case arbitration was impracticable. Sir, every one knows that arbitration is the most rational, the most wise and the most honourable means of settling disputes, not only between individuals, but especially between states. As nations progress, as civilization is developed among the peoples of the world, arbitration tends to the maintenance of peace and harmony. Sir, it is in this century that the idea of arbitration has received its most practical application. In spite of the errors of kings and emperors and governments, people are showing themselves opposed to quarrels, so much so, that a leading thinker has been led to say, that it is no longer force, but intellect, or, better still, justice and humanity, that governs the world, and that war is no longer the last argument of nations. I contend, that conciliation, and not war, should have been the first argument of the Canadian Government in this case. Therein has the Ministry been at fault, but it is useless to recriminate. Let us turn from the past to deal with the future. The future! The Ministry offers it to us by the Bill which I hold in my hand. This Bill is a synopsis of all the arguments, of all the speeches, and, I should say, of all the boasts in which the Ministers have been indulging in the past few days. I have studied it carefully. The Government, by interfering, assumes that the intervention of this Parliament is necessary in order to restore to the minority of Manitoba their rights. This Bill, therefore, sanctions the idea that the Manitoba legislature will not render the Catholics justice. So imbued is the Ministry with this idea, that one of them, I think it was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), stated, that the only guarantee that the Manitoba minority had was the passage of a law by this Parliament, and that he would not leave it to Mr. Greenway to do justice to them. That being so, what, then, was the duty of the Government? Here is a province which, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, will not render justice to an important group of the subjects of Her Majesty. Here is a legislature to whom justice and reason are but empty words. If this Government has the power to do so, common sense requires, that it shall assume the cause of the oppressed, and not leave those oppressed longer under the control of their oppressors. The Government, by presenting this Bill to Parliament, formulate the idea, that Manitoba will not, or cannot, render justice. And yet, Sir, by a strange contradiction, though they have the power to enforce this law, they leave the enforcement of the law to the power that combats it. Under this Bill they only decree and proclaim the law, without taking the means to put it into execution. The Ministry reminds me of a schemer who, on one occasion, came to me and gave dazzling accounts of the immense fortune that could be realized by the working of a certain mineral. When pressed with the means to be taken to overcome difficulties, he said: "I bind myself to start the thing; as to its future working, I am not concerned." And so, when we ask the Ministry: How are you going to put this law into operation? They answer: Our duty is to pass this law; our duty is not to put it into operation. Or, as the Postmaster General did, they give no answer at all. The ostensible object of the law is to restore separate schools to the minority in Manitoba. It affirms, that the Greenway government is the enemy of these schools, and yet, by clause 4 of this Bill, it gives to that enemy of separate schools the power to make regulations concerning the organization of those schools. Do we not see immediately, not only the impropriety, as the "Moniteur de Lévis" says, but the danger of passing a coercive law, which will irritate the Manitoba government, while leaving in the hands of that same government the power to make regulations concerning these separate schools that we wish to establish? It is not necessary to study the details of the Bill; the broad lines upon which it is drawn are all that it is necessary to know. "The Ministry has restored separate schools to Manitoba," say the Quebec Conservative members. It is easy to create enthusiasm among those who, for two years, have been trembling at the idea of going before their constituents without having even the senblance. to say nothing of the substance, of a law. And here, Sir, it is well to ask the Government: How do you propose to put this law into operation? Whence are the funds to come? Is it true, as rumour has told us for the last few days, or the last few weeks, that promises have been given to Archbishop Langevin, that, if Mr. Greenway does not do so, this Government, if it is maintained in power, will vote money at the next session for the support of the separate schools?

Sir, if this promise had not been given, I could not understand the position of the Archbishop of St. Boniface, but I will explain his position by saying that I think promises were given to him; because I find that on 4th May, 1895, following an interview with Mgr. Langevin, Mr. Tardivel wrote in his paper "La Vérité," an article from which I take the following extract:—

Without being indiscreet we can say, that those who speak of compromise do not meet the views of his Grace. As the Catholics of Manitoba do not ask any favour, but the enjoyment of a strict natural legal right, compromise is out of the question. All that the minority demands in virtue of its natural and legal right, is the control of its own schools, which it maintains after all with its own funds.

This extract very accurately represents the views of his Grace, for on 9th May, 1895, his Grace wrote to Mr. Tardivel a letter which was published in "La Vérité," and from which I quote this extract:

Please accept thanks for the article published in "La Verite" after our interview. You said just what was required, and I am sure you have rendered a very appreciable service to the cause which you are helping us to defend.

Mr. Tardivel thinking this letter important, I suppose, asked Mgr. Langevin for leave to publish it, and on the 17th May, 1895, the bishop answered him as follows:—

For four years our good Catholics of Winnipeg, without distinction of nationality, have been called upon to pay a tax amounting to $3,500 per annum, in addition to the taxes paid for the schools with which the Protestant majority is satisfied, and which no one thinks of taking from it. We are in debt, crushed. Several of our young parishes have made for a year the same generous efforts as the Catholics of Winnipeg to maintain their schools. It is time, it seems to me, that our cause were vigorously taken in hand.

As the House will see at once, what Bishop Langevin will not have is a compromise. What Bishop Langevin complains of is that the Catholics of Manitoba have been obliged to make enormous sacrifices for the support of their schools, and he cites as an instance of those sacrifices the fact that the Catholics of Winnipeg were last year obliged to subscribe $3,500 for the maintenance of their schools. What was our surprise then to read in the Montreal "Gazette" of 14th February last, the following interview with the same prelate, who is made to say:

Mr. CARROLL.

All the changes will be that there will be a little less money to carry on the public schools, but then we are very poor people, and the Protestants do not want the little money we contribute to help support their schools. All we want is to have our taxes for our own schools.

This interview has not been contradicted, and shows that his Grace must have considerably modified his views since the past few months. I do not say this to disparage in any way the Bishop of St. Boniface; I cite this as an instance to show that promises were certainly made to him, that if Mr. Greenway did not put into operation the law which would be passed by this Parliament, this Government, at the next session, would pass a law giving money for the support of their schools. Sir, I had thought that the Government's stock of promises was completely exhausted. I had thought that after the arrival in this House of the hon. gentleman whom the Conservative party call its saviour, they would proceed seriously to work, and that when we had a Bill, we would have a serious Bill. Sir, my friends warned me that the Secretary of State was exaggerating in Cape Breton; but I concluded that a statesman who did not leave to others the task of sounding his praises, who was himself the panegyrist of his great deeds, must be superior to ordinary mortals. The hon. leader of the House boasted of his great deeds, he boasted of his past successes, and he has had successes. But ordinary mortals who are not always free from envy, are more apt to forgive the success of those who possess the rare quality of silence. But all would have been forgiven to the hon. gentleman if he had kept his word, and if he had, as he stated he would, presented to this House a Bill which gave to the Catholics of Manitoba their rights. Sir, this Bill shows that the only logical position taken by a public man in this country was the position taken by the leader of the Opposition from the start. Not only was his position logical, but I say it was the only legal and constitutional position to take on this matter. In the first place, it is well to say that in certain parts of this country, there is a very mistaken idea as to the scope of the judgment of the Privy Council. Especially in the province of Quebec, the Tory press has said that the last decision of the Privy Council was purely and simply a judgment, and consequently that the Opposition was not logical in asking for an inquiry, since the Privy Council has pronounced on questions of fact and of law, and that its judgment had the force of a chose jugée. How could the Privy Council have given a judgment which had the force of a chose jugée? The statute of this Parliament says that questions shall be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada for advice to the executive. The powers of the Supreme Court are limited by the statute which has been enacted by this Parliament. From the answers given by the Supreme Court, there is an appeal to the Privy Council in England. Those who have the first notions of law, and every one here has, know perfectly well that a tribunal of appeal can only confirm and revise that which has been the subject of a judgment in the first instance. Therefore if the subject decided by the court in the first instance was purely and simply an advice, the jurisdiction of the court of appeal was limited to confirming or revising that advice. And this was the decision, this was the view, taken by the lords of the Privy Council. I will cite at page 209 of the papers in reference to the Manitoba school case :

The Lord Chancellor—All we have to say is what we think the jurisdiction of the Governor General is.

Mr. Blake—The question whether upon the whole, acting in their political capacity, the Privy Council believe that they ought not to act or to act in what we may consider a lame and half-hearted way, or to go the whole length of our demand, is no part of the question I have to submit to your lordships.

Lord Watson—If our duty is limited to that, it must also be limited to deciding whether a prima facie case has arisen.

Mr. Blake—Perhaps so.

And further :

Lord Watson—I suppose we are bound to give him advice on this appeal. He has asked nothing else but advice throughout. He has not asked for a political decision which shall fetter him in any way.

Mr. Blake—It could not be. The law which creates the tribunal for the purpose of giving advice, expressly states that in their political capacity they are not bound by that advice.

Lord Watson—That is a Canadian statute.

Mr. Blake—Yes.

Lord Watson—A Canadian statute which authorized the Governor General in Council to consult the Supreme Court, and lays a duty on the judges of the Supreme Court to give advice.

Mr. Blake—Yes.

As can be seen, the lords declared that what they were called upon to decide was this : was there a prima facie case for the Governor General to proceed ? I said before that the position taken by the leader of the Opposition was the only logical and legal one. He has declared from the first that the question was a question of facts ; his opinion is fully corroborated by the lords of the Privy Council, for on pages 306 and 307 we read as follows :—

Lord Watson—It had ceased to be a constitutional question, and resolved itself into a mere question of fact. The decision is such that in one way it necessitated the application of the Act which made the Act of the provincial legislature void. When that provision was made in subsection 1 that question appears to me to have ceased to be a constitutional question, and to have resolved itself into a simple question of fact.

Mr. Haldane—Take it upon the construction which has been expressed by some of your lordships, and which I am endeavouring to combat.

Lord Watson—What constitutional question has the court to consider when it is merely determining whether such privilege existed—

Mr. Haldane—Perhaps I used the word “ constitutional ” inaccurately there ; it is a question of law—

Lord Watson—Whether a state of things existed that brought into operation a condition of nullity imposed by Act of Parliament.

The Lord Chancellor—If you were once to concede that subsection 2 applied to rights and privileges acquired by post-union legislation, or including them at all events, the question whether a right or privilege had been affected really would be a question of fact in a sense. You may say it is a question of law possibly in a sense, but not in the ordinary sense, because there would be no difficulty in any person of common sense determining whether what had been given, which was for his benefit, was taken away. It would not be a question of law.

Now, if this is a question of fact, what is the position of the parties ? The minority has stated its grievances in its petition, and assuming these grievances to be true, they constitute a prima facie case that the Governor General ought to proceed with the appeal, as Lord Watson says. The minority, then, is exactly in the position of a petitioner who has obtained the issuance of a writ of mandamus or a writ of injunction. The petitioner draws up a libelled requisition, in which he advances the necessary facts to obtain the issuance of the mandamus. If these facts denote to the judge that there is a prima facie case, he orders the issue of the writ. Does this mean that the petitioner has gained his case ? Not at all. The writ is served on the party against whom the mandamus is directed. This party is ordered to appear before the tribunal. A day is fixed for the hearing of the parties on the facts which the parties have to advance in contradiction to each other. This is the procedure followed before the courts, and it is a reasonable procedure.

Well, the Privy Council, according to the language of Lord Watson, having only to decide if there was a prima facie case in favour of the minority, decided that there was such a prima facie case. The most elementary rules of procedure required that before the issuing of the remedial order, the facts mentioned in the petition of the minority, which facts were denied by Manitoba, should be established, since, as the lords of the Privy Council say, it was above all a question of fact. That is why I said that the position taken by the leader of the Opposition is the only legal and constitutional one ; the only one sanctioned by good sense, the only one which should have been followed. I know the sentiment of the majority of the members of this House. I am not speaking when I say that if the law of 1890 had been disallowed purely and simply it would have been to the advantage not only of the minority in Manitoba, but of the whole Dominion of Canada. I know perfectly well that this view is not that of the majority of this House, and that the word disallowance is not a popular one. According to me, the present case was one which called for the exercise of this prerogative. The prerogative was not exercised because in this country the majority is opposed to the interference of the central power with provincial affairs. The two powers claim to be and in reality are sovereign within their respective spheres, and they look with a jealous eye on the encroachment, or even the appearance of encroachment, of the one on the other. The questions decided by the provinces interest the central Government in a greater or lesser degree, so that where the central power disallows a provincial law, it is often a judge in its own case. However, the right exists, and it should be exercised when the circumstances require it. But, Sir, realizing the danger which attaches to the exercise of this right, I now recognize the wisdom of the provincial ministers who took part in the labours of the Interprovincial Conference, held in Quebec in 1887. They wanted this right taken from the Federal Government and given to the Imperial Government. Truly, this change would not be spoken of if the federal authority had acted with discretion in the disallowance of provincial laws; if, during the twenty-five years which have elapsed since the establishment of the federative system, the federal power had shown itself impartial towards the provinces, if it had not encroached upon their rights and privileges, and if we had no reason to believe that it would continue so to act.

In the case of the licenses, it was proposed to deprive the provinces of their revenue from these sources. The provinces gained their point in spite of the bitter fight made by Sir John Macdonald, a fight which was ended by his defeat before the Privy Council. Every time the occasion has presented itself, we have seen the Federal Government take action against the province of Ontario to deprive it of as many immunities, of as many privileges as possible. It is those quarrels, it is those suits, which have stirred up public opinion in this country and caused the power of disallowance to become a dead letter, and that the Government dare not avail itself of it. I was very much surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the statements made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) at the Toronto meeting lately. The hon. gentleman declared that there were better reasons for disallowing the Jesuits' Estates Act than for disallowing the Manitoba law of 1890. I ask myself by what process of logic the hon. gentleman could arrive at this conclusion. Probably he did so to hide a little the contradiction between the line of conduct he followed then and that which he is following to-day. The hon. gentleman demanded the disallowance of the law enacted by the legislature of Quebec. The Jesuits' Act was constitutional, nobody ever thought of denying this—the Jesuits' Act in no way wounded the susceptibility of the Protestant minority of Quebec, who through its representatives in Parliament accepted that Act. There was then in that Bill no injustice against any one, since the minority received its share of the sum voted by the legislature in respect of it. Every one in Quebec was satisfied, and in spite of this, the hon. member insisted on the exercise of the right of disallowance by the Federal Parliament. To-day everybody admits the grievances of the Manitoba minority, and yet all his eloquence and his influence are on the side of the majority against the minority. I do not accuse the hon. member of dishonourable motives. I prefer to believe that he is influenced by his education, which I hope he did not receive in any public school. If he had, he would be a living argument against the public school system. The hon. gentleman appears to me to be in the same disposition of mind in which fifty years ago was the one who is to-day the personification of Liberalism in the world. At that time, Mr. Gladstone was beginning his career, as Macaulay says, "as the rising hope of the unbending Tories of the day." His vast intellect grasped the most varied subjects, and he, the grand old man, on whom the eyes of the world are now fixed, published a book, "Church and State," which was the negation of the first notions of liberty. Mr. Gladstone wanted by force of law a state religion in England, not only in England, but wherever the British flag floated, a religion which was to be that of the subjects of Her Majesty, and which led to the negation of the liberty of conscience.

The English historian, Macaulay—the model of historians, in his memorable criticism of this book, said that Mr. Gladstone's systems would have produced a union which can be compared only to that which is the subject of a wild Persian fable. King Zohak gave the devil leave to kiss his shoulders, when instantly two serpents sprang out who, in the fury of hunger, attacked his head and tried to get at his brain. Zohak pulled them away, and tore them with his nails, but he found they were inseparable parts of himself, and that what he was lacerating was his own flesh. Perhaps we might be able to find, if we looked around the world, some political union like this, some hideous monster of state blessed with one principle or cursed with one principle of sensation, and two principles of volition, made up of parts which are driven by a frantic impulse to inflict mutual pain, yet are doomed to feel whatever they inflict; which are divided by an irreconcilable hatred, yet are blended in an indissoluble identity. Mr. Gladstone, for his tender concern for Zohak is unsatisfied, because the devil has as yet kissed only one shoulder, because there is not a snake mangling and mangled on the left to keep in countenance his brother on the right.

The system of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would lead to such a union as this. He would have in this country that the law which suits Protestants should also suit the Catholics; that that which suits the English should also suit the French, without taking into account the leanings, the aspirations, and the sentiments of the latter. The hon. member (Mr. McCarthy), although he is engaged in law most of the time, must surely have read history, and history is there to proclaim, that whatever efforts may be made, whatever laws might be promulgated, they are condemned to impotence if they are not in accord with the spirit of the people which is subject to them. If the laws are but the isolated product of the dreams of an individual, no people can very long adapt itself to it. In a greater degree is this the case, if the laws come in conflict with the spirit, the manners, the religion, and, above all, with the language of a people. This applies most particularly to education, which is the work of the present for the future, and I may be allowed to cite what was said on this subject by an ex-Finance Minister, Sir A. T. Galt, speaking at Sherbrooke when the question of confederation was under consideration. Sir A. T. Galt said :

There could be no greater injustice than that which would force a population to educate its children in a manner opposed to its religious beliefs.

And Sir A. T. Galt was right, for, as I said before, "teaching is society in labour. It is the morals, the sentiments, the tendencies and the works of the generations which hasten towards the threshold of the future." It is impossible to encroach on these tendencies or these sentiments without striking a blow at freedom. Sir, I am glad to know that the ideas of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) are not shared by the mass of the two political parties in this country. Sir, I do not despair, because I think the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is influenced by his education. I do not despair that in the future, looking back on his past, he will make use of the noble language which one of his co-religionists in France made use of on the occasion of the reception of Father Lacordaire in the French Academy. Mr. Guizot was one of the descendants of those who had been forced to leave their country by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Father Lacordaire was a descendant of those who before had been the persecutors :

What would have occurred, Sir, if we had met, you and I, six hundred years ago, and if we had been, the one and the other, called upon to inflame our mutual distrusts ?

Six hundred years ago, Sir, if mine of those days had met you, they would have assailed you with anger, as an odious persecutor, and yours, eager to inflame the victors against the heretics, would have exclaimed, "Strike, strike, God will not fail to recognize his own." We are here, you and I, Sir, the living evidences and the happy witnesses of the sublime progress which has been accomplished among us in intelligence, respect of justice, conscience and right.

Sir, these are great words, great sentiments. Right, justice, fraternity, are, I regret to say, unknown in some parts of Canada. To cause them to penetrate in the population, the prestige, and the authority of those who command public confidence are required. In this sense, also, must the voice of the press be heard. The influence of the press is well known. The press is the weapon and sinew of modern society. A French writer said, in 1830 : That it was in France more of a social necessity than a political institution. Since these words were spoken the child of then has become a veritable giant, which, with steam and electricity its two agents henceforth sways the world. The press is the indispensable support of our political institutions; it exercises a supreme influence over the minds and movements of men, and on this occasion, I regret to say, it has not been equal to its mission.

Sir, at the present moment, in the province of Quebec—the dear French province of Quebec from which I come, we on this side of the House are accused of being opposed to doing justice to the minority in Manitoba.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CARROLL. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but he must know better. In the province of Ontario we are accused of being extremists, wanting more than justice for the minority. In the province of Quebec hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us of waging war against the Catholic clergy, and in the province of Ontario we are accused of being tools in the hands of the same clergy. Sir, for my part, I say this—and I think I speak the voice of the French Liberals of the province of Quebec—we are not the enemies of the Catholic clergy. I speak here with all liberty, Sir. I speak as a Catholic, but as one who has received his early education from a Protestant mother and, consequently, I am above prejudice. I have made my education with Catholic priests, and, Sir, I found that they were good, they were disinterested, they were devoted, they were virtuous. But, Sir, the only fault I had to find with them—and I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will not think it is a fault—the only fault I had to find with them was that the majority of them were more favourable to the Tory party than to the Liberal party. Sir, to conclude my remarks, I say that Mr. Greenway has committed a great fault.

Moderation is for all the supreme law; more particularly is it the supreme law for those who govern a country. If Mr. Greenway had not been so strongly entrenched in public confidence, I do not think he would have dared to put into practice the arbitrary formula, "The state—I am the state." The teaching of history shows us that whenever governments have the power to do all that they will, they almost always end by willing to do more than they should.

Mr. Speaker, I am against this law, because it is going to cause irritation without relieving the minority. I am against this law, because I think it is an appeal to expediency. I am against this law because I think it is the death-blow to the French language in the province of Manitoba. I am against this law because I do not think that this Government, even if they were sincere, could render justice to the minority while they command—oh, no, they do not command—the Tory phalanx behind them. Sir, I am in favour of the policy of the leader of the Opposition, because I believe it will result in the settlement of this question to the satisfaction of the minority, without disturbing the peace of the country. We are a united party in support of that policy. We want an inquiry, which is the legal and constitutional way to proceed. We want an inquiry; and we want the intervention of this Parliament, if Mr. Greenway is deaf to all sense of justice, as hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think. Sir, the future has not revealed to us the result of our attitude; but when an action is right, and when good sense alone is the condition of success, it is almost being a bad citizen to have any doubts of success. We are men of moderation and our task has for its aim, as it has for its effect, the prevention of the violence which is in preparation, by causing to be heard the voice of good sense and of reason. Sir, our policy is good; our leader the nation has proclaimed a great leader; and if, for defending one and the other, some of us must fall in the fray, at least our political life will not have been wholly in vain.

Mr. LACHAPELLE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in rising to reply to the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll), I am sorry I have not, in the first place the science of a lawyer to follow him with advantage on the ground upon which he stood in the greater part of his speech, and secondly the abilities of a master of rhetoric in order that I might reply to him with as much distinction as he has shown during the whole of his speech. However, it is not quite necessary to have these two qualities to discuss the important question now before us and upon which the eyes of the whole country are now set. There are two ways in which to explain this question: first, from an essentially legal standpoint, for there certainly exists a legal objection that ought to determine us to vote for the measure. Secondly, the question may be dealt with from a purely moral standpoint. That is to say, besides the legal objections, there exists the moral one upon which the Government and this whole House might ground their determination to agree to this Bill. It is from the latter standpoint that I wish to deal with the question, leaving the legal aspect to the professional men. Such as, for instance, the hon. the Minister of Justice who has given us already the results of a thorough study of it. In considering the moral obligation I hope, however, to find enough arguments to come to the conclusion that we ought to pronounce in favour of the Bill now before us which is intended to give back to the Catholics of Manitoba the rights and privileges of which they have been deprived since 1890 by a legislation which we are all agreed to characterize as iniquitous. A year ago, I attended the dinner tendered in Montreal to the hon. the present Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) by his compatriots and which was attended likewise by a great many French-Canadians who have as much sympathy for the hon. Minister as his own fellow-countrymen. The hon. the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec called upon to reply to the toast to his Government and having to reply to the school question, which was then as now interesting all the people, said: In the province of Quebec, we never open our statutes to ascertain the extent of our powers with respect to the Protestant minority. What the hon. the Prime Minister said on that occasion, many others had stated before. The province of Quebec always proved the same, at any time, towards the Protestant minority. That is to say, it never sought to ascertain the extent of her powers towards the Protestant minority which always enjoyed the greatest latitude with respect to their schools and their course of studies. If I insist upon this statement of the hon. the Prime Minister of Quebec it is because I wish to assert at once that it is quite in harmony with our education as Catholics, with our ideas as such to allow the greatest latitude, the fullest liberty as concerns the education of children. We are in duty bound to understand that the education must be essentially Christian and that, since the father of a family is bound to give to his child a Christian education, the same as he owes to him nutriment of the body, it is impossible to entertain for a moment the idea that we could allow the least obstacle to bear on the liberty of the father of a family, by compelling him to have his child educated in any other way than one dictated by his own will. We make a great distinction between education and instruction. We contend that instruction is not strictly necessary, but that education is a bounden duty, that it is a duty incumbent not only upon the State, but also upon the familyman, that he should give to his son a Christian education, in harmony with the one he himself had. Why must education, in our judgment, prevail over instruction? It is because education consists in forming the child, in directing his mind and heart so that he may, through such a direction, have a thorough knowledge of his duties towards God, towards society and towards himself. Through education, we assist in the development of the faculties and in the culture of the mind and heart of the child, development and culture obtained by a good and wise direction given to that education. We consider these qualities are essential and indispensable in order to make good citizens. A good education inspires the man who received it, not only with the desire and the will to perform his duty towards himself, but also towards his family, towards society, towards his country, and that, in any circumstances throughout life. That is what is implied in education. Education is inherent to the development of the faculties of the soul, and I have no hesitation in saying that these faculties are very delicate in the organism of a young child. All the more reason to cultivate these qualities in a wise and proper way, so as to strengthen and develop them as much as possible. Such is the education, Sir, every family man is in duty bound to give to his children. From that point of view, I think the province of Quebec always did her duty, that is to say the education of youth in the province of Quebec was encouraged, divested, cultivated in such a way that our children receive the essentially wise education they should receive. Not only are the fathers and mothers bound to give that education, but the State compels them to perform that duty should they be inclined, either through ignorance or through negligence, not to perform it as they should. I say that in the province of Quebec through private or public action, the best possible direction was given to the education of youth, not only in the family, but likewise in the schools receiving public aid. I insist upon this, Sir, because it was hinted that the schools in the province of Quebec were inferior to those of the other provinces of the Dominion. No, Sir, our schools in the province of Quebec are not inferior to those of the other provinces, as I will show later on by unexceptionable evidences. Without any desire whatever to wound the susceptibilities of the other provinces, I am going to establish this fact in the most peremptory manner, for, when discussing a question such as the one now before us, it is proper that we should repel the attacks or the malignant insinuations directed against our schools in the province of Quebec. The opponents of separate schools in Manitoba are bent on having it believed that separate schools mean inferior schools. It is a serious mistake which I think it my duty to take up and point out to the attention of my hon. colleagues in this House. When I hear such a charge preferred by representatives of the province of Quebec, under the present circumstances, I contend, Sir, that such insinuations and such a charge have no cause whatever. Two years ago, I had the honour to call the attention of the House to this question of instruction in the province of Quebec, and, on that occasion, I moved for important papers in relation to the World's Fair held in the city of Chicago. I had the honour to call the attention of the House to this fact: that the result of the school exhibit of the province of Quebec at Chicago was most favourable to that province. The contention that our schools are inferior is calculated to keep up an opinion most prejudicial to the inhabitants of this country, separated as they are by opinions of creed. I think it is the duty of every member of this House to do anything in his power to cause this prejudice to disappear, in the interest of truth as well as in the interest of harmony and good understanding between the different races which form the people of this Dominion. Last year, I moved for papers relating to the Chicago fair in so far as they related to the educational exhibition made by the province of Quebec. They have been brought up since, and they prove most conclusively the statement then made by me. I then stated that the educational exhibition held at Chicago had turned out to the whole advantage and honour of the province of Quebec. I have now the satisfaction to find out, from official evidence, that this statement was true in every respect. Effectively, there was a report made on the Chicago fair. We have been furnished with a copy of it by the Department of Agriculture. I find in that report the following paragraph which I would like to put before this House, because it goes to show to the whole country how wrong are those who assail the school system of the province of Quebec. I wish, moreover, to quote it here, in order to dispel the unfavourable impression that must have been caused by unfriendly statements against these very schools, which I am bound to defend with all the energy in my power. Here is the official report, of which we were furnished a copy of by the Government. I only give an extract of it:

The province of Quebec, in this, her almost first, exhibit, presented to the many millions who visited the fair an extensive, artistic, and instructive display. The "Révérend l'abbé Bruchési, chanoine de la Cathédrale de Montréal," had charge of the Quebec Roman Catholic schools. He was a most assiduous and enthusiastic worker, and ably represented Quebec's educational exhibits. He had under his charge nearly four hundred schools, representing various religious institutions throughout the province, the primary schools, the University of Laval, and Laval Normal School. The display made by the 100 schools of the convent of Notre-Dame of Montreal, representing 24,000 pupils, elicited much admiration. The excellence attained in those studies peculiar to young ladies was the most characteristic feature of the exhibit. The Christian Brothers Schools were largely represented by exhibits in drawing, writing and studies in commercial work. They represented nearly 20,000 pupils, and their most marked characteristic was the excellence of the writing, penmanship that was equalled by none at the World's Fair. The primary schools had a good showing in every-day school work. The result of this exhibit made by Quebec must dispel the idea wherever it prevails that she is not progressing in education. There were over 10,000 separate exhibits, and they were grouped under 80 headings, and received 60 awards.

Such are the statements contained in the report of the Canadian Commissioner to the Chicago Fair. I might say, moreover, that the greatest number of prizes awarded at that exhibition were awarded to the province of Quebec. This being the case, I think it is impossible to find fault with our educational system, especially when it has given such favourable results. The province of Quebec was certainly well represented at Chicago, it was honourably represented. I would call the attention of the House to the character of the works exhibited. They were not special works, chosen designedly, and not likely to give a true idea of the ordinary works upon which one must base judgment in any exhibition. I find in the report of the Quebec Provincial Secretary, a paragraph clearly establishing that only ordinary and every day works were exhibited, works done by the pupils during the year previous to the exhibition :

In connection with that exhibition, we must manage matters so that our school works may be judged as a whole, without holding to a particular work, however creditable it may be. Indeed we have no intention to send there a special selection of exhibits, but we intend to prove that our system is as good as a whole from the university down to the humblest primary school. In order to do that, we must make it known, such as it is such as it works, that is to say exhibit the works to the teachers and the tasks of the pupils as done from day to day, with the corrections of the teacher.

This is how they prepared for that display. The report contains as well a great many very flattering appreciations by newspapers, from which I shall quote brief extracts. Thus the "Courier du Canada" said :

The general opinion here is that the province of Quebec made an excellent exhibit, especially as regards the practical every-day work of the pupils. The exhibits of work coming from the Brothers' schools, especially in penmanship, drawing and commercial work, were much admired.

The "True Witness" gives expression to the same opinion. Then I find the opinion of Mr. Serrurier, a distinguished French specialist, who says :

He said to me at one time : " If it were in France, what an immense success your schools would have ! I hope you will go there."

And, on August 23rd, he wrote to me :

I am bound to express to you the great satisfaction I felt when visiting your school exhibit.

Mr. LACHAPPELLE.

* * * Your books are the only ones, I think, that are headed in a full, definite and clear way with informations showing the name of the school, the class, the number and age of pupils, etc. Your methods are ours, so much so that, at first, I thought I was in France.

Then comes the opinion of Mr. Morton, which I am pleased to quote. This gentleman had been given charge by the Dominion Government of the whole Canadian Department of Education :

He wrote to you, Sir, from Chicago : " It is the general opinion here that the province of Quebec made a very good exhibit, especially as regards the every-day practical work in the classes. The exhibits of the Brothers' schools, particularly in penmanship, drawing and commercial work, are much admired. The display of the Sisters' schools attract a great many admirers, men and women. All the preceptors who visited this section are never tired of praising the works they saw. The province of Quebec has reason to be proud of her exhibit."

I take it, therefore, for granted, after such evidences, that the insinuation that the schools of the province of Quebec are inferior ones, is one which I would qualify, to say the least, as very malignant. They wanted to make it appear from the last census that the standard of education in the province of Quebec was below that of the other provinces. The census shows, it is true, a difference to the advantage of the other provinces, but we know very well that the return is divided into groups of ages, and we find that the difference, as far as the groups of advanced ages are concerned, is much more unfavourable to us. However, by analysing these various groups of ages, we find that as regards the groups of young people, from five to fifteen years, for instance, this difference is much less marked. The difference is almost trifling between the groups from five to fifteen years. It follows therefrom, and I call the attention of the House to that point, that education is the more and more cultivated in the province of Quebec, and that if it was neglected twenty-five years ago, it is impossible to sustain such a contention as regards our existing schools. That is the evidence I wish to adduce. It might seem out of place in this discussion, but I am pleased to think it will be useful all the same. I will quote, besides, the statement of Mr. de Laveleye, a high French pedagogical authority, which I find, in a speech of the late Hon. Mr. Chauveau, in relation to the movement of education in the province of Quebec. That gentleman made the following table showing the number of pupils attending the schools in 1872, according to the population of the various countries to which he refers :

	Pupil.	Inhabi- tants.
Upper Canada schools	1 to	4
Lower Canada	1 to	6
France, 1864	1 to	9
England, 1870	1 to	13
Italy	1 to	19
Russia	1 to	116

This table quoted by Mr. de Laveleye, goes to show that Canada is far from cutting a sad figure in the group of nations mentioned; it shows, on the contrary, that the province of Quebec comes second, next to Upper Canada, as far as the percentage of pupils according to population is concerned. If I lay such stress upon that part of the Chicago Fair, if I thought it my duty to deal at such a length with this question, it is that I wish to be understood that the matter of education is particularly dear to us of the province of Quebec, and that we consider education as more necessary than instruction. Now, Sir, you must understand how we look upon that question in the province of Quebec, and why we insist so much upon having a control over education. It is for us a matter of the highest importance as to which we cannot possibly make the concessions which we might, perhaps, be called upon to make. It is why we sympathize so much with the Catholic minority in Manitoba, who have been deprived of their schools since the passing of the Act of 1890. We all know, Sir, under what circumstances that law of 1890 was imposed upon the people of Manitoba. It is a well-known fact that there are among our population moderate people who have opposed it, and to whom it was repulsive. If there had been no fanaticism somewhere, one might say without fear that never would the law of 1890 have been passed, that never would the troubles we have been witnessing have happened. I find the proof of this in a speech delivered by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). That gentleman made the following statement previous to the passing of the law. This speech was delivered in 1889, at Portage la Prairie :

Do you tell me that the Equal Rights Association had nothing to do with that question? Of course, the feeling was there; the grievance existed, her people's minds had only to be directed to it, and the moment attention was drawn to it, the province of Manitoba rose as one man and said: We want no dual language, and away with separate schools as well.

This speech was delivered in 1889, as an answer to the Jesuits' Estates Bill passed by the legislature of the province of Quebec. I find that when the Manitoba school question came before the Privy Council, both sides were represented by counsel, and the hon. member for North Simcoe was counsel for the Greenway government. I also find that the hon. gentleman made the following statements at two different times, in answer to the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet). The hon. gentleman then stated that the object of the iniquitous law of 1890 was to deprive the minority in Manitoba of their French characteristics. Here is what the hon. member for North Simcoe stated before the Privy Council for Canada :

Hon. Mr. OUIMET. The restoration of separate schools would not be likely to cause much disturbance in the working of the existing school system.

Moreover, the Remedial Bill would not concern the majority in any way; therefore they are not interested in opposing it.

Mr. McCARTHY. That depends upon what you call concerning them. They may be largely concerned in having the minority identified with themselves, in having them cease to be French.

Mr. OUIMET. Therefore, the object of the Manitoba school law is to have the minority cease to be French and Catholic?

Mr. McCARTHY. Catholic, no; French, yes. * * * The object of the Manitoba legislature is to make the people of the province homogeneous. And it is a laudable object, says Mr. McCarthy, in a province where the population belongs to such various elements. The majority are interested in a process of assimilation, through which the population will cease to be French.

Hon. Mr. OUIMET. Thus one of the objects of the law of 1890 was to cause the French element to disappear?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

These statements, Sir, prove what I have just stated that had we had only moderate people in this country and no fanaticism, we would not be compelled now to deal with such a thorny question, we would not be seeking a way to solve such a difficult question as that of the Manitoba schools. But I may be told that it was the legislature of Manitoba that passed the law of 1890. I admit it is not the hon. member for North Simcoe who voted that law, but I say that the speech delivered by that gentleman, in 1889, at Portage la Prairie, was the spark that kindled the fire, and surely did, as suggested to me by my hon. friend the member for Lévis (Mr. Guay), in flames, to begin with, the whole North-west, and then spread elsewhere. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is the author of this law. What did he say in this respect? His words are well known, but I will in a moment put them before the House. From the statement he made, we are bound to come to the conclusion that such a legislation was not required by the public interest of the province of Manitoba. Both these hon. gentlemen—I refer to the members for North Simcoe and Winnipeg—are opponents of the French language, as well as of Catholic teaching in our schools. The hon. member for Winnipeg uttered, in the course of a speech delivered before the Manitoba legislature, the following words, which I find reported in the Winnipeg "Tribune," under date of March 5th, 1890 :

The Government consider that they are under a very great deal of obligation to those gentlemen who had from time to time for many years past assisted in controlling and shaping the educational affairs as members of the Board of Education. Their labours, thus willingly given, had resulted in great good. The Government's action had not been determined because they were dissatisfied with the manner in which the affairs of the department are conducted under this system, but because they are dissatisfied with the system itself.

What did the hon. gentleman mean by that? It means, Sir, that the hon. gentleman is opposed to separate schools, that he is the determined opponent of the separate schools system. What he wants is a public school system, where there would be no religious teaching whatever. I think they call such schools neutral schools. That, Sir, is the statement made by the hon. gentleman. It is for this reason, and because the hon. member for Winnipeg wants nothing short of neutral schools, that is to say, schools without any religious teaching whatever, schools where no notion of God, no notion of the Christian doctrine, would be imparted to the pupils, I say the hon. member for Winnipeg has committed, through this law, the greatest possible outrage, by seeking, through such a legislation, to establish neutral schools, schools adverse to the Catholic faith. It is for the same reason that the Manitoba Catholics, as well as those of the province of Quebec, and of every other province in the Dominion, wish to protect the consciences of their children by rejecting such schools as those from which God is banished. We are opposed to neutral schools because we contend that it is not possible to have efficient schools for the education of childhood by adopting this system of so-called neutral teaching. Such a teaching could only produce, in our opinion, ill-balanced minds. And then, are they quite sure that they could establish a thoroughly neutral teaching? How is teaching imparted, Mr. Speaker? It is imparted by gestures, by signs, by the expression of the face, by reading, by writing, by copying models. This is how teaching is performed. Now, with teaching thus understood, is it possible to believe that the teacher, the preceptor, the schoolmaster could always teach without expressing an opinion? Would he be able to give lessons without having recourse to talking with his pupils during the class? And then, there would be circum-preceptor, for the schoolmaster to abstain from having an opinion. Such is our contention. We contend it is impossible for the preceptor, for the schoolmaster to abstain from giving his opinion, from making his own appreciations. Now, Sir, the appreciations of the schoolmaster are always in harmony with his personal education, closely connected with his own religious convictions, with his own ideas in matters of religion and morals. And, Sir, after thus asserting the impossibility of having an education such as they choose to call neutral, the impossibility of having such a neutral teaching, I say this system of so-called neutral schools is impossible in principle. But, Sir, I go still further and I say that, even supposing it possible, we should surely draw this conclusion, that such a teaching could not give fair results and could not be accepted. It is for this reason, Sir, that we strongly protest against such a kind of teaching, deprived of Christian notions. We cannot be of the same opinion as those who want to coerce us into committing the care of our children to the charge of teachers who have no religious opinion. Such a course, Sir, would be simply infamous.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) They have legislated God away.

Mr. LACHAPPELLE. (Translation.) There is nothing extraordinary in the fact that we hold such pronounced views as to educational matters, and that we come out so strongly against the iniquitous legislation which has been imposed upon the Catholic minority in Manitoba. That is also the reason why we insist upon that minority being restored the rights and status they enjoyed previous to 1890. The Catholic minority are entitled, under the educational sections of the constitution, to separate schools where the children of that minority may receive a sound religious education. We insist upon restoring to that minority their schools in which religious instruction will be imparted to their children, under the state of things which obtained in the province from time immemorial. I find in the third volume of the history of the North-west, written by Alexander Begg, a chapter about the Catholic schools in Manitoba, in which the school question is summarized. There is in that chapter a passage which shows that there had been in existence for a long time, schools established by the missionaries, and in which children were taught in accordance with the religious tenets of the parents. That passage contains the instructions given by Bishop Plessis in 1818 to the Rev. M. Provencher and Dumoulin, missionaries:—

Missionaries will take a particular care of Christian education among children, and for this they will establish schools and catechisms in all the localities they may have occasion to visit.

In 1818, Messrs. Provencher and Dumoulin were sent to the North-west, and in obedience to the instructions issued to them, established the first school at St. Boniface. These missionaries not only had the countenance and support of the Governor General of Canada in their work, but also the confidence and aid of the Hudson's Bay Company. That they were worthy of the trust reposed in them by the representative of His Majesty the King of Great Britain may be judged by another quotation from the instructions issued to them by Bishop Plessis, as follows:—

"The missionaries will make known to the people the advantage they enjoy in remaining under the government of His Majesty; will teach them by word and example the respect and fidelity they should have for the Sovereign; will accustom them to offer to God fervent prayers for the prosperity of His Most Gracious Majesty, of his august family, and his empire."

As early as 1816, Lord Selkirk urged the Catholic church to send missionaries to Red River for the double purpose of teaching the Gospel to the people and establishing schools for the young. In 1817, His Lordship visited the settlement, and on that occasion set apart one block of land for a Catholic, and another for a Protestant school; thus countenancing and assisting denominational instruction. Indeed, Lord Selkirk, in 1817, endorsed a petition to the Bishop of Quebec for a Catholic school at Red River, and it was in answer to it that Messrs. Provencher and Dumoulin were sent in 1818. In 1820, Rev. Mr. West arrived in the country, and began the work of establishing Protestant schools, and thus the separate school system was established.

Further on, I find the following resolution proposed by Sir George Simpson :

Great benefit being experienced from the benevolent and indefatigable exertions of the Catholic mission at Red River, in the welfare, and the moral and religious instruction of its numerous followers, and it being observed with much satisfaction that the influence of the mission under the direction of the Right Reverend Bishop of Juliopolis has been uniformly directed to the best interests of the settlement, and of the country at large, it is

Resolved,—That in order to mark our approbation of such laudable and disinterested conduct on the part of said missionaries, it be recommended to the Honourable Committee that a sum of £50 per annum be given towards its support.

Following in the footsteps of the Hudson's Bay Company, the Council of Assiniboia, on the 1st May, 1851, passed the following resolution :—

That £100 be granted from the public funds to be divided equally between the Bishop of Rupert's Land and the Bishop of the North-west (St. Boniface), to be applied by them at their discretion for the purpose of education.

By these and other acts, it is clear that the Earl of Selkirk, the Hudson Bay Company, and the Council of Assiniboia, each in succession, recognized the separate school system, and immediately preceding the transfer of the country, the latter was the acknowledged government in the Red River Settlement.

Thus, separate schools existed by custom, and it is a matter of regret that facts of such importance were not brought out when the case was carried in appeal and argued for the first time before the Privy Council of England. Their lordships were ignorant of that practice, when they rendered their first decision which was considered by many people as erroneous, and which gave rise to the second appeal, by which the rights of the minority were restored. The law of 1890, therefore, was unjust, and infringed the right of the minority to their separate schools. That is the reason why the case was taken to the Privy Council, by whose decision the rights of the minority have been re-established. That question was made to run the gauntlet of the judicial tribunals for five years, apparently to the utter dissatisfaction of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but in following that course, the Government only fulfilled their duty.

Several hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LACHAPELLE. (Translation.) The hon. gentlemen always say : no, no ; they are bound to die impenitent. I say that the Government have pursued the right and proper course, in having determined by the tribunals the rights of the minority.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) That is our bulwark to-day.

Mr. LACHAPELLE. (Translation.) When the hon. member for L'Islet appealed to our faith and to our patriotism—

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) You have none.

Mr. LACHAPELLE. (Translation.) If we had listened to those appeals, what would have happened, had the question been introduced in Parliament, previous to its being determined by the judicial tribunals ? I am safe, I think, in stating that the hon. gentlemen opposite would have raised the same objections as now. I could easily understand such objections coming from hon. members in this House who have religious opinions and ideas in educational matters, different from ours. Had we appealed to the House, previous to having the question settled by the tribunals, the hon. gentlemen might have said : Let us first have the question determined by the tribunals, and should the issue prove favourable to our cause, we shall make a strong appeal to the majority in this House. Well, Sir, the question is set at rest, and we are now appealing to the majority in this House, and I am satisfied that—although the majority of the hon. members have different opinions from ours in educational matters—they will not hesitate, in accordance with the judgment of the Privy Council, to co-operate with us in having the constitution respected and obeyed in the far-away North-west, as in the province of Quebec. It is a matter of regret, Sir, that we should be unable to agree upon such an important issue. We had long cherished the hope that all the hon. gentlemen, irrespective of political affiliations, would sink party differences, and would, in a friendly spirit, unite in settling once for all this vexed question. I cannot help recalling to mind a period of our history similar to the present one. It was away back in 1863, under the administration of Sandfield Macdonald, at a time when the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Scott), now leader of the Opposition in the Senate, rose in the House to introduce the Separate School Bill. Now, Sir, when the hon. gentleman introduced his Bill, the Hon. John A. Macdonald, the then leader of the Opposition, did not hesitate to cross the floor of the House and to extend his co-operation to the Government whom he opposed, but with whom he thought fit to make an alliance, because, in his opinion, he held it necessary, in the interest of Canada, that both political parties should co-operate together in order to set at rest a question fraught with danger, and a fruitful source of sectarian agitation. That question, however, did not intrude itself upon the attention of the House, under the same circumstances as we now witness. When it first came up before the House, it was not backed up by a judgment which made it imperative upon the Government to follow the course they had agreed upon.

But the then leader of the Opposition, the very statesman who was to play later on such a grand role, at the head of the Conservative party, had the manliness to relegate into the background his hostility to the administration of Sandfield Macdonald, in order to set at rest a question fraught with such danger to the interests of Canada. Now, Sir, I cannot refrain from saying that we had long cherished the hope that the present leader of the Opposition would follow the noble course pursued in 1863 by Sir John A. Macdonald. We had fancied that he would accede to the invitation extended to him by the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and lend his generous and active concurrence to the Government, in order to set at rest once for all that vexed question which has proved such a fruitful source of racial and religious differences. The hon. leader of the Opposition did not deem it fit to accede to the tacit wishes of a large number of his colleagues. I am not here to judge his conduct in the matter, but time will tell whether the extraordinary attitude which he has taken will prove beneficial, both from the standpoint of the party of which he is the leader and from that of the general interests of the country, interests which all the hon. members, irrespective of party affiliations, have so much at heart to secure and to promote.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, if there be a subject which has been discussed to the very limit of human patience it is truly this everlasting question of the Manitoba separate schools. How many speeches have been made about it, both in the arena of Parliament and at public meetings. How many pages cast by the press to the wind of publicity? It has been said of the learned Origen that to read the works of him alone, one would require more than the ordinary life of man. To read everything that has been said and written on what we have agreed to call the school question, two Methuselahs juxtaposed—according to the original expression of a writer—would not suffice. Therefore, I have no idea of inflicting on you the detailed story of the varying phases which have marked this question any more than I have of giving you an estimate of each of them. I take my stand at once on the domain of the actual and at the very outset I think it is my duty, here and now, to warmly congratulate the Government for its noble determination to render justice to those to whom justice is due. For nearly six years, the Manitoba minority have kept their eyes fixed on Ottawa in the expectation of a remedy promised for those evils from which that minority suffer in regard to the education of their children. And although at times the firmament was covered with clouds, never has the star of hope disappeared from sight, the sweet radiance of which, with genial light, has always illuminated the heart of those who waited. That heart to-day beats more steadily because it sees that the night of oppression is fading away and the dawn of deliverance appears, because the people have confidence that the hour has struck when truth and justice will shine in the sunlight, the hour when the constitution and the holiest of causes shall triumph. And not only the Catholics of the Red River, but the Catholics all over the length and breadth of Canada, and not only all the Catholics of Canada, but all upright men, all those who are not blinded by party spirit or by fanaticism, who believe that the constitution is not a worthless parchment, but who, on the contrary, believe that it provides for the equal protection of all races and all creeds, all those I say, wait impatiently for the result of the deliberations of the national council. The Government have understood that with appeals to tolerance and to loyalty, they could not unravel the school question—a veritable Gordian-knot—and after the fashion of Alexander, they have taken the resolution to cut it with the legislative sword. Thanks then to each and every one of the hon. Ministers who preside over the destinies of the country. I applaud with pleasure the courageous act of the Ministry, who, by their Remedial Bill, constitute themselves the champions of justice, of right, and of the constitution. Yes, I am proud and happy that the Conservative party, under whose banner I have walked since I have attained the age of manhood, responds to my hopes and shows itself worthy of the great role and of the noble mission which have devolved upon it. And I have so much the more right to rejoice in the realization of my wishes inasmuch as I have not hesitated to speak my thought boldly, and even to give a hostile vote every time that the circumstances of the contest called for a protest. But I wish to pay an altogether special tribute of eulogy to the venerable old man, who with so firm a hand guides the Ministerial bark. Impartial history will record that he has had the noble courage of sinking his own preferences and his personal antipathies in order to remain faithful to his duty as guardian of the constitution, because his enlightened intelligence and his generous heart have seen what justice is and wish to do it. There are people who have a singular faculty of recognizing the merit of a man and of working to appease the discords which divide our population. Instead of the tactics of conciliation so as to bring out whatever is good in the life and actions of a man, they look for some fistfuls of mud to cast in his face. Instead of respecting the religious convictions of men, they make of them a heinous crime and so foment dissensions the gravest and most dangerous. For my part, I cannot approve of Sir Mackenzie Bowell's belonging to the Orange order. But his membership in that association which, to be perfectly candid, has too often shown a blind and reckless zeal, only increases the admiration engendered in me by his manly conduct and by that energy which does not quail before the excitements of intolerance and of fanaticism. I do not forget that in 1863 the hon. Prime Minister who now is, canvassed, for the first time, the votes of the electors of the county of Hastings. They required from him a pledge to vote against the incorporation of religious societies and to vote for the abrogation of the laws establishing separate schools in Ontario. "This country," replied Mr. Bowell "cannot be governed according to our principles; and if I am elected in such a county as this, it will not be by taking such engagements as you demand from me." And he was defeated. He was defeated for having proclaimed the principle of liberty and of equal rights for all races and for all creeds. Ever since Sir Mackenzie Bowell has not departed from that way. He has, on the contrary, emphasized his frank and resolute attitude. Therefore it is that all Catholics and all good citizens mindful of the rights of others have noted with pleasure the declaration made by him in the Senate on the 22nd April, 1895:

I hope sincerely with the mover and seconder of the Address that the people of Manitoba may see their way clear to settle this question among themselves, and to relieve the Parliament of Canada from the serious obligation which will devolve upon them otherwise. It is a very serious matter for the Government of the Dominion to undertake to deal with a question which affects solely any one section of the country. If the people of Manitoba are patriots they will keep this question out of the arena of Dominion politics, but if they desire to continue flinging fire-brands among the electorate of this country (who I am sure are desirous of living in peace and harmony), if they reject all overtures and act upon the suggestions of those who are leading the Opposition throughout the country, I can only say that when the time comes, if it should come, for action by this Government, the people of Canada will find that the present Administration are quite prepared to assume the responsibility which may fall upon them, no matter what the results may be.

To-day the Government of which he of whom I have just spoken is the leader undertake to worthily crown the work which despite appearances of doubt and passing hesitation they have steadily pursued. I must thank and congratulate the Government. In everything that concerns the Remedial Bill, they may rely on the loyal support of all men of order, friends of true liberty, of the equality of all before the constitution, of conciliation, and of peace. The congratulations and the thanks which I have just addressed to the Government and to their respected heads, I would I could extend them also to all the hon. members of this House. I regret to state, Mr. Speaker, that there are here men who have done all in their power to hinder and delay the definite settlement of the Manitoba separate school question. Among these men some are opposed to all intervention of the central power, others effect, it is true, to lean to a contrary teaching, but they strive to attain the same result, by suggesting means which constitute a veritable lure, an open mockery. They first proclaim themselves defenders of the provincial autonomy which they allege is attacked by the federal authority. In the name of provincial rights, they adjure the Government to halt and not to lay their hands upon I know not what ark of the covenant. Certainly provincial autonomy and provincial rights should be respected, but the very constitution which the provinces have accepted and under which we are all living should not be trailed and trampled on. Therefore, the interference of the federal power in educational matters, the protection due by them to provincial minorities, all that is provided for, settled, regulated, by our Constitutional Charter, and far from being a culpable encroachment, this interference exercised within the limits of the law is nothing but the fulfilment of an imperative duty. Moreover, these provincial rights of which we hear so much are not the exclusive property of the majority; they belong also and by the selfsame title to the minority. If, then, a majority impelled whether by fanaticism, by hatred, or by any other motive take upon themselves by force of numbers to crush a minority whose rights are guaranteed by the constitution, surely it is this majority who attack provincial rights. And if the central authority interferences to protect a minority attacked in their provincial rights, all they do is to maintain the latter in their integrity and not to wound them. Behold, Mr. Speaker, what logic and common sense force us to admit. Ah! if less formal declarations left us no doubt of the real dispositions of our adversaries we would easily have the better of them in argument. But what animates their acts is not the love of national institutions, the desire of safe-guarding the principles of the constitution which governs us, no, it is hatred of everything that is Catholic and French Canadian. The hon. member for North Simcoe acting as counsel for the Government of Manitoba before the Council of Federal Ministers acknowledged that the Catholic minority of Manitoba had grievances; but he is vehemently opposed to every measure which can give them redress. The hon. gentleman went much farther and while he was in a vein of freedom, he unveiled the goal which they wished to attain by means of the school law of 1890. He established, by statistics, that the Catholic population of Manitoba, is but a feeble fraction of the total population. The hon. Mr. Ouimet replied to him:

Hon. Mr. OUIMET. The legislation would not concern the majority in any way?

Mr. McCARTHY. That depends upon what you call concerning them. If the majority are concerned in having the Catholics identified with themselves, if they are concerned in having these Catholics cease to be French and English.

Hon. Mr. OUMET. Would that be the object?

Mr. McCARTHY. Undoubtedly, I think that would be a great object, and I think the object.

Hon. Mr. OUMET. That they may cease to remain French and Catholic?

Mr. McCARTHY. Let them remain Catholic, but not French.

All that is very clear, is it not? Nevertheless, the hon. member did not push his frankness to the very end, and very vainly he concealed his real thought behind a big falsehood, by pretending that the aim of the school law was not to Protestantize Catholics. If, in reality, it were sought mere to anglicize Canadians of the French race they would have been contented with the law abolishing the teaching of the French language in the schools and its official use in the Government. By abolishing the Catholic schools they simply wished to make a Protestant proselytizing. If the hon. member for North Simcoe had dared to tell the whole truth, he would have repeated what so many of the ultra-Protestant organs have long since declared: "We wish Canada to be a British and Protestant country." We know all that. That is not precisely a new thing. That is the system of politics inaugurated by the conquerors the morning after the cession of Canada, although the French Canadians were then only six thousand and although they had then but a single bishop whom the British government refused to recognize. This style of politics has not been always affirmed brutally as it was under the Military government, but it has never varied. All of which, however, has not hindered the French race and Catholicity from growing and propagating. Despite the emigration of our people to the United States, the French Canadians, whom they are so anxious to make real English people of, are to-day nearly two millions in Canada, all as French as on the first day of the English domination, and the Catholics have thirty-one dioceses or apostolic prefectures. Such is the result of persecution whether open or concealed. If our enemies imagine that they can at last accomplish what so many others before them have failed in, they are very naive. Let them well understand, Mr. Speaker, that the French Canadians will remain as they are. The fusion of races in this country is a chimerical dream: there is not a sensible man who can reasonably entertain the idea of it. This is what Sir George Etienne Cartier thought of the matter:

The fusion of the races into a single one is a utopia; it is an impossibility. Distinctions of this kind will always exist; diversity seems to be a trait of the physical, moral and religious order.

Mr. JEANNOTTE.

There is only one means of making peace reign between the races, and that is to leave upon the beautiful soil of our Dominion the two races to develop and grow side by side in full liberty guaranteed by the laws which do not prevent any person from exercising his rights and the duty of well-doing. It is not indispensable to speak only English and to be Protestant in order to be a loyal subject of Her Britannic Majesty, and to be a good citizen. We are British subjects by cession and not by conquest, and for that reason we have a right to the civil and religious liberty promised to us by treaty. French Canadians ask in this country the place which is their due, no more; and when they insist on the maintenance of Catholic schools in Manitoba, it is not a favour which they are soliciting but a right which they demand for their brethren. All that they desire for themselves and for those yonder is the liberty of clearing the soil watered by the sweat and by the blood of their ancestors, to speak the beautiful French language, to practice the consoling and divine Catholic religion, and to live peaceably and honestly in the midst of their fellow-citizens of foreign origin. Certainly nobody will deny that the Catholics of Manitoba have the incontestable right of being treated by the Protestants in the same manner as these last are treated in the Catholic province of Québec. What, then, have the French Canadians done, Mr. Speaker, to be the object of the concentrated rage of a certain number of their English and Protestant fellow-citizens? Of what black treasons, of what execrable crimes, have they rendered themselves guilty, to be treated in confederation as if they were scabby sheep? Have they ever failed in loyalty towards the institutions granted to them? Listen to the testimony of a man whose name still loudly resounds in this country. Speaking at the banquet given in Ottawa in honour of the delegates from England and from the different colonies, at the time of the Intercolonial Conference, Sir John Thomppson exclaimed:

I would fail in my duty were I to let this occasion pass by without publicly rendering homage to the loyalty of French Canadians. Had it not been for the devotedness, the heroism, the loyalty of the French race in this country, there would be no Canada to-day. True to their faith, faithful and loyal to their princes, they laid the foundation of civilization in all the different parts of America. From the shores of the Atlantic to those of the Pacific, their footprints are marked by heroic and genial works, and there is no race in the world can boast of a nobler and more glorious past. The finest pages of our history are those which relate the patriotism and the loyalty of French Canadians.

And I will add with a celebrated orator of my own race:

We have neither numbers nor strength, nor influence, nor riches; nor as a French nationality the province of Quebec is still but a little child.

But if they wish to tear from him the treaties which protect us, if they wish to throw to the winds of heaven the constitution that defines our rights, if, in fine, they are going to submit to a decisive test our faith, our patriotism, and our national aspirations, they will see this little child take on the proportions of a giant. * * *

"The guard is dead and does not surrender," said a brave commander on a celebrated field of battle, but our cry will be more potent, for we shall say, "The French Canadian does not surrender, and he is not dead." Never shall this be read upon a tomb-stone: "Here lies the last French-Canadian!"

Mr. Speaker, I signalized at the commencement of my speech, the presence in this House, of men who, to settle the thorny school question have only the expedients of mountebanks and a policy of deceit. I wish to speak of the famous project of investigation of the hon. leader of the Opposition and his followers. The plank of salvation of the Manitoba minority would be, according to them, an investigation. But why this investigation? Is it to establish that the actual schools of Manitoba are Protestant? The proof of that has been made on many occasions, and the hon. member for Winnipeg, author of the school law, has admitted that they are. Let us suppose, however, that such a proof has never been made. For what good purpose try to make it? That is not the question at all. The question—the sole question—of facts prior to an investigation of the right of the Manitoba minority—is to know if before 1890, that minority had Catholic schools, and if since, on account of the new laws, that minority has lost them. Well, if the hon. leader of the Opposition, an advocate; if the hon. leader of the Opposition, a public man of thirty years experience; if the hon. leader of the Opposition directing a great party, has not been able for six years, taking the two laws, that of 1890 and that which preceded it, to discover on comparison of them, that the Catholics of Manitoba have been despoiled of schools which they enjoyed and which they had controlled for twenty years, then he is not worthy of the high position that he holds in Canadian politics. Well, then, let the hon. gentleman in all good faith take the last judgment of the Privy Council and he will find decided in it not only this question of fact, but also the question of right. And although that judgment does not go so far as to indicate to the Federal Government how it ought to proceed—a very useless thing indeed, since the constitution declares it in plain letters—it nevertheless separately mentions a minimum of grievances calling for remedial legislation. The question of fact and the question of right are established by that judgment; what need of more? Must we recommence a season of disputing which has been only too prolonged already? Must the Catholics of the west suffer still troubles and sacrifices which have marked the past five years? Justice and imprescriptible rights demand a more prompt solution. And let us suppose the investigation were made, would we be any nearer a solution? To be convinced of the contrary, it is only necessary to reflect that Mr. Greenway himself demands an investigation. And he demands it not with a view of inquiry into the grievances of the minority but to withdraw himself from such an inquiry; not with the thought of doing justice later on—he forbears carefully from saying that—but to put the Catholics on the bench of defendants; not with the view of bringing about an equitable settlement, but to render permanent the order of things now established; not to repair but to consummate injustice; not to mark his respect for the constitution, but to justify his violation of it; not to obey the judgment of the Privy Council and the mandate of Her Majesty, but to quibble about one and the other and to frustrate both. Such are the intentions so often manifested, and he says as much formally, notably in his reply to the Orders in Council of March, 1895, and December of the same year, as well as in the Speech from the Throne which he has just put into the mouth of the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba at the opening of the session of the provincial legislature. This is the manoeuvre of a guilty fellow who seeks to escape from trouble by back doors without offering to his victims any satisfaction other than splashes. Do we see gleaming anywhere in the distance at the close of such an investigation, a ray of justice for the Catholic minority in Manitoba, should the result of such investigation be favourable to them? There is not even a hint of a promise nor the least indication to that effect. Those who are unwilling to bow to the final judgment of the Privy Council, would submit still less to a simple commission. If such a report was favourable to them, they would post it everywhere in big letters. But if it were the contrary, they would tear it to pieces, or they would tell it to go to the devil, in default of other jurisdiction. Every kind of after-thought flutters around this proposal. It is a subterfuge, a piece of party tactics, a means of putting off the solution of the school question until the Greek Kalends, and, consequently, it is out of the question. That the hon. leader of the Opposition should make himself an accomplice of Greenway and Sifton, is a complaisance which, to say the least, lowers him in the eyes of his contemporaries, and which in history will cast a thick shadow over his reputation. Now it may be asked of me how it happens that the hon. leader of the Opposition, a French Canadian, a Catholic, refuses to aid the Government in the efforts which it is making to do justice to the Catholic minority of Manitoba. The answer seems to me easy enough. It is because the abolition of the Catholic schools and the beautiful French language is the work of his political friends and receives the general approval of the Liberals; it is because the Liberals have not changed their programme. Such as they were in 1855, in 1863, when they voted for the abolition of Catholic schools and the establishment of godless schools, such they are still to-day. The Liberal party having no principles, and consequently, no settled, well-defined, policy, sees no other way to climb into power but by stirring up questions of race and religion. Wretched politics this which consists in sowing the wind in the hope that the whirlwind will bear them into power! Ah! well, Mr. Speaker, have we not just assisted at a very sad spectacle which should suffice to convince us that the proposal of the leader of the Opposition is not only a huge mockery, but that it is also an act of cowardice? In effect, we have just seen persons who reciprocally detest one another, our most implacable enemies, hugging each other before a public meeting held recently in Toronto, and denouncing, with fanatical hatred, the Remedial Bill re-establishing separate schools. And what is still more painful is that among the orators of this assembly there were some who said that they were authorized to speak with the consent of the leader of the Opposition. Let me here open a parenthesis: The ground of this assembly should represent a very original tableau in which different colours mixed and formed a curious blending. The ex-Controller of Customs represented the bright yellow orange; the member for North Simcoe the light yellow, mixed with blue and pale red; the member for Winnipeg, scarlet; the member for North York, the fixed yellow red; the member for East Durham, the dull orange blue; the member for East York, the "dyed-in-the-wool" yellow blue. With such men as these whom I have just mentioned and their compeers, who declare themselves in favour of an investigation, have we not reason to say with the poet, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes?" I fear fanatics even when they speak of equal justice for Catholics in the near future. I can only regret the obstinate blindness of the hon. leader of the Opposition, who thinks himself, doubtless, in good company with such members to seize the reins of power. The concert of these men may rejoice Liberals without alarming Conservatives. History repeats itself, that is all. For ever since political parties existed here it has always been the same thing. Those Conservatives who are unwilling to respect either law, or constitution, or treaties, or the word of honour, and who trample upon these great principles of the natural law, "live honestly, render to every man his own, and do unto others as you would wish others to do unto you." All such, I say, are not in their place in the great Conservative party. And so they go out of it, one after another, to enter the ranks of the Liberals, where they are always sure of a welcome, and where they find themselves perfectly at home. This it is which explains the tender harmony existing between the member for L'Islet, the member for North Simcoe, the ex-Controller of Customs, the member for Winnipeg, and the member for Quebec East. Their rallying cry is always the same: "No separate schools"; the same cry which they uttered when they abolished separate schools in the provinces of New Brunswick, of Nova Scotia, and of Prince Edward Island. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to note the inconsistency of the member for North Simcoe, and of some others of the "noble thirteen" who are still in this House. I mean to speak of the Jesuits' Estates question. The legislature of Quebec had just made a tardy restitution; it was well within the limits of its jurisdiction, it had done wrong to no person, and the parties directly interested had accepted the settlement which was offered to them in discharge of their just and legitimate claims. Who could have believed that men who wished to be taken seriously when they speak of the autonomy of the provinces, as did the hon. member for North Simcoe and his friends, would have been able in this case to blame the Federal Government for not having intervened to disallow this Act based upon justice, equity, honour, and the natural law, "render to every man his own." And to-day, when there is question of a law contrary to equity, to justice, and in direct violation of the constitution, and in contempt of treaties, and of solemn covenants, we see these same members, supported by the hon. leader of the Opposition, by the member for L'Islet and their friends, rising and protesting against the just act of the central power, tending to the redress of the evils and of the general unrest caused by the conduct of the Liberal legislature of the province of Manitoba, conduct at once unworthy and ultra vires. It is enough to mention the fact to be satisfied as to the motives animating the conduct of these gentlemen. The hon. leader of the Opposition commenced his speech on the project of the Remedial Bill by pretending that the Act was not mandatory enough: that the Greenway Liberal government would never be willing to submit to it, and that thus it would be useless; that coercive law never did any good. Probably he was alluding to the school law of 1890. For I know of nothing more coercive than the laws which abolished Catholic schools in Manitoba; which stole Catholic school-houses and Catholic money, and forced Catholics themselves to pay taxes for the maintenance of Protestant schools which they cannot frequent without violating their consciences. Surely, if that is not the most pronounced coercion, we must change the meaning of the words. The hon. leader of the Opposition has also repeated what he has been saying for more than five years; he has, I repeat, reproached the Government with not having made an inquiry into the causes which have brought about the abolition of separate schools in Manitoba, then to the general surprise of this House and of the country, he finishes by proposing the six months' hoist of the Remedial Bill without giving any reason whatever, valid, serious, and worthy of the leader of a party. He proposes neither more nor less than that the school question should receive the honours of a first-class funeral. What then has become of the fine promises and the public engagements of the leader of the Opposition and of his followers? If the law, in the opinion of the member for Quebec East, is insufficient to do justice to the minority oppressed by the Liberals of Manitoba, the friends of the Liberals of this House, there is only one thing to be done and that is to propose amendments or another law according to his own views and not to run away by a hidden door. One of the reasons given by the hon. leader of the Opposition for opposing the Remedial Bill, is that the Parliament of Manitoba had not been made a party to the inquiry before the committee of the Federal Privy Council. The hon. gentleman who is a lawyer, cannot be taken seriously. This objection is too silly to be invoked in a cause based ever so little on common sense. For those who are lawyers it is a fact known and undeniable that the plaintiff, as the petitioner, must rest his plea either upon right, or upon the common law, or upon facts. On whom does the burden of proof lie? On the plaintiff or petitioner, that is an elementary fact, and the defendant has nothing to do but to say: prove your case. If the plaintiff does not prove the facts alleged in his plea, it is dismissed without the defendant's having produced a single witness, for there is no proof to disprove. If on the contrary the plea is based only on right, on law, no proof is necessary, because then it is a question of knowing if the plaintiff or the defendant has transgressed the law or has well or ill-construed the law which should govern their case. When the plaintiff refuses to make an inquiry, it is because his plea on its very face, in his opinion, bears a proof prima facie of the solid foundation of his claims. Then it is a very great advantage for the opposite party since it has only to say: you have proven nothing. This is exactly what happened in the case with which we are dealing. Mr. Ewart, the advocate of the Manitoba minority, not having wished to enter into a proof, having the confidence which every honest man naturally has that the victory cannot be doubtful, when he defends a person persecuted and tyrannized over in violation of all law and of all justice. There at last we know the great secret which the hon. leader of the Opposition has been hawking about for over five years in all parts of the country and which should, as if by the stroke of a fairy's wand, re-establish Catholics in the enjoyment of their legitimate and sacred rights. The secret is very simple, and certainly did not deserve to be kept so long under a bushel. Here it is: it is to abandon the Catholic minority to its wretched lot and to leave it alone to the mercy of a hostile majority which has no other end in view than to render its life impossible. If this great secret had been disclosed before the elections in Verchères, Montreal Centre, Jacques Cartier, and Charlevoix, the result would have been quite different. The success of the Liberals was due only to the colossal fraud perpetrated by them. In every one of these elections the Liberal speakers and candidates asseverated with so much persistence that the Conservatives would never bring down the Remedial Bill, because the Prime Minister was an Orangeman, but that the Liberals having at their head a French Canadian Catholic, that the Liberals alone were capable of settling and would settle the school question in such a manner as to render justice full and complete to the Catholics of Manitoba. These things have been said and repeated so many times and with the aplomb which the Liberals alone know how to put in them that the electors ended by believing them. Before going further, I desire to speak of a very delicate subject which I would have preferred to pass over in silence, but since the hon. leader of the Opposition has wished, without any sufficient cause, to complain of a letter which a venerated and a venerable member of the clergy had privately written to him, I believe it my duty to give my opinion. The letter in question was written to a friend by a friend, exposing to him his views if a Remedial Bill were submitted to the House, expressing the desire of seeing him support it, and showing him the danger to which he would be exposed in combatting this law. It was one friend who was warning another, and we know that a man warned is worth two. Far from finding cause of complaint in the conduct of this good missionary, I see in it only a friendly service; it is a disinterested fellow countryman who sees the danger and who wishes to forewarn his friend of it, and the member for Quebec East has no reason to exclaim about threats and undue influence. Therefore, I regret infinitely the inconsiderate, unseasonable, and hysterical attacks of a certain section of the press against that which we have been accustomed to love, to pay court to, to respect, and to venerate. Who can forget the eminent services rendered by the Catholic clergy, which no other person would have been able to render to our fellow-countrymen when they were abandoned by those who had been accustomed to direct them, to conduct them? Who hindered Canadians from accepting the alluring offers of the Americans if it be not the clergy by causing the French Canadians to learn the short catechism? It is thence that they drew these grand principles, the putting of which in practice suffices to render nations happy: "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself for the love of God." "Thou shalt live honestly, thou shalt pardon the offences which have been committed against thee, and thou shalt return good for evil." It is with these great principles which are learned in our schools that the Catholic clergy brought French Canadians to remain faithful to England, to not take vengeance on the English who so unjustly and so brutally maltreated them, and to be faithful and loyal subjects of the British Crown. I do not hesitate to say that if the ex-Controller of Customs and some of his friends had learned the short catechism, they would find themselves the better of it, as well as would those who are obliged to meet them in the transactions of life. It is only corrupt or ill-formed hearts that are without gratitude. Mr. Speaker, the priest's mission is grand, noble, and divine: it can be summed up as follows:—To remove men from sin, to cause them to practice the good, to lead virtuous lives, and to conduct them to heaven. For us Catholics who have the advantage of knowing the immense amount of good which our clergy do daily and the signal services which they render in all the situations of life, one would need to be an ingrate or a very evilly disposed person to belittle those whom we should hold in the highest esteem. Moreover, no person will dare to maintain that the priest who is an educated Canadian, intelligent and disinterested, so far as political parties are concerned, has not as much patriotism, as much knowledge of the true interests and of the affairs of the country as the first individual who hardly knows how to read and who, nevertheless, has the right to talk politics, to vote, to be elected, and to come to this House to make laws for the good conduct of the electors, the well-being of the country. I protest energetically against these unjustifiable attacks, and I make it a glory and an honour to walk under the fatherly, friendly direction of the ecclesiastical authorities, certain as I am that they will teach me nothing but what is right, for our clergy well know their short catechism, which I recall to myself still with a very genuine satisfaction. Walking side by side with the hon. leader of the Opposition, and indeed hand in hand is to be found the hon. member for L'Islet, the valiant lieutenant. The conduct of this hon. gentleman is a real puzzle: "Close your eyes," say the "Canard," with humour, "take two turns to the right and two turns to the left, and you will have the right to a subscription to the "Canard," if you can tell what is the position of Mr. Tarte upon the school question." Having passionately preached the policy of disallowance and having incessantly reproached the Government for what he called its policy of delays, the hon. member for L'Islet has finally discovered that the Government was going too fast * * * * * no coercion, and disavowal. What is that, if not the most radical of coercions? No delays! and this commission of inquiry which, like his leader, the hon. member demands, is not this the open door to new delays and new procrastinations? Admire, Mr. Speaker, the suppleness of the hon. member's backbone, and with what astonishing ease he turns his breeches inside out! In 1892, when the cause of the Manitoba minority was lost in the first instance, before the Privy Council of England, and when the hon. member for Provencher, hardly believing in the possibility of succeeding in a new suit, proposed an investigation as the last means of saving the situation, the hon. member for L'Islet did not wish to hear mention made of this investigation. "To name a Committee of the House," he wrote in the "Cultivateur," "to inquire into the circumstances which accompanied the passing of the Manitoba Act," this is what the member for Provencher suggests. Who does not know these circumstances? Do not the official documents contain the history of them as clear as complete?

Instead of demanding justice, Mr. LaRivière does the business of the Ontario fanatics, by taking the means of burying the question.

The hon. member for L'Islet then traced the way to be followed:

The constitution is formal; it belongs to the Governor General in Council to take the initiative, to decide and to communicate his decision to the Manitoba Cabinet and to demand of it to do justice. If that Cabinet refuses, then, and then only, commences the right of interference and of action by the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, has not the Government followed this programme to the letter? But he, the hon. member, what is he doing to-day? He denounces the line of conduct of which but lately he demanded the adoption. If this was a subterfuge in 1892 to speak of an investigation when the tribunals had decided against the Manitoba minority, what must we think of the manœuvres of the hon. member enrolling himself now against Federal intervention and holding the same language which he condemned so energetically four years ago? If ever a like proposition had been put forward with the view of burying the question out of sight and doing the work of fanatics—according to the expression of the hon. gentleman—it is truly in the present instance. Not content with having deserted the cause of the Manitoba Catholics, his brethren by blood and by faith, the hon. member for L'Islet has publicly denounced the system of education of the province of Quebec and has seen fit to cast discredit upon the Canadian hierarchy and clergy. Nevertheless, this is the same gentleman who wrote in "Le Canadien," under date of the 28th of June, 1871:

Let us rally around our clergy and let us fight as men of faith know how to fight. It is at such a cost only that we shall save our society.

And again :

The day when the sympathies and the approval of the clergy shall be withdrawn from us will be that of our retreat from public life. If it is ever found that we are incapable of worthily defending the church we shall pass on to others the so weighty burden that circumstances have imposed on us.

Mr. Speaker, parliamentary language has no expressions strong enough to justly qualify the attitude of the hon. member for L'Islet. I can do no better than to here let one of the principal journals of my province speak for me :

Behold the odious role which Mr. Tarte is playing in Parliament. Not content with betraying a sacred cause, that of the Catholics of Manitoba, he takes a place in the ranks of radicals and joins his voice to that of the rouge newspapers to proclaim what he calls the rights of "free citizens" in matters of religion. These are the doctrines which Voltaire and his disciples preached. Continue, Mr. Tarte; your name will go down to posterity graven in letters of gold in the aurore.

But this is enough to show the inanity or rather the iniquity of the opposition to the remedial measure which has been submitted for the approval of the representatives of the people. I do not doubt that it will be adopted by this House by a large majority. I do not doubt that good sense and a spirit of justice will prevail in the councils of the nation, and that the Catholics of the west will obtain the legitimate power of having their separate schools. And to dissipate, if that be possible, all the prejudices which people may be able to have against the rights of my compatriots and co-religionists in Manitoba. I request, Mr. Speaker, that I may be allowed to read the very beautiful letter which the Rev. Robert Kerr, an Anglican clergyman at St. Catharines, Ont., addressed, under date of the 8th of March, 1895, to the "Mail and Empire," upon the school question. The Rev. Mr. Kerr among other things, says :

In order to state the question as clearly and as simply as possible, I may say that the Protestants in Manitoba have apparently come to the conclusion that the less religion is taught in the schools the better it is for them; and if it is better for them, it is necessarily so for everybody. It is evident that they wanted to force the minority to accept under the guise of religious teaching a kind of "olla-podrida." * * * They style that school folly a "national system," and the legislature passes coercive Acts in order to force everybody to accept that system. The minority contend that they have natural and constitutional rights which have been infringed by that godless legislation. They contend further that if Protestants are satisfied with this diminution which goes the length of destroying all religious teaching, such a course is not lawful for Catholics, who cannot in conscience divest themselves of the trust conferred on them by God as to the proper education of their children.

All the actual school difficulty, Mr. Speaker, comes from a false principle too universally diffused. Behold this false principle: the education of children is a political function, a business which belongs to the State, a thing which the Government should organize, direct, control. Against this false principle it is proper to apply the true doctrine which can be thus formulated: by the natural law, the education and the intellectual and moral training of the child belong exclusively to the parents, in the exercise of this natural law, which no human power can take from them, in the accomplishment of this duty from which no human power can dispense them. Catholic parents should be submissive to the high direction of the church, and non-Catholic parents should act according to the lights which they have received, but in either case the State cannot take the place of the parents in the work of education. The role of the State, in matters of education should be limited to the protection of the school, just as it protects the family itself, to help to facilitate the work of education and to repress the flagrant attacks against the natural law. This I do not fear to affirm, Mr. Speaker, is the true educational teaching. For Catholics it does not admit of doubt. And I am glad to find also a clear statement of this doctrine in the important journals of our separated brethren. The "Citizen," in the course of the month of August, 1895, has this to say on the subject :

It should not be lost sight of that the State, properly speaking, has no right to interfere with the control which parents have over the education of their children. * * * The privilege and the duty of educating children naturally belong to the parents. As a matter of fact, the strong Conservative opinion which impels men like Goldwin Smith to antagonize gratuitous popular instruction is that, while freeing the parents from the responsibility of educating their children, the State invades in an unwarrantable manner the domain of domestic authority.

What conclusion must be drawn from what precedes, Mr. Speaker? It is that we must leave the Catholic minority of Manitoba to educate their children as they understand that duty. But, it will be said, nothing hinders the existence of voluntary schools in Manitoba. Yes, something hinders it: it is the crying injustice of the law which taxes the minority for the maintenance of a system of schools which this minority cannot make use of without doing violence to its religious beliefs. When they have paid their quota for the maintenance of public schools, people have not always the means wished for to found and keep up voluntary schools. And even if these means were forthcoming, the people would be no less the victim of a grave injustice when it is forced to pay twice for the same service. It is then in all equity needful that liberty of education which no longer exists in Manitoba be re-established there. Such is the goal to which the project of law now before this House tends. No doubt this Bill is not perfect—that I know. Still, in order that it receive my sincere support, it is enough for me that it safeguards the great principle of separate schools, which, as I have just said, is the consecration of the natural rights of parents in the education and the intellectual and moral training of their children, to the exclusion of any human power, and that it is accepted by the parties whom it most especially affects. I have no doubt that the House will be disposed to amend the Bill and to do away with certain sections in it which are not to be commended. It is time for men of good-will to take their stand on the side of the Government, to silence party spirit, to show uprightness, and to do their duty. "Do what you should, let the consequences be what they may," says an old French adage. Let this fine maxim but animate the resolutions and the acts of hon. members of this House, and the people will reward them for it. The people love manly acts, firm attitudes and strong resolutions. It admires men of character, those who know how to rise above vulgar prejudices, to listen only to the great voice of patriotism. "Patriotism well understood," as Cartier has said, "is that which does not fight with a spirit of fanaticism, but which, while safeguarding what it loves, wishes also that the neighbour be no more molested than oneself." "Joined one to another as the branches of a great tree," will I cry in concluding, with one of the most celebrated French Canadian tribunes, "the different races who live in Canada should accept this being bound for the whole of their existence, which circumstances rather than their will have imposed on them; they ought to be nourished from the same sap, and our soil is rich enough to furnish them abundantly with it. And since the one is forced to renounce the hope of reigning upon the ruins of another, they ought always to unite in a sympathetic manner, with a noble and generous openness, and work in harmony to assure the destiny which Providence lays up for us. The general interest of Canada, which is our common country, ought to dominate the interests of caste; we should not forget, we, the inhabitants of this country, called to found a great nation, that if we are French, English, Scotch or Irish, we are also Canadians; and that this title can suffice for our pride as it ought to satisfy our legitimate ambition. We are descended from the strongest races of the world, and we are called, not to perpetuate on this continent antiquated hatreds, but to build up here a great nation, whose destinies are glorious, in the designs of Providence."

PRAYERS.

CANADIAN CATTLE IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the attention of the House to a matter that is of great importance to the North-west Territories and to Canada generally, and if necessary, to put myself in order, I will conclude with a motion. In to-day's "Citizen" there appears a despatch from Montreal, dated March 10th, which is as follows:—

A special cable to the "Star" says: Mr. J. G. Colmer, temporarily in charge of the Canadian High Commissioner's office here, with the approval of Dr. Montague, Canadian Minister of Agriculture, has submitted a strong despatch to the Colonial Office against the permanent exclusion of cattle proposed in the bill. On behalf of the Canadian Government, Messrs. Colmer and Montague will interview the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain on Thursday. The exclusion bill is delayed in the Commons, and it is suggested that the Canadian House of Commons pass a strong resolution against it. The Liberal Opposition in the Imperial Commons and that of the press increases on the ground that the step is an infraction of free trade principles.

This is a subject, Mr. Speaker, that has occupied the attention of the House time and again, and it is a subject that has occupied the serious and fruitful attention of the hon. baronet who now leads the House, when he occupied a high position in London. It seems to me, Sir, and it has struck other gentlemen interested in this question, that the suggestion contained in that telegram, and which appears to come from a Minister of the Crown, should be acted upon. If it were practicable, I should have put a motion on the paper to the following effect—which, of course, is not the motion with which I intend to conclude. But, if this motion should strike the House favourably, there can be no difficulty in having it passed in time to have due influence in London; or, if it should strike the Government favourably, then I will leave it in their hands. This is the motion that I suggest we ought to pass:

That, in the opinion of this House, the scheduling of Canadian cattle at the ports of Great Britain is a harsh proceeding, seeing that Canadian cattle, though free from pleuro-pneumonia, are thus not only shut out from Great Britain, but also from the countries which are alarmed by the action of the Imperial authorities; and is detrimental to Imperial interests. That the passing of an Act of Parliament looking to such exclusion of Canadian cattle as a permanent policy is to be deprecated on every ground of fairness and sound commercial principles, and is contrary to the large and varied interests of the colonies and the mother country, considered as an Imperial whole."

Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to dwell on the importance of doing all in our power, to, if possible, divert the Imperial Government from the course that it is now about to take. It was a very bad thing to have our cattle scheduled, but if an Act of the Imperial Parliament is to be passed, and it is to be made a permanent policy to exclude Canadian cattle, then it will be still more serious. I am, of course, in the hands of the House. If the House was willing to suspend the Standing Orders, instead of moving the adjournment of the House, I would move the motion I have read, and if the House is not prepared to do that, then I will leave the matter in the hands of the Government. I conclude, Sir, with moving the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) that this is a very important matter, and I may say that when this Bill was introduced in the Imperial Parliament the Government instructed Mr. Colmer, secretary of the High Commissioner's office in London, in conjunction with Dr. Montague, the Minister of Agriculture, to enter the strongest possible protest against the proposed legislation, and against the grounds upon which it was based. They were instructed to state that so far as Canada was concerned, it could scarcely be disputed by anybody that the evidence was entirely conclusive that pleuro-pneumonia had never existed and does not now exist in Canada. I would suggest to my hon. friend that as this matter is a very important one, and is now being carefully considered by the Government, he should for the present leave it in that position, as it is quite possible we may feel it our duty to call the attention of the House to some such measure as is suggested.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, it is well that the attention of the House should be drawn to this matter by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin); but it is a pity that action taken by the Government in the meantime should have done so much to justify the exclusion of our cattle from the British market, and to tie our hands in applying for the removal of that exclusion. Not long before the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) left for Great Britain, he had obtained the passage of an Order in Council allowing United States cattle to be shipped from the port of St. John to Great Britain. He had done so on the statement made by himself, that it appeared to be hopeless, now, to obtain the removal of the scheduling of Canadian cattle, and that he thought therefore it was unnecessary to continue any longer the precautions which we had been observing to prevent our cattle being tainted with pleuro-pneumonia. In effect, the argument was that, as our cattle were scheduled at any rate, our steamboat lines and railways might as well as not have the privilege of carrying United States cattle to the old country.

That was a very peculiar line of policy from the farmers' point of view, to begin with. It authorized subsidized lines to carry United States cattle in competition with Canadian cattle. But, so far as the present subject is concerned, I have only to speak of its effect upon the request that Canadian cattle should not be excluded from Great Britain. I say that that act of the Government, allowing cattle from the justly suspected United States, to go by Canadian lines to England, has done a great deal to weaken our case, when we ask that the exclusion be removed. It is a very peculiar thing that the same Minister of Agriculture who obtained the passage of that Order in Council, here, should now be applying to the home government to remove the exclusion for which his own action has given grounds that never existed before in the history of our cattle export trade.

The recurrence of this question at this moment calls our special attention to the inconvenience of our not having a High Commissioner in London. We have, it seems, a clerk there in charge of the High Commissioner's office. It may be that this clerk is quite as efficient for all purposes as the High Commissioner himself would have been; it may be that he has been in the habit of performing all the duties of that office; but certainly it does not lie in the mouths of the Government or their friends to make that assertion. It must be admitted, therefore, from a Government point of view, that it is extremely inconvenient to have the gentleman who is nominally High Commissioner in London, sitting in this House as Secretary of State. The commission under which the High Commissioner is appointed makes it his duty to attend to all matters of this kind, and a number of other matters to which I shall not call the attention of the House just now, because I shall have a further opportunity of showing the inconvenience of having a High Commissioner who is not a High Commissioner.

The hon. High Commissioner who sits in this House as Secretary of State has told us that he has called the attention of the secretary of the High Commissioner's office to the matter, and has instructed him in conjunction with the Minister of Agriculture to protest. I have shown the House that the position of the Minister of Agriculture in the matter is vastly weakened by the action he himself adopted before he left these shores. The House will also admit that the action of the clerk in the office cannot be nearly so effective as the action of the High Commissioner himself. After all the blunders that have been made in connection with this cattle trade, after the Government have given up in despair the hope of obtaining the removal of the scheduling of Canadian cattle, it still seems to me possible that something might be done by united effort on the part of this House. If the obnoxious Order in Council allowing suspected United States cattle to be shipped by Canadian lines, were withdrawn, and if the Government would obtain a vote of this House, based on evidence laid before it, and setting forth the undoubted fact that Canadian cattle are not infected, and would renew their promise to exclude United States cattle from all danger of infecting our own, I do not believe yet that it is impossible to get rid of this obstacle in the way of our trade.

We have one fact in our favour, Sir, as shown by the reports in the old country press. We have the fact that the Liberal party in Great Britain oppose this Exclusion Bill as being a piece of protective policy. With their assistance, and with the assistance of action on the part of this House, which I think should be solicited and carried through by the Government. I have hopes that something may yet be done to obtain that entry into the United Kingdom for our cattle which they undoubtedly deserve on the grounds of their health. The High Commissioner, I think, would be more usefully employed here in promoting this expression of opinion, and in promoting action on the part of the Canadian Government, which would lead to this result, than in promoting private Bill legislation, with the promotion of which he was also concerned on the other side of the water. I do not think the House needs to be reminded of the Bill to which I refer.

An hon. MEMBER. Name.

Mr. CASEY. The name is the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Bill, which this House dealt with the other day. Hoping that action will be taken in the line suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia, I leave the matter with the Government.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, in agreeing to second the motion made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I did so after a hurried consultation with my hon. friend when we agreed that provided the House would assent to it, the resolution which has been read would be moved. I regard it as a matter of the utmost importance that action should be immediately taken on this subject. It was not with any disposition to forestall a declaration of what the Government might propose to do that this motion is made, but because we had not an opportunity of consulting them after we saw the intimation in the papers that the subject was under serious discussion. We believed the matter was of such vital importance that the House would readily consent to the passage of such a resolution unanimously, so that it might come with the greatest force to those parties who are looking after our interests over there. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that there has been any dereliction of duty on the part of the Government, or that there have been blunders made from which resulted the scheduling of our cattle. It is quite plain to any one who has kept track of the history of the case, from the first time the embargo was placed on, in 1892, to the present, that the Government cannot fairly lie under any such charge. But at present there is a very strong feeling in the country that great injustice is being done Canada by England. We used to enjoy the English market for our live cattle, but upon the plea, in 1892, that our cattle were affected with pleuro-pneumonia, they were scheduled. In every possible way our Government have made efforts to prove conclusively to the British Board of Agriculture and Parliament that pleuro-pneumonia did not exist in Canada, but without success. I intend to recapitulate very briefly a few of the efforts made. In 1892, when the cases of pleuro-pneumonia were said to have been found on board the "Hurons" and "Monkseaton," we endeavoured to demonstrate in the following ways the absence of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada: 1. By the examination of the herds from which these cattle came. They were traced directly back to the herds out of which the cattle were purchased, and the fact was conclusively established that there was no evidence of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious disease in those herds or any other cattle found in the district. 2. The examination of herds of cattle all over the country by competent veterinary surgeons and the demonstration that we had no contagious diseases of that nature in our cattle. 3. The examination of cattle slaughtered at the abattoirs in the large cities and towns of this country. They were slaughtered by hundreds and thousands, and yet no evidence of this disease was found. 4. We had an inquiry by cattle dealers and purchasers of cattle in every part of the country where they were buying; and when the returns came in, there was no evidence of disease. 5. We had an examination of the live cattle shipped at the port of Montreal in 1894. Out of 99,606, only 140 were rejected. Of these 67 were rejected for actinomycosis or lump jaw; 51 lame, 15 too lean for shipment. There was no evidence whatever of either pleuro-pneumonia or other infectious disease among them. 6. We had the slaughter at the ports of landing in England of 193,860 head in 1892, and of that large number only two cases were selected as showing any evidence whatever of diseases. It was said that in these two there were some signs of something apparently resembling pleuro-pneumonia, but this was not by any means successfully proven. That was reported by Mr. Gardner and assessors. 7. As many as 1,493,145 head of cattle were shipped from Canada between 1880 and 1892, the date of the first scheduling; and in all these, no case of pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious disease was discovered. The injury that is being done Canada to-day is not confined to the injury of our trade with Great Britain. That of itself is bad enough, but the injury is also, as the hon. member for Assiniboia has said, much wider than that, because the scheduling has resulted in other countries imposing the same embargo on Canadian cattle, on the plea that England has done so after full and fair inquiry. That is an injustice we ought not to suffer under at present. The proposal now to pass a Bill to permanently prohibit the importation of live animals, if based on the assumption that disease exists in cattle imported from Canada, is most unfair, ungenerous, and unjust to Canada. If the proposed legislation is intended to protect the British farmer, as a line of protection, then we cannot reasonably complain; but if it is intended for the other purpose, it is very unfair and ungenerous to Canada. I hope the Government will take up the question at the earliest possible moment and endeavour, as far as possible, to show the British Parliament that the unanimous opinion of this House and people is that the British Parliament will act most unjustifiably in passing any such law, if they pass it on the ground that our cattle are infected with pleuro-pneumonia or other infectious disease, and that there is danger of their carrying such infection into England.

Mr. McMULLEN. I agree with the hon. gentleman that our herds in Canada are free from pleuro-pneumonia, but I most decidedly dissent from his proposition that the Government are entirely free from blame for the exclusion of our cattle from England. Why, time and again, on the floor of this House, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has shown most clearly and distinctly to any unbiassed mind that the loose manner in which the Government handled the trade of the export of cattle from the United States through Canada was what led up to the scheduling of our cattle in England. I am amazed to find the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) reiterate the same statements that he has made before, in the face of the positive undeniable evidence, which has been frequently adduced to show that the absolute neglect of the Government is the cause of the existing condition of things. Will any man dare to deny that the binding bargain, the honourable contract entered into with the Crown of England that no cattle would be admitted into Canada, unless on certain stipulated conditions, was openly violated by the admission of thousands of cattle into the North-west from the United States? The hon. Minister of Agriculture tried, on a previous occasion, to evade the direct charge made by my hon. friend from North York, by raising the question that those cattle, which were brought in from the United States, had been brought in from states that were not afflicted by pleuro-pneumonia. No one dares to say that they were or were not, but that is no answer to the charge. We can say that the English government drew the attention of the Canadian Government to the fact that pleuro-pneumonia did exist in the United States, and that it would be well and prudent for the Canadian Government to watch most vigilantly the export of American cattle through or into Canadian territory in order to discover if any of the herds were diseased. But the Government did not take the warning. They did nothing. For six months that remonstrance lay in one of the pigeon-holes of the Agriculture Department without a single effort being made, and yet we have men who will state in this House that the Government are free from any blame. I am amazed to find that a man will dare to stand up in this House and repeat and reiterate such statements, in the face of the positive evidence that has been produced to the contrary from time to time. Sir, at the door of hon. gentlemen opposite lies the responsibility. Had this been a matter affecting the interests of the sugar refiners or of the cotton weavers of this Dominion, the united efforts of the whole Cabinet would have been brought to bear to secure for them the advantages they wanted to enjoy. But now that a question affecting the agriculturists of the Dominion demands immediate and prompt attention, impotency appears to have struck every man of the Cabinet. They are unable to do anything. They do not move, but allow anything to happen, no matter what it is, exhibiting the utmost indifference. But they hope they will be able to mislead and deceive the farmers into believing that their interests are being attended to. What do we see to-day? The hon. Secretary of State and leader of this House stated a few moments ago that a message had been sent to Mr. Colmer, the secretary of the High Commissioner's office in London, to formulate a remonstrance and present it to the Cabinet in England to try to secure an escape from the permanent scheduling of our cattle by the British authorities. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the whole ability of the Cabinet, limited as it may be, has not been concentrated upon this important question, and that a despatch embodying the remonstrance for presentation to the British Cabinet has not been prepared, and Mr. Colmer merely made the bearer of that remonstrance, instead of leaving it to an official of the High Commissioner the grave responsibility of preparing that remonstrance. Again we are told that the Minister of Agriculture is in England. If we understood aright, that hon. gentleman left here to seek health. He was supposed to be a man suffering under illness for whom complete rest was absolutely necessary, and he went to London, no doubt, for the purpose of seeking medical advice. I would like to know if in such a grave juncture as this our affairs in this important matter are to be left to an underling of the High Commissioner's office and a sick man. I would like to know if the Minister of Agriculture is in a position efficiently to perform the very responsible duty of remonstrating with the Cabinet of Great Britain with regard to this very grave question. If when the Government issued their remedial order to Manitoba, the High Commissioner had remained in England and secured a remedial order that would permit our cattle to enter the English market, it would have been a matter well worth his personal attention; and it would have been a great relief to the stock-raisers of this country if this had been done. But from time to time difficulties have arisen to prevent the farmers of Canada from enjoying the advantages they formerly enjoyed in this market. To-day we are face to face with a proposal in the British Parliament to make permanent the exclusion of our cattle from the English market, and the whole responsibility of remonstrating with the Cabinet in England on that point is allowed to rest upon an underling of the High Commissioner's department and a sick man who has gone to England for his health. The Government have not formulated and cabled any remonstrance. The Secretary of State does not dare to say that he has done so. Though we have seventeen Ministers, instead of calling them together and uniting their influence and brain power, whatever it may amount to, and getting up a well-prepared remonstrance to the English Cabinet in the interests of the farmers, practically nothing has been done. Well, Sir, we express regret on behalf of the farmers of this country. The hon. leader of the House may possibly escape here the condemnation that his mismanagement deserves. But he must distinctly understand, and every member of the Cabinet must distinctly understand, that we shall endeavour to enlighten the country as to the neglect of the Cabinet in this matter.

Mr. McSHANE. I am very glad indeed, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Abyssinia, or Assiniboia, or whatever it is (Mr. Davin), has brought this matter up, and I desire to say a word or two upon it, with the permission of the House. I attended a meeting of the Agricultural Committee a few days ago at which the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) presided. At that meeting Prof. Robertson introduced a proposal that the Government of this country should spend $300,000 in order to ship dead meat from this country to England, and showed in glowing terms on paper the great profit that would be realized in this trade. In fact, one example that he gave went to show that some $15 or $16 more per head could be made by slaughtering cattle in Canada and exporting the meat than by exporting the live animals. I do not know how he could have figured that out. We know that, unfortunately for the farmers, unfortunately for those who deal in cattle and export cattle, and unfortunately for the whole Dominion, England has closed her market against the cattle exported from Canada. Recently this House declared by unanimous resolution that Canada was loyal to Great Britain, and was ready, if necessary, to take up arms in defence of the Empire. It is unfortunate that such an important industry which is so likely to assist in strengthening the trade relations between England and Canada should be thus destroyed. Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the loss to this country can be hardly known. Take the case of Chicago, where many houses, including the millionaires Armour, Swift and others have been for years engaged in exporting beef. We all know that to that great centre of Chicago from all parts of the western country come hundreds and thousands of animals every week. Beef cattle are sold there for from 1½ cents to 4 cents and 5 cents a pound live weight. We know that the men who export beef not only are millionaires, but that they are in with every great railway monopoly in that country, and they can export their beef or their live animals from the furthest part west through New York or Boston, almost as cheaply as you can send animals from Toronto to Montreal. These men are now giving up the dead meat export, so unprofitable is it, and are exporting live animals instead. I do not reproach the hon. gentleman who did us the honour to represent us as High Commissioner for the Dominion of Canada. No doubt he tried to do his best. I have had great trust in the gentleman appointed by this Government to inspect the animals at Montreal—Dr. McEachren. That gentleman has frequently stated, and I know well myself, that there does not exist any disease in cattle in this country. I think this Parliament cannot express itself too strongly in telling Mr. Chamberlain, the Colonial Secretary, that if he expects Canada to be faithful to England, we want fair play, we want justice, and we want nothing more. I believe this trouble has been caused by English politicians and perhaps by farmers who have not made as much money out of their cattle as they wished, owing to the immense amount of meat which comes into England from Brazil, from Australia, and from other parts of the world, and for which modern improvements afford great facilities by enabling shippers to keep dead meat in good condition perhaps two or three months, so that they can put it upon the market as fresh as if it were slaughtered the day before. I must say that this scheme of the Government to ship dead meat from Canada, will fail, and they might just as well throw their money into the broad Atlantic. I wish that the hon. Secretary of State, who was performing the duties of High Commissioner for the Dominion of Canada in England, had remained there in order to settle this important question, because this business of cattle exportation is the life of this country. The export of cattle was only in its infancy when this trouble arose. I saw lately that Mr. Armour, of Chicago, had secured a large contract of some millions of dollars with the British Government for canned meats; and in view of the importance of this business, I hope the Government will bring every possible influence to bear on Mr. Chamberlain in order to obtain justice for Canadian exporters and Canadian farmers. We want such arrangements with the British Government as that our cattle can be disembarked at an English port, and driven from one place to another, and then the farmers of this country will get back again that which has been taken from them. This is a matter which specially interests the farmers, and the farmers' representatives in this House should look after it. I have great respect for the honest farmers of Canada. I have dealt with them for twenty-five or thirty years, and I say that the farmers are honest men. I know that there are some hon. gentlemen in this House who have led the farmers to believe that the merchants in the cities try to hurt them. Sir, when the farmers prosper, the city merchants prosper, and the poor men everywhere will prosper. I am glad that the hon. gentleman who brought this matter before the House has given me this opportunity of expressing again my hope that the Government will take such measures as will enable our cattle to be shipped alive to England as they were before.

Mr. McMILLAN. A good deal has been said with respect to the action of the Government in this matter, and I must say that there is not the least doubt that a certain amount of blame is to be attached to the Government. Two years ago I asked whether cattle had been allowed to come into Canada from the United States, upon inspection only, and the Minister of Finance rose in his place and stated that strict quarantine regulations had been enforced. But when the leader of the Opposition got up and asked him how long the strict regulations had been in force, my question having been put and answered upon a Monday, his reply was that the Order in Council was passed upon the preceding Saturday, and the strict regulations were only enforced from that day; so that after all, United States cattle had been allowed to come across. I wish to remind the Government that the matter came up lately in the British House of Commons, and the question being put whether they intended to allow Canadian cattle to enter the British market again, I see that Mr. Chamberlain, the Colonial Secretary, answered that the matter was under the consideration of the government. Now, Mr. Speaker, I consider this is an opportune time, if the Government wish to do anything on behalf of the farmers of this country, to send just as strong a remonstrance to the British Government as they possibly can. It is not alone by the British Government that our cattle have been scheduled, for in consequence of that action we find that Belgium and France have also scheduled our cattle. I think a few were allowed to go into France last year. Those are markets that we could have cultivated with great benefit to Canada. It is true that there is a scheme on foot to spend $300,000 in buying Canadian cattle and slaughtering them for export; but I must say, as one deeply interested in this cattle trade, that it is more to the interest of Canadian farmers that British ports should be open to our live cattle than that the Government should spend any amount of money in sending dead meat to that market. From my knowledge I am convinced that we will get better profits from our cattle when they go in alive than if they were sent in slaughtered. The statement has been made time and again that our cattle shrink in crossing the ocean. I admit that in a stormy passage cattle will shrink; but I have shipped cattle during the last eight years, and only once during that period have I known cattle to suffer in a vessel shipped from Montreal to the old country. It is when cattle are carried in cars to Montreal that they suffer the greatest hardship. In crossing the ocean in an ordinary vessel, I have found cattle to gain on the voyage from Montreal to the old country. I say it is of more importance for us to get the British markets open for our live cattle than it is for this Government to take up the dead meat trade; and I am convinced if they take it up, it will end in disaster, as almost every other scheme they have gone into in the interest of the farmers. Last summer I watched the markets closely, we made five or six shipments to the old country, and I am convinced we came out better than if we had sent dressed meat there. I am altogether opposed to the Government entering into the business of a common trader, and purchasing cattle in the country and exporting them to the British market. The statements that have been made to us with respect to the prices of dressed meat in the British market, do not give a fair representation of the true state of things. I procured lately a report of this trade for the last ten years, both in dressed meat and in live meat, and I can say that the live animal trade will yield the most benefit to the farmers of this country. I believe it would be in the interest of this country that some strong private corporation should go into the business of slaughtering cattle and exporting the meat; but even in that case, I believe it is the duty of the Government to send as strong a remonstrance as they can to the British Government. I do not see why it should be left to the secretary in the office of the High Commissioner to send a remonstrance; if that is the only remonstrance that is sent, Parliament being in session, it will appear that this Government and this Parliament take very little interest in the matter. It is to be remembered that we are on the eve of a general election, and I believe that this dead meat scheme of the Government is got up for the purpose of hoodwinking the farmers. But if the Government will take this matter up and deal with it in the manner I have suggested, they will be conferring upon the farmers a lasting benefit.

Mr. LISTER. It is hardly necessary to say, that the question now before the House is one of vital importance to farmers in western Ontario. Of all parts of the Dominion, with the exception of the North-west, and I will say, even including the North-west, Ontario is the largest exporter of live cattle. Anything and everything that it is possible for the Government to do to enhance the price to the farmers of these products, would, of course, benefit the farming community. To-day, the price of live cattle is lower than it has been during the last fifteen years, notwithstanding the National Policy, notwithstanding the fact, that we have had a High Commissioner, or ought to have had one, in London, during all that time. I repeat, that the price in Ontario and in Canada is less to-day than it was fifteen years ago. This is one of the largest interests in the whole Dominion. It overshadows the manufacturing industry, so far as exports are concerned, it overshadows almost every other industry, for, if you take the Trade and Navigation Returns, we find that the value of the exports of live cattle is almost fabulous. A very small reduction represents in the aggregate an enormous sum, because, as the member for Montreal (Mr. McShane) has eloquently told the House, unless the farmers are in a prosperous condition, it is impossible that the merchants and the rest of the community can be prosperous, the prosperity of the farmers being the foundation stone of all prosperity in this Dominion. One cannot shut one's eyes to the fact, that the position occupied by the Secretary of State to-day is a most anomalous one. This country thought it would be in the interest of Canada that there should be a representative in Great Britain, and that a gentleman should be sent there to look after our trade and commercial interests. The present Secretary of State some years ago was appointed to that high position; and yet we find him abandoning the interests of this great country at the most critical time in its history, for, if there ever was any work to be done by the High Commissioner during the last ten years, the time is now. He abandoned his position and came to Canada, for the purpose of doing—what? Why, for the purpose of saving the most rotten political Government that ever governed a country. Sir, he came here for the purpose of saving the Conservative party. The then Prime Minister, the Finance Minister and all these men with extraordinary abilities that are to be found in the Cabinet, are mere nothings, so to speak; the Government and the party would have drifted on the rocks and be stranded and wrecked, but for the appearance of the High Commissioner on the scene, so they think. Time will tell whether the presence of the High Commissioner will save the ships from drifting on the rocks and being wrecked. At this time the High Commissioner is found in Parliament, when he ought to be in London. That is where he should be, that is where the people expect him to be, watching the interests of Canada at this critical period and looking after the cattle trade, upon which the prosperity of Canada so much depends. We find the hon. gentleman here, instead of being in London; he is quietly seated in an arm-chair in this House, directing the fortunes of the Conservative party here and in the country.

An hon. MEMBER. Second in command.

Mr. LISTER. Yes. We were told, when the hon. gentleman went to England as High Commissioner, that great things were to be accomplished. He was to help our people, his actions were to increase the trade of the country, great things, I say, were to be accomplished. We gave him a princely salary; we furnished him with a palace; we paid the taxes and all expenses, even down to the smallest amounts, and we expected to receive compensating advantages. What have those advantages been? We know, that a few years ago there rang through the Conservative press of this country reports of what the hon. gentleman had done for this country. A car-load of cattle was sent over to England. The animals were quarantined, they were slaughtered for pleuropneumonia. The papers told us, that our High Commissioner, with that courage which characterizes him, at once took the train and went to the place; that he pulled off his coat, rolled up his sleeves, and stuck his hands down into the lungs of the animals, to see if there was anything wrong. There was nothing wrong with them. Who is to do that work now? I will venture to say, that the secretary of the department, with his trousers turned up above his boots, will not pull off his coat and shove his hands down into the lungs of animals to see if there is anything wrong. No, Canada is not represented as it should be. Who is to negotiate with the British Government? Do you suppose that Joseph Chamberlain will receive the secretary of the hon. gentleman's department? No, Joseph Chamberlain's secretary will probably receive that secretary. He will have a right to say: Where is your High Commissioner? What is he doing over in Canada? Why is he not here, looking after the interests of the Canadian people and promoting this great trade and preventing enormous injury being done to the people of the country? What answer is there to be made, what answer can the Government make, when the people consider that the High Commissioner should be at his post in London, and not sitting in an easy chair in the Parliament of Canada? Surely, there are men in Parliament who can lead the party, who can help to govern the country in a sort of way, and it is doubtful whether the hon. gentleman will help in that direction or not. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) does not like this embargo business. He does not see that it is one species of protection. It is all right to add 100 per cent on importations, but it is all wrong to do something else. I have no hesitation in saying, and I believe I utter the exact truth, that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in this country from one end to the other; but I believe, at the instance of the British farmer, the Government have had to yield, and, while they would not impose an import tax, they passed a regulation which amounts to the same thing, as it practically prevents the importation of cattle into that country. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) may take a lesson. That is one species of protection; another is distance; another is attacks on whatever is imported. The Government, as the hon. member for York (Mr. Mulock) has stated, over and over again, and has proved, were derelict in their duty; they were as neglectful of the interests of the farmers as any persons could be. They entered into an agreement with the British Government, and then they wantonly violated it, as I distinctly assert here. This gave Great Britain an opportunity, whether they were justified in taking advantage of it or not, of breaking the contract with us, and saying: We cannot trust you, and we insist on the regulations which we now have in force, and which, no doubt, seriously interfere with the live stock trade of Canada. Why, Sir, the carrying out of the regulations was a delusion. It was the merest pretense, and England was looking for something to justify regulations which would prevent, or diminish, at all events, the importation of live stock into that country. Why, Mr. Speaker, in 1891 these gentlemen opposite travelled through the country from one end of it to the other, and they told the farmers of Canada: If you let these Grits be elected, and if you defeat us, your cattle will be scheduled within one month after the election. In my county, and in every other county, the threat rang out to the farmers, that the result of the defeat of the Conservative Government would be the scheduling of Canadian cattle. These gentlemen opposite said to the farmers: Return us to power, and the same privileges which you have to-day will be continued to you. Sir, they were returned to power. They were returned upon the cry of reciprocity, they were returned upon the fears of a portion of the electorate, but shortly after they were returned, we find that the English Government did not think that they were such great fellows, after all, because within three months quarantine regulations and other regulations were instituted by the English Government, which had the effect of diminishing our cattle trade with England. And, while these hon. gentlemen opposite professed to be the friends of the farmers, they had other considerations behind them. They bonused and subsidized steamers from St. John and other places. They propose to subsidize a line of steamers from Great Britain at $750,000 a year, for the purpose of carrying the products of Canada to that country. Perhaps, if they were severe in carrying out the regulations, the railways of this country might not get the American travel, because we were told by the member for St. John (Mr. Hazen), that the cattle shipped from the port of St. John are principally American cattle. We have subsidized these steamers to carry, not Canadian cattle, but the cattle of our neighbours to the south. The railways of the country and the steamships of the country, are a consideration with the Government, and the influences behind these great corporations may be stronger than the Government are able to resist. Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is entitled to the thanks of the country for bringing this matter before the attention of the House. It is, as I said in the opening of my remarks, a matter of the most vital importance to the farming classes, and to all other classes of this country.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I entirely concur in the last remark of my hon. friend (Mr. Lister), that this is a matter of very great importance, and if Parliament can, in any way, strengthen the hands of the Administration, whereby the Imperial Government may be induced to again throw her markets open to Canadian cattle, we will be doing a good service. Now, there are two reasons assigned to the public for the maintenance of the embargo. One of these is the suggestion, by the supporters of the Government, that the embargo is a measure of protection, and that the English Government have resorted to this measure in order to protect the English farmers. It is said by these hon. gentlemen, that the English Government have been simply carrying on a fraudulent deception, in pretending that our cattle are in any way diseased. I am not here to discuss that feature of the question. I hope that the contention that our cattle are free from disease, is founded in fact. I am not, as I say, here to defend the action of the Imperial Government, when it has been charged on the floor of this House with resorting to a course of conduct that would be most discreditable to any Administration. Sir, I question if any member of this House in a responsible position, would care to assert in England that successive Governments there had done this without evidence, and for the purpose of going against the settled policy of free trade in that country. But, if it should be the case, that the scheduling of our cattle in England is maintained in the interests of the English farmer, on the principle of protection, in what position are the Canadian people, who have adopted the principle themselves, when they approach the English Government and ask them not to treat us in the same manner as we are treating them. We have directly invited protection from the English Government towards us. We have closed our markets largely against English manufactures. How can we complain, then, if England chooses to give us some of our own medicine? But, Sir, suppose that we abandon that idea. I have too high an opinion of the English people; I have too high an opinion of the honour of the English statesmen; I have too high an opinion of their sense of fair-play; I have too high an opinion of their courage, to believe that there would be found public opinion, either within or without the Parliament of England, that would warrant the English Parliament or the English Government in resorting to a cowardly, underhand, and dishonest course, in order to accomplish such a measure of protection as is here suggested.

Sir, without going, for a moment, into the cause of this embargo, and taking it as an existing fact, as we find it, I will tell the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) now the proper step which he should take, in order to get it removed. And, Sir, I will tell him upon evidence that he will find in the Department of Agriculture, I will detail to him the evidence that was given to the High Commissioner himself, in London, in his own office. In the year 1893, in the month of June or July, the English Government, through the Colonial Office, communicated to us the first step that we should take, in order to get the removal of this embargo, and when I mention the matter, I am sure that the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) will be reminded of the fact. In a record which is bound up among the records of our own department, and among the Imperial records, as well, they said: We have established an embargo because, under the provisions of the Contagious Diseases Act of England, evidence has been given to us that satisfies us, that Canada is not a country free from disease. That was the finding of their experts, and it gave no option at that moment to the Government to do anything but schedule Canada. They scheduled Canada, and they made a report in June or July, 1893, saying: The first step for you to take in Canada in order to have the scheduling removed, is to adopt a certain course. I do not pretend to give all the details, but the character of them is as follows:—"Let the Canadian Government establish throughout Canada a system of examination of all herds in which they think there is disease, or a chance of disease. Let them go further; let them slaughter certain cattle; let them take an average of the slaughtered cattle; let them send over to the English experts, portions of the lungs of any animals that may be suspected; let them adopt a certain course of action, such as is suggested in the report; and if, after a period, we are satisfied that the cattle of Canada are in a healthy condition, this course will go a long way towards convincing us that we ought to remove the embargo." That report was presented to the High Commissioner's Department in July, 1893. Now, I am going to ask the Secretary of State, or any member of the Government, this question—and I want a categorical answer, if I may be considered entitled to it: Has the Canadian Government, from that time to this, adopted the course asked for by the English Government? I understand that the Bill alluded to, that has been introduced into the English Parliament by Sir John Leng, provides for the permanent exclusion of Canadian cattle.

Mr. MULOCK.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not Sir John Leng, but Mr. Long. Sir John Leng is the other way; he is resisting it.

Mr. MULOCK. Very well. On the 4th of November, 1894, Sir John Leng, being extremely anxious for the removal of the embargo, wrote the Hon. Herbert Gardner, then President of the Board of Agriculture, asking him whether or not the embargo would be removed, what progress was being made, and generally for information on the subject. That letter was written seventeen or eighteen months after the Imperial Government had asked the Canadian Government to adopt a certain course. The Hon. Herbert Gardner replied to the following effect: "In June, 1893, being desirous of assisting in the elucidation of the truth, with a view to the removal of this embargo if Canadian cattle were in a good state of health, my department suggested in writing what course was necessary as a first step to that end. That communication was placed within reach of the Canadian Government at once; and, although eighteen months have elapsed, I have to tell you that the Canadian Government have not, up to this moment, taken the first step to comply with the reasonable request of the Department of Agriculture." Now, I want to know from the hon. Secretary of State whether, since the 4th of November, 1894, when that letter was written, either he or the Government have done anything to comply with the request of the Imperial Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say to the hon. gentleman that the difficulty in carrying out the suggestion of the Department of Agriculture was this: They proposed that we should do in this country what, under the law, the Board of Agriculture do in England, that is to say: wherever pleuro-pneumonia is suspected, and there is reason to believe it would attack a herd, they slaughter it out, and the Government pay the parties who own the cattle their value. They asked us, wherever there was suspicion of pleuro-pneumonia in this country, to slaughter out the herd in the same way as was done in England, and the answer given by the Government of Canada and by myself was that as pleuro-pneumonia had never existed and did not now exist, and as no suspicion of pleuro-pneumonia could be detected in Canada, it was impossible to carry out the suggestion they had made.

Mr. MULOCK. I am aware that the hon. gentleman did send an answer of the character he states. That answer was sent very shortly after the issue of the Imperial order or request, and it was not accepted as a satisfactory reply. If the hon. Secretary of State will refresh his memory upon the matter, he will find that the communication did not require the slaughtering of all herds that might be suspected. It required certain precautionary measures to be adopted, certain inquiries to be made, and reports to be sent to the authorities in England; and after eighteen months, Mr. Gardner, with such an answer before him, stated, on the 4th of November, 1894, that that answer was not the proper answer, that it did not meet the requirements of the English Government, that their request was a reasonable one, and that it must be met as a first step towards satisfying them. He assured the people of England, in a letter to Sir John Leng, of the bona fides of his department. He maintained, rightly or wrongly, that their court of inquiry had correctly found the facts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The veterinary surgeons' department.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes. He submitted the findings of the veterinarians to a court composed of men of high standing and of unimpeachable integrity; and a large number of witnesses—learned men from the learned institutions, bacteriologists who stand at the head of their professions—were subpoenaed to give evidence; and, as a result of their evidence, rightly or wrongly, the court confirmed the report of the veterinary surgeons, and found against the Secretary of State. Am I not right in my statement as to the finding of the board?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite correct.

Mr. MULOCK. So that that finding, whether right or wrong, was a serious and deliberate finding, and was confirmed by subsequent inquiry. It is idle for us, in the face of that finding, to say to the English Government: "Your experts, your veterinarians, are all wrong, and that is an unfounded report." That has been the attitude of the Canadian Government, instead of trying to get the embargo removed by complying with the reasonable request of the Department of Agriculture, and giving the President of the Board of Agriculture a justification for its removal. How could he, as a representative of the people, ignore the finding of the report, except upon our being able to prove that whatever may have been the state of affairs at that time, it had changed. At the same time, we could have asserted that if the facts were such as were reported, those were isolated cases, and such a state of affairs existed no longer. If our Government would simply take the case presented to them, instead of saying that the court was all wrong, and would comply with the request of the English Government. I think my hon. friend would find that would be the first step towards the removal of the embargo. Now, I trust that in what I have said, I have helped to guide the Government aright. I do not believe that you will succeed in a course which really asserts that the English Government, all these years, have been doing an injustice. It is against human nature to suppose that the English Government will, at our assertion, recede from its position—a position which has cost the people of Canada a very large sum. The embargo has been enforced four seasons, and we have lost during that time directly probably four million dollars. I hear that Prof. Robertson has said that there would be a profit of $16 per head on a fat bullock, slaughtered and dressed in Montreal and shipped to England, instead of shipping the live stock to England without an embargo. If Prof. Robertson has said this, then there is a very serious conflict of testimony between him and the late Deputy Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Lowe). In the report of the latter, you will find that, writing to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, informing them that the Government had received an intimation from the English Government that pleuro-pneumonia existed in the western states, he said: We trust you will adopt all precautions to prevent any laxity in connection with the transit trade, which might afford a justification for the imposition of an embargo on Canadian cattle. This was a letter from Mr. Lowe to Sir Joseph Hickson, the then manager of the Grand Trunk Railway. Mr. Lowe added that if an embargo were imposed, it would remain imposed for a sequel,—that is the word he used—and that it meant a loss of at least a penny a pound—he did not say live or dead weight, but take the most favourable view and say dead weight—on every head of cattle sent to England and slaughtered at the point of landing. Everybody who is engaged in the shipping trade knows that whether the loss be a penny a pound or not, there is very considerable loss. It was that loss which urged the Government to make energetic efforts, which urged the High Commissioner (Sir Charles Tupper) to do everything possible to obtain a removal of the embargo. If there were not a loss, why all these efforts to remove the embargo? A short time ago I had an interview with a shipper of cattle, and he gave me this illustration. He said, there are two markets on the Thames where cattle are sold. One of them is the market for Canadian and American cattle, which have to be slaughtered within ten days of their landing. The other is the market where cattle from England and Ireland are brought for sale. You can go to the Canadian market and buy a beast there for several pounds according to the weight, £4 or £5 per head, less than you would have to pay for the same beast raised in England or Ireland and sold in the other market, only a couple of miles away on the Thames, simply because the butchers who purchase the Canadian beasts have to slaughter them at once, whereas the butchers who purchase the English fed cattle can take them into the interior and keep them until they require to slaughter them. How does Mr. Lowe's statement coincide with that of Prof. Robertson, who is supposed to be advising the Government with regard to its parental course in becoming butchers and dealers in live stock, butter and cheese. There is no doubt that this embargo is causing us a direct loss of at least $10 a head, which is not more than half what Mr. Lowe put it at; or on 100,000 head, which we export to England per year, that loss amounts to at least one million dollars. In addition to that, it discourages export and depresses business in Canadian markets. The result is it not only causes our farmers to lose the full value of the English market but it also deprives them of the full value of the Canadian market as well. I shall not enter into any details as to the cause of this unfortunate condition of things to-day; but I would tell the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) this, because I have no doubt he is anxious to have the embargo removed. I have never been able to get a proper hearing from the Administration on these points; and I may give the hon. gentleman another point which I trust he will take into consideration, because it is necessary for the Government to obtain a variation of the engagement with England on this other point or we will not get the schedule removed. If I might suggest to the hon. gentleman, without being open to a charge of egotism, an admirable source for correct information, I would refer him to an address which I delivered on this question in this House in July, 1894, in which he will find set out at length the agreement under which the British Government promised not to schedule Canadian cattle, and which agreement has never yet been varied by the Imperial authorities. One of the terms of that agreement is that no American cattle are to be allowed into Canada at all except in transit, and then under certain conditions. And by way of parenthesis—for this does not concern the Secretary of State at this moment,—let me say in answer to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) who asserted that that agreement had never been violated, that it was violated from the very start. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to turn up the reports in the Department of Agriculture, he will find that, from year to year, after that agreement the Canadian Government allowed the American cattle to come into Canada from the western states, uninspected, not quarantined, entirely untrammelled by any regulations or restrictions of any kind. The figures in the department show that cattle came in from the American states to Manitoba and the Territories to the enormous number of at least 50,000, which were never quarantined nor inspected but allowed at once to enter our country and mingle with our herds. The hon. gentleman will find that there never was an Order in Council passed taking the most elementary precaution for protecting Canadian herds in all those years. To quote again the language of the late Deputy Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Lowe), he said that, so far as the importation of American cattle into Canada was concerned, for many years there was untrammelled importation. Since then the department have from time to time, I think, tried to quarantine American cattle, but that will not meet the case because the agreement, which is a condition of England not scheduling Canada, and which will stand in our way if we ask the English authorities to remove the scheduling, says not only shall there be no untrammelled importation, but there shall be no importation at all. The words are "total prohibition." There is to be total prohibition of American cattle coming into Canada, except in transit. Although this matter has been before Parliament for a long while, I do not find that any member of the Government has ever yet given to the country the statement that the agreement to which I refer has been modified by the British Government. I tell the hon. Secretary of State, because I know he is not yet familiar with the history of this transaction, that one of the great mistakes of his department was this. I will tell the Secretary of State one of the great mistakes that his Government has made. He will find that, instead of the Canadian Government recognizing the terms of the agreement to which I have alluded, they proceeded to pass an Order in Council, framed in a very different way, ignoring the stringent provisions assented to by the English Government, and suggesting and adopting others instead. But the Canadian Order in Council had no effect whatever upon the bargain. It was never assented to by the English Government, it never controlled that Government, and it was either laxity, oversight, or bad faith, choose as you may—at all events, it allowed the trade to be conducted at our peril, so that when the incidents that have led to the embargo occurred, we were at their mercy for having violated the agreement. So that I say that in order to accomplish the purpose, either we should get the English Government to relax the terms of the agreement to which I have referred, or we should comply with them. Now, that seems reasonable, and I trust that the hon. Secretary of State will give consideration to what I have said, and at once. I may say that if he does so, he will find that action on the part of our Government seeking to comply with the requirements of the English law will go a long way to remove the embargo. I am glad to see the hon. gentleman here, because he is familiar with the requirements of the English Act. He will remember that that Act declares that the British Government may schedule not only a country where disease is known to exist, but also a country contiguous to it, if there is any danger of the disease being imported from one country into the other, and thus into Great Britain. And under that provision of the English Contagious Diseases Act, Great Britain will not remove the scheduling from Canadian cattle unless fully satisfied, not only that Canada is free from disease, but that we have such regulations as will render it impossible for the disease to get into the Canadian herds from the United States. I have never learned that the Canadian Government have directed their attention to the simple, plain methods of the removal of this embargo. The Secretary of State, we have been told and I believe rightly, was able, on one occasion, to accomplish great good in the interests of our cattle trade. I would ask him if he would be good enough to search the records of the Government and see if possibly the English Government have, at any time, assented to a modification of the terms to which I have alluded. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) is continually asserting that there was no violation of the agreement. But I have never yet heard any member of the Canadian Government venture to say that the agreement with Great Britain had been modified, and if not, the cases that I have referred to were clear violations of that agreement, and, perhaps, had to do with the imposition of the embargo. We might as well look at it in a business way, and you will see, Mr. Speaker, that there is a good deal that is plausible in the position, from the English point of view. They say that the first cattle that were found to be diseased, came from Pilot Mound, Manitoba, or rather our Government traced them to that point, as shown by the records of the Department of Agriculture. Then, you see, the English Government established a connection at once between pleuro-pneumonia in the cattle of the States and in the two cattle from Pilot Mound, which were the first suspects. For it is in evidence that the herds in southern Manitoba, as in many of the western states, were largely filled up with cattle from Montana, Dakota, and elsewhere, in which places pleuro-pneumonia was supposed to exist. It is to be remembered that there are no quarantine regulations between different states of the union, so that where pleuro-pneumonia exists in one state, there is every danger—for on these great prairies of the United States the cattle roam and are driven northward and southward according to the season—that it will ultimately find its way to widely-separated portions of the country. While we assert with all positiveness that no pleuro-pneumonia exists in Canada, and while I hope that that is true, yet I must be frank, and admit that it is an assertion that presents some difficulties when we try to convince the English people, particularly when they can turn up our public records and show that thousands of cattle from the western states found their way into southern Manitoba. So we might as well look the situation in the face, and try to remedy it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the cattle in the western states adjoining Manitoba had pleuro-pneumonia?

Mr. MULOCK. No, I did not say that. I speak from memory as to the states in which it existed, but I think you will find, on reference to the records, that Illinois was one of the states in which the English Government advised the Canadian Government, pleuro-pneumonia existed. But, at any rate, the fact of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in the United States was communicated to the Canadian Government. And the British Government scheduled the United States because of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia there, and, because of our contiguity to the United States, they were about to schedule Canada. Subsequently, they agreed not to schedule Canada, but they wrote to the Canadian Government, informing them that pleuro-pneumonia had broken out in certain states of the union. My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) informs me that there were three states, but I cannot recall the names at the moment. The fact that there is no interstate quarantine, as I understand, in the United States—but that is not material, it is sufficient for the purposes of the English Act, and that is what you have to consider if a disease is found in a contagious country, the United States, for example. Now, the Secretary of State has told us, and perhaps rightly—I trust rightly, for the purpose of what I am about to say—that he has been able in his life to accomplish great things, and I trust that his usefulness is not gone, and that he is still, as he indicated a short time ago, a lion. He said he was a lion in the path of the Grit party. I trust he will be able to use his great powers, not only for the Grit party, but for the Tory party, and for the whole country, to secure the removal of this embargo. Surely, what he did once he can do again, if not so well. The hon. gentleman stated, when he came to Canada, and assumed the high position he has now, that he was able to fill this position and the office of High Commissioner, as well, and that the department in England would not suffer by his absence. Well, now, if it is not going to suffer by his absence, we are going to have the full benefit of this lion's services in the High Commissioner's office. Even though bodily he is here, spiritually, potentially and politically, perhaps, he is in the High Commissioner's office, as well, issued in duplicate, in fact. So, under the circumstances, inasmuch as he has stated, that the public interests will not suffer by the office remaining nominally occupied by a 'locum tenens,' and that he will be still presiding over it here; and inasmuch as this is a subject that has been in his hands a long time, and to which he has given a great deal of attention, although I think his course was not always the wise one, still, he is so familiar with it that I have ventured, at further length than I intended in the first place, to dwell upon the subject, in order to let him know what I think are some of the difficulties to be removed; and, if these points are attended to, I believe he will find the English Government yielding and restoring to us our suspended advantages. I cannot sit down without repudiating the idea as strongly as I can, that the imposition of this embargo is one not sustained by the spirit of the law in England. As a loyal citizen and subject of the Empire, I cannot admit for a moment, that the statesmen of Great Britain would deliberately and fraudulently impose and maintain, knowingly, a tariff and regulation such as this, to the injustice of a great colony like the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This question is of such serious import to the trade of this country, that I desire to say a few words upon it. It has been a great misfortune to the trade of this country, that this embargo was placed upon our cattle; and I understand, that we are threatened by a Bill, which has been introduced into the English Parliament, further to prohibit the importation of our cattle into that country. Although I do not like to blame the Government in connection with this matter, it does appear to me, that somebody has blundered. I cannot get over the conclusion I have arrived at, that the regulations in the contract that was made between the mother country and Canada, have not been duly enforced; and that is one of the reasons why England resorted to this measure of slaughtering our cattle on landing at their ports. I have an idea, that the English Government to-day are satisfied that the regulations were not carried out in their entirety. I understand, that they caused an investigation to be made of the mode in which the regulations were carried out, and they found it so faulty and so fraught with danger to the trade of Great Britain, that they thought necessary to schedule our cattle. I believe no other conclusion than that can be arrived at. It is also somewhat to be regretted, that, at this stage, when a measure so drastic is introduced into the English House of Commons, we have no one there representing this Government at the present time. Our High Commissioner is not there. Our High Commissioner—where is he? Our High Commissioner is here; and just at a time and at a crisis when, if the High Commissioner ever could have been of any use to Canada, he might be of use in this important crisis in the history of the cattle trade of Canada, we find that he is absent. There never was a time when he might be more useful. It has been said, in the past, that he was useful to the cattle trade; but it will be noted, that he had been in England only a few years before our cattle were scheduled. During all the years before we had a High Commissioner in England, our cattle were allowed to enter freely into that country; but, notwithstanding the usefulness, and the power, and the ability, of the High Commissioner, shortly after he went there, our cattle were scheduled. It may be, that this Bill has been forced upon the British Parliament with a desire further to limit our importations into Great Britain; possibly, there may be a provision in the Bill to prevent High Commissioners going over there, and spasmodically staying there. It has not been found in the interest of the Empire, I think; because our High Commissioner, when he was in England, sought to convey to the people of England the idea, that one-half of the country, a little more than one-half, those who represent more than half of the wealth of this country, were not loyal to the mother country. The High Commissioner was not well employed when he made that statement; and, when he came back to Canada in order to make the Liberal party tremble at his gaze, he was obliged, the first thing he did, to retract that statement, and withdraw that calumny against the most important party in the Dominion of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker. I think I can hardly allow the hon. gentleman to make that statement in this House without giving it a most emphatic contradiction. I never in my life made such a statement, and, therefore, it was impossible that I could ever have retracted it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If I am not mistaken, I read the statement myself, in an article written by the hon. gentleman in an American magazine.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, will the hon. gentleman tell us, then, what he did say in that article?

Mr. FOSTER. Question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentleman, at all events, made a reflection, and a reflection I have no doubt he feels sorry for at the present time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I deny most emphatically ever having made such a statement in my life ; and I challenge the hon. gentleman, or any other hon. gentleman in this House, to prove that there is any foundation for his statement.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Very well ; I am obliged to accept the hon. gentleman's retraction. I congratulate him in making the retraction, because, in his long parliamentary history, I have scarcely ever known him to make a retraction before. I have known him to be charged with serious affairs before, and he turned round and said these were only a strong vindication of the high policy and the high course he pursued in Parliament. That was his course in other days. Now, Sir, as to this matter, we have, I think, seventeen members of the Government. There is a great crisis going on, affecting the trade of Canada in England ; there is another crisis going on here. The Government, I understand, are to have a conference with one of the provincial governments. Now, we have enough members in this Government to conduct two conferences. We could spare three or four of them to go to England, where we have no High Commissioner ; we could spare three or four more of them to attend this other conference, and, I believe, the parliamentary proceedings would go on uninterruptedly. I do not think there would be any hitch in the proceedings, if we had about six or seven Ministers less. One wing of them might take charge of one conference, and another wing of the other conference. The wing that the Premier described as a nest of traitors, would be admirably adapted for one, and the wing that they denounced as imbecile and incompetent, would be admirably adapted for the other. They can carry on the two conferences at the same time, and then, at all events, there will be peace in the Government for the time being. That will be a satisfactory thing. Possibly, this complication that has arisen may have called forth the remarks from the Premier of Canada, that, had he been supported loyally, as he should have been, he could have done many things that he was unable to do. This is one thing that could have been done and if the party had been led by any one but an old granny, as Foster said, much would have been done. Now difficulties have arisen, trade complications are ensuing, and our business is threatened, the peace of the country is endangered, and all these results have followed the course pursued by the Government. If we had had a Government united the members of which were friendly to one another, and were not occupied in stabbing each other in the back whenever there was a chance, if we had had a Government united in the interests of Canada and the Empire, these difficulties would not have occurred. Hon. gentlemen opposite are united for office only. The Government goes on under the same incompetent leader. The leader of this House has been called upon to vacate his seat in favour of the Secretary of State, who comes here ostensibly to lead the party, and the Finance Minister is called upon to take one seat further back in the councils of his party and the country. If we do not need a High Commissioner in London, the office should be vacated and abolished. If it is necessary to have a High Commissioner he should be there and he should be there now, because this is a crisis in the history of this country in regard to an important trade. The Minister of Agriculture is in England, we understand ; but it is said he went there for his health. He caught cold while he was here—there were some very cold days before he left—and then he went away. I am sorry he did not take the opportunity, for he said he would avail himself of the earliest possible moment to do so, to vindicate his honour against charges made by hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House, by the hon. member for East York and the hon. member for West York. He went away, and nothing has been done towards vindicating the honour of the Minister of Agriculture ; his health is broken, and he left the country before the vindication took place. It is said that charges were made against him by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) in his paper, and the hon. Minister was going to reply to these people who made an assault on his honour ; but unfortunately he got sick, and I hope his health is now restored. It is unfortunate. I hope the Government will not use his services, when rest is absolutely and imperatively required, to look after this great question. At the present time it is relegated to the clerk in the High Commissioner's office. The High Commissioner and the Secretary of State appear to think that he is a satisfactory agent for Canada at the present time. It appears to me, however, that if we need a High Commissioner, he should be in England. If the Conservative party want the ex-High Commissioner here, by all means get him here ; but it seems strange that the great Conservative party can find no other man qualified to fill the position of High Commissioner, and when the hon. gentleman comes here the high and responsible duties of the office are entrusted to a clerk. I am really surprised that the Conservative party has only one gentleman in its ranks qualified to fill that position, and when the High Commissioner comes here to help his political friends in a campaign, the office is closed or run by a clerk. I fancy this action lowers the dignity of the office in England and in the eyes of public men when they ascertain that the office is being run by a clerk. It is time this farce should be stopped. The question as regards the cattle embargo is one of vital importance to this country. Prof. Robertson says that $16 per head could be saved by turning the cattle into dead meat, while the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) states that more money can be made by shipping live cattle, if the embargo is removed. It can be easily understood that a great loss has accrued to the people in consequence of this blunder made by the Canadian Government. It is time these matters should receive careful attention, and that the Government should unite on a policy on this question, and should stand united, working in harmony one with another in their efforts to preserve our interests, which have been slaughtered like our cattle, in the British market. It is high time, indeed, that this Government should understand that the eyes of the people are upon them, that their movements are being watched both as regards this and other matters, and that they should decide on a policy which, while saving money to the farmers, would at the same time preserve the honour, dignity and respect of the Government and the country. I am deeply interested in this question, and in my opinion the time has arrived when something should be done by this House. If the Government are powerless to deal with the subject, then let them say so, and let this become an open question in Parliament; then let the House take it up and deal with it in such a manner as to impress on the British Government the desire and the wishes of our people, so as to preserve this great trade for Canada.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I feel deeply interested in this question, having been many years engaged in the trade, and I do not want this opportunity to pass without saying something in regard to it. It is a great pity that our cattle have been scheduled by the British authorities, and undoubtedly greater loss will be sustained by this country if they are altogether excluded from British ports as live cattle. This is a question which the Government should deal with energetically, for it affects not only the farmers, but the business men of the country generally. It is now the duty of this Government to show the Government of Great Britain that we have a healthy class of cattle here. No doubt disease has been introduced among our herds owing to our cattle coming in contact with American cattle. The first proof of disease occurred after American cattle were permitted to cross the line and enter Manitoba, and it was from that province the first case of disease was found in our cattle on board steamships going to Great Britain. If anything can possibly be done to prevent the British authorities depriving us of the benefit of the markets of the old country for our live cattle, it should be carried out. I have always been in favour of prosecuting the dead meat trade; but the reason I favour it is, that the cattle west of Winnipeg should be slaughtered and shipped as dressed meat to England, thus giving the Ontario stock-raisers the benefit of the market for their live cattle. What was our experience last year? When we were shipping cattle during the season we found that the freights were very much raised when the Manitoba and North-west cattle came to our ports for shipment. The reason was that there was competition between Manitoba and the North-west and Ontario at the port of shipment. No doubt the steamship companies like to obtain good freights and the railway companies also desire good freight rates. It is all very well for them to get high rates, but it is not in the best interests of the country, that they should be getting very high rates, while our farmers are deprived of making the money they ought to make out of their stock. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if we ever intend to do anything, we should make an effort at this very moment to convince the people of England that our cattle are healthy, and that we are prepared to protect our cattle by inspection, both on board the trains, and when they are being put on board the vessel at the port of shipment. Last year I had the honour of moving for papers with reference to the disease existing amongst sheep. I warned the Government at that time that if something were not done, our sheep would be scheduled in England, and shortly after I brought that question before the House, my fears were realized, and our sheep were scheduled. I am sorry that such has occurred, because it has proved a great loss to the farmers of our country. They cannot raise sheep now with any profit, and they will consequently have to abandon that industry altogether. We should encourage the raising of stock in Canada, because if we do not raise plenty of stock, our farmers will get poor. They cannot grow grain as they did in years gone by when the land was new. We should follow the example of the British farmers, and try to put back on the land as much as we take off, and if we do that, it will make money for the farmers, it will make business for the country, and it will make trade for the railway and steamship companies. Now, Mr. Speaker, I put a notice on the paper the other day, with reference to the disease that has broken out amongst horses. I have witnessed these American horses going aboard steamers, and any practical man must know, that the disease which has broken out amongst them is attributable to the way in which they are managed, and the manner in which they are raised. They raise a great many of them very cheaply on the prairies. They never take them into a stable, or never do anything to them until they are ready to ship them to Great Britain. Then a number of cowboys lasso these horses and break them in, within a few days. Inside of two weeks, they have these horses so tractable that they can halter them and put them into the cars, and when they get to a shipping port, it is dangerous for a man to walk through the stables, so fierce are these animals. These horses are not properly broken, and they are not fit to sell. They get disease on account of the rough usage they are subjected to, because they are bruised and knocked about without any care or attention being paid to them. That is one of the reasons why I object to the regulations recently adopted by the Government, with reference to shipping from the port of St. John, and by which regulations our cattle, horses, and sheep, are allowed to come into contact with these American cattle, on board ship. It is a great mistake to allow American cattle to be carried on the same ship as Canadian cattle. I remember that some years ago there was an order that no vessel carrying American cattle could carry Canadian cattle, until sixty days afterwards, and even then, the ship had to be thoroughly disinfected. These regulations have been infringed upon, and Canadian cattle and American cattle alike, are to-day carried on the same steamers. That is a very foolish thing for any country to do, which is anxious to secure that its cattle shall be healthy. The time has now arrived, Mr. Speaker, when we should make some strong effort to prevent animals from the United States coming into this country and going over on the same vessels as ours, thus causing our animals to be diseased when they land in England. This gives Canadian stock a very bad name in the English market. The English people are very careful about their stock. They do not want any animals to come in contact with them that will breed disease, and they are taking precautions to prevent disease from spreading in that country. We in Canada should imitate the British people in that respect, and try to keep our stock as healthy as the English people are trying to keep their stock.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, just a few words on this question. I hold that the scheduling of Canadian cattle has been a great damage to the Canadian farmers, and through them to the Canadian people at large. I believe, Sir, that the Canadian Parliament should do everything possible to prevent the continuance of that scheduling. At the same time, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the Canadian Government have themselves been largely to blame for the scheduling of Canadian cattle in the English market. They know just as well as I do, that an agreement was entered into in 1883, with the English Government, by which the Canadian Government were to carry out certain engagements. There was a cry from the English farmers, who are, to a certain extent, protectionists, and they brought strong influence to bear on the English Government to schedule Canadian cattle. I remember well, when, in 1887, the Reform party advocated reciprocity, that it was pointed out by the Conservative press at that time, that if Canadian cattle were scheduled in England, the Canadian farmers would lose at least 3 cents per pound on all the beef they sent to Great Britain, which, in the aggregate, amounted to three-quarters of a million dollars per year. If the Canadian Government knew that the English farmers were anxious to schedule Canadian cattle, they should have taken greater precaution to keep intact the agreement they entered into with the Imperial Government, in 1883. What was this agreement, Sir? The Canadian Government agreed to be as careful as possible that no diseased cattle would pass from the United States through Canadian territory on their way to the English market. And, in order to avoid any danger from pleuro-pneumonia to Canadian cattle, our Government agreed to take certain precautions, some of which I will mention to the House. They agreed that they would appoint veterinary surgeons on the boundary line to examine American cattle, previous to their crossing into Canadian territory. There were three of these veterinary surgeons appointed, one at Sarnia, one at Detroit, and one at Sandwich. They were ordered, by the arrangement with the English Government, to have the cattle untrucked and to examine them carefully when they were off the cars, so as to render it impossible that any animal at all diseased, should enter Canada. The railway companies made representation to the Government that this regulation interfered with their traffic, and with their profits. It is here that I blame the Canadian Government, because they considered the interests of the railways in preference to the interests of the Canadian farmers. They relaxed the order so as to allow the veterinarians to examine the animals at night; and when the cattle were in the trucks they could only be seen through the railings which constitute the box of the car. Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, or any reasonable man, if it is possible for any veterinary surgeon to ascertain the condition of animals when they are all standing together inside of a car and you can only see their heads and tails. But it was upon such an examination that the cattle were given a bill of health and passed through Canadian territory. Again, it was a part of the agreement made between the Canadian Government and the English Government that no examination should take place at night. That rule was also relaxed, and the veterinarians were allowed to examine the animals at night and pass them through Canadian territory. I am giving facts which can be substantiated by reference to official documents which any man can see in a blue-book published by this Government. These relaxations in the agreement were made at the solicitation of the Canadian railways, which made representations to the Government of Canada that it was a great inconvenience to them to have the cattle remain over night, to be inspected in the day time. Afterwards, it was represented that it would be an inconvenience to have the animals examined on the American side, and the rules were relaxed to permit them to be examined on this side. The consequence was that a large number of animals passed through Canadian territory which were liable to communicate disease to Canadian herds. Then, under the agreement the Government was to name an inspector and the railway company was to pay him; and he was to travel with the cattle from the western boundary until they reached the eastern boundary and entered American territory again. Whom do you think the Government appointed to look after the cattle in the interests of the Canadian people? The conductors of the trains. Do you really suppose for one moment that a conductor, receiving his wages from the railway company, would not overlook violations of the rules in favour of the company rather than in favour of the Government? And that is really what they did, because the human nature of conductors is very much like human nature in this Parliament or in this Government. The result was that these facts came to the ears of the British farmers, and the British Government, in obedience to the strong pressure brought to bear upon them, were forced to schedule our cattle. Another point in the agreement between the Canadian Government and the English Government was that the cars which carried American cattle, before being returned for other loads, should be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected. But it is on record that those cars repeatedly returned through Canadian territory without being cleansed or disinfected at all. In this way Canadian herds were exposed to danger. Another thing: under the agreement the cars which carried American cattle were not to be used for carrying Canadian cattle through Canadian territory. That rule was violated, because the cars were marked with the letter "V," and it was found that Canadian cattle were being conveyed in cars so marked. The Government also agreed to construct, midway between Windsor and Montreal, at a station called Lynn, a certain enclosure for the purpose of protecting Canadian cattle from coming into contact with American cattle. The American cattle, while being transported across Canadian territory, required to be taken from the trucks at Lynn for the purpose of feeding, watering and rest; and while off the trucks, they were to be kept in this enclosure. In order that the saliva of these cattle should not be licked up by cattle from the outside, and that they should not come into contact with each other, a second fence was constructed around the enclosure, about 10 feet from the inner fence; but the outer fence became so dilapidated and broken down that it did not fulfil the purpose intended, and the cattle from the outside came into contact with the cattle in the enclosure, and, it was said, contracted disease from them. All these things were known to the Government, because their officers reported them from time to time; and yet they did not move one finger to correct this state of things. It was further agreed that the manure gathered around the places where the cattle were kept should be buried. Instead of that, it was taken and sold to the farmers in the neighbourhood, to be used as manure upon their lands. The result was, as the testimony goes to prove, that disease broke out among the cattle of that neighbourhood. All these facts became known to the English people, and the English Government, and were used as a strong argument for scheduling Canadian cattle. How can the Government, looking at the whole history of this case, justify themselves for the position they have taken? I am sorry to say that the English people, becoming aroused to the danger of their herds becoming infected, have excluded our cattle to such an extent that our people do not realize the profit which they would otherwise realize from this trade, and I think that our people when they come to know all the facts, will hold this Government responsible.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

FAST ATLANTIC SERVICE.

Mr. BORDEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the Government to a cablegram which appeared in the Toronto papers—the "Mail and Empire" and the "Globe"—of yesterday, to the following effect:—

Right Hon. R. W. Handbury, Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury Department, replying to John Henniker Heaton, M.P. for Canterbury, said that the Imperial Government had not consented to contribute £75,000 towards a subsidy for a steamship service between Canada and England, but have intimated to the Canadian Government their readiness under certain conditions to make some contribution. They suggested to the Canadian Government that by calling for tenders they might ascertain the probable cost of the service. The Imperial Government would then decide the amount of British aid to the scheme.

I would like, in view of this statement, to ask the Government whether this statement is substantially correct, and whether that is the understanding of the Government of Canada as to the amount of aid which the Imperial Government is to give to the fast line service?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that the reply given by Mr. Handbury in the House of Commons no doubt is correct. The matter stands in this position. Canada voted the sum of £150,000, speaking in sterling money, for this fast service. The Government made application to the Imperial Government to assist to the extent of £75,000, or practically one-third of the total subsidy. Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies informed me that Her Majesty's Government had decided to give the required assistance, but that it would be necessary, as a new phase was given to the enterprise by the assistance of the Imperial Government, to call for new tenders, and it was understood that the amount given by the Imperial Government would be in the proportion of £75,000 to £150,000. But as the service might be taken for a smaller amount than the two together, it was impossible to say what the amount of Imperial assistance would be, until the tenders were sent in, so that practically the Government of Canada are relying, if it be found necessary to require the £75,000 in addition to the £150,000, on the Imperial Government for that assistance; but if we can obtain the service for a smaller amount, of course that would reduce the amount asked from the Imperial Government.

Mr. BORDEN. Would the hon. gentleman say whether tenders have been asked for or what steps have been taken?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A draft of the invitation to tender has been forwarded to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies for his approval, and he has been asked to cable us if it is satisfactory. If so, it will be immediately published. If not, Her Majesty's Government will suggest any alterations that they propose should be made in the form of invitation for tenders, which, of course, would have to be considered before publishing.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION—CONFERENCE WITH MR. GREENWAY.

Mr. LAURIER. I will take advantage of the presence of my hon. friend from Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) to bring again to the attention of the House the statement made by the hon. leader of the House the other day, with regard to the opening of negotiations with Mr. Greenway concerning the school question. The action of the Government, if any action was taken, was based upon this telegram said to have been forwarded by Mr. Greenway to Sir Donald Smith:

Winnipeg, 2nd March, 1896.

Your telegram has received the most careful consideration of myself and colleagues. While duly appreciating all you say, it is quite clear that we can only proceed to Ottawa for the purpose of holding a conference, upon the official invitation of the Dominion Government. I fully appreciate your kind offices in this matter.

GREENWAY.

There is nothing in this telegram to suggest what was the matter of communication between the hon. member for Montreal West and Mr. Greenway. It might have been concerning wheat, or transportation, or the school question, and I believe it was the last. I submit there can be no doubt that my hon. friend from Montreal West handed over this telegram from Mr. Greenway to himself and at the same time the telegram which he has sent to Mr. Greenway to the Government, and the Government must be in possession of both; and the House, under such circumstances, would be entitled to be put in possession of the communication which was sent by my hon. friend from Montreal West to Mr. Greenway, as well as the answer of Mr. Greenway. Having the answer alone, without the communication itself which prompted this answer, it is obvious that we have only part of the information, and it is equally obvious that the House is entitled to full information on this important subject.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In reference to the hon. gentleman's request, I may say that I have not yet had an opportunity, since the return of the hon. member for Montreal West, of conferring with him on this subject; and after communicating with him, I will be in a position to say to the hon. gentleman whether I can give any further information.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for second reading of Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba), and the proposed motion (six months' hoist) of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot, in the absence of the information for which my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) asked, just now, feel quite as certain as to what passed between my hon. friend from Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) and Mr. Greenway as I could desire; but viewing the matter in the light of the information we do possess, that is to say, by the light of the statement made on Monday last and on Tuesday by the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), I think I can say this, that if there were one thing necessary to illustrate in the clearest light the utter absurdity of the position which the Government have assumed with regard to this question, it was furnished us by the remarkable declaration made by the hon. Secretary of State two days ago. We may well be at some loss, on this side, to understand exactly where the Government are placed with regard to the school question, because we find that, at one time, in their various pilgrimages throughout the country, they tell the people of Ontario at any rate, that their action in this matter has been purely mechanical, that they were mere transmitters of the message from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to the parliament of Manitoba. But, Sir, on other occasions and in other places, we find these same gentlemen posing as martyrs to the constitution, as men who are actuated by the sternest sense of duty in all they do in this matter, and who only undertook the perilous task to which they have committed themselves under the impulse of high patriotic motive. Sir, we find on one and a very important occasion that this Government found it impossible to grant an hour's delay, when asked for delay by the government of Manitoba, under circumstances which most amply warranted their request. But we find, on other occasions, that this Government was able to contemplate with equanimity the possibility of practically throwing this Bill over altogether for a whole year and, in all probability, for ever. I should like to know what these hon. gentlemen intend by the proposition which they have lately submitted to us. I should like to know what they mean by suggesting to this House that they will hold a conference with the government of Manitoba, after they have had the second reading of this Bill. What do they wish their followers, and particularly their followers from Ontario, to understand? Is it that this second reading is a mere formality intended to impose upon or to terrify the people of Manitoba, but a thing which, after all is said and done, means nothing. Sir, I should like to ask this House and the followers of the hon. gentleman, if, in all their experience, they have ever known a great question as mis-handled as this has been, from start to finish, by these hon. gentlemen? In this present instance, what is their plain duty in the premises, supposing that, at long last, they are going to adopt the policy advocated by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) and to do now what they should have done before they passed the remedial order—hold a conference with the government of Manitoba and attempt to arrive at an amicable settlement. Sir, what is their plain duty in the premises? Their plain duty is this—if they desired to conciliate Manitoba, if they desired to confer with the government of Manitoba, they should have at once adjourned this debate until such time as they have had their conference and until such time as they were able to come down to us with something like a reasonable proposition for the settlement of this question, with the goodwill of the people of Manitoba.

Now, Sir, if they refuse to take this course, what must the House conclude? We can only judge of these gentlemen's intentions by their past acts. It appears to me, that they must be conspiring against somebody now, or that some part of them must be conspiring against some other part of them now. Sir, treachery is afoot. Whether treachery is intended against the Prime Minister, who, I believe, has been honestly endeavouring from the first to redeem his pledges in this matter, or whether they are endeavouring to delude their supporters from Ontario, whom they are leading like sheep to the shambles—and they know it—or whether they are attempting to delude their followers from the province of Quebec, to whom they are offering a stone in place of bread, as the "Vulgate" puts it—because this Bill, as they well know, is an utter mockery and sham, so far as it is likely to afford any genuine or substantial relief to the Catholic minority in Manitoba—which of these objects they have in view, I cannot say. Possibly, they have not made up their minds which it would be safe to mislead and deceive on this occasion. Or, Sir, is it that these gentlemen, in their cowardice and incapacity, are unable to decide upon any policy at all? Have they arrived at the state described by the great Florentine, where they are "hateful to God and to the enemies of God?" Or, is it, peradventure, Sir, a fear of the displeasure of that dread grand sovereign who has just returned from his tour in the west, with the scalps of certain delinquent brothers at his belt? Or, peradventure—because I wish to give these gentlemen the benefit of every doubt—is it that they have just waked up to a realizing sense of the grave difficulties which attend a settlement of this question? Sir, knowing something of the hon. gentlemen, I am not disposed entirely to disregard that hypothesis. I think I know their limitations; I admit their skill in the conduct of a gerrymander; I admit very frankly, that they are able to carry out a fiscal policy which was in vogue four hundred years ago, when piracy was an honourable profession; but I have my doubts, Sir, whether they understand, or ever did understand—not excepting even the "father of confederation," as he calls himself, the hon. Secretary of State—a real important constitutional question. And, that being so, I can well comprehend how the discussion that has taken place on this question has been really a revelation to those hon. gentlemen, and they have at last woke up to what they might well have known, that, in attempting to settle this question, they have undertaken one of the most difficult problems that it is possible for a federal legislature to address itself to. Sir, there is one statement of these hon. gentlemen in which, I am bound to say, in very great part, I concur. I have noticed, that all these gentlemen have prefaced their remarks on this subject by declaring, that this was a very important question.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very general fault.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a very general statement. The Secretary of State, for instance, said:

Mr. Speaker, in times past I have had occasion to propose to this House the consideration of measures of very great importance, but I confess that I have never risen to propose the second reading of a Bill under the same deep sense of responsibility that I feel on the present occasion. The question that is now submitted for the consideration of this House is one which, in my judgment, transcends in importance any measure that has ever been submitted to this House during its existence.

Strong words. I do not entirely dissent from them, though I am not ready to subscribe to them to the full extent. But let me ask, Sir, What does all this prove? These gentlemen, one and all, tell us, that this is the most important question—at least one of the most important questions—that we have ever been called upon to decide. Why, Sir, if they used their greatest ingenuity to find an argument to justify the position taken by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier), that is the very argument I would have liked them to adduce. The more important the question, the more time it requires; the more important the question, the more need of investigation; the more important and the more irrevocable the step proposed, the more reason why we should go slowly in dealing with a matter of such gravity. Sir, that would be a reason for caution—and hon. gentlemen opposite know it, and the House knows it, and the country knows it—even if this Bill were as good as I believe it to be bad. But, 'a fortiori,' in the present case it does appear to me, that, in calling upon us to give a decision at this time and under these circumstances, in a question which they admit to be of such transcendent importance, they are doing a thing which no government, except themselves, would attempt to do under such circumstances. So far, Sir, I am sorry to say that the arguments which the Government have used appear to me to be utterly and entirely beside the question. The hon. Secretary of State was good enough to devote an hour or more to certain interesting facts in ancient history, with which, as he says, the younger members of the House could not be presumed to be acquainted. I will not dispute these facts. They were not very new to me, but, then, my record in this House is almost as long as that of the hon. gentleman himself. The hon. Minister of Justice occupied even a longer time in assuring us, that we had the power to legislate upon this question. Well, Sir, I never heard that anybody disputed that. Certainly, none of the gentlemen who have spoken on this side, disputed our right to legislate upon this subject, under certain conditions. The government of Manitoba, and the parliament of Manitoba, as I read their statements, fully admit the power of Canada, as the Dominion of Canada, to legislate in this case, under certain conditions. The Minister of the Interior, whom I do not see in his place at present, spent twice as long as both the other gentlemen put together; but, as his subject was the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), I do not feel disposed at the present moment to notice his remarks more fully.

But, Sir, these hon. gentlemen have left the real points of the question wholly untouched. What are we asked to decide?

What is the object of this Bill? Sir, the questions which are proposed for the consideration of this House, and of Canada, as I understand them, are these two: First, Shall we act in this matter without hearing the people and parliament of Manitoba; and next—a question to which I shall address myself more fully later on—Has this House, under existing circumstances, at this stage of its own existence, a right to act in this grave matter at all without an appeal to the people, from whom alone they can derive the right to act? Perhaps, I might add a third, but, in view of the statement, that a suspension of the Bill will take place after the second reading, it may be hardly worth while. The third question would be: Is this Bill as we have it fit to pass in any case; is it not so faulty as to be utterly incapable of amendment; is not the kindest and most humane thing that its putative fathers can do for it to withdraw it and strangle it without more ado?

Now, Sir, I am not going to deal with the innumerable legal technicalities of this measure. When it gets into committee, these, no doubt, will be fully dealt with. But there are certain things which all men of affairs, which all business men in Canada know, and can perfectly appreciate, quite irrespective of the legal considerations involved in this measure. Sir, this a subject which, in the very nature of the case is in the highest degree contentious, is in the very highest degree a matter of controversy. Every human being who has had anything to do with questions of education, with questions in which the religious element comes in, knows perfectly well that you cannot possibly select a subject as to which there will be more hard feeling elicited, as to which there will be more occasion of continual dispute and controversy. Then, Sir, do we not know, is not every lawyer in this House, indeed, is not every business man able to tell the Government that if there is one thing more than another which is certain to breed an endless train of litigation, it is just these questions of joint jurisdiction, every one of which, mark you, Sir, under the most favourable circumstances, even supposing you were acting with the government of Manitoba and not against the government of Manitoba, would be elicited by a proposal to pass a School Act regulating the mode in which education should be administered in any province of this Dominion. If that be the case, where the parties are agreed, what is it likely to be when we know from the very outset that the rival authorities are utterly and bitterly opposed? Why, Sir, I know—and I have paid for my knowledge somewhat dearly, because, although I have not the honour of being a lawyer, I have had the honour of paying very heavy law fees in my time—I know this is a case in which a single careless phrase, a single ill-turned sentence, may well produce a dozen years of costly litigation. If ever there was a Bill submitted to Parliament which needed the most careful drafting, which required the most mature consideration; if ever there was a Bill in which it was necessary that every word should be carefully weighed before it is put on the statute-book, it is the Bill which is submitted for our consideration to-day. Now, Sir, let us ask ourselves what possible chance this Bill has of receiving that mature consideration; what chance this Bill has of being weighed, of being considered as such a measure should be considered. I take the Bill itself as it stands, and I can define it as nothing but a parliamentary scarecrow. Sir, this Bill is simply an imposture. There is no motive power in this Bill whatever. It threatens what it cannot perform; it promises what it can never implement. It may be, and very likely will be, a bonanza for the lawyers of Manitoba and elsewhere; but it assuredly will be a very Pandora's box for public men of all kinds and description if it is placed on the statute-book in its present shape. Sir, this is a Bill, in one word, for the purpose of disturbing everything, and settling nothing; this is a Bill which can satisfy nobody; this is a Bill which those very persons at whose instance it is brought in, do not pretend to accept as final or complete. The best word they can say for it is that it is an instalment; the best word they can say for it is that it is the entering of the wedge; the best thing they can offer to us is that if we pass this Bill and establish its principles, we will be opening an era of fighting and wrangling, and arguing. I verily believe, not only 'de die in diem,' but 'in sæcula sæculorum.'

After Recess.

CANADIAN JOCKEY CLUB.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 48) respecting the Canadian Jockey Club.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MARTIN. I am still without any advice from Winnipeg with regard to this Bill.

Mr. TISDALE. Would you like it to stand over until Friday night?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. TISDALE. I hope you will let us go on then, because everybody else is ready.

Mr. MARTIN. I fully expect to have advice by that time.

Mr. TISDALE. All right. Let it stand.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 32) respecting the Winnipeg-Great Northern Railway Company.—(Mr. Boyd.)

Bill (No. 36) to incorporate the South Shore Suburban Railway Company.—(Mr. Lachapelle.)

Bill (No. 50) respecting the South-western Railway Company and the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Edmonton District Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 56) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Lachapelle.)

Bill (No. 60) respecting the Thousand Islands Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Canadian Peat Fuel Company.—(Mr. Boyle.)

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had been pointing out the extreme inexpediency, from all points of view, of proceeding with this Bill under existing conditions, and at this present moment. In my opinion, there is but one argument which could under any conceivable condition justify us in proceeding at this moment, and that would be, if it were possible by this measure to get rid of this question once and for all. But, Mr. Speaker, this Bill itself, in express terms, absolutely negatives the idea that by passing it you get rid of the question. The very last clause, in so many words, declares that this question is to be kept open, and that the Government arrogates to itself—whether legally or not, I am not prepared to say—the Government arrogates to itself the right to tinker and meddle with this legislation again and again, if they are called upon to do so. Now, Sir, we know positively that the government of Manitoba and the parliament of Manitoba refuse to accept this Bill. They have already informed us that this measure as it stands, is one to which they refuse concurrence. Under these circumstances, the difficulty and the inexpediency of meddling with this question grow more and more manifest with every step; and I may add, also, my conviction that the Government never took the trouble to think this measure out before they laid it on the Table. Sir, if the Government have been utterly unsuccessful in making any other point plain, I think they have made plain the almost intolerable difficulty of interfering with any effect; and, Sir, I will venture to say that to every man in this House who sits down calmly and deliberately to study this problem, the more he studies it, the more the difficulty will appear, that is to say, if the province intended to be coerced is adverse.

Now, it appears to me, and it has appeared to me all through, that there were but two effective remedies in the case of a wrong being done to the Catholic minority. One of these is the remedy afforded by the constitution in the ordinary courts of law, wherever a province has exceeded its legitimate authority in passing an Act of this kind. The other is the veto power which is vested in the Government of Canada with respect to all Acts of provincial legislatures. Now, Sir, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the case of the appeal to the courts of law, so far, it has gone chiefly—I do not say altogether, but chiefly—in favour of Manitoba, which has been declared by the supreme tribunal of the Empire to have acted intra vires in passing the measure in question. The other power, Sir,—as to which I shall have something to say presently—is a power which the Government dared not use. They may or they may not be blameworthy—that is an open question—for having declined to use the veto power. At any rate, Sir, and it is well that their supporters in this House and the country should understand this—they had the opportunity; and, for reasons best known to themselves, they chose to let that opportunity pass away for ever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to review the circumstances which have led us to the situation in which we find ourselves placed to-day. I propose, in the first place, to review the conduct of the Government. I propose, in the second place, to consider the right of this House to act at all; and I want also to call the attention of every man in this country who desires to see this question settled equitably and fairly, to the effect that certain proceedings of the Government are likely to have on the province of Manitoba.

With respect to the conduct of the Government, it appears to me that their best friends must admit that it has been hopelessly contradictory. Sir, under what conditions and what conditions alone could their action in passing the remedial order have been justified? Recollect, a remedial order, or an Act passed upon a remedial order, is an extreme measure; it is a thing of last resort—a thing which every constitutional lawyer and every statesman will admit should, under no circumstances, be done if there was any possible way of avoiding collision between provincial and federal authority. That, I believe, every man in this House on either side will admit to be the truth. If I am correct in my definition of a remedial order, it follows that such a measure should never be passed except after the fullest possible investigation in the first place; it should, in the next place, never be passed until every effort at conciliation and negotiation had been exhausted; and, in the last place, it should be passed only after proof adduced of grievous wrong. Sir, what were the conditions under which the remedial order was passed by the present Government? In the first place, they would have absolutely no investigation. They refused to proceed with the investigation when asked by the government of Manitoba to do so. The Manitoba government were haled like a culprit before their bar. The commonest courtesy which might have been expected to exist as between a provincial and a federal government, was refused to that government. I can only say, with respect to the mode in which the remedial order was passed, that it displayed, on the part of the Government of Canada a desperate and indecent haste; and the terms of peremptory command in which it was conceived were of the most unfortunate possible character. Then, Sir, what followed? Why, Sir, what followed might have been expected. What did this Government do? Mind, Sir, when Manitoba appealed for delay, when its counsel pleaded that they should wait, at any rate, until the provincial legislature had closed its session, and the government of Manitoba could appear before them, the Government of Canada refused to grant them the common courtesy of three weeks' delay, and issued their remedial order. But the Government of Canada, which could not grant three weeks' delay to investigate the case, found it convenient to wait a whole year before introducing an Act in pursuance of the remedial order. Sir, we have been told—I do not know whether by the Secretary of State or by some of his colleagues—that the Government of Canada issued the remedial order under the sternest sense of duty to their country. But, Sir, under a still sterner sense of duty to themselves, three months afterwards they found it necessary, practically, to abandon it and to beg for any concessions which the government of Manitoba would make, if only they would enable them to recede from their remedial order. Here is the dilemma of the Government, which I have never yet seen answered, but which there is yet time to answer before this debate closes. If the Manitoba government did such grievous wrong as to justify the issuing of the remedial order—if its acts were so plain and glaring, as these gentlemen contend, that the idea of a delay of even three weeks was improper to their just and conscientious minds—why did they not impose their veto five years ago? If, on the other hand, the matter was, as I think all fair-minded men will admit, a matter of difficulty and complexity in which the respective rights of the majority and of the minority were hard to determine—if it was a case on which tribunals of the very highest rank differed in toto, as we know they differed—why that outrageous haste in passing the remedial order? Those who know the real motives of the Government can, I think, supply an answer to that question. Sir, the veto was not used in 1890, and why? Because a general election was at hand, and they had trouble enough, as the Secretary of State knows, in maintaining themselves in the general election of 1891, without importing into it a quarrel with Manitoba. Why was the remedial order passed in March, 1895? Sir, I am sorry that I have to say that the evidence there is equally clear and conclusive. The remedial order was passed a year ago in the hottest haste, because they then expected that they would never meet Parliament—because they then expected that a general election was imminent, and because they purposed to deceive the electors on both sides. Sir, it is known what hon. gentlemen opposite stated in Verchères, it is known what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) declared to the electors in Verchères, it is known that he pledged himself that a Bill would be instantly introduced, identical with the words and on the lines of the remedial order. And it is known to-day what passed in the county of Haldimand, when a Minister of state was seeking re-election there. Why is it we have not the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) here to-night? I have no doubt that the hon. Minister is a sick man, but I should be sorry to think that his illness is so severe as to disable him from being present. I have no doubt that he is very sick of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and still sicker of the prospect of having to eat his own words, and to swallow the remedial order or the Bill based thereon. Now, that plot was frustrated, and hence this useless muddle in which we find ourselves, hence the vacillation which has marked the conduct of the Government, hence the dishonest conspiracy with which this session was inaugurated, for the purpose of getting rid of the man who had pledged himself to carry out the statement made by the Government when we parted last, and who, to do him justice, I believe is honestly attempting to carry out that pledge.

Now, I wish to take this Bill itself and to call your attention to one of the vital questions connected with it, which, so far as I have heard, has been altogether, or almost altogether, ignored, by the hon. Ministers, at least. Why, we have in a Bill of forty pages and 112 clauses, a complicated scheme proposed for our adoption. If there be one thing clearer than another, it is that if this Bill is to be anything more than what I describe it, if it is to be anything but a dead letter, if it is not literally, as I have described it, a parliamentary scarecrow, it is necessary that money, and a considerable sum, should be provided to work this scheme to any practical effect. Who is going to provide that money? Before we are asked to proceed with this Bill, we ought to have that question answered, because that is of the very essence of the contract. The Government of Canada dare not, for good reasons, propose to this Parliament, at any rate, to appropriate the funds of the province of Manitoba; and any lawyer will see that if they attempt to appropriate these funds, they will have intolerable difficulty in carrying out their intention. And the Government, although they dare to bring in this Bill, dare not ask a grant from this House for the purpose of carrying it into effect. What will they do? If they attempt to take money from the revenues of Manitoba, then they propose for themselves endless trouble. If they attempt to ask this House for it, what a vista will they open up—what confusion worse confounded? Are they going to introduce state church into Canada? Will the hon. gentlemen dare to ask for federal aid to assist one particular church to educate its children in its own way? I know that the hon. Secretary of State is a bold man. So, for that matter, is the Postmaster General, whom I do not see here in his place. But I doubt whether either of them would have the courage to come before Parliament and make the demand that we should furnish from our funds, money to carry this out; and yet, I repeat, if that money is not provided, this Bill is utterly dead and worthless. Let us consider this Bill like men of business. Without money, and money liberally supplied, the separate schools in Manitoba will be helpless and hopeless. Every one knows the peculiar conditions that prevail in that country; every one knows that, at the best, it is matter of extreme difficulty, in the greater part of Manitoba, to provide proper educational facilities for the children of the settlers. Save in a few special localities, under this Bill, separate schools are an impossibility; and even in those few special localities, they would be carried on at extremely heavy odds. Now, I will take the other alternative. I will suppose, although the language of the hon. Secretary of State renders it a very doubtful thing indeed, that the Government succeed in passing this Bill as it stands. All that they really can do so far as I can see—though here I am open to correction on the part of my legal friends—all the Government can do is this. I think they can exempt the Catholic minority in Manitoba from taxation for school purposes. But it is a very doubtful point, indeed, I believe—again speaking under correction—looking at the peculiar construction of our federal system, if they can legally empower the minority to tax their own people for the benefit of their own schools under our constitution. What follows? Why, this follows: If you pass this Bill as it stands, making no further provision than you make now, what you do is this: You condemn the children of the Catholic minority of Manitoba to hopeless illiteracy. You will do your best to turn them into hewers of wood and drawers of water. Is that the boon you propose to give the Catholics of Manitoba? Is that what my hon. friends from the province of Quebec desire should be granted them? Is that just? Is it right? Is it in the interests of the public? And yet I well believe that is all you can possibly give, without the aid of Manitoba, by any such measure as you have now submitted to the House. It cannot be too clearly pointed out that this business of joint jurisdiction is an absurdity on the face of it, and that it will merely provide the opportunity for interminable strife and litigation.

Sir, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has pointed to you a more excellent way. Let us look to the example of our own two great provinces. I do not know that separate schools are particular favourites either in Quebec or in Ontario, but I put it to my friends in Ontario whether the Protestant minority in Quebec is not fairly and generously treated by the Catholic majority of that province? And I put it to my friends in the province of Quebec whether the Catholic minority in Ontario is not fairly and generously treated, too, by the Protestant majority in that province. These are proofs and instances of what can be done, and ought to be done, when the provinces are left to their own devices. And it is no small matter in connection with this question, it is a thing which ought to have very considerable weight with this House, that one of our most eminent statesmen, my esteemed friend, Sir Oliver Mowat, has already publicly recorded his opinion, that this Bill, based on the remedial order, which the Government propose to pass, is to the last degree ill-considered and ill-advised.

I have another criticism yet to make on the conduct of the Government in this matter. I have looked over the documents which they have laid before us, and in which they have embodied their proceedings with respect to this same remedial order, and I find to my astonishment that a large part of this document, formally laid on the Table of this House, widely circulated throughout this country, consists of ex-parte affidavits which had been ruled out of court, which had been deliberately withdrawn by the counsel for the minority in Manitoba. We know what apology the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) made for that. What does it prove? Giving him the benefit of his own apology, it simply proves that this whole proceeding was conducted with such shameful haste that these affidavits were published without the slightest consideration, on his part, and that he is heartily ashamed of the thing to-day. What had the hon. Minister of the Interior to say for it? He was good enough to tell us that he thought it was all right, because it enabled him to insinuate nasty things against my hon. friend the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). To my mind, both the present Minister of Justice (Mr. A. Dickey), and the former Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) deserve very severe censure for their conduct in this matter. The present Minister of Justice deserves censure for allowing it to be done, and he takes the responsibility of it in part, and the former Minister of Justice deserves severe censure, likewise, because it was his special duty I conceive, to see that all the documents in such a case as this were duly and properly in order, just as they would have been if presented in a court. Let me ask one question. Had the case been reversed, had a number of affidavits been presented on the part of the province of Manitoba, and afterwards withdrawn by the counsel for Manitoba, is there one human being within the sound of my voice who thinks that those affidavits would have found their place in the blue-book printed by the Government of Canada? Sir, I will ask my legal friends another question: Did they, in all their experience, ever know any such thing to occur in any court of justice, as evidence of this class, which had been expressly withdrawn, which, it was stated, was to have no effect whatever upon the minds of the judges, appearing in the records of the case sent out as being a true statement of what passed before that court? And remember that, according to these gentlemen's statement, their Committee of the Canadian Privy Council sat as a judicial body in this case. Now, Sir, I say, that that one fact is enough to damn the remedial order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is perfectly clerical, I beg to inform the hon. gentlemen—perfectly clerical, if not parliamentary—and it is good sound Saxon English, into the bargain. Sir, I say more—that that document, printed, as it has been, with these ex-parte affidavits in it, would go very far indeed to justify the assertion made by the government of Manitoba, that they had had no fair hearing before the Privy Council. Their case was prejudged, Sir. Now, one of two things—either this was a most unfair attempt to prejudice the case of Manitoba, or it is a proof of the extremest carelessness in a matter which, of all others, demanded the greatest prudence and care at the hands of the Government. I repeat, that it is not to be forgotten, that these records were scattered all over Canada. Is there one man in ten thousand, not being a lawyer, who, taking up that book and seeing these documents, would understand that they are, from a legal point of view, absolutely worthless, that, though they appear to be sanctioned by being printed in the Government Printing Bureau and bound up with the proceedings, they are really not part of the case. I think the government of Manitoba have a right to demand a formal apology from the Government of Canada for the introduction of these affidavits in this blue-book that they have disseminated throughout the country.

And now, Sir, I come to another and important side of this question. I do not deny, I do not dispute, that this House has a right, if it pleases—and it may be it is well that it should exercise that right—to discuss this question very fully. But I must say, that I most gravely impeach the right of this House, except on the strictest and most constrained construction, to decide in a matter of such magnitude at this moment. I dispute that right on moral grounds; I dispute it on equitable grounds; above all, I dispute it on constitutional grounds. What is our position to-day? Sir, five years and one month have elapsed since, on the 3rd of February, 1891, the House that preceded us was dissolved. Five years have elapsed since the overwhelming majority of the members of this House were elected. It is perfectly well known that we met on the 29th of April, 1891, and it is perfectly well known, too, that by the terms of the proclamation of the Governor General the writs for this House were returnable on the 25th April, 1891. More, Sir; this House is known to everybody not to represent the electorate of Canada to-day. This House was elected on lists that were prepared from the voters' lists of 1888, some seven or eight years ago. Now, it is a mathematical fact, capable of being demonstrated in any way you please, that there is no possibility that we represent more than 60 per cent of the existing electorate. An immense number of men who were on the election rolls have died, an immense number of others have grown to manhood, a very large number have been admitted under our several Acts, and, I am sorry to say, a very considerable number have left this country. On what ground do we assume to pass laws? The ground is, that we represent the electorate of Canada, and that the majority in this House represent the majority of that electorate. How can we say that that is the case, when the whole of us put together represent very little more than half the existing electorate? Then, there is the constitutional ground, which ought to weigh with a parliament like this, if it has any regard for our federal constitution. Since the last House was dissolved, a census was taken, in April, 1891. The results of that census show, that there are to-day four provinces out of the seven improperly represented on the floor of this House. The three maritime provinces are represented in excess of their right to the extent of something like 10 per cent, and the province of Manitoba is largely under-represented. The Redistribution Act was passed, I believe, in 1892, so that it is more than three years since that Act was passed. Sound constitutional usage would have dictated that, in all conscience, we should have a dissolution within a reasonable time after the passing of that Act. This Parliament is the last Parliament that ought to attempt to avail itself of a technicality to prolong its existence far beyond the time for which the people intended to trust them. More, under these circumstances, this is the last Parliament that ought to legislate for Manitoba, in a matter specially affecting that province. On every ground, if we legislate, our Act would be inequitable, practically immoral, and entirely unconstitutional. Everything forbids our availing ourselves of our technical legal right, everything points to the soundness and wisdom of the position taken by my hon. friend, in favour of forbearing from legislation, until we have a mandate from the people to take the matter into consideration. For let it be well remembered, this question has never been before the people of Canada. I do not think that in one single constituency in 1891 was this a vital issue. I doubt that it was raised at all.

Now, I take it, that the constitutional doctrine is the same as the common sense doctrine in a matter of this kind. The rule is well established, that it is not expedient that in a Parliament whose term is nearly run, new and important legislation should take place on questions as to which the people's voice has not been heard, except in extreme cases. It may be well, that we should discuss the question, as I have said. But, surely, it is not well, that we should attempt to decide a question of this kind under such circumstances as these. I will grant, that, in cases of extreme emergency, in cases where it is obvious the public interests would suffer seriously by delay, such a thing might be done. But, dare any man pretend, dare the Government themselves pretend, after their conduct, that this is a case of extraordinary urgency, or that any interest will suffer irrevocably by delay. More than that, it is quite possible, and I believe that the best lawyers of Canada are very much of that opinion, that any action we take may be absolutely irrevocable, that, when we have exercised our function on this head, we shall have completely tied our own hands, and that it will be impossible for us either to add to or to take from the Bill, except, perhaps, with the assistance of the Imperial Parliament. I think here I may well point out to the House that Manitoba has set them an excellent example. The government of Manitoba have appealed to the people; they come from the people fresh with their mandate on this particular question; and the House will do well to remember that in slighting the wishes of the government of Manitoba, it does not slight merely the government, or merely the legislature of Manitoba, but it slights a united province. There is another consideration to which I allude with some little delicacy; but it is perfectly well known to every man in this House that there are scores of hon. members now present who never intend to face their constituents again; and it is more than rumoured, it is known, that among them are a considerable number of gentlemen who have promises of offices from the Government of the day. Now, I say that under these circumstances, it is in the highest degree inexpedient that a measure of this kind should be carried by the votes of men who, practically, are the paid servants of the Government, who are violating by their presence here the spirit if not the letter of the Independence of Parliament Act. Sir, I warn hon. gentlemen that although I for one would be most loth to see the American system introduced into Canada, that to the victors belong the spoils, yet there is a point at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue; and if men violate their trust, if men with the promise of office in their pockets, vote on a question like this under such conditions, let me tell those hon. gentlemen that public opinion will demand, and it may be the painful duty of future Governments to see that the demand of public opinion is carried out, that they shall not be allowed to profit by the wages of their shame. Sir, let all such, if such there be, be wise in time, and abstain from voting at all; or, if this Government, which acts under such a stern sense of duty, whose ideals are so high, if they wish to remove a stumbling block from their own friends, and from our way, too, let them give us their promise that no appointments of any members of Parliament will be made to office until three months after the next Parliament assembles. Now I come to the third question that I raised—I wish the House to consider what is the effect of all this on the province of Manitoba? Mr. Speaker, we may as well recognize once for all that physical coercion of Manitoba is an impossibility; and in my judgment, you will find that interference with the revenues of Manitoba is practically nearly as impossible. Now, it is quite likely, I believe it is quite probable, that the government and the people of Manitoba would be disposed to bow to the opinion of the people of this Dominion, fairly and honestly expressed; and I have shown you the reasons why no human being can pretend that a vote on this Bill at present can be taken as the expression of opinion of the majority of the existing electorate, and I defy any man on either side of the House successfully to controvert that statement. And what is the result? Sir, I say that all these considerations show that it is necessary for us to pause; all these considerations show that we have really and truly no right to act irrevocably in a matter of this kind, for we are setting usage, we are setting tradition, we are setting British constitutional maxims and common equity at defiance, all at one time. We are sitting here to-day by straining a special technical clause which was granted for no such purpose as that to which the Government are attempting to put it. And all for what? Why, Sir, all to pass a measure which can never be successfully worked, which, as I said, its own friends talk of as simply an instalment. Sir, it is the most idle delusion. I would say to any hon. gentleman who cherishes the vain hope that if this Act goes on the statute-book it will be an easy task to amend it to suit themselves, that they know little of the feelings that have been evoked from one end of this Dominion to the other, if they think that any Government that values its own existence will rashly meddle with that Manitoba Act once these elections are out of the way. Sir, this measure would be a fruitful source of endless and eternal litigation, and it would intensify and exaggerate racial and religious disputes among us for ever. Now, I do not for one moment pretend to say that the Catholic minority in Manitoba have not a grievance; they have a right to be heard on that grievance, which, if well established, should be redressed. But I do say this, that there is no proof whatever that the Catholic laity, whatever some of their spiritual advisers may do, would approve of such a Bill as this; and we have a right to know that the Catholic laity as well as the few individuals who speak for them, do approve of such a measure as this before we are called upon to pass it. Now, Sir, I would like briefly to summarize the proceedings of the Government in this matter. If the aims of the Government had been to complicate this question, then I think we will all admit that they have been eminently successful. Here is a question, a question of all others which have been submitted in my time in Parliament, which needs that it should be approached in a calm, judicial frame of mind; and the Government bring it forward at a time when a calm and judicial decision is absolutely impossible. There is no man, let him be as upright and pure-minded as you please, who can vote on this question without bearing in mind that in a few weeks he will have to face his constituents. Here is a question which of all others needs ample time for consideration, if it were for no other reason than this, that there is the strongest ground for believing that if you make a mistake or an error now, that error is irrevocable. The Government bring this question forward—when? At the latest possible date that they can bring it forward. They bring it forward at a time when the days and the very hours of this Parliament are numbered, when at best we can only sit six weeks longer. Why, Sir, we were summoned here on the 2nd January expressly to consider this Bill. Had the Government been genuinely in earnest in their desire to pass this Bill, would not this Bill have been laid on the Table as soon as the Address had been got rid of? When is it presented? It is presented for its second reading on 3rd March, and this is 11th March, five years and two months since the Parliament of 1891 was dissolved. Sir, here is a question which, of all others, needs all possible moral support in order to induce the people of Manitoba to yield obedience to our direction in this matter, and the Government bring it forward under conditions which not only excuse but justify the people of Manitoba in disregarding it; because I say, that on constitutional and moral grounds this House, as I pointed out, has absolutely no right to dictate to Manitoba at present. Sir, this is a question which of all others needs the fullest information that could be laid before us in all details with respect to its practical working, and with respect to the practical working of the system which it is sought to amend; yet we have absolutely, so far as the Government are concerned, no information whatever. More than that, the Government deliberately prevented this information being got when the counsel for the province of Manitoba tendered it to them. Sir, one thing we do know, and that is, that by their conduct they have made the province of Manitoba unprecedentedly unanimous in declining and refusing to consider their propositions: aye, Sir, and perhaps we know this other thing, that if there be any further mistakes to make, these hon. gentlemen are the men to make them. Now, I would like to say one word to my hon. friends from the province of Quebec. Sir, in this matter, their position has been one of uncommon difficulty and uncommon delicacy. We know well that they have exposed themselves to much misconstruction; and I am happy to say that under those circumstances their conduct has been loyal and courageous in no ordinary degree. Sir, I will not minimize the danger to which those hon. gentlemen have exposed themselves, but I say to them, with some experience behind me, that in a case like this the boldest course is always the wisest course. To the French Liberals of the province of Quebec, Canada owes a very deep debt, and they are doing more by their action to reconcile the two races and disabuse men's minds of prejudice than by anything that has occurred perhaps since the confederation became a reality. More than that. Sir, I believe my excellent friends from the province of Quebec will before many weeks elapse find that the policy that they have adopted is the policy which more than all others is likely to bring redress for their friends the Catholic minority in Manitoba. Sir, I cannot doubt, I should be ashamed to doubt, that the people of Manitoba as a whole will recognize the obligations which they are under to the French Liberals of the province of Quebec, and that they will do more for those who have refused to condemn them unheard than they would do for a whole army, even if it were led by such a courageous warrior as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), and I was going to add, and the still more daring hero, the Minister of Public Works, whom I do not see in his place. Mr. Speaker, in no terms of fulsome compliment do I say to my friends from the province of Quebec that they have done a great deal to redeem this Parliament and ennoble its dying hours. They have proved themselves true friends of liberty in this country. I grant that in Ontario and elsewhere our task has been easy; we have been swimming with the stream, we have taken no risk, we have rather strengthened our hands; but it was not so with my friends in the province of Quebec, for the moment at all events, and the least we from the other provinces can do is to recognize and proclaim our high appreciation of the conduct of our friends and of their action in this matter; and I will add, that I have more hope of confederation to-day than I have had for many long years past, I have more hope of seeing our various provinces welded into one harmonious whole and bringing about that consummation which alone can make this confederation a success, when every man in this House and out of it will feel that he is a Canadian first and a Frenchman or an Englishman, a Protestant or a Catholic afterwards.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Mr. Speaker, I must confess at the outset that I am one of those irreconcilables referred to the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am willing to be so termed by him if he will allow me to use that same term to describe Ministers who failed to agree with their chief on every point of his policy, as well as to apply it to those private members who disagree with their party on one plank of its platform and that a fortuitous plank, as this happens to be. I came to this House four or five years ago with the idea that I was coming to Parliament to hear questions discussed concerning the progress and welfare of the country, the development of our resources, the increase of our population, the settlement of our wild lands. But ever since I have had a seat in this House I have heard these questions discussed but little. On the contrary, we have had the time of the House occupied more or less by this question now before us. It has been a spectre before us all the time, and unless we take a firm stand now and put these race and creed questions out of this House, as I think they should be put out, they will continue from year to year and be a bar to the progress of any legislation of the kind to which I have referred. We have a splendid iron industry in Hamilton and elsewhere, we have a great lumbering industry, an extensive pulp industry, great agricultural resources and mining possibilities, and hon. members of this House should be concerned in extending these industries and extending our trade by appointing consuls in other countries, and in every way devoting the energies of the House to building up our industries, increasing our trade, and consequently increasing our population instead of wasting the time of the House in discussing race and creed questions. The necessity of rejecting the consideration of such subjects is seen in the statement that this question will take up all our time, as a great many speakers have already said, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated, "this is only the beginning of the question." The last clause of the Bill provides for amending legislation, and we were told by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll) last night and the hon. member for South Oxford to-day that if we pass this Bill the time of the House next session will be taken up in amending this Act; and we know, from a question placed on the paper the other day, that the bishops of the North-west Territories have a school grievance, and if this legislation is passed to remedy the grievance in Manitoba there will assuredly be a school question in the North-west Territories, and if we continue to entertain these proposals there will be nothing discussed in this House for some sessions except race and creed issues. As a young man and a Canadian proud of my country, I appeal to this House to bar the door against these questions, and keep them out, and devote our energies to the improvement of our country, the promotion of our industries, and the building up of this great Dominion. No party, whether it be the Conservative party or the Reform party, can stand the strain of such questions as this which we have had before us during the last three or four years. What is the fact with regard to our own party—and I still call myself a Conservative? That all the divisions we have seen of late have turned on this question. There have been twelve ministerial defections from the Cabinet, and I venture to say that every one of these defections has turned on a creed or race question. Is it not a fact that there are hon. gentlemen in this House who would not enter the Cabinet because of these issues? Were they not prevented doing so simply by these race and creed questions? So it will be from year to year, and therefore it is in the interest of the Conservative party and it is equally in the interest of the Liberal party, to have it understood that we will keep out of the House these issues; for if we pay any attention to reports that are current, we know that hon. gentlemen opposite are as much disturbed by this question, and the speech delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) confirms this, as are hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and that a creed question is a menace to both parties, a menace to the Dominion, and at all hazards should be kept out of the House. Why should this Parliament settle the question? Is it not a fact that the provinces have power to settle questions of this kind, and that they have been so settled heretofore? As the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pointed out, have not the Protestant majority in Ontario treated the Catholic minority generously? Is it not a fact, as has been claimed in this House, that the Roman Catholic majority in the province of Quebec has treated generously the Protestant minority in that province? Is it not a fact that this question or a similar one has arisen in Prince Edward Island and in New Brunswick, and that the local legislatures of those provinces settled it? And why cannot this be done in Manitoba? If the remedial order had not been issued, even if the present Bill were withdrawn, I believe the good sense of the people in Manitoba would rectify this difficulty, would remedy the grievance of the minority and would do justice under the circumstances; but I do not believe that the province of Manitoba under the present circumstances will do anything to remove the grievance in question. There is just another matter in connection with this question, and it is this. If we set the example now of allowing any one province to create a disturbance of this character, and if that province happens to be under the control of a political party opposed to the dominant party at Ottawa, is it not a fact, that the party in power in the several provinces will be continually bringing up these questions, in order to cause a disturbance in the ranks of the party in control of federal affairs and opposed to the provincial government in politics? The Liberal party in Manitoba are not acting beyond their powers or beyond what political parties do, and for that very reason they think they can aid their friends here at Ottawa by keeping this question alive. If they succeed in doing that, Sir, every other province which happens to have a government opposed to the dominant party at Ottawa, will be continually trying to raise these disturbances, and by sending them to Ottawa we will be kept here in a hotbed of race and religious issues.

Now, the question has been raised here in regard to the constitution and in regard to the right of the Manitoba minority to claim a remedy under the constitution. It is a fact, as has been said, that our Canadian constitution is a written one. We are told, that we must live up to the spirit and letter of that constitution in every line and in every clause. I do not claim to be posted very deeply as regards the constitution, but I have at least read in the works dealing with the constitution: That the constitution is a matter of growth, is a matter of progression, and that, if you attempt to make it cast-iron, and to insist upon every clause being carried out, you will fail. The British constitution, which is the finest constitution in the world, and upon which ours is modelled—

Mr. GILLIES. No.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) does not deny that we have British constitutional practices in this country.

Mr. GILLIES. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say, that the constitution of Canada is the same as the British constitution?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The very first clause of our constitution says that. If the hon. gentleman will read the Act, he will see it in the very first clause, and my hon.

friend (Mr. Gillies) is a lawyer, and I am not.

Mr. GILLIES. The Canadian constitution is written, and the British constitution is not.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Certainly, I did not need to be told that. I will tell the hon. gentleman in what the two constitutions are alike. The British constitution is a progression, a development, and it is the great constitution it is to-day because there were any number of rights guaranteed to the king, guaranteed to the nobility, guaranteed to the universities, guaranteed to the great corporations, guaranteed to the trade guilds, and they were a part of the constitution, just as much as any provision is in our constitution. But, in the interests of the people, and in the interest of progressive government, these rights and these privileges were withdrawn, were left in abeyance, or were silenced, in the public interest. I say, Sir, that, notwithstanding the fact, that a certain provision may be in our constitution, yet, if it is in the public interest, we would be justified in allowing whatever rights the minority claim in Manitoba to remain in abeyance. Certainly, there is no great public reason why they should be dealt with at the present time, and in the manner in which it is proposed now to deal with them. Sir, I throw out the idea, that the Canadian constitution is just as much subject to the law of development, just as much subject to the law of progression, just as much subject to the rights of this one or that one going into abeyance, as were subject to go into abeyance the rights guaranteed under the British constitution. The same thing has happened in the United States, which has a written constitution, and the same thing is happening every day in regard to our own Canadian constitution, whether we like to confess it or not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to make a long speech. But I desire, on this occasion, to protest against this Parliament coercing a great and free province like Manitoba in the matter of education. I protest against this Parliament coercing the province of Manitoba in the matter of education until this Parliament, as previous speakers have said, has had a mandate from the people in a general election to interfere in that respect. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) who preceded me, has referred to the sacrifices which the Liberals have made in Quebec in regard to this question. Well, Sir, there are others on this side of the House who are making great sacrifices too. I say for my own province—and I speak for my own province—I say for the Conservatives of Ontario, that they protest against this interference with the province of Manitoba under existing circumstances. The province of Ontario regards her relations to the province of Manitoba in the light of the ancient Greek idea. Ontario regards herself as the metropolis, the mother city, the mother state, and Manitoba as her child, her offspring, and her colony. And, Sir, the province of Ontario will resent—and I say it after a thorough knowledge of what the opinion of my province is—the province of Ontario will resent such interference as is proposed under this Bill and under existing circumstances. I say further, Sir, that, as a young Conservative, as one who regards the great Northwest as the hope of this country, as one who regards that part of the Dominion, which, when developed, will give us our greatest strength, will give us that great increase of population we desire; as a young Conservative, I say this to the Government to-night: I say, forbear. I repeat it, forbear before you attempt to interfere with the province of Manitoba; forbear before you compel a province of its standing and of the character of its people, to adopt a school system which they have declared at the polls they do not want, and which I know they are supported in resisting by the people of Ontario and a large proportion of the people of Canada.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise, Sir, to support the second reading of this Bill, and I shall give a few reasons for doing so. The question has been admitted on all hands to be an important one. It is indeed the most important question that can very well come before this Parliament. The amendment which has been moved to the motion for the second reading of this Bill, is instructive, in this particular, that it shows how in a case like this extremes can meet. On the one hand, we have the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Maclean) and others who are with him, declaring that they will support the amendment because they are entirely opposed to remedial legislation. It matters not to them what the grievance is. It matters not as to how the minority may be treated in reference to the schools. The hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) will sweep out of the constitution the protection given to the minority, and will pay no attention to the provisions of that constitution. On the other hand, we have the other extreme represented by the gentleman from Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) and by others of his friends, who say that they will vote for the amendment, but on entirely different and opposite grounds. These gentlemen say they will vote for the amendment, because the Remedial Bill is not a Remedial Bill at all, and because it is not as strong as it should be in support of the claims of the Catholic minority in Manitoba. They go further, and they say, that the Government was wrong in not disallowing the Manitoba School Act of 1890. Yet, Sir, these two extremes meet, in support of this amendment. We have also the leader of the Opposition and some who are with him, taking a middle course, which is calculated to catch both parties. The leader of the Opposition does not say, that the constitution should be entirely overlooked, but he says we should consider this matter a little more; give us time, give us a commission, give us an opportunity to investigate, forgetful entirely of the fact, or, it may be, overlooking the fact, that investigation of the subject and discussion of the subject has been going on in all parts of this country for over six years. If the hon. gentleman has not full information in regard to the question now, after six years of discussion and investigation, it seems somewhat questionable whether he would understand it any better, or be able to come to a more intelligent conclusion in regard to it after six or seven months of further delay.

For myself, I feel, as I have always felt, that the rights guaranteed under the constitution to the minority, whether in Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, or any other province, are sacred and should be properly and carefully guarded. I differ entirely from any hon. gentleman who says that we should so construe those provisions of the constitution as to give the least amount of benefit to an aggrieved minority that could be given. I say that we should give liberal, fair and proper consideration to the complaints of a minority; we should construe those provisions of the constitution according to its spirit and letter. I also differ from those who say that the time has come when we may regard the solemn compact entered into with the minority as being no longer binding upon us. I dissent entirely from that view. I say that we should give fair force and effect to that compact.

But let me consider briefly the three objections which have been urged against this Bill. The first is that it is not strong enough, not remedial enough, so to speak, in its provisions. Now, Parliament has the right, only so far as the circumstances of each case may require to make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of the Act. So that whether this law is remedial enough or not, whether it goes sufficiently far to protect the rights of the minority, is a question for Parliament here and now to determine. I admit that. Those who support the Act believe that it does. And while it may be said, not to be a complete answer, yet the minority who are affected by the Act are satisfied with it, and think it is sufficiently strong to remedy the grievance of which they complain. That being the case, it does not lie in the mouths of the gentlemen who are endeavouring to defeat the legislation sought, to say that it is not sufficiently strong and does not provide a remedy. The people of Manitoba who are asking for this legislation are better able to determine that, and they say it is sufficient. That, I think, is a complete answer to the statement that the Bill is not remedial enough.

As to the middle course suggested by the leader of the Opposition and supported, I think, by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I ask, why should we have a further investigation? As I have said, this question has been under discussion for six years. The Act complained of was passed in 1890, prior to the elections of 1891. It was then more or less discussed throughout the country. It has been discussed from time to time ever since. The Act itself was before the courts—first, before our own courts and afterwards before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—on the question as to whether it was ultra vires or not. The complaints of the minority were discussed then, and they have since been discussed from time to time throughout the country. The question again came up when the appeal was made to the Governor General in Council. So that, after all these discussions, I cannot see what further investigation is required. Let us for a moment look and see what is to be investigated. We have this fact, that down to 1890 the minority were entitled to separate schools under the laws which existed prior to that time. In 1890 the Act in question was passed, by which every vestige of right which the minority had to separate schools was entirely swept away. That is not disputed; nobody pretends that that was not done. What further does the hon. gentleman wish to have investigated? That is what the minority complain of. It is that and that alone that entitles them to come here for a remedy. And Parliament has a right to pass a law that will so far, and so far only as is necessary, remedy that grievance. In proposing to do this, the Government have said, and have said very wisely: "We will remedy the grievance, but we will see also that the schools we establish shall be efficient. We will not re-establish inefficient schools, but will see that the real grievance complained of shall be remedied, and at the same time efficient schools shall be established." A good many people have gone abroad saying that the Government want to bring back the old inefficient schools; but that is not the case. We know that the Catholic minority wish to have their religion taught in their schools. That is a matter which they consider a right—a right which, under the constitution, they enjoyed prior to 1890; and this Bill restores that right, while providing for the efficiency of the schools. Now, why should this question be kept open any longer, a disturbing element in the politics of this country? The sooner it is settled the better. It should be settled now. Parliament should at once, and as quickly as possible, deal with it. That is the great reason for which we met this year, and it would seem unworthy of Parliament to separate and still leave the question open to continue to disturb the country. The reason given by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and some others for delay is that he does not want this or any other Remedial Bill passed because they wish to give no effect to the provisions of the Act for the protection of the minority. Is it a good reason? It is an intelligible reason, but not one which ought to commend itself to any man who has any regard for the rights granted to the minority under the constitution. It is not a reason which should commend itself to any man who feels like legislating fairly between the majority and the minority. Whether rightly or wrongly, the minority have had that right granted to them by the constitution, and it would be unworthy of Parliament, if Parliament were, for one moment, to say: Notwithstanding all that, we will disregard that right, and do away with it; we will treat you as if no such right existed.

That brings us to the question that we have to consider, and I must say that, in discussing it, I am not taking into account my own private opinion with regard to separate schools. I do not feel at liberty to determine the question on that basis at all. I am here to give effect to this provision in the constitution. What is the provision:

In case any such provincial law as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

As I understand that, it means that when a minority have a grievance and appeal for remedy to the Governor General in Council, and when that appeal is allowed, then Parliament is seized with jurisdiction. And what then is the duty of Parliament? Not to legislate originally, if I may so speak, not to legislate according to what the majority may believe should be done if no privilege had been granted by the constitution—it is not for us to say whether there should be separate schools or not, but to decide whether the minority did have separate schools and whether these were improperly taken away from them, whether they were taken away in such a manner that the minority are entitled to come to the Government and ask that their schools be restored. It is for us to consider the question in a judicial capacity, and not from the point of view of personal opinion. It is for us to fairly remedy the grievance of which they complain, and give them back fairly what was wrongfully taken from them. That is the question we have to consider. They come to us and ask us in our judicial capacity—semi-judicial capacity, at all events—to restore to them the separate schools which were guaranteed or continued to them under an express provision of our constitution, and if they prove their case, it is our bounden duty to restore these schools, no matter what our personal opinions may be as to the advisability of having separate schools or not. At all events, that is my opinion. The only limitation on our right of restoring them is as to the extent to which we will restore them. We cannot say that we will not restore them at all, or that we will make them inoperative altogether; but we can decide, because we are the judges in that matter, how far it is necessary to restore them, how far we think they ought to be restored. That, at all events, is the view I have always entertained.

I regret exceedingly that this question should be considered as one of Government policy. It is unfortunate that it has to be considered as a question of party politics. It ought to be outside of and beyond party politics, and should be considered entirely on its merits irrespective of Government policy. Because it is no part of the policy of the Government, but it is a question which has been forced upon the Government, and which it is the bounden duty of the Government to deal with. The minority have a grievance, and they appeal to the Governor General in Council for redress; and if the appeal be well founded, the Government is obliged to allow it. So that it seems to me a question of this kind ought to be outside of party politics, and Parliament should rather consider it from a judicial than a political standpoint. Now, then, what are the merits of the case? Going back to the formation of the province, we find that a certain class of schools was in existence then; and the first question that arises is whether these schools are protected and guaranteed by the constitution itself, so that they could not be affected by any subsequent legislation on the part of the province. I have come to the conclusion, after carefully studying the question, that it was the intention of the parties connected with the negotiations by which Manitoba entered confederation that these separate schools should be continued and secured. It is true that the Privy Council has declared that the Act was not sufficiently strong; but in considering this question, I think we ought to endeavour to discover whether there was sufficient in the negotiations to lead to the conclusion that the parties to them intended, at all events, to secure the continuance of these separate schools. I think I speak correctly when I say that there are only four men living to-day who were then members of the Government. Two of them are in this House, and the other two are the Hon. Mr. Mitchell and Sir Leonard Tilley, I know that the opinion of both Mr. Mitchell and Sir Leonard Tilley is that they intended that the schools then existing in Manitoba should be preserved to the people, and I believe that is the opinion of the two gentlemen who are members of this House.

So that we have that much evidence to go upon; but I go further, and I say that the Act itself is some evidence that they intended to preserve them, that the words in the Act are sufficiently strong to show that the intention was to guarantee and continue these separate schools. Bear with me while I just call attention to this clause:

Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union.

That was with reference to schools that were then in existence, and it differed from the wording of the British North America Act in having the words "or practice" as well as the words "by law." Now, it is a proper rule of construction that when a change in words is made in an Act it is to be presumed that it is done for a purpose. The words "or practice" must have been added for a purpose. That purpose was either to extend or to limit a right. I think the intention was to extend it. These people felt that they had schools there which were in effect separate schools, though, perhaps, not such in the legal sense of the term, and the words "or practice" were specifically introduced to cover the case of those schools. I think that is a fair construction. In further evidence that these schools were intended to be protected though not covered by law was the fact that, as soon as Manitoba became a province of the Dominion, a law was passed establishing these separate schools. I am satisfied that all parties to the negotiations so interpreted the agreement. And the fact is that the schools remained in existence for nineteen years, until 1890, when the Public Schools Act was passed. Then arose the questions as to whether that Act was ultra vires or not, and for the first time it became necessary to give a legal interpretation to the words, "or practice" in this clause. The parties went before the courts, and it is significant that our own Supreme Court unanimously took the view that these schools were guaranteed by agreement embodied in the constitution. I thought I had here the decision of the Supreme Court and regret that I have not it, as I would like to read a portion of the judgment of Chief Justice Ritchie, one of the most eminent jurists that ever sat upon the Canadian bench. But if hon. gentlemen will look up that judgment they will find that the learned chief justice holds that the words "or practice" were words of limitation put in there for a purpose. The minority had not legal separate schools that time but the words "or practice" were put in to cover the case of these schools as they were not covered by law. It is true that that decision was subsequently reversed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and by that decision we must abide. And yet, though it may seem impertinent, I am bound to say that, having read very carefully both the decision of our own Supreme Court and that of the Judicial Committee, in my humble judgment, the reasoning of the former is far more conclusive and satisfactory than that of the learned judges of the Judicial Committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you mean in both cases?

Mr. McLEOD. No, I mean in the Barrett case.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, I thought you overruled the Privy Council altogether.

Mr. McLEOD. I do not overrule it at all, but I venture to give an opinion in which I have heard other members of the bar concur, that the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Canada judgment is more satisfactory than that of the judgment of the Privy Council.

This is important in this way: If it is true that these people thought they had protected their rights prior to confederation, and had failed, if the words they used were insufficient for the purpose and they were therefore without that guarantee of their rights, it seems to me it makes their claim for remedy and relief here, much stronger than if those rights had been acquired altogether after the province became a part of the Dominion. To illustrate, if, before Manitoba became a province of the Dominion this matter had not been thought of, and separate schools had been subsequently established and the Act establishing them repealed years afterwards, I do not think their claim would have been so strong as it is when it is shown that they tried to protect their rights prior to the province being established. So far as their legal right to appeal is concerned, of course that cannot be questioned. That question has been before the courts and there can be no question about it. I never heard anybody seriously put forward the idea that the Governor General in Council was not right in allowing that appeal. Considering the case in a quasi-judicial capacity, and seeing the rights of these people had been entirely swept away. I do not see how they could have decided the case otherwise. Then it is remitted to us. I come back then to the question I referred to some time ago. It is said we are not obliged to pass this legislation. I admit that. But I say there is a moral obligation resting upon Parliament to give back to the minority the rights that were improperly taken away. Then, finding that in 1890 these rights were entirely swept away, rights that they thought were guaranteed to them, rights, in fact, that were given to them by the Act of 1870 and subsequent amending Acts, I say, finding that, it becomes the moral duty of this Parliament to remedy that grievance so far as we can. I know that some hon. gentlemen take a different view. It has been said by the hon. gentleman who last preceded me (Mr. Maclean), that the province of Manitoba was unanimously opposed to this measure. I have also heard it stated that there are men in my own province who are opposed to it, and I presume there are. But on this question, and on all similar questions, I have great confidence in the fair and honest spirit of the electors, which is sure to manifest itself on sober second thought. I think, when this question is fairly presented before the people, they are intelligent enough to understand its merits, and will be disposed to render justice to the minority in Manitoba. I think we may safely go before any intelligent constituency in Canada and say to the electors: Here is the constitution of Manitoba; these rights were guaranteed to the Catholic minority, rights which they believed were guaranteed to them prior to the union, rights which they thought were provided for prior to Manitoba becoming a province; rights that are absolutely fixed and given to them by the law itself of 1870 and amending Acts. But in 1890 these rights were ruthlessly taken away from them, and they were stripped of every vestige of what they supposed was guaranteed to them by the law and the constitution. Under our constitution, an appeal is allowed to an aggrieved minority to the Governor General in Council; that appeal was taken, and immediately thereafter Parliament was seized of jurisdiction, and it then became the moral duty of this Government to give back to the Catholic minority of Manitoba the rights of which they had been deprived. I believe, if these facts are clearly set before the people, there is not a constituency in Canada to which that appeal cannot be successfully made and who would not sanction this legislation. Sir, I intended to speak but briefly on this question, but I thought it my duty to give to Parliament the reasons which will impel me to vote against the amendment and in support of the motion for the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. DEVLIN. I rise for the purpose of explaining, in as few words as possible, the vote which I propose giving in favour of the second reading of the Bill now under discussion. Perhaps, it would be unnecessary for me to offer any explanation, were it not for the fact that my position has been misrepresented by the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) in his speech, delivered some days ago in this House, and also by certain newspapers edited in the interest of the party with which I am allied. The ex-Controller of Customs stated in his speech, that I had changed my position, and, speaking of the interference, as he put it, of the clergy in regard to this question, he said, that their action had made me change my position in connection with the question now before the House. He said:

I am afraid it does strike some in this House, because I remember hearing that the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) who went down to Cape Breton, was one of the loudest there in his desire to resent any attempt at interference.

I asked him, if he had been there, and he answered that he had not, but that he held this upon the authority of a member of Parliament. In answer to that, I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that at no time in the last five years have I spoken against remedial legislation. I could not do so. Five years ago, when I came to this House first, I had occasion to speak, as I thought at all events, in the interest of the minority of Manitoba, and at that time I strongly denounced the Government for not having disallowed what I felt compelled to call the infamous Acts which had been introduced into the Manitoba legislature by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I denounced the Government for not having disallowed those Acts. So that at that time I was in favour of intervention, immediate, direct intervention; and I hardly think it will be possible for me to-day, after having contended for disallowance, to take any other course than to ask the Parliament of Canada to intervene in behalf of the minority in Manitoba. I meet the charge made against me by the ex-Controller of Customs, thus: I did go down to the county of Cape Breton to take part in the contest in which the present hon. Secretary of State was a candidate, and Mr. Murray, of Sydney was the Liberal candidate. I went down there, not because of the position of the school question, but rather as a Liberal, anxious to give aid and assistance to a Liberal friend. The school question did come up; but, Mr. Speaker, you will bear this in mind, that at the time there was no Bill before this House: the present Remedial Bill had not yet been introduced; and, consequently, it was impossible for me to speak against a measure which had not been made known to Parliament. I blamed the Government for not having introduced that Bill, and that was the ground I took. I blamed the Government for having, as I believed, trifled with this very question. Why, Sir, what is the history of this case? We well remember, when the remedial order was issued, the promise was made, in the county of Verchères, I believe that if that order were not complied with by the Manitoba government, a session would be almost immediately called, during which remedial legislation would be passed by the Government. It was about that time, I think, that the then Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) resigned. The real reasons of that resignation have never transpired; Parliament and the country have been left in the dark as to the causes which led up to that resignation. I believe that the cause was, that the then Minister of Justice thought it well, after issuing the remedial order, that an appeal should be made to the people of Canada. Be that as it may, a session was called, and for ten days during that session we expected that a Remedial Act would be introduced. Day after day during those ten days, statements were made by the Government, and day after day the public of this country were left under the impression that an Act would be brought into the House that would do full justice to the minority of Manitoba. One day, however, we were taken by surprise. Three Ministers resigned, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General. They resigned because of this very question. They felt that they could not have that confidence which they should have in their colleagues, because of the refusal of their colleagues to bring in a Remedial Act during that session. Three days afterwards, two of these Ministers returned, and a pledge was made by the leader of the House, that another session, the one which is now going on, would be called, at which an ample measure of relief and of remedial legislation would be proposed by the Government and carried through. The most important of the three, the man whose position stood highest of the three in the province of Quebec could not accept this promise of the Government, and refused to return to the fold of the faithful and accept the portfolio he had resigned. I believe that he knew perfectly well what was transpiring in the inner circles; I believe he knew that the cause of remedial legislation was hopeless in so far as the present Government was concerned. That such was his impression is shown by the fact that notwithstanding the pressure brought to bear on him frequently, he refused at any time to give an expression of opinion in favour of the Government, and he believed that in so far as the present Government were concerned, the cause of remedial legislation was hopeless. Had I not, then, reason to denounce the Government during the campaign in Cape Breton? And, after all, was I doing any worse than members of the Government themselves, when I said that they were not sincere in respect to this measure? I held that belief even then, because of the words uttered by the Secretary of State during that campaign. When the hon. gentleman and his friends came to a Protestant section, very little was said in regard to the school question; when they reached a Catholic section, very much was said in regard to that question, and when they entered upon a section where the population was mixed, they assured the people that the difficulty would be settled in a plain and easy manner. I had my doubts, and consequently I expressed them publicly.

The session was called for the 2nd January. The date was fixed for this memorable session when remedial legislation was to be introduced. The House met on 2nd January. The Speech from the Throne was delivered, and the House adjourned. If my memory deceives me not, to 7th January.

When we met again, what was the declaration made by the Government? Was it that the Remedial Bill was then ready? Were the Government then prepared to go on and pass the legislation which had been promised in the most solemn manner during the previous session? No. We found that the Government were divided. On the one hand there were seven members who opposed the other seven, and there were seven who proclaimed the first seven incapables. This was the situation which confronted us, the cause being, I believe, that these members of the Government could not agree upon the Bill which is before the House to-day. I therefore had difficulty in believing that the Government were perfectly serious in introducing this Bill for remedial legislation. However, the day came and the Bill was introduced, and then at once, and without delay, I expressed my determination to support it, as it is my intention to support it by my vote. I simply wish to correct the impression created by the ex-Controller of Customs in regard to the position which I occupied in Cape Breton on this question. I explained my position there as I do here to-night, and at no time in my life, at least no time during the last five years have I uttered one word against remedial legislation. True, we had not a Remedial Bill before the House, we had promises, oft repeated, promises made in high and low places, promises made by high and ordinary politicians; but the promised Bill did not appear, although the moment it did appear I explained that I would vote for it. I explained that through the press. The first or second day I was in Cape Breton I explained the position of my leader, according to my knowledge as to what his position was. Remember we had no Remedial Bill before the House, and I had the very faintest hope that the Government ever would introduce such a Bill. Finding we had not such a Bill before us, a measure which was to me a long-cherished hope, I explained what the policy of the leader of the Opposition was, namely, that it was a policy to appoint a commission, a policy of investigation. Sir, only a few months ago, I think, three or four months ago, the leader of the Opposition held a meeting in the county which I represent in this House, in that portion which will constitute the county of Labelle. He spoke in the town of Buckingham. I was present at the meeting, and on the platform—and that was three months ago—I then and there declared that if remedial legislation were proposed by the Government I would support the measure. True, I qualified my statement. I said I should like to have a measure that would be, in truth, remedial legislation, and would afford to the minority that relief to which, in my opinion, they were entitled. Although I have not the pleasure of seeing my old friend the ex-Controller of Customs in his seat, I hope he will do me the pleasure and honour of reading the few remarks I have made in regard to his statement concerning my position in Cape Breton. Sir, he also pointed out that the dignitaries of the church had spoken, and consequently we had to bow. All I can say is that I have the highest respect for the bishops of the church to which I belong; and I unhesitatingly declare that when the bishops of the church speak on this question of education, I will listen to them with all possible respect, knowing that by their vocation, by their mission, and by their attainments they are well qualified to speak on this subject. It would be an unfortunate day when, in order to please the ex-Controller of Customs, or any other hon. gentleman who entertains his opinions on this subject, I should speak lightly of the bishops of the church, or receive with disrespect the utterances they might make on the school question. Sir, the hon. gentleman went from Spain to Italy and travelled from one country to another in order to find material with which to assail the Catholic church and the cause of Catholic education. He spoke of the threats and menaces of the Catholic church. Does he imagine for a moment, that we ignore history, even history as it exists in this country? Does he ever hear us recall to him the fact that ministers of his church and the ministers of every Protestant denomination have spoken from the platform on this question in such a way that nothing but a threat could be inferred? Statements made in such a way, Sir, that no other inference could be drawn from their remarks than that if members of this House did not vote as they wished, they would find arrayed against them the Protestant electorate of Ontario. He (Mr. Wallace) drew attention to the utterances of the Catholic bishops. The Catholic bishops of the province of Quebec, aye, and of Ontario, did speak upon this question. And how did they speak? Did they speak in a tone of threat. No, Sir, they did not. They spoke in the form of a petition to the Government some few years ago, asking, praying, that certain amendments, cruel and unnecessary amendments, to the school law, might be disallowed. It was not in the form of a threat. It was not in the form of a menace. It was in the form of a prayer to the Government, and I think that is the only declaration in recent years which we have had from the bishops of the Catholic Church of Canada, speaking collectively, and speaking with authority, on this question. There are no threats, Sir. None have been made by the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church, and no insinuation in that sense can rightly be conveyed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace). He speaks of the state of education in Italy and in Spain. It is unnecessary, in connection with this debate, that any defence should be made of the cause of Catholic education, or of the cause of Catholicity in Spain or in Italy. Sir, we are long accustomed in this country to such attacks. When in the province of Ontario war was made at different elections upon the separate school system, the Roman Catholics of this country had to put up with such attacks. I go this far, and say: that it is by the use of such attacks that the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) has attained eminence in this country—sad and sorrowful eminence, I must say. He denounced the Catholic Church. Has he read the history of his own Canadian home? Has he read the history of Canada? Knows he not, Sir, that there is not one stain upon the Catholic Church, or upon its history in this country, a country of which he expresses himself proud? Does he forget the sacrifices made in the interests of Christianity by the noble missionaries who crossed the ocean and here planted the sign of faith? Does he forget the deeds of Catholic missionaries who brought to the uncivilized the first glad tidings of the gospel; aye, brought them, Sir, at the expense of every comfort, and heedless of every sacrifice possible, sacrifices which few men could make, sacrifices which alone martyrs of their grand noble character could make. That is the history of the beginning of the Catholic Church in this country, and step by step, from that day to this, these missionaries and their successors, and the bishops, have fought for the grand and noble cause of education. Sir, if that hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) wants to know what the Catholic Church has done for education in this country, I will invite him to go into the city of Quebec, and there he will see one of the grandest monuments of education—I will not say in Canada alone, I will not say on this continent of America alone, but one of the grandest educational institutions in the world, the great University of Laval. Side by side with that university he will behold the Seminary of Quebec, and he will see at almost every corner the magnificent educational institutions of which Canadians, whether Catholic or Protestant, have just reason to feel proud. And, Sir, let him come to the city of Montreal, let him come to this very city of Ottawa, let him go where he will, he will find that the Catholic Church, instead of doing harm or damage to the cause of education, is in every way and at every step, and during every day of the year, and during all the days of all the years of our Canadian history, promoting this glorious, humane and ennobling cause. I do not wish to dwell upon this. I speak, perhaps, not with the authority I would like to enjoy in this matter, because I am a Roman Catholic myself, and I may be partial to the faith of which I am proud. But, as a Roman Catholic I cannot allow him (Mr. Wallace) or any other member holding the principles which he does, to insult that grand old faith which has resisted the storms of nineteen centuries, and which to-day is shining forth in every part of the civilized world. I cannot allow him to make such attacks without, at all events, giving him a short answer.

Sir, what is the question before the House? It is not the one exactly to which I have been referring; the question of education in Spain or in Italy, or in those countries which were mentioned by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace). But, Sir, it is the question of the rights of the minority in one of our own provinces. We are told that the minority in Manitoba are making a great mistake in asking this Parliament to intervene. We are told that they should place faith in the spirit of justice and in the generous treatment which would surely be accorded them by the government of Manitoba.

Sir, what is the history of the events connected with that government? What is the source of all the trouble which is to-day disturbing this country? It was in the year 1890 that the trouble first arose. Some time before that, when the Harrison government was in power, an election, as it was told in this House, occurred in St. François-Xavier. The Harrison government had their candidate, and the Greenway government, which succeeded that Harrison administration, the Greenway party, at all events, the Liberal party of Manitoba, had their candidate there present. It was circulated abroad that if the Liberal party in Manitoba came into power the French language would be in danger, Catholic separate schools would be in danger, and every right which they enjoyed might be taken away from them. Then it was, Sir, that the statement was made in St. François-Xavier that it was no part of the programme of the Liberal party of Manitoba to interfere either with the separate school system or with the French language of that province. That promise was made during the election.

An hon. MEMBER. Who made it?

Mr. DEVLIN. Perhaps my friend could tell who made it if he looks in this direction.

An hon. MEMBER. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is not in his seat.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Speaker, the Catholic minority of Manitoba placed faith in the declaration which was then made, and what was the result? Did the province clamour for a change in the separate school system? In 1890 an Act was introduced doing away with Catholic separate schools, notwithstanding the declarations which had been made. Sir, the Roman Catholic minority was deceived, and cruelly deceived, and we are asked now to go and place faith in these gentlemen who then deceived the Catholic minority. I for one have lost faith in them when they broke their own pledge and went back on their own platform. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that was not the only time the Catholic minority have been deceived.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The Government are going back to these very people you despise so much.

Mr. DEVLIN. Does the hon. member interrupt. I would be very glad to hear the interruption.

Mr. BELLEY. Parlez M. Choquette.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The Government are going back to these very people.

Mr. DEVLIN. Well, if the hon. gentleman had waited a little bit, perhaps I would have told him about that, too. At all events, Mr. Speaker, this was the treatment at that time accorded to the Catholic minority. The Act of 1890 was passed, and we know that separate schools were abolished. I should not forget perhaps to mention an instance in connection with this, which may to a certain extent—I won't say justify—but explain the conduct of the Greenway government. During the campaign of 1886 the present member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), speaking at Barrie, referred to the French element as a great danger to the confederation. Some time afterwards he proceeded to Portage La Prairie, and there delivered one of those nice, quiet, calm speeches which he alone can deliver, explaining that the curse of this country was separate schools and that the danger to this country was no doubt the existence of the French language. And I am informed that a member of the Greenway government was present at that meeting; and it was shortly afterwards that we were told that the Acts of 1890 would be introduced. Sir, I make the statement here, that the people of Manitoba—the Protestant majority of Manitoba—never asked that the Catholic minority should be treated as they have been treated during and since 1890. I venture the statement that it was a matter of expediency upon the part of the local government, and not a matter of principle—that that government were simply anxious to retain power, and knew well that a powerful means of retaining power was to appeal to the prejudices of the people of that province, arouse their passions, and stir up their religious feelings. Thus it was that they did retain power, and thus it is that they are to-day very powerful. An hon. gentleman, speaking in this House the other day, said, "Why would you interfere with this system of education, which has the approval of at least nineteen-twentieths of the population of Manitoba?" I have no doubt that it has, because those nineteen-twentieths constitute the Protestant population of Manitoba, which has been aroused against the Catholic minority; and the other twentieth constitutes the feeble Catholic minority. Strange, indeed, if that great and powerful majority, after all the cruel and unwarranted misrepresentations which had been made of the Catholics of Manitoba and of their institutions, would not listen to that appeal, and accord to those gentlemen that confidence which they enjoy. Sir, that was the source of the trouble; that was the point where the whole trouble arose. That was why the public schools were established and the separate schools abolished. We are told to-day that we should not interfere, because interference on our part will constitute coercion of the majority of the province of Manitoba. Bear in mind, I do not think there is a member of this House who will contend, in view of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that we have not the right to intervene. I am not going to-night to read any portion of that judgment, nor is it necessary; and it would be absurd on my part, not being a lawyer, to go into the law of the Manitoba Act bearing on this question. I simply say this, that I think there is hardly a member of this House who will claim that we have not the right to intervene. That we have such right under the constitution has been fully granted by both sides of this House. It is also admitted on both sides of this House that a grievance exists, and that we have the power to remedy that grievance. Of course, a contention is held that it is unwise at the present moment by action on our part to attempt to remedy that grievance. Nevertheless, these two great points stand out before us—that the Parliament of Canada has the right to intervene, and that the Catholic minority of Manitoba have a grievance. All that remains is this: Is it in the interest of that minority that we should interfere? We are told that we do not know the facts. I share not that belief. I know one fact, which is made known to me by the Acts of 1890—that the separate school system in Manitoba has been ruthlessly destroyed. That is the great fact, Sir.

Mr. DUPONT. That is the fact.

Mr. DEVLIN. That is the fact that every man in this House knows who knows anything at all about the history of the province of Manitoba during the last five years. I am wrong in making that statement. In so far as public legislation is concerned, that system has been done away; but the separate schools are there still. They are maintained in Manitoba, because the Catholic parent there holds dear to the right of educating his child. He knows that that child was given to him, not by the state, but by God. He knows that he was given the care of educating and instructing that child and looking after it, and that the state has not the right to exercise any interference with him other than what I might term the interference of the policeman. If the parent wantonly and cruelly neglected that child, then the state could interfere. If the parent taught that child immorality, then the state could interfere. But, Sir, the parent has the right to dictate the form of education his child shall receive. Hence it is we Roman Catholics in Canada are so anxious that our children shall be brought up in the faith to which we belong—not that we are anxious to incur the enmity or hatred or hostility of our Protestant fellow-citizens—not that we bear ill will against them; but because we claim for ourselves what Sir Alexander Galt was bound that his Protestant fellow-citizens in this country should have. That is our position. Why, Sir, it has been pointed out in this House that it was not the Roman Catholics of Canada who struggled so fiercely for separate schools. It has been pointed out that when the great work of confederation was going on, Sir Alexander Galt insisted that the saving clauses with regard to minorities should be put into the constitution in order that the Protestant minority of the province of Quebec should be protected. Sir, from that day to this that minority have enjoyed every right that was conceded to them at that time. Rights have been taken away from minorities in this country; but as a Roman Catholic and as a member representing a constituency of the province of Quebec, I am proud to say here that no Catholic has ever attempted to take from his fellow Protestants any right they have possessed. But I am sorry to say that it was in the province of Manitoba, which should be the home of good feeling,—in that province, which has the promise of such a grand future before it—in that province, for which Canada has spent so much money—that prejudice was stirred up to such a fever heat as to enable the Protestant majority there to crush the Catholic minority, and to rob them of their rights. Sir, I do not ask you to coerce Manitoba. I do not ask that. I would be sorry to ask this Government to coerce Manitoba. What we ask you is that the coercion imposed on us five years ago shall be done away. What we ask is that the chains laid upon us by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) five years ago shall be broken. We should be sorry indeed to ask this Government to coerce Manitoba or any other province. What we ask is that the rights of which we have been robbed—and the term is not too strong—that the rights of which we have been despoiled—those rights which we enjoyed from 1871 to 1890—shall be given back to us. Let me remind you of this, Sir, that this is not a question confined solely to the province of Manitoba. This, it is true, is a question in which, I am glad to say, the minority in Manitoba have the sympathy of innumerable Protestants throughout Canada. I am proud to see that they have spoken on various platforms through their representatives and public men, and in various newspapers, also, they have given expression to feelings of sympathy with the minority in Manitoba. Aye, but I venture to say that to-day in the whole Dominion, from Cape Breton away up to Vancouver, there is not a Catholic home—and I want you to understand that Roman Catholics constitute 42 per cent of the population of Canada—there is not a Catholic home in this country which has not heard of the sufferings to which our fellow Catholics in Manitoba have been subjected. The Catholics of Canada feel that when the Catholics of Manitoba are coerced, it means that the Catholics of Canada are coerced. We are bound together by the ties which have united the members of the Catholic church from the first days of Christianity, we feel in this matter, and we are bound, whether this Parliament will settle the matter or not, to pursue the struggle until the last chain is broken, and until we have acquired our rights; and I say it here, knowing whereof I speak, that the Catholics in Manitoba have the sympathy of the Catholic people of Canada. No, we are not anxious to coerce Manitoba. All that we are anxious for is to be treated as our Protestant fellow-citizens are treated.

Let me put the question to my Protestant fellow-members of this House. What have we done that we should be singled out, as we have been at various times, for misrepresentation and for cruel treatment? Let me ask my fellow Protestant members of this House, if the Catholics have not loyally supported this country, and done all in their power to promote progress and help on the development of Canada. Let me ask this House if it is not true that in 1775 and again in 1812, aye, and at other times, those at the head of the Catholic church have warned their flocks that they must stand by the British constitution, that not only must they seek the protection of the British flag, but that they must see to it that that British flag shall float proudly over this country and continue to be the emblem and the ensign of power in Canada. We obey the laws of this country. We are proud—not of all the laws, not of the Act of 1890—but we are proud of the laws of this country that generally exist. We do our best, we share even in these grand sentiments which are uttered in this House from time to time on the all-important and absorbing subject of loyalty. But let me ask you, Sir, do you imagine that if the Catholics of this country, in the person of the minority of Manitoba, are to be trampled upon, if they are to be outraged, if they are to have no consideration, do you expect that they can be as loyal as they would be if they were treated on the same footing as their Protestant brethren are treated? Why, it was only a short time ago when there was a sign of trouble between England and the United States, and the feeling was abroad that perhaps Canada would be the battle field. Would you not then have been proud to have had our people united, to have had this Canadian people all enthusiastic in the defence of British power? And do you imagine for a moment that you are going to render that enthusiasm certain by trampling, in the name of British fair-play and in the name of British law and British justice, upon 42 per cent of that population? It is impossible. I see the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) smile—the man who was ready to carry war into the very heart of Great Britain if justice were done to Ireland—that representative who spoke the other day of the condition of the schools in Ireland, and who was most anxious that five millions of the Irish people shall not obtain home government for no other reason than this, that he is afraid to confide to the majority the care of the minority, that he is afraid that the educational rights enjoyed by the minority might, perhaps, suffer at the hands of the majority, if that majority were to obtain power. And sooner than see such a thing consummated, he was ready, sword in hand, to go across and give his aid to disrupt the Empire.

Mr. DEVLIN. I do not believe the hon. gentleman is a Fenian. The Fenian in his opinion may be a desperate man, but I put him even ahead of the hon. gentleman. I do not think that any Fenian in Canada—if there be any Fenian in Canada—or any man enjoying the protection of our law and the advantages given to this country, would go across to wage war against England and Her Majesty in her declining years.

Sir, I propose to vote in favour of this Bill, because I believe in the right of intervention and because I believe that intervention is necessary. Why, I was astonished when I heard that the Government were going to invite the Premier of Manitoba in order to treat with him again. Over and over again, Mr. Greenway has said, through his Attorney General, Mr. Sifton, through the "Tribune," and through every possible means of communication, that it is out of the question to restore separate schools in Manitoba, and I am sorry, indeed, that he should be again approached. I say that he has treated this Government with contempt, that he has treated the Parliament of Canada with contempt, and that he has treated the Privy Council of England with contempt. I say that his contempt for the Government and the Parliament of Canada is almost equal to his contempt for the minority in Manitoba. He has been approached in every possible way. He was approached by Catholic deputations in Manitoba, and he treated them with scant courtesy, indeed. He was approached by Catholic members; he was approached by Mr. Prendergast, who was the representative of the Catholic minority in his Government, and who, rather than lend himself to the piece of treachery which was performed in 1890, gave up office. He was approached by Mr. Prendergast many times, and strong appeals were made to him on behalf of the Catholic minority, but in vain. He was approached by means of the remedial order, and that order he treated with contempt. He was approached again by means of the second message sent in July, and that message he treated with contempt. Why, every request made by the Government or Parliament has been treated with contempt, and I confess I am sorry indeed that it should be thought necessary to go on the knee again before this high and mighty gentleman. I vote for the Bill because we have the right to intervene, and because it is absolutely necessary that this Parliament should intervene. I have no hope of justice from Mr. Greenway or his Government. I know his past history. I know what we have received from him and his friends in the past, and I cannot hope for any other treatment in the future than what he gave us in the past. I vote for the principle of this Bill because it declares the right of the minority to separate schools, and God forbid that the day should ever come when, in this House, or out of it, holding the belief which I do, I should refuse to vote in favour of the principle of restoring to the Catholic minority, separate schools. There are certain clauses in this Bill which are, in my opinion, imperfect. I regret that such clauses should be found in it. But, Sir, if I give this vote in favour of the Bill, it is because that, in my opinion, we should intervene, that there is a necessity to interfere, that minorities have rights in this country, as well as majorities, that the rights of the minority should be protected and because this Parliament alone can protect that minority. The cause of the minority in Manitoba is unpopular. I am sorry to say, it has been rendered unpopular by means of falsehoods circulated by gentlemen supporting the Greenway government there. It has been rendered unpopular by the misrepresentations concerning them at all times. It has been rendered unpopular by the crusade made by the ex-Controller of Customs himself. No man denies the power which that hon. gentleman holds in this country. He is at the head of a numerous and powerful institution. You doubt his power. Did not the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) tell you of the scalps that the ex-Controller of Customs had brought back; and, if there were necessity for it, the hon. gentleman could prove that history in this matter would repeat itself. He has a large following at his back, I know, and at all times he has engaged in special pleading against the Catholic minority in Manitoba. I myself, Sir, felt that faith could not be placed in the Government in regard to the settlement of this question, when I saw that hon. gentleman retain his position in the Government even up to the very last moment. But, at all events, that day is gone. He is out of the Government, and the Bill is on the Table. And, moreover, he and I stand in the same relation as before—he is voting on one side and I am voting on the other. I wish to say in concluding my remarks, that I do not consider the Bill perfect; there are many clauses in it to which I take serious objection. But when we reach, if we ever do reach, the happy day of committee, amendments can be made in the Bill, and I feel confident, that, if the amendments are sound and in accordance with the principle of justice and fair-play, the Government will accept them. I have that much confidence in them.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. DEVLIN. Some hon. gentleman is astonished that I should have confidence in the Government. But I must tell him, that I had not that confidence until the Bill was on the Table. Now, he must let me enjoy a few days of happiness and peace and indulge my confidence in the Government. I will support all amendments that seem to me good, and I will do all in my power to make the Bill one which will correct the injustice that has been done to the minority.

Sir, I have been charged, in connection with the vote which I am to give in support of this Bill, with being a traitor to my party. I resent that. I do not think, that that charge will be brought against me by my Liberal friends in this House, nor will it be brought against me by those Conservative members who know me. I know, that I am doing myself a great injury personally by the vote I am giving.

An hon. MEMBER. How is that?

Mr. DEVLIN. How is that? asks the hon. gentleman. He has only to read certain articles appearing in prominent Liberal newspapers, to learn. Why, Sir, I have received remonstrances from every quarter, explaining to me exactly the position which I occupy in connection with this matter. I am sorry indeed to be obliged to vote against my party. But, after all, I am sure my party will not bear me such malice, when it is a vote only against an amendment, an amendment for the six months' hoist. Surely, I shall not create that feeling that will cause my Liberal friends to turn against me. I wish to be in sympathy with the Liberal party, and, when this question will have been disposed of, I am quite sure that I shall be in sympathy with my party. I have worked in the interest of that party as hard as I could and as well as I knew how. Thirteen years ago I first stood upon the public platform, and, from that day to this, I have been bending my energy to the service of the Liberal party. And, when certain papers in this country tell me, that I am a traitor to my party, I throw the charge back upon them. I give this vote because I believe I am doing my duty, and in obedience to my conscientious convictions. I give this vote because I believe I am working in the interests of the minority. I give this vote because I am in favour of separate schools, and because of the fact, that those who are suffering to-day could get no protection from the government of Manitoba, and have to come to the Government of Canada to ask for, and, I hope, obtain, that protection. I give this vote because I believe it is in the interest of Canada that this question should be settled now, and that its settlement should not be retarded. I believe we have had trouble enough over it. I believe there has been animosity long enough over this question, and my prayer to-night is, that Protestant and Catholic in this country may join hands over this subject which has separated them so long, and may see to it that minorities shall receive justice. My prayer is, that a lesson may be taught, that who ever shall strain the constitution, or destroy the constitution, to attack a minority, be that minority Catholic or Protestant, will find that the strong arm of the law can reach him, will find the flag of Britain floats here not in vain, but that it gives that protection which gentlemen here so often make their boast it does, the protection that every British subject should enjoy.

Mr. MARTIN. I hesitated, Mr. Speaker, to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I desire to say that, so far as he charged me with getting or seeking the support of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba by promises and afterwards going back upon those promises, his statements were entirely inaccurate, and without any basis of fact, and that the only evidence that can be offered in support of any such statement is to be found in the affidavits published in the Government's blue-book, which I have never had the opportunity to correct—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, and which are untrue.

Mr. DEVLIN. I simply wish to repeat the statement I made. The statement I made was that the hon. gentleman had declared that it was no part of the Liberal programme to interfere with the French language or with the religious institutions of the minority. That was my statement, and I hold to it.

Mr. MARTIN. It is not true.

Mr. O'BRIEN. No one in this House, I think, will be inclined to doubt the sincerity of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I believe that he has spoken with and possesses the full courage of his convictions. Nor will I for one question even the propriety of his language, even though in some respects it was rather warm and excited, but that was natural and to be expected. But there are one or two statements that he made to which I desire to refer briefly, and one of them was with reference to the possible attainment of any compromise by means of a conference with Mr. Greenway. Sir, I think the language used by the hon. gentleman and the manner in which it was received by a number of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, render it tolerably certain that the childish proposal which was laid before us a day or two ago by the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches will meet with the fate which I think it richly deserves. I think it can only confirm the conclusion of hon. gentlemen in this House and of people throughout the country, that there is nothing sincere or honest about it, that it was simply a dodge to accomplish one or two objects, either, as was stated this afternoon, to force the supporters of the Government to vote, or rather give them an excuse for voting for the second reading, on the pretext that after the second reading was accomplished, then they would so modify the Bill that they might reasonably support it. Well, Sir, such a proposition is about equivalent to the intelligence which seems to actuate some hon. gentlemen who imagine, from reports that are going about the House, that they can save the Government by voting against the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), and then save their own skins by voting against the second reading of the Bill afterwards. Now, those two ideas are just about on a par; one is about as unreasonable and unlikely to lead to any practical results as the other. Sir, the hon. gentleman spoke with perhaps justifiable warmth on behalf of the system of education to which he is attached. Unfortunately the facts are against him; unfortunately the census returns, which have never been questioned, so far as I am aware in that particular, show that under the system of education he so warmly admires, the province of Quebec stands lowest in the scale of all the provinces of this Dominion. Certainly evidence has been adduced to prove that so far as the twenty years experience in the province of Manitoba goes, the results there of the separate school system were sadly inadequate to the necessities and requirements of the people, and far inferior to the results produced by the system of education which was in force in the other schools. Now, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. McLeod) treated us to some very extraordinary arguments. When the judgment of the Privy Council did not suit him, he swept it aside as a piece of bad law, and preferred to rest his case upon the judgment of the Supreme Court; but when the judgment of the Privy Council did suit him, then he wanted to carry it a great deal further than anybody else ever thought of doing. He strained the doctrine as to the necessity of obeying the remedial order, further than either the introducer of the Bill had done, or any one who has spoken with regard to it. Sir, when an hon. gentleman professing to belong to the legal profession makes the statement that that judgment was binding and compelled this House to act, whether it would or not, it is hardly worth while to argue with him upon the subject. Now, the hon. gentleman who moved the second reading of this Bill spoke with more than usual accuracy of statement and with more than his usual moderation of language, when he said that the importance of this Bill transcended that of any measure of legislation previously introduced into this House. Well, Sir, that statement was true, and why? Not because the Bill possesses any merits of its own, not because the Bill is one which can be of any practical value for those in whose behalf it is introduced, but because of its mischievous purpose; because not of its value for good, but because of its capacity for mischief; and because, as has already been said in this House, it settles nothing and unsettles everything; still more, because of its ultimate results upon the future of this country, which have also been so fully described and so ably pointed out that it seems almost an impertinence to again refer to these matters. But I do not deny the importance of this Bill, even as stated in the language of the hon. gentleman who introduced it. If this Bill is important—again I am afraid I am repeating language that has already been used in this House in better terms than I can use it—how much more necessary was it that it should be dealt with by a House in the full vigour of its age, and not in the last hours of its decrepitude, not in the dying hours of a dying session when a few weeks, at any rate, must see the end of it, and not by a Parliament, many of whose members can no longer be said to be responsible to the people. Sir, there is another remark that I wish to make, and to which I desire to call the attention of the leader of the Opposition. The statement has been made, in answer to an observation from an hon. gentleman, that this House is not even complete in itself, that even old, decrepit and dying as it is, it is still wanting in numbers, and that there are three constituencies which ought to have a voice in settling a matter of this kind, that are unrepresented; and the public and the House naturally want to know how it is that they are unrepresented. Well, Sir, the insinuation was made that it was by virtue of an arrangement between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition. Now, I would like the leader of the Opposition, if he will do me the courtesy of paying attention to what I am saying, to answer the insinuation that he was a party to any arrangement by which the constitution of this country should be so violated, and whether he is a party to an arrangement by which three constituencies are unrepresented in this House; because if so, certainly parliamentary government has come to an extraordinary pass in this country. However, be that as it may, I will simply repeat the argument which, as I say, has already been fully stated in this House, that it is not by a decrepit and dying Parliament that a question of this importance should be discussed; it is not by a Parliament, many of whose members have ceased to be responsible to the people, that this question ought to be decided. Now, Sir, as a question of practical value, let us examine this Bill a little. The hon. gentleman who moved the second reading thought to influence this House by quoting the opinion of a distinguished educationalist, Sir William Dawson. Well, Sir, as to the practical value of this Bill, I could reply by quoting the opinion of another distinguished educationalist, Principal Grant, of Queen's University, Kingston. I am unable to lay my hands on the paper containing the opinion of Dr. Grant, but I imagine most hon. members have read it. He points out that the very initial stage connected with carrying out this Bill, if passed, could not be accomplished, simply because there would be no money even to lease a room in which the committee could sit, no money to pay the necessary officials, that therefore the very first step towards carrying out this law could not be accomplished, because no means were provided whereby this could be done. If that is the case I need not go further into the merits of the Bill—it is quite sufficient to show how valueless it is from any practical point of view.

The hon. gentleman spoke about the importance of this measure. On many occasions Acts of provincial legislatures have been disallowed by the executive authority, but this is the first time that the Parliament of the Dominion has undertaken to interfere in the legislation of a province with respect to a subject clearly admitted to be within its jurisdiction, and to accomplish that by means which seem to prevent, according to the best opinions, any possibility of alteration. If the Governor General disallows an Act of the Provincial legislature, if there is anything lacking in any essential point, the Bill can be re-enacted, or perhaps the circumstances which gave rise to the disallowance ceased to exist, as was the case with respect to the attempt made to coerce Manitoba with respect to railway legislation. But when we come to pass a Bill like this under consideration there is no possibility of remedying any evil which may be found to exist. The provincial legislature cannot repeal or amend an Act of this Parliament, and it is questioned by some of the best authorities whether this Parliament has not exhausted its power on this subject when it has passed this Act, and no further legislation in regard to it can be enacted. There is one thing very certain, and it is that after the adoption of this Act, it will be very hard to find a Government bold enough to undertake to discharge any such duty as this Government has undertaken.

If this Bill has no practical value it possesses importance of a very serious character in another direction. We have the opinions given by hon. gentlemen who are anxious to see this Bill passed, to have remedial legislation adopted, and we find that those hon. gentlemen are entirely opposed to the Bill because it has no practical value. We find the passing of the Bill will accomplish nothing. It will not please the hierarchy, who have demanded it, because they regard the Bill simply as a stepping-stone to further legislation. What does that mean? It means a continuance of this agitation, that what we are doing now is not, as hon. gentlemen desire, a final settlement of the question; it is simply setting a stone rolling which will continue to roll for years to come, and the results we cannot foresee.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is the beginning of it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Yes. While this Bill does not satisfy the hierarchy, it is naturally opposed by those who think that no public funds should be devoted to further the ends or interests of any particular denomination or church. It does not satisfy the minority of Manitoba, but it renders the majority still more hostile to any proposal which might be made for the advantage of the minority. So in every possible way it antagonizes every interest which might otherwise serve the minority, while it gives the minority no possible advantage. Instead of bringing peace, it will bring the sword of discord in a variety of ways; it will excite animosities without settling the law; it will give rise to frequent and continued agitation, and not only agitation such as is carried on on the platform, but it will lead to contests in the courts.

I have a still more decided objection to this Bill than any that has yet been taken. I object to this Bill because it legislates for a minority. The time has come when this doctrine of legislating for a minority should cease in this country. It is the bane of our constitution that instead of treating the whole population of the country as a homogeneous population which ought all to be under the same law, we have adopted the rule of legislating for a minority, and having entered on that mischievous and dangerous course, it is difficult to escape it. I oppose this Bill because it legislates for a minority, and therefore, the very first line, in my opinion, condemns it. When we come to look at the Bill itself, we find that as regards the appointment of a separate school board of education the only qualification provided is that the members shall be Roman Catholics. There is not a single safeguard of the interests of the minority as regards the educational status of those through whom the instruction is to be procured; in fact there is nothing in that regard such as is contained in every Bill dealing with the education of the people. The simple qualification of members of the board, that will have entire control over the schools, is that they shall be Roman Catholics. Can hon. members imagine a system logically more objectionable, first, recognizing that the minority are to be legislated for altogether irrespective of the rights of the majority, and when we come to carry out the measure in its practical details the only qualification required of those who are to carry out the law is that they are to be members of the particular church interested in its legislation. To go into details is unnecessary. If we ever pass the second reading, the time for the consideration of details will come. But supposing it does come and we do go into committee on the Bill, then the practical defects will be so apparent that the authors will be very sorry they ever introduced the measure as it is pregnant with mischief and devoid of any practical results. The great argument that has been used throughout the whole of the discussion—it was used by the Minister of the Interior, it was specially used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and it was used by the introducer of the Bill—is based on the old exploded theory that justice is to be done to the minority of Manitoba because justice was done to the minority in the province of Quebec. It seems almost impossible to eradicate the erroneous ideas that prevail on this subject. There is no analogy whatever between the two cases. Surely at this day it is not necessary to point out to hon. members that the public schools so-called in the province of Quebec, are sectarian schools. Surely it is not necessary to point out what an outrage it would be to compel the Protestants of any denomination to attend schools in which doctrines were taught to which they were opposed. Even were it otherwise, it is not worth while to go into the question, because it rests on totally different grounds, and whatever advantage was given to the Protestant minority in Quebec was amply repaid by the privileges given the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario, and those rest on Acts of Parliament, on our constitution, with which we have no power to interfere.

So far as that is concerned, the argument is absolutely valueless, and must fail of effect. I trust it will not be necessary to refer again to that subject. No analogy had ever been shown to exist between the two. Now, Sir, with regard to the question as it stands before the House to-day. We have on the one side the declaration, that more information is sought for. Well, Sir, from my point of view, as I said on a previous occasion, I want no information. I am prepared to oppose this Bill because it is in every respect objectionable in principle. It matters not to me how far in detail it is objectionable, or how far in other respects it may be advantageous, for I am opposed to any legislation whatever upon this subject. But, Sir, those who desire to legislate, whether they are those among the Quebec Liberals who would like to see some advantage given to their fellow-subjects in Manitoba, or whether they are Conservatives who are determined to give these advantages, we have enough evidence from the discussion which has taken place in this House, to show, that the contention of the Opposition is unanswerable, and that no practical statesman would attempt to legislate upon a subject on which they are—I will not say, confessedly ignorant—but on which they have been shown to be ignorant. To attempt to legislate under the circumstances is a piece of presumption. If hon. gentlemen wish to legislate upon this question, surely they ought to understand the subject upon which they are to legislate, and it has been shown by remarks made in the course of this debate, that ignorance does prevail on the matter, even among hon. gentlemen who have given the subject some consideration. That is an unanswerable argument, why gentlemen who wish to legislate upon this subject, should ask for delay. It proves that they are consistent in opposing the second reading of this Bill. I say, that the Opposition are perfectly consistent and logical in the course they have taken. Some of them are not opposed to legislation. But they cannot accept this legislation, which they see is evidently valueless, and they do not wish to attempt to legislate without knowing what they are going to legislate upon. The same remark applies with still greater force to those who are forcing this Bill through the House. I say, that the course of the Opposition is just as reasonable and logical as is my own course, when I say, that I intend to resist this legislation, being opposed as I am, to separate schools. That, however, is not the real issue before the House. If the Manitoba government wish to establish separate schools, they have a perfect right to do so, and I, for one, would not interfere. But I maintain, that we should not compel them to do so against their will, and especially should this House not compel them to do so, when it is ignorant of the whole subject. There is no inconsistency nor divergence on the part of those men who vote for this amendment because they are opposed to legislation altogether, nor is there inconsistency on the part of those who vote for the amendment, who think that legislation is desirable, who yet are unwilling to accept useless and valueless legislation, and who are in favour of thoroughly understanding the subject. Many of those hon. gentlemen have also a reasonable hope, that, if the matter is left where it ought to be left, namely, to the provincial authorities, then, if grievances exist, these grievances will be ameliorated. Now, Sir, we have arrived at a most extraordinary state of this most extraordinary proceeding, and of all the blunders which have been committed by this babyish, blundering Government, from first to last, this is the most glaring, this childish attempt to get over the difficulty in an indirect way, through the mediation of an hon. gentleman (Sir Donald Smith), not of the Government, asking Mr. Greenway to come down here and do what he has repeatedly said he will not do. Blunders enough have been committed, promises enough have been made, which never could have been fulfilled, and which, I believe, never were intended to be fulfilled, because, when many of these promises were made, in the earlier part of these proceedings, those who made them thought they had a reasonable method of escape from the dilemma in the judgment that might be given by the courts. Undertakings have been entered into, out of which it was hoped a similar method of escape might be found, and at last the Government had to come face to face with the question. What is the result? The Conservative party is rent asunder; the Government is broken up and practically dissolved. Such a disruption of the Conservative party has been brought about that all the talents and ability, such as it is, on the Treasury benches, will not be able to heal it, either by this measure or by anything that will follow it. Under these circumstances, while the Bill is practically valueless, while it does not do what it pretends to do, it has done immense mischief already, and is pregnant with untold mischief in the future. I, for one, feel that I am justified in voting in favour of the amendment, and in opposing the Bill in every possible way it can be opposed. So far as my voice and vote are concerned, the people of Manitoba shall never be troubled with having to resist the operation of a Bill to which they are opposed, and which, if passed, they must either submit to at the risk of all kind of confusion in their own laws, or else place themselves in the position of rebels against the Dominion authority. Opposition is due to this Bill, no matter from what point of view I regard it. Opposition is due to it from the Conservative party, because, as has been well said by the member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) he, as a Conservative, does not want to see the Conservative party tainted with the reproach of having coerced the province of Manitoba, as this Bill proposes to do.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). What is the good of that, if, as you say, the Conservative party is torn asunder.

Mr. O'BRIEN. We will have a better idea of the good of it by and by. The Conservative Government is in the position of the king who ruled but did not govern. That is the position of the present Administration. It has one policy to-day and another to-morrow. It is so weak that its members had to send for one of their own servants to lead them, a thing unheard of before in political history. It is so weak, that with a majority of sixty in this House, they could not find a man capable of controlling the Cabinet. It is so weak that when six of its members resigned and were taunted as traitors, they were pusillanimous enough to go back again when they found that if they did not go back, a Government could be formed without them. Under these circumstances, it ill-becomes any one to talk about the Conservative party. There was a time when the Conservative party had power in this country. There was a time when the Conservative party had a Government whose followers were not ashamed of it. That day has gone by. It may return—I hope it will some day—but at the present moment, it is little consolation that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House can find, by looking at the personnel or the character of those who now administer their affairs. Holding these views, Sir, I shall vote most heartily and resolutely against every process by which it may be attempted to carry this Bill into law.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) I have attentively listened to the utterances of hon. members on both sides of this House on the Manitoba school question, a problem which is of the utmost interest to the citizens of this country. I hope, Sir, that the Bill now before the House will be placed upon the statute-book, as promised by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the Prime Minister, in July last. I give credit to the Government for having so nobly redeemed their pledge on that vital issue. I intended to take part in the Budget debate, but at this advanced stage of the session, being apprehensive lest that would impede the progress of the debate on the present Bill in which such interests are involved, I made up my mind to postpone to another year the remarks I intended to make on that subject. On the school question public attention is now riveted. Well, Sir, I say that if we wish to make this Canada of ours a great and prosperous country, it is absolutely necessary that racial and religious questions should be thrust into the back ground. I have the honour to represent here a constituency composed of Protestants and Catholics alike, and all classes live in peace and harmony together. I know that the English-speaking citizens in my constituency entertain liberal views upon the school question, and should I cast my vote against the Government Bill, I am positive that they would be sorely disappointed. I have been brought up in their midst; I am intimately acquainted with them, and I have but encomiums to bestow upon them, as regards their dealings with their French-Canadian fellow-citizens. There is an entente in the constituency which I represent and which has been created over thirty years ago. The English-speaking element send a representative of their own nationality to the Quebec legislature, and the French-speaking voters select a man of their own race to represent them here. That agreement has always been strictly adhered to. That goes to prove that the English-speaking voters in my constituency are broad-minded and like fair play. The same remark holds good with respect to our municipal affairs. In the parish where I live, there are but from twenty-five to thirty English families; still we allow them a representative in the municipal council. In the county council, with a population, the three-fourths of which are of French-Canadian origin, we allow the English minority to appoint the warden every second year, alternately with the French-Canadians. That, again, shows that we mean to be just and fair towards the Protestant minority. I have been accused in my constituency and by the Liberal papers in the province of Quebec, of being a traitor to my race, because I voted, in 1893, against Mr. Tarte's motion on the Manitoba school question. Now, I may say that the motion of the hon. member for L'Islet was a motion against which I could well afford to cast my vote, owing to the fact that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) voted for it. These hon. gentlemen could never agree; one of them said that the Government were bound to interfere, while the other held the very opposite opinion. Now, Sir, I stated, at the time, that the motion of the hon. member for L'Islet was not worth the paper it was written on, and that it would not promote the interests of the Catholic minority. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) wrote editorially in his paper, "Le Cultivateur," in March, 1895, the following article:—

The Catholic minority has been struggling these five years past against the unjust laws which the Federal Government have it in their power and are bound to disallow.

French Canadians in the west have, within the last five years, lost their school system and been deprived of the rights of using the French language.

The Dominion Government have allowed fanaticism free scope.

Now, the Imperial Privy Council drives the Government to their last entrenchment, and force them to take action.

But what could Messrs. Bowell, Angers, Caron, and Ouimet do in presence of the Imperial Privy Council?

So long as they could back down, elude their responsibility, avoid coping with the difficulties, they did so.

One day they found themselves shut in, and entrapped into their own nets! They were forced to move on!

The hon. member has changed his mind since that time. He then stated that the Government were bound to exercise their power of interference without delay; and that delay was fraught with danger, and now he is opposed to intervention in any shape. In the course of a speech delivered here, the hon. member stated further that the educational system of the province of Quebec was below the standard. Well, Sir, let me ask the hon. gentleman how it comes that at the great World's Fair, held in Chicago, the province of Ontario received only fifty-four awards, while the province of Quebec received seventy-two? His object,

Sir, is to belittle the country for the benefit of his own party. They say that the hierarchy should abstain from interfering in active politics. I believe, Sir, that under the present circumstances the clergy should interfere, because this is no mere political or party question. The trouble is that the Liberal party have made it a purely political issue. The hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh, but they cannot gainsay it. I may here, Sir, say a word in connection with what the clergy have done for the country; for instance, they have materially helped the colonization of the country, and they have also exercised a beneficial influence in the field of education and have contributed to the aggrandizement of the nation. I consider that it would be very unfair to deny that enlightened class of citizens the right to express their opinion as to the party which is the best qualified to administer the affairs of the country. I know that my hon friends opposite are not over-confident that the opinion of the clergy is favourable to their party. Mr. Speaker, where is now that great champion of the Manitoba separate schools, the hon. member for L'Islet? Where does he stand upon that question? When that great upholder of the Catholic schools was satisfied that the Government had decided to introduce the Manitoba School Bill, he was the first to declare himself in favour of a commission of inquiry, which was but a means of shelving the Bill and putting it off for another year. On the other hand, his leader moves the six months' hoist, which is but another way of killing the Bill. The hon. gentlemen opposite have declared before the country that never would the Government pass their Remedial Bill, and it was with that platform that they succeeded in carrying several elections. Had the hon. leader of the Opposition told us at least that the day he could come into power, he would introduce a Remedial Bill in favour of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, we might have accepted that pledge. But on the contrary, Sir, the hon. gentleman declined to pledge himself; he lost himself in the clouds. The hon. gentlemen want to ride into power over that issue, at the next general elections. They want to make it subservient to their party interests, and nothing else. They are in hopes, were it not settled now, of carrying the next elections, on that issue. In its issue of the 7th instant, the Quebec "L'Electeur" tried to attenuate the disastrous effect, by publishing an elaborate editorial, commenting upon an article from the Toronto "Globe" against federal interference in Manitoba school affairs.

The "Globe," we may remark, is of opinion that our co-religionists are aggrieved. But, as our contemporary remarks, any attempt at interference ought to be avoided, for it would be the signal for a long and bitter struggle, the extent and gravity of which it would be difficult to foretell. Would it not be a wiser policy to make further attempts at having the evil remedied by the very authority who is responsible for it? The contemplated object would thus be reached without any friction.

The article winds up with an appeal to the Manitoba government to condescend to set at rest the dispute, by making the necessary concessions to Catholics.

We do not approve of the position taken by the "Globe." Our contemporary has, no doubt, allowed its judgment to be swayed by the cries and threats of the sectarian element of the province. Our contemporary has felt that it was in the interests of our party to make certain concessions previous to the monster Tory meeting, called together for next Monday at Toronto.

As will be seen from the above, the organ of the Ontario Protestants and of the Reform party is opposed to separate schools, and deprecates federal interference. On the 7th of March, 1895, "L'Electeur" said:

The public still recollect, no doubt, the commotion created by the "Globe's" editorial a fortnight ago. The "Electeur" published at the time the article in question. The great Liberal organ, although it recognizes the injustice perpetrated upon the Catholic minority, was of opinion that further attempts should be made at having the Manitoba government remedy the evil for which they are responsible.

While we are grateful to the "Globe" for its advocacy of the rights of our co-religionists, we gave expression at the time to our dissent from the suggested mode. The Federal Government, as we remarked, ought simply to comply with the judgment of the Privy Council, and pass the Remedial Bill, enforcing it without either the intervention or the aid of the Manitoba government.

For our part, we decline to compromise. The "Electeur" is of opinion that from the refusal of the Manitoba government to surrender, last year, from the attitude taken by them before the Privy Council of Canada, through their counsel, Mr. McCarthy, there is no longer any hope to be entertained from that quarter, and that the time has come to force the central power to interfere and do justice to the minority.

Whatever may be the influence and position of the "Globe," the "Electeur," we think, in giving expression to these views, is as much the representative of Mr. Laurier and of the Liberal party as any Ontario journal.

Now, what do we see, Sir? "L'Electeur" advocates what the "Globe" to a certain degree advocated, and it declares now against what he advocated at the last session. Then, according to "L'Electeur," it was necessary to pass a Remedial Bill without delay. Now, it charges the Government with proceeding with undue haste. The hon. gentlemen ask for a commission of inquiry, but what do they want an investigation for? The Liberals only want the question to be investigated, or rather wanted so. The hon. leader of the Opposition moves now the six months' hoist, without any further investigation. As to the Conservative party, we want the Manitoba government to modify their law. We want the Catholic minority to be restored to their former state previous to 1890. We want a Bill restoring to the minority the rights guaranteed by the constitution. Nobody calls in question the fact that, from 1870 to 1890, the Catholic minority had their separate schools; and that, under the constitution, prior to 1890, those schools were separate. Those facts have been recognized by the judgment of the Imperial Privy Council, the highest tribunal in the Empire. Nobody calls in question the fact that the Greenway government, through their law of 1890, have taken away from the Catholic minority their separate schools, and set up in their stead public and Protestant schools. Nobody calls in question the fact that petitions have been sent in by the Catholic minority, praying for the restoration of the separate school system, and that their demand was denied by the Greenway government. The Liberals are quite aware of those facts. We should not lose sight of the Blake-Laurier motion, adopted in 1890, aimed at providing the means whereby the Government might be empowered to refer questions of law or fact, in educational matters, to the judicial tribunals, previous to exercising their right of interference. With the consent of Archbishop Taché, the question was submitted to the courts. I happened to meet Archbishop Taché in 1891, and he told me that the best means of finally settling the question was by appealing to the tribunals for a decision on the matter. Had the Government disallowed the law of 1890, Archbishop Taché told me that the Greenway government would have re-enacted it. I do not rely now on bogus statements. I do not resort to the argument used by the hon. member for Lotbinière, last night. My authority is Archbishop Taché himself who made the statement I have just given, on the 11th April, 1891.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him? Let me read to the House what Archbishop Taché says. Page 107 of his pamphlet of 1893:

The minority in Manitoba and myself were charged with great responsibility for having allowed such a course to be taken. The fact is, my own attitude has been so absolutely passive in the matter, that I knew nothing of it until it was entirely settled and the counsel had been chosen for the case. The idea of this mode of action originated with the Government at Ottawa, who decided upon it after Mr. Blake's resolution had been adopted. The Barrett case is not my doing. More than that, I dare say that it might have resulted in quite a different way if my views had prevailed. I do not understand why the minority are charged with its responsibility, as the Premier, in a public meeting in Montreal, on 12th September last, stated: "I am ready to admit it, as I have always admitted in Parliament, the case was laid before the tribunal by the Government, in order to obtain a decision which would settle the affair by judicial proceedings."

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) That is perhaps a portion of the spurious documents you read to the House the other day?

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) That statement will be found, page 107 of the pamphlet published by Archbishop Taché on the Manitoba school question.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) Archbishop Taché was always in favour of a Remedial Bill, and I believe that the Liberal party, on that point, do not want to defer to the wishes of Archbishop Taché. The Archbishop appealed to all the judicial tribunals. The first appeal was taken to the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench, and the case was lost. Then an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the Court unanimously reversed the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. It was believed at the time that no further proceedings would be taken. The majority in Manitoba, however, took the appeal to the Privy Council of England, and their lordships reversed the judgment of the Supreme Court. Then the only course left open to the minority was to appeal to the Governor General in Council on the ground of justice and equity. Who supplied the necessary funds to carry the appeal to the Privy Council? It was the Conservatives who gave Mr. Ewart $8,000 to defray the judicial costs in England. Such was the help proffered to the minority by those very same Conservatives, who for several years, have been condemned for the course pursued on the Manitoba school question. Now, they charge the Government with not having disallowed the Act of 1890. Disallowance would have proved of no avail, for the Greenway government would have re-enacted it as often as it had been disallowed. The Government whom I have the honour to support have promised to pass a remedial law, as soon as the Privy Council would have rendered a decision in favour of the minority. That judgment was sent to the Federal Government in February, 1895, and an Order in Council was forthwith sent on to the Manitoba government asking for a reply no later than the 11th May, 1895. The answer was a fiat denial. The Manitoba government declined to interfere. There was no other alternative left than for the Federal Government to pass a remedial law. That law was to have been passed during the last session, but Mr. Greenway's answer having been received at the end of the session, the Government thought it best to put it off to six months, the passing of the law. Here is the statement made in the House, at the latter part of last session by the hon. leader of the House:

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the Government has had under its consideration the reply of the Manitoba legislature to the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, and, after careful deliberation has arrived at the following conclusion:—Though there may be differences of opinion as to the exact meaning of the reply in question, the Government believes that it may be interpreted as holding out some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba government and legislature; and the Dominion Government is most unwilling to take any action which can be interpreted as forestalling or precluding such a desirable consummation. The Government has also considered the difficulties to be met with in preparing and perfecting legislation on so important and intricate a question during the last hours of the session. The Government has, therefore, decided not to ask Parliament to deal with remedial legislation during the present session. A communication will be sent immediately to the Manitoba government on the subject, with a view to ascertaining whether that government is disposed to make a settlement of the question, which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province, without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament. A session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If by that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, the Dominion Government will be prepared, at the next session of Parliament, to be called, as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council, and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895.

Last year, the hon. gentlemen opposite wanted by all means the Government to pass without delay a remedial law. They said that another six months' delay would undoubtedly expose the country to an agitation fraught with danger. Now, the leader of the Opposition moves the postponement of the Bill, and does not seem to apprehend any agitation. We, on this side, want to pass the Bill now, and those very men who deprecated delay now ask for delay, and want the measure to be put off indefinitely. We gave our consent to the six months' delay last session, only after the Government had pledged their word that there would be held another session, in January, 1896, in order to introduce and press through the House a Remedial Bill. The hon. leader of the Opposition, who censures the Government for having postponed the question, now moves the six months' hoist. But will he pledge his word, in behalf of his party, that if he comes into power, he will introduce a Remedial Bill? Here is the principle of the Bill now before the House:

Whereas the Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba appealed to His Excellency the Governor General in Council under the provisions of section twenty-two of chapter three of the statutes of 1870, intituled: "An Act to amend and continue the Act thirty-two and thirty-three Victoria, chapter three, and to establish and provide for the government of the province of Manitoba," from certain Acts of the legislature of the province of Manitoba, passed in the fifty-third year of Her Majesty's reign, chaptered thirty-seven and thirty-eight, affecting the rights or privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority in relation to education, namely: "An Act respecting the Department of Education" and "An Act respecting Public Schools," and whereas such appeal having been duly heard and decided by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, such provincial law as seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of the said section twenty-two of the said first mentioned Act has not been made, and the circumstances of the case require that the Parliament of Canada should make a remedial law as hereinafter enacted for the due execution of the provisions of the aforesaid section twenty-two: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba shall appoint, to form and constitute the Separate School Board of Education for the province of Manitoba, a certain number of persons not exceeding nine, all of whom shall be Roman Catholics.

Under that law, we give the Manitoba minority their separate schools. They say that this law is not a good law. But, if the law is not good, because incomplete, the principle of it, at least, is good. Does the hon. leader of the Opposition approve of the principle of that law? I say the principle is good, and that we should approve of it. Do not the Government, under that law, remedy the grievances complained of by the minority? I consider that the objection raised by those who contend that the law is not a good one, as utterly groundless. The Bill may be amended in committee as any other Bill that comes before the House. So long as the principle is good, as the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) remarked, we ought to accept it, under correction or amendment in Committee of the Whole. None of the hon. gentlemen opposite have made any suggestions as to how it shall have been framed or amended. Clause 4 of the Bill reads as follows:—

4. It shall be the duty of the Board of Education,—

(a.) To have under its control and management the separate schools and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline and the carrying out of the provisions of this Act;

(b.) To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of its teachers, and for the withdrawing of licenses upon sufficient cause; provided that the standard of qualification for teachers shall be in secular matters the same as that at any time prescribed for teachers of other schools of a public character established under the statutes of the province of Manitoba. Provided further, that all teachers' certificates issued by or under the authority of the Department of Education shall be recognized by the Board of Education;

(c.) To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control; provided however that no book, map or globe shall be selected unless such book, map or globe has been authorized for use either in the high or public schools of the province of Manitoba or in the separate schools of the province of Ontario.

As I just said, Sir, under this Bill, the Manitoba Catholic minority are given the rights asked for. The minority had three grievances. (1) The law of 1890 took away from them their separate schools. (2) Under that law they were not allowed the choice of their own text books, and they had no control over their schools. (3) Under the same law, they could neither build nor buy any school houses. Now, under the present Bill, those rights are restored to them. This Bill also exempts them from paying taxes for the support of Protestant schools. That is an important point gained by them. I am no lawyer, but I think this Bill gives the minority what they asked for. The interested parties declare that the Bill gives them satisfaction. Now, if those who are to benefit by it say so, I do not see why we should not be also satisfied with it. Archbishop Langevin, Senator Bernier, Mr. LaRivière, the member for Provencher, and Mr. Prendergast declare that the Bill gives them satisfaction, and that they accept it. The hierarchy also accepts it. Why should the Opposition not also accept it? I consider that it is not the business of the Opposition to say whether the Bill is satisfactory or not. It is not the business of those who are not interested in it, but of the men who are going to benefit by it, to complain about it or to state that they are satisfied with it. It is no use being more Catholic than our own bishops. Clause 74 reads thus :

74. The right to share proportionately, in any grant made out of public funds for the purposes of education having been decided to be and being now one of the rights and privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba, any sum granted by the legislature of Manitoba and appropriated for the separate schools shall be placed to the credit of the Board of Education in accounts to be opened in the books of the Treasury Department and in the Audit Office.

I believe that the Government could go no further, because they cannot coerce the Manitoba legislature into appropriating votes for such purposes. I consider that under that clause, the right of the Catholic minority to share proportionately in the legislative grants is recognized. Should the Bill go any further, the leader of the Opposition, who is always ready to find fault with the Government, would say that the Government had no right to make such an enactment. Clause 112 contains the following provision :—

112. Power is hereby reserved to the Parliament of Canada to make such further and other remedial laws as the provisions of the said section twenty-two, of chapter three, of the statutes of 1870, and of the decision of the Governor in Council thereunder may require.

Under that clause, this law may be amended as any other law passed by Parliament. The Government explicitly reserve that right to themselves. I am not a legal man, but I am satisfied that the Bill now before this House restores to the minority their separate schools. Under the Bill they are restored their right to separate schools ; they are exempted from contributing towards the support of Protestant schools, and authorized to choose their own text-books. Well, Sir, I think the minority never asked for more than that. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. leader of the Opposition had been anxious to do justice to the Manitoba minority, he would have refrained from proposing the six months' hoist, because this shelving of the Bill is equivalent to killing a child, before it has reached the age of majority and is able to provide for itself. Now, the six months' hoist is equivalent to killing the Bill. I could understand the hon. leader of the Opposition coming before this House and stating that, in case he should be Prime Minister, after the next elections, he would be ready to make the necessary corrections to the Bill, so as to secure its full enforcement, but he did not commit himself in that way at all. I also believe that the Conservatives are going to have another lease of power, and we pledge ourselves to perfect the Bill, if necessary. Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to the sixth question submitted for hearing and consideration by the Supreme Court. It reads as follows :—

6. Did the Acts of Manitoba relating to education, passed prior to the session of 1890, confer to or continue, to the minority a "right or privilege in relation to education," within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, or establish a system of "separate or dissentient schools" within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, if said section 93 be found to be applicable to Manitoba ; and, if so, did the two Acts of 1890 complained of, or either of them, affect any right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council ?

Now, let us refer to the answer given by the Privy Council to the sixth question :

6. In answer to the 6th question : That the Acts of Manitoba relating to education passed prior to the session of 1890, did confer on the minority a right or privilege in relation to education within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act" which alone applies ; that the two Acts of 1890 complained of did affect a right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council.

More than this, the Lord Chancellor, in giving his decision, thus delivered himself :

The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the State. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which State aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants.

I consider, therefore, that the Bill restores to the minority their separate schools, as they existed previous to 1890. The Opposition have made up their minds to prevent the passing of the Bill, in order to make it an issue at the next electoral contest. The hon. gentlemen opposite are anxious to come into power by foul or fair means, and that would be an acceptable political platform for the party, who are in sore want of a programme. As to us, Catholics, were we obliged to send our children to Protestant schools, it would be, to our mind, a more arbitrary measure than the closing of our churches. Further, the fact must not be lost sight of, that it was a Liberal government who inflicted that injustice upon Manitoba. It must be kept on record that Her Majesty's loyal Opposition in this House support and approve that policy, and cheer the framer of that law, as I happened to remark the other day, when the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was addressing the House. That gentleman is the real promoter and framer of the law of 1890; I do not blame him on that score, as he belongs to a religious creed different from ours, and he is free to take on that question any stand he likes; but, I blame the French Liberal members who cheer him to the echo when he champions his law in this House. Where are they now, those great champions of separate schools of 1893, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette), and the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne)? Those great champions of separate schools are the first to inveigh against the remedial law, and to say that it is a clumsy law, which should be shelved without delay. The hon. leader of the Opposition stated last year that delaying the matter to another session would involve the country in trouble and foster a dangerous agitation. But the times are changed. Then the hon. gentleman believed that the Government would never introduce a Remedial Bill, and they wanted to make political capital out of the question. The hon. leader of the Opposition is fond of putting on record the examples and utterances of the great English statesmen. Well, Sir, I am going to quote the words fallen from a great English statesman, and I hope they will elicit his approval. Mr. Balfour said at Manchester:

I say it is a monstrous thing to coerce parents whose children attend school all day long, to send them to institutions where those children cannot receive such religious training as their parents want them to receive.

Yes, cries out the "Verité," it is a monstrous thing, and it exists here in Canada.

We call the attention of Mr. Laurier to Mr. Balfour's speech. He will find it in the North-west "Review" of the 21st August, reproduced from the "Nor-Wester."

Let Mr. Laurier mark it well. Mr. Balfour does not deal with Protestant schools to which Catholic parents would be morally forced to send their children, and vice versa; but with neutral schools, to which Catholic or Protestant parents of religious minds, would be constrained to send their children.

Yes, Mr. Balfour thinks it is a monstrous thing to attempt imposing the neutral school upon those who are unwilling to accept it. He says, in substance, in the speech now before us:

"Those who like that system are free to adopt a school where religious teaching is entirely divorced from secular teaching, where the child is taught but purely human sciences; but I deny that this is the best system, and I hold that it is a crying injustice to impose that system upon parents who entertain other notions."

So speaks the English statesman in question. It is too bad that Mr. Laurier, who professes to draw his inspirations from British wisdom, did not these four years past, speak out as clearly and judiciously as Mr. Balfour. Instead of repeating on all the tones of the scale that, if the Manitoba national schools were Protestant schools, Catholic parents should not be forced to send their children to those schools, wherefore did he not say, as Mr. Balfour did, that it is a monstrous thing to impose such schools upon a Catholic population, no matter whether they are Protestant or really neutral schools? Why did not Mr. Laurier speak out like Mr. Balfour? The reason is that Mr. Laurier is a Liberal doctrinaire, and the supporters of Liberal doctrinarianism actually want the neutral school, the secularized, the godless school, from which religious dogmatical teaching is banished, and which all classes, Catholic, Jews and Protestants may attend, as no religious tenets are inculcated on the children. It is far easier for Catholics to stand on the ground taken by Mr. Balfour than on that taken by a Liberal Catholic of the school which Mr. Laurier belongs to. I contend that by their legislation of 1890, the Greenway government perpetrated a crying injustice. Even supposing that there were no enactment embodied in the constitution providing for separate schools, reason would still be our guide. The golden rule applies here: Do by others as you would be done by. The majority should remember that might is not right. We may safely vote the second reading of the Bill, and should Mr. Greenway come to Ottawa, then will be the time for him to accept the Bill and to have it passed by the Manitoba legislature. In that case, the Greenway government will have to enact a law similar to the Bill now under discussion. Otherwise, no arrangement could be entered into. The other day, we heard with pleasure the words fallen from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) and the representative of the English Protestant element in the province of Quebec made a remarkable speech on that day. He said that if ever the time would come when the majority in the province of Quebec perpetrated an injustice on the Protestant minority, that, in the event of Parliament refusing now to interfere in favour of the Manitoba minority, it would be impossible for him, as a representative Englishman, to come before this House and claim justice for that minority. We have now to give relief to the Manitoba minority, in order that later on the Protestant minority in Quebec, if ever their rights were infringed upon, may have their grievances righted. The hon. Minister urged and insisted upon the English members voting in favour of the Bill now before the House. Mr. Speaker, let us for the moment sink party interests; let all the members, irrespective of nationality, English, French Canadian, Irish and Scotch, unite in order to remove from the political arena that Manitoba school question which has occupied the attention of the country these five years past; and then, I venture to say, that peace and harmony will once more prevail among us. I believe that the Prime Minister and his colleagues have redeemed their pledges, in connection with the remedial law. I have to congratulate the Government for the firm stand they have taken, and I am positive that the Canadian electors at the next general elections will show that they know how to appreciate it. The law will be voted by a pretty good majority, with the help of the Government friends. The fair-play of our English colleagues and their respect for the constitution are too well known to admit of the contrary. Before I sit down, I declare that I shall vote for the Bill now before the House, because I believe that it restores to the Manitoba minority their right to separate schools, as they existed previous to 1890, and which they have been claiming these five years past. I believe that this Bill will remove the present contention from the arena of public discussion, and dispose once for all of all racial and national feuds, a consummation devoutly to be wished for, if we want to make this country of ours a great and prosperous country.

PRAYERS.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for second reading of Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba), and the proposed motion (six months' hoist) of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I listened with much attention last evening to the speech of the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Fréchette). Three-quarters of his speech I had already read in the newspapers of the province of Quebec, in the course of the last six months. As to the rest, I regret to own that the hon. member spoke so low that I could not make anything of it. I, therefore, apologize to him, if, in order to find anything to refute, I have to pass him over and go back to the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa, who spoke before him. The hon. member for Ottawa spoke more distinctly than the member for Megantic, and I regret that the delicate task of answering him has not fallen to one more able than I am, who might have succeeded in removing, perhaps, the line of demarcation which the hon. member has drawn between himself and the Liberal party in his speech of last night. The hon. member said he hoped that the Liberal party would continue him its sympathy in spite of the position he was taking on the school question. If the hon. member means by this that we regret his desertion, he certainly is right. But as to sympathy, I think that in the future he will have to depend mainly on the other side of the House, for I noticed he was warmly applauded by the hon. gentlemen opposite. In listening to the eloquent voice of the hon. member, I remembered an incident, the recalling of which will not, I hope, be too harsh on my friend's ear. One evening last year, ten thousand persons had gathered in Sohmer Park Hall, in Montreal, to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition, the Hon. Mr. Joly deLotbinière and the hon. member for Ottawa, on the question which occupies our attention to-day. After having explained how hard and difficult this question was: after having pointed out how the French Ministers seemed to allow themselves to be deceived by the Orangemen in the Cabinet; after having shown that only one man—the hon. leader of the Opposition—could settle this question, he then turned towards Hon. Mr. Laurier, and, addressing us all: Behold, oh, French Canadians, said he, behold the one who is to be your chief.

It is to be supposed that from Sohmer Park Hall to Cape Breton, and thence to Ottawa is a long road; for last night it was no more the leader of the Opposition who was to be the French Canadian's chief, it was, forsooth, the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper). The hon. member may have changed his views, but we Liberals have not; we still hold that there is but one man who can bring about the settlement of this question, and that man is the hon. leader of the Opposition. At the meeting to which I refer, an incident happened. The hall was crowded with people, and no sooner had the hon. member uttered the eloquent words which I have reported, than the floor of the first platform gave way and a man fell to the ground. Naturally, this made some commotion, but the hon. member, getting upon a table, and covering the noise with his voice, said: Take no alarm, gentlemen, it is only a man leaving. I will not say to-day, repeating the words of the hon. member, there is only a man leaving, for the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoliel) has gone on the same errand as he, but I will say that although two gentlemen are dropping out through the same hole, the hole will not grow much larger. The hon. member gave us the reasons for which he thought he should support the Government on this question. "In the first place I have always, said he, declared in favour of the disallowance of the Manitoba school laws; secondly, the Catholic people are in favour of a remedial law, and, finally, it is for me more a question of conscience than of party."

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Very good.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) The hon. member for Bellechasse says, very good; has he always consulted his conscience when he had to deal with the questions which came before Parliament?

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Yes.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Well, then, he has two.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) I am bound by parliamentary rules to accept the hon. member's statement; but if he will do me the honour of a visit during the coming election, so that I may on the hustings show him my way of thinking, I promise him another answer. When the hon. member says that he was always in favour of disallowance, I can tell him that the whole province of Quebec was also in favour of disallowance. We have followed the wishes of the episcopacy on the question of disallowing the laws of 1890 and 1894. There cannot, therefore, be anything exceptional in the hon. member being favourable to disallowance. But is that a reason why he should give his support to the Government who refused to disallow these laws?

Next, he says he is in favour of a remedial law; but are we not, are all the French

Mr. MONET.

Canadians not in favour of a remedial law? We are in favour of a remedial law, and believe that it may be necessary when all the means of a settlement by conciliation shall have been exhausted. Thirdly, he says he finds it a matter of conscience. I will take the liberty of asking him if his conscience advised him otherwise, when he went to Montreal Centre and Jacques Cartier, and more recently still, when he went to support the candidate of the Opposition in Cape Breton? I know that at these several elections, the Government candidates pledged themselves to support a remedial law to be presented by the Government at the present session. At the last election, that in Cape Breton, the Government had pledged themselves to present a remedial law. We all knew that a remedial law would be introduced, and the hon. member must have known it as well. But what we had to fear, what he feared himself at Sohmer Park, was that this law, drafted by the Orangemen of the Ministry, could give no satisfaction to the episcopacy, and to the Catholic minority of Manitoba. The position is not changed in regard to the law. We do not find that it affords as much justice and security as we could give ourselves to the Manitoba minority. No, there must be another reason for the position he has taken. I think he has simply been struck with political fright. Had he been sure of re-election after voting against the Bill, I think he would never have taken the position he took. For my part, I will not only say that I am as independent as a large number of the members of this House, but I think that the election which sent me here justifies me in saying that I am altogether independent of parties. I am a Liberal, but I was not the candidate of the Liberal party. On the contrary, the leader of the Liberal party has never been willing to accept my candidature. I do not make a boast of it, for I would have prized his good will, but I say so to show that I am really independent of all the parties. I am a Liberal though, and as such I want the largest possible sum of justice rendered to the minority. In this I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa. I am ready to grant the hon. member for Ottawa, that for the last five years the Federal Government has not ceased to promise that justice would be rendered to the Manitoba minority. On another hand, the Liberal party and the press of that party pledged themselves to do full justice to the same minority, if the present Government continue to neglect their duty, and to deny that justice which they have so many times promised. I do not question here the existence of the evil. I do not question the necessity and the possibility of a remedy; what I consider here is simply the nature of the remedy offered, and on another hand who could more efficiently apply a remedy to the situation. The Liberal party has at its head, I do not fear to assert it, the one man best qualified to apply an efficient remedy, the most distinguished and most popular man the French Canadians have ever had to boast of, and the hon. leader of the Liberal party has many and many a time, as often as he spoke on this question of the schools, declared himself firmly resolved to act in accordance with the principle of separate schools. On the other hand, what do we see? The Conservative party, on the contrary, is represented in this House, or rather in the Senate, by the hon. Prime Minister, who is an Orangeman, as every one knows, who is a former Grand Master of the Orange order. Now, as an Orangeman, the hon. Prime Minister, as well as all the members of his order, has taken an oath which partly reads as follows :—

I swear that I am not and never will be a Roman Catholic or a papist; and that I am not and never will be married to a Roman Catholic or a papist.

To carry fanaticism even into love is rushing it very far :

That I will not bring up my children nor will I permit them to be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, if I can prevent it; that I am not and never will be a member of a society or a body of men who are enemies of Her Majesty.

Such is the oath which the Prime Minister has subscribed to, and this Prime Minister is supported by twelve or thirteen members who all have taken the oath of the Orange order. The hon. Prime Minister is supported by the Conservative party, which has the confidence of the nine-tenths of the Orangemen of this country, who have all taken the same oath. How can the hon. member for Ottawa conscientiously believe that we may obtain justice, full and complete justice for the Manitoba minority at the hands of such men? I do not share the hon. member's opinion, and I prefer to trust the hon. leader of the Opposition, who, I believe, offers greater guarantee. For, Mr. Speaker, we must not delude ourselves with this. The proposed legislation, of which the only remedial feature is the title of the Bill, will, if once voted, be final, and can never be amended hereafter. It therefore behooves us to consider what legislation we are going to pass, and see if the measure proposed is calculated to give full justice to the Manitoba minority. When I give as my opinion that this law, when once voted, will be final, and can never be amended, I do not expect it to have necessarily great weight, but it is also the opinion of the hon. member for Verchères, the most eminent lawyer of Montreal, and it is the opinion of a newspaper which is in high favour with the clergy in the province of Quebec. I know, moreover, that the ex-Minister of Justice, when the question was decided before the Privy Council of Canada, considered that very point. For I read in the report made by the former Minister of Justice the following expression of opinion :—

In this respect, the counsel for the province of Manitoba has contended that if Parliament should legislate under those circumstances, such legislation would be absolute and irrevocable.

As I said before, the Conservative party have for five years promised justice to the Manitoba minority. I know, as my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) does, that the Conservative party accept this Bill, that they declare themselves satisfied with it, but there are grounds for suspecting the motives of this readiness on the part of the friends of the Government. We only knew the title of the new Bill, we only knew it was called a Remedial Bill, when already, in the province of Quebec, the Conservative party were shouting that the Catholics were saved. Even an ecclesiastical personage was writing to the leader of the Opposition that he should support this measure, before having seen it, for it had not yet been presented to the House. All the official press already proclaimed the excellence of the new Bill; and, as the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) said the other day, the members of this House were expected to support it before having seen it. But the only remedial thing in this Bill is the title; and according to my way of thinking this is not sufficient. If the Conservative party is satisfied therewith, the Liberal party, which faithful to its traditions, goes beyond the names and titles of men and things, wants to judge men independently of the titles they have and things according to their value. It is what I have done with the would-be Remedial Bill.

Does this remedial measure consecrate an intervention favourable to the Manitoba majority? What reparation does it offer? To begin with, of what grievance do the Catholics of Manitoba complain. They have not complained by their petition of having been despoiled of their rights and privileges by the school law of 1890. They have not complained of having lost their separate schools, of having lost their Catholic schools, of having lost the episcopal control of these schools, but only of not receiving local government grants any longer. Such is the grievance complained of by the Catholics of Manitoba. Now, let us see what remedy is offered to the minority by means of this Bill. I could say that the Bill now before us offers no remedy, because it is unconstitutional. But, supposing it to be constitutional, what remedy does it afford to the Manitoba minority in respect to the grievances which it sets forth before the Privy Council of Canada. I heard, the other evening, the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoliel) say that he favoured the Bill because, as a whole, the legislation which is offered us recognizes for the Catholics the right of having their own schools. But, Mr. Speaker, the law of 1890 has not taken away from them the right of having their separate or Catholic schools. They have a right to these schools by virtue of the freedom of teaching guaranteed to Canada by the treaty of 1763. This freedom was guaranteed to them before the Act of 1890, and they still have it to-day as they had it before. It is common law. Our ancestors have won this right on battle fields, and it is therefore not this Remedial Bill that guarantees the privileges of teaching in accordance with the Catholic faith. The freedom of teaching has existed a long time and the hon. member for Berthier cannot be serious when he pretends that the Catholics will only have a right to have their own schools by virtue of this law. They had before 1890, as they still have to-day, the right of opening Catholic schools, and all they need is the Manitoba government grant. What the Catholics claim is a share of the subsidies voted by the provincial legislature to help them keep up their separate schools. That is what the Dominion Government should have provided for, and that is what they have not done.

As long as the Government will not introduce a measure giving the Catholics a share of the moneys voted for educational purposes, the Catholics will remain without efficient protection. I cannot, therefore, vote for this Bill. I will vote for it when it is amended to this effect, and made constitutional. The second right that the member for Berthier believes this Bill would give, is the right of establishing a school system and controlling and maintaining such schools. This is exactly the same argument as the first, and my answer applies to it as well. The episcopacy has to-day the right of controlling these schools in Manitoba just as the episcopacy has the control of the Catholic schools in the province of Quebec. Here again all that is needed is money to keep these schools going. The third consideration set forth by the hon. member for Berthier is, that the Bill relieves the Catholics from paying taxes to public schools. I know that there is in this a real advantage if the proposed legislation be constitutional. But the Catholics are not exempted from the whole tax by the measure. An absolute condition indispensable to the Catholics, if they are to profit by this exemption is that there must be ten children capable of going to school within a radius of three miles; then the Catholics can avail themselves of this provision of the law. But if there is not a sufficient number of children to establish a separate school, they cannot take advantage of this provision. I call the attention of the hon. member to this disposition of the Bill concerning the creation of the school districts. Finally, the Catholics, by the same clause, are only exempted from the municipal tax. They will have to pay like all other citizens, their shares of taxes to the common funds of the Manitoba government. Now, the provincial government gives a grant of one hundred and forty to one hundred and fifty dollars per year to each school in Manitoba. Well, to this grant taken from the public treasury of the province, the Catholics, as well as the Protestants, are obliged to contribute; and they are in no way exempted from paying such taxes by the present Bill. As to the last clause of section 28 of the Bill, paragraph 3, which permits the Catholics to tax themselves for the maintenance of separate schools, the point made by the hon. member for Berthier does not seem to be very serious; for if it is a matter of consent for the Catholics to pay money for the separate schools, there is no need of a federal law to compel them to do it. Will the hon. member contend, however, that if they are not willing to pay such taxes they will have no way to escape them? One has only to read section 28 to see that they have the choice of paying either for the public or for the separate schools. Now, the moment they have the option of refusing to allow themselves to be incorporated into a separate school district, the law that would provide for their paying taxes for separate schools becomes inefficient. Let us read the third paragraph of that section:

3. But any Roman Catholic who is possessed of property liable to assessment, within a separate school district, which is also within the limits of some public school district, established by or under the provisions of the legislature of the province of Manitoba, may, at his option, require that such property shall not be levied upon for the support of separate schools, by giving to the secretary-treasurer of the separate school district and the clerk of the municipality a written notice to that effect.

So, it would only be necessary for Catholics to give such notice, and they would avoid paying the taxes that might be imposed under this clause. The moment they are given an option all the efficiency of the remedy is taken away.

Mr. ROBILLARD. (Translation.) The same option exists in Ontario, and that does not destroy the separate schools.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) I do not say that the separate schools are thereby destroyed. I do not know whether the hon. member has understood me. I say that the Bill does not provide for an absolute right of taxation for separate schools, and that it will be sufficient that advantage be taken of section 28 to render the law inefficient. Besides, as the hon. member for L'Islet points out to me, in Ontario, the Catholics have a government grant, which allows them to keep their schools on a good footing.

But, Mr. Speaker, we hear the Conservatives say, it is very curious to see the Liberals so zealous with regard to this politico-religious question; the bishops are satisfied with the Bill as it is, and we do not understand why the Liberals should be more Catholic than the bishops. I deny this. I deny that the bishops are satisfied. At any rate, they have not declared themselves to be, particularly Mgr. Langevin, who, among the bishops, is certainly the most interested one in the question. I say among the bishops, because the parent is more interested than he is. Now, Bishop Langevin has never declared himself satisfied with the Bill. We have grounds to believe, on the contrary, that he is not satisfied at all. Let us see, first, what he wanted. I will show next what was given him. By comparing what he demanded with what he got, one will judge whether he can be satisfied. In a sermon pronounced from the pulpit of Notre Dame, in Montreal, here is what he said :

After having asked all the Catholics of the Dominion to sign a petition praying for the full freedom of our schools, it would be very strange for us to accept a half freedom. Once more, no compromise ! Our rights such as guaranteed by the constitution ! We do not want to accept an inferior position to that occupied by the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. I repeat it, the Catholics have but one thought, but one conviction, that is, that we must claim our rights in their entire fulness.

And further :

I emphatically declare that in the matter of education the Catholics of Manitoba will never accept the crumbs from the table when the Protestants of Quebec are seated at the banquet. No, never.

Mr. Speaker, if there is for Mgr. Langevin to feast upon, only the money which the government will vote, I believe that it will be no feast of Lucullus.

We are neither slaves nor sons of slaves, and so long as the Protestant minority of Quebec will enjoy the fulness of their rights, we, western Canadians, will never consent to half measures.

And at Edmonton, a few days afterwards, from the sacred pulpit, he said :

We will have our rights if we die in obtaining them.

Let us now examine the Remedial Bill, and see if it gives the Manitoba minority all the rights enjoyed by the Protestant minority in Quebec. I hold in my hand the code of Public Instruction for Quebec, in which are stated the rights of the Protestant minority. I also have the Remedial Bill which contains what is called the guarantees offered to the Catholic minority of Manitoba. Article 10 of the Quebec code provides for two committees of the Council of Public Instruction. Article 15 reads as follows :—

Everything within the scope of the functions of the Council of Public Instruction, which especially concerns the schools and public instruction generally of Roman Catholics, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Roman Catholic Committee of such Council. In the same manner, everything within the scope of such functions, which generally concerns the schools and public instruction generally of Protestants, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Protestant Committee.

Consequently the Protestant committee on Public Instruction in the province of Quebec have the absolute control of all matters connected with Protestant education. The clause which I could call the corresponding provision in the Remedial Bill, is thus :

1. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba shall appoint, to form and constitute the Separate School Board of Education for the province of Manitoba, a certain number of persons not exceeding nine, all of whom shall be Roman Catholics.

I admit that at first sight, this seems to give the Catholics of Manitoba the same guarantee as the Protestants have in the province of Quebec ; but it must not be forgotten that, while drafting this clause, the Dominion Government is aware that the Manitoba government is opposed to this law, and they give it the right to itself to appoint the persons that shall form this council. As has been pointed out by Conservative papers in the province of Quebec, the Manitoba government is thus given the absolute right of making this council inefficient by its composition. Such a council might certainly do some good, were it not that the Manitoba government holds the appointment of its members. Why has not the Government protected the Catholic minority in Manitoba in the same manner as the Protestant minority is protected in the province of Quebec ? In fact, article 91 of the code of Public Instruction, says :

—and such dissentient proprietors, occupants, tenants or ratepayers may, by the intervention of the trustees, establish in the manner provided with regard to other schools, one or more schools which shall be subject to the same provisions, duties and supervision, and they shall be entitled to receive from the Superintendent—

I call particularly the attention to this :—

—or from the School Commissioners, a sum out of the general or local school fund, proportionate to the dissentient population they represent.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, under this article, the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec has a right to a grant proportionate to its numbers in any parish where a dissentient school exists. Mgr. Langevin asked for the same enactment in favour of the Catholics and the French of Manitoba, and he plainly declared that the Manitoba minority would not be content with the crumbs from the table while the Protestant minority in Quebec were sitting at the banquet.

What was given in answer to this demand from the minority ? Section 74 is offered, and it reads as follows :—

74. The right to share proportionately, in any grant made out of public funds for the purposes of education having been decided to be and being now one of the rights and privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba, any sum granted by the legislature of Manitoba and appropriated for the separate schools.

And if the local legislature vote no funds, the consequence will be that the separate schools will have no grant. Such is the provision made in this clause. It goes on :—

—shall be placed to the credit of the Board of Education in accounts to be opened in the books of the Treasury Department and in the Audit Office.

No wonder that "La Verité," a paper patronized by the clergy in the province of Quebec, quotes this section and condemns it in the following terms :—

It will be noticed that this section of the Bill does not give a cent of the provincial grant to the separate schools ; it only states that the separate school council will have the right to receive whatever the Manitoba legislature will be willing to give it. Should the legislature vote nothing to the separate schools the latter will have to be content with the municipal taxes ; for in what the newspapers have published of the Bill, there is nothing to indicate that the Dominion Government propose to grant any subsidy to the separate schools in case the Manitoba legislature refuse to do so.

It amounts to this, Mr. Speaker, that this section simply permits the Catholic minority to receive the money which the province of Manitoba will be willing to grant them. It is exactly as if a municipal council should pass a by-law to allow the poor of the parish to receive alms that the rich may be willing to give them.

However, the hon. members for Ottawa and Berthier have seen in this clause a great boon to the minority in Manitoba, the protection which this minority have so earnestly asked for.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has attempted to forestall this argument against the Bill now before us ; he has tried to cover this financial flaw of the Bill by saying that while no money is provided for the separate schools, the Bill declares that the Catholics have a right to a proportionate share of the grants voted by the local legislature, and he hopes that they will get it when a Conservative government comes to power in Manitoba. Then the Catholics may have a legislative grant. It is to be observed, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend's trust rests on the Conservative party coming to power. I do not know that the Manitoba Conservatives would be more favourable to the Catholics than the Liberals. The "Nor'-Wester," the organ of the Conservative party in Manitoba, on the last days of the electoral campaign, on the eve of the last election, contended that Mr. Greenway was not to be trusted, and put the voters on their guard against the government. I quote from that paper :

If Mr. Laurier comes into power Mr. Greenway will yield. Mr. Greenway will pass such remedial legislation as will be dictated to him by his lord and master, Mr. Laurier. Each of his acts, and of those of his principal followers, point to that conclusion and no other, in spite of his non-committing answers, his provocative speech and his boasted stalworthness. Will Mr. Greenway, in order to give consistency to the spirit of his answer and of his speech, declare that he will resign rather than ever consenting to a remedial legislation either in the Dominion Parliament or the local legislature ? He will not dare to do so, for he knows full well that, once the elections over, he will, if returned to power, agree to a certain measure of remedial legislation. This is no idle prophecy. The acts of Mr. Greenway and of his lieutenants indicate that, or else the support they give to Mr. Laurier is so flagrantly inconsistent that it is ridiculous. It is but an old Grit game.

I understand by that that the Conservative party in Manitoba is still more antagonistic to the Catholics than the Liberal party in the matter of a legislative grant. But let us suppose that the Conservative party be favourable to the minority. My hon. friend the member for Bellechasse says that that section 74 will render a great service to the Catholics ; but that only is if a Conservative government consents to vote them a grant. Now, if such a government is generous enough to make such a grant, there is no need of a law to compel it to do so. The last part of section 14 says that the money voted by the legislature and appropriated to the separate schools will go to the Board of Public Instruction. This is common law, and there was no need of a Remedial Bill for that. Let us now compare the rights of the Protestants in the province of Quebec as to the school books with the position made to the Manitoba minority. Article 214 of the Code of Public Instruction for the province of Quebec reads as follows :—

The curé, priest or officiating minister, shall have the exclusive right of selecting the books having reference to religion and morals, for the use of the schools for children of his own religious faith.

Mgr. Taché was by right a member of the old Board of Education in Manitoba. I know that Mgr. Langevin wanted to be ex-officio member of the education board, and that requests have been made to friends of the government for a provision declaring the bishops of the province of Manitoba, ex-officio members of the board, intrusted with the control of the Catholic schools. Here is my answer : If Archbishop Langevin were satisfied with the Bill, from a religious standpoint, he is welcome to it ; but as a French Canadian, I am entitled to discuss the question, from a national and constitutional standpoint. From that standpoint, I decline to be dictated to by Archbishop Langevin. I say that if he were satisfied with the Bill, from a religious standpoint—which remains to be shown, and it is a point of some importance to the issue—then, I would ask the hon. member for Bellechasse to tell us whether Archbishop Langevin is satisfied with the Bill, as it stands.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I could even, if necessary, read the telegram sent by Archbishop Langevin, in which he declares to one of his friends here, that he is satisfied with the Bill, and asks all Catholics to support it.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) Will the hon. gentleman please read it?

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I am going to read an extract of the telegram.

Mr. MONET (Translation.) I call upon the hon. gentleman to read that telegram. My hon. friend is too good a lawyer not to know, that he cannot make use of mutilated evidence.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I shall mutilate nothing. Here is a copy of the telegram in question. It is written in Latin; I am going to read it in Latin:

St. Boniface, 22nd February, 1896.

Reverend Father Lacombe, Residence of the Oblate Fathers, Ottawa.

Lex applicabilis, efficax et satisfactoria. Probo illam. Omnes episcopi et veri Catholici approbare debunt. Vita in lege. Euge tibi et Larivière. I entirely approve of your written statement.

ARCHBISHOP LANGEVIN.

Which means: The law is applicable, operative, satisfactory. I approve of it. All the bishops and all true Catholics should approve it. Salvation is in that law.

Mr. MONET (Translation.) Would the hon. gentleman tell me to whom that despatch was directed?

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I have just read it, and, if my hon. friend would pay attention to what is going on, instead of listening to the suggestions which come to him from the back benches, he would only be the better for it. It was sent to the Rev. Father Lacombe, and it bears the date of the 22nd February.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) The Bill did not exist at the time.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) Let the hon. member allow me to tell him this: As I just said, the Bill may be considered from a threefold point of view: from a political, national or religious standpoint. Previous to the hon. gentleman's reading that despatch, I had already stated—and I repeat the statement—that, if Archbishop Langevin were satisfied with the Bill, viewed from a religious standpoint, we are not satisfied with it at all, both from a national and from a political standpoint. I am sorry I cannot read to the hon. gentleman a letter which was communicated to me. It comes from a high dignitary of the church in Quebec, and he says that the Bill, which he has carefully scanned, is not worth the parchment it is written on. How is it possible for the hon. members not to feel embarrassed in the presence of such conflicting opinions?

In connection with the question of disallowance, a well-known Quebec journal, "La Verité," an influential clerical organ, in its issue of the 7th March, made the following charge against the Government and the Conservative party:—

NO DISALLOWANCE.

The twelve months' delay during which the Dominion Government could disallow, or nullify the Manitoba law of 1894, expired on the 6th instant without the law having been disallowed. However, we had been given to understand, by certain Conservative papers that the Government would not exercise their power of disallowance.

The denial of the Federal Government to obliterate from the statute-book the infamous law of 1894, as they have the indisputable power to do, under the constitution, was a serious mistake which the Conservative party will find it difficult to redeem, and still more to obtain forgiveness for.

That party, at least in the province of Quebec, boast of following the orders of the bishops, and of being in reality, the only Catholic party. To pretend to be more Catholic than the Conservative party, is, according to the "Minerve" tantamount to attempting what cannot be done.

Now, it just happens that the bishops in the Dominion formally ask for the disallowance of a legislation which they declare oppressive for the Manitoba minority. Never did the hierarchy in Canada formulate a more solemn demand in favour of a juster cause. And yet, the Conservative party disregard their prayer. Such is the unvarnished truth. Let the Conservative organs explain away if they can the denial of their leaders to comply with so legitimate a request from the Canadian hierarchy, they can no longer boast of following the orders of the bishops in matters within the sphere of action of the latter.

It will be recorded that the bishops did their duty, their whole duty, but that our public men failed to do their own duty.

We repeat it, disallowance was, politically speaking, the only efficacious remedy that could be applied to the odious legislation of the Manitoba government, which is a political crime, a violation of the federal compact and of the fundamental principles of the constitution. Had the Government disallowed the laws of 1890, the question would now have been set at rest; for, never could the Manitoba government have defiantly resisted the central authority, had the Government, grounded as they were upon the right, stood to their guns.

Now, as I said, in view of this opinion of a Conservative paper, enjoying such high credit among the clergy of the province of Quebec, is it possible, I ask, for the French Liberal members from Quebec to take upon that school question a different stand?

Now, coming back to the freedom of political action, both from a national and political standpoint, how is it possible to reconcile the position taken by the Catholic clergy—provided that the telegram just read by the hon. member for Bellechasse be authentic—with that taken in 1872? At that time, a similar question was agitating public opinion in the country.

There was several available means for reaching a settlement of the question. Here is what Cardinal Tachereau, the Archbishop of Quebec at the time, stated, in confirming the opinion of the late Bishop Langevin, of Rimouski, with reference to the attitude of Catholics under the circumstances :

1. Catholics are, undoubtedly, bound to disapprove of the principle of the New Brunswick School Act, and even to secure a remedy for that deplorable state of things within the limits of their power and complying meanwhile with the rules of prudence.

2. Catholics, however, are free to adopt, in order to reach that desirable end, the means which they deem, to the best of their knowledge, the best adapted to the accomplishment of that object, coupled with the least danger possible to the religious peace of the country.

3. The validity of the Act in question and the timeliness of provoking the intervention of the Imperial Parliament or of the Dominion Government, are open questions from a religious standpoint, and our Catholic legislators can, without infringing their religious principles, vote in either direction.

I call the attention of the hon. member for Bellechasse to what I have just read. And the Bishop of Rimouski, further says :

Such are the principles which must guide you in governing the souls committed to your charge, under the present circumstances.

Catholics have, from the decision given by the hierarchy in 1872, the right to exercise their judgment as to every national or political question, will any man in his sober senses, I ask, deny the fact that we are confronted by the same question that cropped up in 1872? Why, I ask, should the members of the Liberal party be precluded from exercising their own judgment on the matter and from voting against the Bill now before the House? In 1872, it was declared that we were free to exercise our own judgment and to settle that question as we thought fit. At that time as now, the separate school question was at issue. We were to judge as to the best means to be resorted to for obtaining separate schools. We now find ourselves in a position exactly similar to that one. I am in favour of separate schools, and I believe that the best means of restoring the separate schools in Manitoba is not to adopt the so-called Remedial Bill which is invalid. The hon. leader of the Opposition has always declared that he wanted an investigation to be made into the facts of the case, in order to frame the best and most adequate legislation. He has always declared that he wished to probe and sift the facts to the bottom, by means of an inquiry. I do not say, Sir, that an inquiry is absolutely necessary, but that it will be very useful for the better understanding of the question, and further, it would result beneficially to the Manitoba minority. Archbishop Taché himself asked for it. I believe that there are two kinds of inquiry to be made on that question. The first one will have to be made, in order to render valid the contemplated remedial legislation. A second inquiry should be made about the facts, with a view to make the legislation as complete and as operative as possible. An investigation should also be made into the petitions, memorials and other papers laid upon the Table of this House in connection with the Manitoba school law, as pointed out by the Privy Council judgment. We are called upon to legislate on the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council. That judgment is on the lines of the question which had been put to the tribunal and which is this: "Supposing all the facts alleged in the petitions to be true, the Governor General has the right to interfere. But the Privy Council never stated that the facts alleged were true, because there was no evidence taken before that tribunal. The Privy Council did simply declare that the Governor in Council could interfere, if the facts alleged in the memorial presented by the Manitoba hierarchy were true. Now, no proof of these facts was ever made before the Government. That judgment, if I interpret it aright, is in every point similar to a plea of justification at law, before a tribunal. If the court ordered that the evidence should be produced previous to the petition being acted upon, would the man in favour of whom that decision was rendered have a right to hope, if he neglected to produce the evidence, that the final finding of the court would be favourable to him? Not by any means. In the case at issue, the facts were not proved, and now the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) asked the Privy Council of Canada for leave to contradict the so-called evidence which had been produced by the other side. And not only was his demand rejected, but the evidence was withdrawn upon which rested the case and which the hon. gentleman wished to contradict. I believe with the hon. leader of my party, that for want of any such evidence, this Bill will prove invalid.

Archbishop Langevin is quite free, as such, to approve of this Bill, from a religious standpoint, but we have the same right to vote it down from a national standpoint. What we do want is a constitutional law, an operative law, a law so framed as to mete out justice to a minority whose rights have been overlooked for over five years by the present Government. We want an operative law, which may later on be modified. That cannot be brought about without political evolution which will bring into power men strongly determined to deal to the minority full justice. That political evolution will bring about a change in relations between Manitoba and the central government. I do sincerely hope, under the circumstances, for a change in that direction. But I may say that the Conservative party have done all they could to entangle the question, and however anxious we may be to settle it, possibly we might be precluded from doing them as full justice as we might have done at the outset.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, I would request that the indulgence of the House be extended to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) so far as to allow him to remain seated while addressing the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member be allowed to remain seated while addressing the House?—Carried.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the members of this House most heartily for the courtesy they have extended to me in allowing me to keep my seat because of the physical disability which prevents me standing for any length of time. I desire to address myself to the discussion of this most important topic which is at this time engaging the attention of this House and the entire Dominion. This is, perhaps, the most important epoch in the history of this confederation. For the first time this Parliament is called upon to act under the power which it undoubtedly possesses to override the legislation of the provinces under certain circumstances. The question as to the wisdom of this power being vested in us is one that I do not pretend to discuss. It has been held that it is contrary to the spirit of federal institutions that the powers vested in a province and exercised constitutionally by that province should be overridden by the central power. Whether that is the case or not is beside the question now, because the power is vested in this Parliament, and it is proposed that this House should exercise its power by the legislation now under consideration. This power, Sir, is granted to this Parliament by the 93rd section of the British North America Act; and I take it from the reading of that portion of the section conveying the power, that it is permissive—that this Parliament is not obliged to exercise it, but can exercise its discretion in the matter. The language of the section is “may”—not shall—“make remedial laws;” and I take it that it is fair to infer from that language that the power exercised by this Parliament is a power which it may or may not exercise, according to its discretion, having regard to the promises.

Now, Sir, this Government have not always manifested this degree of anxiety with regard to the constitutional phase of this question that they profess at this moment. When the law of 1890 was passed, it would have been perfectly constitutional and perfectly proper for the Government of this Dominion to have disallowed that law. They were asked to do it. They were then as fully in possession of all the facts pertaining to the question as they are now; but they declined, or failed, to exercise their clear constitutional privilege to disallow the law. They shirked responsibility in reference to that law until responsibility was thrust upon them by the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. When the responsibility was thrust upon them, they proceeded to act in a manner which I am about to describe. This question was under consideration by our own highest judicial tribunal. The Supreme Court of Canada gave a decision in regard to it on the 20th of February, 1894. Their decision was, that no appeal lay; and, with all due deference to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, if my own opinion were consulted in the matter, I should say, that the Supreme Court of Canada, possessed, as its members were, of an intimate knowledge pertaining to our institutions, our laws, and the Dominion of Canada in all the phases of its institutions, constitution and laws, was more capable than any other body of jurists in existence to pass upon this question. The judgment of the Judicial Committee recites briefly one of the reasons that had weight with the Supreme Court in giving their decision that an appeal did not lie in this case. It is as follows:—

The learned Chief Justice of the Supreme Court was much pressed by the consideration that there is an inherent right in a legislature to repeal its own legislative Acts and that “every presumption must be made in favour of the constitutional right of a legislative body to repeal the laws which it has itself enacted.”

This, among other reasons, was given in the judgment of the Supreme Court for deciding that no appeal lay in this case, but the case was carried to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the decision of that committee was that an appeal did lie. And it is fair to say that in the appeal before that Council the case went practically by default. The minority had the benefit of the talents of one of the most eminent lawyers in the British Empire. Mr. Blake, and associated with him was a lawyer thoroughly conversant with every phase of this case, Mr. Ewart, of Winnipeg, while the Manitoba government was practically unrepresented by counsel during that trial. At the eleventh hour, certain English barristers, entirely ignorant of all the phases of the case, were employed, and I think I may say, without disrespect to these gentlemen, that their services were almost entirely useless. The Privy Council gave its decision, and that decision, we must bear in mind, was that the power conferred upon the Privy Council of Canada was purely and entirely a political power. It was not a mandate which the Privy Council gave by their decision, it was a permission to the Privy Council of Canada to make, in its discretion, regulations with regard to this matter. It was a judgment that permitted the Privy Council of Canada, in its discretion, to refuse to do anything in this matter. It was left to them purely as a political question. I find on page 209 of the blue-book laid before Parliament, that Lord Shand asked:

If the appeal is before the Governor, would he be entitled to take political considerations into view ?

It would seem, Sir, as if Lord Shand was asking the direction of Mr. Blake with regard to this matter; and I have no doubt that the talents and well-known reputation of Mr. Blake had a very great influence with the four lords of the Privy Council who sat in judgment upon the case. Mr. Blake replied: "Doubtless." Then Lord Shand asked :

It is not a mere construction. That is out of it. It would be purely political. I suppose ?

Mr. Blake—It is not out of it. That is one of the reasons we are here. Suppose the case of post union privileges granted and retracted, more or less, then the Council has to decide, first of all, whether the case comes within the law at all; secondly, whether there has been such a retraction, and then they proceed to decide what they think ought to be done in order to give the minority substantially the position which has been withdrawn from them.

Lord Shand—Surely, if it were not a question of a political character, to some extent, that would be determined by the courts of law ?

Mr. Blake—In my conception, after His Excellency in Council has got rid of this preliminary question and by the light that the courts of justice throw upon the construction of the statutes, has found that there is a case for entertaining an appeal, he proceeds to deal with that ex necessitate rei in a political sense, because what is to be done ? Council is to say to the legislature of Manitoba, we think such and such things should be done in order to restore to the minority the rights which we think they had and which we think they ought to have back again.

The Lord Chancellor—All we have to see is what we think the jurisdiction of the Governor General is.

Mr. Blake—The question whether upon the whole, acting in the political capacity, the Privy Council believe that they ought not to act, or to act in what we may consider a lame and half-hearted way, or to go the whole length of our demand, is no part of the question I have to submit to your lordships.

Lord Watson—I suppose we are bound to give him advice in this appeal. He has asked nothing else than advice throughout. He has not asked for a political decision, which can fetter him in any way.

Mr. Blake—It could not be. The law which creates the tribunal for the purpose of giving advice expressly states that, in their political capacity, they are not bound by that advice.

Then Mr. Ewart, on page 236, in summing up the case, uses this language :

Before closing, I would like to say a word or two as to what we are seeking. As it has been already remarked, we are not asking for any declaration as to the extent of the relief to be given by the Governor General. We merely ask that it should be held that he has jurisdiction to hear our prayer, and to grant us some relief if he thinks proper to do so.

It is to be left entirely to his discretion to grant us some relief if he thinks proper to do so.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. Blake says, on page 328, the last remark but one made by that gentleman during this trial :

What we ask your lordships is, what the privileges were, how far they have been infringed, and then we propose to ask the Governor General to determine how far he will go. I do not ask your lordships to make any suggestion as to his action, which I conceive from the beginning is political.

This, then, is a political question, clearly defined to be such by the lords of the Privy Council, clearly admitted to be such by Mr. Blake and Mr. Ewart, the counsel for the appellants in the trial before that judicial body. The question is a political one, and the Privy Council of Canada, when it proceeded to act upon this question assumed to act judicially, when, in fact, it was acting politically. It assumed functions which it did not fulfil. It assumed judicial functions which it did not perform, and it acted purely and entirely in a political sense. What was the character of the trial or the hearing ? The minority, of course, was heard. Mr. Ewart, who was thoroughly familiar with the question, was there. He was prepared to proceed with the investigation. He had no reason to ask for delay. The Manitoba government had been summoned, and they appeared in the person of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). The necessary adjournment for hearing fully this case was denied. In fact, the Privy Council heard the minority and refused to hear the majority, and proceeded to give its decision without having permitted the majority to present its case; and after having done this, it printed evidence which was not in evidence, and virtually the whole transaction betrayed its purpose to act not only in a political, but in a partisan sense, and in an unfair, partisan sense. It has acted from the lowest possible motives, while assuming to be a court of justice.

The remedial order was issued on the 21st March, 1894, and that remedial order, in substance, commands the government of Manitoba to restore to the Catholics of that province the privileges they had enjoyed under the law of 1871. It required, in short, that legislature to re-enact a most obnoxious school law, which had been abolished by the Act of 1890, and left the legislature of Manitoba no discretion in the premises. The answer of Manitoba, made June 19th, 1895, should, I imagine, have called a halt. It ought to have impressed upon the Government of this country the propriety, not only the propriety, but the necessity of proceeding in this matter cautiously, and of informing themselves as to all the facts connected with it. That answer set forth the following facts, and contained the following allegations :—

We labour under great difficulties in maintaining an efficient system of primary education. The school taxes bear heavily upon our people. The large amount of land which is free from school taxes and the great extent of country over which our small population is scattered present obstacles to efficiency and progress.

The reforms effected in 1890 have given a strong impetus to educational work, but the difficulties which are inherent in our circumstances have constantly to be met. It will be obvious that the establishment of a set of Roman Catholic schools, followed by a set of Anglican schools and possibly Mennonite, Icelandic and other schools, would so impair our present system that any approach to even the present general standard of efficiency would be quite impossible.

We contemplate the inauguration of such a state of affairs with very grave apprehension. We have no hesitation in saying that there cannot be suggested any measure which, to our minds, would more seriously imperil the development of our province.

We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not available then to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools.

We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order.

Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall cheerfully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.

It is urged most strongly that upon so important a matter, involving, as it does, the religious feelings and convictions of different classes of the people of Canada and the educational interests of a province which is expected to become one of the most important in the Dominion, no hasty action should be taken, but that, on the contrary, the greatest care and deliberation should be exercised and a full and thorough investigation made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the reasons set forth in this answer to the remedial order of this Government made by the government of Manitoba are unanswerable. In my estimation, the setting forth of the facts which are contained in this answer rendered it necessary, imperatively necessary, that the Government, if they desired to act in a fair and judicial spirit, if they professed to be a judicial body, to have listened to these suggestions, and to have accorded to Manitoba what they had not been given before—a fair trial, granting its representatives the opportunity to present the facts which were alleged in this answer to the remedial order, and other facts bearing upon the case. Why, Sir, it was alleged that a large proportion of the children of the province were growing up in illiteracy; it was alleged that the sparseness of the population made the double schools practically impossible. It was alleged that the Catholics were accepting the public school system, and that thirty-seven Catholic separate schools had come under the public school system, and were satisfied with the amendment. It was shown that there were 196 schools in the province of Manitoba, in which the average attendance ran from 4.4 pupils up to a fraction less than ten pupils. At the time of the hearing before the Privy Council, there appeared a gentleman, a Catholic from Manitoba, Mr. O'Donohue. We have no reason to suppose that Mr. O'Donohue was not a representative Catholic, or that he did not voice the wishes and opinions of a very large proportion of the Catholic laity of the province of Manitoba. He tells us that he ran for school trustee in Winnipeg in opposition to Father Langlois, and was elected by an overwhelming majority, that he received 90 per cent of the Roman Catholic vote. He said, in substance, before the Privy Council:

He was a resident of Winnipeg, a public school trustee, a member of the Roman Catholic Church, and a regular attendant. On behalf of a large number of Catholics of that province, he declared that the French schools of Manitoba are not in so satisfactory a state as the Protestant schools. Seldom had he found a French teacher who could speak or teach English. He had made representation to the Archbishop about the matter, and also to the late Premier Norquay. He did not think that 25 per cent of the French youths could write their names, whereas 75 per cent of the Protestant natives could read and write. When the Greenway government came into power he urged Mr. Joseph Martin to try and do something for the separate schools. At that time Mr. Martin did not think the matter was within the power of the province. When the School Act of 1890 was passed he gave it his support, and had no reason to regret his action. He believed if the clergy would allow the people to accept the present system they would do so. Efforts had been put forward by him to obtain a compromise, but his Grace the Archbishop would not consent to it, having been advised by eastern friends to accept nothing short of the repeal of the Act of 1890. There is scarcely a day that passes, but Catholics call upon me to express wishes that matters will shape themselves so that they may be able to send their children to the public school. They do not like to express themselves publicly for the fear of coming into conflict with the clergy. In his election he had been opposed by Father Langlois, who denounced the government as thieves and scoundrels—and yet he had been elected.

Now, if these representations made by Mr. O'Donohue were correct, and if it is a fact that a large majority of the Catholic laity of Manitoba were satisfied with the school system, if it was a fact that thirty-seven Catholic separate schools had passed over and were counted on the roll of public schools, certainly these were matters that demanded the courtesy of an investigation. These were allegations that had a bearing upon this question, these were allegations that this Government, if they acted in fairness, were bound to investigate. They were bound to possess themselves of full knowledge as to the state of public sentiment in Manitoba in this matter, and they were incapable of giving an intelligent decision until such investigation had been made. It was said that the public school system was Protestant. This was denied, and an investigation as to that matter was challenged. It was alleged that the scripture selections used in the public schools were substantially the compilation of selections known as the "Ross Bible," of Ontario, which had been sanctioned by that enlightened prelate, Archbishop Lynch. It was alleged that the form of prayer was entirely undenominational. There are seventy-one selections from the Old Testament, and sixty-six selections from the New Testament, and these were entirely unsectarian, none of them could be said to redound to the benefit of one sect more than to another; they taught morality, the fear of God, the existence of an immortal soul in man. And the form of prayer used was as follows:—

Most merciful God, we yield thee our humble and hearty thanks for thy fatherly care and preservation to us this day, and for the progress which thou hast enabled us to make in useful learning; we pray thee to imprint upon our minds whatever good instructions we have received, and to bless them to the advancement of our temporal and eternal welfare; and pardon, we implore thee, all that thou hast seen amiss in our thoughts, words and actions. May thy good providence still guide and keep us during the approaching interval of rest and relaxation; also that we may be prepared to enter on the duties of the morrow with renewed vigour, both of body and mind; and preserve us we beseech thee, now and for ever, both outwardly in our bodies and inwardly in our souls, for the sake of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord, Amen.

Now, is there anything objectionable in that form of prayer? Can that be said to be a Protestant prayer? It is a Christian prayer, a prayer that can be used by every man who believes that there is a Lord and Saviour. The allegations that these schools were Protestant schools is denied, and that denial and the facts upon which it is based ought to have been investigated by this Government. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), in his speech a day or two ago, said that the province of Manitoba, though they asked an investigation, did not say what they wanted to have investigated. He said, moreover, that the facts were all known, and that there was no need of an investigation. Now, who knows the facts as to the condition of public sentiment among the Catholic laity of Manitoba? Who knows the facts as to the character of the scripture reading, the character of the prayer? Who knows anything of the many other facts that are pertinent to this question, and that must be known and understood before an intelligent answer can be given? The Minister is entirely mistaken when he says that the facts are known; the material facts are not known, they are in dispute. The government of Manitoba says the material facts require investigation before this Government is in a position to give an order. The hon. Minister says, also, that they had an entire week, that they had most eminent counsel, and every opportunity to make known their case. When the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) first appeared before the Privy Council, he asked for a stay of proceedings until the case for Manitoba could be presented. The first remarks made by that hon. gentleman before the Privy Council, were as follows:—

Mr. McCarthy—Mr. President and gentlemen of the Privy Council, I appear here for the province of Manitoba, and before the argument is entered upon, I desire to state on behalf of the government of Manitoba that they have had no opportunity of making any preparation for this argument, that the notice of this meeting was only received by them by telegraph on Saturday week. As you know, the provincial government are now busily engaged in the work of conducting the session; under the circumstances they say that there is no possibility for them to prepare an argument, or to give that attention to the matter which its importance demands. I am desired, therefore, by the Attorney General "to protest," to use his own language, "and most vigorously, against the absolutely short notice which has been given." I do that now respectfully, before the argument is entered upon, as of course it would not be fair to my learned friend, who appears for the minority, to allow him make his argument, and then for me to make this statement.

Well, how was that received by the Privy Council? Here is the fact set forth that the legislature of Manitoba is in session, that the Attorney General of that province is unable to leave his sessional duties and proceed to Ottawa. It is quite evident, I imagine, to any person that it would be a matter of importance to have the Attorney General of Manitoba present at a trial that affected so seriously the interests of his province. He was naturally more familiar with the circumstances of the case than even my learned friend, the counsel who appeared on behalf of that province, because he was an actor in all these scenes, and he knew exactly what the position and the contention of Manitoba was. The Premier asked Mr. McCarthy:

Sir Mackenzie Bowell—I was going to ask you, Mr. McCarthy, what time would you require to prepare your argument?

Mr. McCarthy—It is not so much for myself I am speaking as for the Attorney General; and what I rather gathered from him, though he has not said so in words, was that he desired to have been here himself. It is a matter which involves the educational system of the province, a question which, of course, has attracted a great deal of attention in Manitoba, and has been a subject of discussion in more than one session. I think what he would like is such a postponement as would enable him to go on with the work of the session and to come here after the session. You are aware, of course, that Mr. Greenway, the First Minister, is ill, and the leadership of the House, I suppose, devolves upon Mr. Sifton, the Attorney General. He instructed me that he telegraphed to this effect on Saturday, to the Secretary of State.

Now, I would like to inquire, Mr. Speaker, what possible reason, that would be a reasonable one, could be assigned for refusing a postponement of this hearing long enough to allow the Attorney General of Manitoba, who was leading the legislature in that province, to remain there the few days that would elapse before the close of that session, and then come to Ottawa and proceed to act as the counsel for Manitoba in that trial? If any reason could be assigned, that would be a reasonable one, I am unable to understand it. The Government refused this request. They gave to the counsel who appeared on behalf of Manitoba, time to telegraph to Winnipeg, time to have some documents sent down, and one or two persons to come here, the Minister of Education and Mr. O'Donohue, to assist him in the investigation; but they gave no adequate time for the preparation of the case of Manitoba in this most important trial; and the decision arrived at was distinctly upon the ground that they could not wait, that they must have the hearing concluded before the Manitoba legislature adjourned, in order that that legislature might have time to act upon its deliverance before its adjournment. Is there not some significance in that? Does that not imply that the decision the Privy Council were to arrive at was a foregone conclusion that they had decided beforehand to issue a remedial order, and that they must sit and finish the investigation and issue that order before the legislature of Manitoba had adjourned? If they were in uncertainty as to what their order would be, if it was just as likely to be a conclusion not to meddle with the matter as a conclusion to meddle with it, it would not have made any difference. But for some reason, they must have that order issued before the Manitoba legislature adjourned, that adjournment was a few days off, and consequently they could not allow the counsel for Manitoba more than three or four days to prepare their case. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the issuing of that order was decided upon before the case was heard; I believe that it was perfectly useless for Mr. McCarthy, or Attorney General Sifton, or anybody else to have appeared before that Privy Council, because no earthly power, and no amount of reasoning, no amount of proof, could have changed the order that that Privy Council had decided to issue.

Now, Sir, in connection with the constitutional question we are considering here, let me call attention for a moment to the American federal example. Of course, the American system is the pattern of all federal systems. It was the first federal system devised, it is a federal system which has been found to be in the highest degree advantageous to the states living under it. It has worked smoothly; and its general provisions, as bearing upon this case, are perhaps worthy of a moment's notice. Under that system there is no federal veto of a state law. The government at Washington cannot interfere with a state law; it is beyond their powers. Under that system there is no federal supervision of state legislation; the government and congress at Washington can under no circumstances review the legislation of a state. Under that system an unconstitutional law, whether federal or state, may be set aside by the Supreme Court of the United States. Any law that is unconstitutional—and it is worth while bearing in mind that the Manitoba law is declared to be constitutional by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—under that system every state law was left untouched; under that system all the reserved powers belong, not to the general government, but to the state; and as I said, the test of experience has proved that that is a wise and smoothly working system. Whether our own system is as good, I do not pretend to say; but it does strike me that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, taking the ground that it is impossible to believe that the legislature should not have power to repeal its own enactments, is a sound and constitutional one. But as I said, our constitution unquestionably vests in this Government and in this Parliament the powers that are sought to be exercised upon this occasion under the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

I think it must be apparent to any person who is conversant with the state of public opinion in this country, who is conversant with the ease with which racial and religious animosities are aroused in this country, I say I think it must be apparent to any person who is conversant with these facts, that the gravity of the situation which we are facing to-day, demands prudence and forbearance upon the part of the Government; and I declare that in my belief the Government have neither exercised prudence or forbearance in this matter. They have acted hastily, they have acted precipitately, they have placed themselves in a false position; and the consequences may be very serious to this country. Conciliation should have been exhausted, entirely exhausted, before the last resort was taken, instead of taking the last resort at the very commencement, without any attempt at conciliation. No attempt at conciliation had been made, the remedial order was issued at once, and when the legislature of Manitoba asked for a stay of proceedings, asked that the government might be heard, which had not yet been heard, their petition was treated with contempt.

Now, Sir, when this case came before the Government, there were three courses open to them, and either one of these courses was strictly constitutional. The first course open to the Government was to refuse action. The judgment of the Judicial Committee established that this was a political question, and that the matter was in the discretion of the Privy Council of Canada. The clause in the British North America Act which gives this power, says "may make;" it is permissive; and the Government has in all these cases the right to act upon its own judgment. They could then, either have refused action ; or, in the second place, they could have acted upon the lines of conciliation ; they could have decided to learn fully the facts, they could have proceeded slowly, proceeded to learn what the condition of public sentiment was in Manitoba, proceeded to learn what Manitoba had to offer as a reason for the repeal of the law of 1871 ; and having exhausted all the resources of conciliation, they could then, as a last resort, have proceeded to do what they did at the outset. Or they could, in the third place, do exactly as they have done, pursue the course they have pursued. Each of these courses would have been constitutional, but the last certainly was not advisable.

The Government's situation, I must confess, is not a very desirable one, and I do not accuse the Government of having reached this situation by premeditation. I do not believe that the Government anticipated the turn of affairs that has occurred. I believe the remedial order was predicated upon the decision to have an immediate dissolution of Parliament. I believe that the Government expected to go immediately to the country ; they expected to secure the support of the hierarchy, they expected to be able to conciliate their supporters in the west, as the Minister of Agriculture did in Haldimand. They probably would have been able to do it ; that was their design. It was a good plan, and, if carried into effect, they might have carried the country ; but an accident occurred—at least, I imagine so.

Mr. CAMERON. There will be another soon.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is necessary to have funds in going to elections, especially with a Government like this. An Order in Council had been passed before the remedial order, by which Order in Council $2,500,000 were granted to the Hudson Bay Railway Company, for the purpose of constructing a portion of that line which would cost not to exceed $1,600,000. That would leave a surplus of $900,000. I do not know that I have the evidence, but I imagine that the arrangement with the Government was, to get the election fund out of the surplus of $900,000, and that arrangement being made the remedial order being issued, they were ready to drop the hat and go into the race. But a screw got loose. The men who had to put up the money had their doubts ; they doubted whether the Order in Council was as good as a statute ; they doubted whether the Government would win the elections or not, and, if the Government were defeated, they had doubts as to whether they would get their money back. So they concluded, that there would have to be a statute passed before they would advance the funds. The remedial order was issued. It was just a little too soon. The plan went astray, and the Government were in trouble both as to lack of funds and as to having issued the remedial order, which has come home to vex them, which has proved a curse to them.

This political move having been made, the Government must justify it. They could not accept the petition of Manitoba on 19th January, asking that the false step might be retraced, asking that an investigation, which should have been made at the outset, should then be made, asking that the fact should be laid bare by an inquiry. False pride deterred the Government from listening to this reasonable request, and they decided to justify the political move they had made. And how did they proceed to do it ? They said : We were sitting in Council as a judicial body ; we had presented to us a mandate from the highest judicial body in the Empire, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council ; that mandate commanded us to do certain things ; it commanded us to relieve the minority of Manitoba from the grievances under which they laboured ; we had no choice, we had to proceed at once with action, without permitting Manitoba to be heard before us, without deigning to listen as to what the facts were—we had to proceed at once to issue this remedial order for adjusting the grievances under which the minority of Manitoba laboured, and we have been acting under constraint, we have been acting as a judicial body under a mandate of a higher judicial body. The position is false—the premises and the conclusions are false. There was no mandate of the Privy Council, there was nothing but a permissive declaration from that body, which expressly stated, that the action of the Privy Council would be political in its character, and the Governor in Council might give or might not give, the redress which the minority might choose to ask. This statement was expressly made by the lords of the Privy Council ; it was expressly made by both of the counsel on behalf of Manitoba before that body ; and, when the Government assumed this position with respect to acting as a judicial body and being constrained by virtue of the order issued to act as they have done, they took a false position and one calculated, whether designedly or not, to deceive the electorate of this country.

There is great solicitude for the constitution. It must be preserved. But there is no particular solicitude for the people. There is great solicitude for the Protestants of Quebec. If we do not give to the minority of Manitoba a remedy for their grievances, the interests of the Protestant minority in Quebec, they say, might suffer, they might even be swept away, and the people of Quebec might rise in consequence of the feeling of hostility engendered, and deprive the Protestant minority in Quebec of their rights. There is no parallel between the cases. The Protestants in the province of Quebec enjoy the privileges they possess on the same terms as the Catholic minority in Ontario enjoy their privileges. Those privileges were a matter of treaty, a matter of negotiation, a matter of compromise; they were secured for the respective minorities of those two provinces long anterior to confederation. They were ratified by the British North America Act, they are part of the constitution of this country, they cannot be touched. If the rights of the minority in Quebec or in Ontario were infringed by legislation in either of those provinces, it would be the duty of the Government instantly to disallow such legislation. Such legislation would be clearly unconstitutional. The separate school system could not be legally abolished without amending or modifying the British North America Act, and to secure such modification would require the action of this Dominion Parliament, the concurrence of the provinces interested and the action of the Home Government. The cases are entirely dissimilar. When the British North America Act was promulgated and its provisions with respect to separate schools were made, there were only four provinces in the Dominion. The Act primarily applied to those provinces; it actually applied to but two of those provinces, Ontario and Quebec. There are at this moment five provinces in the Dominion without separate schools. In one of the provinces the question is at stake now. If we are to favour separate schools in Manitoba, ought we not, as a matter of justice, to favour separate schools in British Columbia, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island? Is there not danger that, if we favour separate schools in Manitoba, forced upon that province in the manner now proposed, that the next turn of the wheel, if the present party remains in power, may be to force separate schools on the other provinces? This is a dangerous question. It has been decided that there were no privileges enjoyed by the Catholic minority in Manitoba at the time of the union that were infringed upon by the School Act of 1890. But it cannot be said, that there were no privileges enjoyed by the Catholic minority in Ontario and the Protestant minority in Quebec at the time of the union that would not be infringed upon, because those privileges are enjoyed under the constitution and existed before and were embodied in the constitution and are a part of the constitution.

This movement, Mr. Speaker, is a purely political one. It has been taken for the purpose of securing political support; it has been taken for the purpose of securing success in the coming general elections. It has been taken, I repeat, precipitately and unadvisedly. It has been taken in a way likely to stir up religious animosities, and worse yet, to stir up racial animosities. The advisers of the Crown who have chosen to take this course, actuated by the motives that have actuated them, are not the friends of this country; they are the enemies of this Dominion. They are taking a course that may result in serious disaster to this Dominion. Have the minority sustained a grievance? It has not been proved. That is one of the things that require investigation. It has not been proved that the minority in Manitoba esteem that they have sustained a grievance. That is one of the things which the government of Manitoba ask to have investigated. They say that thirty-seven of these separate schools have become public schools, and if Mr. O'Donohue is the mouthpiece of the majority of the Catholics of Manitoba, as he professes to be, then these people do not esteem that they have sustained a grievance. There should have been at least the courtesy of an investigation extended to a sovereign province of this Dominion. We should have learned by investigation, what were the views entertained, what were the motives that actuated them, what were the purposes that they proposed to follow, what were the considerations that influenced the Manitoba majority in the legislation of 1890. We should have given the courtesy of consideration and of investigation to these views, these motives, these purposes, and these circumstances. And, in the absence of the extension of that courtesy to this province, this measure must create—I do not say it may create, I do not say it is probable that it will create—but I say it must create discord and enmity. It will do it. Is it not of some importance to maintain this confederation? Does any reasonable man suppose that the province of Manitoba, with the character of the population which it possesses, will ever be dragooned or coerced into obedience to this remedial order? Do the Government of the day desire to drive Manitoba and the great North-west, the future seat of empire in this Dominion, into secession? Do they desire to render it probable, that these people will begin to consider the geographical and natural affinity that exists between that great region and the Mississippi valley? Why, these men are the enemies of Canada? These men are trifling with interests, the magnitude of which they fail to comprehend. These men are facing a danger that may shatter this confederation into fragments. I can tell you, Sir, that the state of sentiment that exists in the Dominion with regard to this matter, although it may be, in a degree, slumbering at the present moment, may be roused into a condition that will threaten this confederation. We do not know, Sir, to what extent this flame may burn. We do not know how far this wave of indignation may run, and this Government that issued this remedial order at the commencement instead of at the end of investigation, this Government that refused to take into consideration the reasons that actuated the province of Manitoba, that refused an adjournment for a few days, in order that the Attorney General of Manitoba who was then leading the legislature of that province, and could not leave, might be in Ottawa to represent his province; I say that this Government that adopted this scheme of forcing Manitoba into the traces, without listening to her reasons for having passed the legislation it did; this Government has outraged decency, and insulted Manitoba, and insulted every citizen in this country who entertains a sense of justice. This Government, Sir, is clearly and absolutely in the wrong. If we are to become a nation, we have got to have harmony. We have got to secure harmony. We have got to move in a direction that will result in a greater assimilation of the people of this Dominion, and in a greater degree of homogeneity than exists at the present moment. We have got to smooth down racial disturbances, and religious disturbances, and in order to do that, it is necessary to adopt a policy of conciliation, a policy of mutual regard, a policy that will command us at all times, and compel us at all times, to listen to the just objections and reasons that may be urged by any section of the people of this Dominion.

And, Sir, this debate has developed one circumstance that will stand as an epoch in the history of this Dominion, the attitude taken by the leader of the Liberal party. He has deliberately placed country before race. He has deliberately placed country before religion, before sect. He has deliberately taken his position as a patriot, with the patriotic desire to act in the interest of all the people of Canada. He has, while affirming the right of every individual in Canada, whether lay or clerical, to his political opinions, and to his right to act upon his political opinions; he has, while expressing the greatest reverence and regard for his church, distinctly and emphatically repudiated ecclesiastical dictation in political affairs. He stands upon the principles of liberty, of equality, of justice, of recognition of the great fact, that civil rights and civil power must be superior to all other powers in civil affairs. Now, Sir, this example set by the leader of the Liberal party, points the way to the realization of that condition of things in this country, that will make of Canada a nation. The course taken by my hon. friends in the Government, in the matter of the remedial order, points the way to a condition of things that will set race at war with race, religion at war with religion, faction at war with faction, province at war with province, and may result in the disruption of this confederation. The Government, Mr. Speaker, have not only proceeded with rashness, with precipitancy, and without sense, in the issuing of the remedial order, and in their subsequent conduct, but they are prepared to enter upon a system of deception, by assuring the west that this Bill is entirely useless, that there is no need to pay any attention to it, that it does not amount to anything at all, and that it is merely a tub thrown to the whale. I can foresee, by indications I have seen in this House, that this is the course that every Protestant supporter of this Bill will take when he goes back to his constituents in the west. I can foresee, that he will say that the Bill does not amount to anything, that the party, for party purposes, had to conciliate the ecclesiastical power, and that they have passed a Bill which amuses them and does not hurt us.

Mr. FOSTER. All that you would have to do to prove that, is to quote some of your own people.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps so. All that they would have to do would be to tell the truth, as it exists to-day, with regard to my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) and his colleagues. There are certain features in connection with this Bill that are very grave features, indeed. I suppose the legislation, if it passes this House, is irrevocable. Whether it is right or wrong, judicious or injudicious, we can deal with it no more. That is said to be the case. This Bill will inevitably produce serious strife in this Dominion. It is a Bill that will be the beginning of a crop of litigation, the end of which no man can see. Manitoba may, as a first move, take an appeal against this Bill on the ground that it is not in the terms of the order. If it loses that appeal, it may next take an appeal against this Bill on the ground that the legislation was not submitted to Manitoba, and that this Government superseded the exercise of provincial legislative functions, before having given Manitoba an opportunity to say whether she would accept this condition or not. And when these two appeals are heard, if both are dismissed, the ingenuity of lawyers would concoct a dozen more reasons, and would keep this matter in litigation until the middle of next century, if necessary. And this measure, even if a grievance exists, even admitting that a grievance exists, this measure of coercion will inflict a greater grievance than the grievance it is designed to remedy. The grievance it is designed to remedy is a minor grievance compared with the grievance it will create.

Some of our friends from Ontario manifest a very inconsistent attitude on this matter. For instance, my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) was the associate of a P.P.A., and his colleague in the local legislature is this same P.P.A., who denounces Sir Oliver Mowat because he permits separate schools to exist in Ontario, and demands their abolition in that province. That gentleman is a representative in the local House of the same party of which the hon. member for East Lambton is a representative in this House; and yet the hon. gentleman stands up here and advocates the forcing of the separate schools on a province, while his colleague in the local legislature demands the abolition of separate schools in a province where they existed anterior to the constitution, and where they are recognized by the constitution.

There is another feature of this matter which is as grave as any that I have yet alluded to. I refer to the attack on the independence of Parliament—the revamping of old tactics; placing financial considerations before members; dangling before their eyes judgeships, senatorships, collectorships, places in the Civil Service—reminding me of the old days when members of this House were given timber limits, grazing leases, colonization grants and other considerations to make them solid. To those members who have promises of judgeships, senatorships, collectorships or offices in the Civil Service, it does not matter whether they are going back to their constituents or not. It does not matter to them whether they are recreant to their constituents—whether they have violated the wishes of their constituents in the most flagrant manner. They do not care; they will support the Government in this scheme; they will receive their reward.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad to see that the hon. member's health is improving.

Mr. CHARLTON. The system is, in short, a refined and decorous mode of bribing. We come to bribery at last, though covered up, sugar-coated, decorous in its character. Every member of this House who votes for this Bill against the wishes of his constituents, and afterwards receives an appointment from this Government, has been bribed. He has been bribed to violate the principles on which he was elected; he has proved recreant to the principles of free government; he is a traitor to the wishes of the people whom he represents. There ought to be a way of curing this, and I believe there is a way of curing it. That way would be simply by a cancellation of those appointments. And, when the day comes, as it is coming very soon, when the Liberal party will be in power, it will be worth the while of that party to consider whether those appointments, made after a moribund Parliament had ceased to be a moribund Parliament—because they will not be made until after this Parliament is prorogued—made by a Government that is living, not on borrowed time, but on purloined time—should be recognized or not. I hold that justice would be vindicated and a wholesome example set for the future if every one of those appointments were cancelled; and I pledge myself to use every influence I possess to have every one of them, to the last one, cancelled. Every one who becomes a judge, or a senator, or a collector, or an office-bearer of any kind under the Government, after having voted for this Bill will have justly excited suspicion and should be made an example of by the cancellation of his appointment. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but the time is coming when this will not, perhaps, be laughed at. The legislation of this Parliament has been tampered with long enough by the corrupt influences of a corrupt Government.

The advocacy of this measure, whether it passes or not, is a fitting close to the career of an Administration marked by such legislation as the gerrymander Act, which enables one-half of the electors of Ontario to elect two-thirds of the representatives in this Parliament; the Franchise Act, which places in the hands of the appointees of the Government the making of the lists, and permits the printing of those lists in the Government's own office here, under the supervision of their own officials, where they may be stuffed to any extent the Government please, without any power to remedy the outrage. It is a fitting close to the career of a Government who have practised the system of boodling scientifically and by wholesale; who have made gifts of timber limits and colonization lands to its friends in this House; who have bribed ridings, not in one case or in a dozen cases or in a score of cases, but in fifty or a hundred cases by the appropriation of money for the construction of useless public works, their only motive being to influence votes in the ridings where the grants were made.

Now, Sir, this motion for the six months' hoist, which I shall support, demands the support of every advocate of provincial rights, whether he believes interference with provincial legislation should be permitted or not. It demands the support of those who believe in a thorough and impartial investigation of all the facts of the matter before action is taken. It demands the support of those who believe that the Bill affords no adequate remedy for an assumed grievance. All three of these classes, if they act on their convictions, will vote for the six months' hoist.

At what stage of the life of this Parliament is this Bill under consideration? Is this the fourth or fifth session? It is the sixth session of this Parliament. This House was elected five years ago on the 5th of this month. It has lived out its day. The Government should have gone to the country before this time. In 1891, after Parliament had held four sessions, the Government dissolved it on the false pretext that they were negotiating a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and were about to submit that treaty to Parliament, but did not wish to submit it to a moribund House. That House had still one session before its term expired. Yet here is a measure infinitely more important to the future of this country than any reciprocity treaty—a measure which may seal the doom of this confederation if it is successful, and this same Government, whose conscientious scruples would not permit them to refer a reciprocity treaty to a moribund House four years old, are referring this measure of infinitely greater importance to a moribund House which is now in its sixth year. Sir, the Government's assumptions in 1891 were false assumptions, I judge, from the course they have taken in this case. If the statements made by the Government in 1891 were true, the reference of a reciprocity treaty to Parliament at that time would have been proper; but the reference of this Bill to this Parliament is improper. Its five years have expired; its time has come; and it ought before this to have been sent about its business. This question ought not to have been referred to this moribund House. It is a question upon which the Government ought to have been informed by the people. It is a question that should have been referred to the people at the polls. A question so vital to the future of this Dominion should have been dealt with by a Parliament fresh from the people, and not by a Parliament in which it is reported twenty or thirty members have promises in their pockets of judgeships, senatorships, collectorships or other offices, and in which the will of the people will be defied by the corrupt tactics of a corrupt Government.

Mr. FORBES. It has occurred to me that the Government should have ere this put their position more clearly on the records of this country showing why this Bill should carry. I was in hopes that another section of the Government, those who pretend to uphold this Bill as a satisfaction of the demands of the minority of Manitoba, would have expressed their views, so that we could have seen wherein the Government were making efforts to justify this Bill as a full and ample satisfaction of the demands of the minority of Manitoba. But they have not seen fit to do so. They have, by their action, conveyed the impression that the members of the Government, representing the faith of the minority in Manitoba, have lent themselves to the tactics of the Government in covering up and hiding out of sight the scheme initiated and endeavoured to be perpetrated for the purpose of keeping the minority from obtaining what they claim to be their just rights. Sir, if the representatives in the Cabinet, who pose as the champions of the alleged oppressed minority, saw fit to explain wherein this measure would carry out fully the promise made to the minority, we would have had the arguments on both sides of the case. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) really represented the views of the Government when speaking on this Bill, because the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) did nothing but relate matters of ancient history which had no bearing on it. In one point alone did the hon. Secretary of State speak with any relevancy to this Bill before us; but to do justice to the Minister of Justice, he really made an endeavour by argument to sustain the Bill. But he failed to satisfy this House and the country that the arguments he put forth were such as should convince self-thinking men that this measure should become law.

Great stress, Mr. Speaker, is laid on the fact that the Government are compelled to enact a Bill similar in terms to the remedial order of the 21st March, or so framed as to embrace the chief and salient points of that celebrated Order in Council, in order to remedy, as they allege, the grievances under which the minority in Manitoba are suffering. In other words, they claim that the minority have a legal and just claim to come to this Parliament and demand a remedy in the exact terms of the Order in Council of the 23rd March last. Except the Government take the ground that the right of the minority exists by virtue of our constitution and that the Privy Council have decided that this Bill should be enacted, the contention of the Minister of Justice, who was the legal mouthpiece of the Government, is absolutely without foundation. I know that it has been asserted, every six months or every three months, for the past five or six years, that there is a legal constitutional right for the oppressed minority to come to this Parliament and demand remedial legislation. But that contention has, to a great extent, been upset by the various arguments which have been advanced from day to day during this debate; and it will only require a few words from me—if the Minister of Justice is not already convinced of the error of his ways by the arguments which have been adduced by able constitutional authorities in this country—to convince him that there is no legal obligation on the part of Canada to restore those rights to the same extent—I am even prepared to go so far as to say that there is no legal obligation on the part of Parliament to restore those rights to any extent, as they existed before the Act of 1890 was passed. Let me refer for a few moments to the several sections of the argument made before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, where the Hon. Edward Blake handled the case, as senior counsel on behalf of the minority. The right of appeal is made under section 22 of the Manitoba Act and section 93 of the British North America Act. They differ very slightly in words but materially in fact. Section 22 of the Manitoba Act, says:

In and for the province, the said legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject to and according to the following provisions:—

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

2. An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

3. In case any such provincial law, as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority, in that behalf, then, and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

Now, the Act of British North America is practically the same with the exception of section 2, which says :

All the powers, privileges, and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor in Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

Then, subsection 4 gives the remedy, in the event of a provincial law taking away any of these privileges. It provides :

Then, and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

The hon. Secretary of State, in quoting that section, claimed that there was legal obligation upon Parliament to enact the proposed legislation, because, he said that the word "may" is used, and he asked whether we were going to refuse justice to the minority because the option of refusing it was given Parliament. Sir, the Parliament of Canada does not stand in the position of being obliged to take away what was an alleged right because the word "may" is used in the constitution; because it has the discretion of granting or refusing to grant that remedy to the minority. No, Sir; we go further than that. We say that there stands behind the constitution of Canada an undoubted right of the minority of any province in this confederation to have its rights protected so far as those rights have been guaranteed by the Act of union when the provinces formed the union known as the Dominion of Canada. This section 22 of the Manitoba Act and section 93 of the British North America Act differ in the use of the words "by practice" in addition to the words "by law." Now, it has been decided that these words mean practically nothing; they have no legal effect whatever. Yet we find the hon. Minister of Justice in his speech saying that coercion was justifiable and necessary in order to maintain rights acquired "by practice" under these words. In order to make this phase of the question more emphatic and more clear I will read what a distinguished Queen's Counsel of Nova Scotia has lately written for the public press, in commenting upon the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice. I refer to Mr. Benjamin Russell, Q.C., Professor in Dalhousie Law University. Mr. Russell, in his exhaustive letter upon the speech of the Minister of Justice as referring to this section, says :

We do not, however, advance the argument very far when we have settled this point, for I freely grant that it is not a conclusive answer to a proposed measure of legislation to show that it involves coercion. Coercion may be justifiable and necessary, and the whole question at issue at the present moment is whether the present condition of the Manitoba school legislation is such that the coercive proceedings now proposed by the Federal Government and recommended to the Dominion Parliament for its adoption are justifiable and necessary. Mr. Dickey contends that they are, and as he is the highest legal authority in the House of Commons, as well as one of the most fair-minded and reasonable men on either side of the House—

I quite concur in which —we may expect to find in his speech the strongest presentation of the case for coercion that can possibly be made. * * * * *

The Act by which Manitoba became a province of the Dominion provided that nothing in any law passed by the Manitoba legislature should prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons had by law or practice in the province at the union. It was thought that by virtue of this provision, differing as it does from the general provision of the British North America Act with reference to the rights and privileges of minorities by the addition of the words "or practice," which are not used in the British North America Act, the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba were entitled to separate schools supported by public grants of money, or at all events to be exempted from taxation for the support of national schools, although at the date of the union it is admitted as one of the unquestioned facts of history that there were no school laws within the boundaries of the province, no public school tax and no public schools, whether Protestant, Catholic or secular, all the schools in the province being purely private enterprises supported by fees and out of church funds. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest court in the Empire for us, negatived this contention and decided that the Public School Act of Manitoba did not prejudicially affect any right or privilege of the Roman Catholic minority with respect to denominational schools, enjoyed at the union either by law or practice, that no such rights or privileges existed, and therefore the Manitoba School Act was perfectly constitutional and valid. As to this Mr. Dickey says that "if the Parliament of Canada had properly expressed its meaning at that time," the time when the Manitoba Act of 1870 was passed—"there would have been no Manitoba school question now on our hands, because the Act of 1890 would have been declared ultra vires of the province."

I do not know what the hon. Minister of Justice means us to infer from that, unless it be that he would have vetoed the Act of 1890. Mr. Russell continues :

The decision of the tribunal of last resort is the best and only authority as to the meaning of Parliament. No doubt those who secured the insertion of the words safe-guarding the rights or privileges enjoyed "by practice" attached importance to them, and supposed that they conferred on the minority in Manitoba some advantages which would not have been acquired by the adoption of the provisions contained in the British North America Act. But the Dominion Parliament can no more be held, by the use of these words, to have affirmed a proposition that there were rights or privileges enjoyed "by practice" at the time of the union than they can be held to have affirmed the existence of rights or privileges enjoyed "by law" at the time of the union by the use of the latter term, which also occurs in the Manitoba Act. Nobody pretends that there were any such rights or privileges enjoyed "by law" at the time of the union in Manitoba, because there was no law in relation to the question. The only inference that can be drawn from the insertion of the words in question is that the Dominion Parliament was willing and desirous in 1870 of giving the minority or whatever class in the community might thereafter in the mutations of time become the minority, whatever protection such a provision would afford valet quantum, to secure to them any rights or privileges that they might be held to have enjoyed at the time of the union, leaving it entirely an open question whether any such rights or privileges actually existed or not—a question which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has answered emphatically and clearly in the negative.

The Manitoba School Act having been thus determined to be absolutely valid and constitutional, it is not easy to understand Mr. Dickey's contention that it is necessary for Parliament to interpose for the purpose "of redressing a substantial wrong that has been properly proved." In making that contention, Mr. Dickey is surely begging the question, as he is also, in another form of words, when he says that "the Manitoba minority have come to sue for justice," and asks "if the House will refuse them justice." Certainly if there is a wrong it must in some way be redressed, and certainly no Parliament can be got together in this Dominion that will not on such a subject as this do justice. But where is the wrong, and where is justice? A wrong, as I understand it, is the violation or refusal of a right. If there be no right there can be no wrong. The Privy Council has decided that the Roman Catholic minority have no right to claim the establishment of a separate school system. How then can there be any wrong done them in the abolition of that system? It would certainly be a very strange constitution that would enact that a system of separate schools established by a provincial legislature in 1870 could not be legally abolished by the same legislature in 1890. Mr. Dickey's theory of our constitution involves this monstrous proposition, that if the legislature of Nova Scotia should at its next session establish a system of separate schools for Roman Catholics and the provincial government should be defeated on that issue at the ensuing general election, the incoming legislature could not properly or effectively repeal the Act and take away the right or privilege which its own legislation had created. An appeal would lie to the Dominion authorities in such a case as it lies to the Dominion authorities in the present case. The argument would be precisely the same. The cases would be absolutely identical. The aggrieved minority would have precisely the same rights that it has in the present instance. The decision of the Privy Council would be precisely the same as in the present case and would possibly be accompanied by the same extrajudicial advice to the Canadian Parliament as to the mode in which it should deal with the subject.

The cases are identically parallel. If the minority of Manitoba had any right at the time of this union "by law," it is clearly established by the Privy Council of England declaring that the Act of 1890, which took away the privileges which they enjoyed by virtue of the statute, was a perfectly constitutional Act that they have lost those rights "by law" also cannot therefore claim any "legal right" to have them restored. The same English Privy Council, in the case of Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg, decided that the words "by practice" had no effect and are a nullity; and section 22 of the Manitoba Act gives them a right of claim on the ground of justice to the minority by virtue of the words "by law or by practice at the time of the union" in that section. If, I say, it has been decided by the Privy Council of England that these two collections of words, "by law" and "by practice," practically mean nothing, then I say I am correct, and the Minister of Justice is wrong, and the minority have no right to come to Parliament and say they should have what they claim to be their grievances redressed by Parliament as a matter of "constitutional right," and by virtue of the agreements and compacts made with them at the time of union, and subsequently incorporated into their written constitution. Sir, I claim that the Government have no right, "constitutional" or "legal," to demand of Parliament that the passage of this Act is the bounded duty of Parliament, or an act of justice, as the Minister of Justice puts it. I say that there is nothing of the kind, that the authorities will not warrant it; and therefore we are thrown back exactly into the position which is exemplified in the remarks of Mr. Russell, of Halifax, when he says that the position of Manitoba to-day is exactly parallel with that of Nova Scotia if the legislature of the latter province were to pass a law practically to abolish the Free School Act, and were to pass a separate school Act, and if that Act was then to be—

An hon. MEMBER. Abolished?

Mr. FORBES. Certainly, and if there were to be a general election, and if the opponents of those who had repealed the separate school law in Nova Scotia were to come to this Parliament and demand the restoration of the pre-existing rights and the repeal of the Act, I say the position would be identically the same.

Mr. DICKEY. The position would be exactly the same if those rights had endured for twenty years, and a generation had grown up under them.

Mr. FORBES. The Minister of Justice cannot make the contention good that because that privilege existed in Manitoba for twenty years, it became a right by law.

Mr. DICKEY. I am speaking of the similarity of the cases. The cases are not similar in point of time. We have had national schools in Nova Scotia since 1864.

Mr. FORBES. Manitoba has only had her national system about nineteen years, and yet the Minister of Justice will admit that my contention is right as regards the supposed position in Nova Scotia, namely, if the incoming local legislature were to repeal the present national school system in Nova Scotia it would be parallel to that in Manitoba. Yet the Minister of Justice says that because Manitoba had a national school system for nineteen years, therefore no local government succeeding the present one would have the right to repeal that local Act.

Mr. DICKEY. No.

Mr. FORBES. Then my hon. friend cannot hold that his position is sound. The claim of the minority in Manitoba to come to this Parliament as a matter of justice, can only be by virtue of rights established under the Act of Union; and if it is decided by the decision of the Privy Council in England that they have not any such rights "by practice," and that they have no such rights "by law," therefore, I ask the Minister of Justice where do they get their right? Upon what ground does he claim that "in justice" to the minority the Parliament of Canada is bound in honour to pass this Bill? I cannot understand that the minority have any "right," or "legal" justice, to demand from this Parliament the passage of this Bill.

Mr. TAYLOR. You are not open to conviction.

Mr. FORBES. I am as much open to conviction as any free citizen in the country. If I can be convinced that the minority are entitled "by law" or "by practice" to have the whole of their alleged grievances redressed by Parliament, or to have a part of them redressed, I am willing and ready at any moment to support the law proposed by this Government to that effect. But I cannot be convinced; and I take the same ground that was taken by Benjamin Russell, professor of law in Dalhousie University; and in opposition to the contention of the Minister of Justice, I have supposed a case in which the school law in Nova Scotia could be exactly in the same position as the school law in Manitoba to-day. Yet no one would disturb the condition of affairs there to-day. The school law of the province of Quebec is vastly different, because section 93 of the British North America Act protects the Protestant minority in Quebec. Subsection 2 says:

All the powers, privileges and duties of the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects shall be the same as hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

Mr. KENNY. Does my hon. friend contend that the position in Nova Scotia and the position in Manitoba, on educational questions, are similar?

Mr. FORBES. They both have national systems of schools. In other words, I say the province of Manitoba to-day has neither "by law" nor "by practice," any stronger claim upon this Parliament for legislation to change the provincial legislation of that province as regards education, than a Nova Scotia minority would have if the legislature of that province was to repeal the existing school law there. I say, in other words, that the repeal of the present school law in Nova Scotia would put that province in a parallel position to-day, as regards the jurisdiction of this Parliament, as the province of Manitoba is in. I say that there is no constitutional obligation upon this Parliament to legislate.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It is not necessary to repeal the law in order to establish separate schools.

Mr. FORBES. In Nova Scotia it would not be.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). We have separate schools there now.

Mr. FORBES. If the hon. gentleman knows as little about the Manitoba law as that, that is another reason why we should have an investigation on the line of the policy laid down by the leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Inverness must know that there is no separate school law in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). There are many of them.

Mr. FORBES. The hon. member for Inverness is not only entirely out of order, Mr. Speaker, in interrupting me, but he is entirely ignorant of the law of his own province. There is not a single statute giving separate schools.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). The hon. gentleman is not free to answer my question.

Mr. DICKEY. My hon. friend meant to say that there were many separate schools.

Mr. FORBES. The hon. member for Inverness is not only ignorant of the school laws of that province—

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). You cannot answer the question.

Mr. FORBES—but I say he is ignorant of the way in which the present school law there is operated. There is no such thing as separate schools established by law in Nova Scotia. The statutes of Nova Scotia do not permit them.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). But they exist all the same.

Mr. FORBES. There are separate schools in Nova Scotia by a sort of compromise. In certain districts there is a practice of allowing Roman Catholic teachers to teach Roman Catholic children, and it works most harmoniously and satisfactorily.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Why not establish that by law?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you want this Parliament to force them on Nova Scotia by law?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Certainly. They were claimed in 1868, and they would claim them yet if they could get them.

Mr. FORBES. I understand the hon. member for Inverness would abolish the present national school system in Nova Scotia and would enact a separate school law by this Parliament.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No, that is not at all necessary.

Mr. FORBES. We have in Nova Scotia one of the most successful systems of school laws in the Dominion of Canada, just such a system as, I do not hesitate to say, the minority in Manitoba would be willing to accept, and such as all the people of Manitoba would accept, a perfectly workable system, giving full and complete satisfaction to all classes in the community, whereby no race nor religious warfare exists, whereby Protestants and Catholics work side by side to promote the best interests of the community. Education is free, and is taught to the highest and lowest alike. That system is sustained by the province of Nova Scotia to-day. If any hon. gentleman representing Nova Scotia in this Parliament were to advocate a repeal of the present school law in that province, and were to seek election at the hands of any constituency there, he would soon find himself relegated to obscurity. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize the point by quotations from the argument made before the Privy Council in England that there is, as I said before, neither a legal right nor obligation on Parliament to interfere with the school law of Manitoba, and to force upon that unwilling province an unsatisfactory law.

The Lord Chancellor—Then you say there is a case for the jurisdiction of the Governor General, and that is all you have to decide?

Mr. Blake—That is all your lordships have to decide. What remedy he shall propose to apply is a different thing. (P. 62.)

Mr. Blake—In case the provincial legislature does not act in pursuance of the views of the Governor in Council it depends on the determination of the Canadian Parliament whether or not they will pass a remedial law—make remedial laws. (P. 90.)

Mr. FORBES.

The Lord Chancellor—It is not before us what should be declared, is it?

Mr. Blake—No; what is before your lordships is whether there is a case for appeal.

The Lord Chancellor—What is before us is the functions of the Governor General.

Mr. Blake—Yes, and not the method in which he shall exercise them—not the discretion he shall use, but whether a case has arisen on these facts on which he has jurisdiction to intervene. That is all that is before your lordships. (P. 26.)

Lord Watson—I suppose we are not asked to give any such finding or opinion as would tie the Governor General to follow any recommendation of the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. Blake—I do not think your lordships are, I do not like to make an absolute concession at this time.

Lord Watson—I suppose we are bound to give him advice in this appeal. He has asked nothing else throughout. He has not asked for a political decision which shall fetter him in any way.

Mr. Blake—It could not be. The law which creates the tribunal for the purpose of giving advice expressly states that in their political capacity they are not bound by that advice. (P. 39.)

Mr. Ewart—As has been already remarked, we are not asking for any declaration as to the extent of the relief to be given to the Governor General. We merely ask that it should be held that he has jurisdiction to hear our prayer and grant us some measure of relief, if he thinks proper to do so. (P. 183.)

Lord Watson—What is given to the Governor is a discretion to do what he thinks fit in appeal.

* * * I apprehend that the appeal to the Governor is an appeal to the Governor's discretion. It is a political administrative appeal, and not a judicial appeal in any proper sense of the term, and in the same way, after he has decided, the same latitude of discretion is given to the Dominion Parliament. They may legislate or not as they think fit. (P. 193.)

Mr. Blake—Only within the limits of his discretion.

The Lord Chancellor—He (the Governor) cannot do anything of himself. At the last resort the only person or body who can do anything more are the Parliament of Canada, who are certainly not under legal compulsion to act, and certainly would not act unless there was some substantial ground for it. (P. 259.)

It is true that the minority has the right to come to this Parliament, as any corporation may come here, and ask by petition that an Act be passed to give it corporate existence for the purpose of carrying on more efficiently its operations. I think the minority have rights far superior to any such body of persons as an ordinary corporation; but I submit, that Parliament should not be dictated to by the Government and told, as the Secretary of State told this House, that there is a legal obligation to pass this Bill in favour of the minority. The remedy is at our discretion, and, when it has been established, by investigation before an impartial tribunal, that a wrong has been done to the minority in Manitoba and that we should enact measures to relieve them, then such measures should be adopted. But I do not believe that the Bill under consideration should become law. In my opinion, a Bill can be passed through the legislature of Manitoba which will satisfy all contending parties, and quiet the fierce passions that have been created there, a measure that would restore harmony through that fair province, and bring about a peaceable and satisfactory solution of the difficulty. I contend, therefore, that there is no obligation, legal or otherwise, resting upon Parliament, as the hon. Minister of Justice stated. It has been said, that the position of the Opposition in this House, so ably presented by its leader, is not a favourable position, and is not one which will bring about a solution of the difficulty, but that it is, rather, a position taken by a political party which seeks to disregard the rights of an oppressed minority. I deny that charge altogether. I assert, that the only wise and statesman-like course that can be pursued on this question, is that laid down so ably by the leader of the Opposition, himself a Roman Catholic of French descent, sitting here, pleading on behalf of the better judgment of this country, and entertaining feelings more or less inclining to those of his own nationality. It would be natural for that hon. gentleman to say: My compatriots in religion, I think you can place confidence in me and consider that I will do justice; and to my compatriots from the province of Quebec I can say: If you have confidence in me, you will ultimately have your reward; let us not prejudge the case, but let our Protestant friends in other parts in the Dominion join with us in educating the people of Manitoba who may be opposed to my policy, so that some measure of justice, great or small, as the circumstances of the case may require, will be given to the Manitoba minority. I believe the course laid down by the leader of the Opposition is the most wise one, and that it is one which will receive the unanimous support of the people of the country, whenever an opportunity is given them to express their opinion at the polls.

After Recess.

Mr. FORBES. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was proceeding to say that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) was presenting to Parliament the argument: that the minority of Manitoba had come to Parliament for "justice," and he asked: Would anybody in Parliament refuse them "justice." That contention of the Minister of Justice could only be based upon the supposition that a right had existed, and that a wrong had been done. I trust I have shown clearly to the House that the decision of the Privy Council in England in 1892 laid down that by the passing of the Act of 1890, no wrong had been done the minority in Manitoba, and that they had not been deprived "illegally" of any right. That, Sir, was the decision of the English Privy Council, in Barrett vs. City of Winnipeg, and the contention of the Minister of Justice to the contrary cannot be sustained by the decision in the case of Barrett vs. The Attorney General of Manitoba. I have also asserted, and I challenge contradiction, that if there is no right taken away, there can be no wrong done by any law, and if there is no wrong done, it was improper for the Minister of Justice to urge upon Parliament that he was coming here 'ex justitiae debito,' claiming from Parliament that "justice" should be done to the minority. It is beyond doubt, Sir, that the only right that a minority in any province, whether Protestant or Catholic, would have to ask the interference of the Parliament of Canada on behalf of their educational matters, would be entirely dependent upon the discretion of this Parliament. I claim that no person has a right to present this case to us, as if there had been an infringement of the constitution of the country. I protest against that, Sir, I ask that after the evidence is taken on the subject the House and the province should have an opportunity to say whether they are willing to restore, or to grant to the Manitoba minority separate schools, pure and simple, for the benefit of a certain class of citizens in that province. It may be that upon the investigation of the facts, enough could be said on behalf of such a cause as to almost compel any fair-minded man to grant the request set forth in their petitions. For my part, I am willing and anxious to have the matter thoroughly investigated, and if the Manitoba minority—or, for that matter, the minority in any province of the Dominion—can establish that they have a right to ask the interference of this Parliament, and to appeal to the better judgment of this Parliament, I, for one, am prepared to bring an unbiassed mind to deal with the case. I ask that we be left to judge upon the matter, without being compelled to prejudice ourselves by a strained interpretation of the decision of the Privy Council. I had also said, Sir, that the position of Manitoba, according to the contention of the Minister of Justice, would be exactly similar to that of the province of Nova Scotia, or Quebec, or New Brunswick, or Prince Edward Island, under the same circumstances. If, for instance, the local legislature of Nova Scotia passed an Act to abolish the national school system, and if general elections were to take place, and the incoming local government were to pass an Act repealing that Separate School Act of that province, and by which the alleged rights of the minority which may have accrued to them would be swept away, then that minority might come to this Parliament and claim what the Minister of Justice calls "justice." The cases are exactly parallel, and is it within the ability of any Minister of Justice, or any legal man of standing, to say that any such party would be "legally" oppressed—and that they would have a "legal" right to come to this Parliament and ask interference in a matter of that kind? Does the Minister of Justice think that they would be listened to for one moment under such circumstances? Would the member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) go on any platform in Nova Scotia and advocate such a thing as that? No, Sir, his position would be untenable, and he would be hooted off the first platform on which he advocated such a condition of things.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). What condition is that?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Your usual condition.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). And your usual understanding.

Mr. FORBES. I further say, Sir, that the judgment of the Privy Council was, that the subsections of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, whereby rights were obtained by the minority in that province, "by law or by practice," had practically amounted to nothing. One decision of the Privy Council said that the words "by practice" really amounted to nothing. With that view of mine, the Minister of Justice concurs. I also stated that the last decision of the Privy Council had decided that the minority in Manitoba had lost no rights "by law," and that the passing of the Act of 1890 was entirely within the purview of the constitutional jurisdiction of that province. It therefore remains that if the minority in Manitoba are deprived of any rights by the Act of 1890, they were deprived of them "legally and constitutionally." Consequently, under the law, there was no wrong done, and there was no illegal deprivation of any rights. In the decision of the Privy Council which is to be found on pages 2 and 3 of the Manitoba School Case, question 6 is as follows:

(6.) Did the Acts of Manitoba relating to education, passed prior to the session of 1890, confer on or continue to the minority a right or privilege in relation to education, within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, or establish a system of separate or dissentient schools, within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867; if said section 93 be found applicable to Manitoba; and if so, did the two Acts of 1890 complained of, or either of them, affect any right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council?

Their lordships gave answer to that question as follows:—

In their lordships' opinion, therefore, it is the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act which has to be construed in the present case, though it is of course legitimate to consider the terms of the earlier Act, and to take advantage of any assistance they may afford in the construction of enactments with which they so closely correspond and which have been substituted for them.

Consequently it is section 22 of the Manitoba Act which governs this case. Section 22 of the Manitoba Act, subsection 3, says that in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws with respect to schools which exist by law or by practice. Section 93 of the British North America Act limits interference to cases where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union. The point I am making is that subsection 3 of the Manitoba Act has been practically eliminated from this discussion by the decision of the Privy Council. Therefore it is fair to say that, as a result of that decision, there is no right or claim to interference from this Parliament of Canada belonging to any minority.

Now, Sir, reference was made to the position of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec; and I think it was clearly established by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), when he addressed this House the other evening, that the rights of that minority were firmly fixed by legislation previous to confederation. Section 93, subsection 2, of the British North America Act clearly provides that any educational rights which the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada had at the time of the union shall remain. I have already cited that clause. Therefore, when the hon. member for Winnipeg proved conclusively that the rights of the Protestants of Quebec, as regards morals and education, were preserved to them by an Act of that province passed in 1861, just six years before confederation. I contend that there is no danger of those rights being in any way interfered with by legislation of the province of Quebec. Their rights are irrevocably fixed and established, and cannot be taken away or infringed upon without violating the terms of the British North America Act irrespective of the argument—which was a most valuable one—presented by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) the other night, when, in addressing the House, he said that the Catholic majority in the province of Quebec would never under any circumstances attempt to infringe on the rights of the Protestant minority of that province. I know that the Catholics of that province, broad-minded, generous and fair as they are, would fully coincide in that statement of the hon. member for Three Rivers. That statement, by such a high authority, added to the law as it stands in the books, firmly established, beyond any likelihood of infringement upon the rights of the Protestants of Quebec.

Now, I come to another contention put forward by the advocates of this Remedial Bill, namely, that the powers of Parliament are so full and ample that if this Bill is not sufficient, subsequent legislation may be passed to implement it. Sir, that idea is combatted by the best legal authorities in the land. It is not safe to put forward such a contention, nor do I believe that the Government have any heart in setting it up; because the constitutional authorities of this country acknowledge the right of this Parliament only to pass one Remedial Bill. I contend that this Parliament cannot go on year after year tinkering with this question by such legislation as they may see fit to pass. They have no right, after passing a Bill this year, to go on afterwards amending it year after year. Once they invoke their legislative power, they must do it in as ample and full a manner as the constitution will warrant them; and if they fail in that attempt, they can never again have recourse to the same authorities to grant them further power. That is a principle of constitutional law which I venture to say no authority in this House will contradict.

Further, it is contended by the Minister of Justice that if Parliament in this case fails to interfere on behalf of the minority of Manitoba, and in the line of their petition, its jurisdiction to interfere on behalf of an oppressed minority in any other province of this Dominion at any subsequent time, would be lost to it. Sir, I contend that that is perfectly untenable, because the circumstances surrounding the several cases may not be alike. The minority in the province of Nova Scotia may have their rights trampled upon at some subsequent day. Then it would be perfectly legal, under a different condition of affairs, for that minority to appeal to this Parliament, and it would be upon stronger grounds than the minority of Manitoba have to-day; and I do not doubt that fair justice would be done to any minority from the maritime provinces that might appeal to this Parliament.

It may be contended that the position taken by the Liberals in this House, and so ably presented by the leader of the Opposition, is not such as to allow the case of the minority of Manitoba to be heard. Sir, that is a perfectly erroneous contention. The position of the leader of the Opposition, supported by his followers in this House, and I venture to say by the great majority of the people of Canada, is simply that a right exists in the Parliament of Canada to grant such a measure of relief as it may in its wisdom see fit to grant, without coercion by any judicial tribunal, or by any biased authority such as the Minister of Justice; and the minority of Manitoba, so far as obtaining permanent justice for their wrongs and grievances is concerned, are much safer in the hands of the Liberals of this House and this country, when those grievances are properly proven, than they are in the hands of their pseudo friends of to-day, the members of this Government. This Government are not using the minority of Manitoba in a just and fair way. They have no intention of granting them such a full measure of relief as they have led them to believe they are entitled to. We have had members of this Government, from the time this question first appeared in the political arena, holding in one section of the country that the duty of the Government was fulfilled when they transmitted to the government of Manitoba the decision of the Privy Council of England, and that there they intended to stop—they intended to pass no remedial legislation. We have had them in another part of the country proclaiming that they intended to fully carry out the remedial order, and grant to the minority all the requests they made to Parliament. We have had them going further—deliberately refusing investigation. We have had them bringing down a Remedial Bill which in itself is an unworkable Bill—which in itself is not complete, which is incapable of enforcement, which has no provisions for giving redress to any of the alleged grievances of the minority. We have no statement from any Minister of the Crown that they intend to implement that Bill by a subsequent Bill. All we have in that regard is a clause added to the Bill which simply says that the Government hold themselves free to pass subsequent legislation. We have no declaration from the Government or any member of it that they intend to do that. We have simply the statement, that the Parliament of Canada holds itself free to implement this Bill as it may see fit to do. In view of the fact, that the best constitutional lawyers of this country have declared, that, once Parliament has exercised its power in this direction, it cannot subsequently pass any legislation on the same subject, the Government brings in the hollow mockery of a clause to induce the Catholic minority to believe, that what is wanting in the Bill to-day will be supplemented by future legislation. Sir, it is a mockery to Parliament to have the Government taking this course. The only way in which the people of Canada will uphold the Parliament of Canada in granting such remedial legislation as the Catholic minority, probably justly and rightly, claim, is, by convincing the fair-minded majority of the country that these rights are a part of those to which the minority are entitled, and that Parliament is doing the best it can in the interests of that province and of the country as a whole. Sir, the Government positively refuse to take such steps as will induce this House or the country to back up the legislation now submitted to Parliament. I contend, therefore, that what the Government desire is to have public opinion brought to bear upon them in order to prevent their passing this Bill. They do not want to pass it. They are not anxious to hear the evidence which might give them reason for passing it. I claim, that it would be in the interests of the minority in Manitoba to bring forward evidence which would convince Parliament and the Government, that this measure is not sufficient, and will not effect any good. If it is not just under the constitution of our country, that we should pass this law, and if we are not compelled to pass it, why should we interfere unless a good Bill is presented? If there is no constitutional obligation on us to pass the law, why is it thrust upon us so frequently, that we are compelled to do this? Are the laws of the land to be evaded in order to subserve a party purpose? Behind all this, let me point out, there lies the principle of infringement upon the provincial autonomy. If that argument be not sufficient to offset the contention of the Government, that constitutional right does not compel them to present this measure to Parliament and force it through, how is it, Sir, that the provincial autonomy, in the matter of education, is to be invaded and the rights of the province trampled upon? If, under our constitution, the laws with regard to education are within the jurisdiction of the provinces, surely the same constitutional authority which declares this, cannot have intended us to understand that that jurisdiction can be infringed upon by this Parliament, except under the constitution. If it were pretended that, in the working of the Nova Scotia school law, the rights of the Catholics were invaded or infringed upon, I take it that no member on the Government side from Nova Scotia would dare to present a petition to this Parliament, asking us to relieve those people. They would not be given the opportunity to present it on any platform in Nova Scotia. In the province of Nova Scotia we have a peculiar system. We have a system of national schools passed about the year 1864. In 1859, when the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) was leading the Opposition in that province, the Liberal party, which was in power, undertook to present a national School Bill in the provincial legislature. The Liberal party had a majority of only one or two in the House at the time, and the hon. Secretary of State fought against the enactment of a national school law most bitterly. Subsequently, at the elections of 1863, the Liberal party were defeated, and the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) was returned with a large majority at his back. He took up the School Bill, which had been submitted by the Liberals, and, with the consent of the Liberal party, it went through the legislature and became law. The hon. Secretary of State then bitterly denounced the system of separate schools. He stood up for equal rights all round, and the state system of schools was introduced. Separate schools he frowned down and would have no part in, and he introduced the law which wiped them out of existence. From that day to this, that Act has worked satisfactorily to all classes in the province. In many of the counties, there is a large number of Catholics, principally in the counties of Halifax, Richmond and Antigonish. Perhaps, in Inverness and Cape Breton and one or two others there are sections of several counties where the Catholics largely predominate. The system was adopted, under that Act, of each county being divided into school districts. Each district appointed trustees, and these trustees would appoint teachers who had the necessary qualifications and diplomas, or had passed the necessary examinations, as laid down by the school system. The Council of our Board of Education approve of the working of the trustees in the several sections. The Inspector of Education resides in Halifax, and has complete supervision of the whole system. Now, in Halifax, where there is a large number of Roman Catholics, these people naturally like to have Catholic teachers for their children, and a system of this nature has there grown up. In a district where there is a large number of pupils attending the common schools, and these schools become congested or overcrowded, Catholics are allowed to take whatever number of scholars they may have in that congested district, and put them into a separate school. As the school trustees would be obliged to find accommodation for these extra scholars, the Catholics simply ask, if they provide a school-house, will the Council of School Instruction or the Board of Trustees for that district, appoint Catholic teachers for this school, which is solely attended by Catholic scholars. The Board of School Commissioners at Halifax invariably agree to this. There is upon this board a fair representation of Catholics, who are appointed by the government and the city council, and, when a number of Catholic scholars is taken out of an overcrowded school and given a separate school, a Catholic teacher is allowed to be appointed. The question presents itself, how are these schools conducted? Do the Catholic children in these separate schools get as good a training as those in the Protestant schools? Do they receive an education in conformity with the school law of that province? I say, yes, they do, most certainly. I have in my hand a letter giving a conversation between the chairman of the Board of School Commissioners of the city of Halifax and a gentleman of the city of Halifax, and, as I am at liberty to use it, I take pleasure in giving it to the House, because it will be much stronger and more to the point than anything I can say, in fact it must be absolutely conclusive:

I had a talk a day or two ago with Mr. W. I. Stewart, the chairman of our city school board. He is, as you know, a strong Conservative, and I should add an equally strong opponent of remedial legislation in any form. I asked him about the practical working of the schools here. "What difference," I said, "is there between the Catholic and Protestant schools" ? "None whatever" he answered. "Isn't that going too far" ? I asked him. "No," he said, "there is no practical difference whatever between the schools. All that is done is this : We have a certain number of Catholic teachers. Instead of spreading those among the schools at large we appoint them to some half dozen of the schools. The teachers in those schools are altogether Catholic, and these schools are chiefly attended by Catholic children. The teachers give no religious instruction, they simply serve as a guarantee to the Catholic parents that there will be no tampering with the religion of their children." "Is there no religious instruction in the Catholic schools ?" I asked him. "I understand that in some of the schools the priest attended after school hour a couple of days in the week and gave religious instruction for half an hour." "Not in any of the boys' schools," he said, "so far as I am aware. But there would not be the slightest objection made by the board to that being done if the Catholic clergy asked for it. It is done, I believe, in some of the girls' schools. The Protestant children retire and the Catholics stay behind." "There are Protestant children in the Catholic schools" ? "Plenty of them, there are also Catholics at the Protestant schools, but not so many as there used to be, there has been a little pressure put on them about that lately." "How are the Catholic teachers selected" ? I asked him. "Just the same way as the Protestant, by the board, which in this matter acts through the committee on teachers and the supervisor. Naturally the Catholic members of the board take a greater interest in the appointment of the Catholic teachers, but the whole board can and does discuss their qualifications and fitness." "In all respects then, curriculum, text books, &c., &c., the schools are identical" ? "Absolutely." "How do the schools compare as to efficiency" ? I asked. "The boys' schools not so good, the girls' schools better. The sisters are capital teachers ; and appear to have the knack of giving more refinement to their scholars than the Protestant lady teachers."

Now, there is an opinion from a Conservative and the chairman of the school board of the city of Halifax as to the working of the school system in Nova Scotia. I contend that the Catholics of any province in the Dominion would be content with just such a system, if it was probably worked under their own supervision or under the general supervision of the Protestants and themselves, jointly. It is only because the Minister of Justice and others have been impressing upon the Catholic minority of Manitoba that there is an obligation upon this Parliament to give the full measure of their demands, that such demands are insisted upon. But the Privy Council of Great Britain decided that they have no legal ground for those demands. Sir, if there is a serious grievance, if the Catholic children are obliged to attend Protestant schools, I, for one, as a member of this House, will join in redressing that grievance. It would be a gross imposition upon our fellow-citizens in the province of Manitoba that Roman Catholics should be compelled to submit to teaching to which they have conscientious objections. Now, with the lesson we have before us in the refusal of this Parliament to interfere in the case of New Brunswick, because, to do so would be an infringement of provincial autonomy, with the lesson before us of the refusal of this Parliament to interfere with Quebec when it made a disposition of its funds for religious purposes, because it would be an interference with provincial autonomy, with the fact which cannot be gainsaid that no member from Nova Scotia would dare to contend that this Parliament would interfere where the plea raised that rights of the minority in that province had been interfered with, why should this Parliament be called upon to interfere in this case ? There is nothing in the nature of this case to justify the contention that we are bound to interfere. The hon. Minister of Justice puts this forward as a demand for justice. We are perfectly willing to do justice, but in order to accomplish that end, we must be sure of our facts. Before Parliament is asked to pass this Bill we should be put in possession of the facts of the case, as presented by the government of Manitoba. We do not know to-day that the majority of the minority of that province are asking for this Bill. We do not know that there is any strong public demand for this Bill. I have not heard of any public meetings in Manitoba addressed by members of the minority urging the people of that province to insist upon Parliament passing this Bill. I have heard of no public discussions in the press in that province, showing that, as a matter of justice to the minority, this Bill should be passed. I have found no public men who, having looked into the matter, put forward the claim for this Bill likely to impress fair-minded men in this House with the belief that this measure should be pushed through, as demanded by the Government. All that we ask for is an investigation of the facts. All we ask is that the Government take this matter out of the arena of politics. All we ask is that the assumed facts, dwelt upon so eloquently by the leader of the Opposition, should be proven before Parliament, and not assumed, as they were before the Privy Council. All we ask is that the bogus affidavits presented before the Privy Council of Canada, upon which the ex-Minister of Justice based his remedial order, should be answered by the province of Manitoba. I ask that the Government stay its hand. If there is any intention on the part of the Government to call upon Premier Greenway to meet a representative of this Government and discuss the details of the Bill, or investigate the facts upon which the Bill is based, let us have the Bill withdrawn. Let them hold the investigation. Let us know what is the outcome of the inquiry that is to be made. Was it a farce when the Secretary of State stood up and read us the telegram that he had caused the member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) to send to Winnipeg ?

Did he intend anything by it? Or was it a snap of the whip to bring into line the discordant element from Ontario that is behind him? Was it the holding out of an olive branch in order to make votes to sustain this Bill in Parliament, or was he honest in his contention? If he was honest, there is only one legitimate way in which he can prove it, and that is to withdraw the Bill, and plead the excuse that he was too hasty, and apologize to Parliament for his action. If he does not want to humble his knee so much as that, let him show that he is only too glad to have an inquiry with Manitoba on this question, and withdraw the Bill. We are debating this matter day after day, endeavouring to get at facts, endeavouring to find out where we are on this question, and what Manitoba has to say with respect to it; and yet we are told that the matter has been before the country for five or six years. The Secretary of State says that he is going to send a commission to Winnipeg, or he is going to invite the Manitoba government here to discuss this matter. Sir, it is too late to do that, unless he restores the parties to the position in which they were before he commenced this suit. The position of the parties to-day is exactly that described by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll) when he said that the position was that of a litigant appealing to court for a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus. He alleges his facts in affidavits, and asks for a rule nisi, or a summons in the first instance, for a mandamus to issue, calling upon somebody to do a certain thing. Surely not even a layman, let alone a Minister of Justice, would contend that upon these affidavits, without hearing the parties summoned, judgment should pass. No, Sir, no court, no tribunal of any legal standing in this country, will contend that after the plaintiff makes his affidavit, and he gets his summons in the first instance, and serves the papers upon the defendant, that the defendant should not have ample and full opportunity to answer them. If a defendant goes into a court of justice, and asks for time, saying he has not had an opportunity of looking into the case of the plaintiff, no court, however prejudiced, however anxious to gain a point, would refuse to the defendant an opportunity to answer the contention. And yet, in the month of February, 1895, as soon as the decision of the Privy Council was telegraphed to this country, the ex-Minister of Justice saw fit to issue his summons in the first instance, his rule nisi, calling upon Manitoba to appear within twenty-four hours, or else he would give judgment against her; and when Manitoba appeared in the first instance and asked for time to prepare her case, the Minister of Justice says: No, go ye hence, you have had time enough, obey the summons, and go on at once, or I will give judgment against you. Sir, to show that the Government were biased, that they intended to do what they did, with malice aforethought, with the evident intention of gaining a political advantage in that case, the ex-Minister of Justice agreed, that the plaintiff could withdraw his affidavits which he had filed when he obtained his rule nisi. He, the ex-Minister of Justice, as one of the judges, however, did not withdraw them, and yet he goes to work and gives judgment without a scintilla of evidence before him, except hearsay evidence which would be ruled out in the meanest court in any British community. He never asked the defendant if he wanted time to answer the affidavits. He practically said to the plaintiff: Take your case away, take away the case for which you prepared in the first instance, for which I have granted you a rule nisi; I give judgment in your favour against defendant. Sir, the ink was hardly dry upon the notes of evidence taken before the Privy Council before judgment was given, and the judgment on the mandamus, on the 21st March, was sent to Manitoba post haste, and Manitoba was called upon to obey the judgment of the court. Manitoba was not called upon to show cause why that mandamus should not have issued; Manitoba was called upon to comply with the judgment, to do the three things laid down here in this order. Manitoba had no alternative; she was told by an order of the Privy Council of this Government: You shall grant to the minority of Manitoba:

The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

Notwithstanding that the Privy Council of England has decided that as a matter of right and of law, those Acts were constitutional.

The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education; and third, the right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools, from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

Sir, those three things were the substance of the judgment of the Privy Council of Canada, passed illegally, without any evidence, without a hearing whatever, and without giving an opportunity of appeal after judgment was given. Sir, I say it was quite in keeping with the whole bungling proceedings of this Government, with the evident intention of pulling the wool, if I may use that phrase, over the eyes of our Catholic friends in the province of Quebec, with the evident intention of befooling them, with the evident intention of leading them to believe that the Government were doing something for them, while at the same time they said to the opponents of the remedial order: "Steady, boys, we will do nothing of the kind, we will burk the measure yet." That is what they are to-day anxious to do. Otherwise what position do we find them in? Why, twenty-four hours ago the Secretary of State stated that he was about to ask Mr. Greenway, through the hon. member for Montreal West and the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, to come to a conference with the Government of Canada upon this question; and yet almost while he was talking, or within a few hours afterwards, the Minister of the Interior, the Protestant member of the Government from Manitoba, got up here and gave the most tremendous tirade against that very Mr. Greenway and the government of Manitoba, practically blackguarding them out of court. He says: We send you an invitation, but don't you dare to accept it, because we won't listen to you. He entered into a tirade of abuse against their legislation on the subject, and did everything he could to prevent the two parties coming to terms. What was the object of that? Was it not apparent to our Catholic friends in this House that the intention of the Government, from the Secretary of State down, was to say to the disappointed element behind him: "Gentlemen, we are going to remedy this measure, we are going to offer the olive branch to Manitoba." But the Minister of the Interior gets up and turns to his Catholic friends behind him, and says: "Don't you hear what the Secretary of State says? That olive branch is no good at all; Greenway is a villain; it was he that passed this law and stole away your rights; but we will give them back for you, we will compel him, at the point of the bayonet of legislation, to give you what you want." And why did the Government put up the Minister of the Interior to tell them that? Why did not the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell them that? Why did not the Postmaster General tell them that; or the Minister of Public Works? Why were not those gentlemen put up to tell the members from Quebec: We do not care what comes of the olive branch, we are going to coerce the government of Manitoba, we are going to get this legislation forced through Parliament. Sir, it was because they thought that coming from the Manitoba Minister in this Government, coming from the Protestant Minister of the Interior, it would have more effect than if it came from any one else. That is the reason. The whole thing is a snare and a delusion to both the parties supporting the Government in this House. Openly to-day we have the two factions of the Government's party supporting them upon other questions. We have the true yellows from Ontario and we have the true blues from Quebec combining to burk this measure in this House. It is said that this measure will never get through Parliament; it is said by supporters of the Government that they will vote against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition in order that the Bill may get its second reading; then, if the Bill ever gets into committee, they intend to talk it out and burk it.

The whole of the proceedings of the Government with respect to this matter are inconsistent, I might say dishonest. If the Government were to adopt the true policy of not interfering in matters which belong exclusively to the provinces, but appealed to the manhood of the province they would receive justice and fair-play at the hands of the people. This result has been brought about in Nova Scotia. There Catholics and Protestants sit side by side in the schools. Where the Catholics cannot get sufficient scholars to fill a school-house they accept instruction from the teachers in the common schools of the province, side by side with their fellow-Catholic children. Nothing can be more desirable in the province of Manitoba or elsewhere than such a system. Let it never be said that members of this House endeavour to make political capital out of the sufferings of their fellow Canadians. Such capital is, however, being sought to be made by the Conservative party. They are using this question as a lever wherewith to divide the great Liberal party; they are playing battledore and shuttlecock with this important issue; they expect by creating divisions in our ranks to cement together the different sections of their own party, well knowing that the measure introduced by them will prove abortive for the purpose for which it was laid before Parliament, but with the assurance that they will gain political capital at the coming general elections.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attention to the arguments of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Forbes). He blames the Government for introducing the measure which is now under consideration, for the reason, as he alleges, that no grievance exists in the province of Manitoba, that the Roman Catholic minority in that province have no grievance, that they have never been able to establish that a grievance exists. With all due deference to my hon. friend, I must tell him that I consider that the Roman Catholic residents of the province of Manitoba are better judges on that point than my hon. friend. As my hon. friend should know, because he has heard the statement made repeatedly in this Parliament, great and grievous wrongs and prejudices have been inflicted on the Roman Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. FORBES. So they have in Nova Scotia.

Mr. KENNY. The existence of these grievances in Manitoba is indisputable. But my hon. friend has this great advantage over me, that he is a lawyer and must be much more familiar with the value of legal documents than I am. I have taken some pains to inform myself on this question, for I recognize fully its gravity and importance, and I find on page 10 of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, given on 29th January, 1895, that the Lord Chancellor in delivering judgment made this statement :

The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to say how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before they passed into law there existed denominational schools, the whole control and management of which were in the hands of the Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching.

Although the hon. gentleman has not been able to satisfy himself after this question has been before the Canadian people for five years, yet the Lord Chancellor of England and the members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were satisfied that a wrong does exist and they expressed their opinions in the statement I have read. Let me add while I am dealing with this point, that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), when he was arguing this question before the courts, referring to the statement in the judgment of the Privy Council which I have just read, said, that that expression of opinion in the judgment precluded him from denying that any grievance does exist.

My hon. friend (Mr. Forbes) said that the Bill which is now on the Table is not a measure of relief to the injured Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba. On that point I have only to say that if the people who are affected, the Roman Catholics of the province of Manitoba who are sufferers by the legislation of 1890, assert, as they do assert and as has been affirmed over and over again during this debate in this House, that the Bill is to them a satisfactory measure of relief, I think that statement disposes of that argument made by my hon. friend that the Bill is remedial. My hon. friend at one moment accused the Government of making a deliberate attempt to burk the measure, and the next moment he accused them of a determined effort to enforce coercion on the province of Manitoba. I do not know how my hon. friend is going to reconcile those two very divergent opinions. I may say that I regret very much the fact that this Parliament has to deal with questions of this character. I regret it because in a country like Canada, I recognize that we have many people who are thoughtless and who are emotional, and a question of this character is calculated to arouse race antagonisms and religious prejudice. But, Sir, whilst I feel, that to some extent that may be the result of the agitation of this question in the country, yet I know, that no such result can follow in this assembly of politicians, that it would not be possible to find in the Dominion of Canada a like number of men who are so free from all sectarian prejudices. Our avocation as politicians, and our position as public men, bring us into contact with all classes and conditions of the population, and that intercourse with the people is calculated to smooth the rough edges of isolation and of individual environment and training. I am, therefore, sure, that in this House a question of this character will be fairly and justly discussed, and will receive careful consideration. It was stated by the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), in moving the second reading of this Bill, that in pre-confederation days when Canada was composed of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, that owing to the race and religious differences which then existed, it was exceedingly difficult to carry on the public business of the country, and that so great was this antagonism, that the progress and advancement of the country was thereby retarded. That was the unhappy condition of things in the Parliament of Old Canada. It is today, Sir, our proud boast, as Britons, that so vast is the domain of our Queen, that the sun never sets on her possessions, and it is our equally proud boast, as Canadians, that in all that vast Empire you cannot find a people so contented and happy as are the people of this Dominion. I am ready to admit, that this great improvement is due to the tendency of these last days of the century towards a greater toleration and a more comprehensive spirit of liberality. But it is also due, mainly, to the fact, that the members of this Parliament recognize, that in all questions of race and religion it is necessary to deal with them in a spirit of generosity and with an earnest desire to settle them in an amicable, a just and a fair manner. I am quite sure, that hon. gentlemen approach the consideration of this question, animated with that spirit. I recognize fully, Mr. Speaker, the gravity and importance of the question which is now before us. Entrusted, as we are, with the maintenance of the constitutional rights and privileges of the people of Canada, I realize that it is our first duty to safeguard those rights and to remedy all wrongs. While I may regret that the time of Parliament, which should be devoted to the consideration of measures for the improvement and development of the material resources of our country, is so much absorbed in the discussion of a question of this character, yet, I recognize that this is a duty which the constitution of our country imposes upon us. I have no sympathy with gentlemen who argue, that we should close the door to the introduction of all such appeals. That we cannot do, if we are to be guided by our constitution. Personally, Sir, I dislike very much indeed to hear the term "Catholic," or "Protestant," used in this House. I wish these words were never uttered here, but I do realize that in this free assembly questions of the character of this remedial legislation must be introduced and must be heard and must be decided. As regards this question which is now under discussion, the constitution, as expressed in the Manitoba Act, provides specially for its presence in this House, under certain conditions. My hon. friend (Mr. Forbes) has referred to the fact, that the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) made the announcement recently, that, as soon as the second reading of this Bill is passed, that, as soon as the principle of the Bill is affirmed, that, as soon as the constitutionality of the question is upheld, that as soon as the duty of this Parliament to redress a constitutional wrong is affirmed—so soon will an effort be made by the Dominion Government to have a conference with Mr. Greenway.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. KENNY. That seems to be amusing to my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. FORBES. I did not assert that the constitutional power was not in this Parliament. I know well, the constitutional power is in Parliament. I never denied that.

Mr. KENNY. I am not a lawyer, but I know that this Parliament has the power to deal with this question, and so does every other hon. gentleman in the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Forbes) said, however, that no grievance exists, and that, even if we had the power to deal with the question, the possession of that power does not impose upon us the duty of remedying the grievance. That was the contention of the hon. member. Sir, referring to the announcement made by the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), that, as soon as the principle of this Bill was affirmed, it was the intention of the Government that a conference shall take place with Mr. Greenway, in the hope that some settlement may be arrived at. I share in the hope, as I believe most members of this House do, that some such solution of the difficulty may thus be attained. This troublesome question was started by the Liberal party in the province of Manitoba for party purposes. Mr. Greenway is the Liberal leader in that province, and it is certainly the duty of the provincial legislature, led by him, to dispose of this question fairly and equitably and promptly. But, as they have refused to do so, and, as they have inflicted this wrong on the minority, it is regrettably our duty to have to deal with the question here. My hon. friend (Mr. Forbes) has referred to the condition of our schools in the province of Nova Scotia. I am happy to say, that, although occasionally there may be instances of friction in the administration of the school laws in that province, yet the law is administered satisfactorily. Its administration is a matter of compromise, and it is creditable to the people of Nova Scotia, that such a settlement and adjustment of the question has been made. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us, as a free translation of the Latin words "arida nutrix leonum," that we, Nova Scotians, were the greatest boodlers in the universe. That is his opinion of us. I have to say to him that in matters of religious liberality and toleration, we set a good example to the other provinces of the Dominion. I wish sincerely that the Protestant majority of Manitoba would follow the example of the Protestant majority of Nova Scotia, and so adjust the educational matters under their own provincial laws that they could be conducted fairly and satisfactorily, and that the rights of minorities would be respected, which is all that any public man, or any portion of the population of Canada, desire. And if the people of Manitoba would only act fairly to the minority, would only give them the rights which are guaranteed to them by the legislation under which they entered the Dominion, and which they enjoyed till the Liberal party came into power in that province, we should have no further question of this kind. I believe that if a settlement is to be made by Mr. Greenway and the representatives of the minority, it must be by mutual concession and mutual forbearance; it must be to a great extent by compromise, without, of course, sacrificing any principle.

It is my belief that on educational matters there is a difference between the constitutional and legal position of Nova Scotia and the position of Manitoba. When Manitoba entered the confederation, special legislation was enacted, which accorded to the minority of that province a protection which does not exist in the province of Nova Scotia. When the satisfactory condition of matters in the province of Nova Scotia, which I have described, is chiefly due to the causes which I have enumerated, I consider that it is also largely due to the wisdom and moderation which have characterized the administration of the different churches by the prominent clergymen connected with them. I think it is due, also, very largely to the school law which was introduced in Nova Scotia by my hon. friend the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), who now leads this House. It must be said for that hon. gentleman that, during all the time he was connected with the public life of Nova Scotia, his tact, his wisdom, and his influence, were exercised in order to preserve peace, harmony, and contentment among the population, and to remove and avoid all religious strife; and in this laudable work he was eminently successful.

I repeat that I should be glad, indeed, if this difficulty were settled, as it should be, by the government of Manitoba; but I very much fear that will not happen. I do not want to prejudge the case, but after what we have heard in this House, after what we heard last night from the hon. member for Ottawa county (Mr. Devlin), in the forcible and eloquent speech he made, we are driven to the conclusion that the manner in which this legislation was introduced in the province of Manitoba, and the purpose for which it was introduced, as a piece of mere party tactics, to preserve the Liberal party in power, do not justify us in expecting redress from that quarter.

I will, Sir, briefly pass in review a phase of this question to which I attach great importance; that is, what was the intention of the people of Manitoba, and the intention of the Parliament of Canada when the Manitoba Act of 1870, which is the charter of that province, was passed by the Parliament of Canada and accepted by the legislature at Fort Garry? We know that in the days when that territory was owned by the Hudson Bay Company, denominational schools existed there. We are familiar, too, with the fact that previous to the entrance of the province of Manitoba into the confederation, or about that date, there were disturbances there which were exalted by the title of rebellion; and we know that in the settlement of those difficulties the hon. gentleman who now represents Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) took a prominent part. We also know that Mgr. Taché, who was then the Roman Catholic Archbishop of St. Boniface, who was the successor of the men who first planted the symbol of Christianity in that land, was solicited by the Government of Canada to lend his influence in bringing peace and harmony among the population, and that that gentleman exercised his great influence successfully in that direction. We know, that it was at his instance that delegates came down to Ottawa from the Red River country to confer with the Government of Canada in regard to that country joining the confederacy; and we are all aware that those delegates brought with them a statement embodying the views of the people they represented as to the terms on which they would consent to join the Dominion of Canada. That document is now known as the bill of rights. Clause 7 of that bill of rights, which expressed the wishes of the population of the Red River territory at that date with regard to education, reads as follows:—

That the schools be separate, and the public moneys for schools be distributed among the different religious denominations in proportion to their respective populations.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What bill of rights are you reading from?

Mr. KENNY. Clause 7 of the bill of rights brought down by the delegates from the

Mr. KENNY.

Red River settlement, when they came here to arrange the terms of confederation. And let me here say, Mr. Speaker, that when the Manitoba Bill was before the Parliament of Canada within these walls, the Hon. Mr. McDougall, who took a prominent part in the discussion of that question, on the 7th of May, 1870, gave the Government notice that when the Bill went into committee of the whole he would move for the obliteration of the educational clauses; and any gentleman who takes the pains to read the history of this case will find that three days later, on the 10th of May, 1870, when the Bill was in committee, and when clause 22, the educational clause, was reached, Mr. Oliver, a member of this House, rose in his place and moved that the clause be expunged. I have in my hand the "Hansard" of that date, and I find that Mr. Oliver moved that the educational clause be struck out. When Hon. Mr. McDougall gave the notice to the Government, which I have just mentioned, he said he would move for the abolition of the clause which guaranteed separate schools to Manitoba, I find that when the Bill was in committee, and this motion had been made by Mr. Oliver, the following debate took place:—

Mr. McDougall said that the effect of the clause, if not struck out, would be to fix laws which the local legislature could not alter in the future, and that it would be better to leave the matter for the local authorities to decide as in the other provinces. He quite agreed with his hon. friend in giving the same powers to this province as the others had, and it was for that reason he desired to strike out the clause.

The Hon. Alex. Mackenzie was prepared to leave the matter to be settled exclusively by the local legislature. The British North America Act gave all the protection necessary for minorities; and the local authorities understood their own local wants better than the general legislature. It was his earnest desire to avoid introducing into this new province those detrimental discussions which had operated so injuriously on their own country, and, therefore, he hoped the amendment would be carried.

However sound that doctrine of Hon. Mr. Mackenzie may have been, we are face to face with the fact that when that amendment was proposed, it was defeated by a majority of 50, which meant that the Parliament of Canada was desirous that the contract which had been made with the delegates from the Red River country and which is referred to in this very decision of the Judicial Committee of January, 1895, should be adhered to. When that compact was made, it was the intention of this Parliament that the people of that country should have secured to them all the rights which they then possessed, including the important right to separate schools. I am disposed to attach importance to that compact for this reason. I believe that we, as successors of those who made that agreement, should see that the compact, the bargain which was made by our predecessors should be honourably adhered to. Further than that, if the school question should become ever again a matter of discussion in the Dominion—and so far as my own province is concerned, until very recently we have not heard very much about it—I recognize that it is a matter which must be settled by the Protestants of this country, because they are the vast majority of the population. If that should happen, I say that as a Canadian who is proud of Canada, as a Roman Catholic who is proud of his church, I am not afraid, at any time, to leave the decision to the sense of fair play and justice which actuates the majority of my Protestant fellow-citizens. I urge then that this contract which was entered into, should be adhered to in the spirit as well as in the letter. I find, that this matter as referred to in the judgment of January, 1895, in the following terms, by the Lord Chancellor :—

As a matter of fact, the objection of Roman Catholics to schools such as alone receive state aid under the Act of 1890, is conscientious and deeply rooted. If this had not been so, if there had been a system of public education acceptable to Catholics and Protestants alike, the elaborate enactments which have been the subjects of so much controversy and consideration would have been unnecessary. It is notorious that there were acute differences of opinion between Catholics and Protestants on the education question prior to 1890. This is recognized and emphasized in almost every line of these enactments. There is no doubt either what the questions of difference were, and it is in the light of these that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act of 1870, which was in truth a parliamentary compact, must be read.

Here are the words of the highest judicial court in the realm, and it is their opinion that the compact was a parliamentary compact, and it is a compact which I contend should be adhered to by this Parliament of Canada.

I have referred to the fact that the delegates from the Red River settlement came down here. They returned to their own country, and took with them the Manitoba Act, as the arrangement which had been made between them and the Dominion of Canada. And that arrangement was submitted to the legislature at Fort Garry and accepted by it in good faith. It is now a matter of history, it is a matter of common notoriety, that Mgr. Taché was exceedingly active in his efforts to induce the population of that country to accept that charter, and we all know that the right reverend gentleman took a great interest in educational matters. It is not at all likely, therefore, that he would have accepted an arrangement which exposed the schools which he had worked so long and so earnestly to establish, to be easily destroyed and his people to be deprived of educational advantages to which they attached very great importance. In addition to the contract with the Parliament of Canada, the people of the Red River settlement had beyond that the assurance of the representative of Her Majesty in Canada that their rights and privileges would be regarded.

They had also the statement of the Imperial authorities, the statement of the Colonial Minister, that their rights and privileges would not be prejudiced by any arrangement they might make with the Dominion of Canada.

In 1871, at the first meeting of the legislature of the new province of Manitoba, as evidence of what the people understood and desired; a law was passed establishing denominational schools. I do not think it is important for us to discuss the relative merits of public or denominational schools. That is a question on which we may conscientiously differ; and if I refer to it later, it will only be due to this fact, that other gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate have thought it necessary to attack the system of denominational schools. I suppose I shall be told, if anything that I say is considered worthy of criticism, that we have not separate schools in the province of Nova Scotia. We have not. At all events we have an arrangement whereby the religious wishes of the different denominations in the larger centres of population are respected, and a system which works satisfactorily to all classes of the community. If the minority in Manitoba say that a certain class of schools is satisfactory. I am prepared to favour its adoption. If my voice could reach to the province of Manitoba, I would say to the Roman Catholics of that province: Unless the people there are very different from the people in other parts of Canada, you should be able to settle this question as a matter of mutual concession and compromise.

Mr. FORBES. Will you vote for the amendment, then?

Mr. KENNY. No, I could not vote for the amendment because it would impose a further flagrant injustice upon the minority of the population of Manitoba. I could not vote for that amendment because I think it is a dishonest proposition. I could not vote for that amendment because it has been moved by a gentleman who has used all his power, all his influence and all his eloquence to excite his compatriots and co-religionists of the province of Quebec against the Government of this country on the ground that they refused and delayed to do justice to the minority in Manitoba, whom he has now deserted. I could not vote for that amendment because it was moved, as I believe, to please the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the triumvirate who follow him in this House. I could not vote for that amendment because I believe it is most desirable, in the public interests of Canada that, as soon as possible, this question should be finally removed from our political arena. I could not vote for that amendment because it provides for the perpetuation of an injury to the minority of Manitoba who have suffered for five years, while waiting for this tardy act of justice, and because it keeps open this sore in the political body of Canada. In answer to the question which has been put to me from the other side of the House, I give these as some of the reasons why I could not vote for the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Sir, I have referred, in passing, to the establishment of denominational schools in Manitoba in 1871, when the population was about equally divided between Protestants and Catholics. My hon. friend to my right (Mr. Cameron, Inverness) says that the majority of the population was Catholic. I did not think that that was the case. I understood that one moiety was Catholic, and one moiety was Protestant. However that may have been, schools were established, and we gave our legislative bond to the people of Manitoba that no matter whether the majority should be Catholic or Protestant, the rights of the minority should be respected and preserved. Our predecessors in this Parliament made special provision in the Manitoba Act to carry out the bargain. They actually refused, by a large majority, to put the people of Manitoba in the position in which Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were under the British North America Act, but gave them special legislation with regard to educational institutions. So it would be unfair of us, and unworthy of us, not to carry out the arrangement made with Manitoba in 1870. This system of schools prevailed in Manitoba from 1871 to 1890, and in the meantime there were certain minor changes in the provincial laws indicating that the Protestant majority in the province was steadily increasing. We now come down to 1890 when, as we know, two Acts were passed by the local legislature of Manitoba which did violence and injury to the rights of the Catholic minority of the province. I have sometimes asked myself whether, had the trend of population been reversed, had injury been done to the Protestant minority, and had that Protestant minority appealed to us and asked for us to redress their grievances, would some hon. gentlemen who want the door closed against the consideration of this question be so anxious then that the bar should be put up. Whatever may be our individual views upon questions of one or another class of schools, it seems to me that as members of this Parliament we cannot refuse to deal frankly with this question. In 1890 this objectionable legislation was passed by the legislature of Manitoba. The hon. member for Ottawa County in his convincing speech last night told us very frankly and very forcibly that that legislation was enacted to gain party advantage for the Greenway government. He also told us that the legislation was passed by deception, and that the Roman Catholics of that province had been publicly, by prominent Liberals, promised that if the Liberal party came into power, no change would be made in the school system, and no injustice done to the minority. On the strength of that promise, a certain important constituency was carried. It was largely through the influence of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) that that constituency was carried, and the statement of the hon. member for the county of Ottawa, a Liberal, was made recently in his presence. But it is a matter of common notoriety that this fraud was practised. It was by this deception that the Liberal party secured their majority. The manner in which the legislation was enforced was described by Mr. Hugh J. Macdonald in this House as barbarous, brutal, and butcherly, inflicting not only injustice, but insult, upon the Catholics of the province. That legislation being so offensive and cruel, is it any wonder that the minority appealed?

Mr. Speaker, since we met here last session, this question of the Manitoba schools, although, as I said, we have not heard so much of it in the province of Nova Scotia, has been the subject of very frequent discussion upon the platforms throughout the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The hon. leader of the Opposition, who moved the six months' hoist, addressed frequent meetings all over the country on this subject. Considering the important position which that gentleman occupies as the recognized leader of a great party, I felt, as a citizen of Canada, and as a public man, a very natural desire to inform myself as to his views upon that question, and upon the remedies that he might recommend. But I must say, Sir, that the more I read his speeches, the more I was puzzled as to his intentions. At one time he told the country the question was a difficult one; at another time the question was a simple one. At one time it was only a question of fact; at another time it was only a question of law. The hon. gentleman had the happy faculty of making speeches which somewhat resembled the famous shield of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That shield, as I have heard it described, was gold on one side and silver on the other.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Brass.

Mr. KENNY. Brass or the other. But there was this difference between that shield and the shield of the leader of the Opposition. The speeches of the leader of the Opposition were of such a character, that in Quebec they were interpreted by the organs of his party as showing his earnest desire and determination to enforce remedial legislation. The same speeches, exactly the same words, were carried to Ontario and Manitoba, and were there explained to mean, that the hon. gentleman was determinedly opposed to all remedial legislation. Indeed, Sir, I do not know anything more difficult than to attempt to find out what are the views of the leader of the Opposition on this question, by reading his speeches on the subject. When reviewing the speeches of the hon. leader of the Opposition, I am reminded of a description given by Lord Beaconsfield of a prominent public man in England; and to paraphrase it, I might say, that it would seem, that the qualifications for a leader of the great Liberal party in Canada are, that he should be a gentleman of an agreeable presence, of eloquence of speech, and that he shall have no inconvenient convictions. Now, coming here with this state of uncertainty in my own mind as to the intentions and desires of the hon. leader of the Opposition, on this question, which concerns particularly the French Catholic population of Manitoba, and which has naturally excited so much sympathy and interest in the province from which he comes, I listened with great attention to the speech which he delivered on this debate, expecting that we would have from him a supreme and patriotic effort, and some statesman-like proposal for the solution of this long-pending difficulty. Sir, I find in that speech, as reported in the "Hansard," that the hon. gentleman said:

It must be evident that while you redress the grievance of the minority by such active interference, you run great risk of creating a grievance on the part of the majority. But the remedy of interference is found in the constitution, and being there, it must be applied by those who love the constitution.

Sir, the leader of the Opposition tells us the remedy is in the constitution, and it must be applied by those who love the constitution. Well, certainly, we are all lovers of the constitution, we are sent here to uphold the constitution, that is our first duty; and as I listened I was wondering how he would propose to deal with this question in a constitutional manner. He says distinctly, that grievances exist, that the power of interference exists, that the grievances are of such a character that they demand interference. And yet he proposes, not to remedy the grievance, but to throw the whole matter out of Parliament, leaving it a disturbing element in our body politic; not only that, but to subject the weak, unprotected minority to a perpetuation of the grievance which he says exists. Further on, the hon. gentleman said:

This remedy must be granted or denied—
That is, the legislative remedy.

—according as the circumstances of each case require. And that, Sir, is the very language of the statute the hon. gentleman cited a few moments ago. The remedy is to be sought and applied as the circumstances of the case require; and it can be intelligently applied only after full and ample inquiry into the facts of the case, after all means for conciliation have been exhausted, and only as a last resort.

Sir, any one who listened attentively to that argument of the leader of the Opposition, must have expected, that he was going to propose what he had been contending for for many months, that the matter should be a subject of investigation and a subject of inquiry. Therefore, it was with great surprise that I heard him cravenly abandon his own policy which he had been advocating for many months, and adopted the policy of the hon. member for North Simcoe, who had stated distinctly, some months ago, that it was absurd to have an investigation, that it was unnecessary to have an investigation, that every man in Canada knew that the matter had already been thoroughly investigated. Further on in his speech the hon. leader of the Opposition insinuates that he had been threatened and dictated to by the hierarchy, and that he was not the man who would allow any body of people, no matter what their position, to dictate to him. Sir, so far as I know, so far as I have read the public documents, and having read the memorial of the Roman Catholic archbishops and bishops of the Dominion, which is published in this blue-book, I can detect no threat, or any disposition to dictate, either to the hon. gentleman or to any other member of this Parliament, or to any in Canada. In fact one is surprised when reading the closing sentences of the hon. gentleman's speech to notice how far he goes out of his way to make that attack upon the hierarchy. One is puzzled in seeking a reason for that attack. But, reviewing the hon. gentleman's whole career and, especially his recent conduct, and the way he has treated this question, one is forced to the conclusion, that, as the changes in the Manitoba school laws were made to gain party advantages, so this irritating question has been kept open in order to secure party advantages for hon. gentlemen opposite. I say further, that I believe that reference to the hierarchy was made to obtain political support for the Liberal party. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in the course of the speech which he delivered in this debate, intimated that several members who were going to vote on this measure had promises of positions in their pockets. He did not tell us on which side of the House they sat; and, when I consider the wonderful and abrupt changes which some hon. gentlemen opposite have made, I am forced to the conclusion, that there must have been some very remarkable proposals made to them before any such change could be accomplished. The hon. gentleman made use of this language, that it might be the duty of future governments to see to it, that they should not be allowed to profit by the wages of their shame. We all know the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) is a violent man. I use the words in a parliamentary sense. He is violent in his language, he is violent in all his utterances and attacks on his political opponents. He calls the people of one province boodlers, and, if there are a few hon. members who happen to be connected with any manufacturing enterprises, he calls them thieves and robbers. He is violent in his language—he does actual violence to the ordinary laws of nature. When, Sir, people attain the age of the hon. member for South Oxford and myself, they usually acquire a moderation in language and form charitable judgment for their neighbours, and, in fact, they attain all the virtues which become the aged; but, as regards the hon. member for South Oxford, the older he gets the more violent he becomes, and the more reckless in his assertions, and of all his reckless assertions, I think this is one of the most reckless. Such a statement is not only improper and offensive, but it is unwise, and I say more, it was unwise, because it was sure to evoke retaliation. Do hon. gentlemen suppose for one moment, that we, who come to discharge our public duties here, will permit any one among them, no matter how prominent or exalted his position, no matter how superior his oratory, to attack us, without receiving a reply? When that hon. gentleman goes out of his way, wantonly, to attack hon. gentlemen who are here to perform their duty fairly and honestly, I tell him distinctly, that, just as sure as he does it, so sure will retaliation follow, and it must be so in common justice to ourselves and to the leaders of our party.

The hon. gentleman, in the course of the debate, has, very unwisely, as I think, threatened the Government with the hostility and opposition of the Protestant majority of Ontario. There was a positive threat. He said, in effect, the province of Ontario is largely a Protestant province, and we are going to arouse Protestant prejudices to such an extent that we will injure you thereby. In fact, the hon. gentleman made a distinct appeal, from his place in this House, to religious prejudice and passion. What followed? The echo of that appeal had hardly died away in this Chamber when he turned around to the French Liberal representatives of the province of Quebec, and made an appeal to them. I will paraphrase his appeal thus: You heard me just now threaten the Government with the hostility of the Protestants of Ontario because they recommend justice be done to Manitoba; but you are Liberals, you must not forget that fact, and must not ignore it. You have heard your leader all over the province of Quebec proclaim, that a gross injustice has been done to the minority in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman quoting, or paraphrasing?

Mr. KENNY. Paraphrasing. I said, that this, in effect, was what his language meant. To continue the paraphrase: Not alone your leader, but all of you pledged your word and your honour to obtain justice for this injured minority in the province of Manitoba. I address you as Liberals; you are members of the great Liberal party of the province of Quebec; you must recognize, as I do, and as we all do, the desperate straits in which the Liberal party of the Dominion now finds itself; a desperate condition requires a desperate remedy. Be Liberals, but do not be so particular about promises and principles; the great Liberal party of Canada will never accomplish anything, if it adheres to promises and principles. See what your leader has done; he has not only abandoned the policy of remedial legislation, but he has actually placed himself under the tutelage of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). See too what I have done; you heard me proclaim in Parliament, that I had nailed the flag of unrestricted reciprocity to the mast, to float there until it carried us to victory. I have hauled down that flag. You heard me contend in this House, that the best thing for Canada was continental free trade, the highest form of protection in the world. I have abandoned that, too, and now I am advocating free trade as it is understood in Great Britain. Members of the great Liberal party of the province of Quebec, I ask you to ignore all the rights of your country-men, break all your promises, abandon all your principles, and vote for the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. The speech delivered by the hon. gentleman may be thus interpreted. I never heard an appeal from a leader which demanded from its followers so thorough a sacrifice of principle than that which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) addressed to the Liberal members of the province of Quebec. As I watched the Liberal members from that province, while the hon. gentleman was addressing them in that strain, as I watched them with their subdued demeanour and bowed heads, I saw they realized the humiliating position in which they were placed, and that they knew the hon. member for South Oxford, when he was uttering those words, was making the funeral oration of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. gentlemen oppose the Bill because they say it is an attempt to coerce the province of Manitoba. Sir, where does the coercion come from? Nineteen-twentieths of the population of Manitoba are Protestant, and the people who have been coerced are the remaining one-twentieth. Really, as regards this bugbear of coercion, it is too ridiculous to suppose, that such a small minority can coerce such an immense majority. I understand that the Catholic minority of Manitoba desire separate schools. They had them prior to 1890. That question is with many people a matter of conscience. Many people desire that their children shall be instructed in their religion during school hours, and that is a desire which is not confined to Catholics, but which is shared in by Protestant denominations. As far as I am concerned, I should be very sorry indeed to see the Protestant schools of Manitoba secularized. I should be very sorry to see religious instruction removed from the teachings of the Protestant schools, because I do believe, and the longer I live the more convinced I am, that a non-religious school means an irreligious school, and that a godless school produces a godless people. Sir, it is within the knowledge of hon. members in this House that at the last general elections in England the question of voluntary and board schools was a prominent issue before the people. In fact, Sir, the large majority which the Conservative party have in the Imperial House of Commons today, is due to the fact that they were in favour of what are called voluntary schools. I may be told that in Liberal-Unionist sections of the country, especially in Birmingham, represented by the present Colonial Secretary, the Rt. Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, that issue did not prevail. But throughout England generally the large majority which the Conservative party have in the House of Commons, is due mainly to the fact that they were in favour of the voluntary school system. I will quote, Sir, one or two statements bearing on this question made by the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour, the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Commons, a thoughtful man, a man who has given to this question great consideration, and who is known as the author of a recently-published book, "The Foundations of Belief," which has attracted much attention. At Manchester, Mr. Balfour said :

I never will admit that it is not the grossest of injustice to compel parents who take a different view to put their scheme of education into that which happens to harmonize with the secular view which I have just explained to you. I say it is a monstrous thing to compel parents whose children are at school all day long to send them to schools where the religious training and the religious education which they desire to see instilled in their youthful minds, cannot be instilled, cannot be taught. Those who are parents, will I am sure, sympathize with me. Those who take my view of what is due to the rising generation, those who hold, with the strength of conviction which animates me that it is not merely by passing a number of standards or by satisfying a certain number of Government inspectors that you are going to raise up a generation worthy to be the successors of those who have made England what it is—those who hold that conviction will, I am sure, work shoulder to shoulder with those who desire to preserve as an integral, healthy and prosperous part of our educational system, the voluntary schools by which alone, in my opinion, the best ideal of education can be carried out.

Again, speaking at another public meeting at Alnwick, he said :

It would be a melancholy day, in my judgment, for this country if parents were deprived of the right which, surely, they have by a law higher than any law which Parliament can pass to bring up their children in those religious surroundings which conform to their own highest religious convictions.

It may be said, Sir, that this is simply the Anglican view of the question, but I find that recently—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I gather, from the quotation, that Mr. Balfour was referring to the compulsory clauses of the School Act in England.

Mr. KENNY. Pardon me. He was advocating a further grant of public funds to the voluntary schools. It is contended that the grant which is now made from the Treasury to the voluntary schools is not sufficient. It is about 17s. 6d. per head, and the voluntary schools ask for 21s., the same as the board schools receive.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That quotation evidently refers to the injustice of compelling a child to attend the schools where religious exercises are repugnant to the views of the parent. That would be so in England, if there were no voluntary schools, and a conscience clause in the Act, which exempts them from these religious exercises.

Mr. KENNY. The argument of the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour is, that it is unjust to parents to deprive their children of the advantages of religious education in the schools. I find, further, Sir, that in November last, a large and important deputation from the Wesleyan Conference waited upon Lord Salisbury to place before him their views in the matter of primary education. The deputation was introduced by Sir Henry Fowler, who made this statement :

There were practically one million scholars attending their Sunday schools, and that shows the importance of the population, and the numerical strength of the people which they represent.

The Rev. Dr. Waller, President of the Wesleyan Conference, then addressed the Prime Minister, and said :

Dr. Waller said that he should not like to say that. With regard to religious education, the Methodists held that no system of education was perfect which did not include the Bible and religious instruction therefrom, suited to the capacities of children, and given by the teachers.

The Marquis of Salisbury—Does that include Roman Catholics ?

Dr. Waller said that no schools, Roman Catholic or otherwise, would put in the best representation if it excluded religious teaching, and he was not aware that Roman Catholics admitted that they discarded the Bible. It would be a national calamity if religious instruction were banished from the schools, and they believed that the teacher was the proper person to impart the instruction.

The Marquis of Salisbury—No matter to what denomination he belongs ?

Dr. Waller said no matter to what denomination he belonged. They believed that it would detract from the dignity and the usefulness of the teacher if the highest subject of all were taken out of his hands.

That is the opinion, as I have said, of the president of the Wesleyan Conference ; and the gentlemen who have argued in this House against religious instruction in the schools must recognize that in England, where the standard of education is very high, there is a strong sentiment in favour of religious instruction in the schools. And religious instruction, as stated by Dr. Waller, to be effective, must be continuous and authoritative; and it can be best given in the schools, and by the teachers. Therefore hon. gentlemen must not find so much fault with their Roman Catholic fellow-citizens if they desire to have their children instructed in religion in their schools. I might give other extracts pointing in the same direction from the utterances of the Prime Minister of England. But let me just say that this matter of religious instruction is one that concerns the poor man more than the man who is better off. We have no rich people in Canada; but to some has been accorded greater material wealth than to others. My contention is that there is no portion of our population so much interested in the preservation of religious instructions in the schools as the poorer people; for this reason, that the poorer people have not the time, even if they had the ability, to give their children that instruction; and unless those children receive it in the schools, they will grow up in ignorance. The better we can make our population, the more morally and religiously we can bring up our children, the more satisfactory they must be to us as parents and the better Canadians they will become. I have no sympathy with the men who would exclude religious instruction from schools. I am told that even in this Manitoba case—I do not speak of my own personal knowledge—when the Act of 1890 was introduced, the Catholic schools were first assailed because they were the weakest and that one spirit that animated some at any rate of the men who introduced that measure, was that they would gradually exclude religious instruction from all the schools.

Mr. Speaker, it is needless for me to take up the time of the House upon the question of coercion or upon the question of an inquiry. As regards the question of a commission or an investigation, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) who is evidently the tutor of the leader of the Opposition in this matter, has stated distinctly that there is nothing to investigate, that the whole question is known, as it has been before the courts for years. It now becomes a question whether this Parliament, having the power placed in our hands by the constitution to redress this grievance, shall honestly, fairly and justly administer that power. I do not for my part see how we can in all fairness refuse to do so in view of the pre-confederation compact entered into by the Parliament of Canada with the people of the then Red River settlement, now the province of Manitoba. I think it would be in the public interest that this question should be disposed of by the men who caused the trouble, if they will do so. I am anxious, for the peace of Canada at home and for the credit of Canada abroad, that this question should be disposed of; and I believe that if this Parliament refused to deal with it in the manner in which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has intimated we should deal with it, we should be doing an injustice to the people who have been aggrieved and an injury to Canada. My hon. friend the leader of the House said that he would be glad to see confederation rounded off by the ancient colony of Newfoundland entering the union. Nova Scotia is the nearest part of the Dominion to that colony, we are naturally more familiar with the sentiments of its people on that question than our friends who live in other more distant parts of the Dominion; and I say, speaking of my own knowledge, that the fact of this injury being inflicted by a majority on a minority in the province of Manitoba, is used by the opponents of confederation in Newfoundland as an argument against that colony joining Canada. Gentlemen who occupy prominent positions in Newfoundland, and who take a great interest in educational matters, have also admitted to me that their judgment on the question of confederation was influenced by the fact that the Parliament of Canada had refused to redress the grievances of the minority in Manitoba. Therefore, if that injury has resulted to Canada in the case of the neighbouring colony of Newfoundland—if the people there, who know so much more about us than the people of Great Britain do, if they point to the existence of discord and ill-feeling in the Dominion of Canada—I contend that it is a greater injury still to us as regards immigration into this country. We desire to see the province of Manitoba prosper; we desire to see its population increased; and we believe that can be helped by settling this difficulty. We desire it to be settled, because not only is immigration prevented, but the British investor and the British public generally are unfavourably influenced towards Canada by the prolongation of this grievance. The question has been so long disturbing our politics that it is desirable that it should be removed. While the Roman Catholic minority in Nova Scotia have no such legislative protection as that of Manitoba, yet we have a modus vivendi which works satisfactorily, and as a consequence of that happy condition of things, Nova Scotia is a model province, and Halifax is a model provincial capital. We have in the province of Nova Scotia no place for firebrands and fanatics. We can only offer them early and commodious graves. Down by the sea we do not unduly disturb ourselves about questions of religious belief, nor do we value our associates less because they do not happen to kneel at the same altar as we do. I sincerely hope that the happy condition of things which has so long prevailed in the province of Nova Scotia, may be extended to Manitoba, and that it may also become a characteristic of the other provinces of our Dominion that they may :

Like the rainbow's light,
Their various tints unite,
And form, in Heaven's sight,
One arc of peace.

Mr. CASEY. A good old Methodist hymn, which refers to the conditions of those who have gone before into a better world, speaks of their troubles on earth in this wise :

They wrestled hard, as we do now,
With sins and doubts and fears.

That reminds me very much of the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Kenny's) position while he was making his speech. He was wrestling very hard with difficulties of that kind, and I am sure that when he brought upon the desk those last three sheets which contained his beautiful peroration, he must have been as much relieved as the rest of the House were at the happy event. The hon. gentleman set out by telling us that he was no lawyer, and he proved that statement most conclusively before he got through. But he also proved that he was a special pleader, and that in dealing with speeches which have been delivered, and facts that have been ascertained, his ordinary manner—I suppose I must speak of it in a parliamentary way—is ingenious. He gave us, in his own ingenious way, his version of the remarks of those who preceded him, and the facts of the case. He told us that he did not want to hear the words "Catholic" and "Protestant" in connection with this debate, but his whole speech, from beginning to end, was an ingenious attempt to wrest arguments, statements and facts for the purpose of rousing the religious prejudices of Catholics. He told us that he objected to violence of statement in men of his age and the age of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and that such violence always met with retaliation. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has got that fact fully established in his own mind. For this session he has had an experience of the retaliation that follows violent, abusive, and ingenious remarks, directed against other members of the House. He had so much of that retaliation that it is a considerable time since we have seen him on the floor of this House, or heard his melodious voice. He is going to suffer on this occasion from another species of retaliation, which, perhaps, he may feel more deeply than any he has deserved by the ingenuity of his remark, and that is, that no one will take the trouble to follow him through the windings of his alleged arguments, or attempt to answer his alleged statements of fact.

There is one admission he has made, however ; and as we can afford to use so much of his speech as gives away his case, that must be noticed. He told us that the present public school system in Nova Scotia has been a success, that the modus vivendi has been a success there, and that he would advise the minority in Manitoba to agree to a similar arrangement in that province. And yet he intends to vote for a Bill which makes modus vivendi impossible, and which will impose on the people of that province a school system which is not of their own devising.

Now, I notice that he is not the only gentleman on that side of the House who is wrestling with sins and doubts and fears. The whole Government have been in great difficulty about this measure ever since it has come upon the carpet. They have endured it long and now wish to make an end of the agony. When the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) concluded his remarks, the hon. Minister of Finance called "question," intimating that he did not wish any further discussion of the question, but to have an immediate vote. I am astonished that he should so far underrate the importance of this great question, and the desire of members of this House to discuss it, as to make that demand. He knew that at the time he called "question," the House was thin, and that a large number of members were engaged on the Railway Committee, which was somewhat irregularly sitting while the House was in session. He knew that one at least of the most prominent speakers on this side, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), was ill and not able to speak, and he knew, personally, very well that that gentleman intended to speak, and was fully prepared to do so. He knew all this, and yet he called "question." It showed an impatience of suffering with which I would hardly have credited the hon. gentleman.

But there are other reasons why we should not come to a vote for some time yet, besides the considerations of fair-play to which I am alluding. We have not heard from the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) himself on this question. He is one of the central figures in connection with this issue in the eyes of the country. It has long been known, he has made no secret of it, that he never wished to have a Bill of this kind brought before the House by a Government of which he was a member. It is known that he is, in heart, opposed to it, and opposed it in Council since the inception of the idea. We also know that no man in the House has such a facility for composing ingenious excuses for his own conduct, and for the conduct which he wishes his supporters to practice, and we are awaiting his remarks with great interest. We are waiting to hear from the brains of the party, because we have not heard from the brains of the party yet, to any great extent. We have heard from the Master-Mind on the subject, but he gave very little attention to the question in hand, and told us nothing whatever new or useful about it, when he introduced the Bill. He took the job of introducing the Bill out of the hands of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), who had given notice of the Bill, and had helped to prepare it.

To sustain his position in the Cabinet, and his pretensions to a still higher position in it, the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) took away the job of explaining the Bill from his subordinate, and made such an explanation of it as the House has already heard. I am not going to qualify or describe that explanation further. It was quite clear, that this hon. gentleman had come out here as the liquidator of a bankrupt government. He had no interest in this Bill, he did not care anything about it, and did not know anything about it, but took it over as part of the bankrupt stock of the concern which he had come to liquidate, and, when he brought it before the public view, he was unable to show off his goods to any great advantage. Now, Sir, for that reason we want to hear from these brainy members of the Government who do know something about the Bill. Besides the gentleman whom I have already named, we want to hear from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan); we want to hear from the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) who really had most to do with the framing of the Bill; we want to hear from the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), who has had something to say upon the subject elsewhere than in this House. We want to hear from every one who belongs either to the bolting or to the remaining wing of the Government, what they think of this Bill, and how they justify their conduct.

To come back to my subject, they have been in great difficulties in regard to the measure. In fact, the Conservative party, at the present time, is somewhat in the position of a certain hero of old, to whom I may refer, as a reverend old friend of mine used to do, as belonging to ancient history. My good old friend used to speak of all those of whom we read before the Christian era, as belonging to ancient history, and he spoke of Neptune, Caesar and Nebuchadnezzar as of equal reality. He used to tell us about Hercules, and, in one respect, the story of Hercules resembles the plight of the Conservative Government to-day. Hercules, as we all know, was a long-suffering and powerful hero of mythology, who came to his end in a very tragic way. One of the wives of his bosom sent him, as a present, what she supposed to be a clean shirt, but it turned out to have been poisoned with the blood of something or other—a hydra, I think, or some other creature that was prolific in microbes—and, when Hercules donned his present, he found himself in trouble. He writhed, groaned, shrieked, wriggled and yelled, until, finally, he died. And I think the Conservative Government is in the same position to-day. They have put on what they supposed to be a beautiful new garment, which they call Remedial Policy, but they find that it burns like fire, and they are now writhing in agony. I do not wonder that, like the Finance Minister, they are anxious to have the agony over and to be through with it and with life together.

They have one last hope, which has been referred to to-night, the hope of a conference with Mr. Greenway on this subject. They declare, that they intend to have this conference after the Bill has passed its second reading. The question naturally arises: Why should not that conference be held before the second reading? Is it sensible, is it reasonable, to ask Mr. Greenway to come down here and consult in this matter after it is practically all finished? Is it not an insult to him and to his government to ask them to come here and then propose to meet them with a loaded gun—to say to them: “We have passed this Bill on its second reading, we have got the assent of the House to the principle, and now, if you do not go down on your marrow bones, if you do not knuckle down to us, we will fire the gun and blow you and your legislation out of existence, and impose our will upon the people of your province?”

That is the meaning of the proposition for the conference which the Secretary of State said he was going to have—that is the meaning of it, as it refers to Manitoba. What is the object of the proposal, from the point of view of party tactics? It is quite clear. The object is to tell the bolters from Ontario and other provinces: There is no fear that the Bill will become law. They are told almost in so many words by the press, they will be told privately by members of the Government and the party whips, and dear knows, by whom else: “Don’t fret; you are all right; vote for the second reading of the Bill, for it will not become law: we are going to get Greenway down and get a promise from him to do something that will enable us to drop the Bill or burk it in committee; you may vote for the second reading with a clear conscience, for there is no danger of Manitoba being coerced.” But the bolter may look at it in another way, and he may say: “If the Bill is not going to pass, if you are going to have a conference with Mr. Greenway, why commit me to the principle of coercion, by forcing me to vote for the second reading? Why not postpone the second reading until after you have seen Mr. Greenway, and unless it is necessary to pass the Bill, let us not commit ourselves before our constituencies by this unpopular vote.” That is how it will strike the bolter—the bolter for what I may call Protestant reasons.

But will it so strike the supporters of the Government who, like my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny), really wish to have remedial legislation? It is impossible that a gentleman of his acuteness should fail to see, that this proposition of a conference is a confession of failure on the part of the Government. It is an adoption, but too late to be of any use, of the policy which the leader of the Opposition has been urging upon them for five years, ever since this question became a question—the policy of inquiry before final action. It is a confession of failure, in not having done it before. It is a confession that they do not want the Bill passed, if, by any possibility, it can be got rid of. That is the way in which it must strike all those who really wish remedial legislation.

Coming to the Bill itself, and the interests involved, I think, that this is, undoubtedly the most important question that has ever arisen in Canada. It is a question upon the solution of which depends the answer to the query, whether the people who now compose the confederation, can live together any longer as Canadians. I do not pretend that any immediate rupture would follow any course that might be taken in regard to this Bill. But I do contend, that, if this question is not settled in consonance with sound constitutional ideas, and with sound policy, for the good of Canada at large, it will open a breach between the different classes in the confederation that may never be healed. We must approach the consideration of this question with such coolness and calmness as party feeling will allow us to exercise. I hope, for my own part, that, in discussing this question, I am as far from feeling the prejudices of a Stewart Mulvey, on one hand, as I am from entertaining the same opinions as Bishop Cameron does, in regard to those who oppose the Bill, on the other. Personally, I have equal opportunities, through relationship, and so on, to understand the views of both Protestants and Catholics on the matter, and I think I can view the question with a fair mind.

The history of the case has been gone over pretty frequently, and I need not go into that in detail. There were petitions from Manitoba alleging grievances. There was a reference to the Supreme Court for its opinion, merely, as to whether those grievances constituted ground for appeal to the Privy Council of Canada. There was an appeal from the opinion of the Supreme Court on that question, to the Privy Council of England.

I wish to make it clear that that appeal merely carried over the same questions that were before the Supreme Court here, in order to get the opinion of the English Privy Council upon them; and the decision of the Privy Council had no more the effect of law in the matter, had no more directive or compulsive power than the opinion of the Supreme Court had in the first instance. And, as was well pointed out by my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll), whose speech on that subject cannot be too highly praised, the opinion either of the Supreme Court or of the Privy Council on that matter was purely advisory under the terms of the reference, and had really no more binding effect on the Government than the opinion of the Minister of Justice himself could have had.

Now, the Privy Council gave a different answer, as its opinions on the points submitted, from that given by the Supreme Court, holding that there was a prima facie case for an inquiry by the Privy Council of Canada. That is another point I wish to make clear. The decision of the Privy Council was that there was a case for inquiry and possible action. They did not pretend that they had made any inquiry, they did not pretend to dictate what the action should be. To make that clear, I wish to quote a sentence or two of the reference on which they decided. Question 2 submitted to the Privy Council reads as follows:—

Are the grounds set forth in the petitions and memorials such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsections above referred to, or either of them?

Question 5 was:

Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declarations or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises?

There is a complete answer to the statement of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) that the Privy Council of England had decided that there was a grievance requiring a remedy. The point has been made by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll); I merely repeat it to answer the hon. gentleman's repetition of the other charge. Those were the questions asked them, and they decided that, "assuming the facts stated in the petition" there was ground for a hearing. A great deal has been made of the concluding clause of the Imperial Order in Council based upon the decision of the Privy Council in England. The great bulk of that Order in Council, of course, simply embodied the words of the finding of the Committee of the Privy Council, the judges, in other words, who heard the case. But at the close are added the usual words with which an Order in Council always concludes, namely:

Her Majesty having taken the said report into consideration, was pleased by and with the advice of Her Privy Council to approve thereof and to order, as it is hereby ordered, that the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually observed, obeyed and carried into effect in each and every particular. Whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being, and all other persons whom it may concern are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

We have heard no end of times, all over the country, that these words constitute a distinct order, to our Government here, to enforce a remedy for certain grievances in Manitoba. They constitute nothing of the kind, as every lawyer ought to know, but as some lawyers have pretended to ignore. But these words were quoted in the election of Haldimand somewhere about a year ago, as a proof that the remedial order, which had been passed already, was not a declaration of policy on the part of this Government, and was merely handing on the decision of the Privy Council to the government of Manitoba. How hollow that claim is, will appear from reading the decisions of the Committee of the Privy Council itself, which are embodied in this Order in Council. In answer to the 5th question, which I have just read, they say :

In answer to the fifth question :—That the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction and the appeal is well founded, but that the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute ; that the general character of the steps to be taken is sufficiently defined by subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 1870.

I will read from the judgment as contained in the report of the Canadian case, as edited by their counsel in England, to show what the concluding words of the Order in Council mean.

Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute. It is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

So far, it is similar to what I have quoted from the blue-book, but the original report goes on :

It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

Then the Order in Council states what the grievance was, assuming the facts alleged in the petition to be true, as follows :—

Before this passed into law—

(Referring to the Act of 1890 and amendments.)

—there existed denominational schools of which the control and management were in the hands of the Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used, and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxtion of the province, and the money raised for these purposes for local assessment was, so far as it fell upon the Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools.

These are the three provisions so often referred to as A, B and C, securing the control and management of separate schools the supply of their proportionate share of the public money, and exemption from taxation for public schools.

Now, that was the condition of things when the Privy Council of Canada began to inquire into the matter. And what did they do ? Instead of inquiring into the facts which had been alleged —by the petitions which had been assumed by the British Privy Council, and which had been transmitted to them for their judgment, they came to a decision without having before them as evidence a single proven fact in regard to this alleged grievance, or a single answer to the allegations of the petitioners. We all know that certain evidence on behalf of the petitioners was put before them, that they refused time to Manitoba to reply to that evidence, that thereupon that evidence was withdrawn for the purposes of the suit. But those same affidavits have irregularly, improperly and scandalously been since published in the official blue-book, as if they had been part of the case before the Privy Council, and had been decided upon by that body. I say that such action was scandalous, because it leads the public to believe that this was in evidence before the committee of the Privy Council, and had to be taken into account in the decision, when such was absolutely not the fact.

Then they concluded this farcical proceeding, miscalled an inquiry, by passing an order which granted all that the petitioners asked. I remind you, Sir, that the British Privy Council had told them that they need not grant all the petitioners asked. But this Government, without having any evidence, legally, before them, did grant all the petitioners asked, and put it in the Order in Council. My contention is that there and then was the time when not only questions of fact, but questions of policy should have been entered into by the Government of Canada, before they issued any order to the government of Manitoba. If I understand the Manitoba Act, it was the duty of the Privy Council of Canada to consider, first, all questions of fact relating to grievances alleged to exist ; second, all questions of policy as to how the grievances may be best remedied, without involving undue interferences with existing legislation. We contend that this Government did not look into these matters at all ; that they merely made themselves machines for registering the demands in full of the petitioners.

The order subsequently published by the Governor in Council refers to the three classes of privileges to which I have referred, and sets them out under headings, "A," "B" and "C," in this form :

(a) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid.

(b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

(c) The right of exception of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payments or contribution to the support of any other schools.

I make this quotation in order to maintain my contention that the Order in Council directed and implied the restoration of the Manitoba separate schools, as they existed before 1890.

It has been contended that that order is the judgment of a court. It is not the judgment of any court. There was no consideration of evidence, there was no decision on facts ; it was a declaration of policy, a declaration binding the Cabinet as a whole, to the policy that the separate school system of Manitoba should be restored to the full extent in which it existed before 1890. That order was served on Manitoba, and the province made a reply, refusing to accept it in that shape, but urging certain important considerations in regard to it, to some of which I must refer. It points out many valid reasons why the law of 1890 was passed, among others, that the separate schools were defective, and allowed the people to grow up illiterate. It took objection on the ground of principle to any change been made. Then it pointed out particular difficulties, in this manner :

Objections upon principle may be taken to any modification of our educational statutes which would result in the establishment of more sets of separate schools. Apart, however, from the objections upon principle there are serious objections from a practical educational standpoint. Some of these objections may be briefly indicated.

We labour under great difficulties in maintaining an efficient system of primary education. The school taxes bear heavily upon our people. The large amount of land which is free from school taxes and the great extent of country over which our small population is scattered present obstacles to efficiency and progress.

Hon. members will see that the land policy of the Government in the North-west is involved in this manner, that their action in exempting railway lands from taxation has, to a large extent, prevented the establishment of schools. Then the reply touches on this important point :

We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not available then to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools.

We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order.

Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall cheerfully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.

But the Government rejected that offer, as they had refused the advice of the leader of the Opposition to the same effect long before.

Then this reply from Manitoba points out the two essentials to any effective and substantial restoration of Roman Catholic privileges, in this way :

1. The right to levy school taxes.
2. The right to participate in the legislative school grant ; without these privileges the separate schools cannot be properly carried on, and without them, therefore, any professed restoration of privileges would be illusory.

There is some argument put forward as to the legality of legislating in this Parliament with respect to levying school taxes ; but in regard to the second point, the right to share in the legislative grants, there is no room for argument. It is clear to every one that without a share in the public funds of the province, the restoration of separate schools in Manitoba must be perfectly illusory, and the framers of the present Bill have confessed it by the manner in which they have framed the Bill, for evidently, they are unable to see any way of providing public funds for those schools.

Then there was the memorandum, dated 27th July last, adopted by the Committee of the Privy Council, here, making certain suggestions. This was not a new remedial order addressed to Manitoba, directing it to do certain things, but a memorandum making suggestions to Manitoba, and setting forth that something less than what was demanded by the remedial order might be satisfactory to the minority. It was an inquiry as to what Manitoba would be willing to do about the matter. It contained no indication as to what the Government here intended to do. In reply to that memorandum, and forwarded a good deal later, there was another memorandum from the Government of Manitoba, sent on 21st December, 1895, covering a good deal of ground, and I wish to call attention to one of its phases. It contains a distinct repetition of the invitation to inquire further into the facts of the case. It says :

It is a matter of regret that the invitation extended by the legislative assembly to make a proper inquiry into the facts of the case has not been accepted, but that, as above stated, the advisers of His Excellency have declared their policy without investigation. It is equally a matter of regret that Parliament is apparently about to be asked to legislate without investigation. It is with all deference submitted that such a course seems to be quite incapable of reasonable justification, and must create the conviction that the educational interest of the people of the province of Manitoba are being dealt with, in a hostile and peremptory way, by a tribunal whose members have not approached the subject in a judicial spirit, or taken the proceedings necessary to enable them to form a proper opinion upon the merits of the question.

The inquiry asked for by the reply of the legislature to the remedial order should, in the opinion of the undersigned, be again earnestly invited, and in the event of the invitation being accepted the scope of the inquiry should be sufficiently wide to embrace all available facts relating to the past or present school systems.

I do not think the position could have been stated in more correct and statesman-like language. The Privy Council, here, had failed absolutely in its duty to consider the facts and the policy of the case, before framing its order. The legislature of Manitoba had, in reply, invited inquiry, and by that invitation had practically pledged itself to abide by the result of the inquiry. Again, as late as the 21st December last, it repeated the invitation with the same implication involved in it. Even then, the Government here would not accept it. It is only now, when they find how slippery is their hold upon the majority in this House, when they find how thoroughly unpopular their policy is with the country, that they are holding out an olive branch, with a sword point concealed among the foliage, inviting Manitoba to a conference about the details of this question, after the matter has been settled by the Bill passing its second reading in this House.

By this last concession, the Government have confirmed the stand of the Manitoba legislature, and confirmed the stand taken by the leader of the Opposition, that there should have been more investigation and consultation about the matter, and that it is even yet not too late, to have that consultation. The only difference between their position, as modified by this confession of failure, and our position, is, that they propose to act before having a consultation, and that we propose to defer action until there has been time for a consultation. We propose to give this Bill what is called the six months' hoist, to give it a clear negative, for the time being; but that action certainly does not prevent, as has been alleged, an inquiry and a consultation with the Manitoba government, as to what that government should do in regard to the schools in that province. I have no doubt that the influence of this Government, exerted in that way, could have long ago settled this question, and could have kept it out of politics for years back, if it had not been supposed to be the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite, to keep the question in politics for party purposes, for the sake of the votes they thought they could make out of it.

I come now to consider, briefly, the provisions of the Bill itself. I will not go into the details now, but certain broad facts stand out in regard to the principle of the Bill. In the first place, the Bill is, in its terms and in its intentions, coercive. It has been denied that it is coercive, because it provides the nominal alternative, that the Manitoba government may, itself, do a great many things ordered therein, and so prevent their being done by this Government. But I say that a Bill which is intended, or supposed to be intended, to secure the performance of certain things in Manitoba, which the government of that province do not wish to be done, is, in its essence, a coercive Bill. This Bill, in regard to some things, provides, that if they are not done by the local government they shall be done by the Governor in Council here. In regard to other things, it directs the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to do them, but provides no alternative in case they refuse to do them. According to the strictest definition of the word "coercion," this Bill is strictly a coercive Bill in its intention, and in its language, and yet those in this House who sympathize with the position of the minority in Manitoba, who feel that something ought to be done for them, have the additional fault to find with it, that while the Bill is coercive in language and intention, it is not remedial. This point was well brought out, like so many others, by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll); but it cannot be too often impressed upon the House, that the Bill is, at the same time, coercive and ineffective.

Before calling attention to its defects as an Act for establishing separate schools in Manitoba, I wish to emphasize the argument that the Bill is, in its essence, unconstitutional, and is one which this House has no right to pass. It must be remembered that our jurisdiction is a special one in regard to separate schools in Manitoba. It is a jurisdiction forming an exception to the rule of the constitution, which gives educational matters to the control of the province. It is, therefore, limited to the exact wording of the constitution, which creates that exception, and endows us with power to act. Under the 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, the circumstances which give rise to our jurisdiction are clearly defined. There must be, first, an appeal from the aggrieved minority to the Governor General in Council. There must be an Order in Council, demanding certain relief from the government of Manitoba for that aggrieved minority. There must be a refusal by the government of Manitoba to grant that relief, and the measure of our jurisdiction—and this is a point to which I wish to call special attention—the measure of our jurisdiction in this matter is the degree in which Manitoba has refused to carry out our demands.

There is a theory, that, if your remedial order directs Manitoba to do a large numbers of things, and she refuses to do those things, you may then legislate to carry out a smaller number of objects, and justify it by the pretense, that the greater includes the less. No argument could be more absurd and rotten. Our jurisdiction only begins when Manitoba has refused to do certain particular things, and it is only with regard to those certain particular things that we are able to legislate. I do not think that argument could be expressed any better than was done in the columns of "La Vérité" of last week. "La Vérité" is an acknowledged clerical organ in the province of Quebec, an organ which I am told goes practically to every priest in the province, an organ which is looked to, as its name indicates, to tell the truth on everything in which the interests of religion are involved. By a strange coincidence "La Vérité" on the 7th of March and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) on the 6th of March in this House put forward almost exactly the same argument in regard to the unconstitutionality of this measure. When you find the hon. member for Winnipeg, the author of the Act of 1890, the man who is supposed to be the champion of Mr. Greenway in this particular matter, and "La Vérité," the organ of the clerical party in Quebec, and supposed to be the champion of the hierarchy and the priesthood in that province, agreeing exactly in the same argument—

Mr. AMYOT. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—

Mr. CASEY. Order. Only one conclusion remains, Mr. Speaker, and that is, that this argument is so incontrovertibly and absolutely true that it cannot be got around by anybody. Now, if my hon. friend wants to ask me a question, I will hear it.

Mr. AMYOT. I say that the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken about the position of "La Vérité" in Quebec.

Mr. CASEY. What is its position, then?

Mr. AMYOT. It is an ordinary paper, without any authority more than any other paper.

Mr. CASEY. Others of my hon. friends from Quebec, who are equally able to speak of "La Vérité" such as my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette), and my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Dupont), have told me that it is, I do not say an inspired paper, but one that is looked upon as a clerical paper which goes practically to every priest in the province of Quebec.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. And has great influence.

Mr. CASEY. I have no doubt that my hon. friend who interrupts me (Mr. Amyot) thinks that "La Vérité" is a very ordinary paper when it disagrees with him, but that it is a very extraordinary paper when it agrees with him and with the Government which he supports. "La Vérité" is not as loyal to the Government as the hon. member for Beilechasse (Mr. Amyot) is for the moment. There have been times when he has not been loyal to the Government; but he is now extremely loyal to them, and he does not like to be told that an independent paper, which consults the church authorities, but does not consult him or the Premier of this country, has pronounced against this Bill. I propose to read to you as correct a translation as I can make of the argument in "La Vérité." It says:

The parliamentary correspondence of the "Trifluvien" considers that the present time is not well chosen for discussing the merits of the Remedial Bill. We believe it is infinitely better worth our while to examine this Bill now, when it is, at least theoretically, possible to modify it, than to pass it first, and then to estimate its shortcomings. It will be said, "If there are shortcomings, they will be removed by subsequent legislation." Let no one create this illusion for himself. Such as the Act is when passed, such will it remain. Never can Parliament be led to legislate twice on this question. It is enough to remember what is going on at Ottawa to convince one of this.

If the Bill is not modified so as to make it conform entirely to the remedial order of last March, it can be attacked as unconstitutional. In effect, the Federal Parliament has no right to legislate on the school question except in so far as the Manitoba Legislature has refused to legislate itself. Now, the remedial order of March 21st, 1895, declared that the minority had a right to three things: A, B, C, viz., (A) to construct, maintain, manage, Roman Catholic schools; (B) to receive a proportional share of every subsidy granted from the public funds for educational purposes; (C) finally, exemption for the Catholics from taxes imposed for the maintenance of public schools. It is A, B, C, which the Federal Government ordered the legislature to do. It is, therefore, A, B, C, which the Manitoba Legislature has refused to do. It is, therefore, A, B, C, which the Federal Parliament has the right to do, in virtue of the constitution.

But, by the Bill actually before the public, the Government only invites Parliament to do A and C; for, no matter what one may say, clause 74 does not do B;—that is to say, it does not give the minority a proportional part of every grant made for educational purposes out of public funds.

Winnipeg may then say:—"I have refused to do A, B, C;—but I have not refused to do A, C. You have, therefore, the right to legislate on A, B, C, because of my refusal; but you have not the right to legislate on A, C, because you have not, in the first place, given me legal notice to legislate, myself, in regard to A, C, alone."

It is useless to do like the ostrich: to hide one's head in the sand, and believe oneself under shelter. If clause 74 is not modified so as to do B, the Act will probably be declared unconstitutional.

There is the opinion of an independent, respected, influential, clerical authority, on the constitutionality of this measure. It is remarkable that the same argument should have occurred to the hon. member for Winnipeg at the same time, and should have been put forward on the same day without any knowledge of the coincidence or part of either. The conclusion, I say, is clear that that argument is incontrovertible. Both the Greenway side of this question and the clergy of the province of Quebec are agreed in thinking that this Act is defective and will probably be unconstitutional.

Nay, Mr. Speaker. I will go further than that; I believe the Government meant this Act to be unconstitutional. Nobody believes for a moment that this Government, now consolidated, with the brains back in it, and the imbecile head, as he was described by his subordinates, not cut off—nobody believes that this two-headed Government really wish to restore separate schools to Manitoba. Everybody knows that all they wish to do is to pass a Bill through this House which shall nominally assert the right of the Catholics of Manitoba to separate schools, which shall make a show of coercing Manitoba, which shall be sufficient to secure the support of the Catholic church in the next election. That is all they want to do. They are comforting themselves and their Ontario followers with the assurance that after all it does not matter. They know that the Privy Council will declare the Act in its present shape to be ultra vires. They know that Parliament will never venture to attack the question again. They know that it is a dead issue if this Bill passes. They know more than that; they know that if this Parliament forces separate schools on Manitoba, it will prevent the legislature of Manitoba from establishing separate schools itself. They are afraid like the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan) that the Manitoba government will re-establish those schools and get the credit of that act. They would rather see it done from here, and the result of an attempt to do it from here by a Bill in any such shape as the one before the House would be to make Catholic separate schools in Manitoba impossible for generations yet to come.

It is a serious question for our French and other Catholic friends whether they should vote for a Bill of that kind, in view of the consequences to their co-religionists.

Mr. CAMERON. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend from Inverness gives his dry "hear, hear" as a criticism on my remarks; but I am glad to be able to oppose to that little interruption of his the opinion of as good a Catholic, as good a Nova Scotian, and as good a lawyer as he is. I refer to Senator Power, of Halifax. His catholicity will not be denied by any one who knows him.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Nor his Grittism.

Mr. CASEY. Strange as it may seem to the hon. member for Inverness, it is quite possible to be a good Grit and a good Catholic at the same time. We may say one thing for Senator Power's catholicity, which I am afraid will never be said for the catholicity of the hon. member for Inverness. More than twenty years ago, certain writings of Senator Power on the relations of the church to politics, which were published in our papers here, were sent to Rome, and submitted to the college of cardinals; and they were declared by the cardinal whose special duty it was to look into the matter to be sound in theology, although there was a slight leaning to Grittism in the writings. And as a result of the writing of those articles, an ablegate was sent from Rome to this country, and an important revision of the relations between church and state in this country, followed his mission. Senator Power's catholicity, therefore, cannot be denied, and I will give you some idea of his opinions on this Bill. I will read you one or two of his conclusions, first, and then one or two quotations in support thereof. I shall read you first the conclusion of his valuable pamphlet:

Having looked at the record of the Government in connection with the Manitoba school question and having examined the Remedial Bill, I return now to the question stated at the beginning of this paper, and say that in my humble opinion, the Bill in question, is not such a measure as a Catholic member of either House of Parliament should vote for. It is calculated to do no good, but rather harm to Catholic interests in Manitoba, and to cause serious injury to the Canadian people as a whole. While I do not question the right of any Catholic member, who can satisfy himself that the Bill is likely to improve the position of his co-religionists in the matter of education, to vote for it, I shall feel it my duty, as a Catholic and as a citizen, to vote against it, should it come before the Senate, in anything like its present condition.

L. G. POWER.

Ottawa, 3rd March, 1896.

He finds that a great many defects in the Bill, some of which I have pointed out, and others to which I have not referred. He says, after a good many criticisms, which I shall not read in full:

In short, the Bill is such as one would naturally expect to result from the contest of two hostile sections of a Cabinet, warring over the remedial order, one striving—probably honestly—to restore to the Catholic minority, the rights of which they were unjustly deprived by the Manitoba Act of 1890, and the other determined that nothing should be done to alienate the large section of the population which is opposed to any concession to the minority, and believes that in the matter of education, the majority in Manitoba should have a perfectly free hand.

Let us suppose the Remedial Bill to have become law, and try to foresee the probable result. Certain school districts, in which a majority of the voters are Catholics, have accepted the Acts of 1890 and are now working under them. The people assess themselves under the law and receive their proportion of the legislative grant. The teachers say Catholic prayers, and give instructions in the doctrines of their church after the regular school hours.

This is in the much-abused Protestant schools of Manitoba!

The attitude of the schools in Catholic districts towards the existing law and their present condition are reported on by Mr. A. L. Young—an officer of the Manitoba government.

He then goes on to quote the report of Mr. Young, but, as Mr. Young will be suspected of favouring the Government, I prefer to quote from the speech of Senator Bernier, which he gives later on :

However, I find that he is to a great extent confirmed by Senator Bernier, late superintendent of Catholic schools in Manitoba. Speaking of the Catholics of that province he said, in addressing the Senate on 25th April, 1895 :

"Inducements were offered to them by the local government through their officers to attend the schools without entirely sacrificing their views ; and they thought they might try the new system. It is not on account of any preference for the public schools but because of their poverty and of the peculiar inducements offered to them. The local government were anxious to have some of our schools brought under the law in order to be able to base an argument upon the change. An inspector was sent to them who told them that if they wanted to keep up their schools the government would not be too exacting about compliance with the regulations. He told them that they might quietly give any religious instruction in the school after school hours. He told them that they could begin and close school work by saying the ordinary Catholic prayers and even suggested how it should be done."

This is sufficient proof out of the mouth of Senator Bernier, late superintendent of separate schools in Manitoba, that the local government has made it as easy as possible for the Catholic minority there to avail themselves of the ordinary public schools. Senator Power goes on to comment as follows :—

It is hardly to be expected that the districts in question will give up the advantages which they now enjoy, for the purpose of coming under the operation of the Remedial Bill, if it become law ; and I do not believe that Senator Bernier will seriously blame them if they fail to do so. They would gain nothing and lose a great deal.

Amongst other things they would lose their share of the public grant for educational purposes, which this Bill finds no means of giving them.

Whatever we may think of the local government's action in this connection, it cannot be said that it shows any hostility to Catholic schools as such ; and it perhaps indicates that, if the existing contest with the Dominion Government were at an end, a settlement or modus vivendi satisfactory to all concerned might be found without any radical change in the existing law. In the rural districts, where the law of 1890 has not been accepted, the Catholics as a rule are not well enough off to maintain their schools satisfactorily with their own funds, without a share of the legislative grant and without exemption from taxation for the public schools.

It is clear that in Manitoba the passing of the Remedial Bill will be of no substantial benefit to the Catholic minority, while it will tend to prevent a friendly settlement of the question and to antagonize the local government and the Protestant majority, who might otherwise be willing to make such modifications in the existing law as to legalize concessions similar to those tolerated in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and recognized as being on the whole fairly satisfactory.

Mr. CAMERON. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. They were so recognized tonight by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) and now by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron).

Mr. CAMERON. If legalized.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for Halifax declared that they were satisfactory as they stood. Senator Power goes on to say :

Outside of Manitoba, persistence by the Dominion Government is likely to have injurious effects, more especially in Ontario, where it may lead to a renewal of the warfare waged for so many years against Catholic separate schools by the Conservative party under the leadership of Mr. (now Chief Justice) Meredith. The number of Catholic children of an age to attend separate schools in Manitoba, was, as appears from the official report for 1886, the last to which I have had access, about 4,100.

Now comes a passage to which I would call the attention not only of every Catholic, but of every Protestant who, like myself, wishes to see no disturbance of the existing relations between Protestants and Catholics in Ontario :

The prospects of a successful campaign against separate schools in Ontario would be much increased if the Catholic electors of that province were now by transferring their support to the Conservatives, to alienate the Liberals, who, under Sir Oliver Mowat, have been their staunch friends in the past. In any case, the passing of the Bill will cause a continuance of the present mischievous and regrettable agitation, which is prejudicial to the interests of all classes.

I skip again a little and quote further. After saying that he does not object to the Remedial Bill on the ground of provincial rights, he says :

At the same time, I am convinced that, under all the circumstances of the case—some of which I have discussed—Mr. Laurier's policy of inquiry and conciliation would, if adopted, be far better for Catholics as well as Protestants, not only in Manitoba but in Ontario and all the other provinces of the Dominion, than that of the Government, as embodied in the attempt to pass the Bill. I was for thirteen years a commissioner of schools for the city of Halifax ; and my experience in that capacity has satisfied me that good tempered appeals to the generosity and sense of justice of our Protestant fellow-citizens will nearly always gain recognition for our reasonable claims and due regard for our conscientious convictions ; while, on the other hand, anything in the nature of aggression or coercion is almost certain to lead to resistance and failure. In Ontario the experience has been much the same. Various amendments to the original Separate School Act, which were needed to place the Catholic schools upon a satisfactory footing, have been made from time to time, without appeals to any power other than the spirit of toleration and the sense of justice of the overwhelming Protestant majority of that great province. Human nature is much the same in Manitoba as in Nova Scotia or Ontario; and the attempt by the Dominion Parliament at the present time to set up separate schools in Manitoba under the provisions of the so-called Remedial Bill, against the strong protests and hostility of the Government, legislature and electorate of that province, is fore-doomed to failure.

I will not quote any more, though it is all valuable.

I will say in conclusion to the Catholics in Ontario, and to those who know what has taken place in Ontario, that they should know who are their friends, they should know perfectly well who have stood up for their rights, so far as those rights could be obtained without adopting a policy that would injure the country at large. They know whether the P.P.A.'s, the associates of my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff), who spoke in favour of this Bill, or the associates of those on this side of the House have done justice to the Roman Catholics in Ontario. To our French friends I do not need to say anything.

An hon. MEMBER. They are not here.

Mr. CASEY. No, but they are within hearing. The people of Quebec know who is their friend. They know in whom they are trusting. They know that they have a man who understands them, who understands their views and their interests. And, by a strange coincidence, we of Ontario find in the same individual one who understands us and our views and our interests. In spite of all attempts by such speakers as my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who seems to feel a natural antipathy to our leader—and I do not wonder at it—in spite of all attempts to raise religious prejudices against him amongst the Catholics of Quebec and the Protestants of Ontario, our leader stands out as the only man who has taken a manly straightforward, upright course in regard to this question, the only man who by any possibility can settle this question.

I said a moment ago that I need not say anything to our Liberal French friends, but I cannot help saying one thing to them. They may be sure that those who have taken a broad and statesmanlike view of this question, who have refused to take advantage of a constitutional technicality to pursue a course that would stir up divisions of race and creed in Manitoba, who have refused to take advantage of the weapons placed in their hands, will find that the people of Manitoba are human like the people of the rest of Canada. Whatever the feeling has been there, up to the present time, it will be impossible for any ordinary British or French people in Manitoba to refuse to do something in return for the magnanimity which these gentlemen are showing. I say that those French Canadians and Irish Catholics who are supporting the policy of the leader of this side of the House—and they are a vast and increasing number—are doing more to save the future of Canada, are doing more to make the continuance of confederation possible, are doing more for the welfare of their co-religionists in the province of Manitoba, than can be done by any Government in Canada taking the fullest advantage of the weapons afforded by the constitution.

And when I say that this Bill is a failure, I am not imputing any special blame to the Government, because I am quite convinced that any Bill that could be framed in this House must be a failure. I am convinced that no means exist for enforcing the will of this Parliament upon Manitoba in opposition to the will of its legislature and the majority of its people. What we can blame the Government for, is not their inability to do the impossible, but their dishonesty in pretending to do what their common sense should have told them was impossible, and for seeking to make capital out of religious differences and for keeping the country in a turmoil over a question that could have been settled long ago by conciliatory and peaceful methods.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to engage the attention of the House for a short time only, for the purpose of making a few observations on the very important question that is now before us. In doing so, I do not propose to deal with this subject from a legal point of view, because, Sir, being a layman, I am not competent to do so. But I purpose discussing it from a practical common sense view of the situation as we find it to-day. You have in your hands, Mr. Speaker, a motion moved by the Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., the leader of the Government in this House, which is in effect that this Bill be now read a second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole House. When the Bill is before the committee this House is competent to deal with it, to offer suggestions, to move amendments, so that the measure may be altered and made satisfactory to the majority of the House, and such as to meet the views of those who think and believe honestly that there is a grievance that this House is called upon to settle. For myself, I am opposed to separate schools. I live in a town with a population of over 4,000, one-fifth of whom are French and Irish Roman Catholics. We have but one school there, a public school. The children of Catholics and Protestants alike go to that school and sit there side by side. On leaving that school boys and girls, young men and young women, they take their places in the factory or the workshop or engage in other occupations, they fight the battle of life and are good friends all the way through. Therefore, I think we are all the better for not having separate schools there.

But our Roman Catholic friends there, as all over the province of Ontario, have a right to have separate schools if they choose. But, so far at least as our town is concerned, they have not chosen to exercise that right. But, if the province of Ontario was to take away that right from our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, they would then have a constitutional grievance. All parties in this House are agreed that the minority in Manitoba have a grievance. The decision of the Privy Council has settled that question. It says that a grievance does exist on the part of the minority in Manitoba. There have been no two opinions expressed on that subject since this debate began. All parties are also agreed, that this Parliament has the right to deal with and settle that grievance, in case the legislature of Manitoba fails to do so. They have not done so, they have refused to do so. Then all agreed that this Parliament has the right to settle it, and can do so. But all are not agreed as to the kind of remedy that should be applied. Some favour the restoration of the schools as they existed in that country prior to 1890; others favour the Bill now before the House to restore the privileges that were taken away by the Act of 1890, and to relieve the minority from paying taxes to the schools that they cannot avail themselves of, and thus establish the right of the minority to separate schools under government inspection, qualified teachers, etc. For myself, I think the requirements of the constitution and the decision of the Queen's Privy Council would be fully met, if, when the Bill gets into committee, it is amended in this way: That in the province of Manitoba there shall be one national school system, that there shall be one school, and that in that school no religion shall be taught that will be offensive to the consciences of the parents of any child. That would be my view: that, I believe, would settle the constitutional grievance, because it would place the whole of the community on the same footing. That is the view I shall take, when we get into committee on the Bill. But, I presume, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would oppose that view, because he says, that he prefers separate schools to secular schools; and I believe there are others in this House who take a similar view. But, in my opinion, the requirements of the constitution would be met, if this Parliament passed a Bill of that nature; because, if the Christians in that country, Catholic and Protestant, cannot agree on a form of religion that will not be offensive to the conscience of any man's child, then, let them wipe it out and let the religious training be given in the churches and Sabbath schools. Sir, I think it is a reflection on the pious fathers and mothers, on the clergymen of all denominations alike, and on the Sabbath school teachers of all denominations, if the religious training of our children has to depend on twenty or thirty minutes daily of state-aided religion taught in the schools. That is my view, although others take a different view. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) who was the father of this Manitoba Act passed in 1890, said, that the religious exercises provided for in the schools of that province, constituted rank tyranny towards the Roman Catholics who had to support those schools.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where did he say that?

Mr. TAYLOR. I will read what he said before I sit down. This being the case, I cannot help but think, that it is the duty of every loyal man in this country to assist in removing that part of the educational system in Manitoba which constitutes rank tyranny towards the Roman Catholics. When this is done, in my opinion, the grievance complained of would disappear. Then, the committee, if it thought wise when dealing with this Bill, might add another clause to the effect that this Act should not come into force for a term of three or six months, whichever term the committee might, in its wisdom, think best to fix, provided, that, in the meantime the legislature of Manitoba did not so legislate as to meet the requirements of the decision of the Privy Council, and remove the grievance. Now, Sir, that is my opinion of what could be done, and what ought to be done by this Parliament, after passing the motion moved by the leader of the Government. Now, let us look at the other side. You hold in your hand, Mr. Speaker, an amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition, that this Bill be not read now, but that it be read this day six months. If that amendment passes, will it settle this question? If it did, Mr. Speaker, we ought to pass it. If it will remove the question from this Parliament and settle it for ever, then, let us adopt the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition. But will it do this?

Mr. WALLACE. It will settle it so far as this Parliament is concerned.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will it settle the question? That is the point.

Mr. WALLACE. You asked, if this Parliament could settle it in that way. I say it will.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will show how Parliament will settle it by that amendment. If the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition is carried, it will have the effect of defeating the Government, and that is the only effect it will have, so far as I can see, in settling the question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is all you want to know.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, we will see. It will lead to the resignation of the Government led by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and that is the only effect of the amendment, so far as I can see.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Or go to the people.

Mr. TAYLOR. But it is expected by my hon. friend who wants to go to the people, that the adoption of that amendment would place the leader of the Opposition in power as Premier of this country. Then, if he gets into power, how would he settle the question? The hope of the leader of the Opposition, in moving this amendment, is, that, if carried, it would put him in power, and then he will settle the question by a still stronger Bill. Does he promise, either in his speech or in his amendment, that, if he were in power, and the government of Manitoba refused to settle this question, he would not come to this Parliament and ask us to pass a stronger Bill, a Bill that will restore the schools as they existed previous to 1890? No, Mr. Speaker, he says just the contrary; he says, and his supporters from Quebec who have thus far spoken on the subject, also say, that this Bill is no good, that it is not strong enough; and they will support his motion with the object, that, when he gets into power, he will bring in a stronger Bill. They can go back to their constituents and say, we did not vote against the Bill, we voted to put the Government out and to put the leader of the Opposition in, and he will give us a better Bill. He is reported—and I never heard him contradict it—to have said, "I thank God that among us Liberals there are no Orangemen."

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). How could he have said that, for there are as many Orangemen in our party as in yours.

Mr. TAYLOR. He has never denied it.

Mr. FOSTER. It was read to him twice and he never denied it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). You had better take it back.

Mr. TAYLOR. I take nothing back. I propose making my speech. If I get out of order the hon. gentleman has the right to call me to order, but if he wants to interrupt me he will simply keep hon. members here that much longer.

Mr. FORBES. As hon. gentlemen are aware, the leader of the Opposition contradicted that statement over his own handwriting.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, I am not aware of it, nor are the people of this country aware of it, because it has never been published.

Mr. FORBES. Yes.

Mr. BELLEY. The leader of the Opposition said it in the town where I reside.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask hon. gentlemen to refrain from these interruptions.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman is going to speak, and as he has said he heard him, then let him make the statement. This, so far as I can gather from supporters of the leader of the Opposition from his own province who have spoken on the subject, is their object in supporting his amendment and in killing this Bill—that they hope it will place their leader in power, who will give them a stronger Bill and restore separate schools in Manitoba as they were prior to 1890. This is what they expect will be the result if the amendment for the six months' hoist is carried. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is merely a trap to try and catch those hon. members who are opposed to separate schools. Why did not the leader of the Opposition move his commission resolution, the resolution he has talked about from one end of the country to the other, the idea he has conveyed in every speech made throughout the Dominion, that when the House met he would move for a commission to settle this question. Why did he not move that resolution, Mr. Speaker? He found out that many hon. members who were opposed to separate schools would not vote for a commission, because the idea of a commission was to bring about the restoration of the separate schools in Manitoba as they existed prior to 1890. Why did not the hon. gentleman allow the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to move his amendment, which would not only give the Bill the six months' hoist, but would commit this House never to deal with the question again? Because he found that if the hon. member for Simcoe moved that amendment, he (Mr. Laurier) could not get his followers from Quebec to support it. The idea which prevailed was that if it was moved by any one except himself it would not carry, but if he moved the six months' hoist his supporters would all say, we supported it with one object in view, to defeat the Government and put the leader of the Opposition in power for the purpose of obtaining a stronger and better Bill. If the leader of the Opposition wants to settle the question for all time to come, and remove it from this House, not to remain as a question, as the hon. gentleman has often said, out of which political capital could be made, then let him withdraw his amendment and substitute one reading like this: That this House is of the opinion that this Bill or any other Bill dealing with this question be not read now or six months hence or at any future time, but that the question be left to the province of Manitoba to deal with it as it may deem best. Let the hon. gentleman move such an amendment, and he will satisfy the House that if the question is not settled now, we at all events will not deal with it, and it will be left to the province of Manitoba. If the leader of the Opposition moved an amendment like that, he might reasonably expect the support of hon. members in this House who are opposed to the re-establishment of separate schools as they were prior to 1890. But the hon. gentleman cannot expect that hon. members entertaining such opinions will support a motion for the six months' hoist preceded by a speech to the effect that the grievances in Manitoba must be removed, and that the claim of the minority that separate schools be established must be conceded and attended to. This being the case I cannot support the amendment. I cannot do so in view of the statement made by the leader of the Opposition and repeated by his followers that the only object they have in view is to defeat the present Bill with the hope of being able to pass a stronger Bill. Last session I addressed a few words to this House when this subject was before it, and in my speech I made the following statement:—

Ever since I was 18 years of age I have been an Orangeman, and I am now representing perhaps the strongest Orange constituency in the province of Ontario, containing more Orangemen, more Protestants, than many, if not any other constituency in the province of Ontario; and for these reasons I think it but right that I should say a few words on this question. Orangemen are not constitution wreckers. Orangemen, if true to themselves, if true to their obligations, must uphold the constitution of our country. It is true we have some men in this country, and I am sorry to say we have them in this House, who pretend to be more Orange than King William ever was; and, although they have never joined an Orange lodge in their lives, yet they would willingly wreck the constitution and wreck the country, if they could, to make some party capital out of it. Orangemen are not made of that kind of material.

The remarks I made then I repeat to-day. This, in my opinion, is the germ of our constitution. The decisions of the Privy Council form part and parcel of our constitution, and the decision given by the Privy Council in this case says: There is a grievance, and it is the duty of this Parliament to remedy that grievance; and, Sir, the minority of Manitoba, having acted upon the decision of the Privy Council, and having knocked at the door of this Parliament for relief, is it the right of this Parliament to say: We do not recognize treating this question respectfully, and discussing it on its merits, but we will take every opportunity to drive it out of Parliament. Sir, at the same time, I made that speech last year, I also made these observations:

But there are times in the history of every man when he should rise above party feeling in the interest of his country, and when he should take, not only his political life, but, if necessary, his physical life, in his hands, for the salvation of his country and the maintenance of the constitution.

These words I again repeat to-day, because if there ever was a time when, in my opinion, they were applicable, that time is now.

We are dealing with the most serious question that has ever engaged the attention of this Parliament, or of any other Parliament in this country. It goes, as I have said, to the very root of our constitution, which it is our duty to uphold and obey. In the speech that I made in the House last year, I quoted from the speech that I delivered when this question first loomed up, some four or five years ago. Addressing my constituents then, I made this statement:

Now, when Parliament meets, I expect that some French member will move a resolution similar in every respect to that moved by Colonel O'Brien on the Jesuit question, to the effect that the Government ought to have disallowed the Act. It would, however, defeat the Government and cause it to resign, as it would be a vote of censure. How will my friends who found fault with me for voting as I did on the Jesuit question, wish me to vote on this? If they are consistent, they will have to find fault with me again, for I intend to vote on this question in just the same way as I did on the other, seeing that, so far as our House is concerned, they are exactly parallel questions. I will again vote and say that the Government did right in not disallowing the Act. I intend to be consistent, whether those who find fault with me are so or not, but I do not blame any one for finding fault, as many were misinformed and did not understand the question.

It is said by some and believed by many that the Government will introduce legislation to override the provincial Act and to grant separate schools to Manitoba. I do not know what the Government may do or intend to do, but I do know the course that I, as your representative, intend to pursue. As a supporter of the Government and as my duty demanded, I notified my leaders over two months ago that, if they introduced any legislation to interfere with or override that of the province of Manitoba, I feel it to be my duty to vote against them. I now tell you, the members of this association, that this is the course I have marked out for myself, and, if I am not, on this question, in accord with the majority of my party, I will feel it to be my duty to tender you my resignation, as I claim that the provinces alone have the right to settle these local questions. If the Jesuits' Estates Act is to be repealed, it must be by an Act of the local legislature of Quebec, and if separate schools are to be recognized by the government of Manitoba, it must be by an Act of the legislature of the province. But the same law must apply to all provinces, that each shall have the power to deal untrammelled with its own local questions, a power to which they all have a right by virtue of the constitution granted under the British North America Act.

That was a speech that I made four or five years ago, when this question first loomed up. Last year, when I read this to the House, I made the following remarks:—

That was a speech that I made two years ago, and before the last decision of the Privy Council was rendered, and on which decision the remedial order now under discussion was based. The decisions of the Imperial Privy Council are part and parcel of our constitution in this country, and since I made that speech to my constituents the Privy Council have rendered their judgment. They have said by that judgment that grievances exist in Manitoba, and that by the Act of 1890 the Manitoba government have perpetrated an injustice on the minority in that province. That decision of the Privy Council was signed by Her Majesty the Queen and was sent to our Government, and in turn it was the duty of the Governor General in Canada and his advisers to pass that remedial order on to the Manitoba government. That was the constitutional way of doing it.

That is what I stated last year, and that is what I state to-day. That decision of the Queen's Privy Council says that the Manitoba government, by its legislation in 1890, overstepped its legislative authority, and perpetrated a grievance upon the minority in that province.

Mr. FORBES. No.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is in effect what the Privy Council said, and it said further, that the minority in Manitoba have the right to appeal. Well, Sir, they did appeal to the Governor General in Council, and the Governor General in Council has given a decision. As they had a right to do, they have asked the legislature of Manitoba to remedy the grievance. The sending of that order from this Government has unlocked the door of this Parliament, and enabled it to act, and if the government of Manitoba failed to remedy the grievance, then the minority have the right to come to this Parliament, the high inquest of the nation, to appeal to them to settle this question, as, in its wisdom, it may deem best to settle it. The question before us now is: Are we going to give this Bill the six months' hoist, and say: We will not deal with the question now, but we will throw it back, and make a little more capital out of it at the next elections.

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman read the circular letter he sent to his constituents a short time back?

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) asks me if I will read the circular letter I sent to my constituents a short time back. I never sent a circular letter to my constituents at any time. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has been so informed, the only letter he can refer to is that, when my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Bain) called a meeting in my constituency to discuss a question there, and called it where he thought he would be surrounded by three or four Grits to one Tory, I addressed a circular letter—and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) may refer to that, because it is the only one I ever sent—I addressed a circular letter to a few of my friends, saying that my friend (Mr. Bain) had invited me there, and I wanted two or three of my friends in that Grit hive to give me a cheer occasionally. That is the only circular letter. If my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) refers to circular letters, I have one in my desk here, which he sent to one of my constituents—

Mr. WALLACE. Many a one I sent.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that you have; but don't charge me with having sent any, when I have not sent them.

Mr. WALLACE. I was misinformed. If the hon. gentleman has any of mine, I will not repudiate them.

Mr. TAYLOR. This remedial order was sent on by this Government to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, to be laid before his advisers and the legislature, with a request that they should remedy the grievance. That remedial order asked that the legislature of Manitoba should amend their law, in accordance with the decision of the Queen's Privy Council. Shortly after this was done, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), who was the father of this Act of 1890, passed by the legislature of Manitoba, wrote a letter to the press, in which the following passage occurs:—

When I introduced the School Bill of 1890, I pointed out that in so far as it provided for religious exercises in the schools, it was in my opinion defective. I am one of those who deny the right of the state to interfere in any way with matters of religion. I said then, and I still think that the clause of the 1890 Act, which provides for certain religious exercises, is most unjust to Roman Catholics. If the state is to recognize religion in its school legislation, such a recognition as is acceptable to Protestants only, and in fact only to a majority, of Protestants, is, to my mind, rank tyranny. The desire of those with whom I think in this matter is to eliminate every question of a religious nature from the school laws and to make the school laws purely secular. This has not been done in Manitoba, and that course is apparently not supported by a majority of the people there. That being so, surely it will be admitted that the nature of the religious exercises or religious teaching (I am unable to make any clear distinction between the two) should be such as is agreeable to the consciences of those whose money is taken to support the schools. I have sufficient faith in the liberality of the Manitoba people to declare on their behalf that if a final settlement of this question can be reached upon the lines suggested by Col. Oulmet, they will do their part. What Manitoba has insisted upon is that the Roman Catholics shall not have a system of separate schools such as existed prior to 1890, which were exempt from the general laws as to efficiency. If the Roman Catholics are willing to accept the schools as they exist at present and as they may from time to time be modified with the addition of such religious teaching as they may desire, then there should be and I am sure would be no difficulty in reaching a settlement of the whole question without any legislation on the part of the Dominion Parliament.

Yours truly,
JOSEPH MARTIN.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has this Government done since to try to induce the legislature of Manitoba to obey the constitution and remedy the grievance? They admit, as the hon. member for Winnipeg admits, that there is a grievance; yet, in order to make political capital for the leader of the Opposition, they refused to remedy that grievance. True, the constitution forces this question into this House to be dealt with and the Government have done what they believed to be their duty; they have introduced a Bill, but not to restore the schools as they were previous to 1890—a Bill which the hon. leader of the Opposition and his colleagues, from his own province say is no good. The Government have introduced a Bill which, in their opinion, meets the requirements of the decision of the Privy Council. If the object of this Bill was to restore separate schools as they existed prior to 1890, I would give it as strong opposition as any other member of this House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the distinction between the schools as established—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is the distinction between the schools as established prior to 1890, and as provided by this Bill? There is this difference: They are to be under the control of the Government, so far as qualified teachers and inspection go. But the Bill, even as it is, does not meet my view, and when we get into committee, I will have something more to say as to that, by moving an amendment; but I do not expect that my hon. friend opposite will support it.

Mr. FORBES. What is it?

Mr. TAYLOR. I told my hon. friend a few moments ago what my view was—that we should have one school without any religion in it that would be offensive to the conscience of any person's child, and that will contain what the hon. member for Winnipeg says their schools do contain—rank tyranny, so far as the Roman Catholics of Manitoba are concerned. After quoting the letter written by the hon. member for Winnipeg last year, I made the following remarks:—

If I can understand the English language, and if my hon. friend from Winnipeg speaks, as he professes to speak, for the legislature and the people of that province, then there will be no difficulty in the government of Manitoba adjusting the difficulties that are claimed to exist in that country. I may just say for myself that had the government done as it had been rumoured two years ago they would do—had they introduced an Act to override the Act of the Manitoba legislature, I would then, as I notified them, have voted against them. Had they introduced it at the session a year ago, I would have done the same; the decision of the Privy Council had not then been rendered. Had they introduced it this session, I would have voted against them. And, in pursuance of my duty as whip, I found that if the Government introduced legislation this session to override Manitoba, and if enough Government supporters voted against them, it was the intention of all the Liberal members of this House, whether Protestant or Catholic, to down the Government for it.

Last year, shortly before the session met, the remedial order had been sent to Manitoba. The Remedial Bill would then have been called coercion; but the Government said: We will not introduce it this session, but we will call a special session to deal with the subject. Then they issued an Order in Council and sent it up to the government of Manitoba, asking that government to deal with the question. The conclusion of that Order in Council, which was sent to Manitoba in July last, read as follows:—

The sub-committee have, therefore, the honour to recommend that Your Excellency will be pleased to cause communication to be had through the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba with the government of that province, in order to ascertain upon what lines the local authorities of Manitoba will be prepared to promote amendments to the Acts respecting education in schools in that province, and whether any arrangement is possible with the Manitoba government, which will render action by the Federal Parliament, in this connection, unnecessary.

The legislature of Manitoba is now in session, and have they done anything towards meeting that reasonable request of the Dominion Government? They have not; and yet our friends talk about this measure as being coercion now, after the Government here had sent the respectful request which I have read, to the Manitoba government to regulate their own affairs, to amend their own law to comply with the decision of the Privy Council, and not oblige this Parliament to deal with the question. They paid no attention to that communication. They thought they could make some political capital for our friends on the other side of the House by letting the House meet and letting this Bill be introduced; and if the Government should be beaten on the motion for the six months' hoist, the friends of Mr. Greenway in this House might get into power. I went on to state in my speech delivered last session, that, in my opinion:

Every possible effort should be made by this Government to have the matter adjusted amicably, on the lines of the letter of the hon. member for Winnipeg, by the local legislature, which, by the constitution of this country, has exclusive jurisdiction to deal with such matters. Like the hon. member for Winnipeg, I have faith in the people of Manitoba. I believe the people of Manitoba and the government of Manitoba will obey the remedial order, and the decision of the Queen's Privy Council, which is part and parcel of our constitution. I have no reason to doubt that they will not obey that order, for the word sent down here by the Manitoba legislature was to the effect that they were willing to try and adjust the matter. The hon. member for Winnipeg says his letter has a different meaning from what I take from it, and from what the people of this country will take from it. But you may take the same meaning from the answer of the Manitoba legislature to the remedial order. If I can read and understand the English language, it says: We are willing to negotiate further. Then I say it is the duty of this Government to meet them on that ground. Had the Government introduced and tried to pass legislation at this session, I believe they would have been acting wrongly and contrary to the true meaning of the constitution; but they have delayed the matter to another session, in order to try to adjust it, as I believe they will; because I believe and accept the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg that the people of that province are just as loyal and true, and as ready to uphold the constitution of this country, as any other community under the sun.

That is the statement I made last year, and, after the House had closed, the Order in Council, a portion of which I have read, was sent to the Manitoba government, and six months have since elapsed. Have the Manitoba government tried to adjust the matter in any way satisfactorily to the minority or to meet the requirements of the decision of the Privy Council? No; and yet we are asked to give another delay of six months, not for the purpose of removing the Bill from this Parliament for all time, but to turn out the Government and to give the Opposition a chance to pass a Bill strong enough to meet the wishes of those who want the schools restored as they were previous to 1890. As I have stated before, I do not see how I or any other hon. gentleman, entertaining the views I hold, could do otherwise than vote against the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and vote for the second reading of this Bill, in order that it may be discussed by the House in committee and there remodelled to suit my views, if I can get it remodelled in that way, or, if not, to suit the views of the majority in this House, who are willing, as I trust they are, to obey the constitution of this country and try to remove the grievance, in accordance with the judgment of the Privy Council. Then, so that there might not be any excuse for charging that we are, in any way, attempting to coerce Manitoba, the House might add the clause in committee which I have suggested, providing that the Act shall come into force after a certain delay, say, three or six months, if necessary, so that Manitoba may have ample opportunity of legislating in the matter, and not lose for all time the power of legislating on the separate school question. We shall thus give the legislature of Manitoba the right to do what it ought to do, and, as I trust, it even yet will do, namely, so legislate as to remedy the grievance complained of and obey the command of the Queen's Privy Council, by removing a grievance declared by the hon. member for Winnipeg, in the speech which he delivered but a few days ago, when he read the letter that I have just quoted, to be a grievance amounting to rank tyranny.

I have had placed in my hand some affidavits, which I shall not take up the time of the House with reading now, to show that, although the Act of 1890 removed separate schools in Manitoba, that Act is not enforced. I have had placed in my hands some six or seven affidavits from residents in that country. One is from a gentleman who has been teaching schools out there since 1871, and here is a portion of it:

Late in the fall of 1894, Mr. Young, Government inspector, called at my place of residence in the parish of St. Laurent, and entered into conversation with me regarding the schools in general and the French schools in particular. In the course of the conversation, he spoke to this effect:

I have been visiting several French schools along the Red River, out at St. Anne's and other places. We are not hard on them.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, this is the government inspector of schools in Manitoba, acting under the Act of 1890, who speaks thus:

We are not hard on them. They use the books they like. They conduct the schools as formerly. They receive the government grant, and we do not interfere with them.

Thus you will see, that, although Mr. Greenway, by his Act of 1890, and his speeches, has wiped the whole thing out, yet none the less he allows the inspector to go round and pay the government money to schools which are following the old system. While the Roman Catholics in that country are getting from Mr. Greenway what pittance he likes to give them. Their constitutional right has been taken away from them, according to the decision of the court, but these affidavits show Mr. Greenway's duplicity. He has wiped out the schools by law, but he still allows them to continue and pays them the government money all the same. This is the way my hon. friend from Winnipeg thinks the grievance probably has been adjusted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member for Halifax says that is all they want.

Mr. CAMERON. They want it legally, as the constitution says they are entitled to it.

Mr. KENNY. I did not say that was what Manitoba wants.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You said that Nova Scotia gave you that, and you are satisfied.

Mr. TAYLOR. As I have said, all parties appear to agree, that this Parliament has the right to deal with this question. All parties appear to agree, that the minority in Manitoba have a constitutional grievance, inflicted on them by the Act of 1890, but all do not agree as to the course to be taken to remove the grievance, except that it is the duty of the government of Manitoba to remove it, if they will do so. But they have been requested, not only by the Order in Council, but by other communications—there have been three requests made by this Government to the Manitoba government to adjust the grievance, and without avail. And the question now is, what is the duty of this Parliament? Is it the duty of this Parliament to throw out the Bill submitted to it on a motion for the six months' hoist? Is it our duty to say, that because we are opposed to separate schools, we will do nothing? I regret to find, that some Conservatives are so prejudiced, or so bigoted, that they will vote against anything or everything, and even go so far as to support the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, which has only one object in view, and that is to defeat this Government and leave the question unsettled. I am, thank God, no bigot. I believe in equal rights in the broadest and fullest sense of the term. I believe in living within the lines of the constitution, which I, as an Orangeman, am bound to uphold. Therefore, in my opinion, the constitution will be fully obeyed, if this Bill is read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, where it will be so amended as to meet my view or the view of the majority of this Parliament. This House has the right to settle the question for ever, provided, in the meantime, the government of Manitoba do not settle it, as they ought to do, by complying with the decision of the Queen's Privy Council, and amending the public school law so as to remove the grievance which the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has declared to be rank tyranny. This, in my opinion, is what this Parliament ought to do, and what every loyal man in this country, I do not care to which party he belongs, ought to try to do, and so settle the question in accordance with the action of the Privy Council.

Mr. GRANDBOIS. (Translation.) The members of the House will, no doubt, be pleased to hear that at this late hour, it is not my intention to deal at great length with the question now before the House. I wish, however, to express my opinion on this question and state the reasons which, in my judgment, justify the vote I intend to give. I might say at once that I do not approve of the proposition of the leader of the Opposition for the six months' hoist and that I will give my whole support to the measure now before us. This I will do because I think the Bill is constitutional, operative and just. The Catholic minority were granted the right to their separate schools by a statute passed in 1871. We shall see, later on, what were the privileges. Amendments were made, from year to year, to the Separate School Act and in 1881, the Act of 1871 was repealed and all the school laws consolidated. But, in 1890, the Greenway government introduced and caused to be passed a law abolishing separate schools, and establishing public schools. Under the statute, the public schools were unsectarian or neutral, but, as proved by Archbishop Taché and admitted in the House by the author of the Act, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), the public schools were in fact Protestant schools. The Roman Catholics at once sounded an alarm. They protested and appealed to the courts to have the Act declared unconstitutional. After undergoing various successes and defeats, they finally lost their suit before the Privy Council and the Act of 1890 was held to be intra vires. Beaten on this ground, but strong in the consciousness of their right and not at all discouraged, the Catholic minority then appealed to the Government of Canada. Petitions very numerous signed were presented, containing a statement of the grievances of the minority. It is proper to say, at this moment, that as soon as 1890, one of the most prominent men in this House, the Hon. Mr. Blake, had moved a motion, the object of which was to facilitate the settlement of these appeal questions in connection with education. I have not here the French version of this motion. I have only the English one. This motion, agreed to on April 29th, 1890, reads as follows:—

That it is expedient to provide means whereby on solemn occasions, touching the exercise of the power of disallowance, or of the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the Executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration, in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented, and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the Executive.

The motion of the Hon. Mr. Blake was agreed to without a dissenting voice and, in the following year, the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, in accordance with the Blake proposition had an Act passed "(to amend the Act concerning reference to the Supreme Court." Thus the whole course to be followed by the Government was laid out to them. The claim of the minority had reference to the cases provided for and the question was referred to the Supreme Court in the first instance, and then to the Privy Council, whether the Government ought to hear the appeal. The following questions were submitted to the courts:—

(1) Is the appeal referred to in the said memorials and petitions, and asserted thereby, such an appeal as is admissible by subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, or by subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 33 Victoria (1870), Chap. 3, Canada?

(2) Are the grounds set forth in the petitions and memorials such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsections above referred to, or either of them?

(3) Does the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the cases of Barrett vs. The City of Winnipeg, and Logan vs. The City of Winnipeg, dispose of or conclude the application for redress based on the contention that the rights of the Roman Catholic minority, which accrued to them after the union under the statutes of the province, have been interfered with by the two statutes of 1890, complained of in the said petitions and memorials?

(4) Does subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, apply to Manitoba?

(5) Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declarations or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises?

(6) Did the Acts of Manitoba relating to education, passed prior to the session of 1890, confer on or continue to the minority a "right or privilege in relation to education" within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, or establish a system of separate or dissentient schools within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867," if said section 93 be found to be applicable to Manitoba? and if so, did the two Acts of 1890 complained of, or either of them, affect any right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council?

The Lords of the Privy Council answered as follows to each of these questions:—

(1) In answer to the first question:—That the appeal referred to in the said memorials and petitions, and asserted thereby is such an appeal as is admissible under subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 33 Vic. (1870), Chap. 3, Canada.

(2) In answer to the second question:—That grounds are set forth in the petitions and memorials, such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsection of the Manitoba Act immediately above referred to.

(3) In answer to the third question:—That the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the cases of Barrett vs. The City of Winnipeg, and Logan vs. The City of Winnipeg does not dispose of, or conclude the application for redress based on the contention that the rights of the Roman Catholic minority, which accrued to them after the union under the statutes of the province, have been interfered with by the two statutes of 1890 complained of in the said petitions and memorials.

(4) In answer to the fourth question:—That subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, does not apply to Manitoba.

(5) In answer to the fifth question:—That the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction and the appeal is well founded, but that the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute; that the general character of the steps to be taken is sufficiently defined by subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 1870.

(6) In answer to the sixth question:—That the Acts of Manitoba relating to education passed prior to the session of 1890 did confer on the minority a right or privilege in relation to education within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, which alone applies; that the two Acts of 1890 complained of did affect a right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council.

The Privy Council therefore held that there was a grievance, that there lay an appeal, and, in conclusion, their Lordships added:

For the reasons which have been given, their lordships are of opinion that the 2nd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is the governing enactment, and that the appeal to the Governor General in Council was admissible by virtue of that enactment on the grounds set forth in the memorials and petitions, inasmuch as the Acts of 1890 affected rights or privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education within the meaning of that subsection.

The further question is submitted whether the Governor General in Council has power to make the declarations or remedial orders asked for in the memorials or petitions, or has any other jurisdiction in the premises.

Mr. GRANDBOIS.

Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded.

Supported by this judgment of the highest court of the Empire, the Government of Canada heard the appeal of the Catholic minority. After an elaborate argument by the counsel for the Catholic minority and the counsel for the Greenway government, judgment was rendered for the Catholic minority in the way of a Remedial Order in Council of which the following are the conclusions:—

His Excellency the Governor General in Council was pleased to order and adjudge, and it is hereby ordered and adjudged, that the said appeal be, and the same is hereby allowed, in so far as it relates to rights acquired by the said Roman Catholic minority under legislation of the province of Manitoba, passed subsequent to the union of that province with the Dominion of Canada, and His Excellency the Governor General in Council was pleased to adjudge and declare, and it is hereby adjudged and declared that by the two acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba, on the first day of May, 1890, intitled respectively "An Act respecting the Department of Education," and "An Act respecting Public Schools," the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province, in relation to education, prior to the 1st day of May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following rights and privileges, which, previous to and until the 1st day of May, 1890, such minority had, viz.:—

(a) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

(b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

(c) The right of exception of such Roman Catholics, as contribute to Roman Catholic schools, from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid, shall be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the said Acts of 1890, so far and so far only as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.

The remedial order was based upon section 22 of the Manitoba Act. It is this section 22 that gives jurisdiction to the Federal Parliament, and limits its powers as well as defines its duties. In the whole course of these proceedings the Government never gave up their moderation and wisdom and they always held to the law and constitution. From the beginning to the end, they always show a spirit of conciliation. I say that in answer to the charges made against the Government by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The Cabinet used the greatest moderation, and to prove it, I point out to the attention of the hon. gentlemen the fact that, several months previous to the passing of the remedial order of March, 1895, the Government of Canada had sent the authorities in Manitoba an Order in Council or memorial relating to the complaints of the Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba, accompanied by the request that they should be pleased to remedy the grievances of the Catholics. That Order in Council was under date July 26th, 1894. I have not the French revision and therefore I am obliged to read the English text. I will not read the whole Order in Council, but only the last paragraph, which I find in a series of letters published in connection with the school question by Mr. James Fisher, M.L.L.:

I refer to an Order in Council, passed at Ottawa, on the 26th of July, 1894, which recited the memorial presented to the Government of the Dominion on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba, complaining of the law of 1890, and praying for relief. That Order in Council set out with considerable fulness the grievances complained of by the minority, and it was communicated along with a copy of the memorial itself, by the authorities at Ottawa, to those of Manitoba. From the concluding paragraph of that order I take the following extract:—

"The statements contained in this memorial are matters of the deepest concern and solicitude in the interests of the Dominion at large, and it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and to religious belief and practice, and the committee therefore humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hope that the legislature of Manitoba may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment, the complaints which are set forth in this petition and which are said to create dissatisfaction among the Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist."

That Order in Council was rather an entreaty. It was not drafted in any harsh language. The Government of Canada sent to Manitoba government a memorial of grievances of the minority in Manitoba. They pointed out these grievances to their attention; they expressed the hope that the Manitoba government would take the matter under their consideration, and they requested the latter government to communicate the Order in Council to the legislature. Now, the Greenway government never did, that I know of, communicate this order to the legislature. They were satisfied with keeping up their work of persecution and with contending that the minority were not injured. I find the following words in their reply to the Federal Government:—

The formal reply therefore was, that the executive of the province see no reason for recommending the legislation to alter the principle of the legislation complained of.

And further on:

It is clear that there was no grievance. The complaints of the minority are groundless, and we will make no alteration in the law.

I make those few quotations in answer to the charge that the Federal Government were wanting in conciliation. Well, as I already stated, this quiet conciliating memorial was sent to the Manitoba government long before the opening of the first remedial order. There is the first reason why I say that the Government of Canada were never wanting in moderation and wisdom. A second reason is that during last summer in the course of the session, when there was talk of passing the Bill now before us, the Government of Canada, in order to defer to the wishes of a good many members, in order not to be charged with having taken Manitoba by the throat consented to the granting of a postponement of six months. Therefore, instead of introducing the Remedial Bill, they then announced that there would be another session in 1896, in order to settle the question if, in the meantime, the Manitoba government had not settled it. What has happened? Nothing whatever was done. The Manitoba government persisted in their course. Mr. Greenway instead of doing something for the relief of the Catholic minority, dissolved the legislature. By appealing to prejudices, it was an easy matter for him to obtain the result which we all know. Well, when comparing the course of the Federal Government with that of the Manitoba government, I may ask: Where do conciliation and moderation stand? Now, what do we find? We find the Federal Government stating that they are ever ready, should the Manitoba government be willing to it, to have a conference so that they may be able to settle the school question themselves, for it is admitted on all sides that it would be better should the Manitoba government settle the question themselves. There are no two opinions as to that, but should they not settle it, the Government here are willing to do it with the assistance of this House. Before considering whether the Bill would be practical, I wish to try and reply to a few objections raised by its opponents. Many gentlemen opposite, if not all, blame the Government for not having opposed their veto to the Act of 1890 or disallowed it. This objection is very easily answered. In the first place, the Catholic minority were themselves adverse to a veto; if they suggested it at the outset, they soon renounced it, and to apply it would have been going against their interests. The minority themselves chose the ground upon which they wanted to stand during the contest; they wanted first a recourse to the courts, to have the Act declared unconstitutional, which would have settled the matter for ever according to their contentions; having failed in this, they used the appeal to the federal executive which was allowed them by their own constitution. Would the disallowance have had any result? None whatever, for the Manitoba government would have had the Act passed anew. The ever-recurring conflict necessarily following from this could only aggravate the position of the Catholics. It is plain the Act might have been disallowed, but it would have been doing an injustice to the majority in Manitoba who, as is well known, would rather have a system of public schools than separate schools. Had the veto been applied to the Act of 1890, the majority could have complained of coercion; they could have said that we wished to deprive them of such schools as were convenient to them. And now, in the face of what has happened since, who does not plainly see how wise it was not to have recourse to disallowance, but to have obtained for the benefit of the cause of the Catholic minority the favourable judgment of the highest court in the Empire, one which is deemed to be always respected throughout the breadth and length of the Empire? If, with that judgment, it is difficult to get justice, how much more difficult would it have been without the judgment of the Privy Council? They also talk about an investigation and they blame the Government for not allowing one to be made. But, Sir, could there be any fairer or fuller investigation than that made before the courts these last five or six years? What new facts could they disclose? The investigation proposed would have been made, of course, by a committee. Had its decision been in favour of Mr. Greenway, its report would have been accepted, and the rights of the minority would have been over. But had it decided against him, who will believe that he would have submitted more readily than he submitted to the judgment of the Privy Council? We have heard, during the session, the hon. member for L'Islet propose an investigation, in a speech rather astonishing at the time it was delivered, and still more astonishing by the statements it contained, in order to know whether the public schools in Manitoba were actually Protestant schools. Assuming that they would have shown these schools to be neutral schools, the position of the minority would not have been bettered, for we know the attending of neutral schools to be repugnant to a Catholic conscience. The hon. leader of the Opposition seconded the proposition of the member for L'Islet. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan) has triumphantly refuted the proposition of the hon. member for L'Islet. The hon. leader of the Opposition, seeing in what a false position his friend was involved, came to his rescue. He endeavoured to explain the proposition of the hon. member for L'Islet, who had asked for a committee of the House, and that Archbishop Langevin and Mr. Greenway be summoned to Ottawa. The hon. leader of the Opposition stated that, personally, he was not wedded to a commission of inquiry, and that he would accept as well a Royal Commission. It is but too evident that there was nothing serious in those suggestions. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in moving that the Bill be not read the second time but this day six months, has displayed before the House and the country a sad lack of consistency; he has shown that it was not the inquiry he was aiming at, but at reaching power. As to the hon. member for L'Islet, he had himself given, four years ago, in the "Canadien," the best reply to his proposal of inquiry. In 1892, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Larivière) having suggested the expediency of having the whole matter investigated, the hon. member for L'Islet wrote in the "Canadien" of the 2nd November of the same year, that the fact of asking for an inquiry was only a miserable make-shift. Would not the fact of asking for an inquiry be equivalent to inviting the minority, who have won their case, to waive their claim to redress and begin all over again? What would a litigant say, under similar circumstances, if he were invited to waive his claim confirmed by a judgment of the tribunal, and to consider it as null and void, and if he were told: Let us hear again the evidence and begin all over the trial. He would simply laugh at you in your face. I understand that an investigation, at this late stage of the debate, would result in making us lose time and jeopardizing the chances of a Remedial Bill. And I believe that would be playing the game of the hon. gentlemen opposite who want to prevent the Remedial Bill from being carried. The law, however, is operative. It in no way affects the public schools, which have been established under the Act of 1890; it only restores the separate schools. The machinery of that law is based upon the laws of 1871 and 1881 and upon the Bill drafted by Mr. Ewart. That law will restore to the Catholic minority their separate schools, with a Board of Public Instruction composed of nine Catholic members. Those schools will share proportionately in the legislative grants; the minority shall be exempted from paying any taxes for the support of Protestant schools; they will have the right of taxing themselves for their own schools. Therefore the law is quite operative in that it revives the separate school law, in vigour previous to 1890. The hon. member for Vercherès, one of the luminaries of the bar of the province of Quebec, it appears, was forced to speak out on the question and to declare against the law. The hon. member has stated that, during the electoral contest in his constituency, he publicly declared that he was in favour of a remedial law. He told us the other day that the Bill now before the House was not worth the parchment it was written on; he graphically described it with one single word, 'nihil.' A strange subterfuge, forsooth, for a member to resort to, in order to break his pledged word. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll), in the course of an eloquent address, summed up the grounds upon which he rests his opposition to the Bill, and said that not a single principle was involved in it. But I hold that there is one principle involved, that of the separate schools; and I see in it the guarantee for the Catholics that they will have their own schools and that they will no longer be forced either to attend Protestant schools or to pay twice for the instruction of their children. The Bill is on the lines of the remedial order, which has been passed in order to give effect to the Privy Council judgment. Now, what is the opinion of those who are directly interested in having a good law enacted? What is the opinion of the representatives of the Catholic minority in Manitoba? Mr. Prendergast gave expression to his views before the Manitoba legislature as to the merits of the Remedial Bill. He said:

The Remedial Bill, he said, is apparently clumsy, but it could hardly be otherwise, considering that, in the drafting of it, great care had to be exercised not to give the minority any advantage which they did not previously enjoy. This Bill recognizes the principle which we have been fighting for these six years past. Our right to share in the legislative grants is also sanctioned by this Bill. I am not ready to challenge the power of the Federal Government to grant us a share in the provincial grant. If I were a member of the House of Commons, I would support the Bill. If I were in the House of Commons, I would insist upon the Catholic schools receiving a share of the money to the credit of the land grant. Should the Manitoba government refuse to grant us a share in the legislative grant for school purposes, I say that the Parliament of Canada would act justly in amending the Dominion Land's Act so as to enable it to grant us our shares out of the proceeds of the sale of the school lands. I think the Catholic school might get along if necessary without the government grant; but, from whatever source it may come, we will require money for organizing our school board.

Mr. Theophile Paré and Mr. Roger Marion, members of the legislative assembly, also gave expression to their views in the columns of the "Manitoba," as follows:—

Mr. Prendergast has rightly interpreted the views of the minority with reference to the legislation which now occupies the attention of the Federal Parliament. In doing so, he is not liable to be suspected of partiality towards the Federal Government. As stated by him in his address, Mr. Prendergast is a Reformer, one of Mr. Laurier's followers, and not one of Sir Mackenzie Bowell's followers.

The reports of the proceedings in our local House, on the 26th February last, as published in the Winnipeg papers, have already made known the attitude taken by Mr. Prendergast. In calling attention to that portion of Mr. Prendergast's address in the House, we wish to emphasize the fact that the Catholic members of the Manitoba legislature hold the same views as those expressed by Mr. Prendergast on the school question and particularly on the Remedial Bill.

On the other hand, the "Manitoba," of the 4th March, 1896, said:

We have no hesitation in declaring that the Remedial Bill embodies in substance all the principles essential to the good working of our schools. We have the right to hope that all the members of the House, who have any concern for their duty, will support the measure by their vote. Being given the limits of federal jurisdiction a careful perusal of the enactments of the Bill shows that it secures to the Manitoba Catholics as complete and independent an organization as possible, and that it effectively protects them from the ill-will of the provincial government. We are fully aware of all the difficulties that the course of the Ministry was beset with, in the framing of this law. There was no question of framing at one cast a Bill, which might give satisfaction to the Catholic minority. Allowance had also to be made for the Manitoba educational laws passed previous to 1890. We could neither claim any more rights than we enjoyed at the time nor escape the control exercised at that time by the local government. So, for instance, we were obliged to leave in the hands of the Manitoba executive the appointment of the members of the school board and of the superintendent, a right which had always been exercised by the Government. The fact of taking away that right from the local government would have stamped the Remedial Bill with invalidity and jeopardized the measure.

As will be seen from the above, the law is operative, and is approved of by the representatives of the Manitoba Catholic minority, who are the most directly interested in it. That is the reason why we should not hesitate in this House to give the Bill our support, as it restores to Catholics their separate schools, while Protestants keep their own schools. The Catholic minority in Manitoba turn their eyes towards the representatives of the great and generous province of Quebec. Shall our Catholic brethren in Manitoba be denied the right that we so willingly grant to Protestants in our province, the right to their separate schools? Most certainly not. I hold that the Remedial Bill is fair and just, because it is based upon the federal compact, upon natural law, and in harmony with the principle of freedom of conscience, and, last, because it tends to foster sentiments of loyalty and of devotion to the crown. All the hon. members know that the Red River troubles of 1869-70 originated from the fact that the French half-breeds first, and later on the English half-breeds, strongly opposed the taking possession of the country by the Canadian officers. After different parleys, the Red River delegates were invited to come and confer with the Ottawa Government. The conditions of the admission of the Red River country into the confederation were discussed and an understanding was arrived at. A Bill was drafted, introduced in Parliament and passed into law. It is the Manitoba Act. It was, therefore, in virtue of a pact or treaty that Manitoba was made part of the confederation. From the fact that the Remedial Bill is framed in accordance with the educational clauses of the Manitoba Act, it follows that it is just. The justice of the law may also be argued from another standpoint. Clause 93 of the British North America Act, and clause 22 of the Manitoba Act, were both framed with a view to securing the right of minorities. Clause 93 alone would have fully met the exigencies of the case. But the framers of the constitution were not satisfied with that clause alone; they went further, and with a view to rendering more explicit and less liable to conflicting constructions, and placing beyond the reach of any interference for the future, the rights of minorities, they inserted clause 22 into the Manitoba Act, which provides for the right of minorities to schools established by practice. And I call here the attention of the champions of Protestantism, whether they sit on this side or the other side of the House—I call their attention, I say, to the fact that, at the time in question, the prevailing belief was that Manitoba would become another province of Quebec, and that the minority would, therefore, be Protestant. In contrasting this fact with this other fact that Sir John Macdonald, a Protestant whose religious fervour cannot be called in question, was the then Prime Minister, and that upon him, more than any one else, devolved the charge of framing the Manitoba Act, it is easily understood how he took good care to make the wording of the law as clear as possible as regards the protection of the future Protestant minority. That such was the intention of Sir John Macdonald, is evidenced by a letter which that great statesman wrote, in 1889, to a member of the Manitoba legislature, who asked him for his advice on the matter. He said :

You asked me for advice as to the course you shall take upon the vexed question of separate schools in your province. There is, it seems to me, but one course open to you. By the Manitoba Act, the provisions of the British North America Act (section 93), respecting laws passed for the protection of minorities in educational matters are made applicable to Manitoba, and cannot be changed, for, by the Imperial Act confirming the establishment of the new provinces, 34 and 35 Vict., Chap. 28, section 6, it is provided that it shall not be competent for the Parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the Manitoba Act in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba. Obviously, therefore, the separate school system in Manitoba is beyond the reach of the legislature or of the Dominion Parliament.

In support of that view, I may further quote the opinion expressed by the Hon. Mr. McDougall, the very same gentleman who played such an important role, at the time of the union of the Red River settlement with Canada. Here is what he says :

We certainly meant that the Catholics of Manitoba (or whatever denomination might be the minority) should have the right of establishing and maintaining their schools. You see that the words "or by practice" were inserted in the Manitoba Act, so that the trouble which had arisen in New Brunswick, where separate schools actually existed, but were not recognized by law, might not be renewed in Manitoba. And then the right of appeal to the Federal Parliament was given in order to make that assurance doubly strong.

And I may add that we have in this House two actors of that grand drama of confederation, the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) and the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), who both confirm the construction I put on those words. They rank among the fathers of confederation; they attended conferences which took place between the government and the Red River delegates. These hon. gentlemen have stated here that it was undoubtedly the intention of the Government to give a sufficient protection to the minority in educational matters. The remedial law is just, because it is grounded upon natural law and in harmony with the principles of liberty of conscience. What is natural law, but the notion of right and duty, of right and wrong, a notion which Almighty God has implanted in man's heart. And liberty of conscience may be looked upon as a political right guaranteed by constitutional liberties. Nobody can deny that parents are bound to provide their children with food, clothing and education. It is their right to give that education, according to the dictates of their own conscience. Now, separate schools alone can accomplish that object. Well organized public schools are either Protestant or unsectarian, and in both cases they are repugnant to the Catholic conscience. But I may be told that by the fact of public schools being created, separate schools are not done away with; you may, if you feel bound in conscience to do so, establish separate schools where you may send your children. But that is a fallacious argument. What you offer Catholics is practically impossible. When you force them to contribute to the support of either public, Protestant or unsectarian schools, you take away from them money intended to support their separate schools. Why, Mr. Speaker, is it not a monstrous thing to coerce a minority, no matter how small it may be, to pay for the support of schools of what they cannot avail themselves and to pay in addition to that, taxes for their own schools? I appeal to conservative minds on both sides of the House,—and I know that they are numerous in this House,—I appeal to the members from Quebec, and I ask them to vote down the motion of the leader of the Opposition, which is directed against the remedial law; I request them to support that law, which is just and founded on natural law and which will restore to the minority in Manitoba the rights which they hold dearer than life. Finally, Sir, I find that the law is just, because it goes to develop a teaching saturated with patriotism and loyalty to the institutions of our country and to the crown. Catholicism is a school of obedience, of devotion, of respect to the authorities that are; there is no better citizen than a Catholic truly worthy of the name. Good Catholic is but another name for good citizen. It may be truly said that Catholicism is a school of patriotism and of loyalty to the institutions of our country and to the Crown. Let the hon. gentlemen refer to the records of Canadian history, and they will find that in troubled times, the Catholic hierarchy and the clergy did always play the role of moderators and peace-makers. The signal services rendered by Archbishop Taché, at the time of the first rebellion, are still with in the recollection of this House. Archbishop Taché was in Rome when the troubles broke out. The Canadian Government, aware of the powerful influence which the Archbishop enjoyed over the half-breeds, invited him to come back to Canada. In spite of his advanced age and of the fatigues of a long journey, he did not, a single moment, hesitate to comply with the wishes of the Canadian Government and to return to the Red River settlement, where he succeeded in re-establishing peace, a task which the Government had failed to accomplish. Upon another occasion, at the time of the rebellion in the North-west, were not the Catholic missionaries seen using their influences to check the Indians and the half-breeds during the revolt? History will record the names of the brave and holy missionaries who fell under the bullets of the Indians, martyrs to their devotion to Canadian interests. Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I desire to appeal to Protestant members, whose minds are unbiassed by prejudices, and who love justice and fair-play. The question here is not whether separate schools are efficient or inefficient, better or worse than unsectarian or Protestant schools. Protestants have their own views and freedom of choice in the matter. What we are asked is to vote for a law which will restore to the Catholic minority in Manitoba, a right to which they are entitled under the constitution, as decided by the highest tribunal in the Empire. Let them help us to accomplish that object. I make a special appeal to the members from the province of Quebec. Let them ponder over the responsibility which they assume. This is, perhaps, the last opportunity which is offered us to do justice. Let them improve the occasion, and join with us in order to bring about the triumph of the cause both of the Catholic minority and of the constitution.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, at this advanced stage of the debate, I shall not assume upon my shoulders the responsibility of protracting the debate, in reviewing the question at issue, and recalling the sacrifices which we have imposed on ourselves in behalf of the British flag, in order to build up the Canadian confederation.

We have placed our confidence in the English Protestant majority; we have made a compact and we must stand by it. All that has been so well said, argued and evinced that I think it unnecessary to revert to the subject. I will, therefore, content myself with briefly giving the grounds of the vote I am about to give, and dealing more directly with the attitude of the different parties towards the Remedial Bill which is before the House. We know now what to think about the disallowance of the law of 1890. Undoubtedly, if the Federal Government had disallowed the law of 1890, the Manitoba Government would have re-enacted it. And they would have had that right, as under the Privy Council judgment it had been decided that the law in question was intra vires of the legislature, and that the Manitoba government had the right and power to do so. I do not know how the hon. members opposite and their party press can censure the Government for not having resorted to the exercise of their powers of disallowance, when their very leader seconded, in 1891, the Blake motion, their then chief, a motion whereby, under similar circumstances, the educational Act of the provincial legislature may be referred to the tribunals, rather than resorting to disallowance. I now give the motion as proposed by the Hon. Mr. Blake:

Whereas it is expedient to provide means whereby, on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance, or of the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the executive.

In the course of the debate on the motion, Mr. Blake said:

The first of the two classes to which I allude is that in which the proposal comes before the executive, to disallow an Act of the provincial legislature on the ground that the Act is ultra vires. If it be so, the Act is void. And I think I may say that it is now generally agreed that void Acts should not be disallowed, but should be left to the action of the courts.

During the interprovincial conference convened in Quebec by the Hon. Mr. Mercier, from the 20th to the 28th October, 1887, a special resolution was carried, giving expression to the opinion of the conference against the exercise of the power of disallowance.

Here is the resolution of the interprovincial conference, held at Quebec:

1. That this power of disallowance may be exercised so as to give to the Federal Government arbitrary control over legislations of the provinces within their own spheres.

R

2. That it is important to the just operation of our federal system, as well as that the Federal Parliament should not assume to exercise powers belonging exclusively to the provincial legislatures, as that a provincial legislature should not assume to exercise powers belonging exclusively to the Federal Parliament, and that to prevent any such assumption, there should be equal facilities to the Federal and provincial governments for promptly obtaining a judicial determination respecting the validity of the statutes of both the Federal Parliament and provincial legislatures; that constitutional provision should be made for obtaining such determination before as well as after a statute has been acted upon; and that any decision should be subject to appeal as in other cases, in order that the adjudication may be final.

The exercise of that power would further have been undesirable on the ground that the Federal Government, if they had vetoed the Bill, would also have disallowed that portion of the law, under which the schools of the majority were established. It would have been an encroachment on Manitoba's self-government. We are then left the choice between the Blake motion, seconded by Mr. Laurier, providing means whereby reference may be made to a high judicial tribunal, rather than resorting to the power of disallowance, between the opinion of the hon. member for L'Islet and of the whole Liberal party, who, since 1892, charge the Governments with not having disallowed the school laws of Manitoba. Moreover, I contend that the Manitoba government were in favour of reference to the courts in preference to disallowance, for, it is the prevailing opinion among them that, had the law been disallowed it would have resulted in bringing about disastrous consequences for the population. I received, lately, an interesting letter on the question under discussion, from a citizen of high standing in Manitoba. That letter deals mainly with the question now before the House, and reviews the troubles which were forestalled in Manitoba, as a result of the exercise of the power of disallowance. I crave, Sir, the indulgence of the House, while I read part of that letter:

On the day following the enactment of the famous school law, we asked ourselves with anxiety what were the means to be resorted to in order to nullify those iniquitous laws.

Now, Sir, my correspondent describes the grounds upon which a reference to the judicial tribunals was advocated:

With one or two exceptions, we were all agreed as to the advisability of a reference to the courts. We had just been eye-witnesses to a spectacle unheard of in the records of the country. A few months previous to the enactment of the school law, the Attorney General Martin—

I believe, Sir, that this is the same Mr. Martin who is now in this House, the right hand of the hon. leader of the Opposition——had decided to build the Northern Pacific Railway and to cross, within a few miles from Winnipeg, the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Federal Government who alone could give the necessary authority, refused to grant it. Martin took no notice of it. They were on the point of crossing the Canadian Pacific Railway when the latter company got an injunction from the court. The sheriff, charged with the execution of the order of the court, proceeded to the contemplated junction with special constables. Martin had 700 or 800 provincial constables sworn in, and in defiance of the Federal Government and of the tribunals crossed the way of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Those high-handed proceedings of an Attorney General, setting an example of revolt against the law and against public order were still within our recollection, when that sinister individual trampled under foot our religious and national rights. Under similar occurrences, we were of opinion that the exercise of the right of disallowance would only result in exasperating that passionate men who, unfortunately, had just stirred up a considerable group of the English population against us.

In short, we were of opinion that the best means for us to adopt was reference to the judicial tribunals.

But before leaving that part of the subject, let me quote a despatch which was circulated in the press at the time, and we will see what Mr. Watson told his friends in the county of Marquette, to induce them to vote for him at the election of 1891:

I have Mr. Laurier's promise and that of the Liberal members of the province of Quebec that they will oppose the disallowance of the Manitoba school law.

So there is evident contradiction in the principle of the Liberal party on this question of disallowance.

Now, what causes more surprise in that affair is the course pursued by the leader of the Opposition. In 1893, he visited Manitoba, and after having had every opportunity to get the necessary information, he could only repeat, after returning from that province, what he had said in the House, during the previous session: I say, that, if those schools are Protestant schools, it is an intolerable injustice. He was always in the same unsettled state of mind, and kept asking for information. Still, about the same time, he was ready to pass condemnation on the Government for what he called their unwarrantable delays, and he wanted the question to be settled at once. On the 15th July, he said:

I charge against the Government of the day, and I invite their answer, that they have dallied with this question, they never dealt with it frankly, fairly, sincerely, and if I am allowed by the rules of debate, I will say, they never dealt honestly with that question.

And further on:

Let hon. gentlemen opposite settle that question. I will be most happy to give them my support, but they must settle it in some other manner than they have tried heretofore. Something must be done, and done at once, because this policy of delay, this policy of vacillating is not only paralyzing, but it is fast disintegrating national life; fast disintegrating national life, I say, because it is arraying creed against creed and race against race. What should be done? I have no hesitation in saying for my part, speaking my own personal sentiment, to say that I do desire and do wish that the minority in Manitoba may be allowed the privilege of teaching their children their duties to God and man as they understand these duties, and as their duties are taught them by their church.

As will be seen from the above, at that time the leader of the Opposition insisted upon the question being settled at once; he would suffer no delay, nor admit of any postponement; the time for temporization was passed—"Something must be done, and done at once," he then exclaimed. But he has quite altered his mind since, and we will soon see him turn right about face. No sooner had he understood that the Government meant to bring in their remedial law, than he changed his attitude and began preaching conciliation and about the necessity of inquiry. I charge against him, that he is responsible for that notion of inquiry spreading about; he it was that suggested it to the Manitoba government, who now use it as a quibble. Besides, if ever there existed a party that resorted to conciliation, it is, surely, the party now in power. Was it not the course followed by the Government, when, in 1892, they sent to the Manitoba government the petition by which the Catholic minority prayed for the redress of their grievances? Did not the Government resort to conciliation, when they signed, in July last, an Order in Council whereby they asked the Manitoba authorities to restore to the oppressed minority the privileges they had been deprived of? Was not conciliation again resorted to, when the Governor General extended, in July last, to the Manitoba government an invitation to come and consult with him with reference to the school troubles? What can be more conciliatory than the statement read before the House by the hon. Secretary of State, on the 9th instant, and which reads as follows:—

In view of the assurance that the government of Manitoba are willing to have a conference, the Government propose, so soon as the second reading of the Remedial Bill is carried, to have a conference with Mr. Greenway's government with a view to arrive at a settlement of this question on terms that will be satisfactory to his government and the minority of Manitoba; but in the meantime to proceed with the question before the House de die in diem as previously arranged.

Conciliation having failed again, now they fall back on the commission of inquiry. Of what avail would that committee have been? What are the facts of importance to be brought out by a committee, which are not already known? The question has now been six years before the country; it has been thoroughly ventilated and sifted, both in the Commons and in the Senate and elsewhere; it has run the gauntlet of the courts of justice, and I do not see what new facts are to be brought out or what new light could be thrown upon the subject. The Greenway government themselves admit all the facts.

The questions which are raised by the report now under consideration, have been the subject of most voluminous discussion in the legislature of Manitoba, during the past four years. All of the statements made in the memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, and many others, have been repeatedly made and considered by the legislature.

There is still another person who is now held in very high esteem by the hon. leader of the Opposition, who will certainly vote for the amendment to the motion proposed by the leader, and who also finds that there is no need of any inquiry. It is the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who said:

There is not a man sitting at this Council who does not hold a pronounced opinion as to the respective merits of the two systems. The question has not the merit of novelty for us. I do not think there is a single man in public life who has not formed his opinion on the subject.

From the very outset of the debate, the country expected the hon. leader of the Opposition to have proposed that a committee of inquiry be appointed which he had advocated in all the public meetings held last fall. Instead of that, he only proposes that the Bill be not read now a second time but be read this day six months. Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss now how to qualify the attitude taken by the leader of the Opposition. To propose the six months' hoist is equivalent to shelving the Bill, to putting it off indefinitely; and it is depriving our co-religionists in Manitoba of the redress of the grievances complained of. Why, Mr. Speaker, we have a Bill carefully framed, on the lines of the judgment of the highest tribunal in the Empire, a Bill which embodies the great principle of separate schools, a Bill which atones for the wrongs committed by a government of persecutors, a Bill which gives back to the minority what they have been deprived of by an unjust majority, and lo! the leader of the Opposition finds no better occupation than killing that same law! Now, should any hon. gentleman, a year ago, last session, have foretold such a course, he would have been looked upon as a liar and a slanderer. Never would the followers of the hon. leader of the Opposition have agreed that such an intention could be presumed on his part. If, at least, the hon. gentleman had a reasonable plea or excuse to explain his position, but he has none. He cannot invoke the insufficiency of the Bill, for it is as complete as circumstances would allow. And besides, that law is framed for the Manitoba minority, and up to date, no competent voice has been heard against it. It has not been condemned by any organ of the minority. It is approved by everybody, and the Archbishop of St. Boniface accepts it, as shown this afternoon by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), when he read a telegram sent by that prelate to Rev. Father Lacombe. Moreover, the "Manitoba," the authorized organ of the minority in that province, in a carefully written article, in its issue of the 4th March, completely endorses the Remedial Bill. I shall content myself with reading a portion of it :

We do not hesitate in declaring that the Remedial Bill contains in substance all the principles essential to the good working of our schools. We hope that all the members who have a concern for their duty, will give it the support of their vote.

We ask all those who are our true friends not to barter in breach under the fallacious pretense that it is not as perfect as might be desired a law, the main features of which are so favourable to our cause and go as far in the direction of justice as the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament will allow.

I do not know whether the hon. leader of the Opposition has read the article in question ; at any rate, he ought to read it. Why, Mr. Speaker, the very friends of the hon. leader are forsaking him, and the number of his followers is decreasing every day. The hon. member for Berthier first set the example in a magnificent address. He was closely followed by the hon. member for Ottawa County, who made a splendid speech, the secret way of making which he knows alone. Another journal, "Le Temps," edited here, a Liberal organ, quite in sympathy with the leader of the Opposition and devoted to him, a journal, I say, whose editor is in the confidence of the hon. leader, was forced to abandon him, owing to the attitude taken by him in the House on the school question. Here is what says the journal in question, in its issue of the 9th March :

The amendment moved by Mr. Laurier to the Remedial Bill involves a denial of the object which Mr. Dickey wishes to accomplish : the re-establishment of the Manitoba schools, and at the same time it involves a denial of the principle upon which the law is grounded, namely, federal interference.

The liberal leader, it is true, has eloquently spoken of a commission of inquiry, pointing out the benefits which would flow from an amicable settlement. But he has declared against the commission of inquiry, and against means of conciliation, when proposing the six months' hoist. All the eloquence of the silver-tongued speaker was wasted, because he did not succeed in convincing anybody.

In its issue of the 11th March, the same journal published the following editorial :—

Why does Mr. Laurier ask now the House of Commons to vote in favour of the six months' hoist ? Why does he force his party to assume an attitude which is inconsistent with the contemplated commission of inquiry which he has ably advocated before the country ? Not one of those who intend voting for the amendment of the liberal leader, not one solitary French paper has, as yet, attempted to explain that forsaking of programme, that impassioned advocacy suddenly transformed into a cold denegation.

Sir John A. Macdonald told us once : "Laurier is one of the brightest jewels that the French Canadian race has produced, but those Grits will suck his last drop of blood, and then they won't have heart enough to give him a decent burial."

We could stop here and rest contented with this graphical definition of the present state of the Opposition. The Grit element of Mr. Laurier's party is formed of irreconcilables, of narrow-minded egotists, who have not the least notion of true liberalism ; in short, they are ultra-Tories reversed. Their mind does not spread its wings beyond the limits of their constituency. There is among them neither brotherly spirit, nor spirit of discipline ; it is they who carry to its extreme limit the doctrine of self. We do not mean to say that the whole English portion of the Opposition belong to this wretched school. There are some very striking exceptions in the persons of Messrs. Edgar, Cartwright and others, but the bulk of the party is composed of Grits who are easily known from their particular bearing.

At the beginning of winter two elections took place in the province of Ontario ; one of them in North Ontario, the other in Cardwell. In one of those elections the Grit candidate lost his deposit, and in the other the deposit of the candidate came within an inch of being lost. Mr. McCarthy conducted the contest for his party in both constituencies. In North Ontario the Equal Rights candidate had made an alliance with the Patrons of Industry, but in Cardwell Mr. McCarthy had brought his own candidate forward. After having experienced those two defeats, the Grits were scared. After the crushing defeat inflicted upon them by Mr. McCarthy they were ready to turn their back to their chief, Mr. Laurier, to throw themselves into the arms of the Equal Rightist leader, and to make but one mouthful of his programme.

After having advocated his scheme of commission in all the public assemblies which he addressed, Mr. Laurier saw himself threatened, in the House of Commons, of being deserted by the Grits, unless he would give up his programme, in order to accept that of Mr. Clarke Wallace and Mr. McCarthy.

It has, therefore, come to this, that the Liberal party is in the power of the Grits, that is to say, it follows in the wake of the most anti-Liberal, anti-French and anti-Catholic element, Mr. McCarthy and Equal Rightism, and Mr. Wallace and his Orange lodges.

Necessity makes, indeed, strange bed-fellows.

The man who penned these lines is intimately acquainted with the leader of the Opposition. From what I have said, it is not to be wondered at if the country reposes no confidence in the hon. leader of the Opposition, for the settlement of the question. I believe, Sir, that the Government in dealing with this vexed question have acted with prudence, disinterestedness and without any party spirit. I believe that under the circumstances they have pursued a wise course and exhausted all the means of conciliation within their power. Their line of action is approved of by the hierarchy. The Bill which they have brought in is accepted by the Manitoba clergy as well as by the chief representatives of the minority in the provincial legislature, Messrs. Prendergast, Marion and Paré. The Bill is approved of by the hon. Senator Bernier and the hon. member for Provencher, who are the authorized representatives of the Manitoba minority in the Federal Parliament. Now, in dealing with this question, the Government not only command the support of their French and Catholic followers, but are also seconded and approved by a large number of Protestant members who represent here electoral divisions belonging to a different creed, and also by all the Catholic Irish members. I can, therefore, have no confidence in the vacillating policy of the hon. leader of the Opposition who has been unable so far to take a solid stand on the matter and who sees himself forsaken by a large number of his followers in this House, until he is forsaken by the electors of the country. Before I sit down, Sir, allow me to give communication to the House of a letter which I have just received from a friend in Manitoba, a man who occupies a high position, who commands the confidence of the Catholic minority and who is well informed on the question at issue :

St. Boniface, 9th March, 1896.

My Dear Friend,—Your letter just at hand. You will find in the editorial of the "Manitoba" (4th March) which Archbishop Langevin had directed to you, a correct and reliable statement of the attitude of the Catholic minority in Manitoba. That article is approved of by the Archbishop. You may state without the least hesitation that we give our support to the Bill, as it stands. Any opposition calculated to jeopardize the existence of the Bill can only result in disastrous consequences to us, and is condemnable. We ask all our friends to vote in favour of the Bill, reserving to themselves the right to amend it in Committee of the Whole. I speak whereof I know.

The Bill contains the principles that are essential to the resurrection and good working of our schools. It gives us life, not comfort. But that recognition of our rights is an immense step in the direction of complete justice. The law sanctions our right to a share in the legislative grant; therefore, in giving it their support, the members of Parliament sacrifice nothing, yield nothing. Archbishop Langevin, whom I have seen to-day, and with whom I had a long interview, approves this law, and would like to see it supported by all the members. You may state without hesitation that the Catholic minority strongly advocates the adoption of the Bill. I sincerely hope that the hour of justice will soon strike for us; and Heaven's blessing will be for those legislators who will have helped to restore our rights to us, and in the records of the Northwest will be found a page full of emotion, which will tell to future generations our gratitude to those who shall have nobly done their duty.

Laurier's commission of inquiry is ridiculous. In 1890 we have flooded the Legislative Assembly with our petitions, asking the government not to allow the Act of 1890 to pass into law and tyrannize over our consciences. Later on, subsequently to the last decision of the Privy Council, we went again, a deputation of over 800 citizens, composed of delegates from all the Catholic groups, praying for justice.

Greenway, who received the deputation brutally, replied that we had no ground to complain. The legislature has always voted resolutions over resolutions stating that we had no grievances, and that we would never have any separate schools.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Speaker, I am going to say very little on this question. I am not going to tell you what I do not know about constitutional law. That side of the question has been pretty well discussed. But I am going to tell the members of this House what I think is necessary in order to render justice to all, and what I consider, as an English Protestant representing a Quebec constituency, justice in this matter is as we in the province of Quebec ask that it shall be meted out to us. Take my county, for instance, the county of Richmond and Wolfe. We have always had the best of feeling between both races and both religions. We have a Catholic majority of about 16,000. The French-Canadians have always accorded us our representation in this House as we have accorded them their representation in the local legislature. We ought to be in a better position to judge how justice should be rendered toward a minority than the Protestant representatives of Ontario. The Protestants of Manitoba had no fear of the Catholic majority in the early seventies. But now that the Catholics are so greatly in the minority they seem to be fearful of according them their rights. I do not regard this as a question of law, but as a simple matter of justice to this people. I do not think that the English people of any part of the world ever wish to try to keep down the minority. The minority is so small that certainly the majority of Manitoba have nothing to fear from them and Ontario certainly has not. I would like to quote from the census of 1891 two or three groups of counties in our province of Quebec and to show the way they are represented. There was one group of five Protestant counties with a Catholic population of 37,522 and a Protestant population of 85,098. On the other hand we have seven counties with a Catholic majority of 61,818. In this present Parliament every one of those constituencies with a Catholic majority is represented by a Protestant, who was elected by Catholic votes cheerfully given. Let me mention the case of a by-election in 1874 to show the good feeling and freedom from race prejudices of the French-Canadians in my constituency of Richmond and Wolfe. In that election there were two English-speaking candidates in the field, and a French-Canadian came in between them, but he only got 400 votes out of a total of over 6,000. Why, Sir, the English-speaking representative in the Quebec government of the Protestant minority in that province is an Irish Roman Catholic, and I do not think that the Protestants suffer any grievance thereby. He was elected in a Protestant county by a majority of over 7,000. Now, I think if Ontario could exhibit such cases of toleration, it would do more for the maintenance of good feeling between the people of this Dominion, and more to cement the various provinces together than weeks of talk on constitutional points which have been decided in England long ago. Now, let us look at several Catholic counties in Ontario that are represented by Protestants. North Essex has a large Catholic majority; Gengarry has a large Catholic majority; Ottawa city, on the borders of Quebec, has one Protestant and one Catholic representative. The people in these counties agree to disagree on many things, but they agree to work for the best interests of Canada. The county of Russell also has a Catholic majority of over 5,000. I may also refer to the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Sanborn), whose county has a Protestant population of only 3,868 as against a Roman Catholic population of 19,395. Now, I would ask what should be that hon. gentleman's duty in a case like this, how should he vote? I believe in principle and in voting for principle, and although I told my electors last winter that I felt specially bound to vote for measures which I knew were approved by the people whom I represent, still if I could not do so, I would resign my seat and give them an opportunity to elect one of their own faith who would represent their wishes more closely in Parliament. Sir, there are townships in the county of Wolfe where there is not a single English-speaking voter, but where I had a majority from the French-Canadian voters, and where there were no appeals to religious or racial prejudices. Again, I would ask the French-Canadian members from the province of Quebec what they can expect from the leader of the Opposition. If Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Protestant as he is, Orangeman as he is, cannot give them relief, what can they expect from the leader of the Opposition, surrounded as he is by members of the most diverse sentiments? I refer, more particularly to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). Now, I ask the French-Canadians from Quebec and the Catholic minority of Winnipeg, if they expect to get relief from such an aggregation as that. If the hon. leader of the Opposition had moved for a commission, we could at least have felt that he was honest, but it is surprising that he of all men should move the six months' hoist to this Bill. If many of us in this House do not know the wants of Manitoba, do not know how they are situated, and want more information on the matter, certainly the leader of the Opposition ought to be the last man to need enlightenment. We know that he went through the length and breadth of Manitoba not long ago, and spoke in every constituency and every hamlet of any importance, and certainly he had ample opportunity to glean all the information that was necessary to enable him to move such an amendment in this House as would at least have had the ring of honesty. I would again appeal to the Protestant majority in this Parliament to stand by the Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba, and give them the rights of which they have been despoiled. If the time should ever come, I hope it never will, when the Catholic majority of Quebec should be provoked to make reprisals, and if the Protestant minority from that province should come here asking for redress, could they complain of being told: You must not come here, we do not interfere with provincial rights. Now, Sir, I wish to quote from an article published by an Eastern Townships newspaper, edited by the oldest journalist in Quebec:

We write this before we can know what will be the fate of the Remedial Bill, but we are buoyed up with the hope that it will pass. What will be its fate afterwards, it is impossible to predict. Should Manitoba continue her resistance, it is obvious that there are troublous times in store for the Dominion.

I do not agree with him there, I do not expect any trouble.

It has become a religious question, and the gravest consequences may result,—not to Manitoba so much as to the peace and concord of the people of this province, for to deny to the minority of the prairie province what is accorded to the minority of Quebec, might produce reprisals, and how these people who are resisting the Remedial Bill could consistently complain if that should happen, we cannot understand. Our separate school system here is at the mercy of the Roman Catholic majority; it is quite true that the legislature of Quebec cannot intra vires of its powers legislate it out of existence, but it can emasculate it, and be within its rights in doing it, so as to make it wholly unworkable. The Protestants would of course appeal under the constitution; would these people then say, "You must not coerce Quebec, she is within her rights in legislating according to the will of the majority as expressed by her legislature; interference with the autonomy of a province must not be allowed." Yet are not the cases parallel ones? The Protestants of Quebec will never consent to surrender the right of appeal to the Federal Parliament; but what is the use of appealing if the majority of the House of Commons holds to the non-interference policy?

We have no fear of reprisals on the part of the Roman Catholics of this province, but that is no reason for withholding from the minority of another province the same privilege we claim for ourselves; on the contrary, it is a good reason for supporting them in the demand for it. This aspect of the question seems to have been completely ignored by the Protestant anti-remedial party, and we are grieved that any considerable number of our co-religionists should be found arrayed against the aggrieved minority of Manitoba.

I think it is useless for me to go over the ground that has been gone over so often during the past week. I will simply content myself by renewing my appeal to the House to pass this Bill in the name of the Protestant minority of Quebec as well as the Catholic minority of Manitoba.

Mr. BOYLE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. DICKEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 2.10 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Bill (No. 82) respecting the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Manitoba and North-west Millers Association.—(Mr. Mills, Annapolis.)

REPORT.

Summary Report of the Geological Survey Department, for the year 1895.—(Mr. Daly.)

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION—MR. GREENWAY'S TELEGRAM.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to call the attention of the hon. leader of the House to a remarkable statement which is alleged to have been made by Mr. Greenway, reading as follows:—

Winnipeg, March 12, 1896.

In the legislature to-night, Premier Greenway called attention to the fact that a sentence had been omitted from his telegram to Sir Donald Smith, as read by Sir Charles Tupper in the House of Commons. Mr. Greenway considered the sentence important, and read the telegram to the legislature. The missing words were, "As you are aware, we are not to blame for the present situation."

I would like to inquire whether those words were in the telegram which the hon. Secretary of State read to the House on Monday?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Those words were in the telegram, and they were omitted because they did not seem to have any special bearing upon the question. It was a mere matter of opinion, which no one would be surprised that Mr. Greenway should entertain; but I would like, while making that admission—and certainly I was not under the impression that it was at all garbling the telegram to omit something which had no special reference to the main point, and that was whether Mr. Greenway was willing to have a conference with the Dominion—I would like to take the opportunity of answering the question which was put to me by the hon. leader of the Opposition, who, I observe, is not in his place to-day. That hon. gentleman asked me if I was prepared to lay upon the Table the message from Sir Donald Smith to Mr. Greenway, to which Mr. Greenway's telegram of the 2nd instant, which I read to the House, was a reply. I said that I would communicate with Sir Donald Smith and be in a position to answer the question put to me. I may say that I was most anxious to be in a position to read the telegram to the House from Sir Donald Smith to Mr. Greenway, to which that was a reply, but I am unable to do so for the reason which I shall state.

Without Mr. Greenway's consent, Sir Donald Smith will not allow the communication of his telegram to Mr. Greenway, to which that of 2nd March read to the House by me on 9th inst. was a reply.

All telegrams and other communications between Sir Donald Smith and Mr. Greenway were regarded by them as confidential and were imparted by Sir Donald Smith to the Government as strictly such.

Our intention was to obtain Sir Donald Smith's consent to communicate the telegram of 2nd March to the House, but, on inquiry, the Premier found he was in New York, and not knowing his address there, we could not reach him for that purpose by telegraph. Considering that, under the circumstances, I could properly use the telegram, I did so, and for this alone I am responsible. I now express my sincere regret, that this was done without the consent of those gentlemen.

I felt it due to myself to make this frank explanation to the House as to why a telegram, which I regarded as virtually a communication to the Government from Mr. Greenway, was used, to which I thought there could be no possible objection.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did I understand the hon. gentleman correctly, that this telegram was used without Mr. Greenway's consent?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And a garbled—well, I will not say that—but a mutilated version of it at that. I shall leave the House and the country to consider whether that was treating us with the respect with which, in so grave a matter, this House should be treated.

DURATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another question I should like to put to the hon. gentleman. I should like to ask him if he is prepared to inform the House whether there is any ground for the statement circulated widely in the press that the Government have such doubt as to whether this House expires on the 25th April that they propose to submit a case to the Supreme Court to resolve their doubts?

Mr. DICKEY. The Government is considering the desirability of doing that, but nothing has been done yet.

EMPLOYMENT OF GOVERNMENT ENGINEERS.

Mr. BERGERON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to bring to the notice of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, a small paragraph which I find in the "Gleaner," published in Huntingdon. I should like to have the hon. gentleman's statement upon this subject:

For two weeks past a staff of engineers have been taking measurements and levels between Valleyfield and the Chateauguay River. People became curious, and some person started a rumour that they were working in the interests of a proposed canal from the St. Lawrence to Lake Champlain. The facts are, they are a staff of engineers in the pay of the Federal Government, and are only making their usual visit prior to a general election.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals the explanation of this, because I have never heard of it before.

Mr. HAGGART. The engineering staff of the Soulanges Canal are sometimes not very busily engaged for two or three weeks during the winter. This year I ordered the engineer to make accurate surveys of what may be probable canals. The Caughnawaga is one that would afford communication from Lake St. Louis to the lake at Plattsburg, and from Plattsburg to the Hudson. I wanted to have plan and specification on file so that I might judge accurately of the feasibility of such a canal.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION—COMMUNICATION WITH MR. GREENWAY.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if the Government have applied for permission from Mr. Greenway to lay before the House the telegrams and other communications that have passed between the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) and Mr. Greenway's government?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member for Montreal West did communicate with Mr. Greenway on the subject of asking his permission, or asking whether he was willing that the telegram from the hon. member for Montreal West to Mr. Greenway, to which that laid before the House was a reply, should be laid before the House and I have just stated to the House that consent has not been obtained from Mr. Greenway for that purpose.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for second reading of Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba), and the proposed motion (six months' hoist) of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. FOSTER. I venture to ask the House for its consideration for a few moments of some remarks, even at this late stage in the discussion of a pretty thoroughly discussed subject, even at the risk of repeating and reviewing arguments and facts which probably have not the merit of complete novelty to the members present. I think I shall commence my remarks by being a little unorthodox, and that may be pleasant to my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) who sits just opposite to me. The remark I shall commence with is this—that I am not of the opinion that the question at present before the House is intrinsically either the most important or the most difficult question that has engaged the attention of this Parliament from confederation up to the present time. My view is that the question is a plain and simple one, and that the great difficulty which surrounds it, and the importance which attaches to it at the present time is due rather to the complication with it of side issues, which, in a legitimate sense, do not belong to the question at all. And before I proceed to a discussion of the question proper, I wish to eliminate these, and to make a few remarks upon each. The first of these questions which is brought up in connection with the case properly before the House is that of provincial rights. The assertion is made in this House, and in the country as well, that for the Dominion Parliament to attempt to legislate on this subject is to interfere with and invade provincial rights. I beg to state my humble opinion that it cannot be fairly maintained either in this House or in the country, looking to the distribution of powers by the Confederation Act where the jurisdiction is plain and unequivocal, that for this Parliament to exercise its powers, to exercise its jurisdiction is to interfere with any rights that belong to the province in question, at this time, or of any other province, if this question touching any other province, were to come up. This side issue has taken the popular form of a cry, "Hands off Manitoba." In reality it seems to me the proper opinion, that contemplated by the constitution, that carried out by the practice of this country up to the present time is not embodied in that cry, but would be better expressed in the statement that the majority of Manitoba should have kept "hands off" the privileges of a minority, which privileges were given under the constitution, and were supposed to be secured to them by the constitution. Another side issue that is brought up is the question of separate schools, and men range themselves in opposition to remedial legislation, because, forsooth, they do not believe in the principle of separate schools. Sir, the question whether separate schools should, or should not, be established is one which might well have been debated in 1863 when that system was adopted for the province of Ontario; it is one which might well have been debated upon principle in 1867 and 1870, when these schools were being perpetuated under the Confederation Acts. But it is not a principle which is at stake to-day in the least degree; and, for my own part, I believe that I have no right to take my preference on that principle into consideration in the least on this occasion, but that I am now called upon to deal with the question of a clause of the constitution, and a case which arises out of it, in which that principle was settled once and for all in regard to the minority's right by the fathers of confederation, and embodied in the constitution itself. It is also stated as a side argument, but which influences some people in this House, and is meant to influence more people outside this House, that this is but the first step in a separate school crusade, and that if this legislation takes place for the province of Manitoba, upon that result will be built an aggressive campaign for the adoption of separate schools in the other provinces. That was expressed by my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace); that was also given voice to by my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) who made, I think, a somewhat important and a somewhat venturesome assertion; and I call it to his mind now, in the interest of fair and just debate. I find that in his address to this House, as printed in the "Hansard," he made this statement, after advancing the argument that this was but the first step in a crusade for the pressing of separate schools upon the North-west, and then upon the other provinces:

The School Bill passed in the North-west assembly has been held in abeyance, and has not yet received the assent of the Dominion Government. Why is it held in abeyance? Because the clergy do not approve of it.

I ask my hon. friend now to give to this House the ground for his assertion as there made.

Mr. SPROULE. The ground of my assertion is a reply made by Archbishop Langevin at, I think, either Prince Albert or Edmonton, saying that it was not acceptable, and that the same principle was at stake there as here.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I wish to tell my hon. friend that he never should have made a statement of that kind. The fact that Archbishop Langevin said in the North-west that a school ordinance was not acceptable to the clergy may be a fact; that this ordinance was not assented to by the Lieutenant-Governor may be a fact; but when my hon. friend puts those two facts together as cause and sequence, I wish to tell him that he is not warranted in doing so by any rule of logic, and I wish to tell him more, that there is not the first scintilla of truth in his statement.

Mr. SPROULE. The report of his speech must be all wrong then.

Mr. FOSTER. The report of whose speech?

Mr. SPROULE. Archbishop Langevin's.

Mr. FOSTER. Who made that speech? It is well to ask whether the speech if made by Archbishop Langevin bears out the charge of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPROULE. It was reported to be made by Archbishop Langevin.

Mr. FOSTER. If made by Archbishop Langevin or if made by ten thousand archbishops, the hon. gentleman would yet have no ground in logic or in truth for making the assertion he made here the other day, which was, not that Archbishop Langevin did not agree with the ordinance, but that the Government held it in abeyance because the clergy did not approve of it. This assertion, carried as broadly as newspapers will carry his speech, was meant, and will have the effect of raising prejudice and opposition to his legislation amongst the Protestant people of this country, and fan those fires which my hon. friends there and my hon. friends here so much deplore.

Mr. SPROULE. If the speech was not correct, why was it not contradicted?

Mr. BERGERON. There were so many lies said about him, that he could not contradict them all.

Mr. FOSTER. Another question was brought up, both incidentally and directly in this House, by my hon. friend from West York, and caught up in the country, and I am sorry to say, is used by a great many respectable papers of the country, and that is that this Bill as it is presented to Parliament, is but another phase of the old strife and the old war between creeds. I refuse to look upon this question in that light in the least degree. This is not a question of Catholics and Protestants, it is a simple question of the right of minorities, some of those minorities being Protestant and some of them being Catholic. I am sorry that men in this House, and men outside of the House, cannot approach a simple question of fact of that kind without importing into it the spirit of that discussion which raged with virulence in past years, but which we were hoping, in these more advanced years, would find less food for its sustenance, and less scope for its work. This question is also complicated by the strife of partisanship, and I am not satisfied that parties on both sides have not contributed to the difficulties of settling this question. I have no hesitation in saying that 100 or 200 sensible men brought together free from these side issues and prejudices and partisanship, meeting together and taking up this question, thoroughly and judiciously considering it, would come to a conclusion in a very short time as to the rights of the question, and would settle it as it ought to be settled, and as I believe it will yet be settled. So I say that what we ought to do in a discussion of this kind, having the responsibility of members of Parliament, is to brush aside all side questions of interference with provincial rights, the suggestion of its being a first step in a crusade for the establishment of separate schools in other provinces, the suggestion of its being a decision to be made on the merits of separate schools or otherwise or the side issue that this is a question which should marshal the old strife between Protestant and Catholic. I say that we ought to brush aside partisanship as well; that we ought to come down to the discussion and settlement of this question as it arises under the constitution, and as it affects the rights of minorities which were legislated for under that constitution. It seems to me, Sir, that there are but three points of view from which it would be possible to discuss a question of this kind. One is to take up the question de novo, and I think we are precluded from doing that, because it was discussed before, and as a result of that discussion it has been embodied in two compacts which now have force in this country, the confederation compact and the Manitoba compact. Or we could take it up as a question which has come to us under a constitution which is binding, but in which constitution this is an unwise provision. If we look upon it in that light, it seems to me that we ought not to deprive a minority of its rights under that constitution, which is binding, because we think one of its provisions is unwise; but we should go to the constitution itself, and discuss and settle the question as to whether it is better, in the light of thirty years' experience that has been shed upon it, that that constitution should be revised. The third point of view, and which seems to me to be the only practical point of view, is to discuss it in the light of a clause in the constitution which is binding, and which, taking all the circumstances of this country into account, is not only binding, but is a wise provision of the constitution as well. Now, Sir, with these preliminary remarks, I wish to proceed a little nearer to the discussion of this question, and in doing that, let me premise one thing. I believe every member in this House will agree with me when I say that good faith is an absolutely essential condition of social, commercial, political and national life the wide world over. The forms of law, the contracts between individuals, the agreements between parties, the treaties which bind nations together, are after all, simply the partial and fragmentary embodiment of that great principle of good faith which, the wide world through, forms the effective and the absolutely necessary basis of social and commercial and national progress and advancement. Sir, this principle of good faith is magnified in the case of a nation which is composed of different classes, different creeds and different races; and it becomes more sacred when it has effect as a principle in the transactions of nations with nations, and is raised, as you may say, up to an international plane. Along with that element of good faith there is the accompanying principle or element of a broad and generous toleration, which must have place in social life, which must have place in every phase of life, and without which the work of the world and the progress of the world would be poor and meagre indeed. These two principles of good faith and of a broad and generous toleration are principles which have nowhere been more strongly illustrated than in the growth, in the progress and in the present condition of the greatest empire in the world. I mean the British Empire. Great Britain is a nation which has been distinguished by the tenacity with which she held to every compact and every agreement. She has been distinguished no less by that spirit of generous and broad toleration with which she has treated every religion, every class of nationality which form the components of her great Empire. Now, Sir, these two principles of good faith and toleration are the very principles which underlie our constitution, and especially those clauses of the constitution under which the present question arises, and which have to do with the educational rights of minorities in the different provinces of the Dominion.

The first question, then, for me to solve when I approach the consideration of this subject is this: Is there any compact or agreement arrived at in this country and embodied in the constitution under which we live which has first to be considered before we can give our decision upon this question? The answer is plain and definite. There is a compact in the constitution of confederation; there is a second compact in the constitution of Manitoba, ratified by the British Parliament, and under which she became a part of this Dominion. It is an idea which has currency in the country, that for these compact clauses in the constitution and for the protection of minority schools in this country the Catholics were sole movers, and are responsible for their introduction into this constitution. The question has been so threshed out in this House that I imagine there is no hon. member sitting within these walls who for a moment takes that view. But the idea is yet prevalent in the country, and it is necessary that it should be properly and thoroughly understood before we can get at the proper basis for a settlement of this matter. What are the facts of the case? That this question of a guard in the constitution, in the form of an appeal clause, in favour of religious minorities, as regards educational work was not raised in any case by the Catholics of any province which came into confederation in 1867. It was not a question raised by the Catholic people of Nova Scotia, it was not a question raised by the Catholic minority in New Brunswick, it was not a question raised by the Catholic majority in the province of Quebec, and it was not a question raised by the Catholic minority in the province of Ontario. By whom was it raised? Simply and solely by the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec, and that point is one that must be settled and thoroughly settled in our minds as being a necessary basis for the consideration of the question.

Mr. WALLACE. Permit me to ask a question. If it was not asked by the Protestant majority of Ontario, how did it become part of the constitution contrary to the wishes of Hon. George Brown and others?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to proceed I will answer that question in due course, and I will answer it thoroughly. Arising out of long years of sectarian and religious strife under United Canada, opinions and convictions in reference to this matter became gradually modified, and when the representatives of the four provinces came together at Quebec to take up, discuss and settle articles of confederation, these convictions rapidly and definitely resolved themselves into the determination that it should be laid down in the constitution of the country that whatever rights and privileges religious minorities had in the provinces at the time of confederation should maintain their status quo and should not be changed. And so the first paragraph of the educational clauses of the confederation resolutions gave by general consent to the provinces the power to deal with respect to education:

Saving the rights and privileges which Catholic or Protestant minorities in both Canadas may possess as to their denominational schools at the time when the union goes into operation.

The only change which took place in that clause was this, that instead of its being confined to both Canadas, it was broadened to include the provinces which entered confederation. But, Sir, was that satisfactory to the Protestant minority of the province of Quebec? It was not. The Protestant minority of Quebec, led by Hon. Mr. Galt and others, refused to discuss the articles of confederation, refused to accept the fact of confederation unless something else was done to make the Protestant minority secure not only in the rights which they possessed, for this security was fairly well given to them by the clause I have read, but in those for which they had been agitating, which they did not then possess and which they wished to possess. There were only two ways by which these additional powers could be got: either by legislation in the Parliament of United Canada before confederation came into operation, under which state of things they would have been secured by the general clause I have read; or else by placing another clause in the constitution, so that when they got those rights after confederation they would have them secured to them by the dominant power of confederation, acting through the Federal Parliament. This was a question brought up, as I have said, by the Hon. Mr. Galt. And how was it settled in the end? It was attempted to be settled by legislation in the provincial parliament which was promised in 1865, but which was not brought down; which was brought down in 1866, but which, owing to complications which arose, was not passed; which it was then promised by Sir George Cartier and other French leaders would be enacted by the Quebec legislature after confederation had gone into force. On the strength of that promise, evincing again the good faith which existed between parties at that time as regards promises made one to the other, on the good faith of that promise for efficient and full legislation for the Protestant minority confederation was accepted, and a clause was placed in the constitution which should make this post-union legislation secure for all time to come. This clause which was proposed by Mr. Galt and unanimously agreed to by the other delegates reads as follows:—

And in any province where a system of separate or dissentient schools by law obtains, or where the local legislature may hereafter adopt a system of separate schools, an appeal shall be made to the Governor in Council of the general government from the acts and decisions of the local authorities which may affect the rights or privileges of the Protestant or Catholic minority in the matter of education. And the general parliament shall have power by the last resort to legislate on the subject.

The effect of embodying this clause in the constitution is that any post-union legislation such as had been promised to the Protestant minority, consummated after confederation would be secured through the appeal to the general Parliament and through the dominant power in that Parliament, which was supposed at that time to be sufficient and to be relied upon to protect the rights of the minority thus confided to its care. Hon. Mr. Galt and the Protestants of Quebec accepted that settlement, and accepted it loyally. It was the sine qua non of the Protestant minority of their entrance into confederation. I want to make this point as clear as it is true, that Quebec Protestants refused to enter into confederation unless the way of separate schools, and which could only be granted by the Quebec legislature after confederation, was absolutely secured to them by such a clause.

Now, Sir, this, as I have stated, was an article which was placed in the constitution of Canada, not smuggled into it, but placed in it after years of discussion, and with the unanimous assent of the fathers of confederation. More than that, Sir, this clause was not only put in that way, but the whole educational section was put in against the protest of one of the most prominent Catholics in the province of Ontario, John Sandfield Macdonald, who objected to it, and who was quite willing, as far as the Catholic minority in the province of Ontario and elsewhere was concerned, that their rights should rest upon the good feeling and the sense of fair-play of the local legislatures. But, Sir, the whole educational section was confirmed and included the additional guard pressed for as a sine qua non by the Protestant minority of Quebec, and that sine qua non is simply, as I have stated, of value and worth to them, as it depends upon an appeal to this Parliament, and the good faith and power of this Parliament to protect them in the matter of their appeal.

Mr. McCARTHY. Where does the hon. gentleman mean that Mr. Sandfield Macdonald moved and spoke about that? My recollection is, that he was not one of the fathers of confederation.

Mr. FOSTER. He was not, but he was a member of the United Parliament, where this was discussed.

Mr. EDGAR. He was strongly opposed to confederation.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be, but he discussed the articles of confederation. He expressed opinions with regard to them, and no doubt he expressed the opinions of the Roman Catholic minority of the province of Ontario in reference to them. And, since the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) wishes to know what John Sandfield Macdonald stated, it is this:

I, as a Catholic, take the ground that I prefer my people to trust to the good sense of the majority in Ontario, as the minority in Quebec should trust to the majority there, rather than to have any divided power on the question of education.

And he moved:

That the following words be added to the original motion:—"And that it be an instruction to the said committee to consider whether any constitutional restriction which shall exclude from the local legislature of Upper Canada the entire control and direction of education, subject only to the approval or disapproval of the general Parliament, is not calculated to create widespread dissatisfaction, and tend to foster and create jealousy and strife between the various religious bodies in that section of the province."

That amendment was debated, and, Sir, the result of the debate in the vote was, that it was negatived by an almost overwhelming majority, the figures standing 8 for and 95 against. Now, Sir, not only was that article put in the constitution after discussion, and after an antecedent strife of half a century in this country, but, Sir, it was put in by and with the full consent of men of both shades of politics, and of men of the very strongest personal feeling in opposition to the principle of separate schools. To show the importance of the question to the Québec minority, and the views of the strong men of the time, let me quote. Sir A. T. Galt said:

This was a question in which in Lower Canada they must all feel the greatest interest, and in respect to which more misapprehension might be supposed to exist in the minds, at any rate of the Protestant population, than in regard to anything else connected with the whole scheme of federation.

Mr. Holton, representing the English Protestants, said:

The English Protestants of Lower Canada desire to know what is to be done in the matter of education before the final voice of the people of this country is pronounced on the question of confederation.

Sir John Macdonald replied:

Before confederation is adopted the Government would bring down a measure to amend the school law of Lower Canada, protecting the rights of the minority.

Sir John Rose said:

I know you must satisfy them that their interests for all time to come are safe, that the interests of the minority are hedged round with such safeguards that those who come after us will feel that they are protected in all they hold dear.

Sir George Cartier, a Catholic and a Frenchman, in reply to a question of Sir John Rose, said:

It is the intention of the Government that in that law there will be a provision that will secure the Protestant minority in Lower Canada such management and control over their schools as will satisfy them.

Sir E. P. Tache said:

Mr. Sanborn gave expression to the fear that the Protestant English element of Lower Canada would be in danger if this measure should pass. But if the lower branch of the legislature were insensate enough and wicked enough to commit some flagrant act of injustice against the English Protestant portion of the community they would be checked by the general—that is the Federal Government.

Hon. Mr. Laframboise said:

There is one certain fact, and that is that the Protestants of Lower Canada have said to the Government "Pass a measure which shall guarantee to us the stability and protection of our educational system and of our religious institutions and we will support your scheme of confederation; unless you do we will never support you, because we do not wish to place ourselves at the mercy of a local legislature, three-fourths of the members of which will be Catholics." I admit that in doing this they have only done their duty, for who can say after all what ten years may bring forth.

Hon. George Brown said :

It is confessedly one of the concessions from our side that have to be made to secure this great measure of reform. But surely, I for one have not the slightest hesitation in accepting it as a necessary condition of the scheme of union, and doubly acceptable must it be in the eyes of gentlemen opposite, who were the authors of the Bill of 1863.

Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat, who was one of the fathers of confederation, and who took part in these discussions, said, as late as March, 1890 :

In what spirit was the new constitution framed? It was a compromise all round, and an essential part of that compromise—so essential that without it confederation could never have taken place—was the provision by which the separate schools of Ontario, and the Protestant dissentient schools of Quebec, were guaranteed by the Imperial enactment.

But for this being guaranteed, we would have had no Dominion Parliament with its present limited powers, and no provincial legislatures with their powers.

Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, not an upholder of the separate school system, said when speaking against John Sandfield Macdonald's motion :

Though I am against the separate school system, I am willing to accept this confederation even though it perpetuates a small number of separate schools. Under the present legislative union we are powerless in any movement for the abrogation of the separate system; it is even very doubtful if we could resist the demands for its extension. We will not be in a worse position under the new system, and in one respect we will have a decided advantage, in that no further change can be made by the separate school advocates. We will thus substitute certainty for uncertainty. I deeply regret that the hon. member should have thought it necessary for any purpose to move this resolution.

And Sir Alexander Galt, who headed this agitation, who was the prime mover in bringing this question to its final resting place in the constitution of this country, in his pamphlet, published afterwards, referring to the circumstances, said :

Much of the principle and mode of taxation, separate management and other important points are not secured by the Act of confederation, but rest upon the provincial statute of Quebec; that is subject to repeal.

And the only certainty for the enjoyment of these privileges lies in their appeal to this Parliament and in the good faith and dominant power of this Parliament. So, Sir, what I wish to draw from this is that in the Confederation Act itself there is this compact, deliberately entered into, and acquiesced in by men of all shades of party politics and religious belief; and what I want to add to that is this, that the very essence of the Quebec Protestant minority's demand is post-union legislation, which depends entirely on the article of the constitution which is concerned in the appeal before us at this moment.

Nothing more than the above can fitly exemplify the good faith and the toleration, leading to compromise and to harmony, which distinguished the fathers of confederation, growing up as they did in a troubled period, having experience of strifes that arose from contested religious beliefs, and meeting on this common ground of permanent security for the good of the confederation and for its advancement thereafter.

But, Sir, there is a second compact which has to be taken into account in the discussion of this question, that is, the Manitoba compact. Now, let us look for one moment at what took place when Manitoba came into this confederation. I will not recount the history of the events which took place in that northern country immediately before confederation. There was trouble. That great wide country had been sold by the company that owned it to the Dominion Government. But there was not only land in that country. There was a handful of people there as well—Protestants and Catholics, English, Scotch and French—living along the Red River and the Assiniboine River; the denizens and citizens of that land, who were not conquered by Canada nor sold to Canada by the company at the time they sold the land to the Dominion Government. Those men came into and became a part of this confederation after negotiations had taken place, after those negotiations had resulted satisfactorily, and after the results of those negotiations had been settled in black and white in the articles of confederation upon which Manitoba was taken into confederation. Is there any doubt about that?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, great doubt.

Mr. FOSTER. There is doubt that negotiations preceded the passage of the Manitoba Act?

Mr. MARTIN. Nobody representing Manitoba ever agreed to the Confederation Act.

Mr. FOSTER. My statement is true, absolutely true, that negotiations took place, and that the final issue resulted from the bringing of those negotiations to a successful and satisfactory conclusion between the negotiating parties. And, Sir, those negotiations were accompanied by distinct assurances of the Government of Canada as to what would be done. These negotiations were watched with a most jealous and careful eye by the Home Government; and the Home Government followed their course, and sanctioned them at the last. Recollect that the people who lived there were few in number, and were a people who had not the advantages of education and refinement such as we have at this time—a simple-minded people, having their modes of life, their religious customs, their school privileges; intensely suspicious as to what might happen to them if they came under the dominancy of a greater power and intensely careful that they should know, before they were handed over to the Dominion of Canada, that their customs, their rights, their privileges, their status, should be well defined, and should be favourable and satisfactory to them.

I have said that those negotiations were accompanied by assurances from the Dominion Government—assurances which were calculated to settle in the minds of a simple-minded people such as they, that good faith would be kept and security would belong to them if they became a component part of confederation. In the instructions of the Governor General to Colonel de Salaberry, to the Rev. Mr. Thibault and to Mr. Donald A. Smith, that is plainly set forth. The instructions to the two first-named state:

You will not fail to direct the attention of the mixed society inhabiting the cultivated borders of the Red River and Assiniboine, to the fact which comes within your daily knowledge and observation, and is patent to all the world, that in the four provinces of this Dominion, men of all origins, creeds and complexions, stand upon one broad footing of perfect equality in the eye of the Government and the law; and that no Administration could confront the enlightened public sentiment of this country, which attempted to act in the North-west upon principles more restricted and less liberal than those which are fairly established here.

In the instructions to Mr. Donald A. Smith, the third commissioner, this sentence appears:

The people may rely upon it that respect and protection will be extended to the different religious denominations, and that all the franchises which have existed, or which the people may prove themselves qualified to exercise, shall be duly continued or liberally conferred. That "right shall be done in all cases."

The Governor General, writing to Mr. McTavish, the Governor of the Hudson Bay Company, on December 6th, 1869, said:

And the inhabitants of Rupert's Land, of all classes and persuasions, may rest assured that Her Majesty's Government has no intention of interfering with or setting aside, or allowing others to interfere with the religions, the rights, or the franchises hitherto enjoyed, or to which they may hereafter prove themselves equal.

The Canadian Secretary of State, writing to Governor Macdougall in December, 1869, said:

You will now be in a position to assure the residents of the North-west Territories that all their civil and religious liberties will be sacredly respected. That the country will be governed, as in the past, by British law, and according to the spirit of British justice.

Mr. FOSTER.

The Governor General, in a proclamation issued on the 6th of December, 1869, said:

By Her Majesty's authority, I therefore assure you that, on the union with Canada, all your civil and religious rights and privileges will be respected, your properties secured to you, and that your country will be governed, as in the past, under British laws and in the spirit of British justice.

Now, Sir, I say that the tenor of these assurances and communications to a simple-minded people, intensely jealous of the rights, privileges and customs they had enjoyed, unlearned in forms of law or diplomacy, could convey to them and did convey to them, nothing else than that on their union with Canada their status, their civil and religious rights, their customs, so far as they prevailed, should be respected and should be maintained for them, entire and unabridged, on their union with the Dominion of Canada.

But, Sir, I have said that Her Majesty's Government also took an interest in those negotiations. On the 9th day of April, 1870, Earl Granville, while following the negotiations as they were being carried on here in the city of Ottawa, cabled to the Governor General:

Let me know as soon as you can by telegram the result of the negotiations with the Red River delegates.

Earl Granville, on 23rd April, informed the Governor General:

The Canadian Government to accept decision of Her Majesty's Government on all portions of the settlers "bill of rights."

The Governor General was able to cable, on 3rd of May, to Earl Granville:

Negotiations with the delegates closed satisfactorily.

And on 16th March, Earl Granville replied:

I take this opportunity of expressing the satisfaction with which I have learned, from your telegram of the 3rd inst., that the Canadian Government and the delegates have come to an understanding as to the terms on which the settlements on the Red River should be admitted into the union.

Now, I think this is conclusive as to my general proposition, that the terms of the confederation were preceded and accompanied by negotiations, that they were the result of these negotiations, that they were satisfactory to both sides, and so were made a part of the Manitoba Act and the constitution of this country.

Mr. MARTIN. Might I ask the hon. gentleman whether the bill of rights referred to in the despatch just read contained any request or any reference to the question of separate schools?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not discussing, nor do I intend to discuss anything in controversy with reference to the different bills of rights or what they contained.

Mr. MARTIN. That is most important.

Mr. FOSTER. I am simply giving the general tenor of what preceded the union. I am not establishing definite special details by definite special proof, but I am impressing upon the minds of those who listen to me the general tenor and import of what took place prior to confederation, and this carries a meaning to members of this House and the people of this country which no specialization would carry—a stronger meaning, a better meaning and a more conclusive meaning.

After these negotiations had taken place—and I now come to something which will be special enough for my hon. friend—there was introduced into this Parliament a Bill providing for the confederation of Manitoba with this Dominion. And one clause of that Bill was known as the educational clause, which contains within it a rescript of the education clause in the British North America Act, extended in order to meet the special condition of the people of Manitoba, who were soon to be brought into this union. I said a moment ago that I was not concerned to dig into this controversy about the bills of rights. What I am concerned to know is that these negotiations took place, that they were incident to the Act, that the Act embodies a measure of guard and a measure of security to the religious minority, whatever it might be, in the province of Manitoba, equal to, in all respects, and stronger in some respects, than the compact which was put into the British North America Act of 1867, in its 93rd clause.

Mr. SPROULE. It says nothing at all about separate schools.

Mr. FOSTER. It most certainly does. Now, let me go one step further. When that Act came down to this Parliament and was discussed—and I hope my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) will listen now while I am speaking—when that Act came down and was discussed in this Parliament, it was not put through in a lone and dark hour, when nine-tenths of the members were away and when no discussion could be raised upon it. On the contrary, it was discussed, and ably discussed, in this Parliament. What was done was done in the light of day, open to the people of this country from one end to the other. And what took place? This very clause was debated, it was actually contested, and when those particular words in it which extended protection to Manitoba, over and above the protection which was given in the first item of the education clause in the British North America Act—when that extension came down, objection was made to it, and a motion was made by Mr. Oliver that it should not be conceded. Mr. Oliver thought it should be cut out, but after full discussion it was actually embodied in, and remains now, as a part of the Manitoba Act. Now, Sir, that is my answer to my hon. friend over there (Mr. Martin) and to my hon. friend here (Mr. Sproule), that whatever view they may take of the bills of rights and of communications and negotiations that took place, in the letter of the law there is a provision made for the rights of the minority. Whether these separate schools were to be Protestant or Catholic depended on which should be the minority, and the provision which was made in that constitution to secure these schools, was thought to be sufficient and was so considered by all.

After debate was had in this House, and after a vote was called, an overwhelming majority decided that that clause, as extended, should go into the Manitoba Act, and if my hon. friend thinks that that does not show that there was a minority guarantee to Manitoba, perhaps I can convince him by some independent testimony. First, I take the statement made by Hon. G. W. Ross, Minister of Education for Ontario, 19th December, 1895, in Montreal:

I believe, under the Act by which Manitoba entered the union, it was understood by all the other provinces that the minority, whether Protestant or Catholic, would have the right to establish denominational schools. It was the merest mockery to empower the Dominion Government to interfere for the protection of denominational schools unless it was assumed that such schools existed and that in the changes incident to the growth of a new country they might need protection from possible interference some time in the future.

That is strong testimony. It is not testimony from a political adherent of this Government.

Mr. SPROULE. He only gave it as his belief.

Mr. FOSTER. The Hon. Wm. Macdougall, who was one of the members of Parliament in 1870, and an actor later in the bringing of Manitoba into this Dominion, said in 1892:

We certainly intended that the Catholics of Manitoba, or whichever denomination might be in a minority, should have the right to establish and maintain their own schools. You see the words "or practice" were inserted in the Manitoba Act, so that the difficulty which arose in New Brunswick, where separate schools actually existed but were not recognized by law, should not be repeated in Manitoba. And then the right of appeal to the Federal Parliament was given to make assurance doubly sure.

Only an opinion, says my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule), but it is the opinion of a man who was a prime actor in the actual circumstances of the day, and I put that as against the opinion of even my hon. friend from Grey, who is living some twenty-five or twenty-six years later.

Mr. McCARTHY. Where did Mr. Macdougall make that statement?

Mr. FOSTER. In his own house, to a reporter, and it was published in the newspaper and was authorized. But I do not know that I might not have a higher authority still, in the opinion of my hon. friend, for I think that Mr. Dalton McCarthy, Q.C., who spoke for and was the attorney for the province of Manitoba, admitted before the Privy Council committee that this minority had rights. Unfortunately, he did not go so far as to admit that the rights which they undoubtedly had ought to be preserved to them. He stopped short of that; but he did absolutely admit and confess that they undoubtedly had rights. And he did more; he confessed and admitted that if it had not been for bad clerical work in drafting they would have had still stronger rights than they have now to present to Parliament and to the country. For, in the opinion of very eminent legal men sitting in this House, whatever was the decision of the Privy Council in Great Britain on the Barrett case, the minority had before confederation practically in operation what were the equivalent of separate schools; that if it had not been for bad drafting or bad judgment, that first appeal to the Privy Council of Great Britain would have kept this question out of Parliament, because it would have established the unconstitutionality of the Act passed by the Manitoba legislature in 1890, and given the Manitoba minority their schools under the first section of article 22. But, Sir, I may give further authority, the authority of the Equal Rights Association, voiced by Mr. E. Douglas Armour, Q.C., who says:

It was supposed that the italicized words—that is the words “by practice”—would save the right or privilege of keeping up separate or denominational schools.

The constitution of Manitoba did not guarantee separate schools. It was supposed to do so.

The constitution of Manitoba was supposed to have established separate schools perpetually in Manitoba.

The only point I wish to make on this is one that can be given what weight it is worth—and it will have weight—that a compact having been entered into, which all supposed guaranteed to the minority certain pre-union rights, if by reason of faulty drafting or the failure of words to carry out the well understood and complete agreement on the point they failed to get those rights, it stands for nothing in point of law I grant you, but it carries weight with every honest man when he comes to discuss the question of the infringement of post-union rights. But, Sir, more than that, the Privy Council judgment, given by men of the highest legal ability, removed from prejudices and strife, in Canada, makes this matter plain in two senses. It shows that the terms upon which Manitoba was to become a province of the Dominion were matters of negotiations between representatives of the province of Manitoba and the Dominion Government, and that the Manitoba Act was a Parliamentary compact. It says:

Those who were stipulating for the provisions of section 22 as a condition of the union and those who gave their legislative assent to that Act, by which it was brought about, had in view the perils then apprehended.

The terms upon which Manitoba was to become a province of this Dominion were matters of negotiation between representatives of the province of Manitoba and the Dominion Government. The terms agreed upon, so far as education was concerned, must be taken to be embodied in the 22nd section of the Act of 1870.

There is no doubt either what the points of difference were, and it is in the light of these that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act of 1870, which was in truth a parliamentary compact, must be read.

It was not to be doubted that the object of the first subsection 22 was to afford protection to denominational schools.

Now, Sir, I think I have given proof sufficient, but if more is needed it can be had from the sequence of events following the passing of this Act and the entry of Manitoba into the confederation. What were these events? Why, Sir, immediately upon that province being formed—following exactly upon the lines of the negotiations, following exactly upon terms of the section of the Manitoba Act, the legislature, as soon as it was convened, adopted a system of schools, providing in the completest manner for the separate schools of the minority which at that time was found to be Catholic instead of a Protestant minority. More than that, a significant circumstance took place at a later period. In 1876 the question was raised in Manitoba as to the abolition of the Senate of Manitoba on the ground of greater economy in administration. What is the Senate supposed to be in this country? What was it supposed to be, what was the reason for its existence in the provinces of the Dominion? The Senate was looked upon as a guard against sudden impulses and passions of the people. The Senate was looked upon as a protective power to the minorities of the country. They possessed a Senate in Manitoba. When the question as to its abolition was brought up, the Catholics objected to its abolition on the ground that it would diminish their security for two things, their language and their schools. And, Sir, they were promised in the most explicit way by the Premier of the province at that time, by Mr. Luxton, who was an influential member of the legislature at that time, and by others, that if they would consent on the ground of economy to do away with the Senate, they need have no fear that they would not be amply protected both as to their schools and as to their language.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the hon. gentleman think it right to make that statement upon affidavits that were put in and afterwards withdrawn?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not relying upon affidavits. I am taking the debates which actually occurred in the Manitoba legislature. My hon. friend must not go insane over the matter of affidavits. I read here, Sir, the report of a debate which took place just immediately precedent to the Bill abolishing the provincial Senate, Premier Davies said :

It may be said that the council is a safeguard to the minority. He could assure the minority that their rights would never be trampled upon in this province. There would always be sufficient English-speaking members in this House, who would insist on giving their French fellow-subjects their rights to protect them.

Mr. Luxton said :

There were some questions of sentiment which lay close to the hearts of the French people, and he could assure them that the English-speaking members would not ruthlessly deal with these, if the French representatives were sufficiently patriotic to support the measure before the House. They would recognize their generosity and not forget it.

Mr. Frank Cornish, then a prominent lawyer, said :

He believed the old settlers and the French would make a common cause if their rights were infringed upon ; and he could assure them that when the Canadian, that is the English-speaking party, became the great majority it would not be found oppressive.

So strong, so hearty, so generous and so general were these expressions that Mr. Royal felt them and rose to express his feeling in this way :

But there was something else, for himself, which had not been guaranteed by any Act ; he found it yesterday in the remarks of the Hon. Messrs. Davis and Norquay, in the applause given by Mr. Brown to the sentiments of Mr. Luxton, and in the expressions of Mr. Cornish.

There is something that is stronger than compacts, stronger than parliamentary law, stronger than constitution in the world's work—the good faith, the pledged faith, born from a generous hearty feeling of goodwill which one man expresses to his brother, which one set of men in the country express to another set of men. That is what seemed more estimable to Mr. Royal than even Acts of Parliament. And Mr. McKay, speaking, said :

He was very much pleased to hear the generous and just remarks of the hon. Premier, the hon. Provincial Secretary, and also of the hon. member for Rockwood, which gave the minority in the House that confidence, which the members of this House by their vote on this Bill would express, that security they felt in the hands of that majority.

The Senate was abolished with the consent of the French members, and two or three years afterwards, both those rights, one of their language, the other to their educational system, were ruthlessly abolished by the Act of 1890.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the hon. gentleman know that Mr. Luxton, who was referred to in that debate, was at that time strongly urging the abolition of separate schools, that he was elected two years prior to that time pledged to do all he could to abolish separate schools ?

Mr. FOSTER. Whether I know that or not, it is quite conceivable that a gentleman of honour and good faith can have the strongest possible opinion with reference to separate schools, and yet when he comes to a number of gentlemen, his fellow-members, and asks them to give up their opposition to the abolition of the Manitoba legislative council which they looked upon as the guardian of their special rights in language and schools, and pledges his word that they will not regret it, that he will act like a gentleman and respect his promise. And to-day this same Mr. Luxton is strongly in favour of restitution to the minority in Manitoba. There was more. There was another episode which took place in 1888 ; and in mentioning this I am not dealing with affidavits which were put in and which were then withdrawn. I ask the attention of this House to the facts given in a speech of Mr. Fisher in the legislature of Manitoba, an old-time Liberal, and a Liberal to this day. I do not intend to go into the circumstantial parts of the statements in this speech, they have been stated over and over again in this House ; but this was another instance where faith was pledged in a certain contest, where faith was pledged and a contest was run upon it, and a contest was gained upon it, and a government was formed in consequence of it ; where the pledges which Mr. Fisher said were made were not carried out ; where Mr. Fisher was impelled to rise in the legislature of Manitoba, and say that the schools were taken away from the minority by an act of bad faith which he could not but reprobate, and which he could not but deplore. This is additional evidence that the pledge and compact in the Manitoba Act was something really lived upon, acted upon, acquiesced in, for over twenty years, until circumstances arose which made it expedient, in the opinion of the dominant party in Manitoba, to abolish the system of separate schools. Sir, I say that the Manitoba compact was another instance of toleration and compromise, looking towards peace and harmony, and in the best interests of the province and of the Dominion at that time, a duplication of the action which took place some years before in the Confederation Act with reference to the other provinces of the Dominion.

Now, Sir, I wish to come to another point of view. The Government is attacked in this House and in the country for its action with reference to this question. Men meet me every day and say : Why did you raise this question at all ? Why did you bring it up ? I am speaking to that class of men now particularly, when I ask : Who raised this question ? It was not raised, but settled, by the men of 1867, in the Confederation Act ; it was not raised, but settled by the men of 1870 in the Manitoba Act. It has not been raised by the province of Nova Scotia for thirty years ; it has not been raised by the province of New Brunswick for thirty years ; it has not been raised by the province of Ontario for thirty years ; it has not been raised by the province of Quebec for thirty years. There is an even harmony of peace, and of security, and of contentment, so far as that clause of the Act is concerned in its relation to the provinces, for all that period, broken but once, but broken in Manitoba, and broken by whom? To-day, Sir, no indignation is too strong to be hurled against the Liberal-Conservative Government and party because they are endeavouring to settle this question. Let men consider as well why that question has to be settled by us. Let them clearly see whence it comes, and however strong their opinion may be, give to a Government and a party who happen to be in power when this question comes up for settlement, their good feeling, their utmost charity, and their honest and hearty support, if they believe that we are honest and sincere in attempting to meet and settle this question. Who raised it? Sir, it was raised by a segment of a hostile party, the party opposite to us; and but for the action of that segment of a hostile party, there would have been no question here to-day for the Liberal-Conservative party to settle, and even peace and harmony in the west would have gone on side by side with the even peace and harmony in every other province of this Dominion. How did they raise this question? We all know—simply by abolishing the system of schools which was established in 1871, and sweeping away every right which the minority in Manitoba confidently supposed was secured to them, and which they had enjoyed for twenty years. I venture to deplore the action of the Manitoba government and legislature—I wish to speak with no harshness, it is not proper or right for me to do so. I speak simply of a question of fact, and, Sir, I firmly believe that there are few men in this country to-day who do not deplore the action which the Manitoba government and legislature took in 1890 on this question. The Rev. Principal Grant, who went up to Manitoba, and later to the North-west, as an independent inquirer to look into the question, and whose opinion is not, on the whole, at all favourable to the Dominion Government, was constrained to say this :

The government of Manitoba made a great mistake in summarily abolishing instead of reforming the old school system. They have been at war ever since 1890, with the prejudices, and feelings, and even religious convictions of a section of the population that deserved to be treated with the utmost consideration. This war will end only when they make concession which, to the mass of the people interested, will seem reasonable. The sooner these are made the better.

And to make his appeal as emphatic as possible, he says :

Mr. FOSTER.

The onus lies on the provincial government to make concessions to meet the views of the reasonable members of the aggrieved minority.

Sir, I believe it is true, as I stated a moment ago, that in this House and in the country there is a feeling of regret that the action of the Manitoba government in 1890 was either taken at all, or if action was taken, that it was not action upon somewhat different lines, and of a less drastic character. The ostensible reasons which are urged in this House and in the country, are these : First, that the system was faulty. But it is not necessary to cut a man's head off in order to heal a sore upon his body. The system was faulty, but that is no argument that the system must be abolished. It could be reformed ; and the Manitoba government and legislature had full and absolute power to reform it. The schools were inefficient, but that is no argument that they should be abolished. If all the inefficient schools in Manitoba had been abolished, I think a good many more would have suffered a like death. The power lay in the hands of the government and legislature of Manitoba to make those schools efficient. The money was badly managed, but the absolute power lay in the hands of the government of Manitoba to see that it was rightly managed, and all these reforms could have been made without abolition, and without contravening the rights and privileges which have been enjoyed so long by the minority. Why, Sir, is it contended that separate schools cannot be made efficient schools? That contention is not confirmed by the opinions of men who lived in Manitoba and who had something to do with the schools of that province. I find the superintendent of schools, Mr. Somerset, made a report in 1888, in which he said :

In connection with its working (the law) during the last seventeen years, it may be pointed out that the schools of the province have been managed without a particle of the denominational friction that has caused disturbance and bitterness in other provinces of the Dominion.

The past history of the province encourages the hope that perfect justice to each interest shall result in a continuance of the harmony that now exists.

Rev. Dr. Bryce, of Winnipeg, who is no friend of the Dominion Government in this case, wrote before 1890 :

The separate school supporters are viewed in the light of being exempt from the general law which establishes a national system of education. In Manitoba, the Roman Catholic schools are as much national as the Protestant. No special rights are given to either Catholics or Protestants. * * * The government grant is voted for one system of schools, and is divided according to the population of children. No special rights are given either Catholics or Protestants. All moneys are equitably distributed.

* * * Lord Selkirk's scheme of perfect religious equality and toleration is that still subsisting in Manitoba.

* * * There is no bone of contention to disturb the prevailing harmony. No church is given any place of precedence.

Rev. Peter Wright, who takes a lively interest in this question, at Portage la Prairie, says :

In Ontario very excellent work is being done in many of the separate schools. The late Prof. Young, when Inspector of the High Schools of Ontario, was asked by the Government to inspect such separate schools as he conveniently could. I remember a conversation I had with him in which he bore testimony to the excellent condition in which he found many of them.

More yet. Let us take the Toronto "Globe" of 1895. What does it say ?

We advocate the Ontario system, not because it is fixed by the constitution, but because we consider it to be a good system, embodying a satisfactory settlement of a vexed question.

If this province were making a fresh start to-day, absolutely untrammelled by constitutional restrictions, we do not know that it could do better than continue that arrangement without any material change.

Hon. David Mills, in 1892, said :

The course taken in the province of Ontario, on the whole, produces the most satisfactory results on this continent, of the educational question.....I say there is no public school system on this continent, producing more satisfactory results, and that works out with less friction than the separate school system of Ontario.

Then, I say, my position is abundantly proved, if indeed it did require to be proved, that it was possible for other action to have been taken for inefficient separate schools to have been made efficient and workable, short of the abolition of those schools and the raising of this vexed question. These were the ostensible reasons put forward, but if the leader of the Opposition, who says he demands separate schools, were present, I would draw his attention most closely to another point.

What was the real reason for abolishing separate schools in Manitoba ? I will quote three authorities. The first authority is the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill abolishing the separate schools. In introducing the Bill, he is reported to have said :

The Government's action had not been determined because they were dissatisfied with the manner in which the affairs of the department are conducted under the system, but because they are dissatisfied with the system itself.

Dr. Grant, after making his investigation, said :

The men responsible for the change did not attack the old system for faulty administration or poor results ; but they took the ground that it was wrong in principle.

Mr. McCarthy, who spoke by the book, for he had the whole case of Manitoba under his charge, said :

Do you tell me that the Equal Rights Association had nothing to do with that question ? Of course the feeling was there ; the grievance existed ; here people's minds had only to be directed to it, and the moment attention was drawn to it, the province of Manitoba rose as one man and said : We want no dual language, and away with separate schools as well.

That is food for reflection for the leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentlemen who follow his leadership, who has stated, over and over again, that he is intensely desirous for the restoration of the privileges of the minority to them, in so far as separate schools are concerned, that he believes the adoption of sunny ways would have brought about such a conclusion of this matter ; yet we stand face to face with the declaration of the mover of the Bill, of the hon. gentleman who had Manitoba's case under his direct charge, and, from what is well and widely known, that it was not because they objected to the inefficiency or lack of efficiency of minority schools, but they objected to the principle, and separate schools was the thing that had to march out of the Manitoba domain. The leader of the Opposition says that the demon of discontent is roaring, blowing the winds of strife. Who has unchained that demon ? It was chained down by the fathers of confederation by the clause in the Confederation Act, and the compact that resulted from it. It remained chained down for twenty-five years, until the bolts were drawn by the Liberal party ; since then it has gone about and through this country, this demon of discord, blowing the winds of strife, and hon. members opposite now deplore that state of affairs. The evil spirit has been summoned. Who will exorcise it ? Not the Manitoba government, it seems, for during six years they have had the power at will to exorcise the evil spirit and settle the question, and bring peace where discord reigns : but they have not, as yet, taken one single step towards the attainment of that end. Who is responsible for it ? Hon. gentlemen opposite and their party, as a whole, are responsible for it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. FOSTER. I say it, and I adhere to it as strongly as I possibly can. A section of that party unchained this demon of discord, which is roaring around, blowing the winds of strife, and the party as a whole has been the most powerful factor in preventing Manitoba from settling this question. From the day it arose, from the Toronto "Globe" down, they have backed up the province of Manitoba, and called on her to be staunch and firm in resisting the tyranny of the Dominion. In the province of Quebec they carried on a crusade against this Government, as they did in the province of Ontario, because they at first declared the Government would do nothing, and because afterwards they feared the Dominion Parliament would intervene to secure a settlement of the question. In every way they have kept the agitation alive, they have fanned the flames and added to the difficulties of settlement. They have the odium of being the party which unchained the demon, and which has been helping to blow the winds of strife through the country from that time on.

Now, Sir, what has been the course of the Dominion Government with reference to that question? And first, its legal course. On this question, arising from the constitution which the Government was sworn to maintain and uphold, a question which was thrown into their midst by this segment of a hostile party, dogged, as every movement of the Government has been by this party, and for partisan purposes; what has the Government done? It was well aware of the perils of the voyage. It knew the quicksands and hidden reefs, but what this party and Government did, was to nail their compass to the standard of the law and the constitution, and to steer by that towards the port of restitution; restitution, if possible, by the power which could best do it; restitution, if necessary, by the power in whose hands it ultimately was vested by the constitution of the country. They were clamoured with to exercise the veto power. They refused to exercise the veto power, taking the consistent ground that the constitutionality of the Act should be fought out in the courts, and as they did in the case of the New Brunswick schools, they gave a sum of money for testing the constitutionality of that Act. Afterwards, they sought the decision of the courts as to their powers in accordance with the Blake Act, so-called, which was acquiesced in for this special purpose by both sides of the House of Parliament, and passed as a means to be taken advantage of, in this case, and in cases of this kind, never stopping in their even course, until they had the rights and powers as to appeal, as to grievances, and as to the restitution in the case of these grievances, carefully and fully confirmed by the highest tribunal in the British Empire; and, after that, they heard the appeal, making their judgment under the remedial order, and sending it forward to the province which was chiefly interested.

I ask any man here: If that was not the course which the Government followed, consistently, and without deviation, from the very moment this question came into the arena.

Politically, what was the action of the Government? It first invited Manitoba to redress the grievances complained of—and here I have to complain of one thing, which hon. gentlemen opposite, and the leader of the Opposition, especially, have distinctly and constantly ignored, namely, the first communication which was sent by this Government to the Manitoba government and legislature on the 24th July, 1894, inviting them to the consideration of the grievances complained of, and expressing the strongest hope that they would take these matters into consideration and remedy these grievances. This was done, Sir, in 1894, before the decision of the Privy Council. This Government asked the Manitoba government, moreover, that they should lay that request before the legislature of Manitoba. But the government of Manitoba refused the invitation to consider the grievances; they said none existed, and they absolutely neglected to lay the communication before the legislature of Manitoba, and it has not been put before that legislature to this day. The Government then sent forward the remedial order, making it just as wide as the grievances which were complained of. They conveyed to the Manitoba government, at the same time, the intimation, that though that order was made so wide as to cover the fullest possible allegation of grievances, yet, at the same time, a proposition could fairly be made within the lines of that order which might be reasonably satisfactory, and which would be satisfactory, so far as the Dominion Government was concerned. The Manitoba government refused to carry out the terms of that order. What happened thereafter? We came up to the session of Parliament. We had this refusal to act under the remedial order. Our whole course had been an intimation that legislation by this Parliament must follow, if no restitution was made by the Manitoba government. But, instead of driving matters to the extreme, even then, and trying to pass the legislation, the Dominion Government held out the olive branch once more, and postponed legislation for one session on this matter. They again addressed the Manitoba government, asking them to take into reconsideration the whole question, and to make a proposal upon which they could agree, as to some arrangement which would reasonably satisfy the minority. In doing that, Sir, there was an acute difference of opinion in the Government and in the party as to whether it was wise or not; but, for the sake of giving every possible chance to the government of Manitoba and the legislature of Manitoba to settle the question, that acute difference of opinion, and that dissatisfaction which arose in the party, was braved, for the time being, for the sake of the result which all of us would be glad to have happened, namely, the settlement of this question by Manitoba itself. Now, Sir, having given that delay, and having no answer, acceding to even a proposition upon the matter, we came face to face with this Parliament, under the pledge to legislate if the Manitoba government had not arranged the matter. We are carrying out that pledge. We are asking this Parliament to pass the second reading of this Bill. We have staked our existence as a Government upon that measure; but even yet, in answer to the plea—a plea of great force—that if this could be arranged by the Manitoba government and legislature, it would be far better, we have still, even at this late period, asked for a conference, and will meet in conference in order that, if it is possible to arrange it, the Manitoba government and legislature may yet settle this question, as they can easily do, on the principles of fair-play to the minority.

I say that the Government, in acting on these lines, has acted with dignity. It has acted with prudence. It has acted with forbearance, and now, after six years, it comes to the time and the place, where it thinks that in justice to the minority and to the duties which the constitution lay upon us, it is impossible to further postpone settlement, and that, therefore, during this session of this Parliament, a final settlement must be made in one way or the other.

What, Sir, has been the action of the Manitoba government? They broke the spirit of the confederation compact, as I have shown, in 1890 and 1894. They have refused, in the least degree, to make any concession to the minority or to mitigate the severity of their legislation with reference to that minority. They have refused our invitations, refused to act upon the order. They have declared, over and over again, by their counsel, and by themselves, that they did not, in the first place, recognize any wrong, and that they did not propose, therefore, to attempt to settle any alleged grievances. They affirm, in short, that no wrong has been committed, and that they will not change the present system of education. That may have been their determination up to the present time. That may be their determination, even when this conference takes place. I hope it will not be; I hope that the matter, having come to this stage, when one way or the other it must be settled, I hope, I say, that the Manitoba government will take the matter in its own hands, and by a reasonable arrangement concede to the minority what they reasonably ought to have, and so settle this question, and take it out of the arena of politics.

And, as to the Manitoba minority. I must say it, and I say it here, that the minority deserves a meed of praise for its attitude, under these long six years, of what they consider a grievance and a deferred right. That Manitoba minority waited with patience the decision of the Privy Council, and when the decision was given, they murmured a little, but they abided by it, and they respected it. They took up the second branch of what they thought was the charter of their minority rights. They carried it from the Supreme Court in Canada to the Privy Council in Great Britain at their own cost and charges. There they got this judgment, saying that they had a grievance and a right of appeal, and that we had the power to remedy the grievance. They brought that appeal to us; they have waited patiently during delay after delay; and now, after six years, it does not seem more than fitting and right that their patience and the Government's forbearance should meet in a measure which may adequately restore those rights and remedy that grievance in harmony with the purpose of the constitution.

Now, Sir, there are certain objections made to this measure. One is that Parliament is free as air and not bound, and that consequently we are not compelled to legislate. My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) advanced that view, and he is right to a certain extent. Parliament is free as air and unbound. So far as this case is concerned, there is no judgment of a court which compels it to do one thing or the other. There is no superior parliamentary power which is able to coerce us. But I want to say to my hon. friend, that as in the case of an individual, so in the case of society and a country, the highest form of freedom is invariably surrounded with the strongest limitations. Above the compelling powers of the courts of law, and above the compelling power of superior parliaments, there is a sentiment of justice and fair-play which compels where there is no legal instrument;—which compels by the very force of the appeal which that sentiment carries to the heart and the conscience of a parliament and a people to do justice and to exercise that unrestrained and unrestricted freedom in the interests of a minority or of any class of people plainly aggrieved and asking redress.

But we are told that the majority should rule. The majority should rule, says my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). That all depends. Does the majority in a small municipality rule in a contest where the jurisdiction as between the provincial legislature and that small municipality lies with the former? Majorities rule under an even and coterminous jurisdiction, that is all. But, Sir, it would be a veritable tyranny not to be endured for an instant, that a majority should rule, to the oppression of a minority in a small section of country, against the vast majority of a Parliament like this, which has undoubted jurisdiction, and in whose keeping these minority rights that have been infringed upon are placed in the most solemn manner by the constitution. Majorities rule, each in its proper plane and sphere; but the majority of the superior jurisdiction must always rule the majority of the smaller section.

There is no parallel between the case of Quebec and the case of Manitoba, says my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien); they are not alike at all. No parallel? Why not, Sir? Because one minority is Protestant and the other is Catholic? Is that it? That is not the question. You are out of court in making that distinction. The rights of these minorities, which were recognized as legal rights, were settled at confederation. There was a Catholic minority, using Catholic schools, and there was a Protestant minority using Protestant schools. The right of each was conceded ; under the law, as adopted, those minorities were both to have their protection. It is too late in the day now to raise the question, as to whether you must give force to the law with regard to the Protestant minority, forsooth ; but must put out of court another minority, because it is Catholic. The Catholic minority look on their schools in a certain conscientious and religious way. They may not, in the opinion of some, be right in that, but in the confederation compact their opinion prevailed, and their right was guaranteed to them. The Protestants looked on their schools in a certain way. Some Catholics may have said they were all wrong, and they may have combatted that idea at the time ; but the right of the Protestants was conceded, and that right is protected by the constitution. Another says : You are going to mutilate and destroy the system of public schools in Manitoba. I deny it. I ask the educationalists of the province of Ontario to answer me this question : Is the Ontario system of education destroyed and mutilated because separate schools exist there ? You cannot find an educationalist of repute in the province of Ontario, or one who has inspected the system of education in that province, who will give you an affirmative answer to that question. The public school system of Manitoba would be destroyed, if hon. gentlemen opposite had had their way. The leader of the Opposition, who either believed in the argument, or was ungenerous enough to use against us an argument in whose validity he himself did not believe, said that the Catholics of Manitoba are suffering an injustice to-day, because we did not exercise the veto power in 1890.

Mr. GUAY. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear ;" but I invite him down to the seat in front, beside the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who yesterday made that bitter anti-remedial speech, and I will leave them to fight the matter out between them. If we had vetoed the Act of 1890, what would we have done ? Smashed irremediably a system of public schools, which is in accord with the majority of opinion in the province of Manitoba, and created a veritable grievance. To-day, by this legislation, you leave the public school system virtually intact. You simply strive to give back to a minority the privileges guaranteed them, which can be done without disturbing, to any appreciable extent, the beneficence and value of the public school system in the country. Why, Sir, look at the distribution of the population of the country, and tell me how you can maintain the public school system. One says : You will take taxes that ought to go to support it, and that will maintain it. How many people are there in the province ? Some 200,000. How many Catholics ? Some 20,000. So that only one-tenth of the population, at the most, could be withdrawn from the support of the public schools, so far as tax contributions are concerned. How are the Roman Catholics grouped in the province ? The Rev. Dr. King, late moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly, tells us :

A large portion of the Roman Catholic population is situated along the two rivers, where there are almost no Protestants. Accordingly, in nine cases out of ten the trustees would be Roman Catholic, and Roman Catholic teachers could and would be chosen.

The census, also, and every man who knows Manitoba, and has studied its geography, can tell you the same thing. Put your system of separate schools in those parts of the country where nine-tenths of the Catholic population are congregated together, and you have not an iota of difference in the tax contributions, whether you have the separate school system, or whether you have the public school system. You would not take the taxes of the Catholics gathered together along the banks of the Red River, and send them to Brandon, or somewhere else, to swell the public school contributions of that portion of the country. No. Then, I say, establish your separate schools, if you wish, and nine-tenths of the minority will be just the same, as regards the tax contributions, as they will be under the public school system, but better—why ? Why, to-day, Sir, they both carry on their own schools, and pay taxes to the public school system, having a grievance, depleting their earnings by paying a second tax into their own private schools, and it is thus impossible for them to keep up schools of at all like efficiency they would have, if they did not have to pay double taxes out of their pockets. You would have better separate schools. What about the remaining one-tenth of the minority ? In the majority of cases, I venture to say, it is so scattered that in practical working, of necessity, they would not form separate schools, but would do, as they do in Ontario, go in with the public schools. Sir, this plea that you would destroy the public school system is a perfect bugbear and nothing else. When you come to analyse it, a system of separate schools, giving the minority their fullest rights in the province of Manitoba would not disarrange matters materially, but would make the schools, on the average, more efficient in every possible way—and the grievance would be removed.

But there are some strictly Liberal objections. I venture to say that in this House there are just two classes of opinions ; and if its members were polled, it would be found that these classes of opinion would be in the proportion of ten to one. One, and the smaller class, believes in the repudiation of the compact clauses of the Confederation Act and of the Manitoba Act—and which, despite this compact, would do away with separate schools entirely. The other, and the larger class, is made up of men who believe in remedial legislation as a principle either in the first or in the last application; and as far as the principle goes, it does not make a bit of difference. The distinction between the Liberal-Conservatives who support remedial legislation, and the Liberals who to-day wish to give it the six months' hoist and kick it out of this Parliament is simply a question as to time of action—not as to principle. Did you hear what the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) said? Did you hear what other members on the benches opposite said? All, without exception, from the province of Quebec said: Let us have an investigation, let us have a commission; let us have Manitoba settle this thing, if she will. But if she will not settle it, what did they say? What will my hon. friend there (Mr. Davies) say? He is a remedialist in the last analysis. I am a remedialist at this present time. On principle there is not the least difference between us. He is putting the question over on an insufficient plea for delay, on the ground of an investigation. I say it is better for Parliament and the country it should be settled now. But the platform on which they stand in their plea for a commission of investigation. Let us analyse it. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) moves the six months' hoist to a Bill which embodies the principle of remedial legislation. Therefore he and his party are opposed to that principle. My hon. friend, in the very same breath, says: I go for an investigating commission; and he is applauded to the echo by the hon. gentlemen who sit beside him and who follow him. And yet there can be no standing ground for a commission of investigation, unless the principle of absolute remedial legislation underlies it. What business have you investigating if you do not intend to exercise the remedial power should the investigation establish a grievance? The only logical position of anti-remedialists is that taken by the "Globe" and by the third party, viz.: to say you do not want any commission. But the moment you appoint a commission, on your own showing, you are either poking your noses into something you have no business with, or you are standing on a principle which will pledge you to legislate if the commission shows that there is a grievance. That is the consistent platform enunciated by a party which at one and the same minute declares against remedial legislation—kick it out; for remedial legislation—let us have a commission of inquiry. Inquiry is the general cry. The Manitoba government raised it to call off public attention from the act they had committed. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition raises it in order to keep his party in unison. My hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) follows him a long way off. He was not there a few years ago, he was not there a few months ago, but the crack of the party whip has been heard, and my nervous and excitable friend feared the lash and came into line, and he calls out for delay and investigation as sturdily as the best of them. Sir Oliver Mowat adopts it to keep the party within line. It is like a vast umbrella under which they all gather and are sheltered from the pelting rain of criticism, as they think, but beneath which they quarrel like cats and dogs. It is the party shibboleth. Whispered in lowest tones by the remedialists—it is a precedent for legislation later; shouted in stentorian tones from the housetops by the anti-remedialists—it is an absolute negative of the principle of remedial legislation.

What is there to investigate? Do we require an investigation into the compacts? There are the documents—the confederation compact and the Manitoba compact. Read them, if you want to know what they mean. There are the pre-union rights, the privileges which everybody knows existed, though legally they are decided not to be, and we throw that out of the question. There were post-union rights and privileges. Are these not known. And they were taken away. The law of 1870 shows what was given, the law of 1890 shows what was taken away—and what now remains? "Scripta manent"—gather those and read them, if you want to know what was given and what was taken away and what remains. Does anybody doubt that? Not the Manitoba government surely. That government gave them, it took them away, and it gave its reasons. Not the courts. They heard the cases, fully investigated the facts, and gave their decisions. There is not a member of this Parliament who does not know the facts and who has not made up his mind with reference to it. There is not an intelligent Canadian who does not know the facts; the facts are sufficiently known without further investigation. What are the facts? There was a compact which, it was thought, secured the minority privileges, and the minority have not those privileges now. There were separate schools for the minority; there are none now. The taxes of the Catholic minority formerly went to support separate schools; they now go to the public schools, and besides this, the minority have to pay for their private schools. The minority had a share of the public funds; they have none now. They had denominational education then; they have not got it now. They had the selection of their own books and so forth then; now they have not. All these things are known. They are to be found in the books of the statutes; they are in the reports of the inspectors of schools; they are in the statistics of the schools; they are in the census returns: they are in the groupings of population. Appoint your commissioners, send them up there, let them in-investigate, and when they have done their work and come back, what will we have? We will simply have a collection of the very information which we have at hand to-day. A commission will not boil down all this information and put it into homeopathic pills, so that one can take two or three, and, without any effort on his part, have the whole information spread to his brain. There are the documents; they have to be examined. The investigating commission could only gather the documents which we have before us now, and lay them before you for examination. That is all. But my hon. friend who sits opposite me, says the Bill is a bad bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Worthless.

Mr. FOSTER. He says we want a good Bill, if we are to have any. Another gentleman says: You have given us the shadow but we want the substance. Another gentleman says it will produce law-suits. Most legislation does.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Bad legislation does.

Mr. FOSTER. What I want to say to the hon. gentleman is that this is simply trifling. The principle of remedial legislation is in that Bill as the gold is in the nugget.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very refractory gold.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be so, Sir. But the man who wants to get pure gold does not kick aside the nugget with its rough encasement, but he says: Let me have that and, with the help of others, I can refine it into the pure gold. The man who is in favour of remedial legislation accepts that Bill, and does his best in committee to make it as effective as he can, according to his views—I mean the man who is honestly in favour of it. It never has been heard of that a Bill which does not go as far as you wish it to go, but still embodies the principle you desire to have adopted should be kicked out by a motion for the six months' hoist, because it does not cover quite as much as you wish. If you are against remedial legislation, say so, and show it by your vote. If you are honestly in favour of remedial legislation, say so, adopt the principle of this Bill, and then go to work to make it as effective as possible.

Another objection is that this is our sixth session, and we have no right, constitutional or other, to legislate as is proposed. We have every right. The law of this country fixes the term of Parliament, a duration of a certain period—one session every year during that period and within that it is perfectly legal for us to act. We are within the strict letter of that law. More than that, Sir, there is no constitutional requirement which makes it necessary that a question like this should be submitted to the people. For this is not a new question.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend say it is? This is a question that had agitated this country for years, that was settled in the Confederation Act, and in the Manitoba Act. My hon. friend scored the hon. Secretary of State because he did not take the question of confederation before the people of Nova Scotia, and ask them to pass upon it. The hon. gentleman spoke in sublime forgetfulness of the fact that neither did the province of Ontario, nor the province of Quebec. The important time with reference to this matter was when it was being put in the bed-rock of the constitution. Then was the time for the people to have had a chance to state their convictions. They did discuss the whole question then, they accepted confederation, and we have loyally lived under it for twenty-nine years. We are now upon a specific case which grows out of this adopted constitution, and we have sufficient power to settle it. And our constituencies might well call us poltroons if we refused to deal with the question here to-day. The demon of discord is abroad blowing the winds of strife, say hon. gentlemen. And they get up, and with tears in their eyes, deplore this strife. And yet they want to throw this apple of discord into the general elections, and thus all the more inflame prejudices and passions. It is my belief that it is wise as well as constitutional to settle this question and take the responsibility before our constituents.

But, Sir, are these gentlemen opposite playing a part? I do not ask that in an offensive sense. Are they playing a part? Let us see. I think they are, and I submit my opinion. The stake that they are playing for, I know, and so do our friends here. They are playing for power. They are desperate players. I do not play myself, but I take leave to ask those who do a question. If they had been playing all night, and had been losing continually, and had got to the last cent they had in their pockets, would they not become desperate? Cards up their sleeves, cards in their laps, cards all around—anything to win. These hon. gentlemen have been out for over eighteen years. They have been playing for power and they have lost every time. Their last nickel is invested. If they are desperate players, can we wonder at it? Let me ask my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) is he playing a part. In 1893 he said in this House:

Can it be true, Mr. Speaker, that because the Parliament of Canada were unable to find a correct term to define the rights of the minority, this minority would have to be crushed under feet? Can it be true that the Crown in Canada has gone that far, that it would avail itself of a clause improperly drawn up to disregard and overlook the rights of the minority?

Again, in 1893, he said :

It is a censurable and a criminal manoeuvre, not only from the point of view of the minority who are now suffering, but also from the point of view of the general interests and the most dear to the country.

I throw aside party ties and I call upon the Government to preserve the rights confessedly granted to the minority by the constitutional charter.

It is our duty to defend them and to take every possible means offered to us by the law and constitution to preserve them inviolate.

Our only wish is that a principle of equal justice to all be applied ; that the compacts, the agreements made be respected by both parties.

The Catholic schools were abolished and instead of taking a firm stand, worthy of true statesmen, they refer the question to the courts of justice.

After a solemn compact, after arrangements were accepted by the majority guaranteeing the rights of the minority, without any notice being given, without any regard for the negotiations which took place these guarantees are thrown aside which protected the rights of the minority, and they would have us believe that Parliament is powerless to do justice to those who suffer.

One more. On January 29th, 1895, the hon. gentleman said :

I say that the position of the Catholic minority is no better as long as the present Government remain in power, for the reason that the members of that Government, and nearly all their supporters, have declared themselves for non-intervention.

How is it now ? May I ask my hon. friend from L'Islet, when the Government and the members of the Cabinet have staked their lives upon the principle of intervention ? Where is the hon. gentleman now ? He was not thirsting for information then. He had no doubts as to the grievances of the minority, as to the powers of Parliament, as to the duty of the Government. Did he say "Hands off Manitoba" ? No, but to Manitoba he said, "Hands off the minority." And to the Government he said, "Hands upon" that majority to compel hands off the minority. The veto is the club you should use. Strike ! thrust ! destroy ! What has become of the hon. member for L'Islet ? Was he right then ? If so, is he right now, or is he only playing a part ? Let me ask what was said by my hon. friend from Berthier, and we will have a contrast.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You will have a conference with him.

Mr. FOSTER. Not necessarily. His opinions are very frank and frankly given. Here they are :

In the third place, we contend that the time for disallowance having once expired, it was the duty of the Government to enact such remedial laws as were calculated to redress the grievances complained of by the Catholics of Manitoba, instead of resorting to various shifts and subterfuges, to avoid dealing with the just claims of the latter.

Again, my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) says :

I, for one, am ready to assume my own share of responsibility, and to give my support to any Government whose first article shall be the redress of the wrongs inflicted upon Manitoba. On the same ground, I would pledge myself to support no government whose programme would be to withhold from the Catholics of Manitoba the just treatment they are entitled to and which they are denied to-day.

Again he said :

On the other hand, should the hon. the Minister of justice pledge himself to adopt such remedial legislation as might be calculated to redress the grievances complained of, in accordance with his report of the 21st March, 1891. I am ready with a large number of my friends, from this side of the House, to lend him a loyal support, thus making up the loss of a few votes among his own friends, brought about by this honest course of action.

That was applauded by the leader of the Opposition, and every member of the party opposite, just as my hon. friend's (Mr. Tarte's) statements were applauded by the leader of the Opposition and every other member of the party who sits behind him. But let us take another, and that is the statement made by the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who spoke yesterday. At Bracebridge, on December 3rd, 1895, he is reported as follows :—

Mr. Charlton was received with loud applause. At the outset he accepted Mr. Bennett's challenge and declared that he would vote against remedial legislation next session if it were proposed, and every other session in which he should be a member and a proposition for the coercion of Manitoba should be introduced. He would do so because he believed that although it might be that the minority in Manitoba had suffered injury, it would be the worst kind of a remedy to shackle and bind a province in the control of its education.

Yet my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) speaking yesterday on those same lines, received the same Liberal applause from the hon. gentlemen sitting around him. Let us take another hon. gentleman who sits now in this House, but has not been here for a long time previously, I mean the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), who, when he speaks, will take the same line, and will get the same applause. At Goderich that hon. gentleman said :

First he gave an explicit declaration of his stand on the Manitoba school question. "I shall vote against the remedial order," he said, "I do not care who is Premier of Canada, or who is ruffing the country, I shall vote against coercing Manitoba, against taking her by the throat." He would, if necessary, be the only one to stand up single-handed for provincial rights. "Hands off Manitoba" was his watchword.

Now, Sir, all of these have been applauded. Which was right ? The one consistent utterance that I find amongst them is the utterance of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), with which I may couple the utterance of the hon. member for Ottawa

(Mr. Devlin), whose declarations of one or two years ago, square exactly with their declarations now. Now, let us go a little further. "Le Monde," a Liberal paper in Quebec, says :

Before the electors assembled at the Forfar Street and Ste. Etienne Street meetings, Mr. Mc-Shane declared himself for the re-establishment of the Catholic schools in Manitoba. "Good."

Sir William Hingston does not say anything. He is the candidate of the Orange administration that will give Catholics the shadow for the reality, that is to say, nothing at all.

The people's Jimmy has the courage of his opinions, and we congratulate him.

We shall see later whether we can join in these congratulations. Coming down to another province, what do we find? The "Globe" newspaper speaks as to what is going on in Quebec :

As to what is going on in Quebec, we believe that left to himself, the French Canadian citizen cares very little about the question of separate schools in the North-west ; but it is quite possible that he may be worked into a state of excitement by the appeals of politicians who will tell him that the French Canadians of Manitoba are being oppressed by the majority, that it is possible to coerce the majority from Ottawa, and that unless this is done the next point of attack by the "Protestant bigots" will be the customs, language and religion of the people of Quebec. Manitoba cannot be compelled to obey the mandate of Ottawa in educational matters, and the best service that can be rendered the people of Quebec at this juncture is to tell them plainly that the attempt at coercion must be futile.

And again the "Globe" says :

It will, sooner or later, appear that no course is open but to leave the legislature of Manitoba to manage the public education of the province, free from control or interference by any other authority in Canada.

Now, Sir, here are your different sets of opinions ; which are right? All are equally applauded by the party opposite. Why, Sir, am I not justified in saying that they are playing a farce? Take an audience in a theatre. They are facing the boards. The actor comes forward ; as clown, as tragedian, as comedian, he successively comes forward and receives an equal meed of applause, represented as black, or white, as Englishman or as Frenchman, as foreigner or as native—in each character, when he comes forward, he performs his part, and in each is equally applauded. That audience is there simply to be amused, and they are amusing themselves. Here the actors come forward. My hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and other hon. gentlemen, the one black, the other white, with opinions as diverse as the equator is different to the pole, and they are all equally applauded. What is the solution of it? They are simply amusing themselves, there is no principle in the matter. They are playing a part, and they are amusing themselves in the play.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. Speaker, I had intended to address a few words to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. He is not here to-day ; an inefficient substitute (Mr. Flint) I fear I must say, sits in his place ; but if he will take one message to his chief, I will be glad to send it. Let me take, then, the leader of the Opposition himself. In 1893 he said :

That while in all other matters the powers of the local legislature are almost independent, in the matter of education, a supervisory power has been given to this government, in so far as separate schools are concerned. Whatever privileges are guaranteed to one minority in a province I claim in the name of justice and fairness, for all minorities in all of the provinces.

Again, he said :

If the Supreme Court should decide that the Government have the power to interfere with the legislation of Manitoba, and the Government should not obey the legal mandate which they themselves had sought, there would be a powerful and a rightful agitation in some parts of the country against the Government.

He says again :

The Catholic minority has been subject to most infamous tyranny, if the statement is true as given by Archbishop Taché that Protestant schools are being continued under the guise of public schools, and that Roman Catholic children are forced under that law to attend what are in reality Protestant schools.

Again, he says, still later :

If he ever reached power, and he hoped the time was not far distant when that would become a fact, he had reason to believe that this question would be settled.

If the electors gave him such men as Mr. Charbonneau in Jacques Cartier, and Mr. Mc-Shane in Montreal Centre, and other Liberals of that stamp, it would put him in a position to handle this question.

We favour Christian education, but we want the parent to say which religion should be taught to their children.

The Manitoba Catholics were suffering an injustice now, because the Ottawa Government had not done its duty.

I can say that had I been in power I believe that the school question would now have been settled. The appeals by Archbishop Taché and Archbishop Langevin were not made to me, but give me the power and I will undertake to do justice, and come what may I can do no worse than the Government has done. If I fail to keep my promises you can take me and my friends and throw us into the St. Lawrence.

And so on as to the right and the duty. I might read endless quotations in the same line.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You are reading a very good speech.

Mr. FOSTER. I read them for this purpose only, to show that on the ground of the right of Parliament to interfere, on the ground of the duty of this Parliament to interfere, on the ground of a well established grievance suffered by the minority, the leader of the Opposition had declared over and over again that this party, led by the Government in power, have been insufficient, in that they did not redress that grievance, and did not remove that wrong; that if he had been in power he would have redressed that wrong, coupled with the assertion that he makes over and over again that his inmost belief is that the Catholics of Manitoba have a right to their separate schools, and that they should get those separate schools. All these, taken together, form a strong commentary on his position to-day, when the Government having introduced a measure for restoring those rights and removing that grievance, he meets it with a six months' hoist. Sir, this hon. gentleman has argued in favour of the veto, and he has argued against the veto. He has been against any delay and he has rated the Government for delay; yet to-day he is in favour of delay. He has said that investigation is necessary; and he has declared in this chamber that investigation is not necessary. In an exactly parallel case, what is his statement?

As you know, we have in Quebec no schools but religious schools—Roman Catholic schools and Protestant schools. Suppose the legislature of Quebec were to-morrow to abolish the system of separate schools existing there, so that the Protestant population would have either to send their children to the Roman Catholic schools or bring them up in ignorance or tax themselves a second time to establish schools of their own.

Sir, if under the circumstances, an appeal were brought to this Government, is there a man in this House who would not say at once to the Government: It is your bounden duty at once to interfere and make away with this obnoxious and tyrannical legislation.

There is an exactly parallel case here; but the hon. gentleman, with that declaration hot from his mouth, now affirms that we must have investigation and delay, and that remedial legislation must not be given, and he moves the six months' hoist.

The hon. gentleman made a speech at the opening of the debate, in reply to the Secretary of State, a speech that has been much lauded and much read; but a speech which, in my humble opinion, will not bear very much dissection. I wish to direct attention to three or four points in it. The first statement he made was that to proceed with this Bill and make it law

Would be a most violent wrench of the principles upon which our constitution is based.

And yet I have read to this House statement after statement in which the hon. gentleman acknowledged the undoubted right and jurisdiction of this Parliament to so legislate. How can you wrench the constitution by adopting action that is strictly within the powers which the constitution gives? The hon. gentleman went into a long disquisition as regards the excellence of the United States constitution, particularly on the line, that under the United States constitution the state legislation was not supervised by the federal legislation, and bitterness was therefore not imported in such questions there, and while lauding that feature of the United States constitution he called our own "a very great mistake." For what purpose? A minute afterwards he declared:

But the remedy of interference is found in the constitution, and being there it must be applied by them who love the constitution.

Why was he talking about the beauties of the United States constitution as distinguished from those of our own? We are not living under the United States constitution; and he himself when he came back to his subject had to discuss it in the light of the Canadian and not the United States constitution. Further on in his speech he said:

The minority have a right to have their own schools, that I admit.

If then we live under the Canadian constitution, if this constitution gives a remedy that should be applied, and if the minority have a right to their own schools, what then was the object of bringing the matter up at all? The hon. gentleman then went on to say that we must not force public opinion. He said:

It is the part of statesmanship not to force upon the people the views of any section, but to endeavour to bring them all to a uniform standard and conception of what is right.

And five minutes afterwards he came to the conclusion that a time would arrive, some time, when you must legislate, and you must legislate for the majority and against the minority. Again, he said that we were guilty of deception in the statement of the case which was submitted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, inasmuch as we asked their opinion upon a state of assumed facts. Does the hon. gentleman deny the facts? Does anybody deny the allegations in the petition? Does anybody deny the broad statement of facts gathered together as the basis of an appeal to the law courts and carried through court after court, being dissected by lawyers on both sides, to the highest court. This was a legal phrase: "assuming the material facts to be as stated therein," which in reality declared that the facts are not in dispute, and after the criticism of counsel, the judgment of the Privy Council was given on them.

But at last the hon. gentleman tried to play the role of a martyr. He said that some one in ecclesiastical authority had written that if he would not vote for remedial legislation, he would subject himself to the animadversion of the church. I have not seen any Catholic mandament, no one has seen it; but if every man is to make himself a martyr who receives a vigorous letter intimating that if he does not vote so and so on this question, he will have to meet with opposition from different sources, there are a great many martyrs on this side of the House, and a great many martyrs on that side of the House. There are ecclesiastical opinions, and ecclesiastical opinions, and there are also opinions which are not ecclesiastical, but which are being manufactured against us in the country and brought to bear on every independent member. We might all make ourselves martyrs if we wished to become martyrs every time we received a strong letter or strong resolution threatening us with pains and penalties if we did not do thus and so.

One word more, if you please, Mr. Speaker, and that is a word to the Conservatives in this House and outside of the House. My word to the Conservatives is simply this: For eighteen years we have supported a certain policy; we have given to it our means, we have given to it our energies, we have worked out that policy in the country, and we have during these eighteen years affirmed our full faith in the effects of that policy and its superiority to any other policy. For eighteen years we have seen progress and development in this country under that policy and under the administration of the Liberal-Conservative party, and we believe that a continuation on the same lines is the best for the future of this country. You see the compacts of 1867 and 1870 and know how they arose. They are written into the constitution, they face your Government as well as yourselves. They would have tested any Government that had been in power. You see the appeal, the decision, the grievance, the power of restitution defined by the highest court of the land. That highest court has remitted to your Government, which you have supported, a question which was not asked for by them; a something which arises out of the constitution, and by circumstances over which they have no control, this question was thrown upon them for solution. Are there not other portions of the Liberal-Conservative policy of some importance as well as this? Is it not well for Conservatives in this House, and outside of this House, to take the broader, and greater, and wider interests into consideration, and, at the same time, to ask themselves whether it is worth while, for a point of well-held sentiment, for a point, may be, even, of well-held principle on a single position, to go against the party and the policy which they have supported for eighteen years, and which they believe has been the best party and policy, and is to-day the best party and policy for this country.

You see the Liberal party utterly discredited in the country. You see that party without any policy which can appeal to the business interests and the solid common sense of the electors of Canada. You see that Liberal party to-day, marching up to a test before the people of this country, and their whole hope of victory—I say it earnestly and honestly—is that they may get into power, not because of the strength of their own arms and batteries, but because they hope for some desertions from the citadel of their opponents, which shall sally out to their help, and enable them to take the position to which they aspire.

What answer is it to the country's best interests, if we go back to them with a defeated policy and a defeated Government; putting into power a policy and a Government in which we do not believe, but which we do believe will not be for the best interests of Canada. If we have nothing to place against such action but this one question, upon which we hold honest beliefs, may be, can we not to some certain extent, subordinate one opinion, strong though it be, for the greater good, the larger policy, the more valuable and the more precious interests of the whole. What will it have profited us, even if we gain a point of sentiment or of principle in one respect; what will it have profited us, if we lose the soul of a progressive policy and a wise administration of affairs.

After six years, Sir, we stand here under circumstances such as I have detailed. What is it, then, for this Parliament to do? On the one hand, there is a well-founded repugnance to interfere, and do what, even though clearly within our right to do, the province can do more easily and far better than ourselves. There is along with that a number of subordinate reasons arising, either from considerations of principle or of personal concern, or of party interest, that tend to induce some to vote against this Bill and against remedial legislation.

On the other hand, what is there? There is the genius and spirit of the constitutional compacts of this country. There is the splendid lesson of toleration and of compromise which has been read to you in that constitution, and which has been evidenced in its harmonious workings for nearly thirty years. There is the cry of the minority, small in the area of those who directly suffer, but large, let me tell you, in the area of those who sympathize with it in this country from one end to the other. There are the minorities in other provinces demanding of you where they shall stand, and how they shall be treated, if in future years their time of trial comes, and they will have to appeal to this same high court of Parliament, and invoke this same jurisdiction. There is the Parliament, Sir, invested, knowingly, definitely, positively invested by the fathers of confederation in the constitution with the jurisdiction to maintain these rights, and to restore them if they are taken away. This Parliament is appealed to. It is watched by Canada, it is watched by the world. On grounds of courage, on grounds of justice, on grounds of good faith, make your answer to those who appeal, make your answer to Canada which is watching you, and to the world which will judge of your actions.

History, Sir, is making itself in these eventful days. Shall the chapter be a record of nobleness and adequacy, or a record of weakness and inefficiency? Shall we stamp ourselves as petty and provincial, or shall we be recorded to future ages as magnanimous and imperial? Let us plant our feet in the firm paths of constitutional compact and agreement, of good faith, and of honest, fair dealing. Let us take and pass on that gleaming torch of prudent compromise under whose kindly light the fathers of confederation marched safely through in times far more troublous and far less advanced than ours, into an era of harmony and continued peace.

Let us do justice to a weak and patient minority, and thus settle for ever the question of the sufficiency of the guarantees of confederation. Let us follow with cheerful emulation the shining example of our great mother country, whose foundations were laid on the solid granite of good faith, and whose world-wide and wondrous superstructure has been joined together with the cement of a strong and generous toleration.

Let us prove ourselves now, in the thirtieth years of our existence, as in the stress of our natal days, a people fit for Empire, and worthy to rank amongst the best and greatest of nations.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CANADIAN JOCKEY CLUB.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 48) respecting the Canadian Jockey Club.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. TISDALE. I move to amend this by providing that the affairs of the club shall be administered by a club committee instead of by a board of directors.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 4,

Mr. TISDALE. I wish to move to amend this section by striking out subsection 2, and inserting the following:—

2. The club committee shall consist of twelve members of the club and shall be elected as members of the club committee by the shareholders annually at the annual general meeting of the club to be held on the last Wednesday in the month of May in each year, and in addition to that number each duly incorporated racing company and club throughout Canada being the owner or lessee of a race track, and each duly incorporated hunt club throughout Canada, upon affiliation with the club shall be entitled to have one member on the club committee, which member shall be elected or appointed in such manner as each such racing company or club or hunt club shall decide on or before the date of the said annual meeting in each year, and each such racing company or club or hunt club may become so affiliated upon giving to the club a written notice to that effect and upon the payment of the regular fees and upon complying with all such general regulations of the club as may be in force in respect to affiliation, provided that if any affiliated club be at any time expelled it shall not again be entitled to affiliation, except with the consent of at least three-fourths of the whole committee.

3. The next club committee shall be elected in the manner above provided on or before the last Wednesday in the month of May, 1896.

4. If at any time the election of that portion of the club committee to be elected by the shareholders of the club is not made at the proper time, or if for any cause the annual general meeting of the club shall not be held on the appointed date, neither the club nor the committee shall be held to be thereby dissolved, but such general meeting and such election may take place at any time subsequent appointed by the club committee of which due notice shall have been given, and the shareholders of the club on such committee shall continue in office until their successors are elected.

5. Provided, and it is hereby enacted, that the club committee may by by-law passed by a two-thirds vote change the date of the annual meeting of the club.

Mr. MARTIN. I have previously taken objection to this clause. There seems to be no good reason at all why in a club of this kind there should be such a thing as stock. I understand this to be a club for the purpose or regulating races. To its general objects I have no objection whatever. It seems to be an association similar to the Medical Association, the Law Society, or any other of the numerous associations that we have for the purpose of regulating particular trades or professions. In none of these societies is such a thing as stock known. It would not be tolerated, for instance, in the Medical Society, that a certain number of doctors should be allowed to subscribe for a certain amount of stock, and in consideration thereof should have representation on the club committee. That would be considered absurd; and I have yet to hear a reason why this course is adopted in regard to this association. There seems to be no reason for it whatever. In order that it should be successful, its management should be representative. What do these directors represent? They represent only $550. There is no reason why the affairs of the club should not be conducted as the affairs of other associations are, by a committee appointed by the different affiliated clubs. By this Bill, each affiliated club has a representative on the committee; but in addition to these there are twelve members who represent nothing, but who are elected by the shareholders. Why should there be shareholders in an institution of this kind? It has been suggested that it is a necessity of having some one to start the club and manage its affairs until the different clubs can be affiliated with it. If that be the reason, let it be confined to that, and let these twelve men hold office only until such time as there are a certain number, say twelve or fifteen clubs affiliated. As it is, they may go on for all time, and the shareholders will have the right of electing the twelve members, who will have really the balance of power. Take the very case referred to in this section. If a club is expelled from the association, it requires three-fourths of the members of the committee to restore it. For what reason should they have such power in the affairs of an association like this? I cannot understand it. It has been suggested that, because this club was incorporated under letters patent; the Joint Stock Companies Act referred to it, and it was necessary to have directors. Well, we have changed that, and the affairs of the club are to be managed by a committee. It has been suggested that it is necessary to have the provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act applied to this club. I say no. The provisions of the Joint Stock Companies Act are intended to regulate the affairs of commercial companies. This club is not engaged in any money making business. Its business is the general affairs of the association, just as that of the controlling board of the medical profession or the dental, or any other profession. So that, I object very strongly, indeed, to this proposition to hand over such a large share of control of an association which is to be representative. This will practically force every racing association in Canada, including that in Winnipeg, into its ranks, because, while the provisions of this Bill are not imperative, they practically become so, if the association is going to become a success. If the racing men of Canada determine to make this association a success, it will become necessary for every racing club in Canada to become an affiliated part of it. Why twelve gentlemen, living in Toronto and Montreal, who have collectively subscribed a sum of $550 to this association, should for all time to come have twelve votes on the club committee, as something for which there is no warrant or reason whatever, especially, when we consider the fact, that these twelve men came here and asked for powers so outrageous and absurd that the committee would not consider them for a moment. The moment the search-light of criticism was turned upon them, these powers had to be abandoned. It seems to me, that it is very material, that we should keep the affairs of the association fairly representative, and prevent these particular persons getting the very strong control which the present provisions give them.

Mr. TISDALE. There are two very good reasons that ought to satisfy the hon. gentleman. First of all, these amendments were agreed to at a meeting representing all of the clubs of Ontario and Quebec, perhaps a couple of hundred, altogether. In addition to that, they are approved by the representatives of the Horse Breeding Association of Ontario. These clauses are perfectly satisfactory to the whole of them. In addition to that, this Act confirms the letters patent and the powers given under letters patent to the twelve gentlemen mentioned, which powers it is necessary they should have for the business management and success of the association. It is not intended that there should be, nor will there be, any money in it; but we all know that an association like this must be put on a business basis, and for that reason it is brought under the clauses of the Companies' Act. Any amendment that would interfere with that, would interfere with the whole scope and object of the Bill, and require the whole thing to be recast. I confess, that I do not believe I am as competent to judge in this matter as the horse-breeding associations are, and when these associations have agreed upon this Bill, I think we are quite safe in adopting it. It is only fair to say, that the names of these twelve gentlemen are recognized by all horsemen and breeders of horses throughout the country as being names of the highest respectability and as being the names of men, many of whom have invested a great many thousand pounds in horses. These gentlemen desire to have no power, except what is satisfactory to the racing and horse-breeding associations. It was with that object, and that alone, that they inaugurated the association by letters patent, and not out of any desire to acquire any power which they did not feel was absolutely necessary for carrying out this object. It is true, that some of the clauses were of a nature which these gentlemen did not expect would be granted to them, but they were put in to promote discussion, to induce the horsemen and horsebreeders to discuss the whole matter. The whole matter was discussed by those interested, and it is the consensus of their opinion, that this Bill should become law.

Mr. MARTIN. With regard to the point made by the hon. gentleman, that the horsemen have agreed to this, of course, that has great force; but, so far as the horsemen of my locality are concerned, they have not agreed to it, and, in the absence of any reasons given for this feature of the Bill, it is possible, that it was not brought before the horsemen. I do not consider, that any argument has been advanced to show, that the Joint Stock Companies Act should be applied to this association. That Act is not applied to the Law Society or the medical profession. This is not an association for trading purposes. There is really no business to be done by this association. All it has to do, is to make provisions for registering horses and racing, and so forth, and that does not require the application of the provisions of the Joint Stock Act. And, in the absence of any reasons why the horsemen at this meeting to which the hon. gentleman refers, were induced to assent to these provisions, I am not able to attach the same degree of importance to what the hon. gentleman has said, as I otherwise would.

Section agreed to.

Mr. DICKEY. At the request of the Ontario government, I desire to add a clause as follows :—

Constables and police officers appointed under the laws of this Dominion or any province shall, at all times, on duty, have access to the race tracks and grounds of the club or of any club affiliated with it, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the laws in connection with racing, betting or otherwise, are duly observed, or for the purpose of enforcing the due observance of those laws.

Mr. TISDALE. I have no objection.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the promoter of this Bill if this club is permitted to have a race ground? That would apply rather, I should think, to the affiliated clubs. But this amendment refers to the race grounds of the club. If this club is to govern the race tracks, it surely is not intended that they should own a race track. That would be an invidious thing.

Mr. TISDALE. I have no objection to the proposed amendment. As I understand it, the Ontario government wish it, and it is in the right direction.

Mr. MARTIN. What I object to is allowing them to have a race track. I think they should be confined to the tracks of affiliated clubs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think there can be no objection to the clause. There can be no necessity for it, as the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) points out. The tracks are those of the clubs affiliated with this jockey club, which only exists for the purpose of regulating racing, and has nothing whatever to do with controlling the grounds themselves. If they should have one they would have the same powers as they have now on the associated tracks.

Mr. DICKEY. I understand that the Ontario government asked this to be put in because their power to enter these tracks had been challenged, and they wished to have any doubts settled. As to the objection raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg, I think it is well to provide for the possible contingency of this club owning a track. I do not think that this clause would give them power to acquire a track.

Mr. EDGAR. Do I understand the hon. member moving the Bill to say that the club is to own any tracks?

Mr. TISDALE. I do not say that they are to own any tracks. It would be for the club committee to decide as to that. There is no reason that I can see why they should not own a track if they see fit.

Mr. EDGAR. Section 5 in several subsections speaks of the "race track or tracks of the club," as well as of the affiliated clubs.

Mr. TISDALE. It does not follow that they are to have a track. This Bill was made satisfactory to all those interested.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not before notice this feature of the Bill. It seems to me it would be an objection to the whole scheme if this club is to own a race track. They are merely a body appointed to control race tracks, and it seems to me they should be prohibited from owning one.

Mr. TISDALE. Almost every member of the committee, probably, will be the president of a local club. If they see fit, I do not see why they should not have a track. I believe the New York Jockey Club do own a track or two.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, no.

Mr. TISDALE. At all events this club is controlled by the members of the different associations. And they were all satisfied with the shape in which this Bill was put. They know their own business, as I said, better than I do. It seems to me that if we attempt to curtail the authority which was quite satisfactory to these gentlemen who understand the matter, in trying to do good—if we are trying to do good—we might do harm. I prefer to leave it as it is.

Mr. SPROULE. It does seem to me most undesirable that we should give this club power or powers to own a track. Take subsection B of section 5, which gives them power to regulate :

The number, duration, time and period of all race meetings to be held on the race track or tracks of the club, and on the race track or tracks of any incorporated company or club affiliated with the club.

If they intend to make a close corporation, and get hold of a sufficient number of clubs, they might control the racing of the country. This might be very detrimental to some outside clubs that wished to affiliate with them. I do not see why they should wish to control tracks of their own.

Mr. EDGAR. In the schedule of the Act we find the letters patent, the charter already held by the club. The powers given under these letters patent include :

The investigating, ascertaining and keeping a record of the pedigree of horses, the instituting, maintaining, controlling and publishing of a Stud Book or Book of Registry of Horses in Canada, the promoting and holding of exhibitions for the purpose of improving the breed of horses, the holding of contests, race meetings and other exhibitions of horses, the acquiring and maintaining of grounds and premises for the purposes of the club.

That, I take it, gives them the right to hold race meetings and to own grounds and premises for that purpose.

Amendment agreed to, and Bill as amended reported.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 81) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Alberta Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, the generous measure of applause which greeted the Finance Minister when he resumed his seat this afternoon indicated that at least a large portion of his followers in this House were well satisfied with his forensic effort. And I am free to say, Sir, that, as an elocutionary effort it deserves no small praise. The manner in which it was delivered, the voice, the diction, the emphasis given to the several sentences, were deserving of admiration. But when one comes to examine calmly and coolly into the propositions which the hon. gentleman asked this House to support, when one comes to analyse quietly the gist of the speech to find out what the speaker was attempting to prove and what arguments he advanced to prove it, there comes upon one an intense feeling of disappointment.

As a speech to be delivered upon a public platform, what is called a stump speech, in which a large amount of claptrap necessarily must find place, I think the speech of the hon. gentleman would be entitled to very high praise, indeed. But, Sir, I venture to say that to those cool and calm members of Parliament who desire to inform their minds clearly and distinctly upon the important and grave issues which they are called upon to decide, very little comfort can be found in that speech. The hon. gentleman commenced by telling us in a casual kind of way, that after all said and done, the issue was not so very important, and that it was rather a trivial matter; and he wound up with telling us, not like Napoleon told his troops, that forty centuries looked down upon them, but that the eyes of the world were centred upon the vote which this Parliament was about to give. The hon. gentleman told us, in opening, that the question of separate schools was not an issue here at all, that it was imbedded in the constitution itself, and could not be eradicated; and then the hon. gentleman went on to say that we had a right in approaching this question, to brush to one side altogether the question of provincial rights, and the question of precedents, so far as they might affect the other provinces of the Dominion, and the question of separate schools. But, notwithstanding that in his exordium he asked us to brush these important matters all to one side, seventenths of the hon. gentleman's speech was taken up with endeavouring to show that this was not an invasion of provincial rights, that this was not a bad precedent for Parliament to adopt; and that separate schools themselves were excellent things, which had the approval of very distinguished men, and should receive the approval of both sides of this House. Sir, I could have pardoned the hon. gentleman if he has spared me at least that homily which he delivered upon the necessity of public men keeping good faith towards those with whom they were associated. He told us that the observance of good faith was absolutely essential to social, commercial, national, but he had the courage to omit, political, welfare. Sir, this comes from an hon. gentleman who, twelve months ago, joined the ranks of a Premier who was forming a Cabinet, pledged his honour and good faith to deal squarely, honestly, and above-board, with that Premier, and spent twelve months in undermining the Premier he had sworn to defend, and uphold, and after he had agreed upon the Governor's speech to be submitted to Parliament, and had himself placed his name on the paper to move its adoption, suddenly constituted himself the chief of what was termed by his Premier, a nest of traitors, resigned his place in the Government, tried to assassinate his chieftain, by poignarding him in the back, and was thus guilty of the blackest treachery that any public man has ever shown towards his chief in this or any other country. And after vainly endeavouring to destroy the chieftain he had sworn to support, he crawled back into office for the purpose of obtaining his salary and appointment, which he now holds at the beck and will of a gentleman he practically declared was an imbecile, and unfit to lead a Government. For that hon. gentleman to read this House a homily upon good faith, is a little too much for me to stand.

Sir, the hon. gentleman, at any rate, has a certain amount of courage. He did not scruple in this House to-day to defend a political outrage committed in this country some twenty-five years ago, which few other public men have ever had the hardihood to speak in defence of. The leader of the Opposition, in his remarks the other day, referred to the ill effects which flowed from a policy of coercion towards any particular province, and to the good effects which flowed from conciliation and fair treatment to the people. And he pointed out the effect of confederation in Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick, and the different effect which a different policy had in the province of Nova Scotia. He showed, Sir, that in the province of New Brunswick, the question had been fairly and honestly submitted to the people, and the people, having had a chance to pass judgment upon it, had loyally submitted to the effect of their verdict ever since; while in the adjoining province of Nova Scotia, where the opposite policy was adopted, there is rankling in the breast of every elector who was then living, and is living still, a feeling of resentment and hatred towards confederation, which a quarter of a century has not served to eradicate. That hon. gentleman now comes forward to-day and justifies that action by saying that the same policy was pursued in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Why, Sir, he ought to know, as every one else knows, that in the province of Ontario and Quebec, the leading public men and the several parties were united upon this great policy of confederation, and were backed up by an enormous majority of the people. There was not, I am told, from the great province of Ontario, a single petition laid upon the Table against it; whereas, in Nova Scotia, from one end of that province to the other, the people rose up almost in practical rebellion against the measure. But during the last hours of a dying Parliament, by means alone known to those who carried it, a majority of the people's representatives were obtained, against the will of the people, and in violation of their understood pledges, to destroy the old constitution of Nova Scotia, and to force this new measure down the throats of the people against their will. The result has been, as I said before, that to this day you cannot travel through any single part of that great province without finding in the hearts of the people who then were electors, the bitterest feeling against confederation, caused, not by confederation itself, but caused by the dastardly way in which it was forced upon them.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in addressing himself to what he thought was the question before the House, indulged in a style of argument which I think is hardly creditable to a man occupying his high position. The hon. gentleman read here by the hour scrap-book quotations showing what this public man said many years ago, and what he said afterwards; and how there was this inconsistency and that inconsistency. Sir, I think we should have got beyond that style of debating on this great and grave question. It is not a question of whether Mr. A. has been strictly consistent, or whether Mr. B. has been strictly consistent; no doubt each of them would be able to show, if occasion required, that there was no inconsistency between the two statements quoted. But I say that scrap-book quotations are not the arguments that we require when we are approaching a question which his leader designated the other day as one of the most transcendent importance that had ever engaged the attention of this Parliament since confederation. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman referred to the great debates which took place in the old Parliament of Canada, known as the confederation debates, to statements which were made in those debates by leading public men as to their intentions with regard to the school question, and the question of education in the two larger provinces of the Dominion. He quoted from Sir Alexander

Galt, and from Mr. Sandfield Macdonald, and other leading men, to show that there was an understanding at that time, an understanding firmly come to before the Bill passed, that in the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec this question of education should be settled once for all; and that that understanding resulted in a compact being come to whereby the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec and the Catholic minority in the province of Ontario were to be secured in certain educational rights.

With what object were these speeches quoted? I have sat for thirteen or fourteen years in this House; I have been a pretty constant and assiduous reader of the newspaper press, and I never yet heard any public man in his place in this House, nor have I ever known any one of the leading newspapers of the country, assert that the solemn compact entered into at that time with respect to the rights of the minorities of Ontario and Quebec, as regards education should be interfered with. Why, we know, and every one knows, that the rights which were granted to those minorities were assured to them by compact contained in the British North America Act, which it is not within the power of either the legislature of Ontario, or the legislature of Quebec to contravene, abridge, or interfere with. We know, that, if the province of Ontario attempted to-day to pass a law which would abridge in any respect the pre-union educational rights of the Roman Catholics, as secured to them by the Confederation Act, that Act would be held by the courts to be ultra vires. It would not require an intervention by this Parliament, it would not require any assistance from politicians, it would be outside of the power of the legislature to attempt it, for the rights of the minority were secured, not by this or that political party, but by the constitution itself, and the courts would interpret and enforce the constitution. The hon. gentleman spent some time in showing, or attempting to show, that the Protestant minority in Quebec held the rights which they enjoy to-day, by some such compact as he says exists with Manitoba, and that, if the rights of the Protestant minority there were interfered with, there would be an uprising of the members of this House to enforce coercion on that province and compel them to keep the compact. The hon. gentleman did not hesitate to impute a dishonest motive to members of this House, in being animated by a desire to keep the compact as far as regards Protestants and annihilate it and repudiate it as regards Catholics. So far as I am concerned, I say that such an accusation is deserving of no other answer than silent contempt. I do not believe there are any hon. members surrounding the hon. gentleman, or sitting on this side of the House, who would be found so base and regardless of honour and of the highest motives which should prompt and control public men as to be willing to give one measure of justice to the Roman Catholics of Manitoba and another measure of justice to the Protestants of Quebec. The Protestants in Quebec to-day hold their educational rights, not by virtue of any post-union legislation. The separate schools which are enjoyed to-day in that province were enjoyed by the Protestants there before confederation ever took place.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) All I have to tell the hon. gentleman is, that, if he says "no," he cannot have read the statutes.

Mr. MASSON. The rights enjoyed by the Protestants of Quebec to-day depend entirely on the Act of 1869. Those existing before that time, were condemned by the Protestants as being only rights in name.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The only change made with respect to the educational rights of the Protestants of Quebec, was a change made with respect to the Board of Education, giving them a separate board; but the right to separate schools and the existence of separate schools, and the choosing of the books on morals and religion were rights which they acquired and held before confederation, and are not in any way derived from, or attributable to, post-union legislation. I affirm, that the legislature of Quebec has no legal right to interfere in the slightest degree with those rights, any more than the legislature of Ontario has a right to interfere with the pre-union minority rights of Roman Catholics in that province. Sir, it should be so. That was a solemn compact agreed to between the two great provinces of the Dominion. It would be a gross violation, a violation so gross that no honest man would stand up and defend it, if any legislature were to try and break that compact; I do not believe there are to be found in this House, or out of it, a dozen men who would justify such a breach. But why are we anticipating anything of that kind? Has anybody, any public man in the legislature of Quebec, attempted to take away from the Protestants the rights which they enjoy under the Confederation Act? I never heard of it, nor do I believe there are any persons in Quebec who would desire to do it, nor do I believe that there can be found any one who will propose a measure depriving the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario of the rights which the constitutional compact of the union gives them.

An hon. MEMBER. How about Mr. Marter?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not know about Mr. Marter or Mr. Meredith having desired to do so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

An hon. MEMBER. Mr. Marter admitted it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I draw a broad distinction between post-union and pre-union rights. Rights given after confederation stand on a very different footing; they can be taken away by the legislature, subject only to the right of appeal to the Government and this Parliament. But what I want to lay down is this, and it is an incontrovertible proposition, which should be understood in this House and out of it, that the pre-union educational rights of a minority in a province cannot be interfered with by any legislation. Therefore, all the time taken up by the Minister of Finance to show that there was this compact with respect to Manitoba, by which statement he endeavoured to arouse a feeling of danger in the minds of Protestants and Catholics, was time wasted, and was a dangerous exercise of demagogic argument, to which the hon. gentleman should not have descended. I think, if we get into our minds that one fact, we will approach one step nearer to the real question which this House has to determine; and I beg to say just here, that the remarkable agility, the wonderful power displayed by the hon. gentleman this afternoon, in evading the only issue which is before the House, excited my wonder and my admiration. For two hours and a half, he thundered out here, talking about breach of faith, talking about compacts; talking about bills of rights, talking about appeals, talking about what this man said, and that man said, and the other man said, and constantly, and continuously, and persistently, avoiding the only issue which this House is called upon to decide, and upon which the electors we represent will in a short time be called upon to vote. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) spoke of the negotiations which took place in Manitoba, and he quoted certain assurances which he alleged were given to the original inhabitants of Manitoba, which in some way, he desired the House to understand, afforded some argument—how I do not know—for a decision, one way or the other, upon this question. Now, Sir, what were these assurances? The assurances he read, were general assurances that they would be protected in their religious exercises, and privileges, and that their franchises were to be respected. Sir, has there been any attempt to interfere with these? The rights which they possessed before confederation have been decided upon by an authority, which even the Minister of Finance must respect, although he tried to ignore it. I heard a great deal of talk from him this afternoon about the highest judicial tribunal of the Empire, about the independence of that tribunal, about the weight that ought to be attached to any judgment that tribunal gave, and I subscribe to every statement he made in that regard. But, Sir,

I ask him : what was the decision of the Privy Council of the Empire with respect to the alleged educational rights which these people held at the time of confederation, and which he tried to lead the House to believe had been invaded ? What was the judgment of the Privy Council in that regard ? We may agree with that judgment or we may not. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) quotes the opinion of the Hon. Wm. Macdougall as to what he thought was intended by the Act. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) quotes the opinion of somebody else, as to what he thought was intended by the Act, and he quotes the motion made by Mr. Oliver, in the House, at the time the Manitoba Act was going through. What has all that to do with it ? The Privy Council have taken the educational code to be found in the Manitoba Act, and they have on appeal determined, that these alleged religious privileges and exercises and franchises, have not been interfered with, directly or indirectly, by the School Act of 1890. Now, Sir, that has been absolutely determined by the highest tribunal of the Empire, in language which cannot be misunderstood. One would suppose, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), who professes so much respect and regard for the decision of that tribunal, would have been prepared to accept that judgment. But instead of that, he asked this House to do—what ? To go behind that judgment, and to overrule that decision ; to decide this question on the ground, that there were rights, although the Privy Council determined there were none ; to decide this question on the ground that there were privileges, although the Privy Council determined that none were invaded ; and to decide this question upon the ground that there were guarantees given, although the Privy Council determined that the guarantees did not exist. Sir, I ask the House now, in gauging the weight which is to be attached to any single argument or quotation made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), as to what was said at the time of confederation, as to what was intended by one man or the other ; I ask hon. gentlemen this question : has not the Privy Council of England in the decision they gave on the constitutionality of the Act of 1890, finally, and for ever, determined beyond the possibility of argument, what these rights were ? Whatever we may think ourselves, I ask : is it honest for a public man to try and lead this Parliament to legislate on the assumption, that the judgment of the Privy Council was an incorrect and a false judgment ?

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) spoke in the same way, about certain bills of right. What did he mean by referring to these bills of rights. Sir, he either meant to lead this House to believe that there was something in these bills of rights guaranteeing to the Roman Catholic minority separate schools or educational privileges ; or his references to them were entirely irrelevant.

What did he mean ? If there is a bill of rights, pledging the honour of the Crown to these people, if there is a constitutional compact in any bill of rights by which the honour of the Crown is pledged to maintain separate schools or educational privileges, which have been withdrawn ; then, I say, let us have an inquiry and have that examined. I venture to say, Sir, that if on that inquiry, a compact is proved, and if the honour of the Crown is pledged, there will not be many men found on either side of the House who will be prepared to withhold their influence, so as to restore these privileges back to them. And, Sir, why is this quoted now by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) ? Was it quoted before the Privy Council ? Did not the Privy Council finally and for ever determine, that all the rights which the minority had on the question of education in Manitoba, must be found in the educational code of the Manitoba Act, and not outside of it ? Did not they determine, in one or other of the judgments, that even the British North America Act itself has no reference whatever to the educational rights of the people there, and that they have to be determined solely and simply by the Manitoba Act ? Sir, if that is so, why go back and make a general reference to negotiations said to have taken place before confederation, or to a bill of rights said to have been submitted, or to assurances given by one man or the other. If the highest tribunal of the Empire has decided that these must not be looked to, and that you must take your legal and constitutional stand upon the consideration of the words of the legislative enactment contained in the Manitoba Act, what is the use of referring to outside issues.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me for a moment. If I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) correctly, he stated, that if the bill of rights No. 4, or any bill of rights on behalf of the people of Manitoba, contained express stipulations for the safeguard of these educational privileges, that then there would be no objection to remedial legislation. Am I right in that ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman explain then, because it occurred to me as an important statement.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will see, that if there was a bill of rights guaranteeing separate schools, we would have no power by remedial legislation to give them. Our power under the remedial legislation clause, is strictly confined, as the hon. gentleman as a lawyer well knows, to post-union rights.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman

(Mr. Davies) in that line of his argument at all. It was only as to what I understood him to say in discussing this question of a compact. I understood him to say, that if it were found that a compact had preceded the Manitoba Act, under which there was an agreement, whether in a bill of rights or in some other document, that these rights should be safeguarded; then there would be no difference between us, I understood him to say.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What I said was: if on inquiry it was found there was a bill of rights to which the honour of the Crown was pledged, granting to these people educational privileges, it must enormously influence the voice of public opinion throughout this Dominion in determining that these rights should be guaranteed in their integrity. I know it would very largely influence my opinion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) opposes the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But, not on this Bill, as I pointed out to the hon. gentleman. Why, it is trifling with the House, and trifling with every lawyer who has ever studied the question, to say that because there might or might not be ante-union pledges or guarantees that would afford any argument whatever, or confer any power whatever on this House to grant remedial legislation under the second subsection of the Act. That comes under another power altogether, to which I will refer directly. But, talking of the influence that such a compact must necessarily have on public opinion, it is perfectly plain to my mind, and I think it will strike many thousands of other minds in the same way, that if you can show that these people were lured, so to speak, into this union with Canada on a bill of rights guaranteeing certain educational privileges to them, and that the credit of the Crown was pledged to that, it must necessarily largely influence public opinion in compelling whatever legislation is necessary for the concession of those rights to them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is no doubt about that. But, Sir, who dares to say that to-day? Where is the evidence to be found that any such bill of rights exists? It is denied. It is asserted, perhaps, by some, though I do not know that anybody in this House is prepared to assert it. I saw it asserted in a pamphlet which some one did me the honour of sending me. But I saw it denied in another pamphlet. It did not appear in evidence before the Canadian Privy Council; it is not in evidence before this House; and it would be a monstrous thing to ask this House to accept as true what has never yet been proved and has never yet been investigated. But what I do say is that if any hon. gentleman can show prima facie that such a bill of rights exists, he will have afforded the strongest argument in favour of a thorough investigation into this subject that has yet been presented.

The hon. gentleman went on to argue that the Senate of Manitoba had been abolished, but that certain pledges were given that there was to be no oppression of the minority, and that their rights were to be protected. Well, supposing that is so, I do not understand that it has any weight or influence or bearing on the particular question before this House. I do not understand Sir, that the question whether some gentleman in the Senate of Manitoba made a general statement that there was to be no oppression of the minority affords any ground, constitutional or legal, for this Parliament passing a coercion Bill without investigation, and forcing it upon that province.

The hon. gentleman asked who introduced this question into Canadian politics for the first time? And he pointed to the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and held him up as a culprit. He told us that this confederation had gone for twenty-five or thirty years, and that heretofore never had such a question as this roused up race and religious passions until the hon. member for Winnipeg had introduced this question in Manitoba. Is that the truth? Why, Sir, I am old enough to remember when the present Mr. Justice King introduced into the legislature of New Brunswick a national school Bill; when that measure was said to interfere with minority rights in New Brunswick, just as this Bill of 1890 is said to interfere with minority rights in Manitoba, when that question was dragged into the arena of Dominion politics, and for years constituted a menace to the peace and prosperity of New Brunswick and the rest of the Dominion—and, as I am reminded by one of my hon. friends, it was brought into this House by a member of the present Government. I would like to say, Sir, that fortunately for the peace, prosperity and happiness of the minority in the province of New Brunswick, that hon. gentleman's efforts to force the will of this House upon that province were frustrated. Fortunately for the minority of that province, the people there were allowed to settle this question themselves; and the good sense, the magnanimity, and the sense of justice and fair-play, which I am proud to say permeates every class of people in this Dominion, impelled the people of New Brunswick to give such a measure of justice and fair-play to the minority there that to-day in that great province not a man can be found to stand up and utter a protest against the national school system of the province. There are those who contend too much has been conceded to the minority, but the minority do not and cannot complain. Sir, what would have been the case had this abominable principle of coercion been introduced then? What would have been the case if the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) had then been listened to, and his advice taken, and this Parliament had interfered and forced upon that province a separate school system? Would the minority there be in the full enjoyment of the rights they enjoy to-day? No, Sir; instead of peace, he would have brought a sword, and he would have rent that fine and fair province from one end to the other.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) quoted a sentence from the report of a very eminent educationist in this country, Dr. Grant, as showing, in his opinion, that the present system of education in Manitoba works an injustice to the minority. But, Sir, supposing that to be true, what was Dr. Grant's conclusion? Did he ask this Parliament to intervene? Did he justify such a Bill as we have before us? Did he tell us that that was the remedy for the grievance? No, Sir; the strongest supporter of the policy propounded by the leader of the Opposition in this Dominion that I know of is Dr. Grant himself. If the hon. gentleman had quoted the strong argument which Dr. Grant submitted in the public press to show that instead of coercion we should adopt investigation, conciliation and amicable settlement, he would have shown that, so far from that reverend gentleman being an authority in support of the position the Government takes, he is identically the opposite, because he supports the policy of the Opposition.

Then, the hon. gentleman goes on to say that we have had enough dilly-dally—that there have been five years to remedy this evil, and it has not been done. I ask any independent or honourable man in this House, is that a fair or honest statement of the case? Why, Sir, six years ago this Bill of 1890 was passed. The Government were asked to veto it. They declined. They invited the minority to enter upon litigation to test the validity of the law; they supplied them with money for that purpose; it took five years to carry the case through the courts; and at the end of the five years the highest tribunal in the realm pronounced the Act to be intra vires—perfectly constitutional and in every way defensible. I ask you, is that period of time to be taken as a period during which the province was to undo the work it did? It may have been right or it may have been wrong. The highest tribunal in the Empire has declared that so far as the Act is concerned, it is intra vires and perfectly proper, and does not interfere with the minority's rights.

Mr. OUMET. Not proper, but legal.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, before I am through I will read the language they used. I say that it did not interfere with the minority's rights, because they still have the remedy which the constitution allows them, of appealing to the Privy Council.

But while this question was in the courts, and while at the expiration of the litigation Manitoba was declared to be in the right, it is a monstrous argument to say that Manitoba has for five years persistently refused to do right. Sir, I say that until the second judgment of the Privy Council was given in the month of February, 1895, the province of Manitoba cannot be said to have been in the wrong for a single instant. She had the judgment of the highest court in her favour. You may or I may think that she acted harshly or wrongly, but she has been declared by the highest court of the land to have acted constitutionally; and to condemn her for not having repealed or amended the very Act which the courts said she was right in passing, is to take a position which certainly does not commend itself to my judgment at least.

Then the hon. gentleman wound up with saying that the Liberal party is responsible. Sir, the Liberal party and the Liberal leader, from the very first time this question entered into the arena of party politics, gave the same counsel and advice that we give now. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) counselled investigation and an amicable settlement—a settlement by means of the provincial authority—as the only possible and real settlement which could give the minority the privileges they believed they ought to have. And that proposition which he made, when the question was first brought up, is the proposition he so forcibly and clearly enunciated on Tuesday last, and which, if the majority of the Dominion back him up by their votes, he will be prepared to carry out when he comes into power.

But the hon. gentleman says that the House is divided into two or three classes. He says that the Government are remedialists and propose to apply the remedy now. And he says that the Opposition propose to apply the remedy at some future time. They are remedialists, too, he declares, but they do not propose to remedy the grievance now. Well, what is involved? He says there is no difference at all in principle. I say there is a very marked difference. I say that the policy of introducing and carrying remedial legislation now, under existing circumstances, involves blind legislation to be followed by chaos—to be followed by bitter racial and religious feeling, religious and racial rancor, which will rend Manitoba asunder and spread all over the Dominion. But the other policy involves intelligent inquiry, the ascertainment of the real facts, the ascertainment whether there is substantial injury or not, and it involves further that when it is found that substantial injury does exist, it shall be followed by a remedial settlement and a measure of justice to the minority, which generous measure of justice will be administered by the local authorities themselves. That is the answer I give to the hon. gentleman's argument.

Now, let me for a few moments bring the attention of this House to what I humbly consider the real question which Parliament has to decide. The question, as I understand it, is whether it is in the interests of the minority of Manitoba, whether it is in the interests of the province of Manitoba itself, whether it is in the interests of the whole Dominion, that we should legislate to impose, as the hon. gentleman says he desires to do, state-aided separate schools upon Manitoba. That is the real issue before this House to-day. The other issue involved is whether the hon. gentleman is honestly carrying out what he says is his desire. There are gentlemen on both sides who challenge issue with him upon both questions, who say that it is not in the interests of the minority or of Manitoba or of the Dominion at large, that at the present stage of this question any such Bill should be introduced, and who say further that if such Bill be carried as being in their interests, it will be a political fraud, a piece of parliamentary jugglery, a delusion and a snare.

My hon. friend the Minister of Justice spent an hour the other day, in a speech to which I can take no exception whatever, as to its matter or manner, in proving that there exists in this Parliament a power to legislate upon this question. Where is the man inside of Parliament, where is the lawyer inside or outside of Parliament who ever questioned that power? This is not a question of our power to act, but is entirely a question of policy and statesmanship to be decided, as the statute says, looking at all the circumstances of the case. Did the counsel of the Manitoba Government, before the Privy Council here, challenge the right of the Privy Council to make a remedial order? Not at all. He admitted its undoubted power to do it. He only questioned the policy, the prudence, the statesmanship of such action. He never denied the power. When that gentleman, himself the leader of the irreconcilables, headed a public meeting in Toronto and moved a resolution some years ago, in which he denounced the policy of interference, in that very resolution, he expressly admitted the power in cases of urgent necessity.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who is the leader of the irreconcilables?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would be so termed. The language he used at that time was that where there was a flagrant abuse of provincial power, the right of the Privy Council and this Parliament to interfere was undoubted. Then we have the province of Manitoba itself, did it question the power? Why, in these remarkable minutes of Council, which were forwarded from Manitoba, the power of this Government to interfere is admitted expressly in cases of urgent necessity. I have not heard any lawyer who valued his reputation, any lawyer of standing, or any constitutional authority, ever express the doubt that there is a power constitutionally vested in the Government of Canada to hear an appeal, and that after they have heard and allowed the appeal, there is power on the part of this Parliament to intervene and enact, a remedial order, if it chooses.

That being the case, we are getting to a narrower issue; and just at this stage, I desire to challenge, right upon the very threshold, the law laid down by the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), when he moved the second reading of this Bill, as the controlling law was which should guide us in this matter. The hon. gentleman then laid down certain propositions which, if they were correct in whole or in part, would fully justify, if not compel, this House to proceed upon the course he has invited us to take. The hon. gentleman, after giving a history of confederation and reading very largely from the judgment of the Privy Council, wound up by declaring what, according to his view, was the law; and as he moved the second reading, upon the statement he then made the policy of carrying this Bill must largely depend, I will trouble the House while I read a quotation from his remarks to show why that hon. gentleman at least asked the House to adopt the course which he did when he moved the second reading:

I think it would be impossible to find any terms in the English language that would more thoroughly establish the position that the right exclusively of the province of Quebec, or the province of Ontario, or the province of Manitoba to legislate in reference to education is not confined to the case in which they have not taken away any of the rights enjoyed by any one of these provinces at the time they entered confederation; that is to say, that if it can be shown that any right enjoyed by any province at the time it entered confederation has been infringed upon, if it be shown that the privileges that were enjoyed under that right, whether by Roman Catholics or Protestants, have been interfered with and removed, the moment that took place, under the Imperial Act of Confederation, under the law as it stands upon the statute-book, the right is transferred 'ipso facto' from the local legislature, because the local legislature hold that exclusive right, subject to the fact that they shall not invade the privileges of the minority, to the Parliament of the Dominion. And holding that under these circumstances, the moment it can be shown that the provincial legislature have invaded that right and have used the power entrusted to them contrary to the spirit of the Act of union, the Imperial Act of 1867, and to the law under which Manitoba came into the confederation—the moment it can be shown that the rights and privileges enjoyed have been infringed, that moment their power to legislate exclusively in regard to the question ceases and is transferred 'ipso facto' to the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada. I would not say that I hold that to be an incontrovertible position if I were not fortified in it by the highest authority in the British Empire, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

I did not conceive it to be possible to embrace within so few words so much bad law as the hon. gentleman has given us here. It is absolutely the reverse of what the law is. The idea that because a provincial legislature infringes upon a right which post-union legislation has given to a minority, that moment the exclusive power of the province in respect to education is transferred to this Parliament, is so monstrous an absurdity, so ridiculous a travesty, of what the law is that I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman who held it should reach the conclusion he did, and should urge this House to pass this Bill. Why, Sir, if that were the law, if Manitoba had lost its right to legislate by reason of infringing the rights of the minority, and that right was, ipso facto, transferred to this Parliament, of course we should legislate. We should do something at once. But, Sir, that is not the law. I will ask the hon. gentleman's attention for one moment to the law as laid down by the Privy Council of England upon that point. The Privy Council says :

Subsection 3 reserved certain limited powers to the Dominion Parliament in the event of the provincial legislature failing to comply with the requirements of the subsection.

That contains the whole of it in a nutshell. As for there being any transfer of power to this Parliament because the provincial parliament interferes with the right of a minority, the thing is too ridiculous for argument. Sir, the true rule is this—that while a latent power exists in Parliament to legislate on the subject of legislation, to carry out a remedial order adopted by the Privy Council on an appeal to them by an aggrieved minority, it ought only to be resorted to in a case of urgent necessity after such case has been fairly established, and then only in the last resort and after the provincial government have declined to act in the matter. But, Sir, when the provincial government has refused to act, and full investigation has been held, and a case of urgent necessity fully made out, then, Sir, we are to exercise our full parliamentary discretion, and legislate just so far as the circumstances of the case require.

Now, Sir, let us try to get a fair idea of how this question really stands at this time. What is the first proposition we start with? We start with the proposition I referred to a moment ago, that the Act of 1890 was finally determined by the Judicial Committee to be strictly constitutional and intra vires. As this matter seems to be called in question by the general trend of the argument of the hon. Finance Minister, and others who have followed on that side, let me read for a moment, because I think it is right that it should go upon record again, what the Privy Council of England did say in regard to the Act of 1890. After giving the main provisions, they go on to say :

Such being the main provisions of the Public Schools Act, 1890, their lordships have to determine whether that Act prejudicially affects any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons had by law or practice in the province at the union. Notwithstanding the Public Schools Act, 1890, Roman Catholics and members of every other religious body in Manitoba are free to establish schools throughout the province; they are free to maintain their schools by school fees or voluntary subscriptions; they are free to conduct their schools according to their own religious tenets without molestation or interference. No child is compelled to attend a public school. No special advantage other than the advantage of a free education in schools conducted under public management is held out to those who do attend. But then it is said that it is impossible for Roman Catholics, or for members of the Church of England (if their views are correctly represented by the Bishop of Rupert's Land, who has given evidence in Logan's case), to send their children to public schools where the education is not superintended and directed by the authorities of their church, and that, therefore, Roman Catholics and members of the Church of England who are taxed for public schools, and at the same time feel themselves compelled to support their own schools, are in a less favourable position than those who can take an advantage of the free education provided by the Act of 1890. That may be so. But what right or privilege is violated or prejudicially affected by the law. It is not the law that is in fault; it is owing to religious convictions, which everybody must respect, and to the teaching of their church, that Roman Catholics and the members of the Church of England find themselves unable to partake of advantages which the law offers to all alike. Their lordships are sensible of the weight which must attach to the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court. They have anxiously considered the able and elaborate judgments by which that decision has been supported. But they are unable to agree with the opinion which the learned judges of the Supreme Court have expressed as to the rights and privileges of Roman Catholics in Manitoba at the time of the union. They doubt whether it is permissible to refer to the course of legislation between 1871 and 1890, as a means of throwing light on the previous practice or on the construction of the saving clause in the Manitoba Act. They cannot assent to the view, which seems to be indicated by one of the members of the Supreme Court, that public schools under the Act of 1890 are in reality Protestant schools. The legislature has declared in so many words that the public schools shall be entirely unsectarian, and that principle is carried out throughout the Act. With the policy of the Act of 1890 their lordships are not concerned. But they cannot help observing that, if the views of the respondents were to prevail, it would be extremely difficult for the provincial legislature, which has been entrusted with the exclusive power of making laws relating to education, to provide for the educational want of the more sparsely inhabited districts of a country almost as large as Great Britain, and that the powers of the legislature, which on the face of the Act appears large, would be limited to the useful but somewhat humble office of making regulations for the sanitary conditions of school-houses, imposing rates for the support of denominational schools, enforcing the compulsory attendance of scholars, and matters of that sort.

That was the first judgment given in 1892. I want to establish the proposition, if I can, that the Privy Council have set at rest once and for all the constitutionality of the Act of 1890, have declared that it was perfectly within the powers of the legislature, and that its passing did not violate any privilege or right which the minority had before the union. So that we will start with that proposition as incontestably proved. Then, Mr. Speaker, if that is so, what is the use of going behind that judgment to try and show that privileges were given to them, when the Privy Council said they were not? Surely we can start from that basis. Now, I may have held, and there are many other gentlemen who did hold, views entirely opposed to the Privy Council. They thought, I thought myself, that the minority had certain privileges and rights which the Act of 1890 deprived them of; but what is the use of my clinging to that when the highest law by which we are bound says they have not, and says that the province was perfectly within its rights, says, therefore, that no pre-union rights or privileges existed, that is affected, directly or indirectly, by the law of 1890? But while that is true, it is equally true, and decided by the same judicial body in 1895, that the legislation of 1890, by interfering with post-union privileges granted to the minority by the legislature of Manitoba, created a grievance which gave the aggrieved minority a right of appeal.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say, with reference to the Barrett case, that he was of a contrary opinion to that decision before the decision was delivered?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said that was my impression, that the decision was rather a surprise to me. I have no hesitation in saying that at all: I want to deal with this question frankly and fairly. But what I say is this, that while I find myself bound by the decision of the Judicial Committee in 1895, I also find myself bound by their solemn decision of 1892. It would not be honest for me, and I humbly submit that it is not honest for hon. gentlemen opposite, to try and create the impression in this House or out of it, that there exists a pre-union right on the part of the minority, which has in any way been interfered with by the Act of 1890. I say it is settled that there is not such right. The only right they have is the right of appeal in case privileges granted to them by the legislature of Manitoba after the union, have been interfered with. Now, I want to come down to this point—what was the real question submitted and determined by the Privy Council of 1895? And what were the petitions praying for an appeal, and what grievances did they say they suffered? I turn to the blue-book upon this subject, at page 198, where I find the substance of these petitions summarized.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. DAVIN. Before my hon. friend goes away from that point, which is a very interesting one from whatever point of view this question is looked at, I should like to have this cleared up. Is it held that if a member of Parliament comes to the conclusion, or if a Parliament comes to the conclusion, that the Act of 1890 was ultra vires until that decision was given, is the Parliament estopped as a court of justice would be estopped, from considering those facts that would establish to one's judgment that it was ultra vires?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Most assuredly, I think Parliament is estopped, for this reason, that the Manitoba Act of 1890 has become part of the constitution of this country, and when that constitution is interpreted by the highest tribunal of the Empire, this Parliament, and every loyal man in it, is bound by the decision. I may regret it, I may have hoped differently, I may have thought differently, I may have shared the views of some of the judges of the Supreme Court here. I did share them, but I am bound to argue this question as a lawyer, as a politician, and as a member of this House, on the lines of the constitution, and am bound by the constitution. When you tell me I am bound by the decision of 1895, I say I am, but I am equally bound by the decision of 1892. Now, I am going to call the attention of the House to what this decision of 1895 was, because, upon that point, a great deal is going to depend. What was the decision given by the Privy Council in 1895? That depends very much upon the petitions presented by the minority, praying for an appeal, and on the questions referred by the Canadian Privy Council to the court for their decision.

Mr. McNEILL. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Do I understand his argument to be that this House could not constitute itself a court of appeal to review the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has expressed my argument very neatly and very well. If I am stating correctly what the decision of the Privy Council was in 1892. If the language I have read is not capable of two constructions, if they did, in clear and unmistakable language, say that the Act of 1890 was constitutional and intra vires of the legislature of Manitoba, and that there were no rights and privileges whatever of a pre-union character which were interfered with, then I say every member of this Parliament, and the Parliament as a whole, is bound by that judgment; I go further, and I say it is politically dishonest to ask Parliament to try to go behind it. Now, Sir, let us see what the other decision was. We have certain memorials presented to the Canadian Privy Council, asking that they hear an appeal against that Act on the ground that certain post-union privileges were conceded to the Roman Catholics, and had been interfered with. What is the substance of those petitions? They are summarized on page 198 of the blue-book, as follows:—

1. The statutes complained of had deprived the Roman Catholic minority of the rights or privileges of a separate condition as regards education and of organizing their schools under the system of public education in the province which they had previously enjoyed by the Education Acts passed since the union.

2. That their schools had been merged with those of Protestant denominations.

3. That they are required to contribute through taxation to the support of schools which are called public schools, but are in substance a continuation of the old Protestant schools.

4. That the religious exercises in the public schools are not acceptable to them.

Now, Sir, that is the substance of the petitions which were presented to the Canadian Privy Council praying for an appeal, and they contain allegations of a very grave and serious character; they contain allegations which, if true, went to show that a grievous wrong had been committed upon the Roman Catholic minority, that there was a case of urgent necessity requiring the intervention of the Privy Council of Canada, and of this Parliament. Now, let us see what was done. Upon the very threshold of the inquiry on the appeal, there arose the question: have we got the power to hear it? I want to let the House understand that the Privy Council of Canada did not at first enter upon the consideration of the merits of the appeal at all. They were met at the threshold with the objection that they had no right to hear it, and that question whether they had a right to hear it was the question which was remitted to the court. How was it remitted to the court? It was remitted to the court in the form of several questions which the court was asked to answer, and I will have to trouble the House, in order to make my argument intelligible, with reading those questions, or a majority of them:

1. Is the appeal referred to in the said memorials and petitions, and asserted thereby, such an appeal as is admissible by subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, or by subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 33 Victoria (1870), Chap. 3, Canada?

The answer is: Yes, it is by virtue of the Manitoba Act. Mind you, that is the appeal referred to in said memorials and petitions. The second question is:

Are the grounds set forth in the petitions and memorials such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsections above referred to, or either of them?

The answer is: Yes, under the last Manitoba Act. Sections 3 and 4 do not refer to it. Question 5 says:

5. Has His Excellency the Governor General in Council power to make the declarations or remedial orders which are asked for in the said memorials and petitions, assuming the material facts to be as stated therein, or has His Excellency the Governor General in Council any other jurisdiction in the premises?

The answer is yes. I have given the answers to the House in substance, and I hold in my hand the reasons rendered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for their answers. The answers in order to be intelligible must be read in the light of the questions which were asked. The case submitted did not involve, nor did it justify any inquiry as to the truthfulness of the facts. The Privy Council were asked to assume the facts stated in the petition to be true, and assuming them to be true, they were asked whether there was an appeal allowable. They decided that the appeal was admissible under subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, 1870, and not under the section of the British North America Act which did not apply. At page 272 of their judgment they state the reasons for giving these answers, as follows:—

The terms on which Manitoba was to become a province of the Dominion were matters of negotiation between representatives of the inhabitants of Manitoba and of the Dominion Government. The terms agreed upon, so far as education was concerned, must be taken to be embodied in the 22nd section of the Act of 1870. Their lordships do not think that anything is to be gained by the inquiry how far the provisions of this section placed the province of Manitoba in a different position from the provinces, or whether it was one more or less advantageous. There can be no presumption as to the extent to which a variation was intended. This can only be determined by construing the words according to their natural signification.

They find that when you want to ascertain what the rights and privileges of the minority of Manitoba, or what the rights and privileges of the majority are, or what the powers of that province are to legislate on the subject of education, you must go to the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act of 1870, and not to the British North America Act or any other source. That being the case, what did they next decide? In finding out, they said, what was the meaning of the statute, you must confine yourself to the meaning of the words of the statute itself. You are not permitted to go to the statements of what one or another legislator thought might be its meaning when the Bill was being enacted. We have had hon. gentlemen quoted and their opinions cited as to what they thought was intended when the Bill was submitted to the legislature. Every constitutional lawyer will tell you, Mr. Speaker, how absurd that view is. The Privy Council spoke as follows:—

It may be that those who were acting on behalf of the Roman Catholic community in Manitoba, and those who either framed or assented to the wording of that enactment were under the impression that its scope was wider, and that it afforded protection greater than their lordships held to be the case. But such considerations cannot properly influence the judgment of those who have judicially to interpret a statute. The question is, not what may be supposed to have been intended, but what has been said.

And so we find two things. We find the highest court in the Empire determined that we must confine ourselves exclusively to the Manitoba Act of 1870, and to the very words of the 22nd section of that Act; and yet it is thought proper to endeavour to interpret it by the hasty expressions or ill-considered opinions of politicians or statesmen in the House when the Bill was going through. If you claim to be bound by the constitution, to be acting here simply in pursuance of a constitutional duty, are you justified in appealing to arguments directly at variance with the decision of the Privy Council, and although that body states that you shall not go outside the Manitoba Act or outside its language to find out what it means, are you justified in going outside of the words and relying upon the opinions of individual legislators? The Privy Council goes on to determine next that subsection 2 of that statute is a substantive enactment by itself, and that is a most important consideration. I speak as a lawyer, a very humble one I admit, and I say that I shared entirely the view of this case which was enunciated with such great ability by Sir Henry Strong, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. I did not think that subsection 2 of the Manitoba Act was a substantive section, but I thought it was ancillary to section 1, and was intended to carry it out. I thought section 1 conferred privileges and rights on the minority in Manitoba. On both those points it appears I was wrong; but I am bound to bow to the decision of the Privy Council. At page 26, the Privy Council say:

The question then arises, does the subsection extend the rights and privileges acquired by legislation subsequent to the union? It extends in terms to "any" right or privilege of the minority affected by an Act passed by the legislature, and would therefore seem to embrace all rights and privileges existing at the time when such Act was passed. Their lordships see no justification for putting a limitation on language thus unlimited.

So we have arrived at this stage. In the decision of the Privy Council subsection 2 does cover cases where rights and privileges have been given by the legislature of Manitoba after the union to the minority in that province. That being so, the sole question to be determined is, has a right or privilege been affected? In order to give a fair and proper meaning to the judgment the House will pardon me if I make another quotation to show that in the opinion of the Privy Council these rights were affected. At page 284, they say:

The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer.

On page 285, they say:

For the reasons which have been given their lordships are of opinion that the second subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is the governing enactment, and that the appeal to the Governor General in Council was admissible by virtue of that enactment, on the ground set forth in the memorials and petitions, inasmuch as the Acts of 1890 affected rights or privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education within the meaning of that subsection.

Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute. It is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

I have read all that part of the judgment, because it is the part always relied upon, in support of the position which the Government took, and for the purpose of justifying their action to-day. Their lordships say: Assuming the facts stated in the petition to be true. Assuming it to be true, that the Roman Catholic minority have been deprived of rights and privileges as regards education, and of organizing their schools. Assuming it to be true, that their schools have been merged with those of Protestant denominations; assuming it to be true, that they are required to contribute their taxation to the schools which are called public schools, but are, in substance, Protestant schools; and, assuming it to be true, that the religious exercises in these schools are not acceptable to them. Assuming all these things to be true, then, their lordships say: An appeal lies to the Governor General in Council of Canada against these grievances.

Now, Sir, if that is so, what was the clear, palpable, plain duty of the court to which the appeal was to be made? The order comes back here from the English Privy Council, in answer to the questions put to them: You have the power to hear the appeal of the minority. The Privy Council determined no more, and the Privy Council could determine no more. There was nothing else referred to them. It is perfectly true, that some dicta were given by the Lord Chancellor, as to what, in his opinion, might be a good course to adopt. But, Sir, I do not think there is a man in this House who will contend, that these dicta form any part of the answers to the questions which they were asked to answer. The dicta of the Lord Chancellor, as to what policy we are to adopt, should not control any man in this legislature, nor any man of the Canadian Privy Council. The policy of this country must be determined by those to whom is entrusted the responsibility for carrying on the government of the country. The policy for the legislation we may enact must be determined by us, and, while I am prepared for one, to give implicit obedience to the judgment of the Privy Council upon questions of law which are properly before them, and, while in this case I am prepared to give, and think both Opposition and Government should give, absolute and implicit obedience to that judgment of the Privy Council, so far as it was a judgment, so far as it was an answer to the questions put by the court, I decline to be controlled or guided by a passing opinion, as to what policy we should adopt on a matter, not of law, but on a matter entirely of policy, which should be determined by the people, by the representatives of the people, and by the Government of the country, who are entrusted with the responsibility.

Now, Sir, the power to hear the appeal being determined, what came before this Government? They had to determine the time to hear it, the manner in which to hear it, and whether it was to be a political or judicial hearing. Sir, what should have been done by this Government? I say here, that the initial wrong, the wrong which it is almost too late to remedy, was committed by the Government of this country towards the minority of Manitoba, when, with an indecent haste, which I cannot sufficiently condemn, they passed that drastic remedial order, which they are now trying to make the basis of legislation in this House. I appeal to the members of this House, as men of common sense; and I ask: What was the first thing this Government should have done. They admit, that this matter of education was exclusively within the jurisdiction of the province of Manitoba. They had an appeal presented to them on the ground that an injustice was done to the minority. They did not know whether they had the power to hear the appeal or not. They referred the question, and the highest court of the Empire told them they had that power, and that being decided, one would have supposed, that the very first action they would have taken, would have been to have passed on by a despatch, the judgment and the answer of the Privy Council of England, and said to the province of Manitoba: Now, the doubt which has existed as to whether we have the right to hear and determine this appeal, has been solved by the highest court of the Empire. If you do not take it up and deal with it, as you have the power and the duty to do, then, we must proceed, in justice to those who have appealed to us to hear their appeal.

Sir, if that step had been taken; if no coercion had been attempted in the first place; if common sense had been used, if the smallest ounce of conciliation had prompted the men who were then controlling Dominion affairs, there would have been no trouble in the Dominion of Canada to-day. The initial wrong, which, I say, it is almost impossible to overcome, was committed against the minority in Manitoba, when, with indecent haste, which, I say, I cannot too severely reprehend, instead of passing on by an amicable despatch the judgment of the Privy Council, calling the attention of the Manitoba government to it, and inviting them to remedy the wrong of which the minority complained, they took the people of Manitoba by the throat, and said: We will now proceed to hear this appeal, without giving you even time to prepare yourself. The indecent haste with which that appeal was pushed forward, while the legislature was sitting, and before the official report of the judgment was received in this country at all, was not creditable to a court which said they were sitting as a judicial body. Before, I say, the official report of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was received in this country at all, and simply on a telegraphic report which they had of what the Privy Council had decided, they hailed the province of Manitoba before them, as if the province of Manitoba was a culprit, and they said: Although your Premier is sick, and your Attorney General is engaged, we will not give you time for these gentlemen to prepare, but we will force you to answer and defend yourselves without any delay. I say, Sir, that it was an indecent haste, which could only have been prompted by a political motive. It is as plain to my mind as the sun in the heavens, when it is shining, that the hon. gentlemen opposite, at that time, intended, not to give relief to the Manitoba minority, but to pass formally a remedial order, and then go to the country and invite the votes of the Roman Catholics of the whole Dominion on the ground that they were seeking to do justice. They were going to snatch an unrighteous verdict, and to depend upon subsequent events to carry out their pledge, when they got into power. That was the policy. They contended that they were sitting judicially. On the preliminary question of their right to hear the appeal at all they might have been sitting judicially; but when they came down to the question of fact, they were sitting as a political body, determining on the policy they should adopt. In the language of Lord Watson and Lord Macnaghten, and by the admission of Mr. Ewart and Mr. Blake, they were not sitting as a judicial body at all, but simply and solely as a political body, acting on their political discretion, and doing what in their political judgment was best in the interests of the country at large. If this is doubted, turn to the controversy that took place before the Privy Council. During the argument on the appeal, Lord Watson interposed to say :

I apprehend that the appeal to the Governor is an appeal to the Governor's discretion. It is a political administrative appeal, and not a judicial appeal in any proper sense of the term, and in the same way after he has decided the same latitude of discretion is given to the Dominion Parliament. They may legislate or not as they think fit.

You will find the Lord Chancellor asking Mr. Blake this question :

The question seems to me to be this : If you are right in saying that the abolition of a system of denominational education, which was created by a post-union legislation is within the 2nd section of the Manitoba Act and the 3rd subsection of the other if it apply, then you say there is a case for the jurisdiction of the Governor General, and that is all we have to decide.

And Mr. Blake replies :

That is all your lordships have to decide. What remedy he shall purpose to apply is quite a different thing.

Mr. Ewart says :

Before closing I would like to say a word or two as to what we are seeking. As it has already been remarked, we are not asking for any declaration as to the extent of the relief to be given by the Governor General. We merely ask that it should be held that he has jurisdiction to hear our prayer, and to grant us some relief if he thinks proper to do so.

And Lord Watson says :

The power given of appeal to the Government, and upon request of the Governor to the legislature of Canada, seems to be wholly discretionary in both.

Mr. Ewart—No doubt.

Lord Watson—Both in the Governor and in the legislature.

Mr. Ewart—Yes.

Sir, these dicta and admissions, one and all, together show what ? That the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were determining a merely legal point ; after they had determined that point and referred the question back again to the Privy Council of Canada, that Privy Council had to take it up as a political administrative appeal, and decide what they would do. Now, Sir, what should they have done ? Surely, after having sent that decision to the Manitoba government, they should have waited a reasonable time to see whether the Manitoba government would do right in the premises. They did not do so. On the contrary, they took the Manitoba government by the throat. If the Manitoba government did not act, then what should they have done ? They should have negotiated with the Manitoba government ; and if their negotiations were ineffective, they should have proceeded with the appeal. But if they determined to proceed with the appeal, how should they have proceeded with it ? There was only one way to proceed. Certain allegations were made in the petitions on which the appeal was made. Were those allegations true ? That was the first thing for the Privy Council of Canada to inquire. Did they inquire ? The judgment of the Privy Council of Great Britain was given on the assumption that those allegations were true. The matter was referred to the Privy Council of Canada to find out whether they were true or not, and, if they were true, to apply the remedy. I ask, was any investigation made ? As a fact, not a scintilla of evidence was given of the truth of those allegations, and the affidavits submitted by Mr. Ewart in support of his contention were one and all withdrawn. Now, Sir, what were those affidavits ? I refer to them because the allegations made in them have been the subject of argument, and have been appealed to by hon. gentlemen in this House in support of their arguments. Why, my hon. friend from St. John, a lawyer of high standing in his own province, did not scruple to refer to statements made in those affidavits as facts which had influenced his mind on this question.

Mr. McLEOD. Excuse me. I did not put it on that ground at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not say that the hon. gentleman referred to the affidavits themselves, but he referred to the facts which were supposed to be proved in them as matters which influenced his mind. Now, Sir, what are the allegations contained in those affidavits ? 1st. That the Manitoba bill of rights contained a special clause guaranteeing the Roman Catholics separate schools, and the distribution of the school money amongst the different denominations according to population. 2nd. Gross breach of faith on the part of the Greenway government, in attaining power on solemn pledges that they would not interfere with Roman Catholic separate schools as they existed in 1888, and in afterwards repudiating pledges and abolishing schools. 3rd. Confiscation of a reserve fund belonging to the Roman Catholic separate school board. When Mr. Ewart came to present his case before the Privy Council, he submitted to them five or six contentions as reasons why they should grant the appeal and make the remedial order. He addressed a solemn argument to them in favour of separate schools. He referred to those affidavits in proof of his assertion that assurances had been given and promises had been made of the nature of those to which I have just referred. He contended that apart from agreements and promises relief should be given on the merits. He argued, finally, that the schools were sectarian and Protestant, adding :

I feel certain that the settled belief of the people of Canada that such liberty (that is, separate state-aided schools) ought to be accorded to Roman Catholics everywhere throughout the Dominion.

I am not concerned just now with the latter part of his argument; but I want to ask—with respect to the arguments advanced on the serious and grave statements made in the affidavits submitted, which, if true, would undoubtedly influence largely the minds of the Privy Council—what was the result? After he had submitted his argument, the counsel for the other side said he was prepared to rebut and contradict every one of those statements in toto; and then Mr. Ewart rose, and rather than have them contradicted, or have time given for contradictions to be obtained, he absolutely withdrew them from the court altogether. And here we are sitting in Parliament legislating, and those affidavits are submitted to us as part of the record; and there are hundreds of men in this country, and numbers of men in this House, who have read that record and those affidavits, and have had their minds largely prejudiced by the statements contained in them. Why, Sir, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) apologized in this House last session for their having allowed these affidavits to appear in the blue-book, saying that it was a mistake of his own; and his apology was accepted at the time, because it was put forward in a manly and honest way. But what do we find this year? We find the blue-book re-published, with the error which was pointed out last year repeated. I find in this blue-book, printed in 1896, this very year, circulated among the members of this House, and sent by the thousand among our constituents, these damaging statements, every one of which was withdrawn, and not one of which formed part of the record before the court. These are circulated throughout this country for the purpose of wrongly influencing public opinion. I cannot conceive of a more disgraceful attempt to mould public opinion in a false direction than is made by means of this trick, for it is nothing more or less. If the same thing took place in a lower court, and you went before a court of appeal and proved it, the man guilty of such conduct would receive severe condemnation at the hands of the court. And how is it here to-day? The hon. gentleman knows that men's minds are being influenced largely by those statements, that men are found in this House now to stand up and make use of them and say openly that their minds are influenced by them, when, as a matter of fact the statements are denied to be true, were as a fact withdrawn, and the counsel for Manitoba declared that if time had been given them they would have refuted every one of them.

Now, the question comes up are these schools sectarian or Protestant schools as alleged? I do not know, I cannot tell, I have never been in Manitoba. It is one thing to point out to me what is the school system, as contained in the four walls of a statute, but that gives me no idea of how that school system is administered. I do not want to know alone what the law says, but how it is practically administered; and if there is one thing that requires examination more than any other before this House attempts to legislate, it is the facts with regard to the practical working of the schools, under the old system, between 1870 and 1890, and their practical working under the system established in 1890, from 1890 to 1895. Unless that practical working is inquired into and ascertained, it is absolutely impossible for this House to come to an honest and just conclusion as to how far we should interfere to remedy the alleged injustice. The question is not whether the schools are non-sectarian or Protestant, but whether they should be imposed by a central power upon the province or voluntarily given by the province itself. I am not going to discuss whether a separate school system is the best or not. That is a matter for the province to determine. If the province determines that a separate school system is the best I certainly am not going to interfere. It is none of my business. It is a matter that has been relegated to the province; and unless the province interferes with a right guaranteed by the constitution, and I am called upon to apply a remedy, I have no right to interfere at all.

Now, I repeat that no evidence was taken upon the merits. Mr. Ewart challenged the judgment of the Canadian Privy Council on the merits of his petition, but not a scintilla of evidence was given to show what the merits were. How am I, how is any member of this House, coming from any part of Canada, to determine upon those merits without investigation? Some hon. gentlemen say we have the Acts of 1870 and 1888, and we have the Act of 1890, and that is enough for us. Sir, it is not enough. It does not touch the fringe of the question, because the question is: what substantial injustice has been perpetrated upon the minority? What was the actual working of the old schools and what is the actual working of the new schools? How far were they acceptable to and accepted by the people? Was the law being applied rigorously or otherwise? What is the grievance? Is it a nominal one or a substantial one? On this last point we have differences of opinion, but I call your attention to one piece of evidence, which was submitted to the Canadian Privy Council, and which will be found on pages 172 and 173 of the report, as showing, at any rate to my mind, some doubt as to how far this grievance went, and as convincing me of the strong disposition on the part of the Manitoba government to deal generously with the minority, if they were not interfered with. I call your attention, Sir, to the report on the French schools submitted by Mr. Ewart to the Canadian Privy Council, and put in the blue-book as Exhibit Q. What does that exhibit show? It shows that there were ninety-one Catholic schools of the old school board; it shows that the total number of districts disbanded for various reasons was twenty-four. In the majority of these, the Catholics attended the public schools, where it was possible for them to do so. Twenty-seven of these old districts together with nine newly formed ones accepted the public school system, making a total of thirty-six school districts now under Government control. That fact is an important one; that thirty-six separate schools have come voluntary under the new school Act; and it is evidence, in its face, that the working of the Act of 1890 is not as drastic or as obnoxious as the Act itself might seem by simply reading it to be. And I say that while the Act itself may have largely interfered with the separate school system, if the practical working of it out is such as to give satisfaction to the minority, surely we would not interfere. Whether it be so or not, I do not know; but I find that Senator Bernier, who was a superintendent of the Roman Catholic schools, comments in his speech to the Senate upon that report of Inspector Young and upon the statement of fact contained in the report that thirty-six schools came under the new government school law. He gives his reasons as follows:—

The local government were anxious to have some of our schools brought under the law in order to be able to base an argument upon the change. An inspector was sent to them who told them that if they wanted to keep up their schools the government would not be too exacting about compliance with the regulations. He told them that they might quietly give any religious instruction in the school after school hours. He told them that they could begin and close school work by saying the ordinary Catholic prayers and even suggested how it should be done. Instead of opening the school at a certain hour, they might open some few minutes before, and at the closing they might close a few minutes after the regular hour, so that they might be able to say that there had been no prayer during the school hours. There are forms of report provided by the government. I have been informed by certain parties that the teachers of those schools were advised that if the clause as to religious instruction was embarrassing to their conscience, as this report has to be under oath, they might strike out that clause.

* * It might be said that the local government, being disposed to shut their eyes to the management of their schools, we might be satisfied and let the matter drop. My reply is that there are principles involved that we cannot overlook.

Why do I quote that? I quote it to show that there is evidence of a strong disposition on the part of the local government to concede to these outlying schools privileges which were not strictly within the letter of the law. I quote it to show that they were allowed to teach what religious instruction they pleased before and after school hours. I quote it to show that the Manitoba government were willing that the provision requiring an affidavit to be made that no religious instruction had been imparted, might be eliminated. I quote it to show that the government of Manitoba were prepared to settle the question by amicable agreement, if they had been approached in that spirit; and I have no doubt, in the face of those statements, if they be true,—and I do not think anybody will question them—that if the Manitoba government, imbued with the ideas I find they were imbued with, determined to concede to the French schools, a very large measure of the demands that were being made on their behalf there would not have been, there ought not to have been, there could not have been any difficulties whatever in settling the matter to the entire satisfaction of the minority and on a basis similar to that on which the school question has been settled in the maritime provinces.

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon. gentleman know the date of those concessions?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They are referred to in the school inspector's report for 1894, and Senator Bernier's speech was made in 1895. So that, up to the very time the judgment of the Privy Council was given, we find, that, by a system of concessions, concessions which everybody would say were fair and just, the Roman Catholics congregated together in settlements by themselves, were permitted to teach their religious exercises, and the disposition of the government was, that they should have the fullest latitude in this regard, and that the strict letter of the law of 1890 should not be enforced, as against them. Now, what did we hear last night? We heard the speech of my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Kenny), a speech marked, I will say for him, by broad statesmanship and stamped with the mark of toleration and fair-play. He told us, that he came from a province where intolerance in religious matters was unknown. He told us, that the Roman Catholic minority in Nova Scotia, under a modus vivendi which has not the sanction of the law, but which has the sanction of a quarter of a century's practice, are enjoying a measure of religious liberty as large as they desire. He told us, that no man could be found in that province to-day to raise his voice against the manner in which the public school law of that province is being carried out. He told us, that, while under the strict letter of the law they have no rights at all with respect to religious education in the schools under the practical application of the law, under the modus vivendi which justice and conciliation has brought about, there is such a measure of fair-play extended to them that no injustice can be charged; that there is all the religious education in the schools which they desire, and that, as a Canadian, he is willing to leave these educational matters to the majority in each province, feeling confident that they will give a fair, honest measure of justice. He says, that, where there is a parliamentary compact, it should be observed. That part of his argument is all very well. But what I wish to point out is, that the people of Manitoba are sprung from the same stock, are imbued with the same spirit of fair-play as the people of Nova Scotia are, and that, if justice has been done by the Protestant majority of Nova Scotia to the Catholic minority there, the same people in Manitoba, under similar circumstances, will give a similar measure of justice there.

Mr. KENNY. They have not done it yet.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman says they have not done it yet. And we have heard a similar argument advanced, time and again, during this debate. Let me ask the hon. gentleman, what opportunity have they had? How many months elapsed after it was first known that their law infringed upon the privileges or rights of the minority before they were called upon to remedy it?

Mr. KENNY. Five years.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought this question up, because I wish this argument to be settled once and for ever. Until the month of February, 1895, it was not known, it was not believed by a lawyer in this Dominion, that the judgment of the Privy Council would be as it was. It was believed by everybody, that the judgment of 1892 had for ever settled the question. It was not known, it was not believed, that the law was an infringement upon post-union privileges. I believe petitions had been presented to the Council before that, but the Council did not act, and would not act, because they were not sure of their power. As soon as it was determined, that this legislation of Manitoba did infringe upon the privileges of the minority, then, and not till then, the time began to run when Manitoba might fairly be expected to remedy the wrong, if wrong there was. But I have pointed out to the hon. gentleman, that the ink was not dry upon the judgment before the government of Manitoba, instead of being invited to do justice to the minority, were hailed as culprits before the bar of the Privy Council and threatened with coercion, if they did not restore the separate schools to these people.

Mr. KENNY. The majority coerced the minority in Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman sees—and no man has a clearer mind—that it was not till the Privy Council's judgment was given in 1895, that it was known, that there was any infringements of the rights of the minority. The judgment of the Privy Council in 1892 had run in an entirely different direction, and had shown that the Act of 1890 did not infringe any privilege which our Roman Catholic friends were supposed to have. But, Sir, I want nothing more than the main lines laid down by the hon. gentleman in his speech last night. Sir, I come from a province where the Free School Act was introduced as far back as the year 1877. I had the honour of introducing that Act myself. I was charged with doing an act of grievous injustice to the Roman Catholic minority of that province. Nothing was ever further from my thought and wishes than to do an injustice to anybody, minority or majority. I knew I had not done an injustice. Petitions were sent from all over this Dominion to the Federal Government to disallow the law, but the Dominion Government refused to disallow it. I was attacked venomously by my opponents for having dealt a cruel blow at the Roman Catholic separate schools. I was told, that I was the enemy of the church; I was told that I was a Protestant bigot; I was told that I was a man who had not the interest of the people at heart. I was denounced, day in and day out, until, I fancy, a large number of people must have thought that I was a kind of ogre, ready to do wrong wherever I could against those of a different faith from my own. I had the privilege of meeting with the predecessor of the present Archbishop of Halifax, the Right Reverend Dr. Hannan, who talked the whole matter over with me. He had the matter submitted to him by the then Bishop of Prince Edward Island. I submitted to him, the provincial government's side of the story. The Archbishop talked it over with the Right Reverend Bishop McIntyre. And what was the result? The result was a settlement upon lines so broad, so tolerant, so generous and so just, that, twenty years after that Act was passed, although there has hardly been an amendment, even to the extent of dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," and, although, when it was passed, nearly half the population were up and denouncing it, I stand here proudly, in this House, and say, that not a man can be found in Prince Edward Island to-day who will say, that a scintilla of injustice is being perpetrated upon the Roman Catholics of that province. And why is that? If we Prince Edward Islanders had been taken by the throat then and told: We will coerce you into yielding this, that and the other; if the minority of Prince Edward Island had been taken under the wing of a majority of this Parliament; if this Parliament had then attempted to dictate to us—

Mr. WELSH. They couldn't do it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—how we should act, what concessions we should make, is there a man here who imagines that we would be living in the blissful state we are to-day, under a system which gives even-handed justice to all, and which is complained of by none? Sir, do you doubt that the same results which flowed from the policy of concillation in Prince Edward Island and in Nova Scotia would also follow the adoption of the same policy towards Manitoba? Do you doubt, Sir, that if you do to them as you did to us—if you adopt towards that province the statesmanlike policy which was adopted towards New Brunswick in its day of trial, and which was adopted towards Prince Edward Island in its day of trial—the bitterness, and the strife, and the party, racial and religious differences which threaten to divide and dismember this new confederacy altogether, will be entirely allayed and done away with? Sir, I appeal against the whole policy of coercion, to the experience of a quarter of a century in the maritime provinces; and I say that you are not statesmen if you ignore it. I say if you adopt a policy of coercion which is hateful to this age, you are adopting a policy which will undermine the foundations upon which this great confederation has been established. We are a country of different races, of different creeds; we cannot live together except we are prepared to extend to each other reasonable toleration, fair-play and even-handed justice. I re-echo the words which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) uttered last night, that in his opinion, the people of all parts of this Dominion, the majority of every province, is prepared to extend that toleration, that even-handed justice, if they are only permitted to do so. Why, then, interfere just now by adopting this hateful principle, repugnant to every British mind, repugnant to every French mind, repugnant to every Canadian mind, a policy which, as I said just now, may result—I hope to God it won't—in disrupting this new confederacy from one end to the other? Now, Sir, it is said that this remedial order was not a drastic order, that Manitoba should not have taken offence at it, that it was in itself really a species of conciliation. Why, Sir, any man in his senses who takes up that remedial order, will see that nothing could be more peremptory, nothing could be more arbitrary, nothing could be more drastic. The hon. Minister of Justice intimated, and the Minister of the Interior followed him, that the remedial order must be read in connection with the covering reasons—the covering order, I think they called it—the reasons given by the Council for its passage. Sir, the province of Manitoba had simply to do with the remedial order itself, and that remedial order in its terms was as severe, as drastic, and as arbitrary as the English language could make it. It ordered, and required, and adjudged that they should restore, without further inquiry, and without reference to the facts, every right or privilege which the petitions alleged the Roman Catholic minority of the province had received by post-union legislation. It gave no room for conciliation, it gave no room for compromise; it gave no room for treating as between the contending parties and seeing if a fair and just basis could not be arrived at, which would do even-handed justice to both parties. Instead of negotiations, you had judgment; instead of conciliation, you had this peremptory order; instead of discussion, you had this absolute decree; and in face of that, what could the Manitoba legislature do, but resent it? You did not give them a chance to do otherwise. There was nothing left for them but to say what they did say. And what did they say? They said: In our judgment, we doubt very much whether you have examined into the facts; you cannot have known the facts; if you had the facts before you, you never would have made such an order. Sir, let me call attention to the reply given by the Manitoba legislature to that drastic order of the Privy Council, in order to see whether there was that bitter spirit of animosity prevailing in that country which it is alleged there was; or whether, on the contrary, there was a desire to settle this question upon a fair, a just, and an equitable basis. Sir, I find, at page 355 of this blue-book, that in the following month of June, the legislature of Manitoba met, and in replying to the remedial order, they state:

The privileges which by the said order we are commanded to restore to our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens are substantially the same privileges which they enjoyed previously to the year 1890. Compliance with the terms of the order would restore Catholic separate schools with no more satisfactory guarantees for their efficiency than existed prior to the said date.

The educational policy embodied in our present statutes was adopted after an examination of the results of the policy theretofore followed under which the separate Roman Catholic schools (now sought to be restored) had existed for a period of upwards of 19 years. The said schools were found to be inefficient. As conducted under the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education they did not possess the attributes of efficient modern public schools. Their conduct, management and regulation were defective; as a result of leaving a large section of the population with no better means of education than was thus supplied, many people grew up in a state of illiteracy. So far as we are aware there has never been an attempt made to defend these schools on their merits, and we do not know of any ground upon which the expenditure of public money in their support could be justified.

And further down:

We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not available then to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools.

We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order.

Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall cheerfully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.

Well, Sir, I submit this reply was calculated to promote a conciliatory settlement, and that the olive branch which was held out by the Manitoba legislature in the words I have just read should have been accepted by our Government. They say: We cannot conceive that in making that drastic order you really understood the whole case. We do not want to do injustice, we invite you to examine what was the character and working of the old school system, and we invite you to examine what was the effect of the new system. We do not dispute your power to interfere, but do not interfere, do not order us to do anything, until you find out the facts. Could anything be more in accordance with common sense? Could anything be plainer? Could anything be more reasonable? I say that if the Government had been animated by any desire to do what was right and fair, they would have accepted the invitation, and would have entered upon the inquiry; and I venture to say that if they had done so, we would not be to-day in the miserable condition in which we find ourselves, with parties divided upon the eve of an election by racial and religious differences fanned to white heat. Now, Sir, what was done then? For the first time, the Government of Canada began to discover that they had done wrong. There was an honourable backdown on their part. It is well known that the Cabinet is entirely divided as to the manner of dealing with this matter. The members of the Cabinet who desired to settle the matter on a conciliatory basis were for the moment in the ascendancy. They determined to negotiate. They practically withdrew the remedial order. They penned an Order in Council which indicated a desire to settle this matter by means of a compromise. They did not want to carry out the remedial order of July. They were perfectly satisfied then to get a half loaf. They seemed to be on the eve of accepting the offer which the Manitoba government had made them, and I have never been able to find out why, having written the Order in Council they did in July, 1895, they afterwards retreated to the coercive policy which they had adopted in February, 1895. What do they say:

In the interest of all concerned it will not be disputed that if possible the subject of education should be exclusively dealt with by the local legislature. Upon every ground in the opinion of the sub-committee this course is to be preferred, and with the hope that this course may yet be followed the sub-committee have now the honour to recommend that Your Excellency will be pleased to urge upon the government of Manitoba the following further views which may be pressed in connection with the remedial order.

The remedial order coupled with the answer of the Manitoba government has vested the Federal Legislature with complete jurisdiction in the premises, but it by no means follows that it is the duty of the Federal Government to insist that provincial legislation to be mutually satisfactory should follow the exact lines of this order. It is hoped, however, that a middle course will commend itself to the local authorities, so that Federal action may become unnecessary.

With a view to a settlement upon this basis, it seems desirable to ascertain by friendly negotiations what amendments to the Acts respecting education in public schools in the direction of the main wishes of the minority may be expected from the Manitoba legislature.

That is all which could be desired. There is a disposition shown to accept the offer for inquiry. What became of it? Why did they not act upon it? No investigation was held, nobody was sent. Why did not a member of the Government go out to Manitoba? Why was this movement not followed up with an inquiry of some sort? No one knows, no explanation has been given. The only explanation is that the coercive branch of the Government again gained the ascendancy, and the olive branch which they had been willing to hold out was again withdrawn.

Then we have the final reply of the Manitoba government, dated December, 1895, in which they say:

It is a matter of regret that the invitation extended by the legislative assembly to make a proper inquiry into the facts of the case has not been accepted, but that, as above stated, the advisers of His Excellency have declared their policy without investigation. It is equally a matter of regret that Parliament is apparently about to be asked to legislate without investigation. It is with all deference submitted that such a course seems to be quite incapable of reasonable justification and must create the conviction that the educational interest of the people of the province of Manitoba are being dealt with in a hostile and peremptory way by a tribunal whose members have not approached the subject in a judicial spirit or taken the proceedings necessary to enable them to form a proper opinion upon the merits of the question.

The inquiry asked for by the reply of the legislature to the remedial order should, in the opinion of the undersigned, be again earnestly invited, and in the event of the invitation being accepted the scope of the inquiry should be sufficiently wide to embrace all available facts relating to the past or present school systems.

The desire of the legislature and government of the province throughout the whole course of the proceedings, beginning with the enactments of the statutes of 1890, has been to provide the best possible means of education for the children of our citizens. To that end every possible effort has been put forth and every possible pecuniary sacrifice made in order that there might be established a school system based upon sound principles and equipped and administered in accordance with improved modern educational methods. Though very much remains to be accomplished it may be fairly asserted that a reasonable measure of success has attended the efforts which have thus been put forth.

In amending the law from time to time and in administering the system it is the earnest desire to remedy every well-founded grievance and to remove every appearance of inequality or injustice that may be brought to notice.

With a view to so doing, the government and the legislature will always be ready to consider any complaint that may be made in a spirit of fairness and conciliation.

Nothing could be more commendable than the language of this Order in Council, nothing could evince a more strong or sincere desire and disposition on the part of the Manitoba government to do what was right, and to submit to any order that might be made by this Government, or any legislation that might be carried by this Parliament, provided only they were granted what was asked, namely, a full and proper investigation of the facts. Now, we have this Bill before Parliament, and hon. members are bound to ask themselves: Are we bound to legislate? Everybody says, certainly not. The Lord Chancellor says, certainly not, unless Parliament is convinced that there is a substantial ground for their action. Nobody denies that. But how are we to be convinced? Is it to be by speeches delivered across the floor by hon. members of this House, or is it to be by the production of evidence? There is no evidence on which we can arrive at an honest conclusion. I do not deny the power of this Parliament to legislate; I do not deny that under certain circumstances we ought to legislate; but I assert that our right to legislate depends entirely on the decision as to whether the case is one of urgent necessity, whether there has been a flagrant injustice committed. If Manitoba had declined absolutely to remove that grievance, I say we ought to legislate. Our powers are to be exercised as a last resort, and as a last resort only, and the best remedy we can apply will be a poor and impotent remedy, compared with that which can be given by the local legislature. The Minister of Justice and the Minister of the Interior admit that one ounce of a remedial proposition carried out by the provincial legislature is worth more than one pound of remedial measure attempted to be carried out by this Parliament. It is admitted on all hands that even if you approach the subject with a fervent and strenuous determination to do right, it is the most difficult matter possible to carry out. You are beset with difficulties on all sides, and when you pass your law there are no means of carrying it into effect. What have we here? We have urgency denied, we have injustice denied, we have investigation asked for, we have the promise of fairness and conciliation by the local government, and if, on investigation, any injustice is shown, we have the pledge of the local legislature, reiterated by the government of Manitoba that they will apply a remedy. Under such circumstances, it will be a high-handed act on our part, it will be a tyrannical exercise of our constitutional rights, and an abuse of those rights to endeavour to force a coercion Bill through Parliament, and impose on that province a system which the enormous majority of the people say they are opposed to. How can we impose such a system against the wishes of the people. Can it be successfully argued that you can do so in the interests of the minority? No. The interests of the minority are not subserved by passing an abortive law which can never go into effect; the interests of the minority are not conserved or preserved by attempting to pass a law which is admittedly ineffective and which, unless supplemented by further legislation, will not be worth the paper on which it is written. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman who moved the Bill (Sir Charles Tupper), and the hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon (Mr. Foster), both appealed to this House in warm and impassioned language, not only to pass this law because it was within our competence, not only to pass this law because the constitutional duty lay upon us; but they appeal to the higher law, to the golden rule, to do unto others as we would that others should do unto us. And by virtue of that higher rule, they ask us to force this coercive law upon the people of Manitoba. How can any maritime province man, who remembers the history of his own province vote for this Bill on any such plea? Sir, if I adopted the higher rule of doing unto others as I would be done by, then I must refuse to vote for a coercive Bill, carried in Parliament without investigation, and in the face of the denial by the province to be coerced that any injustice exists. I must refuse to do towards Manitoba what I would resist if other people tried to do towards the province I represent, and inasmuch as I would resist coercive legislation being applied under similar circumstances to Prince Edward Island, I should according to the higher law and the golden rule, refuse to apply coercion to a people who are piteously imploring us to investigate the alleged injustice and pledging that they will do justice if you only give them a chance.

Now, Sir, let us look at the legal aspect of this law which is now proposed. Is the law in itself of any use? Can it legally be made of any effect? Is it a final law or can you legislate afterwards upon it? Sir, is our legislation in this matter final and irrevocable, or not? The question is an important, if not a vital one. If the answer is in the affirmative few would care to pass it now in the dying hours of a moribund Parliament, just before an appeal is to be made to the people. If, on the contrary, it is ordinary legislation, amendable and repealable from session to session the evils, the defects and the dangers are neither so great nor so grave. But our jurisdiction is neither exclusive nor general nor concurrent with the provinces. We possess simply a limited power, absolutely dependent upon certain necessary antecedent conditions and once exercised it cannot be recalled. The Bill once passed, cannot by us or by our successors be repealed. When we properly legislate, our legislation becomes part of the educational law of Manitoba. As such it would seem to follow that it must be open to amendment from time to time by the Manitoba legislature, subject, like the rest of the educational laws of the province, to an appeal to the Privy Council by an aggrieved minority. But if our power is a strictly limited, conditional one, then it follows that once exercised it could not by us be recalled, the power once crystallized into law the law could not afterwards by us be repealed. A fortiori, it could not be repealed in part by amendment or modification. To justify a subsequent interference, we must show some general power. We have none. If we can amend we can repeal; if we can recall in part, we can in whole, and that necessarily implies a general, if not an exclusive, jurisdiction. Nor does it seem we can reserve our powers in part for a future Parliament to exercise. In my opinion, it is a power to be exercised 'ad hoc.' We cannot delegate it, neither can we reserve it wholly or partially. In so far as we fail to legislate for the remedy of any grievance, whether A, B or C, adjudged by the remedial order, just in so far do we and have we exercised and exhausted our discretion. By the very act of accepting and enacting "A," and declining to accept or enact "B," we have exercised and exhausted the limited statutory jurisdiction vested in us. We can determine to postpone action, or we can decline to act at all, but if we do act, our action will be final and must be complete.

Does the Bill exceed our jurisdiction? Our power to legislate is based entirely on the remedial order. It is argued with much force that we can only legislate to carry out the identical findings and decrees of the remedial order, neither less nor more, and that only if and when the legislature refuses to carry out these findings. It is denied that we have power to legislate to carry these findings out in part for the reason that the legislature might have carried that part out if ordered so to do. In other words, if the remedial order directs "A," "B" and "C" to be done, and the legislature declines to carry "A," "B" and "C" out, then this Parliament has not power to enact "A" alone, or "A" and "B" alone, for the reason that the legislature, if it had been required to carry out such a limited remedial order, might have been perfectly willing to do so. It is said that it is only the legislature's refusal to act which gives us jurisdiction at all, and as there has been no refusal to remedy grievance "A" alone or grievance "B" alone, or "A" and "B" alone, we have no jurisdiction to do so. The argument is a very strong one, and has the sanction of eminent legal authorities. If sound it is absolutely fatal to this Bill. But whether this be so or not, and on that I express no opinion, at any rate, it is plain beyond dispute that this Parliament cannot legislate beyond the very terms and specific adjudications or findings of the remedial order. In my opinion, such an order, being the controlling basis of all legislation, never ought to be made without a thorough investigation into all the disputed facts. The Privy Council, to which the appeal is made, must first determine what facts are proved, what grievances actually exist, and then, as a matter of state policy, how far it is proper or wise or prudent to go in ordering redress. The extent of their decision necessarily limits our powers, and we cannot act as a court of appeal with unlimited jurisdiction and decide on adopting other or different modes of redress to those decreed and adjudged by the remedial order. We can determine, under the circumstances, not to act for the present, not to exercise at this particular time our statutory discretion, or we can determine to exercise it in whole or in part, but our statutory discretion is necessarily limited by the terms of the order. Now, look at this order. It prescribes as a remedy "A," "B" and "C," and those only. It does not in any other respect alter, abridge or amend the Acts of 1890. It authorizes us to enact such legislation as is necessary to carry "A," "B" and "C" into effect, but nothing beyond that. We cannot interfere with the general scope of the educational machinery of Manitoba, except to the extent that is essential and necessary to carry out "A," "B" and "C." The remedial order says nothing about establishing a separate Board of Education. It is absolutely silent on the subject. Unless it is necessarily implied in "A," "B" and "C," we cannot legally constitute such a board. All the rights and privileges conceded to the Roman Catholic minority by the remedial order can as well be carried out by the existing Board of Education of Manitoba as by a separate board. If the contrary was thought, the remedial order should have expressly mentioned it. But a separate board is not necessary to give the minority "A," "B" and "C." If the Manitoba legislature had by legislation of its own, in obedience to the remedial order, conceded the Roman Catholic minority the right to build, maintain, equip, manage and conduct and support Roman Catholic schools under the supervision of the existing Board of Education, we could not interfere to supplement their legislation by establishing such a separate board. Neither can we do so unless such is adjudged and ordered by the remedial order. The establishment of such a board is neither expressly adjudged by the remedial order, nor necessarily to be implied from the three specific rights adjudged nor essential effectually to confer those rights. This being so, we have no power to constitute such a board, and the Act before us being ultra vires in that respect, will be only useful as a source of unlimited litigation.

I have reduced my views on that abstract legal question to writing with very great care, and I commend them to the hon. Minister of Justice or to any other legal gentleman on the other side of the House who feels disposed to controvert them. If I am right in my conclusion, the measure you have before you, if passed, will not be worth the paper on which it is written. I may be wrong; I am open to conviction if I am wrong. That, of course, is a practical legal question which only legal gentlemen will indulge in. I am satisfied that the reasoning cannot be controverted; and unless you can show conclusively that involved and necessarily involved in A, B, and C, is the constitution of a separate board of education, then you have no power whatever to constitute it. I have argued, and I am satisfied beyond a doubt, that A, B, and C can be carried out successfully by the present Board of Education as established. That being so, A, B, and C is the extent of the remedy you can propose, and you cannot add to that remedy an additional one. You cannot constitute a board which the remedial order did not call into existence or require.

Now, Sir, I ask the Government what are they doing in the matter of conciliation? In July they were prepared to conciliate. Where do we stand to-day? We stand here, with the Secretary of State inviting urging, almost imploring, this House to pass a coercion Bill in one breath, and in the next breath telling us that he is about to invite the Premier of Manitoba to enter into consultation with him for the purpose of coming to an amicable settlement. Sir, he asks us to forge a club for him which he may hold over the head of the Manitoba Premier, and, with that club in his hand, say to him: "Now, Sir, I want you to come to an amicable settlement with me." Does he suppose that it is within the bounds of possibility to reach an amicable settlement in that way? And what did we hear to-day? That there was not a scintilla of basis for the statement he made to the House the other day, as to any proposition have been initiated by Mr. Greenway at all. The very telegram he quoted was only quoted in part, and Mr. Greenway has complained bitterly in the local legislature that the whole of it, which he deems important, was not quoted. But, Sir, if the Government are only discharging their duty under the constitution, if what they are doing is imperative upon them, and they are not going further than the constitution requires them to go, I ask, what do they want with consultation, with conciliation? If they are being impelled by a stern sense of duty under the constitution, how dare they hesitate? How dare they retract or withdraw? It shows the utter fallacy, the ridiculously nonsensical fallacy, of the arguments behind which they seek to shelter themselves for want of better. It shows their want of sincerity. I say that these gentlemen are acting in a way which, if human nature is the same in Manitoba as elsewhere, must prevent a frank, friendly, and final settlement of this difficulty. Sir, what is their true policy? If they want to settle it, they can honourably withdraw the Bill yet. There is no dishonour in withdrawing the Bill. They have been told, time and again, and I repeat the statement, that on this side of the House we want to make no political capital out of this question. We are anxious to have it withdrawn from the arena of Dominion politics. We are sincerely desirous of having conceded to the minority in Manitoba the rights and privileges which they ought to enjoy; and we think that can be done, and will be done, if you abandon coercion and enter upon a policy of negotiation and conciliation. We know that conciliation has marked out satisfactory results elsewhere, and we believe that if you adopt it here, an honourable and lasting arrangement, based upon truth, honour and righteousness—which alone can make such an arrangement permanent—can be entered into. You can make an arrangement, which, while doing justice to the minority, will not violate the conscience of the majority or unnecessarily invade the autonomy of the province. You can recognize provincial rights, while, at the same time contending that injustice has been done to the minority which should be remedied; and when you come to determine just how far that ought to be done, it must necessarily be a matter of compromise, and be done in a conciliatory spirit, if done at all.

Holding these views, I oppose this Bill. I oppose this Bill because it is a political fraud, a parliamentary juggle; because it embodies the maximum of evil with the minimum of good; because, while applying a coercion hateful to all Canadians, it is confessedly inefficient and unworkable; because, in its very face, it lacks finality, and by calling for further amendments must necessarily rekindle and encourage racial and religious disputes. I oppose it because it involves an interference with provincial rights, only to be tolerated in the last resort, and after careful investigation proves the existence of well-founded grievances, which the legislature will not remedy. I oppose it because, while technically within our powers, it is, under present circumstances, morally outside them, and because it is an uncalled-for and arbitrary exercise of a limited constitutional privilege or power only to be resorted to when all other means have failed. I oppose it because, while ostensibly pretending to remedy the grievances of the minority, it gives them no effectual relief, and while creating a vast and obnoxious machinery, provides no motive power, either to start it going, or keep it moving. I oppose it because the experience of all the provinces has shown that the majority in each province will, if left to themselves, do even-handed justice to the minority. I oppose it because, while violating the established practice of a quarter of a century, it creates a precedent which, if followed, may eventually disrupt and destroy the confederacy. I oppose it because, involving one of the gravest questions of state policy, ever brought before us, a question pregnant with most far-reaching and dangerous results, it is beyond the moral competence of this dying Parliament, in its dying hour to enact. I oppose it because in my judgment it is more than doubtful whether, once passed, it can afterwards be altered or amended by this Parliament, because the power given to us to legislate at all strictly limited and dependent upon certain necessary antecedent conditions once exercised is exhausted and cannot be again acted upon, because it is probably final and irrevocable, so far as we are concerned, and, therefore, doubly calls for prudence, care, time, and investigation on our part before being made the law of the land. I oppose it because the present exercise by us of the power is bitterly opposed to the wishes and desires of the vast majority of the Manitoba people. I oppose the Bill because the higher law, and the golden rule bids me do unto others as I would be done by, and as I would bitterly resent coercion being applied under similar circumstances, to my province, so I will decline, unless in the last resort, and after fullest investigation, to join in applying it to another province. I oppose it because I do not believe in force as a remedy for wrong.

But while I oppose this Bill, I know there is a better way, a nobler path to follow, a simpler and more British method by which the grievances may be removed, and justice for the minority obtained. That way, that path, that method, is the equitable and British method proposed by the leader of the Liberal party. His earnestness, his sincerity, his ability, are beyond cavil or doubt. His race, his creed, his experience render his position unique, and his powers in such a case as this, very great. His noble statesmanlike views put forward in his speech during this debate have established for him a reputation and a confidence rarely before enjoyed by a Canadian public man. His proposition for a settlement commends itself to our common sense, and involves an amicable settlement through provincial legislation, based on conciliation and compromise, and after thorough discussion and investigation. Sir, I cannot but believe that with coercion abandoned and conciliation substituted the Protestant majority of Manitoba will be ready to accord to their weaker brethren a full measure of justice, pressed down and running over.

Mr. POWELL. I have had the pleasure, on numerous occasions, of listening to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I have heard him, at times, speak more recklessly than to-night, but I have scarcely ever heard him make a speech in which he has been more regardless of the rules—I might almost say, of propriety. In starting, he complained of the language of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). He complained, that the Minister of Finance had accused the Opposition of almost every crime in the calendar. I think this is an instance in which the wicked flee and no man pursueth. He was also pleased to pay his respects to the hon. leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper). Sir, the leader of the House has been too long in public life, has earned too well his spurs, to need any commendation from the hon. gentleman; and, his character and ability are so recognized in this country that I can with confidence leave him to his own fate. I am but expressing the opinion, not only of our own side of the House, but the real opinion of the other side of the House, that what troubles the gentleman is not his character, but his strength, that what inspires him is not a feeling of hate, but a sense of fear; and, when he tells me in this House, that Sir Charles Tupper has not the confidence of his province, and that his course with respect to confederation has begotten an enmity which has never yet been allied, I can point him to the election of 1878, when he swept his native province of Nova Scotia; I can point him to the election of 1882, when he again swept that province; I can point him to the election of 1887, when he swept it by a still more increased majority; I can point him to the election of 1891, when that province returned the large following which he has in this House to-day.

An hon. MEMBER. They will do it again.

Mr. POWELL. Do it again? Of course, they will do it again.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They will never do it again.

Mr. POWELL. I have heard the cries of "never do it again" on the eve of every election. I heard it on the eve of the election of 1882 and on the eve of the election of 1887; and on the eve of the election of 1891, Opposition papers teemed with the strongest prophecies of coming glory. He and his party were to be swept from power; and, Sir, when the smoke of battle had cleared away on election day, they were as dumb as mummies in the tombs of the Pharaohs; they were inanimate as the hordes of Sen-nacherib.

I shall not follow the hon. gentleman in—I can not call it his argument—but in his semblance of argument. I shall only incidentally touch any point he made. The main burden of his song is, that we should have a commission. Pray heaven, what do we want of a commission? The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) says we want it for three things: First, to establish the policy of the Roman Catholic Church—to establish the fact, that, with Roman Catholics separate schools are a matter of conscience. Secondly, to establish the fact, that the edu-educational system of Manitoba is a system of Protestant schools; and, thirdly, to establish whether there was or not an agreement in respect to educational matters at the time that province entered confederation. Now, I shall take those up seriatim. In respect of the policy of the Roman Catholic Church, is there a man in this House, is there a boy attending a college or an academy, who does not know the policy of that church? Why, does it need any investigation? The attention of every man has been called more or less to the history and policy of that church which has lived so long and whose greatness has been such as to warm the imagination, if it does not captivate the heart of every man, that institution which, at times, has been so great in its strength that it played with monarchs as with chessmen, and assumed to dole out empires beyond the unknown seas. Why, the very existence of British law, as a separate system, distinguished from the system of Roman law, is due to her policy. It is due to the fact that the Catholic Church, even in the days of the early Plantagenets, in the reign of Henry II, desired to control education. She thrust her favoured tenets into Bologna, Padua, Paris, Oxford and Cambridge; and it was the rebellion of our Catholic forefathers, who favoured the old laws as against the canon law, which established British law. Why, our forefathers, when Catholics, invariably pursued that policy, and I may say to-day, that, in respect of higher education, we ourselves pursue that policy, just as they did in olden times, and as the Catholic Church desires to pursue it to-day, in respect to elementary education as well. And, in respect to this matter, I claim that they are more logical. Every Protestant church has decided, as a matter of policy, to take charge of higher education, to see to it that young men should be trained under Christian influences. This is precisely the object of the Roman Catholic Church. But, while extreme Protestants, and they are only extreme Protestants, are exciting animosities against Catholics for meddling with education, let them reflect upon the fact that their policy is identically the same, the only difference being that the Roman Catholics are more logical than the Protestants. They say: Give us the child while he is young, while his mind is plastic, while we can mould his character. We are unwilling that he should grow up to be infidel, or atheistic, or agnostic. The Protestant says: Leave the child to the tender mercies of the public school where religion is not taught, and after his views are comparatively set we will endeavour in our denominational colleges to supply the want or to undo the wrong done in the early days of his education. We know that, the world over, the Roman Catholic Church is anxious that religion should be taught in the school. That is their policy.

Mr. POWELL.

We need no commission to enlighten us as to that point. As to the schools of Manitoba, where, I ask, are we to learn their character? We must take what is sanctioned by the statute and regulations of the educational authorities. Those are open to every member of this House. All you have to do is to get the statute and the school regulations. Is a commission necessary in order to discover where the statute is? Must we have a commission to find out where the office of the educational authorities of Manitoba is, so as to send a messenger there for a copy of the regulations? It is perfect nonsense; it is perfect subterfuge.

Now, as to whether there was an agreement or not, I am thoroughly convinced that there was, so fully convinced that my mind has not a shadow of a doubt upon the question. In respect to that matter, Mr. Speaker, four contentions have been put forth. Three were touched upon and set forth to-night by the hon. member for Queen's, the other has been put forth by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). There are: 1. That the Manitoba Act was not a legislative compact, but a legislative concession. 2. That there was no agreement at all respecting denominational schools. 3. That if there was an agreement, it cannot prevail as against the written constitution; and, 4. even if there was an agreement, we are not obliged under the constitutional provisions relating to appeal to grant any measure of relief. Let me deal with the contentions of the hon. member for Simcoe first. Now, Sir, was the Manitoba Act a parliamentary compact or was it a legislative concession? If the Parliament of Canada, having the right of sovereignty over that country, assumed to extend certain privileges to the minority gratuitously, it had the right to recall these privileges. I acknowledge that as a fundamental principle of ordinary parliamentary jurisdiction. But, Sir, the hon. member for Simcoe last year entirely misrepresented the case to the House when he concealed the fact that Canada had not the right of sovereignty in Manitoba at the time the Manitoba Act was passed, nay, when he actually stated to the House that at that time Canada had the right of sovereignty in Manitoba. Canada did not acquire the right of sovereignty until after the passing of the Manitoba Act itself. Let us digress here for a moment—and I hope I shall not weary the House if I give the facts relating to this matter. Before the passing of the confederation there was a feeling of unrest among the people there. They actually at one time held a convention of the inhabitants, and wrote to an hon. member of this House who represented Toronto, urging the necessity of incorporating that territory with Canada, presenting the alternative of annexation to the United States. Canada determined to acquire the territory. In 1867 a joint address was sent by the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada to the Queen asking that the North-west Territories should be incorporated under the provisions of section 146 of the British North America Act. The Queen in Council took this matter into consideration, and in April, 1868, replied signifying her willingness to grant the prayer of the joint address. However, there was a difficulty in the way. They could not transfer the territories without violating the rights of the Hudson Bay Company. On 31st July, 1868, there was passed in the British Parliament, an Act which authorized the Queen to negotiate with the Hudson's Bay Company and to accept the surrender of the franchise of government and the territorial rights which they had in that country. Canada was notified of this. Canada hastily, without the slightest authority in the world, without any more authority than a convention of the Esquimo would have, passed a statute making provision for the government of the country. This excited the people of those territories and rebellion ensued—at least we call it rebellion, but it was not a rebellion, Sir, I say boldly on the floor of this House that Riel's first action in Winnipeg excepting the murder of Scott and other crimes, was a justifiable action. It was the action of a man defending his hearth and home against the intruder. Canada went in there without the slightest shadow of right, and the resistance met was offered to trespassers and interlopers. When the trouble arose, our astute chieftain, Sir John Macdonald cried a halt in the proceedings until the British government should have peace established in the country, by England or the Hudson Bay Company. Negotiations were set on foot. These negotiations ended in an Act of Parliament which we know as the Manitoba Act. But still Canada had no power over the territory. On the 23rd June, 1870, not less than a month and ten days after the passage of the Manitoba Act, the Queen, under the terms of the Act of 1868, took a surrender of the rights and franchises in these territories of the Hudson Bay Company. The very next day the Order in Council was passed and the proclamation issued joining that country with Canada, and giving Canada for the first time any right there. In the face of these facts the Manitoba Act, passed the 12th day of May, 1870, could not be a legislative concession. There could have been no concession because there was no sovereignty. Canada had nothing to concede. The Manitoba Act was purely and simply a legislative compact, which was, after the acquisition by Canada of the Red River settlements, on June 23rd, 1870, made valid as a statute by the Imperial Act of June 29th, 1871, confirming it. The second point is as to whether there was an agreement made as respects the public schools. The hon. Minister of Finance has gone into the telegrams, despatches and memorials that passed backwards and forwards, and I am sorry to weary the House with repeating them. I shall supplement his statement, however, with others. When the trouble arose Canada sent a commissioner, Mr. Donald A. Smith, now Sir Donald Smith, the hon. member for Montreal West, to the North-west. Two others went with him. The proposals they made resulted in commissioners being sent from Manitoba to Canada—Father Richot, Mr. John Scott and Dr. Black, to negotiate a treaty on the terms of which the Red River Settlements should come into confederation. Difficulties delayed their coming. During all this time negotiations were going on between the Hudson Bay Company, England, Canada and the people of the west. England was informed of every step of the negotiations, and of the object of Mr. Smith going there; and she sent anxious telegrams from time to time inquiring as to the progress of negotiations. Earl Granville, on 25th February, 1870, telegraphed Sir John Young, then Governor General of Canada:

Hudson Bay Company are anxious about the negotiations at Ottawa with the delegates from Red River. The settlement would probably be facilitated if Northcote were with you with full powers entrusted by the company. If so, what would be the best time for his arrival?

Recognizing the negotiations. Then again in a despatch, the contents of which were sent to the home government, dated 16th February, 1870, Sir John Young wrote a letter of instructions to Bishop Taché, in which occurs the following words:—

In this last letter I wrote: All who have complaints to make, or wishes to express, to address themselves to me, as Her Majesty's representative, and you may state with the utmost confidence that the Imperial Government has no intention of acting otherwise, or permitting others to act otherwise, than in perfect good faith towards the inhabitants of Red River district, and of the North-west.

The people may rely that respect and attention will be extended to the different religious persuasions, that title to every description of property will be carefully guarded, and that all the franchises which have subsisted, or which the people may prove themselves qualified to exercise, shall be duly continued, or liberally conferred.

This despatch was ratified by the home government. Afterwards, anxious that the negotiations between these delegates representing the North-west Territories and Rupert's Land and the Government of Canada, should be brought to a successful issue and anxious to be kept informed of every step, on the 17th March, 1870, Earl Granville sent the following telegram to Sir John Young:

Let me know by telegram when you know delegates have started from Fort Garry.

Not only that, but Earl Granville sent a special messenger, Sir Charles H. Murdock, with private instructions to Sir John A. Macdonald, and sent also a despatch to the Governor General of Canada in which occurred these words:

But I have also informed him unreservedly of the views of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the Red River settlement; and I think that if, after free communication with him, you entertain any apprehension as to the conclusion of explicit and satisfactory arrangements, especially with regard to the question to which I have above adverted, you will be at liberty to detain him at Ottawa until all such apprehensions are removed.

After this Granville telegraphs to Young on 18th March:

I have the honour to send your lordship to-day the following telegraphic message:—

Received your telegram of yesterday. No news from Red River settlement as yet of delegates starting.

After that, on 31st March, 1870, Young telegraphs to Granville:

I had the honour to send to your lordship the following telegraphic message:—

Mr. Smith from Red River is on his way to Ottawa, and expected to arrive on Saturday next. He reports all quiet up to the 14th inst. Bishop Taché arrived on the 11th. The convention are in session, discussing plans of adjustment, with Canada. Smith says nothing about delegates.

Afterwards in the extreme anxiety prevailing the propriety of sending troops was discussed. Granville says in a dispatch to the Governor General:

With regard to the conditions on which Imperial troops may be allowed to co-operate with the Canadian force, in supporting order in that settlement. I refer you to the telegram which you have already received, and to the oral explanations which you will receive from Sir C. H. Murdock, who is in possession of the views of Her Majesty's Government.

Subject to these conditions, the number of Imperial troops sent may be 200 or 250 as General Lindsay shall think best. They must, however, be accompanied by such a Canadian force as will enable the Government of Red River to bring together in case of emergency 800 trained volunteers and militia, besides the Imperial troops.

The expense fairly attaching to such British contingent as may be sent will be borne by this country. The rest must be defrayed from the Canadian exchequer.

Young replies to Granville on 4th April, 1870:

Smith came here on Saturday from Fort Garry with bad news. A Canadian, called Scott, was by Riel's orders tried by court martial and shot, with the view, it is supposed, of compromising Riel's followers before Taché had arrived. They say delegates are coming, but it is quite clear Riel will yield to nothing but force. Things now look, I think, very bad.

Young kept the home government posted and sent to Granville the following message on 7th April, 1870:

Last of the delegates is expected at St. Paul's on Thursday the 14th. The others arrived there to-day and may reach Ottawa on Saturday the 9th.

Granville replies to Young on 9th April, 1870:

Mr. POWELL.

Let me know as soon as you can by telegram, result of negotiations with Red River delegates, and immediately whether our conditions as to time of transfer and apportionment of cost of troops are accepted by your Government.

In the meantime Father Richot and Scott were arrested at the instance of the inhabitants of Sarnia. This had been telegraphed to the home government, and so anxious were they about this matter, anxious that a successful issue should be the result of the negotiations that Granville sent the following telegram to Young on 18th April:

Was arrest of delegates authorized by Canadian Government? Send full information by telegram.

Young replies to Granville on 19th April, 1870:

Arrest of delegates was not authorized by Dominion.

Young forwarded to Granville, 21st April, 1870, the following despatch:—

Judge Black has arrived, and I have had two unofficial interviews with him, and perused the papers with which the delegates have been furnished by Riel and his advisers.

These papers were first a letter of instructions, secondly, a bill of rights, and thirdly, a certificate of the delegates appointment. Granville replies to Young on 23rd April, 1870:

On the following conditions troops may advance:—

1. Rose to be authorized to pay £300,000 once, and Her Majesty's Government to be at liberty to make transfer before end of June.

2. Her Majesty's Government to pay expense of British troops only, not exceeding 250, and Canadian Government the rest, sending at least 500 trained men.

3. Canadian Government to accept decision of Her Majesty's Government on all disputed points of the settlers' bill of rights.

Sir, that shows that the settlers' rights were the one thing that was in negotiation between them, and so strong and anxious was the British Government that the rights of these people should be respected, that they actually put the screws on the Dominion and said you must negotiate with the people of Manitoba as your equal, and if any trouble arises between you as respect the terms of the agreement, you shall accept the umpirage of Great Britain, and if you do not the English troops will not proceed and the North-west will not go into the union. Young replied to Granville on 29th April:

No other proceedings have been instituted, or are pending, against the Rev. Mr. Richot or Mr. A. H. Scott, and they together with their colleague, Judge Black, have been in conference with Ministers for several days past in their capacity of delegates from the convention of the people at the Red River.

I think it right to forward to your lordship a copy of the terms and conditions brought by the delegates from the North-west, which have formed the subject of conference.

The rights claimed by the Red River settlers formed the subject matter of the conference. Then Granville replies to Young, April 30th, 1870 :

Your telegraphic proposal is accepted by Her Majesty's Government, provided Canadian Government accepts in other respects mine of 23rd, which ought to have been answered.

On 3rd May, 1870, Young telegraphs to Granville :

Negotiations with delegates closed satisfactorily. A province named Manitoba erected, containing eleven thousand square miles. Lieutenant-Governor appointed by Canada, representative institutions Upper House 7, not exceeding 12 members nominated lower, 24 elected by people, 2 senators in Dominion Senate, 4 representatives in House of Commons, to increase hereafter in proportion to population, pecuniary terms, population taken at 15,000 to be credited in lieu of debt per head $27.27, annual subsidy, as to other provinces, 80 cents per head until population increases to 400,000, further provision of $30,000 a year for expenses of Government ; lands to belong to Dominion, but one million two hundred thousand acres reserved to extinguish claims of half-breeds and Indian titles ; all existing titles and possessions to be quieted, in various other respects same terms as to other provinces ; the rest of the territory, the vast extent unsettled and unpeopled to be governed by the Lieutenant-Governor under instructions from the Canadian Government.

Granville had refused to allow troops to proceed to Red River unless these negotiations were closed, and as soon as they were closed, on 6th May, 1870, Young replies to Granville as follows :—

I may now, I suppose, give final orders for the military to start for Red River ? General Lindsay has asked me for such orders.

On 6th May, 1870, Granville telegraphed Young in reply :

Troops may proceed. Who is in command of expedition ; and what is name of Governor of the Territory.

On 12th May, Young telegraphs to Granville :

Bill for the government of North-west passed, sanctioning conditions agreed upon with delegates. Parliament prorogued to-day.

Granville replies on May 18th, 1870 :

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your despatches (Nos. 85 and 87) of the 25th and 29th April last, inclosing documents connected with the recent disturbances in the Red River territory.

I am glad to learn that the proceedings adopted against the Rev. Mr. Ritchot and Mr. Scott were promptly disposed of and had not been renewed, and I take this opportunity of expressing the satisfaction with which I have learned from your telegram of the 3rd instant that the Canadian Government and the delegates have come to an understanding as to the terms on which the settlement on the Red River should be admitted into the Dominion.

Granville responds in a dispatch on May 19th, 1870 :

I have received with much satisfaction your telegram of the 12th instant announcing that the Bill for the government of the North-west Territory had passed sanctioning the conditions agreed upon with the delegates from the Red River settlement.

After the agreement arrived at between the delegates and the Canadian Government, Father Ritchot took the draft Bill home, laid it before the convention in Rupert's Land, and it was adopted unanimously by the convention. In the face of this what shall we say ? Certainly the Manitoba Act is a legislative contract.

Now, with respect to the educational features of the contract. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) has been pleased to throw reflections on Father Ritchot. I have not the honour of that gentleman's acquaintance. It is sometimes cowardly to prefer a charge, and of course I am not allowed to say in Parliament that on this occasion it is a cowardly act to prefer the charge. Four bills of rights were prepared by the inhabitants of Red River. The first one was in December, 1869. In that bill of rights references were made to schools. What schools ? At that time there was no statute law in the country : what law they had was the common law which every lawyer knows goes with settlement of a colony. They had that, of course, but there was no legislature to enact any statutes. They had, however, educational institutions. What are they ? The only educational institutions at that time were schools of three kinds, Roman Catholic schools, Presbyterian schools and Church of England schools, there were no Methodist or Baptist schools. Then what is meant when the bill of rights speaks of lands being given by the Canadian Government for schools ? It means for denominational schools. It is a principle of law and of common sense that language must be construed with regard to the subject to which it is applied. The only schools were denominational schools, and the bill of rights referred to them. The second bill of rights was dated 5th February. In that bill of rights, which was handed over to Mr. Smith, and every item of which he subsequently answered in the convention, there is an express demand that a certain amount of money should be given annually by the Canadian Government to the inhabitants of that country in order to maintain their schools before they would enter into confederation. To maintain what schools ? The denominational schools—the people of that country knew of none other. Next in order of time was the bill of rights known as No. 4 which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) insinuated was a bogus bill of rights. The last bill of rights, which Mr. McCarthy claims was the correct bill of rights, which the hon. member for Queen's also says was the correct bill of rights, was prepared on the eve of the departure of the delegates from the North-west to Ottawa, to hold a conference with members of the Canadian Government. Hon. members will find in the "Nation," a newspaper published in the city of Winnipeg at that time, that after the delegates returned, and a question arose in regard to varying the bill of rights, it was explained by the man who drew it up that there was so much hurrying in order to send the delegates to Ottawa that it had been changed, and there was not time to lay it before a convention before the delegates departed. Bear in mind that the letter of instructions in regard to the last bill of rights was dated 22nd March. Was there another bill of rights—No. 4. One of the resolutions passed by what is known as the January convention was to the effect that the people should appoint a joint commissioner—that was the term used—to frame a bill of rights. This was done in the early part of February. On February 12th there was a letter of instructions given to Father Ritchot, which he swears was given to him with bill of rights No. 4 by Thomas Bunn, secretary of the commission. It may be asked, how do I know these facts? In 1874, Lepine was tried for murder in connection with the murder of Scott. At that trial, Father Ritchot was sworn, and I have a copy of his evidence here. He said: "I received from Thomas Bunn the copy of the bill of rights that was adopted by the convention which met on 25th January and continued until some time in February." If that statement be true, why all the mystery is cleared up. He swears under oath that that was the bill of rights which was given to him, and it contains the section relating to separate schools. As hon. gentlemen know, immediately after the trial of Lepine, application was made to the Governor General for the commutation of his sentence and release from prison. He was released, and, Sir, it is no secret that Lepine was released from prison, on this ground mainly that Canada had, without the slightest jurisdiction whatever, attempted to thrust herself into that country. A copy of the minutes of trial was prepared in 1874 and sent forward to the Government, and that certified copy of the trial, the minutes of evidence, and all the exhibits, are to-day to be seen by any gentleman who chooses to go to the office of the Secretary of State and see them. Every page of them is certified by the official of the court, and among these papers filed in that office in the early part of 1874 is a certified copy of this document, which my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) says no reasonable man attempts to put forward as genuine.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me? Was that document submitted to the Privy Council as one of the grounds on which they should give relief? Was it mentioned at all?

Mr. POWELL. I may come to that later. You do not think the Privy Council had anything to do with that question, and so it is not pertinent to your argument.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On the application to the Privy Council of Canada for leave to appeal, and in the application which set forth the grievances which these people said they were labouring under, was this bill of rights referred to?

Mr. POWELL. My friend, if you ask something pertinent to your argument or to my argument, I will be pleased to answer it. Father Ritchot was sworn, and gave his testimony in 1874. These sectarian schools were supposed to be settled and established in the North-west, beyond peradventure, at that time. Now, if a man commits perjury, or if a man commits forgery, there must be some motive for it, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what possible motive could the ingenuity of man attribute to Father Ritchot, that he should deliberately commit perjury and forgery, and substitute a forged document for a genuine document, when by so doing there was not the slightest object to be accomplished in the world. It is easy to throw out insinuations. As I said, I have not the pleasure of this gentleman's acquaintance, but I will say:

There is no might or greatness in humanity,
Censure can 'scape back wounding calumny;
The whitest virtue strikes
No King so strong can tie the gall
Up in a slanderous tongue.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) if he is aware—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course, I always notice that if any one on this side of the House interrupts, it is very wrong, but hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House are continually interrupting, and there is no fault found with them on this side of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to make a reference to the argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell). Is the hon. gentleman aware that at the convention which he speaks about, and of which Mr. Thomas Bunn was secretary, that the proceedings and papers and minutes of that convention are all in existence, certified to by Thomas Bunn, including the bill of rights which was passed by that convention; and that bill of rights differs from the bill of rights offered by Father Ritchot, and filed in the Lepine trial? Father Ritchot's bill contains a clause asking for separate schools, while the bill of the convention which is in existence, and signed by Mr. Bunn, omits entirely that clause which regard to separate schools.

Mr. POWELL. I will say to the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg, that it is only fair to assume that a man who attempts to discuss this matter is not so culpably negligent of his duty to this Parliament and this country as not to inquire into a question like that. There is a difference between bill of rights No. 3 and bill of rights No. 4. In No. 3 there is no clause relating to sectarian schools, and in No. 4 there is, and while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) says that the minutes of that convention are in existence—I do not know whether they are or not—this particular bill of rights No. 3, which was given to Dr. Black on the 22nd March, 1870, is not given in the minutes of the convention, and, doubtless, this bill of rights No. 4 was prepared by these joint commissioners, who were directed to prepare it for the purpose of being forwarded to Ottawa. That which he speaks of as No. 3 was not prepared until the time, from the 12th day of February until the 22nd day of March had elapsed, after the appointment of Father Ritchot as a plenipotentiary on their behalf to Ottawa. Is there any inconsistency in the statements that Thomas Bunn on the 12th day of February handed over to Father Ritchot the bill of rights that was presented by this joint commission, that was delegated to prepare it by the convention itself, and that on the 22nd day of March, bill of rights No. 3 was handed to Dr. Black with a letter of instructions, and that both bills of rights were at the conference in Ottawa.

That brings me down to the consideration of the statute itself. There is one thing, that I have no doubt the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and the men who oppose this Bill, would be very desirous, indeed, to see proved, and that is, that these people in convention at Ottawa never discussed the educational problem at all. When these people thought of schools in the first bill of rights, and thought of schools in the second bill of rights, is it not the most natural thing in the world that they should think of schools in another bill of rights? Is there anything extraordinary about that? Is there any indication of fraud about it? Not the slightest in the world. But here is the end of the whole matter. When they met to mould their legislative compact, when they prepared a Bill to be put through this House, what did they do? Sir, if there is anything very serious it is the constitution of a country. If there is one thing that such an accomplished statesman as Sir John Macdonald, such an astute man, such an able lawyer—and I am informed he drafted that Bill himself—if there is one thing he would be more careful about than another, surely it would be the preparation of the constitution of a country. They had a constitution for Canada with which country Manitoba was to be united. But a change was made in the constitution of Canada, on the application of it to Manitoba. Under the constitution of Canada, the British North America Act, as it stood, only these rights which existed "by law" were to be stereotyped—if I may use that term—but under the Manitoba Act, what do we find? The language is changed. There is introduced into it a new term, and it provides for the maintenance of these rights and privileges which existed "by law or by practice." Now, Sir, would a man astute as Sir John Macdonald was, have introduced that word practice into the compact, unless it meant something? Does it not show that education was not only thought of, but thought of most carefully.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) says that we must construe that statute with reference simply to the words that are in it. I am not going to quarrel with that statement. He and I are both lawyers. Any man must, by strict rules of evidence, take a written contract as it is. Any man must, in construing a contract, not go beyond the four corners of the document itself. That is clear, and for strict law purposes, I would say to the hon. gentleman that the verbal negotiations that led up to the contract are by the strict rules of evidence, not part of the contract itself, when the contract is written. But I will say to him further, and he knows it well, that if there is in any written contract, a mistake, or omission, if it is between private parties, the courts of this country will compel it to be reformed. And, the reason why this parliamentary compact cannot be reformed, is, that there is no power in the constitution, there is no court in the land, which has the authority to reform an act of Parliament. It stands for better or for worse absolutely binding until Parliament changes it, no matter what mischief it may work or how opposed it may be to the intentions or agreements which it was suppose to embody.

Now, Sir, in respect to these words, "by practice," let us see just what the Privy Council says about it. I am not referring to the dicta of the judges, but I am referring to the carefully-prepared judgment. In Barrett's case, the sole question raised was, whether the Public Schools Act of 1890 prejudicially affected any right or privilege that the Roman Catholics "by law or practice" had in the province at the union. I ask hon. gentlemen to follow this carefully, and see if every line of it is not permeated with this conviction; that the agreement was not fully implemented in this statute:

Their lordships arrived at the conclusion that this question must be answered in the negative. The only right or privilege which the Roman Catholics then possessed, either by law or in practice, was the right or privilege of establishing and maintaining for the use of members of their own church such schools as they pleased. It appeared to their lordships that this right or privilege remained untouched, and therefore could not be said to be affected by the legislation of 1890. It was not doubted that the object of the first subsection of section 22 was to afford protection to denominational schools, or that it was proper to have regard to the intent of the legislature and the surrounding circumstances in interpreting the enactment. But the question which had to be determined was the true construction of the language used.

The function of a tribunal is limited to construing the words employed ; it is not justified in forcing into them a meaning which they cannot reasonably bear. Its duty is to interpret not to enact. It is true that the construction put by this board upon the first subsection reduced within very narrow limits the protection afforded by that subsection in respect of denominational schools. It may be that those who were acting on behalf of the Roman Catholic community in Manitoba, and those who were acting or assented to the wording of that enactment, were under the impression that its scope was wider, and that it afforded protection greater than their lordship held to be the case. But such considerations cannot properly influence the judgment of those who have judicially to interpret a statute. The question is, not what may be supposed to have been intended, but what has been said. More complete effect might in some cases be given to the intentions of the legislature, if violence were done to the language in which their legislation has taken shape, but such a course would on the whole be quite as likely to defeat as to further the object which was in view.

My hon. friend is a lawyer, and should be very careful of his statements. Does he not know, that the court there based their decision on a strict statutory construction? They said: We cannot, as lawyers, spell out of the four corners of that statute the stereotyping of the denominational school system in Manitoba; but it is clear, we can see through and beyond the statute, that it was intended by the parties to this statutory compact, that these denominational schools should be preserved. And I was pleased, indeed, in reading carefully the speech of my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), of last year, to note that he said—I am not quoting his exact words, but the substance of them: "If I could be thoroughly satisfied, in my own mind, that there was an agreement which was not fully embodied in this statute, and that that agreement guaranteed denominational schools, I would vote for this Parliament giving those schools to them." And even the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was apparently willing to go to the extent of supporting remedial legislation, if he were satisfied of this, for he said in this House last year:

But, Sir, I go a long way with those who say: If the constitution by a slip of the pen has omitted to guarantee rights which were intended to be guaranteed by this Parliament and which were the result of a treaty between the settlers at that time and the authorities here, and because the strict letter of the law does not give that right would you deny it to the people of that province?

I am a Protestant, but I represent a constituency in which there are 13,000 or 14,000 Roman Catholics. But I am not taking my present stand in hope of any favour or reward. Those people are an intelligent people, and I feel proud of them in respect of their economy, their frugality their honesty, their fair-mindedness, and their respect for law. But, Sir, they are divided in politics, and the majority which I had at my back last year of about 800 justifies me in saying, that, under present circumstances, unless some great revolution of feeling takes place, my seat is fairly safe. Supporting and voting for this measure may do me more injury than good. My stand on this question is dictated by my convictions. If I felt sure, as I do feel sure, that a fair and square agreement was made between those people of Manitoba and the Parliament of Canada, under which they forsook their direct allegiance to the British Crown, and threw in their lot with us, both parties intending it to be part of that agreement, that denominational schools should be maintained, I would not be true to the traditions of the British race, if I did not support legislation carrying out that agreement. If there is one thing which we, Englishmen, feel proud of, it is our respect for law and our genius for government; and our political instincts are founded on the eternal principles of right and justice. These principles shall ultimately prevail in Manitoba, as well as in every other portion of Canada.

Now, Sir, the only way that effect can be given to that agreement which the draughtsman of the Manitoba Act thought he had sufficiently provided for, but which he did not sufficiently provide for, is by this Parliament passing remedial legislation, since Manitoba will not. Every principle of British fair play demands that such legislation should be passed.

There is another view of this question. Apart from the documents, the best evidence as to what this compact really was, is the testimony of the men who were parties to the agreement. Let us take the statement of Sir John Macdonald, in his letter, which is contained in Pope's "Life of Sir John Macdonald," at page 249, as follows:—

You ask me for advice as to the course you should take upon the vexed question of separate schools in your province. There is, it seems to me, but one course open to you. By the Manitoba Act the provisions of the British North America Act (section 93), respecting law passed for the protection of minorities in educational matters, are made applicable to Manitoba and cannot be changed, for by the Imperial Act confirming the establishment of the new provinces (34-35 Vict., section 6) it is provided that it shall not be competent for the Parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the Manitoba Act in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba. Obviously, therefore, the separate school system of Manitoba is beyond the reach of the legislature, or of the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. Macdougall, who was in the House at the time, was acquainted with the troubles in Manitoba, had been appointed Governor of that province, and had gone there to investigate the whole matter, is of the same opinion:

We certainly intended that the Catholics of Manitoba, or whichever denomination might be in a minority, should have the right to establish and maintain their own schools. You see the words "or practice" were inserted in the Manitoba Act, so that the difficulty which arose in New Brunswick, where separate schools actually existed, but were not recognized by the law, should not be repeated in Manitoba. And then the right of appeal to the Federal Parliament was given to make assurance doubly sure.

I quote that statement for another purpose. When the hon. member for North Simcoe comes to speak, I have no doubt, from the attention he was directing to the speech of my hon. friend the Finance Minister, this afternoon, that he will attempt to demolish this opinion of Mr. Macdougall by stating, that there is an anachronism in his statement. He will claim, that, at the time the Manitoba Act was passed, the New Brunswick school law had not been passed, and, therefore, Mr. Macdougall must have been mistaken. I will explain the apparent error. In 1870, before the passage of the Manitoba Act by the Parliament of Canada, Mr. King, the present Judge King, who was then the leader of the Conservative party in the legislature of New Brunswick, introduced that Bill into the New Brunswick House.

Mr. McINERNEY. He introduced it in 1869.

Mr. POWELL. Yes, in 1869, and in 1870 the Bill was considered in Committee of the Whole. Mr. King withdrew the Bill, or, at any rate, did not carry it that session, and the government went to the country on the Protestant horse.

Sir, great uneasiness was then felt in New Brunswick, and anxiety was felt, by sympathy, in Quebec. Everybody knew about it at the time, and therefore it was that Mr. Macdougall makes the statement which he makes here. I have another statement from another individual, the Hon. Peter Mitchell, who was a member of the Government of that day. Now, Mr. Mitchell is very strongly opposed to this Government, and therefore the opinion expressed by him on this matter is of great weight. In his declaration speech in the county of Northumberland he said :

He had already stated his opinion of what the Catholic party's rights were in that province. He had stated what took place in 1869 when Archbishop Taché came down to Ottawa from that country at a time when Canada had no way opened up by which she could get into it and when it was important that Louis Riel should be got out of it. One of the conditions agreed to with the Archbishop at that time was that the Catholic schools should be maintained. He, himself, was one of the Cabinet of Canada, who made that agreement, and it was kept for twenty-one years.

Not only that, but we have the testimony in this House of Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Hector Langevin, and my hon. friend the representative of St. John, stated positively the opinion and recollection of Sir Leonard Tilley. Sir Leonard Tilley says that unquestionably it was understood at the time that Manitoba was to have these denominational schools and he himself feels it would be an outrage, a reflection on the character of our politicians in this country, and upon the country itself if this Parliament did not observe the sanctity of this solemn statutory compact.

Now, I come to another matter, and that is the legal construction. I am not going into this question at any length. I think that while the constitution must be, as Sir John Thompson said, the pole star of our national life, I feel with my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) that the main ground in this matter—for after all we must appeal to the common sense of the country and not to the refined legal sense of lawyers, who are a very small portion of the community, we must satisfy the people generally—the main ground is that of a compact. However, I shall discuss for a moment these constitutional provisions. My hon. friend says we must not interfere with the majority. The majority must control. I say that is a doctrine which finds no place whatever in our constitution, so far as these appeal provisions concerning education are concerned. Why, just look for one moment. An appeal lies from the action of whom? It cannot lie from that of the minority; it must lie from that of the majority and nobody else. And if it lie from that of the majority, we recognize that the will of the majority in this matter need not prevail—that, Sir, is the constitutional doctrine. In what case does an appeal lie? If the majority are working an injury by robbing the minority of their rights and privileges. That is the constitution of this country, and the other doctrine is foreign to our constitution. In construing this, they say that Parliament is not bound. I can see that in a certain sense Parliament is not bound. You cannot bind Parliament, you cannot bind the highest courts of Canada. Take the courts of original jurisdiction in the provinces. There is no law under heaven that compels a judge of the Supreme court in New Brunswick or Ontario or any other province to decide a question according to law. He is thrown upon the principles of honour that are in him to work out his duty. There is only one instance that I can at present recall in which a judge does his duty under penalty, and that is in the issuing of a writ of habeas corpus. If he does not issue it when he should, he is subjected to a heavy penalty. In one sense the judges are not forced and Parliament is not forced, but that I do not presume is the sense in which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) desires his argument to be taken. Now, is Parliament compelled, using the word in the sense the hon. gentleman used it, or I presume use it, to pass a remedial law? The power of Parliament in this matter, according to my view, is in a certain sense a discretionary power. It is a discretionary power, however, in affording relief. A discretion to be exercised both as to the measure and nature of the relief in view of the circumstances of each case. It is idle to argue that under all circumstances relief should be given. The legislation granting rights and privileges may have been hasty and inconsiderate, or passed under circumstances which would shock the sense of right and justice. No reasonable man would contend that in such a case it is the duty of Parliament to pass remedial legislation restoring these ill-advised and injudicious concessions. Again, the circumstances of a country may so change that a separate school law would inflict financial or other burdens upon a people too grievous to be borne. In such a case also no reasonable man would contend that remedial law should be passed. The growth of the country would thereby be retarded and disturbance fomented. On the other hand where a legislature ruthlessly and arbitrarily abolishes rights and privileges, it is equally clear that it is the duty of Parliament to pass remedial legislation. In all cases falling between these extremes Parliament should exercise its discretion, in view of all the circumstances of the case, both as to the desirability of remedial legislation, its measure and nature, always bearing in mind that, prima facie, it is the duty of Parliament to afford relief. This is the position which is supported by the views of our most eminent public men, both at the time of and since confederation. I do not hesitate to say that it is the view borne out by the constitution itself, and no man can read either the judgment of the Privy Council, or the dicta of the judges on the argument without being firmly convinced that this is the view of the very eminent jurists who compose the Privy Council, and heard the case. I say that our leading statesmen, both at the time of confederation and since, took this view of the matter. Such, Sir, was the view of Mr. Mackenzie. Such was the view of Sir John Macdonald and Sir John Thompson. It was also the view of Mr. Blake. I have not heard Mr. Blake's opinion in this matter quoted before the House during the debate, and I failed to find it during former debates, strange to say. Now, Mr. Blake has given an opinion on a state of facts similar to those before this House. On page 108 of the "Hansard" of 1872, which is composed of "Globe" reports, we find that speaking on the New Brunswick school laws under consideration, he said :

He gave notice that it was intended at a later stage to move an addition to the motion of Mr. Colby, if that should be adopted, in the following sense:—"And that this House deems it expedient that the opinion of the legal authorities in England should be obtained as to the rights of the New Brunswick legislature to make such changes in the school law as to deprive the Roman Catholics of the privileges they enjoyed at the time of the union, in respect of religious education in the public schools, with a view of ascertaining whether the case comes under the terms of the fourth section of the 93rd clause of the British North America Act, 1867, which authorized the Parliament of Canada to enact remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions respecting education in the said Act." If the local Act did come within the provisions of that section, it would be found quite competent for this Parliament to do that justice which was necessary in case the legislature of New Brunswick declined to act, but he would fain believe, he did from his heart hope that that legislature would be disposed by its voluntary action to make such an alteration as to enable the minority to enjoy those principles which they enjoyed at the period of the union.

If they should fail, however, to do this it would be the incumbent duty of this Parliament, should the local law be a violation of the constitution, so to act as to restore the rights of which the minority would in that event have been unjustly deprived.

So, Sir, this is the suppositious case he put. Then, if the case fell within these sections, and if it was so decided, as the case before the House does fall, and it has been so decided, then Parliament would have the power and it would be the incumbent duty of Parliament to exercise that power, and give the necessary relief. Mr. Mackenzie made a speech on the same occasion, which is reported at page 108 and 109 of the same "Hansard." He said :

He believed then, as he had always believed, that a system of secular education was the one best adapted to promote the education of the people. But they were then creating a constitution which in itself was a compromise of political views, and in preparing the way for that constitution, it became necessary in the one case to agree to the construction of the great Inter-colonial Railway as one of the terms of the inter-provincial agreement required. It also became necessary in the other case to agree to continue the system of separate schools for the Roman Catholics, then in operation in Upper Canada, as a perpetual principle of our common school system. He could not help feeling that it would be but fair that so far as the terms of the constitution would allow it the same rights should be extended to the Roman Catholic minorities in the other provinces, if we did not in extending those rights, infringe upon the peculiar province of the local legislatures. Whether they had done that or not he could not say; but it seemed to him, from very careful reading of the Union Act, and the New Brunswick School Act that there was at least much room for doubt and the weaker party ought to have, as far as possible, the benefit of that doubt. Under these circumstances he had been led to give the vote he had given to-night, although in the last vote, if the Government had not agreed to accept the amendment that had been read by the hon. member for West Durham, and which he was about to offer, the vote might have very materially differed from what it actually was. Many on his side, would have preferred voting for the extreme measure of recommending a disallowance of the Act rather than deprive the minority in New Brunswick of all possible chance of redress for the wrong committed, but he had confidence in the deliverance of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and if it should turn out that there had been a mistake committed in dealing with this question by the present Administration the Judicial Committee would undoubtedly give such an opinion as would compel the Administration of this House to do justice in this particular. He did not propose to detain the House by discussing this subject as it had been very fully discussed in its legal aspect by the hon. member for West Durham, with whose opinion he fully concurred.

Now, Sir John Macdonald has given expression to his opinion—very strong expression. Speaking of the Roman Catholics in New Brunswick in 1872, he said :

The true course was to fight in the local legislature for separate schools. If they wanted them let them follow the example of the Catholics of Ontario. He believed they had a just cause, and it was for the interests of education if the Catholics wanted separate schools, to grant them. An important body like the New Brunswick Catholics could succeed if they struggled for their object like the Catholics elsewhere. If they obtained separate schools the Confederation Act would guarantee them in their possession.

Sir John Thompson had the same view of the constitution. In order to settle the question whether the Government had power to hear the appeal or not, he referred the matter to the courts. This course, which was also endorsed by this House, shows his opinion to be that Parliament should interfere—otherwise what sense would there be in putting the country to the expense of deciding whether Parliament had the right to interfere or not, unless he was of the opinion and decided to act on the opinion that it was the duty of Parliament to grant remedial legislation if the Privy Council should decide that we had the power.

The Privy Council, in their judgment, by the most unmistakable implication, say it is the duty of Parliament to grant remedial legislation :

Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute. It is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd section of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

On the authority, therefore, of Canada's greatest statesmen of both political parties, and of the highest court for England's colonial Empire, this Parliament is bound to pass such a measure of remedial legislation as in our discretion under all the circumstances of the case will afford in a proper way an ample measure of relief. If this Parliament declines to interfere, we are ignoring, nay, practically eliminating from the constitution all the provisions relating to appeal which in good faith were incorporated therein, to stand to, abide by and perform which this Dominion, including Manitoba, is solemnly pledged as the basal law of our national life.

I feel, like gentlemen opposite, who gave strong expression to their views, that it is a matter that should be left, as far as possible, to the province of Manitoba. I always held that view: The reason why I favour Parliament taking up the question is that Manitoba will not do anything. She has announced her intention of not doing anything. Talk about scant courtesy. My hon. friend talks about animosity and about the terrible treatment that this Government has meted out to Manitoba. Gentlemen opposite use very strong terms. If the Government were thieves and traitors, they could hardly meet with more vituperation from hon. gentlemen. Let us look at the facts and see what the course of Manitoba has been. When the matter came up, the Roman Catholic bishops, to the number of thirty-one, laid a memorial before the Government of Canada, asking their interference in this matter and their good offices with the province of Manitoba. Now, this was before there was any trouble at all, and this Government set forth a full statement of facts in a message to the Manitoba government, the closing paragraph of which was as follows:—

The committee beg to observe to Your Excellency that the statements which are contained in this memorial are matter of deep concern and solicitude in the interests of the Dominion at large, and that it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and religious belief and practice; and the committee therefore humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hope that the legislatures of Manitoba and of the North-west Territories respectively, may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.

There was no coercion in that. That is one of the most polite missives that possibly could have been sent. And what did the government of Manitoba do? They took the stand they now take. They said: We repudiate any idea of injustice in our legislation; we will pay no attention to your complaints ; we will stand or fall squarely by our legislation. After the first decision of the Privy Council, the Government undertook to hear this appeal. They invited Manitoba in the first place to argue the question whether the minority had a right to appeal. But the government of Manitoba treated the invitation with contempt, and would not even appear to argue the matter. What did the Government of Canada do? In order that there should be fair-play, at the expense of the people of Canada, they employed Mr. Christopher Robinson to argue the case on that province. The second judgment has decided that we had the power, under the provisions, of appeal in this particular case. The Government then decided to hear the appeal. It is complained, that the time allowed to Manitoba was short. Unfortunately, the time between the receipt of the judgment and the sitting of Parliament was very short indeed. But the Government gave them fair notice. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) appeared as their advocate. He was completely conversant with their case. He had argued the first appeal before the Privy Council. So that no wrong was done, not the slightest. These affidavits were submitted but they were not used, and so there was no need to rebut them. Fully instructed the hon. and learned gentleman went on and argued the case like any other counsel. After that what took place? After the order was passed last year, explanations were given on the floor of this House. Mr. Greenway and the members of his government must read the papers. They must have known, then, that the Government announced that they were not going to stand upon the letter of the Order in Council, that they intended to be moderate and did not intend to implement that order fully in a statute. They adopted the course of sending a conciliatory letter to the government of Manitoba. That letter was sent in July, 1895, and Mr. Greenway had July, August, September, October and November to answer it. He did not answer it but kept it back for the express purpose, in league, I have no doubt, with hon. gentlemen opposite, of submitting Manitoba's answer just on the eve of the sitting of Parliament, so that no negotiations could be carried on. They allowed all these months to go by, and four days before Parliament met, the document reached this Government in Ottawa. What was this for? They knew Parliament was convened, and the Remedial Bill was to be submitted to Parliament, and they only left the Dominion Government four days to act. Their whole policy was to embarrass this Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite may take what course they please in this matter ; but I would refer them to the course pursued by Sir John A. Macdonald, when in Opposition in 1875 ; I would refer them to the course pursued by Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Blake in Opposition to the Macdonald Government in 1872. These gentlemen on both sides took a noble and patriotic stand. They did not attempt to make any political capital out of the trying circumstances in which the Government was placed, in respect to the New Brunswick school difficulty, but with instincts true to the interests of the country, and true to the peace, safety and good government of the Dominion, they bent all their energies to assisting the Government of the day to carry out a policy which they thought would be in the best interests of Canada. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who I see has this moment taken his seat, also belongs to the illustrious roll of gentlemen who are in favour of what they are pleased to call coercion. He is an eminent authority in its favour. Sir, if you will consult the confederation debates what will you find? I am not referring to the point made by the Minister of Finance, that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec were not consulted as to this great constitutional scheme, involved in confederation ; but I am calling attention to this fact, that when it was brought expressly by resolution before this House, and to the knowledge of the hon. member for South Oxford and his colleagues, that an attempt was being made to throttle—I have heard the word used on the other side—the province of Ontario in respect to educational matters, and to stereotype the rights and privileges of the minority there, so that thereafter there could be no change that would prejudicially affect them, the hon. gentleman was one of the men who voted for arbitrarily depriving the province of Ontario of its authority in that respect. By his vote he said to that province : You cannot manage your own business, we will prevent you from doing it. Now, Sir, I intend to vote for the second reading of the Bill. I think this matter has been dangled before Parliament and the country long enough. It is time some action was taken. As long as it remains were it is, the unrest that exists in this country—I am using, probably, too strong a term—will be prolonged. The Bill that is before the House, hon. gentlemen opposite complain, does not afford a full measure of relief. By that agreement that was entered into at the time of confederation between the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and the Dominion of Canada, it was provided that the right previously existing should continue to exist, namely, that the different denominations should, at their own expense, maintain their own schools, and be under no liability to contribute to the support of other schools. Now, the relief which is given here amounts to this : In that province the school fund comes from three sources, from the province, from the municipality and from the district. The great bulk of the funds come from the district and from the municipality ; and amounts of those two funds that are contributed by Roman Catholics, are to go back to them for the purpose of maintaining their schools, and to this extent it is fully on the lines of the agreement that was arrived at when Manitoba entered confederation. This Parliament has gone further and done what it has a right to do, it declares that the Roman Catholics are entitled to their share of the provincial funds devoted to education. The hon. gentleman from Queen's thinks the Bill should have commanded Manitoba to pay over the moneys. It is useless to attempt to lay down rules for the guidance of Manitoba in respect to grants of public money. They have power to frustrate any legislation of this Parliament in that respect. This Bill has not undertaken then to go further than to make a statutory declaration. This Bill is a splendidly conceived Bill. It gives the maximum of relief with the minimum of interference. There is not the slightest principle of coercion in it. It does not compel the majority of Manitoba to do a single thing with respect to the Roman Catholics; but it says to the Roman Catholics: If you want separate schools, you can take your own money and pay for them, and you may have your fair share of the provincial funds. The Bill provides for efficiency of the separate school and leaves the matter there. I shall have much pleasure in voting for the second reading of the Bill as a measure wise in design, conciliatory in purpose, well calculated to ensure the peace and harmony of the people of the most promising province of the Dominion.

Mr. FRASER. At this late hour I shall not detain the House very long; but I wish to make a few remarks on this question that has been engaging the attention of this legislature and of the people of Canada for the last two or three weeks. First, let me call the attention of the House to one very remarkable thing. When this question was first brought before the people of Canada, the friends of the Government said they were forced to do it in obedience to the constitution. That was the only ground. But if the position of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) is correct, we must do this because there was a bill of rights that was not included in the statute that binds us. Now, the Minister of Finance leaves every other ground aside and appeals to party loyalty. When he felt that he had no case, he turned and in his most pathetic tones, he implored his followers, on account of the party, to stand by the Government, even if they did not want to, for fear the great party should be destroyed. Those were the closing words that rang through this building as he implored and besought them to vote for the Bill on account of the party that for 18 years had directed the destinies of this country with such remarkable success. Although they might not see their way clear, they should forego their conscientious convictions, and vote to support the party and swallow their convictions. Those are the two grounds they have now. Driven from every point that the Government attempted to take, they come down now to the fact that a bill of rights existed, and secondly, that the party must be sustained. Sir, I must say that there have been some amusing incidents in this debate, but of all the speeches we have heard, none was so amusing as the speech of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). That hon. gentleman, if the papers reported him correctly, after having said that he would never support this Bill, vaulted last night in true acrobatic style. He first stood on his head, then stood on his feet, then he went through the high bar practice, and then through the low bar practice, and finally he fell on a cushion prepared for such men. He rose again, and then he waved his hand to the audience in order that he might obtain their approbation. He is ready to vote for this Bill in order that, when it gets into committee, he may take out of it everything except national schools, leaving nothing for the Catholics. He says he would have voted with the leader of the Opposition if that hon. gentleman had only asked for an investigation, or had done anything else except move the six months' hoist. This was a feat worthy of the hon. member for Leeds, and worthy of this Parliament. I could not help thinking, as I listened to him, to what straights, after all, party fealty will bring a man. I never saw such an exhibition in my life as I did from that hon. gentleman. He had made a statement outside that he would not support the Bill; in effect he said so in the House; but he has been assiduously worked upon by the Government since then, and now he finds that he must say something, and to save himself, he pretends that when the Bill gets into committee he will eliminate everything that savours of Catholicism in the schools, so that there shall be no religion at all in them. How he can square himself with his constituents is something that I will not undertake to answer. Now, coming to the main question, I wish to refer to some things said by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). It will be noticed that the whole argument of the hon. gentleman was confined to one point, that there had been bills of rights, No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3, and when confronted by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) with the fact that the minutes of the meetings authorizing these parties to conduct negotiations contained no word of such a document, what had the hon. gentleman to say? He said that the instructions must have been given beforehand, and the delegates were sent away in a hurry, evidently to do something which they were not authorized to do. If that is an argument, I hold, as has been shown by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that it must be eliminated from the discussion. What have we? If there be two, three or four bills of rights affecting this question, and there is such a difference of opinion existing respecting them, no stronger argument could be submitted in favour of investigation. Certainly there is no other method of ascertaining whether bills of rights No. 1, 2, 3, or 4 is the correct one. Has any one come to a conclusion in regard to them except the hon. member for Westmoreland? It is, however, in my opinion playing with the question to talk about bills of rights having anything to do with it.

The hon. member for Westmoreland began his speech by eulogizing the present leader of the House. As a young man he evidently wishes to ingratiate himself with that hon. gentleman. He then proceeded to deal with mummies, next he went to the house of the Pharaohs; he then proceeded to Barcelona; then he posed as an ecclesiastical authority and ended with a homily on juvenile education. All this was gravely gone over in this House when the only question before it is as to which of two measures is the better one to adopt to remove the difficulty. There has been more discussion on the real issue from the other side of the House than was necessary for transacting the whole business of Parliament. What is the issue? It is this: it being agreed that there is a grievance and that a remedy should be applied, which is the better method of rectifying the wrong? The hon. gentlemen opposite have spent more time in proceeding to sustain a truth that was admitted than was ever used by any individual in trying to support a paradox. Why discuss these immaterial matters when we are face to face with an important issue? How shall we meet it? The hon. member for Westmoreland spoke about three positions taken by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier). Speaking of the agreement if there was such an agreement why should it not have been put into a statute and made clear so that the public would be aware of it. If it is admitted that the Privy Council did not deal with it in the first judgment, why did they not deal with it in the second judgment, and let Parliament redress the wrong which prevails. They had the chance then. What did Lord Watson say? It was not that there was a bill of rights or an agreement under a statute, but he said that this Parliament may legislate in the matter if it pleases. It was the same court that gave decisions in both of the cases. The hon. member for Westmoreland referred to the language used by Mr. Blake in the New Brunswick case. Mr. Blake said "if the local government fail." That is what the Opposition say to-day. It is not a question as to whether or not this Parliament has authority. That is admitted. It is not a question whether or not in order to remedy an injustice action should be taken. That is admitted. The whole question, and it cannot be brought before the public too prominently or too frequently is, as to which is the better method to carry out this matter. The hon. gentleman said that no doubt it should be left to be dealt with by Manitoba, but Manitoba would do nothing. Any one who has read the documents cannot say that Manitoba has not declared she would do nothing. It might be said that Manitoba might go further; that would be a legitimate argument, but to say that Manitoba will do nothing shows that the hon. gentleman either has not read the evidence or has given to it a wrong construction. This question of method is one possessing a good deal of importance. The method by which we do anything is important. The way you woo a maid is important. The lover may attempt to carry her off according to the style of the ancients, or he may appeal to her as young men do nowadays and gain her assent. Once on a time the King of England sent to the King of Scotland a message to this effect: I am going to send an army to take your daughter and marry her to the Prince of Wales, so as to join the two nations. A lord in parliament rose and said: I do not so much object to the match as to the mode of the wooing. The question of method in this question now under consideration is an important one. I will not enter into a discussion as to the steps taken or as to the documents which have passed between the governments, but evidence is coming to the front every day to strengthen the position of the Opposition. We have had two scenes in the play to-day. We have had the Finance Minister appealing to the noble sentiments of the Conservative party to stand by him in this ditch in which he is placed, and to stand by him whether the Government are right or wrong.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman is always ready to support his party; he is always ready to support them first and last, whether they are right or wrong. Then another scene in the play was acted by the hon. member for Westmoreland, who urged that the question of the bill of rights was everything. I met a gentleman on the platform, the hon. ex-Minister of Justice, who stated that the Government were bound by the constitution and they could not avoid issuing the remedial order. But if the Government were bound to act, no credit rests with them for having acted. So it appears that the Government were simply acting as a machine to register what the Privy Council declared they should do. Now this position is abandoned. Reference has been made to changes which have taken place in the opinions of members on this side of the House; but hon. gentlemen opposite have also changed in opinion. When an hon. gentleman said that the action taken by this side of the House resembled the last throw of the gambler, he should have remembered that circumstances indicate that this question has been taken up by hon. gentlemen opposite only for the purpose of gaining votes. There are Conservatives to-day who consider the action of the Government was a blunder, and the only answer which those who favour it can make is that they intended to have an election and gain the Roman Catholic vote.

But whether that be true or not, it is the evidence given by our Conservative friends themselves. Driven to the last ditch, disagreeing amongst themselves, kicking out one and taking in another, the head where the tail should be, and the tail where the head should be, they find that the country is not with them, and they attempt to snap a catch vote from the Catholics, by holding themselves up as martyrs for the Catholic religion. Great heavens, has it come to this? Has it come to pass that such men as are on the other side—no worse and no better than others of their kind—that Sir Adolphe Caron, and others such, are to be the only men who will stand up in Canada for the rights of the Catholics. Sir, I tell them, they are reckoning without their host. The Catholics of Canada are not the people to be caught with such chaff as that. Our Catholic citizens are as intelligent as our Protestant citizens, and these gentlemen do no great honour to the Catholics, when, as members of this House have boasted to me, they think that the action of the Government on this occasion, and the action of the Liberal party to the contrary, is not going to leave a corporal's guard of Liberals in the province of Quebec. They hope that this method will gain Quebec to them, and they expect by a double shuffle, to retain their friends in Ontario, by saying, that they had to pass this legislation to sustain the Conservative party. They use the same arguments in Ontario, as the woman caught in the crime did, when she said: it was not a big baby after all. Sir, if this were not a serious question it would be so farcical as to create shouts of laughter. The position of these gentlemen of the Government is such, that one cannot view them as having any regard at all for statesmanship. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that never in the history of our Parliament had we such an exhibition as was presented to-day, and I am sorry for it. It is bad enough when consent is obtained to publish correspondence, to suppress a portion of it, because the consent may imply authority to use such parts of the correspondence as suited; but, when a great question is agitating this country, concerning which only part of a public paper is published and a part left out, and, published without even the consent of the party sending it, then it goes to show the desperate straits which hon. gentlemen opposite are in. We know that the whole purpose of publishing that telegram was to attempt to strengthen the backs of hon. gentlemen opposite who are not inclined to vote with the Government in this matter. They did it in order to say to those gentlemen: Vote for the second reading, sustain the party on the second reading of this Bill, and we can say afterwards that we brought Manitoba to her knees, and that it was a good thing, for we gained the end that we desired, namely, to get the question out of the way. I submit, Sir, that these are the last shifts of desperate men, who find themselves standing on unsheltered ground. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, this question is now brought before the House under compulsion. It should have been before the House last session, but it is brought before us now when there is some doubt as to whether there will be time enough to pass it. I verily believe, Sir, that there may be enough ingenuity on the other side of the House, to evade this spirit of Christian purpose on behalf of the minority, and to make it impossible to pass the Bill this session. Last year the hon. Mr. Angers left their Cabinet, because the Bill was not submitted to the House. Why was it not presented to us last year, when something might have been done in the meantime to bring about a reconciliation. Are nations to deal with one another as individuals might. Should it not be generous for the greater to take the first step towards conciliating the lesser. Manitoba is a new province. Perhaps they may not have the same views of what they ought to do, as the Dominion of Canada has. Surely the very fact that they may fall short if they do fall short, ought to be the very best argument why the Dominion of Canada should say: we will treat you in a different way from that in which we have treated you. Why did the Dominion not say, to Manitoba: You are wrong, let us reason out this matter together, and try and settle it. But, Sir, the Dominion Government have done the very reverse of that. Let there be no misunderstanding about this point. I speak here as a Protestant, and I say, that while there is a grievance, and when that grievance is well established, that grievance ought to be rectified. I say here to-night, lest there should be misunderstanding: that when Manitoba refuses to rectify that grievance, after the grievance has been established, I for one pledge myself, if I am here, and I pledge myself to-night even if I never come here again, that I will be the first to stand up and say, that a province that will not do the right when properly approached, shall be coerced into doing it. Why did not this Government take the same position. If they had done that, they would have been so powerful, that there would be scarcely a voice raised against them to-day. But, Sir, they have not taken such a course, and that is the reason that there is such division at the present time; division not between both parties, but division of opinion among hon. gentlemen opposite and among some hon. gentlemen on this side. I can very well understand how gentlemen taking strong views, feel that these views ought to be presented in this House, and ought to colour the votes they give. I can understand why some hon. gentlemen are led that way, and led honestly, I have no doubt. But surely, a great nation like Canada, ought to deal with this question in a broad and generous spirit. Are we to treat national matters of this kind, as if we were dealing with a man who refuses to pay a little account. Should we not act in a more magnanimous spirit?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this legislation until such time as we have exhausted every means of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion with Manitoba. I am opposed to it on four grounds. First: I oppose the Bill for the reason that the Bill is not in the interest of the minority. Hon. gentlemen may say, that this Bill is in the interests of the minority. I claim, Sir, that it is not. The other night the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) tried to sail north by south, attempting to be very strong in one way, but at the same time speaking strongly on the other. When he said that he wanted this matter for ever settled, did it strike him that the passing of this Act was the very thing that would never settle it. Sir, it can only be settled in one way, and that is, by getting the majority of the province of Manitoba, the neighbours of the minority with whom they live, to come to such an agreement as will make the settlement permanent. Is the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) going to settle it in the way he proposes. Sir, there is going to be lawsuits after lawsuits before this Act, which is altogether unintelligible to any man is going to settle the question. In the meantime are not hard feelings likely to be kept in most active operation during all these years? What will be the disposition of our Catholic friends if the minority there, after years of contest over this Act, when it is declared, as I believe it will be declared, to be of no value or help to them. Driven from post to pillar, and finding that the act they had trusted a great government to pass—a government weeping for their woes and longing to help them—is no good, will not the feeling of those people be ten-fold worse than they are to-day, not only towards the Conservative party, but towards every party in Canada? Do you not suppose that this Act will be taken from court to court? The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) wants peace; he wants this question settled. Does he think such a measure will bring peace or settle the question? He will not have peace until the question is sent to the court of last resort, the legislature of Manitoba, and settled there. He will never obtain a peace which is lasting except by going to the people of Manitoba; and when you appeal to the people of any province there is generosity enough in them, as there is in an individual, to do the right thing. Nothing worse could happen to the minority than the passing of this Act. It will not gain them what they want; it will be barren of results. They will find themselves in this position; they will have to support their schools out of their own pockets without any aid whatever. They will find the Act so inoperative that they will feel that they came here and asked for bread and received a stone; and that feeling will so rankle in their breasts that they will give no peace—

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman has referred to me. He manifests an anxiety to protect the minority. I would ask him, if the Bill is acceptable to the minority, why should we interpose?

Mr. FRASER. There is no evidence that it is acceptable to the minority. But even if it were, I would express my opinion as to whether it would gain the end.

Mr. KENNY. But you put your opinion against theirs.

Mr. FRASER. If the hon. gentleman is speaking for the whole body of the minority of Manitoba, I accept his statement. If he has been commissioned to say here that it is acceptable to the whole minority or the greater portion of them, I will accept his statement. But what proof have we that it is acceptable to the minority? Here is one of the clearest-headed men in the Government ranks, the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), who declares that it is not acceptable to him. He has given notice of amendments which, if carried, would revolutionize this Bill. It is not acceptable to this gentleman who knows more about the race, the language and the religion of those people, a great deal, than the hon. member for Halifax; and if it is not acceptable to that hon. gentleman, who I believe conscientiously wants to help the minority, all I have to say is that the hon. member for Halifax had better keep silent instead of making himself the self-constituted champion of the minority of Manitoba. I might give other reasons to show that it is not acceptable to the minority. It may be acceptable to a minority who are hide-bound to the Government, who are ready to help the Government out of the strait they are in by everything and anything. It may be satisfactory to the hon. member for Halifax and to others like him. But to the well-wishers of Manitoba this Bill is not acceptable, I am sure. If time permitted, I could quote the opinion of some of the best papers representing the Catholics in Canada that it will not gain the end and will not be operative.

I am opposed to the Bill, in the second place, because it is not in the interest of the majority. Majorities have rights as well as minorities. I maintain that in a province where there is a majority and a minority, there is only one method by which they can be welded together, that is, by the good feeling that ought to exist between them. I maintain that the majority ought to have the fullest possible opportunity of rectifying the wrong that is said to exist before being compelled by an Act of Parliament. Surely the majority have a right to come here and say: We are ready to rectify any wrong that exists and do the right thing by our neighbours who are living amongst us, and we ask you as a Government, before you undertake to bring compulsion upon us, to investigate this matter. Let it not be forgotten that the Government themselves, while pretending to throw off all responsibility for it, have sent a plenipotentiary to Winnipeg in this direction. I could not help thinking, as the hon. Secretary of State read the telegram of Mr. Greenway, how altogether independent of the action of the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) the Government must have been, though they were ready to take advantage of it. Does any man think that that hon. member would go to Winnipeg without the concurrence of the Government? Was he going to imperil the interests of the majority or the interests of the minority in that province? He has great interests there himself; was he going to imperil them? Was he going to imperil the interests of the Government he supports? Does any man in his reason think that he would not know the exact ground on which he stood? Does any man believe that he did not go there with the tacit consent—nay, more—with the approbation of the Government? And if that commission was taken with the knowledge and approbation of the Government, by that one act they have given the greatest possible argument to prove that the position of the leader of the Opposition is correct. Were they simply playing a game and acting a part—allowing this man to go as a free lance, to see what he could do himself? As was very well said by the hon. member for South Oxford, the hon. member for Montreal West, finding the Government acting so strangely, might very well believe that he had more wisdom to settle this matter than they. I believe this was simply an attempt made by the Government to get out of the difficult position in which they have placed themselves.

I shall oppose this Bill, in the third place, because it is not in the interest of Manitoba. The minority have interests; the majority have interests; Manitoba as a whole has interests. That is a great province. The hon. member for Halifax said he wanted this Bill, a coercive Bill, passed, as if it was to be the nicest piece of taffy to send to Manitoba; and British gold would pour into that province as soon as it was coerced. A fine place for a man to settle in—a province up in arms against the Central Government. I say that the passing of this Act is going to be the worst thing that could happen to Manitoba, because it will put that province into such a state of ferment that men will not want to go there. Men want to go where they will have peaceful surroundings and live on pleasant relations with their neighbours. Would any man in his senses go to Cuba to-day? No. You want peace and quietness in Manitoba. You want every man to believe that when he goes there he is going to a province where he will not only have the fruit of his labour, but where he will be surrounded by such conditions and such influences as will enable him to labour in peace. I oppose the Bill in the interest of that bright young country, which, perhaps, being new, may not have the same quiet habits and disposition, may not receive an affront with the same equanimity which an older province would display, for there is such a thing as youth not listening as calmly as age—a man of years will listen to an insult which a young man will be quick to resent, and I know that the brightest young men of Canada who have gone to Manitoba are not as well calculated perhaps as older provinces like Quebec or Ontario, or even the lower provinces, to listen to and accept what may be done or said by this Parliament. I think the passage of this Act will have results exactly the reverse of what the hon. member for Halifax thinks it will. Just now we want to do something for that country. In Winnipeg, a few days ago, there was a large gathering of farmers who passed resolutions condemning the Government policy, so far as immigration was concerned, and, as I understand it, the Government themselves have almost admitted that their policy has failed. Are you to add to disappointment of these people and their feeling of rancour on this subject, the more intense agitation which is bound to develop if the course contemplated by the Government under this Bill is persisted in? Will not the hon. member for Halifax take the lesson to his heart that however kindly his disposition may be, however plausible and fascinating may be his speech, this Act, if put in force, is likely to work most mischievously in that province, particularly as regards the minority whose cause the hon. gentleman seeks to defend. Manitoba will resist, and while we may regret that the issue was raised, we cannot help thinking that after all Manitoba will have some right in doing so.

I oppose the Bill, lastly, because it is opposed to the best interests of the people of Canada as a whole. We hear a good deal from time to time about building up a young nation, and about nationality, race and religion. Does not the course of the Government indicate that a dangerous time has come? Does not the fact that we find Protestants, on the one side, saying things they should not, and our Catholic friends on the other side giving utterance to sentiments they should not, indicate that we have reached a serious condition of things which ought to make the Government pause and consider. Are they going to persist, before they have exhausted the methods to which they should have resorted and which true statesmanship would have suggested to them, are they going to persist in a course which must result in intensifying the disposition of the people of Canada—a disposition for which I offer no apology whatever, because I regret that it exists—to excite province against province, race against race and religion against religion. In the interests of Canada, in the interests of all that is best and fairest in Canada, I would plead with this House that we should take some other method of settling this wrong. Wrong if it exists, let us meet it in a higher and better way. Do you think that the fact that on every hustings we shall have this question discussed, that we shall have men violently contradicting each other on a question that touches the very deepest fibre of their being, is going to promote a reasonable and proper consideration by the people of the proper issues which alone ought to come before the electorate? I have no doubt that the Government courts that kind of thing. I have no doubt that they court it now, as they have courted it at other elections, in order to conceal the real issues from the people. I should ask the Government earnestly to consider that if Canada is ever going to become a nation, it will never become a nation by coercion. The history of the world proves that. Coercion has been attempted in every land under the sun, and everywhere it has signally failed. When England attempted to coerce Scotland either by forcing her to become a part of the union or imposing a religion upon her, she failed. When England was for centuries attempting to coerce Ireland, she failed. If she had approached that generous nation in the spirit apparently exercised by the hon. member for Halifax, if she had gone to that nation with kindly words and acts, do you think that we should have had the revolutions in that country we have had? Do you think that we should have had sore hearts and bitter words in that noble nationality, wherever they are, against the wrongs inflicted on them by a coercion similar to that which the hon. member for Halifax now boasts he is going to inflict on Manitoba? You can never do anything by coercion. The quicker new nations learn that lesson from the history of the world the quicker they shall attain their full growth and earn the respect of all that is best in the history of civilization. I am reminded of that period in the history of Nova Scotia when feelings ran high, and my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. Cameron) will remember that period too, for he was then an ardent anti-confederate. He will remember when the local legislature of Nova Scotia, with the concurrence of the Dominion members then supporting the anti-Conservative party, passed repeal resolutions and set the heather on fire. He can remember very well the spirit that was then excited in that province, and I would recall the memorable occasion when this chamber heard for the last time the words of the greatest Irishman Canada ever produced. Were those words for coercion, although rebellious resolutions had been passed in Nova Scotia? No, Thomas D'Arcy McGee's last words in this chamber were impregnated by the spirit of kindness. They breathed the most kindly spirit of conciliation, he urged that the last feeling of irritation that existed in the minds of the people of Nova Scotia should be removed by generosity and forbearance on our part; and he went out from this building after delivering that speech, only to lose his valuable life at the hands of an assassin. Shall we be less willing than were the men of that day to put in practice the noble principles to which he gave utterance? Now, after twenty-eight years in the history of Canada, are we going to attempt to coerce this young province of Manitoba? Are we going to approach it with the bludgeon in our hand? If we do, we will find that what they would be willing to grant, if properly approached, they will refuse to grant at the mouth of the pistol. I think that we ought to redress this wrong by the method proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition. Whatever that wrong may be, we should, when we have discovered it, redress it by the method he proposed. Surely if anything gives hope to Canada, it is the fact that the leader of a great party, himself more interested in this question on account of race and religion, than the majority in this House, should stand up in this House and proclaim to the free men of Canada principles which I believe will find acceptance in the heart of every one who rightly values his own liberty and desires that Canada should increase and prosper. I say that for those reasons and others, which I might give if the hour were not so late, I shall vote against this Bill. I shall vote in favour of having an investigation and approaching Manitoba in a spirit of conciliation and peace. And I believe, if we approach Manitoba in that spirit, we will have a response that will settle this question upon such terms as may not only do the minority justice, but weld them to the people of Canada and show by an object-lesson to both Catholics and Protestants that the higher is the better law. I hope that we shall not again be troubled with questions which affect men so deeply, and which, when used as the Government use them solely for the purpose of gaining votes, can only have one result, and that is not the betterment of Canada but rather its destruction.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL: communicating to Newspapers before being laid on the Table; objection (Sir Richard Cartwright) 825 (i).

REMEDIAL ACT (MAN.) IN COM.: Question raised by Mr. McCarthy that Mr. Mara is not authorized to act as Chairman, as under the Orders of the Hse. a Permanent Chairman of Committees has been appointed, 5732; Ruling (Mr. Mara) that when the Hse. is in Committee, it is governed by its own Rules and Orders, quotes "Bourinot," 5734; Mr. McCarthy appeals from ruling and Mr. Speaker takes the Chair and rules that Acting Chairman must be sustained, and on a division the ruling is sustained (Y. 93, N. 25) 5735-37 (ii).

— ON M. FOR COM.: on Amt. (Mr. McCarthy) to ref. B. to Supreme Court: Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper raises the question that this is not the proper stage of the Bill for such an Amt.; Ruling (Mr. Speaker) 4349-52 (ii).

— IN COM.: M. (Sir Charles Tupper) Com. rise and rep.; objection (Mr. McCarthy) that as Hse. has already disposed of a similar order this M. cannot follow in order without an intervening proceeding; Ruling (Mr. Deputy Speaker) 6459 (ii).

SATURDAY SITTINGS: Motion as read by Mr. Speaker not the same as Notice on Order Paper; Ruling (Mr. Speaker) that notice may be amended by consent of Hse.; Mr. Casey contends that Amt. is out of Order; Ruling (Mr. Speaker) Motion as amended in Order, 5125-32 (ii).

SUPPLY: on M. (Mr. Foster) for Com.; objection (Sir Richard Cartwright) that it is contrary to all custom and rules to consider Estimates without having the Auditor Gen.'s Rep. before the Hse., 766 (i).

TARTE, J. I., PAYMENTS TO BY PUBLIC DEPTS.: on Amt. (Mr. Foster) relevancy of Amt. questioned by Mr. Mills, Bothwell; Mr. Speaker ruled the Amt. in Order, 1451-53 (i).
